OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, March 2, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I notice that at adjournment last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that he understood there was an arrangement that we should continue to-day with the debate on Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations, after which we would take up the bill to incorporate the Bank of Canada. The arrangement to which my right hon. friend referred is possibly one which he may have had with his own Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), but as I understand it, there has been no arrangement between the two sides of the house. In connection with the bill to incorporate the Bank of Canada I did tell the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that if it were agreeable we would be prepared to proceed this afternoon, but nothing was said with respect to the other legislation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is quite right. When I indicated that Bill No. 4 would be taken up, I did so because it had been discussed previously and given precedence in the early part of the week. As I indicated, I thought it was the understanding that it would be proceeded with again to-day. The right hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that there was no arrangement with the opposition to this effect. I understand that he will not be here on Monday and possibly on Tuesday, and it is not probable that I shall be here on one of those days. If he desires, the Bank of Canada bill can stand until Thursday. We could then proceed this afternoon with the discussion as indicated last night. I do not think we could take a division to-night as so many members are away, but possibly at nine o'clock or before we could take up some items in supply. I desire to suit the convenience of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The translations bill is one which affects in a very special way hon. members from the province of Quebec. My right hon. friend knows that Friday is not a very good day for the discussion of measures which affect particularly members from that province. I think there is a recognition of that fact between the different sides of the house. For this reason it was a bit of a surprise to us to find that this particular bill was mentioned for discussion to-day. I think it would meet with the approval of hon. members on this side of the house if it could stand over, but we leave ourselves in the hands of the government. As to the bill to incorporate the Bank of Canada, if it is agreeable to hon. members in other parts of the house to proceed at once, we are quite ready to do so. If not, I think perhaps it would be advisable that it should not come up on a day when the Prime Minister and I, myself, might both be away, although it is not absolutely necessary that it should not. However, I would prefer to be here.

Mr. BENNETT: We desire to accommodate ourselves to the wishes of the house in a matter of this kind. Perhaps the same consideration would obtain with respect to the Bank of Canada bill as with respect to the translations bill, as I understand an amendment is to be moved to the former. Under the circumstances, we would prefer not to proceed to-day. Might I suggest that we go on with the translations bill until six o'clock and not proceed further. One hon. gentleman is in the middle of his speech and I notice others present who are vitally affected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank the Prime Minister for endeavouring to accommodate us, but perhaps it would be better if it were understood that we proceed with the translations bill until such time as it may be desirable to adjourn.

Mr. BENNETT: We will do that if it meets with the approval of the house. We shall proceed with Bill No. 4 until such time as the debate may be adjourned and then take up an item in supply.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Chevrier.

Mr. GEORGES BOUCHARD (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Tuesday last I was endeavouring to indicate the sound fundamentals of the French language. The pride which I take in my mother tongue must be qualified by the fact that certain impurities have crept into the language of educated people, due to environment, to hardships, to the mingling of English and French forms of expression and to the introduction of commercial and professional phrases and colloquialisms. This makes it very necessary to maintain a high standard of perfection in the translation of French into English and English into French. If translation were only the mere substitution of a word from one language into another, then perhaps in our craze for economy we might have a machine with a finger-board so arranged as to produce a French word as one touched the corresponding English word, just as we have the adding machine for accountants. But, Mr. Speaker, translation is a much more difficult task than that. I would invite this house to consider this fact, that even a highly-qualified bilingual man is not necessarily a good translator. I should hesitate myself, with the knowledge I have of the French language, to undertake the translation of my own speeches; and perhaps, if the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) would himself try it, with his long experience, he would at times find it a very arduous undertaking.

In an address over the radio under the auspices of the Professional Institute of the Civil Service, Monsieur Pierre Daviault, a learned translator and a well known author, said last year:

To translate is not to substitute words to other words. To the translator the text is merely the author's thought in its rough state that he must fashion into words. It is incumbent on him to shape it into a form which will make it convey its full meaning. The translator's task is nothing short of a literary essay, and to translate presents all the difficulties inherent to the essay, but is even more difficult. Translation is not the expression of one's thought, which is familiar and always present to one's mind. The translator must assimilate a thought that is not his own, a frame of mind and the shades of thought of another. Besides, he has to be imbued with the author's style, because the translation must preserve the original tone.

I quote another paragraph from the same lecture:

What could not be said of the traps laid by the vocabulary! There are no perfect equivalents between two languages. "From one language to another," wrote Albert Dauzat in la Philosophie du Langage, "there is no equivalence in the means of expression and a strictly adequate translation of a conversation or of a literary work can hardly be conceived. The number of ideas that may be expressed by a word varies from one language to another and the mutual associations created by a common term are so close that the evocation of one almost invariably infers that of another idiomatically different: the result will be an alteration of the notion, imperceptible perhaps, but not less certain. . . ."

And towards the close of his address he said:

The technical vocabulary with its innumerable, varied and changing words is a constant cause of concern to the translator. There is no dictionary which embodies all its modifications. Only by reading scientific works written in both languages is it possible, by means of comparison, to complete a lexicon. It is an arduous, patient and difficult task!

It must be noted that dictionaries are only of a limited help to the translator, although he must have them.

Now, in confirmation of that, I will quote from a report which was prepared on behalf of the translation staff by a learned translator, a very distinguished author, a man who stands very high in the literary world, and one who is to-day president of the Royal Society of Canada, the chief translator of debates, Monsieur Leon Gerin. Referring more particularly to the translation of debates, he said:

The work of the translators of debates may be aptly described: expert translation and editing, in reference to a wide range of subjects, many of them technical. As man's activities are incessant and constantly changing in their aims and means, so language is ever undergoing alterations in form and substance. Dictionaries, encyclopaedias and special works are soon out of date when it comes to translating the debates of parliament. For instance, this great world war has had the effect of introducing into our common parlance, and more so in the parliamentary debates, a number of new terms and expressions. Under such conditions, the translator is bound to launch out on his own account, and build his own modern and technical card-index vocabulary through the perusal of the most recent books, periodicals, etc.

To conclude this little dissertation on translation, I would just refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a very small work the author of which is well known to us all—"On Translation" by Hilaire Belloc. The author, on the opening page of his book, says:

The art of translation is a subsidiary art, and derivative. On this account it has never been granted the dignity of original work, and has suffered too much in the general judgment of letters. This natural under-estimation of its value has had the bad practical effect of lowering the standard demanded, and in some periods has almost destroyed the art altogether. The corresponding misunderstanding of its character has added to its degradation: neither its importance nor its difficulty has been grasped.

Writing men work in part for fame. Nearly all of those with any pretensions to write well —that is, to write as writing should be—take fame for a large part of their incentive; some, perhaps among the greatest, have the attainment of fame for their whole motive. If, therefore, in any department of writing it be impossible to attain fame, that department will presumably be neglected.

I am sorry my time is nearly up, but perhaps I can summarize the conclusions that may be drawn from what I have quoted. One is outstanding, namely, that translating is something not easy of accomplishment, and in order to maintain an efficient staff of translators they should not lose their personality by being merged in a big office, nor should they be deprived of the stimulus of desire for fame and for promotion. Moreover, unless a translator keeps in close touch with the department for which he works, he will soon lose sight of the realities which are essential to the complete fulfilment of his task. One of our greatest social evils to-day in our highly specialized and centralized world is that the labourer has lost pride in his work, because he never sees the finished product credited to him in particular. He is a number in a mass of men too often enslaved by machinery. If this excess of concentration is now an evil for the manual worker, how much greater an evil is it for those entrusted with so subtle an art as translation? The minister says, for instance, that for the sake of economy—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. L. DUBOIS (Nicolet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it may, perhaps, be thought that I am somewhat out of my element in taking part in a debate which pertains more to the sphere of legal men. Like my good friend the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I have not the privilege of being a lawyer. However, I have the honour of representing a rural constituency which is interested in having translation done efficiently. Our farmers often require publications which pertain to branches or divisions such as those of the dairy industry, seed grain, livestock, eggs, poultry, fruit, vegetables and markets, etc., I, therefore, feel authorized to express my views on the present bill which is being discussed by the house. I shall do so without wounding the feelings of any one so that I rely on the good will of my hon. colleagues. It might perhaps be that in the course of my remarks, I may not quite agree with the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), I may also cause him some regret, although I have had, for a long time, much esteem for him. Shall I wound the susceptibility of the hon. member for Labelle? However, inwardly, I feel the necessity of expressing my views on this bill. I frankly confess that it is one of the few occasions that I find it difficult to fulfil my duty.

Before broaching the subject matter under discussion and seeing that it is the first time that I have the opportunity of addressing the house, this session, I wish to strongly protest against the statement made by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) with reference to the university of Montreal. I regret that such an unfortunate statement should have fallen from the lips of one of my fellow farmers. Because, we, who belong to the soil, have long understood the importance of an education for our people and, especially, the importance of our universities. Again, I state that I regret that my hon. friend used such insulting words towards this institution which has rendered, is rendering and will, in the future, render great services to the farming class.

Bill No. 4, which we are asked to consider has for its object: first, efficiency in the translation of the various documents of this house and governmental departments; secondly, to economize. In perusing the bill, I asked myself: Who prompted this measure? Who invented this new system? In what surrounding was this bill concocted?

There was an inquiry held in December, 1932, by a committee of representatives of the various departments who studied a number of questions dealing with a more efficient control of the expenditure of the administration. The committee was composed of Messrs. Watson Sellar, Roberts, Cook, Coolican, etc. They represented the various departments. I eagerly read the report of this committee. After sitting for quite a time the committee came to the following conclusion. All the high officials who were members of this committee, all without exception, most strongly opposed any scheme of centralization. Two principal reasons were given: First, the inconvenience which would result in the efficient administration of departments; secondly, the necessity of having in departments a bureau for translation where, without delay and fear of indiscretion, correspondence and confidential documents would continue to be well translated.

Moreover, in the report of the committee making the inquiry, under the chairmanship of Mr. Sellar, one may find in section 21, the following comments and findings:

The committee has received no complaints concerning the quality of the matter translated. They found that decentralization is general in all departments. This system was adopted following the investigation made on this question, in 1910, after the report of Mr. Achille Frechette, who, on an order of Internal Economy Committee of the House of Commons, visited Belgium and Switzerland to observe the systems in those countries. According to the information furnished to the committee, the departments are, in general, in favour of maintaining the statu quo.

I need not state, sir, that it is unnecessary to insist on the importance of such findings. If the present system is not perfect, if it requires timely improvements, there seems to be only one conclusion which we can arrive at from the impartial findings of the committee: the condemnation, without appeal, of the desire for centralization. Two persons were also consulted with reference to this bill No. 4, Mr. Bland and Mr. Beauchesne, however, their suggestions are considered as confidential. I wonder whether it is owing to such suggestions that the hon. Secretary of State thought fit to propose the centralization of translation?

I can almost assert, without gainsay, that Bill No. 4 did not take birth in the brains of the hon. Secretary of State. I think there exist hidden instigators who are the authors of this act. It is, to say the least, most untimely. It strikes me that the house at present has enough serious and important questions to settle without having to raise a discussion on such a controversial subject as that of translation. I am willing to believe that the hon. Secretary of State, who has accepted the sponsorship of this bill, is well intentioned. He has perhaps in mind the efficiency of translation and economy of public moneys. However, I am bound to state, from a farmer's viewpoint, that this gilded piece of legislation tells me nothing. I rather feel perplexed. I have my doubts as to the efficiency of the measure we are asked to approve. To prove this, I shall examine the two reasons invoked to induce us to support bill No. 4.

The hon. Secretary of State contends in his explanatory notes:

It is desirable in the interest of efficiency and economy that it should now be organized and the work of translating so distributed that no translator shall be idle or overworked, underpaid or overpaid.

[Mr. Dubois.]

This viewpoint was discussed with wit and pertinently by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). The economic question was also discussed in a masterly way by my hon. friend. I regret that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) thought fit to express entirely opposite views from those held by the hon. member for Ottawa. The hon. member for Labelle is better qualified than I am to speak in this house. I have nothing to teach him. However, I represent the county of Nicolet while he represents the county of Labelle. Notwithstanding all the esteem and regard I have for him, I deem it my duty to openly and clearly express my views on this legislation. I regret to disagree with him; I more so regret it because he was one of those who exerted the strongest influence over my youthful ideas and fired my enthusiasm of twenty years ago. I thought I could as a young member look to him as a guide for future years; however, there is too much incoherence in his way of looking at this bill to induce me to place any trust in the statements he made the other day here in the house, and to accept his principles. I hope he will not bear me any grudge. He is broadminded and his heart is in the right place. He will forgive me for having my elbow room with him. The hon. member for Labelle endorsed what he considered the efficiency of bill No. 4.

May I, sir, submit to the consideration of the house an excerpt which an eminent journalist wrote recently:

Translating is not commonplace, a task; or an easy one to perform. To succeed one must have a sufficient knowledge of one language to be certain of the sense and the exact meaning of the text; one must also have a sufficient knowledge of another language to be certain of transcribing in a clear and precise way, with new expressions, this sense clearly unravelled. All those who have tried their hand recognize that it is a difficult task, even if it be an ordinary text which deals with current events. One may perfectly understand in reading, the sense of a document without being able to translate it properly in one's own language.

When it is a question of a technical subject, the problem, often, becomes extremely difficult. An entirely new vocabulary must be acquired and infinite details must be verified. With the decentralization system, which assigns a few translators to such and such a department, you have there individuals who have a particular interest in studying the vocabulary of their specialty. Bye and bye, that goes without saying, they will be in a position to perform their task in a shorter time and with less difficulty. It becomes a real hobby among a number of them. They collect dictionaries and technical reviews and when they make some discovery, it is classified on cards. It is an acquired wealth which will become useful in the future. This desire of always wanting to improve was even responsible for the founding of a society which endeavours to improve the technological vocabulary.

If this organization is destroyed, if the translations are placed in one large office where all will be required, at times, to translate any kind of translation, is it not to be feared that this desire to improve will be sapped at its very foundation?

As matters stand, the translator in the Mines branch may hope to master the vocabulary of that industry. This is not out of reach of an intelligent man, possessing a general and proper preparation. He is aware that once he has attained this goal, his work will become easier, and at the same time, much improved. If he is placed in a large office, will he be able, will he even attempt to acquire this ability? He will have to become specialized in all subjects: that is impossible, and he will not put his heart in a task which is above human attainment.

The final result will be the grouping of persons who will have a superficial knowledge but, on the whole, no thorough knowledge of any subject. We mentioned "final" because centralization, if it decreases the desire and means of improving, will not deprive the present specialists of their worth and we can foresee that their help will be continuously in demand. Why then drag them away from the surroundings where they are in the habit of working, where they are given all the means to improve, and further increase their worth.

The specialization of translators would, in a short time, disappear. It could hardly maintain itself until the retirement or disappearance of the present generation of specialized translators.

It is not necessary to be well informed to understand that a translator who is in the habit of translating in the Department of Agriculture, who has specialized on such subjects as, seeding, aviculture or various chemical fertilizers, cannot become an expert if he is transferred to the Mines branch or Engineering branch.

The hon. member for Labelle complained, the other day, that in translation bureaus a number of employees do not work continuously. He even stated to support his arguments, that such a translator had translated 149 pages in a year, while another, during the same period, had translated a thousand and a few pages, etc.

I wish to first state that the figures he quoted do not appear to me to be correct. I am anxious to see the report of the committee which is to inquire as to the practical application of this bill. I even feel convinced that certain figures were falsified, not by the hon. member for Labelle, because, to my mind he is a very conscientious man, but by those who supplied him with such figures. I find the proof in this fact: that the person who was able to translate 1,076 pages, in one year, is an employee of the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Trade and Commerce. It is unfair to compare the work of a translator in the Bureau of Statistics with a translator of the Mines branch. The former is often called upon to translate but figures, and figures whether in English or French are similar. One need not be very clever to know that tariff items, from No. 1 to No. 1,200, are translated in English by 1 to 1,200, without even having to look up the dictionary. While the translator employed in the Mines branch must make use of technical terms; his work is far more complicated and difficult, often he has to make researches. Furthermore, I shall again avail myself of an argument of the hon. member for Labelle: Did he not state, himself, that when he translated his speeches, he, at times, pondered two hours on one term to find the corresponding word? How do we know that the translators of the various departments are not obliged to devote sometimes two hours per day, to translate the exact meaning of a text? What happens when it is a case of translating documents of a constitutional order, constitutional law or international law? The translator must make researches, pore, hour after hour, over dictionaries so as to find out the thought of the author before translating it. And we expect that the translator, who is obliged to carry out long and careful researches to translate the thought of an author from the text which he is given, will translate the same number of pages as the one who has but figures to translate? That would be unfair.

I think that if we centralize translation, translation will suffer by it, because we smother individual effort. Although that is not the object of the hon. Secretary of State, since he denies that he intends to interfere with the translation of documents; we cannot, however, simply take the word of the hon. Secretary of State on this matter. If his statement was embodied in bill No. 4; if the interpretation given by the hon. member for Labelle was inserted in the bill, I would feel less skeptic and probably support the measure. If, to-day, in the house, the hon. Secretary of State, openly gave me his assurance that he would take special care not to smother the individual effort, to have all required documents translated, I would, to some extent, show myself more amenable to his views.

Another consideration. I may be mistaken, but, it was stated, that this bill No. 4 would help to improve translation. It is an instrument, a tool, states the Secretary of State. I cannot see clearly the necessity for such a tool at present. The decentralization system has given its proofs in the departments where the chiefs were broadminded and used common sense. This proof for instance is to be found in the Department of Trade and Commerce. With the present system we can have at the same time, the publication of the trade bulletin both in English and French. There is great improvement in the publication of the Year Book. Why should this not be in the departments complained of? If the Minister of Trade and Commerce is able to make a success of translation in his department without the help of Bill No. 4, why not the Minister of Agriculture, why not the Prime Minister, why not the Secretary of State himself?

Another reason why I am opposed to this bill and shall vote in favour of the amendment of my hon. friend for Ottawa, it is, as I stated at the outset, this gilded measure tells me nothing. There is nothing in the bill which safeguards the rights of the French language and there is nothing which would constitute an official recognition of that language, so far as translation is concerned.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): That is a fact.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): To any observing mind, the past is there to prove it. Not always have we had, in a wide measure, what we had a right to expect. I feel convinced, in spite of the good will of the hon. Secretary of State, we shall still not be able to make a success of Bill No. 4. As long as he holds that portfolio, perhaps—I have so much esteem for him, I have heard of him for ever so long; but the hon. Secretary of State shall not always occupy the post he has, he shall be replaced. Will the superintendent of this translation bureau be a broadminded man, will he interpret the law, Art. 133 of the British North America Act with an open mind? Experience has taught us, that when we leave it to the government to interpret an act, often, the letter of the law is applied rather than the spirit. Therefore, sir, with such apprehension, I am forced to vote against bill No. 4, unless the hon. Secretary of State wishes to state to the house that this bill is a clearer recognition of the official statute dealing with the French language in the debates. If the hon. Secretary of State would publicly state that it is a greater guarantee for the French language, I could be more lenient towards the measure under consideration.

According to this bill, it is simply a centralization of the translators, and we find in clause 3 a formula which gives me some concern:

[Mr. Dubois.]

3. (1) There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau for Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

There is a long enumeration, but it is not stipulated whether this bill will specially provide for the French language. Moreover in paragraph 2 of clause 4:

(2) The minister may from time to time designate such translators or other employees in the public service or in any department or branch of the public service as he may deem necessary for carrying into effect the provisions of this act, and the governor in council may, from time to time. transfer to the bureau any of the said translators, or other employees so designated.

This is another matter of apprehension. Let us take as an example a qualified translator in the Department of Agriculture, who happens to be a French Canadian. Far be it from my thought, the idea that some one will take advantage of this bill to openly persecute my compatriots. That is not the point. However, what would happen if we were dealing with a narrow-minded man, as this has sometimes happened? Let us suppose, therefore, a French Canadian translator in the Department of Agriculture, whose turn has come for a promotion which might perhaps interfere with the promotion of translators belonging to another nationality. Perhaps, means would be found to transfer this competent translator—finding some excuse —from the Department of Agriculture where he might continue to be in the way of one more influent than himself, to the bureau for translations under the plea that his services are specially required in the latter place.

My hon. friend the member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) expressed such an apprehension while a number of my colleagues entertain similar fears in this respect. Are we not justified, sir, in having some apprehension to vote in favour of this measure? In no way does it embody all the guarantees necessary so far as translation efficiency is concerned; and—I speak on my behalf—as to the safeguarding of our rights to the French language.

I can also give another reason for my apprehension. You are aware, sir, that in 50 per cent of the departments of the government for translation there is no bilingualism. We note that, in many departments, we have not been dealt with fairly. I have here, as one example, the names of officials of the National Revenue Department, it will prove that we have reason to have apprehensions when our interests are at stake.

I shall quote the names of the principal officials of the National Revenue Department. Let us see whether we find one French Canadian name. The hon. minister who is in charge of the department is the Hon Mr. Matthews; his private secretary is Mr. Code; the Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Scully; the Commissioner of Excise, Mr. Sim; the Commissioner of Income Tax, Mr Elliott; the Assistant Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Blair; the Assistant to the General Executive, Mr. Ide. I hold no animosity against those who do not belong to my race—

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): And Mr. Gaboury?

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Among the English speaking members as well as among the English speaking employees there are qualified, intelligent, straightforward and conscientious men who are fair in the distribution of work and if they had to settle the present question, would not fear to do justice to our compatriots who could ably fill posts in the public service or elsewhere.

The hon. Secretary of State still persists in having this Bill No. 4 enacted, notwithstanding the press campaign carried on against it throughout the country. It is true that the hon. member for Labelle designated as little scraps of paper the petitions that were signed and articles that were published in newspapers, such as the "Devoir," the "Droit," "l'Action Catholique," and "Le Canada." He designated as little scraps of paper the warning of our national associations. But it was public opinion that spoke. The hon. Secretary of State is sufficiently wise, open-minded to realize the injustice this bill is doing us. With the broad-mindedness I know he has, I think the Secretary of State should not insist further, he should even drop the bill so as not to force us to vote against it.

Mr. DESLAURIERS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Chief electoral officer—salaries and contingencies of office, $14,724.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): This is the usual vote for the chief electoral officer. There is no change in salaries or in contingencies in that office in these estimates as compared with the estimates for the previous year.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the minister in a position to give us the number of returning officers who have been dismissed since the last general election?

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information. If he will ask for a return, however, I will see that it is brought down. I stand in a peculiar position in regard to the chief electoral officer; he is an independent officer of this house, but he formally approaches the house in connection with his estimates through the Secretary of State. I do not control his dismissals or appointments in any way, and since I have been in office he has never consulted me in respect to either dismissals or new appointments.

Mr. MICHAUD: Do I understand the Secretary of State to say that the chief electoral officer is independent of this house, or independent of the ministry?

Mr. CAHAN: No, he is an independent officer of the house, independent of the Secretary of State. I simply represent this officer, nominally, in presenting his estimates to the house, and any instructions the house has to give usually go through the Secretary of State. The chief electoral officer is an officer over whom I have no control; whose office I do not supervise, and who has never consulted me with regard to dismissals, if dismissals have been made, or in regard to appointments. I am simply asking for this vote for the chief electoral officer for the present year.

Mr. MICHAUD: I should like to be informed as to whether the chief electoral officer is responsible to anyone or whether he has any superior officer. How is he appointed?

Mr. CAHAN: He is appointed under a statute of the houses of parliament. He is not responsible to any superior officer; he is responsible to parliament.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is he actually appointed by statute or is he appointed by order in council?

Mr. CAHAN: He is not appointed by order in council; he is appointed by parliament as provided by statute.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to say a word with regard to the dismissal of the returning officer in my constituency, and I am sorry the chief electoral officer is not represented on the floor of this house so that he might defend his actions.

At my request the chief electoral officer went to my constituency and held an investigation, after which he came to the conclusion that this man should be dismissed, and he was dismissed. Complaints had been made by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion); the electoral officer held an investigation under oath, and came to the conclusion that this man should be dismissed. I submitted the evidence to a learned counsel in Montreal, Mr. John G. Ahern, who came to the conclusion that the returning officer had carried out his duties, but of course as between these two gentlemen the chief electoral officer carried the day and this man was dismissed. Mr. Verge is the son of the former registrar of Bonaventure county, who was returning officer himself for overy twenty years. This younger Mr. Verge was practically brought up in the work, and he was most competent. On the day of the general election he received a telephone message at Carleton to come down to Paspebiac a large parish in the county, to see that no obstruction was put in the way of people voting. He visited a couple of polls and reported that everything was satisfactory. On his way home he was told that some objections had been made at the poll called Thivierge, in Bonaventure county, to the effect that three or four young people who had been away from home but who had returned were unable to vote. The deputy returning officer, who has since died, was of the opinion that to vote in a federal election the person named must be on the list. That is the procedure followed in provincial elections in Quebec; if your name is not on the list you cannot vote, but in the federal election there is a means provided, if your name is not on the list, by which you can vote if you take the oath and so on. Mr. Verge seems to have explained the law to the deputy returning officer and to have left the matter at that, according to his declaration. After his departure three young men and two young women who were employed in Montreal and Quebec but who had returned to their homes in Bonaventure for a vacation, voted at that poll. For that reason the chief electoral officer dismissed Mr. Verge.

I do not imagine that Mr. Verge's reputation in the constituency will be very much affected, because unfortunately it is looked upon merely as a political dismissal; everyone is satisfied that he fulfilled his duties, but in justice to Mr. Verge I am making these remarks, without passing any reflection at all upon the chief electoral officer who is not here to defend himself. Mr. Verge fulfilled his duties to the best of his ability; his actions have been supported by a learned king's counsel of Montreal who is very familiar with the law, and his dismissal is looked upon merely as a political matter in the county. I desire to make this statement in fairness to Mr. Verge.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend's statement now is a matter of record in Hansard. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the chief electoral officer did not act in accordance with his duties, there is always a remedy open, because such a matter is within the jurisdiction of the committee on privileges and elections. If hon. members wish to complain about this parliamentary officer, they will have a full opportunity before that committee. The chief electoral officer could attend for examination.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suppose the minister has not any idea of how many changes there have been in the returning officers.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We shall ask the question at a later time.

Mr. CAHAN: If the question is asked in the house I shall see that an answer is given, by return.

Item agreed to.

Patent record, $35,000.

Mr. CAHAN: The patent record is published by the patent branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. By international agreement we are obliged to publish such a record, and by giving information with respect to patents granted by the Canadian office the record serves a very useful purpose. I am endeavouring if possible, to cut down the cost, and during the ensuing year shall endeavour to reduce the expenditure from $42,000 to $35,000.

Mr. BROWN: What is the revenue from that publication?

Mr. CAHAN: I will say to the hon. member that there is some revenue, but it does not cover the cost. Unfortunately with respect to all branches of the Department of Secretary of State revenue does not come to the department, but goes into the consolidated revenue fund. So that while in several branches of my department we pay our way several times over, the consolidated revenue fund receives the advantage.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the preparation of the publication done by the printing bureau?

Mr. CAHAN: The copy is prepared by the patent branch and the publication is made by the printing bureau.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the Secretary of State in a position to give the house the total revenue received from the patent office?

Mr. CAHAN: I probably can.

Mr. SPENCER: If the Secretary of State will give the information later, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CAHAN: Receipts from the patent and copyright branch for the past year amounted to $539,340.64. That is an increase of $14,092.22 over the previous year. The total expenditures for the same year amounted to $205,293.70, which was a decrease in expenditure of $40,969.40. The decrease occurred in civil government, contingencies, and in the cost of printing the patent office record. Surplus of receipts over expenditures amounted to $334,046.94. In addition to that there was a profit on foreign exchange, that is on cheques sent from foreign countries to the patent office in payment of fees, amounting to $8,033.75.

Mr. GERSHAW: Has the minister or his department any control over so-called patent attorneys? One or two cases have come to my notice in which patent attorneys have accepted large fees for doing very little work.

Mr. CAHAN: The only control over patent attorneys which the minister has—and I am speaking subject to correction—is, that in case of dishonesty, fraud, or other bad practice being proven against an attorney, his name may be removed from the list of attorneys practising before the patent office. That is my understanding, and I believe it is a fact.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Does this item cover copyright, also?

Mr. CAHAN: No, we are now discussing an item concerning the patent record.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I understand copyright information is published in the same periodical.

Mr. CAHAN: In the patent record there may be some reference to copyright records, published as a matter of information. This vote, however, provides for printing the record from month to month.

Mr. FAFARD: May I ask the minister if the hon. member for Compton applied for a copyright on his last speech?

Mr. GOBEIL: That is wise, isn't it?

Item agreed to.

International office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works, $2,000.

Mr. CAHAN: This vote refers to the international office at Berne. It is necessary for us, under international conventions to which we are a party, to make this contribution. We pay $2,000 a year. No change is made in this vote.

Item agreed to.

Expenses under the Naturalization Act, $11,700.

Mr. RINFRET: I notice that there is a considerable decrease in this item. I suppose it is an indication that the requests have diminished.

Mr. CAHAN: The chief reduction arises in this way: Owing to an amendment to the Naturalization Act, dealing with the status of married women, it became necessary to reprint the forms which we had used for a number of years. For instance, a man in Canada may now apply for naturalization, but the naturalization certificate granted to him does not cover his wife, unless she makes an independent application for naturalization. The result was that last year we had to change a very considerable number of forms, due to the amendment to the Naturalization Act. This expenditure is not necessary in the ensuing year. On the other hand, we expect that during the ensuing year there will be a reduction in the number of applications.

Mr. RINFRET: Last year the expenditure was abnormal.

Mr. MARCIL: How many were naturalized last year and the year before?

Mr. CAHAN: I made a full statement a few days ago in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), and this information is on record.

Mr. BRADETTE: There are a large number of people in my section of the country who were born in Europe and have resided in Canada long enough to qualify for naturalization. However, many of these people are on direct relief and find it impossible to pay the nominal sum required. Would it be possible to have papers issued free of cost to these people? I have one case in mind where if the man were naturalized he could qualify for the old age pension.

Mr. CAHAN: I am afraid it is not within the power of the Secretary of State to provide that applicants for naturalization shall be exempt from paying the fee of $5. This amount is not received wholly by the consolidated revenue fund through the Department of the Secretary of State; it covers in part the fees of the clerk of the court to which the application is made and the certificate granted.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to have some information in connection with a case in the town of Transcona. This man originally came from southern Europe; he was naturalized and raised a family, his boys now being all young men. He returned to the old country but is not now able to come back to this country. I should like to know why a naturalized citizen is prevented from coming back to this country.

Mr. CAHAN: We have fairly complete records of all naturalization certificates granted in this country. We have complete records since the Naturalization Act of 1914 and, with a few exceptions, we have the records of those granted by the courts under the old naturalization acts. When we took over in 1914 there had been one or two courthouses destroyed by fire and the records were not available, but otherwise they are complete. These records are available within an hour or two.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I interrupt for a moment? I applied to the office here in Ottawa and obtained this man's record and number, but still he is not permitted to return to this country.

Mr. CAHAN: If he has been absent from Canada for seven years or over without being in the employ of the Canadian government or an office or agency of that government or in the employ of some Canadian company or person doing business abroad, he loses his naturalization rights.

Mr. HOWDEN: He has been away only three years.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will give me his name I shall have a complete examination made and give him a definite reply.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Just before I left for the east two cases were brought to my attention. These parties had lost their naturalization papers and I should like to know the procedure and cost of obtaining new papers.

Mr. CAHAN: If the person affected was naturalized under one of the old acts before 1914 his remedy would be to apply for a certificate under the new act. Prior to 1914 the naturalization granted in Canada made the individual a British subject while in Canada but such status was not recognized when he went beyond the three-mile limit. It became very important that those who had received their certificates prior to 1914 should apply for certificates under the new act. If the individual has been naturalized under the new act and the officer is satisfied that the application for a new certificate is made in good faith, a duplicate certificate is issued. We have found that we must exercise great care in this respect, especially on the Pacific coast. We have found that naturalization certificates have been traded in for certain fraudulent purposes. In certain cases applications have been made for new certificates on the ground that the old ones had been lost, but it was found that they had not been lost but fraudulently sold or transferred to persons who could not obtain naturalization. We have to be very careful but I am sure that the assurance of my hon. friend as to his knowledge of the particular facts would go a long way to satisfying the department in these particular cases.

Mr. SPENCER: What would be the position of an individual who had taken out naturalization papers in some other part of the empire and who was absent from Canada for seven or more years? I take it that he would have difficulty in getting back into Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: So far as the department of the Secretary of State is concerned he certainly would have no difficulty, but I could not answer as to what action might be taken by the Department of Immigration. Particular considerations might arise. Careful reports are made from time to time as to the conduct abroad of naturalized Canadian citizens. We have received complaints in the past which would seem to indicate that apparently certain aliens have been naturalized in this country in order to obtain a certificate of good character with which to go abroad and commit crime. We rely upon Scotland Yard and other sources of information in England as to the criminal conduct of naturalized subjects. If an individual has been found by a court to be guilty of crime, the Secretary of State may apply to the governor in council to have his certificate cancelled. Such applications are made from time to time and even from week to week. Notice of such cancellation is sent to all foreign countries interested. The same procedure is followed in the granting of naturalization certificates.

Mr. ROBINSON: Is it not a fact that where a foreigner becomes naturalized, having been out of the country for two or three years and is living, say, in the United States, if he does not report once a year to the British consular officer he loses his domicile and cannot return?

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact, it is provided in the law that one who is naturalized in Canada and goes abroad to live shall report to a British consular officer once a year with respect to his intention to return to Canada. My hon. friend from St. James can speak regarding the practice when he was in office, but speaking for myself I have not made a practice of attempting to cancel certificates because this annual declaration has not been made, because I find it would often work grave hardships. The fact is that many naturalized citizens of Canada go abroad, remaining away for over a year, with the clear and positive intention of returning and assuming Canadian domicile, and their default in reporting is due to ignorance. In such cases I think we should make very considerable allowances, and I have not attempted any rigid enforcement of the rule with regard to notification of intention to resume Canadian domicile. But in almost every instance, as regards those who are abroad for more than seven years, when that is proved satisfactorily, and after the person has been notified and has had personal service of notice to which he can reply and give his excuses, I apply to the governor in council for revocation. There are however exceptional cases. A very sad case came under my notice not long ago. I received from a district in Manchuria the Canadian passport and Canadian certificate of naturalization of a well known missionary priest from Quebec. He had come from France to this country with his family and had been educated in the institutions of Quebec, being later sent abroad to Manchuria as a missionary. He had his Canadian passport and Canadian certificate of naturalization. When British subjects were being rounded up in Manchuria in order that they might receive the protection of the British government, it was ascertained that this reverend father had been absent from Canada for over seven years and had not travelled a distance of some six or seven hundred miles to get in touch with a consular officer to report. He had been attending to his duties as a priest. They took up the certificate and the passport and it was sent on to the office of the Secretary of State, and soon after there came a letter from this priest—a very touching letter. He said that he was a Canadian though born abroad, and that the one hope of his life had been to return to Canada to spend his last days among his family and friends. You may be sure that within twenty-four hours I returned the certificate and passport so that he could come back. Exceptions must be made in individual cases.

Mr. BROWN: I only wish that many other men who have to do with these matters exercised the same judgment as the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: I must say for my predecessor that I think he was as careful and assiduous.

Mr. BROWN: I am not speaking of either the minister or his predecessor. The fact is however that many men on both sides of the boundary line are absolutely callous. They enforce the law according to the strict letter, exercising no sort of discretion. The minister is to be congratulated on having acted as he has done.

Mr. POWER: Some time last fall the newspapers brought to the attention of the Canadian public the somewhat anomalous position of Canadian diplomatic representatives abroad. It appeared from an article which I read at the time that the children of, let us say, the Canadian representative at Geneva, born in Geneva, would not be regarded as Canadian nationals, and that if perchance later in life they returned to Canada and came under the disqualification of a person who was on relief they might be subject to deportation. I cannot conceive of a worse position than that. I have in mind certain representatives of Canada overseas, of French Canadian origin, whose children were born there. It might very well happen that later in life these children would come to Canada and if they became public charges they would be subject to deportation—that is, if the article which I read in this paper accurately represents the situation.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no doubt in my mind that the children of Canadian nationals born abroad should be deemed Canadian nationals. Two years ago, at the request of one of the missionary societies of the Catholic church, and on representations made through the missionary societies of the United church, the Presbyterian church and the Church of England in Canada, I prepared an amendment to the nationality act. It came before the house for discussion. Some objections were made and that bill was retired. Now, I am giving my personal opinion—

Mr. POWER: I am sorry to say I believe I opposed that bill.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, there was considerable opposition, and I thought it was a matter that should be dealt with by general consent rather than as a party measure and so I did not push the bill. But I think it must be dealt with. I remember the case to which the hon. gentleman refers, but no difficulty was encountered when the son of the Canadian agent at Geneva did return with his mother to Canada. I believe that due consideration is given in all such cases, but we might well consider an amendment to the law which would admit return as a matter of right.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand the Secretary of State to say that as a matter of fact, under the legislation as we have it at the present time, the children of Canadian officials born abroad are not Canadian nationals, though he agrees that they should be?

Mr. CAHAN: I think that under the law—I am now referring to the immigration law, in which I am not an expert—it is not absolutely clear that as a matter of right they may return, though it is clear that they have the right to return to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and do return there very often rather than run the risk of being rejected by the immigration authorities here.

Mr. POWER: Strictly speaking, the Department of the Secretary of State for Canada would not have jurisidiction to grant them a passport?

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. POWER: They would be obliged to obtain a passport from the office in Great Britain?

Mr. CAHAN: Passports are granted by our own Department of External Affairs in Ottawa; to those who are abroad they are granted by consular officers of the United Kingdom who act on behalf of the Department of External Affairs. For example, when I was in Geneva a little over a year ago I came across a peculiar case. One day one of the young women employed as a stenographer in the Canadian office in that city came back to the office very much embarrassed because she had been told by the British consul there that she had no right to return to Canada. It appears, as she explained the circumstances to me, that her parents were English and came to Montreal when she was a little girl two or three years of age, I have forgotten the exact age. The family continued their residence in Montreal. She grew up, was educated in the schools of that city, became quite an expert in stenography and was appointed to and employed in the Canadian office in Geneva. She had gone to Geneva with a Canadian passport. Some family affair necessitated her signing some documents and she went before the consular official to make this signature and some declaration in connection with it, when the consular official asked her how long she had been in Geneva. I think she said: About two years. He drew her attention to the fact that she had not reported to him in the meantime; that her passport showed that she had actually been born in Great Britain, and he told her that in his opinion she had no longer a right to Canadian nationality and a Canadian passport because she had not reported to him before the expiration of twelve months of her first term of sojourn in Geneva. Of course the young lady was greatly distressed because she wanted to return to her parents in Canada. So on her behalf I wrote to the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs and I believe he took the matter up with the Immigration department with the result that assurance was given that the young lady could return to this country. Cases of that kind arise from time to time, I believe these rights should be clearly established by law and possibly after I have passed away, some successor, I hope, will have better success than I have had in attempting to clarify the situation.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister was kind enough to refer to the numerous men and women who during the last few years have been going as missionaries from Canada to the orient, some from the Church of England, others from the United Church of Canada, others from the Roman Catholic Church and so forth. Apparently, Canada is no longer a missionary field and we are sending missionaries abroad. Every year we see quite a number of men and women leaving Montreal to go to the foreign field. Have these people going abroad, especially to distressed parts such as the orient, been instructed, warned or notified by the department or have the heads of their churches been notified, that they should be naturalized or have something in their possession to show their nationality when they reach those foreign countries, because our present nationality is different from what it was in the old days. In those days we used to claim our British nationality. In 1910 I remember when I crossed over to France I wanted to rent an apartment, so I went to the police department and put down my nationality as French Canadian. The Frenchman struck that out and said to me: "You are English." That is the way in which the thing worked in those days. I said to him: "You do not encourage French Canadians in America by telling me I am English." I should like to know from the minister, in view of the large number of Canadians going into the foreign missionary fields, whether any steps are taken under our law to protect them?

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot speak altogether for the Department of External Affairs, but it is a fact that the great majority of those missionaries who go abroad representing the different Canadian churches, are natural born British subjects, born in Canada and therefore do not need naturalization. In the case of French Canadian missionaries abroad, if a missionary happened to have been born in France, coming to Canada later in life, particular pains are usually taken before he goes abroad to secure for him a certificate of naturalization and therefore a Canadian passport. In respect of Manchuria and China I think every effort has been made during these troublesome times to communicate to Canadian nationals such advice as may prove helpful for the protection of themselves and their families.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I should like to ask a question of a different nature from those that have preceded mine. May I draw the attention of the minister to the Naturalization Act which states that any applicant must live in this country for five years and must also be able to understand either the French or the English language. In this country there is a very desirable class of people who have come here in middle age and who are unable to learn either French or English well enough to qualify themselves for citizenship. It oftens happens that some of these older applicants are refused certificates of naturalization on the ground that they cannot speak either language. They have all the virtues; they are industrious farmers or labourers and in every respect outside the fact that they cannot speak either English or French, they would make very desirable citizens of this country. On the other hand, we have the applicant who can speak English almost as well as Shakespeare did, but who in all other respects would not make a very desirable citizen. I have been wondering whether some mitigating provision might not be afforded so far as the first type of applicants is concerned, because I believe they would make good citizens apart from the language qualification.

Mr. CAHAN: I notice from the returns which we receive from the courts of the provinces of the middle west that when these cases come before the judges, the latter sometimes exercise a certain leniency in giving their decisions whether the applicant is versed in English or French. From the reports I notice that if they can understand French or English sufficiently to know what is said to them and to make some reply in the ordinary way, the judges are quite lenient; but to change the law would require a substantive enactment of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Supposing somebody got on a judge's nerves and he refused to exercise that leniency?

Mr. HEAPS: A very important point has been raised by the hon. member for Vegreville. Cases have come to my attention of people who have been in the country twenty-five or thirty years, have attained the age of forty-five or fifty, but have lived in scattered districts where it has been practically impossible for them to become familiar with either the French or the English language. When they reach the age of seventy, without having obtained naturalization papers, and make applications for old age pensions, because of their inability to speak English they are practically barred from the benefits of the Old Age Pensions Act. These people have given good service to the country, and through no fault of their own find themselves unable to obtain naturalization. I wonder if it would not be possible in such instances, where a person has been a good citizen and has all the other qualifications to receive old age pension, that some discretionary powers might be vested in the minister whereby such people could become Canadian citizens and eligible for old age pension.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not for me to decide. I confess that one is moved to leniency in certain cases, but one is dealing with a substantive enactment of the law of this country. If my hon. friend will introduce an amendment along the lines he is now suggesting it will receive the consideration of the house, but I cannot promise action will be taken.

Mr. HEAPS: I am afraid of introducing any amendment to any act of parliament; I have been rather unfortunate in regard to any bill I have tried to introduce. I feel as the minister felt a moment ago when he spoke of the leniency that a magistrate might show towards applicants for naturalization. My own understanding is that as a rule magistrates have been fairly strict in their interpretation of the law, and where a person, even of the age of seventy, who may have raised a large family in the country, has been unable to comply with the strict letter of the law, he has failed to obtain naturalization. This means considerable hardship in old age when they find themselves ineligible for old age pension. If the magistrate had some discretionary powers such cases might be dealt with considerately, but I find that as a rule magistrates claim they have no discretion, that the law is rigid. I feel that there should be some discretion vested somewhere to meet such situations.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I think in the case of elderly citizens such as I have referred to, who want to get naturalization papers, if their community or municipality, through the Secretary or councilmen, could show by letter or affidavit that the applicant was a desirable citizen even though he does not understand French or English, such a recommendation should have some weight with the judge who is hearing the application.

Mr. CAHAN: I think if it were left to the municipality it would be found in many cases that their position would be adverse to the applicant, because our office has received during the last three years many protests from municipalities against granting certificates of naturalization to those who do not understand well either the English or the French language. They insist that the granting of a certificate of naturalization imposes a heavier burden upon the municipality in respect of providing relief, which it is not prepared to meet. Therefore they have in many cases protested very strongly against making any concession to the alien who does not understand French or English.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: If the alien is able to pay his taxes I do not see how it would be a burden on the municipality.

Mr. CAHAN: The alien who is competent to earn his way and pay his taxes and has lived in this country thirty or forty years without finding any inconvenience through not having a certificate of naturalization is caused very little trouble. But in the case of an alien who, after reaching a certain age, suddenly finds it necessary to apply for public relief, who sometimes frankly states in his application that he is applying solely in order that he may be put on relief—some are very frank and state that—in such case if it were left to the municipality, even your western municipalities, I am afraid the decision would be adverse.

Mr. HEAPS: I suppose that is only in the case of aliens who have been in the country a period of five years, which enables them to comply with the laws of the country as far as naturalization is concerned?

Mr. CAHAN: I will mention a case that is before my department now, of an alien, an American, who has been in this country thirty or forty years. He has led a good life, he is recommended by those who know him, but he insisted that he was going to live and die an American citizen, did not wish to assume British nationality. The other day he applied for naturalization, stating that he was applying, not because he wished to become a British subject, but solely that he might be put on relief in the town where he lived. If that case were left to the municipality I am afraid the certificate would not be granted.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not see what difference the granting of a certificate would make in that particular instance. I understand if an alien has been in this country more than five years he is not subject to deportation proceedings, so whether he becomes a Canadian citizen or not makes very little difference.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But if he goes on relief?

Mr. HEAPS: The instances I tried to bring to the attention of the committee are of people who have made their home here for twenty or thirty years, have reached the age of seventy and require naturalization papers to be eligible for old age pension, which will take them off relief.

Mr. CAHAN: I admit frankly that cases of great hardship are brought to my attention where certificates have not been granted. But to remedy that situation would require a substantive amendment to the Naturalization Act.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Suppose the case of an applicant who is refused citizenship papers on the ground that he had not sufficient knowledge of English or French, and the municipality did intercede on his behalf, recommending that he receive citizenship papers, would the minister take that into consideration?

Mr. CAHAN: I can give no promise. One has to deal with individual cases. Where you have about twenty thousand of these application coming in every year, the correspondence averaging nearly a thousand letters a week, one has to endeavour to exercise reasonable discretion, and that I do. If the hon. gentleman brings a particular case to my personal attention I will see if I can find some way to satisfy his wishes. But I can give no definite promises.

Mr. HAY: The Naturalization Act as it exists at the present time does work a great hardship on many people born in foreign countries who have come to Canada and lived here many years: I have had hundreds of these cases brought to my notice in the past five or six years. I would suggest that some change be made which would enable these people to obtain their citizenship papers. I know many cases of sons and daughters of people who are not British citizens who have obtained their papers, yet their fathers and mothers are unable to become naturalized because they are unable to read or write English or French. I have known many cases where the sons of these people have served overseas, yet the parents are unable to become naturalized because they are unable to comply with the law as it exists at the present time. Many of these people are splendid types yet because, as one other hon. member explained, they have lived in districts remote from English speaking settlers, they have been unable to acquire the English language and are unable to become naturalized. Very often the judge before whom these people appear adheres strictly to the letter of the law, and as a result these people are deprived of the opportunity of becoming citizens. I would strongly urge that some change be made in the law or the regulations in order to permit these people to become citizens of Canada.

Item agreed to.

Public archives, $63,024.

Mr. CAHAN: I am instructed by the clerk that I was mistaken in my impression that this item had passed.

Mr. RINFRET: I see a slight decrease this year, and I should like to ask if this means a lessening of the activities of the department outside of Ottawa or whether it is a saving in the expenditures of the department in Ottawa.

Mr. CAHAN: I have not the records here, but we have had a number of deaths in the department, which may account for the reduction. As a matter of fact one lady retired, I do not know whether or not to get married, and there was one death and perhaps two. Since 1930 I have made no new appointments at all in the public archives to fill vacancies caused by death or resignation. I quite agree that public archives must be maintained, but for the present we are maintaining the department with a somewhat reduced staff. It is possible that the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of making the nominations for these vacancies some time in the future.

Mr. RINFRET: Do I understand that this item includes salaries? If my hon. friend will look up item 23 he will find that it covers the salaries in Ottawa. I believe the item we are considering covers the expenditures of the department outside of Ottawa, and my question was whether the outside activities of the department have been diminished in any way. If the minister has not the information I shall be quite prepared to seek it on another occasion.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend is perfectly right; this item is to provide for the salaries of the permanent staff outside of Ottawa; for temporary services; for travelling expenses of representatives outside of Ottawa, and for the purchase of books and manuscripts outside of Ottawa. The money for the salaries in Ottawa is provided under item 23. I think outside of Ottawa there have been one or two retirements, though there has been no forcible retirement of any kind, even under the age limit. There are several employees who come within the age limit, and in order that they might be kept on I have now an application before the treasury board asking that their services be retained for another year. The reduction which appears here must be due to some voluntary retirements, I should think.

Mr. RINFRET: I suppose this also covers the expenditures in London and Paris?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: I understand that work has not been discontinued there and that it is not contemplated that it be discontinued. I believe the department also has a correspondent in Rome.

Mr. CAHAN: That is true, and he is a very worthy man indeed.

Mr. RINFRET: I understand there is no intention of discontinuing that work either. If I am informed correctly, the work done in these European capitals has been exceedingly advantageous to the archives.

Mr. CAHAN: As a matter of fact I think the reverend father who has been at work in the archives in Rome for many years, a very able man indeed, has reached the age limit and can be kept on only by special order in council. I believe I made application the other day in this connection. In Paris there is one man who, according to the age limit, should have been retired a year ago. I am sorry I have not my papers here, but he was employed on some very special work in reproducing some maps which were regarded by those interested in the public archives in this country as very important. Although he had reached the age limit a year ago I applied to have his services retained for another year, and recently I made a second application in his behalf. These people have been working for very small salaries and have not been able to save very much, and I have hoped to keep them on for special work as long as possible.

Mr. RINFRET: I should like to commend the minister for doing so. I think it will be agreed that an archivist can be kept at work longer than the average man in other activities. Unless he is so very old that he cannot carry on the work properly I think age only adds to his experience and ability in his work. I think the minister should be commended for keeping on these men whom we employ abroad, who are very excellent men, and for not being too strict in the application of the age limit. In this kind of work, as I have said, experience and age add to the value of the work done.

Mr. BROWN: I just wish to support the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for St. James. In my view the department of the archives is one of the most important, and the men engaged in it are, of necessity, men who have made a special study of their work. It has become a hobby with them. I can believe that men who have given their lives to this kind of work are more competent to carry on, despite the fact that they have passed the age limit. The minister should be commended for having taken the stand he has, and returning these men to service.

Mr. CAHAN: So far, if I remember correctly, we have not retired any person in the archives branch because of age. Of course, there are a certain number of temporary employees, young women who come and go, but they are on a monthly wage.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—salaries, $37,602; contingencies, $10,000.

Mr. CAHAN: In this item there is a reduction, due to the fact that under the age limit provision we have retired a considerable number who were employed in the public printing and stationery branch. The reduction in salaries this year amounts to $12,888.

Mr. RINFRET: I should like the committee to realize that the detail of this item, appearing at page 91 of the estimates, shows only a very small portion of that which really constitutes the staff of the printing office.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. RINFRET: While I acted as Secretary of State proposals were made by hon. members then sitting on this side of the house to change the system in the printing office. I shall not blame nor shall I criticize the present government for not doing so, because such a change would be a most involved and intricate matter. I should like however to say that the list of salaries appearing at page 91 covers but a very small proportion of what really constitutes the staff of the printing office, because the main group of employees at that point work at prevailing rates of salaries, and the expenditure necessary to meet those wages, combined with those of the printing officer proper, are charged to the different departments under an item for printing. If hon. members will go through the estimates they will find that in connection with every department there is an item for printing and stationery, including not only the material but also the work. The larger group of employees in the printing office are not included in the estimate now before us, but are spread through several items. At least, that was the system prevailing some years ago, and it is obvious that it is still maintained.

Mr. CAHAN: The annual report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery gives the details to which my hon. friend has referred. The present item includes salaries of official heads of that department. On March 1, last year, there were 694 employees, all told, in the department, although that figure has been somewhat reduced since. They are paid out of the king's printer advance account. Their salaries, which last year amounted to $1,700,000, are arranged according to the prevailing rates in neighbouring cities, and are charged to the cost of departmental and other reports furnished to various departments for which the printing is supplied.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In this instance the funds do not go through the treasury; they are reserved for payment. That is, the votes go directly to the department.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is somewhat different.

Mr. CAHAN: There is the king's printer advance account, made by the treasury, supervised by the accountants of the comptroller of the treasury, and audited by the auditor general. Those accounts are paid from day to day and from week to week.

Mr. RINFRET: That includes labour?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I am dealing with labour. No change has been made in the system.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—salaries, $182,898; contingencies, $25,000.

Mr. CAHAN: As hon. members know, this is the usual vote for the Civil Service Commission. It is a branch over which I have no control, and in connection with appointments to the commission I have never made a single request or suggestion. I have been as independent as the commission are. The vote for salaries has been reduced from $196,020 to $182,898. That is due to the fact that there have been some retirements and one or two appointments. I have particulars, but I do not think they would be of interest to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it the intention of the government to effect a complete reorganization of that commission? For instance, may I refer to the chairman of the commission. I see by the press it is rumoured that he is considering retirement. Perhaps the minister could give the committee some information as to when he is due to retire.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe it is clearly understood that the Hon. W. J. Roche, has reached the age limit, and will retire at an early date. Although I cannot speak authoritatively, I have no doubt that upon his retirement the vacancy will be filled by a new appointment. I believe the view generally expressed last year before the committee on civil service was that it might be advisable to retain his services for some months, during reorganization, in view of the fact that he had had such long experience in the details of that organization. His knowledge of these details was most useful to the new appointees and it is solely on these grounds that he is being retained for a short time.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it not true that the committee of parliament which investigated the workings of the Civil Service Commission recommended that the services of the chairman and his two associates be dispensed with forthwith?

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot speak definitely from memory, but I do not think that was the recommendation. As the hon. gentleman knows, Mr. Adrien Potvin, who was formerly one of the translators in the Senate, was appointed as a civil service commissioner. The fact that that commission would have the advantage of his intimate knowledge of translation methods was one of the reasons for the favourable consideration of placing the entire translating branch under the commission in a more definite way than has existed heretofore.

Mr. VENIOT: The Civil Service Commission would have nothing to do with translations, they would have to do only with the appointment of translators.

Mr. CAHAN: There would be the matter of organization.

Mr. VENIOT: If this gentleman has to do with translations I hope he will be more up to his work than he was when he acted as translator in the Senate.

Mr. CAHAN: I have never met the gentleman and, therefore, I cannot make a reply to my hon. friend.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The position of head examiner and translator was abolished on December 1. Does the minister intend to abolish this position permanently or is it to be just temporary? Will it become as permanent as the temporary cut in salaries?

Mr. CAHAN: As the minister representing the Civil Service Commission I can give no assurance as to whether or not vacancies will be filled. I have no voice, directly or indirectly, in connection with appointments or retirements.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $351,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a reduction of $198,300 in this vote. Naturally we are all pleased to see reductions made but this is a very important service and I understand that the duties of this department are increasing all the time.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A substantial part of the reduction is due to the letting out of the staff engaged for the census.

Mr. BRADETTE: How many of that staff have been retained in the service?

Mr. STEVENS: There were 292 still in the service last year but I think a further reduction is to be made this month and some of that number will not be kept on for the coming year.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will that whole staff be eventually abolished or will some of them be retained in the service?

Mr. STEVENS: By the time the supplementary estimates are brought down I shall know definitely. It is possible that due to the growth of the work it may be thought desirable to retain the services of some of those who have received special training in census work during the past three years. I can give no decision to-day on this matter but I shall be able to make a definite statement before the end of the session.

Mr. CAHAN: I notice that certain items of public printing and stationery were not dealt with, and I ask my hon. friend if he would permit these to be taken up at this time. I do not think there will be any discussion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS: I would have to move that this item stands.

Item stands.

Public Printing and Stationery—printing, binding, et cetera, the annual statutes, $8,500.

Mr. CAHAN: The reduction of $1,500 in this vote has been made possible by a decrease in the cost of paper.

Mr. VENIOT: As a matter of economy, has the minister given any consideration to the quality of the paper used for envelopes and correspondence?

Mr. CAHAN: A thorough research has been made in this regard. Certain suggestions have been made to the departments with regard to future orderings of supplies. If these are carried out it is expected a considerable saving will be made.

Mr. VENIOT: I believe it would save considerably. There is another matter to which I would direct attention, that is, the poor sticking qualities of the envelopes with which we are supplied. Take the six or seven inch envelopes. It is practically impossible to get them to stick without the use of mucilage. I do not think members should be expected to send out correspondence in an envelope with the flap in such a condition that anyone could open it.

Mr. CAHAN: I shall make special representations to the department as to this matter.

Mr. POULIOT: I am in favour of economy in every branch of the service but I think the members should be allowed sufficient paper for their parliamentary duties. I do not see any economy in the fact that a member is allowed only two or three pads of paper at a time. He is forced to send out a messenger every time he needs pins, pencils or envelopes. More money is spent on the messenger than would cover the cost of the stationery. These matters should be dealt with from a common sense point of view and a member should not be forced to send for a messenger every time he needs a pad or envelope. I do not blame the minister for this, but I think some attention should be paid to the convenience of the members of this house.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, the bound editions of Hansard. There is economy in that respect, I am told. Now, since I have been a member of this house, for ten years I have been receiving two bound sets of Hansard, one in French and one in English. I keep one at home and one here, and I keep it religiously. This year however on account of economy the clerk has been refusing to let me have an English bound set of Hansard of last year. I do not understand that. There would be greater economy if he did not pay $480 for a carpet without the authorization of the Speaker or the sergeant at arms, though he will not allow members to have bound sets of Hansard. Economy should be practised and not preached; there should be example and not mere words. We are not children here, and we are not to be bossed by any one of our servants; and if he thinks fit to buy an expensive rug for $480, a superior quality rug, it is a real scandal, and the only thing to do is to tell him to get out if he has done it without authorization. According to the information I have received from the proper officials he was not authorized to buy that expensive rug for $480, when I cannot get a bound set of statutes I need for my parliamentary work.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. gentleman is out of order in discussing carpets when we are speaking of statutes.

Mr. CAHAN: The matters of which the hon. gentleman complains have nothing to do with my department or with this vote; they are entirely under the supervision of the internal economy committee of this house, which is composed of his own fellow members.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to tell the minister that I am not putting the blame on him at all. In reply to the chairman I will only say this: I was not speaking of general merchandise or rugs as such but by way of comparison, and I am saying that it is more expensive to buy a rug for $480 than to supply members of this house with bound Hansards in both languages.

Item agreed to.

Distribution of official documents, $39,000.

Mr. CAHAN: This vote has been cut down from $42,500, a reduction of $3,500, owing to the fact that we have made a careful revision of the official lists of documents being sent out. As a result of deaths and from other causes the list has been reduced.

Item agreed to.

Printing and binding official publications for sale and distribution to departments and the public, $42,750.

Mr. CAHAN: This is money that comes back into the treasury.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $351,000.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Reading the bulletins that are issued, one is apt to conclude that we are getting out of the crisis very quickly, that we are on the upgrade, and one is apt to take a very optimistic view of conditions in Canada. I do not object to that at all, but I am wondering whether that is part of the policy of statistical makebelieve, designed to make a good showing. I should like to see the statistics a little more, I will not say accurate but more in keeping with the actual facts. Is it the decided policy of the department to publish only such statistics as make a good showing?

Mr. STEVENS: The statistics are published accurately and strictly in accordance with the facts, and there is a large number of publications on various subjects which are put out as regularly as clockwork monthly and even weekly in some cases. These are very voluminous. The bulletin is a summarization of them for the convenience chiefly of the press.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I am referring more particularly to the bulletin; I will not make any observations on the statistics in general. I am wondering whether the bulletin shows the facts exactly as they are or whether it is intended to give people abroad the idea that everything is on the upgrade and that everything is all right with Canada—on the eve of an election, though I would not blame the minister for taking that precaution.

Mr. STEVENS: A survey of all issues of this kind, such as Irving Fisher's and the American Bureau, the London Economist's publications and all standard publications, shows that in about 80 per cent of them there is indicated a general tendency to rise. I do not think it is pretended by anyone that the rise is rapid, but there is a general indication, purely statistical, of a slight and continuous upward curve; and in our publication we are following as closely and accurately as we can the day-to-day or week-to-week statistical record.

Mr. NEILL: I must confess that I formed an opinion somewhat similar to that expressed by my hon friend (Mr. Bouchard). It seemed to me that the selection of the items in that bulletin was calculated to form good propaganda for the coming election, to put it bluntly. I wish to refer to the subject that was discussed the last time the minister's estimates were under consideration. I complained that the information given in one of the minister's publications differed considerably from the information given in another one or in others, and I instanced three cases of the export of canned salmon. I gave the quarter ending in June, the quarter ending in September and the record for nine months ending September, and I showed that there was a discrepancy, not trivial but running as high as 60 per cent. That was on the 24th, and on the 27th, on the orders of the day, the minister brought the matter up and was allowed nearly two pages of Hansard to explain the situation and to show that I was mistaken. I wonder if I would have been allowed to use two pages on the orders of the day.

Mr. STEVENS: I was doing it at the request of the hon. gentleman, he will note.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, he said that, but I could not find where I had made a request in the matter. I made a statement.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend asked me to take notice of it and make an explanation, which I did at the earliest possible opportunity out of courtesy to him.

Mr. NEILL: Asking him to take notice is hardly a question. However, that is of little importance. Now, to my mind—and I suppose I am stupid—the explanation made the situation rather worse. It was threefold. First, it was explained—and I presume it is to a certain extent correct—that one record was taken from exports from Canada and the other from imports into Great Britain, but not, mark you, from the British but from the Canadian records.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is wrong there. He will pardon me for interrupting him, but I think it would be very unfortunate were an impression to go abroad that the bureau of statistics was in any way inaccurate. The figures of imports into the United Kingdom are the United Kingdom figures. Will my hon. friend please accept my word on that?—because the reputation and honour of the Dominion Statistician are being questioned in this matter and I am indeed sorry that that should be the case.

Mr. NEILL: I am not attacking the reputation and honour of the statistician; I am saying that the man who prepares these bulletins and who turns out 3,000,000 words for $6.20, as the minister himself said the other day, hurriedly selecting the material as the stuff went past, did not do the work as accurately as he might.

Mr STEVENS: I made no such statement.

Mr. NEILL: About the bulletin?

Mr. STEVENS: No such statement.

Mr. NEILL: Well, let us refer to Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well; refer to it.

Mr. NEILL: It will be found that the minister said that this was a selection; that as the items were passed in review, somebody picked it out; that the system was rapid and the material was picked out in that way.

As regards the point whether the information comes from Britain, I have no access to the British records, and I took it from the bulletin prepared by the minister and from the Commercial Intelligence Journal, which the minister will certainly admit is under his authority. I did not take it from the British records. The Commercial Intelligence Journal does not say that they are British records, but I shall take the minister's statement that they are.

[Mr. Neill.]

I understood the minister to say that if some of the shipments of salmon from British Columbia were shipped by water, it would be a considerable time before they arrived at their destination, and consequently some of them would appear in a different quarter of imports into Britain from that in which they were recorded as having left Canada. That is quite true and would be a good explanation as to the discrepancy in one quarter if it showed a smaller amount received in Britain than had been exported from Canada. But that will hold only once. The next quarter it will not apply, because the hangover from the previous quarter would be in the second and the one should more or less balance the other, whereas it does not do so. In the June quarter the shortage was 9,000 hundredweight. In the September quarter it got worse; it was 23,000 hundredweight, and for the nine months ending September, it was 32,000, so it was cumulatively worse. I admit that it will apply to one quarter, but it does not seem to be borne out by the records of three quarters or of the nine months period.

The second explanation the minister gave was that the figure for the exports from Canada was reckoned on 100 pounds to the hundredweight while the figure for what was received in Great Britain was on the basis of 112 pounds to the hundredweight. The answer to that is that at the very most it would make a difference of only 12 per cent, and not of 40 or 60 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no such difference. I ask my hon. friend to pardon me for interrupting him. I am not asking any favours for myself as minister, but I certainly am jealous of the reputation of the bureau of statistics as one of the outstanding institutions of this country. My hon. friend is making statements which, by the very page of Hansard which he was quoting a moment ago, are shown clearly not to be so. My hon. friend need not give me any quarter at all; about that I do not care twopence, but I ask him to be fair in regard to one of our institutions of which hon. members on both sides of the house are justly proud.

Mr. NEILL: Really this lecture is very severe and all that, but the minister has not proven anything.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not a lecture; it is simply an interruption in the interests of accuracy. I protest against allowing to go out to the world statements such as my hon. friend has made. In order to make the point I wish, I shall take the opportunity now of giving the committee the facts. In the export figures of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1933 as given on page 978 of Hansard will be found this: the number of pounds of exports of canned salmon to the United Kingdom is 11,151,800. Then the United Kingdom figures of imports for the same twelve months are 11,397,680 pounds, or a difference roughly of about 240,000 pounds.

The other day I explained that there are bound to be and always are discrepancies between figures of exports to a country and those of imports into it, for two or three reasons. First, these goods move from the Pacific coast to Great Britain and it is more than likely that at the end of the year some might be in transit which were not entered in the returns for that year, and at the commencement of the year the same thing would apply, so there is bound to be a discrepancy. The second reason is that many cargoes going from Canada to Liverpool, Falmouth or other ports in England—and this applies particularly to wheat—are often diverted at some point in midocean to continental ports. My hon. friends who are in the wheat business know that. There is no possibililty of our knowing where such shipments from Canada may be diverted but every effort is made among the statisticians of Canada, Great Britain, the United States, European and other countries to keep their whole system as accurate and as uniform as they can. This is a difficult, intricate and complex task, but it is a most remarkable instance of reasonably accurate comparison. Let me again say that the total figure of Canada's exports of canned salmon to the United Kingdom for the twelve months of 1933 was 11,151,800 pounds while the British figure of our imports into the United Kingdom for the same period amounted to 11,397,680. Does such a slight discrepancy as that justify a serious indictment of the bureau and its accuracy?

Mr. NEILL: The minister is talking about something utterly remote from what I was speaking about when he interrupted me. He says that I am unfair and unjust and that the honour of so-and-so is at stake, but he has not replied as to the particular item about which I was talking when he interrupted me. I still fail to see any unfairness in what I was saying. Let me quote the minister himself as reported on page 977 of Hansard; never mind about page 978; I shall come to that later. He said:

> In the second place the imports in Great Britain are set forth in hundredweights of 112 pounds while exports from Canada are set forth in the Canadian standard of 100 pounds.

Hansard will show that those were exact words I was using when the minister interrupted me. Is there anything unfair in that?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not what I objected to, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. NEILL: Well, that was what I was talking about when he interrupted me and said that I was unfair.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. NEILL: I shall leave it in the judgment of the house and Hansard whether that was what I was talking about when I was interrupted.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member had better read Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. NEILL: We can read it now if he likes. When I came to the second explanation of the minister I said that part of the discrepancy could be accounted for by the fact that 100 pounds to the hundredweight was used in the one case and 112 pounds in the other, and that is true; that was his own language. To draw a picture of what took place as reported on the next page of Hansard is beside the point. I said that that would make a difference of only 12 per cent. It was at that point the minister interrupted; there is nothing wrong there. For instance, in the June quota instead of a discrepancy of 9,000 hundredweight it would still show a discrepancy of 7,144, and in the nine months ending September, after allowance for the difference, it would still leave a discrepancy of over a million pounds, which certainly requires explanation. But even supposing that was correct, who is to blame for putting into his journals two contradictory things, hundredweights of 100 pounds and of 112 pounds, without telling people? Certainly it was the duty of the department to let us know. I am not blaming the minister personally, but an explanation should have been given so that the ordinary business man would not be putting hundredweights of 112 pounds against hundredweights of 100 pounds for purposes of comparison. That is an inaccuracy and a lack of attention that should not have occurred. If that is the cause of the inaccuracy, and the minister suggested it as being one, then the department is to blame. Now I did not get this from the British papers, I got it either from his own departmental bulletin or the Commercial Intelligence Journal.

Then again I complained of three items, the June and the September quarters and the nine months ending September. The explanation about the difference in regard to shipments from British Columbia would do for one quarter but not for three consecutive quarters. The minister explains that one set of figures was based on hundredweights of 100 pounds instead of 112, but that would only make a trivial difference. He goes further and says: Well, look at these other figures, and he draws a pretty picture of another bunch of figures—

Mr. STEVENS: No. I did not.

Mr. NEILL: —drawing a herring across the trail. I never said anything about the year's figures because I have not got them. The minister has access to the figures, but at the time that I spoke I had not access to them. He says: "Never mind about the June quarter, and there is something wrong with the September quarter; but look at these—they are lovely; they fit all right."

Mr. STEVENS: I made no such statement about there being something wrong with the quarterly figures.

Mr. NEILL: The minister made the inference that there was something wrong because he tried to explain the difference by referring to hundredweights of 100 pounds and 112 pounds. He gets around the thing by such well known methods as he is rather fond of. He says: "Yes, but look at this other picture; isn't it nice, and doesn't it fit?" I do not know if it does, because I have not got the figures; therefore I am not talking about it.

We will go a stage further and take the minister's own figures as set forth so extensively on these two pages of Hansard. There are even discrepancies in that. This is the latest thing, fixed up to show the thing is all right. It shows the total for the year as 101,765 hundredweight, while his own Commercial Inteligence Journal of February 24, says that the imports of canned salmon for the year 1933 were 100,988 hundredweight. That is another discrepancy to be accounted for.

Take another error in these same revised figures. On the page referred to, 978, he gives the imports for the year. I have taken them for the nine months, because that is all of which I have knowledge. I added the March quarter, 18,958; the June quarter, 8,360 and the September figure, 27,189, which makes a total of 54,507. Remember those are British hundredweights; there is no doubt about that, because it is specifically so stated. But the Commercial Intelligence Journal of November 24 gives the number of canned salmon in the same nine months as 53,688 hundredweight, a discrepancy of 819 hundredweight, or 91,922 pounds. That is the latest; the minister has had time to consult and get the thing all ready, yet his own figures show these discrepancies.

However, I have not laboured in vain, because the very day we were talking about this there was laid on my desk a correction in the bulletin; it says the export figures for January, 1934, were incorrectly given in hundredweights instead of pounds in connection with concentrated milk production, a difference of well over a million pounds. So it shows there has been in the preparation of that bulletin carelessness and slackness. I am not attacking anyone's integrity, but I say the compiler of that bulletin has been careless and slack in presenting those returns. If they do these things in the green tree what shall be done in the dry?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is most unfortunate that the hon. member should persist in arguing this point. I thought that by submitting an explanatory statement as I did the other day my hon. friend would have understood it. But he still persists in the contention that in particular quarters referred to there is a discrepancy. I have explained about three times that there is bound to be a discrepancy where there is movement of goods. He takes the quarter comprising the months of July, August and September. The Canadian figures show an export of 30,000 hundredweight in August and 18,000 in September. The British figures for August and September are much lower. But the British figures for October greatly exceed the Canadian figures of October exports, showing clearly that the goods were in transit. My hon. friend knows better than any member of the house that the major movement of the salmon pack from British Columbia is in the months of September, October and November. It is perfectly clear, if one wishes to be fair in the matter, as clear as the nose on the hon. member's face.

Then he takes me to task for giving the year's figures. I gave them for the purpose of showing—keeping in mind the movement of the goods and the time that must elapse between their leaving the Pacific coast and arriving in the United Kingdom,—that the figures were remarkably close.

The hon. gentleman takes to task the officials of the bureau for drawing attention to an inaccuracy in a previous report. In the mass of figures issued there are bound to be inaccuracies, but they are carefully checked and the moment differences are found notice is given in the same periodical of such inaccuracy and the correction made. Surely no reasonable person will complain about officials who so quickly and promptly correct any inaccuracy.

There is much more that one would be inclined to say, but I think it would be wasting the time of the committee to indulge in any further reply to such statements the hon. member has made.

At six o'clock the speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Trade and Commerce—Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $351,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: This afternoon the minister gave us some information with regard to those employed in connection with the census, and I understand that those temporary employees have an opportunity to obtain permanent employment under the Civil Service Commission. This afternoon the minister said that some of these temporary employees would become permanent, and I should like to know how the department selects those who are to become permanent. Is it a question of merit or is it carried out under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: They can be appointed only in conformity with and under the terms of the Civil Service Act, in the usual way.

Mr. BRADETTE: How is the selection made as to who shall remain in the service? At first we had quite a number of these temporary employees in connection with the census, but now that this work is completed most of these employees have been dispensed with. The minister, however, said some would be kept in the service permanently.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. Those now employed by the bureau of statistics in connection with census work will gradually disappear; I may say that the number of these temporary employees at the moment is 272. A number of those employees will be retired on April 1; a further number will be retired on June 1, while still more will retire in August, and I think by about October the services of practically all these temporary employees will be dispensed with. A few will be retained in connection with the completion of the ten volumes that will comprise the census work in its finished form; these few will be retained for some months longer, I do not know exactly how long. Then I told my hon. friend that possibly a few, I do not know how many, might have such special training that it would be desirable to retain them. In that case they will be brought into the service under the Civil Service Act, if they qualify; if they do not, the only other way to bring them in is by way of an estimate passed by this house, but no decision has been made in the matter as yet.

Mr. BRADETTE: As to those few who may be retained, will that be because their special qualifications are known to the department or to the Civil Service Commission or to the minister?

Mr. STEVENS: It will be done by examination, under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SANDERSON: I suppose the very large decrease in this item, amounting to almost $200,000, is due to the retirement of so many temporary employees?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the census staff.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In that regard may I ask what is the normal expenditure on this bureau during periods between the taking of the census?

Mr. STEVENS: Last year the vote for the regular work of the bureau was $156,000, and this year we are asking for $148,000 for that regular work. I can run over the figures for the last five years. Last year the regular vote was $156,000; the year before it was $153,000, and for the three previous years it was $189,000, $127,000 and $114,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): From these figures I am glad to see that apparently there is some realization of the great importance of the work done by this bureau. In my opinion it is one of the most, if not the most important instruments with which to make information available to the state, and is one of the finest sources of information by means of which members of this house and the government itself can be governed in relation to matters both social and economic. I should regret very much if any government were to attempt to curtail the activities of this department or the services which it renders, which are not only of inestimable value to the members of this house when it is in session but are constantly being drawn upon from every quarter of Canada whether the house is in session or not.

I have in mind some of the work that might be done by the bureau but which is not done at present, and which so far as I can ascertain is not in contemplation at the present time. For example, we have no complete figures on credit and currency matters going right back to confederation. It is true that in recent years the exigencies of monetary problems have brought about a realization in the bureau, as well as in the department itself, of the importance of accurate figures in these matters, and there has been a marked improvement in this regard, but still we have to analyze the information further back in order to have the record complete. Then there is another matter which I know is very dear to the heart of the minister, that of trade between this country and the United Kingdom. The minister will realize that even at this moment there is no means by which we may estimate correctly the total volume and the balance of trade as between the two countries. A few years ago, when I made a close study of this subject, I found that if adequate corrections were made to ascertain the actual destination of shipments of grain from Canada, it would be found that our figures did not tally in any respect with the British figures as to the reception of Canadian grain. If the allowances were made which were justified by the British figures, we would find that instead of Great Britain buying, according to the popular expression of that time, nearly twice as much from us as we bought from her, the actual position was that she was buying approximately the same amount.

I wonder if that question has been gone into further and whether the department is in a position to designate the destination of the trade movements from Canada and so enable us to reach more accurate judgments as to trade movements and balances as between nations. In my opinion, which I am sure the minister shares, it is essential that the information we acquire in matters of this kind should be as accurate as it is humanly possible to get it, and I hope this matter is not being overlooked. Doubtless there are other questions involved in the work of the bureau, but at this stage I will content myself with paying my personal tribute to the efficiency of the head of that bureau and the active cooperation I have always received from him and from the staff. I hope that at no time, either under this or under any subsequent government, will any attempt be made to curtail these activities.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the two main problems to which my hon. friend has referred are very difficult and very complex; they are engaging the attention not only of the bureau of statistics and its experts in Canada, but also of the statisticians of European countries, and in fact of all the leading countries of the world. Measurable progress has been and is being made towards the harmonizing of these trade figures. Let me take the first item to which my hon. friend refers, namely, the production of statistics which will give a correct view of the economic relations between, we will say, this country and Great Britain. That involves, of course, the question of actual goods shipped from the one to the other, both ways, the amount paid for services in, we will say, freight and cargo rates, the amount involved in interest on investments in this country, and possibly a few the other way; the question of insurance and the question of tourist expenditures pro and con. These are the main factors. There are some other invisibles of smaller and lesser importance. The statisticians of both countries have, I believe, a fairly accurate concept of the value of the services and the invisibles which enter into these calculations. There are no definite records. For instance, as regards shipping it is not disclosed what is paid for British shipping or Norwegian shipping and so on. These things are not reduced to their precise dimensions. But there are yardsticks which are commonly used by statisticians the world over for bases of estimates which are adopted and accepted, and these I believe are used with fair accuracy by our bureau. I believe last session I gave the house a picture of the statistical relations of Canada with the United Kingdom.

In regard to the second question, that is the movement of goods, chiefly grain, I think we might say that the balance of the goods moved is really not a serious matter. In connection with grain, however, it is serious. Cargoes are cleared from Canada nominally for the United Kingdom and, so far as our records show, they are exported to that country. We do know definitely however, that a very substantial portion of these shipments and cargoes are diverted to other ports. We can only estimate, and we do that by various means. Of course the chief source of our knowledge is the British import information by which we are able to get fairly accurate statistics. I believe it was about four years ago I personally made an analysis of these figures, and found that Canada was credited with exporting to the United Kingdom a quantity of grain in excess of the total amount imported by Great Britain. But adjustments can be made and are made in estimating the diversion. Then, of course, as a cross check we have the British import figures, which are usually fairly satisfactory, although there again is a difficulty because frequently grain which is moved, we will say, through Buffalo and New York is entered in the British figures as American grain, and conversely grain which is moved from the middle west of the United States through Montreal is entered as Canadian grain. In the British figures those shipments are not segregated. However, we are able to ascertain with fair accuracy the quantities of grain which are moved.

I am glad the hon. member brought the matter up for discussion. May I say to him that the whole subject is engaging the attention and study not only of Canadian statisticians and students in the bureau and in the universities, but also of statisticians of the League of Nations, in Great Britain, the United States and other European countries.

Mr. VENIOT: Does not the same apply to certain imports into Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, quite so. For instance, large quantities of goods moved from central Europe find as a port of exit, we will say, a German port. They are entered in our import records as coming from Germany, having been merchandised in Hamburg, we will say, which is a great free city. It may be merchandised there, and there may be a bona fide clearing for Canada, but the origin of the goods might be Czechoslovakia.

Mr. VENIOT: What about tea and coffee?

Mr. STEVENS: A great deal of tea in years gone by has moved through Great Britain. However in regard to that commodity I believe we are able pretty well to ascertain the country of origin.

Mr. VENIOT: Through the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: Some comes through the United States, but that is largely transshipped.

Item agreed to.

Sydney and Whycocomagh, service between, $10,000.
Inspection of subsidized steamship services, $4,700.

Mr. VENIOT: Under this item I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that in the estimates for the year 1934, $1,000 was voted for the service between the islands in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the baie des Chaleurs, and the mainland. I refer to the service between Miscou and Shippigan and the mainland. I notice that in the estimates for this year the vote is dropped. May we have the reason?

Mr. STEVENS: Frankly, we found that the service had dropped down to a point where in the last year it carried only 166 passengers. I was impressed with the fact that it was a service which, not being used to any extent, did not warrant a subsidy.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister permit me to call attention to the use to which this service is put? It was established some years ago to enable the people on the two islands of Shippigan and Miscou to have connection with the mainland. When it was first established the boat ran from Miscou harbour to Lameque, on the island of Shippigan, and from there to Shippigan and Caraquet. At that time they were receiving a subsidy of $2,000. Later on the boat they were using, on account of old age and some damage which she suffered, was put out of commission. The company operating the service was a private company of fishermen and farmers of the two islands I have mentioned. About eight or nine years ago they had to build a new boat to carry on the service. I suggest that the utility of the service should not be judged by the number of passengers carried. It is used generally for the transfer of freight and fishermen's supplies, especially in the fall of the year before the winter season sets in. If this boat is not subsidized, as she was in the past, she will likely have to be put out of commission. I know there is not enough traffic to pay for the service, hence the application for a subsidy. Some 3,000 people are being deprived of a service which for the last fifteen years, and perhaps longer, they have enjoyed, and the result is a great hardship to them. It is about the only service of the kind in the maritime provinces which is not being taken care of this year. I appeal to the minister to consider repeating the vote given last year in the supplementary estimates so that the service hitherto given may be continued. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), who was down through this country last summer, must have passed Miscou and Shippigan islands on his way to visit the different ports and must have noted the isolation of these people; I hope he will join with me in appealing to the government to renew this subsidy of 1,000. I know that if it is not granted the boat will have to be taken out of service and great hardship will result to the 3,000 people living on these islands.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall take the suggestion of my hon. friend into consideration, but I should like to make one observation; last year 162 trips were made and the average freight carried each trip was only one and three-quarter tons.

Mr. VENIOT: All the more reason why a subsidy should be granted.

Mr. STEVENS: A consideration which must be borne in mind is the extent to which a service is used. However, there are sometimes extenuating circumstances and I shall give the matter careful consideration.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I notice in this long list of mail subsidies and steamship subventions that in nearly every case there has been a reduction except in one instance in the minister's own province. Under the heading, "British Columbia and Australia and/or China, service between" the vote has been increased from $96,000 to $118,800. I do not object very strenuously to a minister looking after the interests of his own province, but a minister representing a great department should not be so parochial, especially in view of the fact that this service does not concern his own constituency. I cannot understand why one service in perhaps forty or fifty should be picked out to be increased by $22,800. The government say that although they have turned the corner, these are still times of stress and strain. They have reduced every other item in these mail subsidies and steamship subventions, yet the minister, deliberately or otherwise, increases a subsidy in his own province by $22,800.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to some other items. My understanding is that contracts exist in connection with some of these services. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who is in his seat, has always been a great advocate of the sanctity of contracts. When he was on this side of the house and since, he has stated in very serious tones that a contract should not be disturbed, whether it was one in connection with tariffs or one in connection with something else to satisfy the special interests of this country. My understanding is that contracts have been entered into with different steamship companies throughout this country for a period of five or ten years at specified prices, yet the votes have been reduced for all the services except one in British Columbia. I do not know whether this has been done by the statistical branch of the minister's department, which he was so anxious to protect this afternoon, or by some other official, but the fact is that reductions have been made. If these steamship companies have a contract with the government I should like to know why these votes have been reduced.

Let me give two or three instances. I see sitting across from me two very prominent members of the house, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Queens has moved up so that he can hear what I have to say. I notice that the item in connection with the service between Charlottetown and Pictou has been reduced from $30,000 to $20,000. I think the hon. members for Queens and Pictou will agree that this is a very important service between the mainland of Nova Scotia and the garden of the gulf, Prince Edward Island. Not only has this vote been reduced from $30,000 to $20,000, but if my memory serves me aright, and I have a pretty good one—again I refer the Prime Minister to his remarks on the sanctity of contracts—a contract was entered into either by this or by the last government for a ten year service between Pictou and Charlottetown, not for $20,000 a year, not for $30,000 a year, but for $40,000 a year.

Mr. BENNETT: If parliament voted the money.

Mr. DUFF: I thank thee, O Jew, for that word. That is just exactly the trap I would expect someone to fall into "if parliament voted the money." The minister is quite right but only up to a certain point. What is that point? As I say, the contract was for $40,000. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) had put an item in the estimates for $40,000 and the hon. member for Queens moved to reduce it to $20,000 and was sustained by the committee, then the Prime Minister would be right. But a contract has been entered into and the government does not wait for this committee to reduce the amount; in spite of the contract and in spite of the sanctity of that contract, the government reduces the amount from $40,000 to $20,000. Now where is the Prime Minister's argument that this is correct? We have not been asked to vote $40,000 in the case of this Pictou-Charlottetown service; we have been asked to vote only $20,000. I say to the Prime Minister that if he will increase this vote to the amount of the contract, $40,000 and the committee decides that it will vote only $20,000, then it will be time enough for him to say that the government can pay only what parliament votes. We cannot move to increase a vote, and with a contract still outstanding, this particular vote should never have been decreased. The Prime Minister says that all the government can do is to pay the money voted by parliament, but I think he knows better than that. He is a great constitutional lawyer and he knows that if the government decided to increase this vote to $100,000, it could be put through the house with the government's present majority. Yet the Prime Minister tells us that all they can pay is the $20,000. Having entered into a solemn contract to pay a steamship company a certain amount of money, that company having bought a steamship for the purpose of carrying out that contract, and having fitted up that ship, this government has no right to reduce the subsidy to that steamship company by fifty per cent. It is not fair, it is not decent and, what is more, it is not good business.

I notice there is also an amount for a service between Mulgrave and Arichat and Canso. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will lend his support in connection with this item, because Arichat happens to be in his constituency, a constituency that did him the honour of electing him by acclamation. I had to fight for my seat in this house but the Minister of Finance came here without a contest, and I dare to say that I had something to do with it; they consulted me as to whether they should oppose him or not and I told them not to do it. The Minister of Finance ought therefore to be sympathetic towards me; I am sure I shall have his sympathy. Well, what do we find here? What do we find in this great and important constituency represented by my hon. friend? I do not like to make any distinction between members of the cabinet, but perhaps the members of the cabinet will agree with me when I say that next to the Prime Minister the Minister of Finance is the most important member of the council. Yet here is a constituency, represented as I say by the minister second in importance in the cabinet, treated in this way by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; for what has the Minister of Trade and Commerce done in this connection? In spite of the fact that a contract was entered into with a good Tory, a nice fellow and a personal friend of mine—he does not help me in election time but that doesn't matter—we find this service reduced by $3,750.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no contract there except a year to year contract.

Mr. DUFF: Well, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the contractor was consulted before the amount was reduced and whether or not the contractor agreed?

Mr. STEVENS: The contract for the $33,750 is the current contract which expires shortly. No new contract has been entered into.

Mr. DUFF: How can the Minister of Trade and Commerce either through the statistical department or by any other means, arrive at this arbitrary sum of $30,000? How does he know that my good friend, the good Conservative who owns the boat, will accept it?

Mr. STEVENS: He may not.

Mr. DUFF: And I suppose the minister does not care whether he does or not. But I care, and the Minister of Finance cares, though that gentleman cannot get up on the floor and criticize his brother minister. I hope, however, that he will do it in council to-morrow morning after he hears what I have to say to-night. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce: Is this sort of thing fair to his colleague the Minister of Finance, the gentleman who is carrying the financial burden of this country and who is trying to bring in a new Bank Act? Is it fair to that minister to make this reduction without consulting him? Without consulting the Minister of Finance or the contractor he deliberately reduces this contract by $3,750, not knowing, as he has just admitted, whether the contractor will accept it or not. And suppose, for the sake of argument, that the contractor does not accept it; what will happen? What will happen in the county represented by the Minister of Finance and in my own constituency, one of the most important parts of the province of Nova Scotia, where this service goes on? In the light of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has increased the subsidy in his own province to $22,800, is he going to throw out of gear the whole maritime problem as it affects my own constituency and that of the Minister of Finance, without consulting either the Minister of Finance or poor little me? Surely that is not fair; it is not good business for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make this reduction deliberately with a view to balancing the budget—because that is the whole game. And after all it is only balancing the budget on paper; you may reduce the estimates as much as you like, or put in anything you like, but you will not balance your budget unless you get the revenue. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for some reason best known to himself, deliberately jeopardises the position of the Minister of Finance and my position in our two counties by reducing this subsidy by $3,750. Oh, yes. But that does not satisfy this Cassius—is that a good word?—in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

There must be some Scotch in the English Minister of Trade and Commerce because he is not satisfied with deliberately going out of his way to reduce the subsidy in the county represented by my good friend the Minister of Finance and in my own county as well, but he takes another crack at my constituency. Here is the service between Mulgrave and Guysborough, calling at intermediate ports, reduced from $10,500 to $9,500—a very important service. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was one of those who sat around the council board when my hon. friend from Pictou, before he was a member, came at his own expense to Ottawa and urged that a railway be built through part of his county and part of mine in order that the people might have railway accommodation—and I thank the hon. gentleman for having done it. But it was deliberately decided not to go on with the building of that railway, so that the only communication the people have is this water transportation between Mulgrave and Guysborough.

Mr. CANTLEY: They are shipping lumber over my end of it now.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend is stronger than I thought he was. The only means of communication the people have there in the winter time, especially when the roads are blocked with snow and ice, is by steamer between Guysborough and Mulgrave. They have no railway communication, notwithstanding that the people of Guysborough pay their share of interest on railway indebtedness, and paid their share of rights of way in Nova Scotia and other parts of the dominion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the face of that, reduces the subsidy this year, and he cannot say that there is no contract in this instance.

Mr. STEVENS: The present one will be completed out of the vote of this year and no new contract will be entered into after the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. DUFF: In other words, he is paying $10,500 up to the end of this month and, without consulting the owners of the steamer or the Guysborough board of trade, without consulting the people of Mulgrave or the town council or anyone else, he arbitrarily decides that all that this government will pay for the service is $9,500.

Mr. ERNST: Does the hon. member know what happened—whether that service was making a profit or otherwise? I am anxious to know whether it has operated at a profit or a loss. Will it have to go into debt to be able to continue?

Mr. DUFF: I am delighted that my hon. friend has interjected that question, and for two reasons. First, I notice in these estimates for subsidies and even in last year's estimates for subsidies—

Mr. ERNST: There is none for Lunenburg.

Mr. DUFF: There is no subsidy for a service between Halifax and La Have. When I was member for the constituency of Lunenburg, the federal government paid $6,000 for a service between Halifax and La Have. Ever since the present government has been in power, with the hon. member opposite representing that constituency supporting the administration, the subsidy has been cut out. Did the hon. member ask that the subsidy be cut off because the service did not pay?

Mr. ERNST: It did not pay; it has been taken off and I have ever since been asking the minister to restore the subsidy.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member may have been urging the minister, but his urging does not amount to very much. He deliberately got himself into this argument and I am delighted to join him in advocating this particular subsidy. He asked me if this Guysborough service is paying. Of course I have not the books of the company and I do not know, but the owners of the steamship company have told me that, in view of the fact that the government reduced the subsidy last year, they were compelled to take the cook off the boat, so that if, for instance, the boat got stuck in the ice as it is at present in the strait of Canso, and was held up over night in the lee of Bear island or Sand point, there is no food on board and no cook to boil the kettle. I thank the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg for asking whether the steamer was paying. Hon. members know the saying about somebody stepping in where angels fear to tread. But because the government reduced the subsidy from $10,500 to $9,500, the steamship company was compelled to take off the cook and the stewardess so that the passengers aboard cannot get a meal and the crew have to wait until they reach Mulgrave or Guysborough to get something to eat. Surely the hon. member will realize that when a steamer cannot have a cook or a stewardess or food aboard, the company is not making very much money. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce it is not right or fair that the people who put boats on those services and in some cases purchased ships for the special purpose of carrying on a service, should, without being consulted, find, as I said before, that the government in order to make a good showing has reduced the subsidy. This is especially true in the case of my good friend the member for Queens-Lunenburg. I am just as much interested as he is in that service between Halifax and La Have which has been cut out with the result that the people of that important district have now to haul their freight twelve, fourteen or sixteen miles from the town of Bridgewater to La Have or to the town of Riverport. Just because this government are penurious or because they cannot govern properly and collect sufficient revenues, they have to cut out the steamship service between La Have and Halifax.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister inform me as to the number of passengers and the quantity of freight carried on the service between Charlottetown, Victoria and Halliday's wharf.

Mr. STEVENS: The vessel made 211 trips and carried 3,580 passengers, 10,000 barrels of freight and 184 head of live stock.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the distance?

Mr. STEVENS: The service is rather irregular, but the longest distance is twenty-six miles.

Mr. REID: What are the names of the companies receiving subsidies on the Pacific coast?

Mr. STEVENS: The China service?

Mr. REID: All of them. I would like to know particularly what the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific get for the coastwise service there.

Mr. STEVENS: There are a number of them, as follows:

The China Service: British Canadian Steamships, Limited.
South African Service: Java Pacific Line.
Mail Service to China and Japan: Canadian Pacific Railway Company.
Service to New Zealand and Australia: Canadian Australasian Line.
Service to Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte Islands: Canadian National Steamship Service.
Service to Victoria and the West Indies: Canadian Transport Company, Limited.
Service to Vancouver and northern British Columbia ports: Union Steamships, Limited.
Victoria, Vancouver and Skagway Service: Canadian Pacific Railway Company.
West Coast, Vancouver Island Service: Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. REID: The minister will perhaps remember that last year I discussed with him the question of the government taking steps to endeavour to have the companies use quite a proportion of white labour. Have any efforts been made along those lines? I think the minister said that negotiations would proceed after the house rose.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know that I can add much to what was said last year. As regards the service between the coast of British Columbia and the orient, the main service is, of course, the very fine Trans-Pacific mail service by the Canadian Pacific Steamships, and the company states very frankly, handicapped as they are in competition with two large Japanese lines and a long list, which I have among my notes somewhere, of United States lines, all of which are subsidized two or three times as heavily as are the Canadian companies, it would be impossible for the Canadian Pacific to compete with these other services and pay the high rates of wages that would be paid to an entirely white crew. That is one reason. It must be remembered, of course, that these matters are not under our control except in so far as we contribute something for the mail carriage in that class of ship. Second, these ships run to Hongkong as the terminal point in the orient which is a British Chinese area, and the Chinese residents of Hongkong, who claim to be British subjects, claim the right of service on these ships just as well as anyone else, and I do not know that they can be denied. The third reason is that these ships travel a substantial portion of the distance in tropical or semi-tropical waters. All these reasons lend themselves to the use in part of oriental crews. I am well aware of the views entertained by residents of British Columbia that they should have the exclusive right of employment on these ships, but I think a survey of the situation must convince any reasonable person that to adopt that rule would simply mean the elimination of that service from the Pacific ocean.

I do not know that I can add anything to these observations. I fully appreciate and sympathize with the laudable desire of residents, in Vancouver and Victoria chiefly, to be given this employment; but there is reason in all things, and I fear one could not with reason sustain the demand that only white crews should be carried.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell me if any services are omitted this year that were carried on last year?

Mr. STEVENS: That between the mainland, Miscou and Shippigan.

Mr. ERNST: That was discontinued two years ago, not this year.

Mr. RALSTON: Have I an answer from the minister?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the answer—the service between the mainland and Shippigan.

Mr. DUFF: It is usual when a member asks questions for the minister to answer. In my case either silence gave consent or the minister has nothing to say. I would like to get back for the moment to the Prime Minister's idea of the sanctity of contracts. I notice he is not in his seat; perhaps he has gone to look up the constitutional law on the subject. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of the fact that the government and the people of Canada have a contract with the steamship company that has been plying between Pictou and Charlottetown at $40,000 a year, what position the people of this country are in if that steamship company should take action against the government? Would we employ Peter White, or Newton Wesley Rowell, at a large expense, $100 or $200 a day, to defend the government, or what is the real position? I would like the minister to tell the committee whether the government can violate a solemn contract by reducing the amount payable, first from $40,000 to $30,000, and now, by another $10,000. Is there a contract or what is the situation?

Mr. STEVENS: I am pleased to be able to answer my hon. friend. I listened with great interest to all his remarks, and I intend to give careful thought and consideration to what he has said. In regard to the contracts to which he refers, I may say that with very few exceptions these subvention contracts are yearly contracts. That is, parliament will vote a certain sum of money; in some instances tenders are called for and contracts let as a result of the tenders, but where a service has been carried on from year to year by the same person or company or boat, the practice usually is that the contract is renewed by entering into another contract. In the case of the one particularly mentioned by my hon. friend, the service between Charlottetown and Pictou, there was a contract entered into originally in 1924 for five years, and at the expiration of that term another contract was entered into for a further period of five years at $40,000 per year. In all these contracts there is a clause making it subject to the amount being voted by parliament. It is also covenanted that the contractor will accept the amount so voted by parliament. Now the hon. gentleman a little while ago argued quite earnestly this point: is the government discharging its obligation as a party to the contract by submitting to parliament a figure other than the figure stated in the contract? The advice I have received on that point—it is one to which I gave careful consideration—is that it is quite competent for the government in submitting its estimates to submit whatever sum it may see fit in regard to these matters. The government having submitted an estimate to parliament, and parliament accepting it, that constitutes a fulfilment of the contract as far as the government is concerned. Or putting it another way, there is no recourse against the government for taking that procedure. I have given some thought to the point raised by my hon. friend, and I think perhaps it could be argued the other way, but I am definitely assured that there would be no chance of recovery by contractors who might take the action he has suggested in that regard.

But there is something more to this. I do not wish to criticize or reflect upon any services, but some of the services which were entered into in buoyant periods are not justified to-day. There has been in many instances a contraction in the use of the services. In some cases highways which have been developed have taken much of the traffic.

My duty in studying these matters is to try to bring the amounts to be paid within reasonable bounds. I well know that there is always local feeling, always a demand for further amounts. But one must exercise his best judgment in such matters. I do not blame my hon. friend or one or two hon. members on this side who have pressed their claims very vigorously; I appreciate their viewpoint and their difficulties. I assure my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough that it would be pleasant indeed if I were able to respond to all these demands, but I have felt it my duty in some measure to restrict the expediture on this account. I have tried to do so keeping in mind the merits and the value of the services.

One of the commonest arguments advanced for the continuance of these subsidies is that we have had them in the past. I think hon. gentlemen will recognize that while such an argument may be acceptable in buoyant times when revenues are coming in freely, in difficult times when every dollar of expenditure must be examined with care the argument is not a very sound one. The result is that we have lessened in some respects the subventions for these services.

Then my hon. friend appeared to be a little disturbed because there was an increase in the British Columbia-Australia and China service. The reason for that increase is this: we pay so much a trip on that service, and additional trips were made. The increase in the cargoes carried was very substantial, and the value to the Dominion of Canada—it is not a question of British Columbia only—was such that we felt warranted in the payment of the additional amount for the additional number of trips. It is not an increase in the value of the subsidy but rather the value of the trans-Pacific trips that will be made.

Mr. REID: Would the minister mind giving the amount per trip?

Mr. STEVENS: It is $4,950. If the trips are not made this subvention will not be paid. Therefore it does not follow that the whole amount will be paid, but we must provide for it in anticipation of the trips that will be made.

Mr. DUFF: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's special pleading, and I can understand that if the freight and passenger traffic went over the highways instead of by these steamers that might be a reason for the reduction of these subsidies. I do not know how much geography the minister knows, but surely he does not suggest that there is a highway between Pictou and Charlottetown.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. DUFF: The minister's answer was that the subsidy was decreased because in the last few years the people had started to use the highways instead of the old water route. That certainly does not apply to the service between Pictou and Charlottetown, where the only highway is the broad Northumberland strait which sometimes gets pretty rough.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course there was the introduction of the car ferry, which carries a good deal of the traffic, and which was installed after this original contract was entered into.

Mr. DUFF: The minister is wrong there; the car ferry has been in service for a great many years. It is true that under the Liberal government a specially equipped ferry was built and put in service between Cape Tormentine and Borden, but this contract for the service between Pictou and Charlottetown was entered into in solemn form between the owner of the steamship and His Majesty the King represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the government agreed to pay a certain amount of money for a certain specific service between Pictou and Charlottetown.

Let me say to the minister that this is a most important service. The service from Cape Tormentine to Borden does not take care of the traffic from Pictou to Charlottetown, which is the traffic from eastern Nova Scotia and Halifax, including the mail. So the minister cannot argue that he has reduced these subsidies because a new system of transportation has been adopted, or because of the car ferry service between Cape Tormentine and Borden.

The minister said something about the sanctity of contracts, and he went on to state that in these contracts there is a clause which states that if parliament does not vote the money an action cannot be brought against the government. That is quite so, but the minister did not go far enough. There is no clause in the contract which states that the contractor cannot sue the government if the minister deliberately reduces the amount from $40,000 to $20,000. That is a different matter altogether; that is a deliberate breach of contract on the part of the government. I can understand that if this high court of parliament were asked to vote $40,000; if someone moved to reduce the amount to $20,000 and parliament voted only $20,000, then the skirts of the minister and the government would be clear and the contractor could not sue the government for the difference. I repeat, however, that there is no clause in the contract which permits this government deliberately and maliciously to reduce the amount payable under this contract by $20,000 without first submitting the original amount to parliament.

The minister says that these subsidies have been reduced because conditions have changed and there are other methods of transportation. Again I want to say a good word for the county of Richmond, so let us take the service between Mulgrave, Arichat and Canso. This boat leaves Canso in the morning and crosses Chedabucto bay into Arichat, and where is Arichat? I am specific in my remarks because I want to try to show the minister where he is wrong and where his departmental officials perhaps have advised him wrongly in connection with the reduction of these subsidies. This service goes to Madame island in the strait of Canso; it does not go to the mainland. Arichat is the principal port of that island and Petit de Grat is one of the principal villages; this is in the constituency represented by the Minister of Finance. It is true there is a highway, but it is not a main highway. Arichat is at least fifteen or twenty miles from the main highway from Hawkesbury to Sydney, yet my hon. friend tries to tell this committee that the reason this amount is reduced is because there are new means of transportation. There is absolutely nothing in that argument. Does my hon. friend want a passenger or a bale of goods coming from Halifax to go to Mulgrave, then cross the strait of Canso to Point Tupper and then go by highway to Grande Anse, and from that point on the main highway to Arichat, or is he going to let the people of Isle Madame go direct from Mulgrave to Arichat by steamer?

This service is in the constituency of the Minister of Finance, so there is no particular reason why I should be anxious about it except that I am interested in business in that part of Nova Scotia. The people on Isle Madame are fishermen; they have to ship all their fish from Petite de Grat or Arichat to Mulgrave. Does the minister want to tell me that it is fair or reasonable to expect the people of Petite de Grat or Arichat to send their fresh fish by truck—not even by motor truck, because there are only one or two cars there, but by horse and cart—from Arichat or Petite de Grat to Grande Anse and then either by the railway to Point Tupper or the whole distance by road? Does the minister expect that to be done? It is no wonder the fisheries in that part of Nova Scotia are in such a deplorable condition when their only real means of transportation, which is the service between Canso, Arichat and Mulgrave, is cut down by the minister to the extent of $3,750 without—and I say it in all kindness—knowing the circumstances in connection with the matter.

This service touches at Canso, one of the most important fishing points on the coast of Nova Scotia, and the landing point for both commercial cables and the Western Union cable. Suppose this contractor refuses to accept the reduction. If a contract is a sacred thing, can the minister compel this contractor to accept this amount? Of course he cannot. I suppose the minister is working on the idea of this mass buying business—sweat shops, Loblaws, Eatons and Simpsons. Oh, it is a terrible thing for them to do mass buying, but the minister is trying to do mass buying by starving out cooks and stewardesses on the Westport; that is the kind of mass buying he is doing so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. He is cutting down service, and he is deliberately starving service.

The same applies to my own town of Guysborough. The only service they have—they are forty miles away from a railway—from the first of September to the middle of March, yes, even the first of May, is a little boat which runs from Guysborough to Queensport, and then on to Mulgrave. Well, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the exercise of his penny wise and pound foolish policy is compelling the fish buyers to say: "No, we cannot take more fish from you, because when winter comes the boat will not be running and we will have no means of transportation." They cannot go out and get mackerel or herring, because this parsimonious government, this Tory government, has reduced the subsidy to $9,500. No wonder the trade of the country is in its present terrible condition. The minister is responsible, more than anyone else, so far as his department is concerned, for the statistics with regard to trade. No wonder the trade of this country has fallen off by almost two-thirds of its volume when the minister of a great department, one who should do everything possible to increase the trade of the country, deliberately and for the sake of saving a few lousy and measly dollars reduces the subsidy.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to refer the minister to a report issued recently by the Canadian Association of Seamen in reference to subsidized Canadian shipping from Vancouver and Victoria to the Asiatic ports. The report states that on Canadian ships there are 2,574 oriental workers, and that on all foreign ships, particularly Danish, Norwegian, American, French and German, entering Vancouver and Victoria harbours the sailors are the nationals of those respective countries. I should like to ask the minister if he can state whether or not that statement is correct, namely that all other ships entering our western harbours employ their own nationals? Then, in view of the fact that Canada gives to the Canadian ships plying between our western ports and Asiatic ports approximately $900,000 per year, and owing to the fact that on board these ships there are 2,574 orientals working, which means the displacement of that number of Canadian sailors, etc., is there anything the government can do to see that Canadian seamen are employed on board Canadian ships receiving subsidies from Canada?

Mr. DUFF: Before the minister replies may I say this: How would it be for the hon. member to suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he should get a Chinese cook for the Westport between Mulgrave and Guysborough?

Mr. STEVENS: I gave a full answer only a few moments ago to the question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. REID: Perhaps this question does not come within the minister's department, but I should like to ask if any criticisms have been made to him regarding allegations in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company bringing engineers from the old country. I wonder if the minister has any information on that point? Strong representations in that regard have been made to almost every member from the province of British Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS: The statement is denied, absolutely. There may be cases where the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which operates a large fleet of ships on both oceans, might promote a man from a junior position on one of its Atlantic steamships to a position on the Pacific. The reverse often obtains, where a man is promoted from the Pacific to the Atlantic; for instance, I know some of the captains running on the larger ships on the Atlantic were formerly captains on the Pacific. It is quite true that a number of these men are Scotchmen, particularly the engineers. I am quite sure my hon. friend would not criticize the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for using Scotch engineers. They were not imported for that purpose. A Scotchman, or, like myself, an Englishman, might come to this country, become a good Canadian citizen and be entitled to all the privileges of Canadian citizenship. That is precisely what happened in these cases. They are not imported in the sense in which that word has been used.

Mr. MacINNIS: When I entered the chamber a short time ago the minister was answering a question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster in regard to the employment of Asiatics on some of the ships running out of Vancouver. We discussed this matter last year. Although I heard the minister's reply to the hon. member I am not satisfied. Here we have a situation where the government are giving assistance, and where they give such assistance they usually stipulate fair wages and proper working conditions. I do not know whether the minister is aware of this—I believe he is—that so far as the paying of low wages and maintaining poor working conditions are concerned possibly the shipping industries are greater offenders than any other industry in the Dominion of Canada. When the government subsidizes to the extent of over $2,000,000 per year I maintain that some stipulation should be made as to the wages paid to the men on those ships, and also the conditions under which they work. I am not particularly concerned as to whether they employ Asiatics, Canadians or white help of any nationality, but I am convinced that if fair wages and fair working conditions were stipulated by the government, before paying subsidies, there would be sufficient inducement to these companies to employ white help. I have had many complaints, as, no doubt, have the hon. member for New Westminster and the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself. Probably the minister receives more of these complaints than any other hon. member from British Columbia. I am convinced that something should be done to rectify this condition. Last year the minister promised that he would look into the matter. I do not know whether or not he has done so—I know he has had a busy year—but I am suggesting it is a matter which should be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. STEVENS: I believe I have already covered the question. As I said a minute ago, I have nothing to add. There was one further point raised, and I might say this: Apart from the complaints of those who desire to replace the Chinese in crews with British Columbia citizens, we have had no complaints from any source regarding the rate of wages or conditions of labour on these ships. I have made inquiries, and I cannot find anything of the kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have had any number of complaints as to the wages paid on ships plying from Vancouver. I have also had complaints in connection with ships on the Atlantic coast and on some of the local services. Only to-day I received a complaint in connection with the Clarke Steamship Company, which company, I am told, is one of the worst offenders so far as paying low wages is concerned. I have no doubt that white help is employed on these local services, particularly in the east, but before these subsidies are paid I think the government should take steps to find out what are the wages paid and the working conditions of the men.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was referring previously to the Pacific coast. We have received a complaint regarding the Clarke Steamship Company and I understand negotiations are being carried on between the representatives of the company and the seamen's association or union. This matter is under advisement in the department.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister tell me what boat is now running between Baddeck and Iona?

Mr. STEVENS: No boat is operating at present owing to the ice conditions, but the regular steamship is the Pearl Cann.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that the boat that has been in the service right along?

Mr. STEVENS: For some time, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any agreement between the owners and the government as to this reduction of fifty per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: They signed a contract for 1933.

Mr. RALSTON: In reply to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) the minister stated that he had advice as to the non-liability of the department in the case of a reduction in subsidies, due to the fact that there was a clause in the contracts making a subsidy subject to vote by parliament. Circumstances may be different now—I do not think they are—but I should like to direct the attention of the minister to what occurred in 1930. When the minister made that statement I recalled a discussion which took place in 1930 between the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then leader of the opposition, and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm). The then Minister of Trade and Commerce was taken severely to task for stating that the payments under the contract were always subject to a vote of parliament. I should like to quote from page 2862 of Hansard of May 29, 1930, as follows:

Mr. Bennett: You cannot do these things by order in council; there must be legislative authority to do it. The government get over it by saying: We do not bind ourselves for more than one year, but we fill in ten years or whatever sounds good to the person exploiting the subsidy.

Mr. Malcolm: My hon. friend knows parliamentary procedure better than I do. But how could we do it if we did not pass an order in council?

Mr. Bennett: By coming to this parliament.

Mr. Malcolm: We do.

Mr. Bennett: No, only a year after. Suppose something happens to the government?

Mr. Malcolm: Well, if my hon. friend does not vote the money next year—

Mr. Bennett: Then there is an action in the exchequer court for damages.

Mr. Malcolm: There is a clause in the contract to that effect. It has been going on for years.

The present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) then moved that the item be struck out. The present Prime Minister was very positive at that time that there would be grounds for an action for damages. I just mention this to the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not presume to put my opinion on legal matters against the opinion either of the Prime Minister or of my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: What about my opinion?

Mr. STEVENS: I have profound respect for my hon. friend as a sea lawyer.

Mr. RALSTON: I am expressing no opinion; I am simply calling my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the present Prime Minister expressed an opposite opinion to what I understood he said he had been advised.

Mr. STEVENS: I note what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. POWER: What is the total amount paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by way of mail subsidies and steamship subventions?

Mr. STEVENS: For the service between Canada and the United Kingdom on the Atlantic it is $500,000.

Mr. POWER: Is that all Canadian Pacific?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. For the service between Canada, China and Japan the vote is $600,000.

Mr. POWER: Is that all the Canadian Pacific Railway Company receives?

Mr. STEVENS: No, there are some local services. For the service between Victoria and west coast of Vancouver island they receive $10,000, and for the service between Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway, they receive $12,000.

Mr. POWER: A little over a million dollars?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. These subsidies provide for the carrying of all mails which were previously paid for by the ton.

Mr. POWER: Is this paid on a trip basis or is it just a lump sum?

Mr. STEVENS: It is on an annual basis with a guarantee of regular sailings. My hon. friend knows the general run of their services. Previously we paid for the carriage of the mails but now we do not; it is within the ambit of this contract.

Mr. POWER: Is the Canada, China and Japan service on a yearly basis?

Mr. STEVENS: A yearly basis with a guarantee of certain sailings.

Mr. POWER: Am I to understand that the Canadian Pacific would put on a new boat on this service such as the Empress of Japan without having some guarantee from the government that they were to receive a subsidy over a term of years? Is there not something in the contract or in the arrangement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the government under which if the money is voted by parliament it will continue to be paid over a period of years?

Mr. STEVENS: There is nothing; it is voted from year to year.

Mr. POWER: Is there any arrangement with the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing that is not disclosed in the estimates.

Mr. POWER: There is no long term contract with the Canadian Pacific in connection with the China and Japan service?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is made from year to year.

Mr. POWER: No undertaking was entered into either by this or by the former government that this subsidy would continue over a period of years?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot speak for the former government, but my officials advise me that there was no such undertaking. As far as this government is concerned I can speak, and I say, no.

Mr. POWER: Is there any clause in this contract to provide that in consideration of the subsidy of $600,000, fair, reasonable and equitable wages will be paid?

Mr. STEVENS: Such a clause has never been included in any subvention since they were first given.

Mr. POWER: Since the minister has become the apostle of fairly high wages in this country, does he not think that he in his administrative capacity and his department should endeavour to see that something better than slave wages are paid on vessels operating under subventions paid by this government?

Mr. STEVENS: First, I thank my hon. friend for the apostolic suggestion. Second, I shall take his suggestion into earnest consideration.

Mr. POWER: Thank you.

Mr. STEVENS: I mean it.

Mr. POWER: If the minister means it, I thank him twice.

Mr. MacINNIS: What company is paid a subsidy for the Vancouver-British West Indies service?

Mr. STEVENS: I gave that information a short time ago; it is the Canadian Transport Company.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do not the boats of this company go from the West Indies to British ports where they discharge most of their cargoes?

Mr. STEVENS: This is what we call an outward contract. Such a contract is not uncommon to Canada. Certain sailings are guaranteed by the steamship companies, in this case one a month, but there is no obligation for a corresponding return service. The main reason for this subsidy is to provide the West Indies with fodder, such as oats and hay, as well as with fish and other important products such as lumber. Those are probably the four main products involved, and it was largely to facilitate their movement that this service was inaugurated.

Mr. NEILL: Did I understand the minister to say that in the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the system had been abandoned of paying them anything for the carriage of mail, and that it was all included in the subsidy for the service?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Particularly as regards the service on the west coast of Vancouver island?

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to the Atlantic and trans-Pacific service when I made that statement.

Mr. NEILL: And it does not refer to Vancouver island?

Mr. STEVENS: They carry the mail free of charge also.

Mr. NEILL: Some months ago I had occasion to ask for a little extension of the postal service on the west coast of Vancouver island, and the postal people—not the Canadian Pacific Railway—replied that it would be a matter of expense, because they would have to be paid fifteen cents a mile.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend did not do me the courtesy of bringing it to my attention and I cannot answer for the Post Office Department.

Item agreed to.

Trade and Commerce—salaries, $548,766; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the ordinary civil government vote.

Mr. DUFF: This vote I understand is subject to the ten per cent reduction?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand that we pass the vote subject to the same consideration as the others affecting salaries?

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely.

Mr. DUFF: Can the minister tell us whether the government has considered paying the full amount instead of ninety per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: It is still under consideration. It will be decided very shortly and the house advised.

Mr. MacLEAN: Is there anything in the estimates for cable service, transatlantic or otherwise?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

London, salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $1,800 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chap. 15, R.S.C., $121,160.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the committee is prepared to take up the items of External Affairs I will leave one item open in order that the fullest discussion may take place with respect to all items, so that we may put them through according to the usual custom. The item that I would leave would probably be 198, which is the Tokyo vote, about which the hon. member for Bow River desired to make some observations, and I believe the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay also. If the committee prefers, any one of the succeeding items can be left, but I thought that it might be best to leave the Tokyo item, it being understood that the whole appropriation may be discussed on that one item.

Mr. POWER: There would be no objection to discussing the League of Nations vote?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that you leave 200.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is an item of $600,000 for the High Commissioner in London for advertising and publicity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not in this item. It has to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce, miscellaneous, and refers to advertising in the United Kingdom and on the continent of Europe. It is not chargeable against the high commissioner's office but is under his direction. I think I had better leave item 198 open, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Bow River asked some questions yesterday, but in addition to that I shall leave item 200 open. I shall call item 199.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the establishment of a trust fund of $25,000, as an expression of the friendly interest of Canada in the celebration in 1930 of the 1,000th anniversary of the establishment of the Icelandic parliament, $25,000.

Mr. POWER: It seems that we voted this $25,000 two years ago and it has never been paid.

Mr. BENNETT: By arrangement with the government of Iceland the amount was not paid, but interest on it was paid pending the completion of the trust. That having now been completed to our satisfaction, the payment is to be made. This represents an amount agreed upon by both parties in connection with the celebration of the one-thousandth anniversary of the Icelandic parliament.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contribution to the expenses of the International Commission for Air Navigation for 1934, $2,150.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is for air navigation. Can the Prime Minister give us some information ?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows that before this government came into power there was organized an international air commission dealing with problems common to all nations, and contributions have been made from time to time for the purpose of enabling the commission to function. Our contribution is $2,150. I am speaking from memory, but I think that is a correct statement of the situation.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know if I am right in asking this question, but I shall submit it in connection with this item. Has anything been decided as to international or transatlantic air navigation, or how far has the matter proceeded?

Mr. BENNETT: For obvious reasons I am not in a position to make known the extent to which the discussions have gone, but representatives from Great Britain and of United States interests have conferred with representatives of Canadian interests. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that the question is the subject matter of conversations and discussions, but no conclusions have yet been reached.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the Wheat Advisory Committee for 1934, Canada's assessment, $1,955.

Mr. YOUNG: Earlier in the week the Prime Minister told us that by the end of the week he would probably be in a position to give us a detailed statement as to the true situation in regard to the wheat agreement. Can he do so to-night?

Mr. BENNETT: Not the true situation, but to make a more extended statement. I intended, when the orders of the day were called this afternoon, to have said that I would not be in possession of the information until after Monday. I had a telephone message to-day stating that the gentleman who went from my office to the west will be back on Monday. I shall not be here on that day, but on the first day after my return I shall make a statement.

This item refers to our contribution to the maintenance of the advisory board in London which is presided over, as is known, by a Canadian, Mr. Cairns, who used to live in western Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: When the Prime Minister gives the statement of which he speaks, will there be an opportunity for the house to debate the matter, or would it be better to allow this item to stand so that we may debate it later?

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason that an opportunity should not be afforded, while the estimates are under discussion, for any debate that may be desired, and if it is felt that this item will afford a suitable opportunity for that purpose, it may stand.

Item stands.

Canada's portion of expenditure of the Imperial economic committee, the Imperial shipping committee, and the executive council of the Imperial Agricultural Bureaux for 1934, $18,690.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the committee has some knowledge of the circumstances out of which this arises. When the representatives of the dominions met in London with the representatives of the British government and decided to discontinue the operations of the marketing board, there were certain obligations which the dominions undertook to discharge, one of them being in connection with the Imperial Economic committee, which renders valuable service to the dominion; another with respect to the Imperial Shipping committee, which renders invaluable service to us in connection with insurance rates and matters of the kind of which perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite are as well aware as I am; and another dealing with the agricultural bureaux. I cannot recall the entire amount of the expenditures for 1934, but our contribution was $18,690.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are all the dominions contributing a like amount?

Mr. BENNETT: They fix the amounts of their contributions by mutual arrangement. My memory at the moment is this: ours is of course, because of our population, the largest contribution other than that of Great Britain. The Free State, I think, is making some contribution but it is the smallest of all. I do not think there is anything about the matter that calls for a more elaborate statement than what I have indicated as to how it came into being, but if the committee feels it desires further information I shall be glad to see that it is furnished.

Mr. POWER: I suppose we may assume that this will be a more or less continuing item to which we are committed for years to come?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: There is no commitment for any length of time. But the service rendered by the Imperial Shipping committee which is presided over by Sir Halford MacKinder and which has had largely to do with insurance rates is of great importance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is very important.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not say that there is any commitment that extends into years; it is just from year to year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the nature of the activities of the agricultural bureaux?

Mr. BENNETT: Just as its name indicates, it is for the purpose of supplying information that will—shall I put it in this way—make for an increase in the sale of our commodities, for instance, our wheat as one commodity, its quality and matters of that kind. The bureaux deal with that and collect statistics. I suppose it is known to the committee that for the last twenty-five or thirty years we have been making contributions to what is called the International Institute of Agriculture that meets at Rome. The other is confined to the empire alone, doing somewhat the same service, only perhaps in a little more intensive manner than that given by the institute at Rome.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was wondering whether this is supplementary. We are not discontinuing the services of the institute at Rome which gives a world service. Is this confined to the empire?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: How many of these bureaux are there? I see it is plural.

Mr. BENNETT: I speak solely from memory now; it will be corrected if I am in error. The question of these bureaux is one that various parliaments and legislatures have had to deal with, as the hon. gentleman knows. For instance there was one agricultural bureau, so-called, that dealt with standards of wool at Leeds; I think the hon. gentleman knows something of that. Another dealt with dairy products. These various bureaux are supposed—I put it so in deference to the hon. gentleman—to collect such information as is of value to the departments of agriculture in various parts of the empire. I think that is the shortest way I can put it.

Item agreed to.

Advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom and Europe to be administered by the High Commissioner, $200,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the hon. member for West Edmonton like to have this item stand?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I would prefer to have it stand to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in view of the sparse attendance and the desire indicated by several hon. members to speak about it, the matter may stand. It is one about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is more completely informed than I. But I should like to say that during the discussions I had with the high commissioner in London with respect to our advertising he pointed out to me the extent to which other parts of the empire are advertising in London. For instance on the hoardings Australian products are largely advertised. I dare say hon. gentlemen will recall seeing the advertisements of Australian and New Zealand products. It was thought that we have not sufficiently availed ourselves of the opportunities available to make known the merits of Canadian products. The same applies to Europe, where the amount expended is much less. After careful investigation we believe that the best interests of all would be served by placing the high commissioner in charge of the whole expenditure, as contemplated by the High Commissioner's Act. This amount represents a smaller sum than is expended by many of the dominions in London alone, but we felt that under existing financial conditions it is as large as we could ask for at the present time. The item will stand, and fuller explanation will be given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has the particulars.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am glad the Prime Minister allows the item to stand. I am not finding fault with the amount; indeed it is an expenditure I have advocated for a number of years and pressed on the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the late government. But I question the advisability of having it spent under the supervision of the high commissioner, because I have some knowledge of the efficient manner in which the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce have been carrying on this work. The sole difficulty was that money was not furnished them to do it properly.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I should say to the hon. gentleman that the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and other departments in Canada cooperate with the gentleman in charge of publicity, who by the way was appointed by the late administration in London for the purpose of making effective our advertising in England and on the continent. The services of those interested in publicity for the Department of Trade and Commerce will of course be utilized to the fullest extent. I satisfied myself from personal investigation that the services that would be thus rendered to the country, which would include the cost of advertising in English journals and of advertising promoted from this end in that country and on the continent, would be best directed by the director of publicity who is in the high commissioner's office. I think his name is Mr. Gerhaty, and with him is associated a young man named Spence. Mr. Gerhaty, went from here, I think, in 1928 or 1929. I cannot say exactly how long Mr. Spence has been with the department, but they are both very efficient young men and have had experience that enables them by reason of their relations to British papers to render a very considerable service to this country in the way of what I call reading matter advertising, for which no payment is made.

Item stands.

Grant in aid of the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association, $9,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice there has been a cut here. Is that in deference to the objections raised by the hon. member for Southeast Grey?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is uniform, meaning by that not the uniform they wear but the uniform cut.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Dominion Council of the Girl Guides, $4,860.

Mr. BENNETT: That is reduced ten per cent also.

Item agreed to.

Expenses in connection with the negotiation of treaties, $9,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is that for your treaties?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I thought probably from the standpoint of the opposition they would be considered ten per cent less efficient. But in reality it is thought that the sum of $9,000 will in all probability be sufficient to meet any expense that may be incurred in that direction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Apparently the Prime Minister does not intend to negotiate many treaties this year. I would rather see this item increased, if he would proceed to negotiate the treaties.

Mr. BENNETT: It is wonderful what you can do in the way of economy when you try. Nine thousand dollars will go a long way.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Montreal Association for the Blind, $4,050.
Grant to l'Institut Nazareth de Montreal to assist in work with the blind, $4,050.

Mr. BENNETT: These are items for the blind that have appeared from year to year, less ten per cent. I am sorry we had to make the ten per cent cut.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think this is one reduction that the Prime Minister might have considered a little more seriously. I have always felt that our grants to the blind are not nearly sufficient.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Great difficulty is experienced in carrying on this work in the various provinces in which institutions for the blind are situated. I feel that the grants have been reduced almost to the breaking point as far as they are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite correct. Representatives of the societies for the blind waited on us and explained their position. It is really a very difficult one. A delegation met me also at Winnipeg; their position is most difficult. However, it will be observed that these grants are payable to the two associations which carry on, shall I say, general operations in Montreal. In view of the representations made by all these bodies, the government felt impelled at the moment to make the ten per cent of general application. We so advised them at the time. I am afraid that not to apply it in one case, where I will admit there is perhaps a stronger claim than in others, is only to invite difficulty and continuous correspondence in which it would be urged that we did not reduce this and did reduce that. Personally I would prefer to see it $10,000 rather than the amount it is.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I always felt that it would be much better to forego altogether the two preceding votes, to the Royal Society of Canada and the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, and give the money to the blind. However, this is not new as far as I am concerned; I merely reiterate what I said in the past when we were responsible.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to make this observation without being misunderstood: Great as are the claims of the blind and the suffering, merely because we are passing through an abnormal condition of depression we must not overlook entirely the cultural side of the life of the country. Those two items to which the hon. gentleman refers mean the continuance or the discontinuance of the operations of the royal society and the academy of arts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It gives them a much better chance to be supported by private subscription.

Mr. BENNETT: They are largely supported in that way, but this means the difference between their being able to carry on and ceasing to function. As the hon. gentleman knows, the royal society came into being in the days of the late Marquis of Lorne, and I think it has discharged a rather fine service to this dominion. Numbered among its presidents are most distinguished scholars, scientists and men of letters, and it has become well and favourably known in every part of the world. One recalls that the royal society in Great Britain occupies a position of outstanding importance and has been maintained with great difficulty since the days of Newton. This society of ours is now half a century old, and its maintenance, I think, is important from the point of view of the cultural life of the dominion. It brings together scholars, thinkers, mathematicians and scientists, and when one looks through the volume of their papers one is impressed with the extent of their knowledge, the wide scope of their learning and the real contribution they are making to the national life.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to ask if some suggestions have been received to the effect that old age pensions should be paid to blind people before they reach the present minimum age. If such suggestions were adopted by the provinces would the federal government be willing to contribute its share of the cost?

Mr. BENNETT: The question of the payment of pensions to the blind has engaged the attention of this house for many years. Prior to the adoption of the Old Age Pensions Act efforts were made, as every hon. member knows who has served in this house for any length of time, to establish the claim of those who were sightless upon the state for assistance. The hon. gentleman will recall the representations made in this house every year from 1926 to 1933 on behalf of the sightless in Canada. This item does not afford an opportunity to express anything more than I have already said as to the attitude of the government towards the matter. Some of the provinces have enacted legislation under which they have agreed to undertake their portion of the expenditure incident to the placing of the blind in a position where pensions would be payable to them on the basis of the old age pension provision but beginning at the age of forty. No uniform action as yet has been taken, but I feel that if we make any speedy recovery the time is not far distant when some provision of that sort will be made on behalf of the sightless.

Mr. STANLEY: I believe the Canadian National Institute for the Blind carries on some small industry of its own for the manufacture of various commodities. I have specifically in mind the manufacture of rubber mats, and things of the kind. If the different departments of the government could be urged to give special consideration to this organization in the purchase of such supplies it would be a practical way of assisting the individual blind people through their organization.

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that an order in council was passed extending some relief to the blind in connection with some of the provisions of our revenue act. Exactly what the terms of the order in council were I do not recall at the moment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There was some provision in regard to blind soldiers.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we passed something with respect to the sales tax, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance suggests. I believe I express the view of every member of this committee when I say that anything that reasonably can be done in an administrative sense on behalf of the blind would be done gladly by any government regardless of its political complexion. But I may just point out that a difficulty arose in one case; this created a form of competition which proved destructive to those with whom it came in contact, and that expresses the other side of the question.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for grants to be made to the provinces of—
Nova Scotia, $875,000.
New Brunswick, $600,000.
Prince Edward Island, $125,000, pending consideration of provincial subsidies.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if any arrangement was agreed upon by the provincial premiers who met here some time ago with regard to increasing the subsidies. This is a provisional subsidy made under the terms of the Duncan report, and this question has been outstanding for some time. I may say that it is a live topic in the maritimes, and especially in Prince Edward Island. We have no way of raising revenue except by direct taxation. We have no mines on which we can collect royalties; we have no timber permits as they have in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Some of our friends think we are simply living on provincial subsidies, but that is not correct. Our taxes are increasing every year, as they are in the other provinces, and our people are waiting and watching, hoping that some day the subsidy question will be gone into and a larger amount agreed upon. I do not wish to refer to any preelection promises; I know the Prime Minister did not make them personally, but I have before me a pamphlet which was published in the newspapers, in which it is stated that if this government came into power the subsidy would be increased by $700,000 anually. This is the paragraph:

> Bennett will fully implement the Duncan award, thereby enriching our province by some $700,000 annually.

I do not hold the Prime Minister responsible for that promise, but someone made it and a certain number of our electors believed it. However, I do hope the time is not far distant when this question, which is engaging the attention of the people of the maritimes, will be thoroughly gone into and satisfactorily settled.

Mr. BENNETT: At all events it does not appear that a sufficient number of people believed that promise to prevent my hon. friend from being elected. I have not heard that figure before. During the recent visit to Ottawa of the premiers of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island they suggested that a commission be appointed for the purpose of dealing with what were alleged to be the unfulfilled recommendations of the Duncan report, and the government concluded that the proper course to follow was to hear representatives of each of the provinces before a committee of the whole cabinet. We have advised the premiers of the three several provinces that we will hear the representations of each before the committee of the whole cabinet as to the points they desire to make concerning those recommendations in the Duncan report to which effect has not been given. That is the position, including the very matter to which attention has just now been directed. The hon. member is quite right in saying that this matter is of long standing. My memory is that we were given the proud privilege of serving this country some time in August, 1930, and it certainly had been a live question for some years prior to that time. We hope that through this opportunity of making representations to a committee of the cabinet the premiers of the provinces, or their counsel, or anyone acting on their behalf, will be in a position to make known to the cabinet the exact points that in their judgment still remain to be dealt with in order that the Duncan report may be fully implemented. When that is done the government will take such action as may be possible, having regard to the representations that are made.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am pleased that the Prime Minister has given a ray of hope to the people of the maritimes. Without anticipating any representations which might be made by the premiers of the provinces or their counsel, may I say this is one recommendation of the Duncan commission which has not yet been implemented, namely the matter of subsidies or increased allowances to the provinces. It has been carried for some time in the estimates pending final adjustment. So far since the opening of the session we have heard considerable about the claims and the rights of the western people to increased grants and subsidies from the Dominion government. Spokesmen from the maritimes have been very modest, due to the fact that they have faith in the justice of their claims and that they will soon be adjusted. The matter of increased grants and subsidies is one of vital importance to the martime provinces. I do not intend this evening to go into details, but simply to mention the fact that the maritime provinces have not received any material financial assistance through this depression, in comparison with what has been granted other parts of the country.

Some of the provinces, and this particularly applies to New Brunswick, are figuring on an increased subsidy for the next year in order to balance the budget, and it is to be hoped that in some form or another this matter will soon be adjusted and that before the close of the provincial fiscal year, in November, a substantial increase will be made in lieu of what should have been granted some years ago. These would be increased grants to make up for what these provinces have lost and have given up through joining confederation. The matter certainly will come up at some stage during the session, at which time an opportunity will be given to all maritime representatives to speak. So far, however, I am pleased to note that the matter has advanced one step and that arrangements have been made with the premiers of the provinces to have the claims laid in concrete form before the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This may not be the proper place to ask the question I have in mind, but I am sure the Prime Minister will not object to answering. Is there anything in the rumour that there is a commission appointed to review the settlement with Saskatchewan?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will recall that in the agreement made by the late government with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan provision was made under which a commission was to come into being for the purpose of determining two questions. One question was whether or not Saskatchewan or Alberta were entitled to compensation, and if so in what amount, with respect to lands alienated between the date of the extinction of the Hudson bay title in 1870 and the creation of the new province in 1905. That issue, in the case of Saskatchewan, was referred to the privy council, by express provision in the agreement, which, if my memory serves me correctly, the hon. member himself signed. On reference to the Supreme Court of Canada it was decided that there was no merit in the claim thus made. On appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada was confirmed. It therefore left open one question, and one only, that question being, as provided by the agreement: what, if any, compensation the province was entitled to receive arising out of the administration and control of the resources from 1905 until 1930, when the new agreement was made. It is further provided by the agreement that for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion the commissioners could consider financial matters for the purpose of placing the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta on an equality with the other provinces of confederation.

In the case of Alberta, the statute named the commissioners. It does provide, however, that they could be changed, and the government of Alberta have indicated that they desire to modify the provisions contained in the agreement in that regard. In the case of Saskatchewan the Hon. Mr. Justice Dysart has been named, together with the Hon. Mr. Justice Bigelow of Saskatchewan, and Mr. George McDonald, chartered accountant of Montreal. They have been sitting here for some days. Some years ago a commission was set up to deal with the province of Manitoba, that commission being presided over by the Hon. Mr. Justice Turgeon, assisted by the Hon. Thomas Crerar and Mr. Charles M. Bowman of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada. As a result of their deliberations the sum of $4,000,000 was awarded to the province of Manitoba for the purpose of placing that province on an equality with other provinces of the confederation, the judgment proceeding upon the theory that Manitoba should be placed upon an equality with Alberta and Saskatchewan. The matter now being heard by the commissioners deals only with the question of the administration of the resources. To quote the words of the agreement, it is to deal with "the administration and control of the resources" by the dominion between 1905 and 1930, when, by the agreement entered into, the province became entitled to its resources, together with a continuance of the subsidy which had been accepted in 1905 in lieu of such resources.

The problem now engaging the attention of the commissioners deals solely with these matters, and solely with questions which were provided for in the agreement, which, if my memory serves me correctly, the hon. member as Minister of the Interior signed on behalf of the dominion, together with the then Minister of Justice. That is the only commission that has been set up, and the fact that three or four years have elapsed before its being set up is accounted for by some little delay in submitting the question to the supreme court. The judgment of the privy council in answer to the two questions submitted was delivered only last fall, so the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) informs me.

Mr. VENIOT: I think the house adopted the Duncan report in 1928.

Mr. RHODES: The first vote was in 1927-28.

Mr. VENIOT: The year ended March 31, 1928. The Duncan report recommended that these be considered as interim payments to the three provinces. I understand that steps were taken by the Finance department to bring about an accounting between the provinces and the dominion from confederation down in order to see how they stood financially. I wonder if any further progress has been made in this respect preparatory to the meeting which is to be held with the premiers of the maritime provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: That is one of the matters which it is proposed they shall submit to the committee of the cabinet. Much work has been done by the officials from time to time in collecting information as to the extent to which the financial assistance granted to the maritime provinces places them on an equality with the other provinces. I do not say that it has been done in any great detail but additions to the information have been made from time to time. I have in mind one particular official who has been adding to his store of information. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud), who has brought this matter to our attention, suggests that we might discuss it, but in view of the representations to be made by the three provinces to the committee of the cabinet, possibly it might not serve a useful purpose for us to enter into a discussion of the matter until after the presentation has been made by the provinces. Another ground for consideration claimed by the maritime provinces is that Canada having extinguished the title of the Hudson's Bay Company to the northwest territories and the northeast territories, and having secured the money by a loan on credit of the whole Dominion of Canada, of which they paid their share, the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba were enlarged out of that territory, but the maritime provinces, geographically located as they are, were not able to secure any part of it. They claim that they should be placed on terms of equality with the agreement made between Manitoba and the federal government in 1929 and between Alberta and Saskatchewan and the federal government in 1930. They claim that they should receive some compensation in lieu of their not having received any portion of the territory acquired by the dominion on the credit of the whole country.

Mr. VENIOT: That is one contention.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not a new claim.

Mr. VENIOT: That was one of the claims put up in 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

External Affairs—salaries, $83,952; contingencies, $61,800.

Mr. BENNETT: The only change in this item is a slight decrease.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has there been some recent arrangement as to holding up these items of civil government? I understood the arrangement was that they were not to be gone on with.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not present in the house when that arrangement was made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I merely asked if some other arrangement had been made, because I understood that the civil government items were not to be voted until after the government had decided what they were going to do about salaries.

Mr. RHODES: When the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) called his item it was passed without any discussion, but when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) called a similar item the question was put to him as to whether the same statement already made with respect to other items outside of civil government would apply to that particular item, and his answer was in the affirmative. That is the only understanding of which I know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg my hon. friend's pardon. A previous item was dropped and the understanding was that civil government items would not be voted until such time as the government decided what action they were going to take with respect to this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any question about the matter we will let the item stand.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought perhaps some arrangement had been made with our leader. If none has been made, I suggest that the item stand.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is any question about it, we will let the item stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Monday, March 5, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My attention has been drawn to an oversight in the report, and in the motion adopting the report, regarding the printing from day to day of the evidence of the special committee appointed to inquire into price spreads and mass buying. I give notice to-day that to-morrow I shall move for the amendment of this motion, authorizing the printing from day to day. The present motion refers only to the power to have the proceedings printed, and this will meet the complaint, which had not been brought to my attention before, that copies in French and in English are not promptly distributed. The motion I shall move to-morrow will take care of this situation and I give notice of the motion now.

PETITIONS

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to lay on the table of the House petitions forwarded by the municipal councils of St. Etienne de Beaumont, St. Michael de Bellechasse and St. Damien de Buckland, in the county of Bellechasse, requesting the Government to abstain from levying a tax on leaf tobacco.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT RESPECTING TRACKS AND PREMISES AT SAINT JOHN

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to ratify and confirm the agreement respecting the joint use by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of certain tracks and premises of His Majesty at Saint John, N.B.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MANION: The object of this bill is to ratify and confirm an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the joint use of certain tracks and premises belonging to His Majesty at Saint John, New Brunswick, and thus validating the agreement for a full period of 99 years from the first day of January, 1927, unless sooner terminated in accordance with the provisions of the agreement. Neither this bill nor either of the other two that follow has anything to do with last year's legislation; they are bills which date from an earlier period, this one from 1927 and the other two from 1912 and 1915. I mention this in order to clear the air, because I have been asked a number of times whether this had to do with last year's legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY AND THE CAMPBELLFORD, LAKE ONTARIO AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to ratify and confirm an agreement between the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.

He said: With respect to this bill, perhaps I might say a word that I omitted in regard to the preceding one, namely, that these ratifications are made imperative by the Railway Act, which calls for any joint agreement for a stated period beyond 21 years being ratified by this parliament. It dates back to 1912.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC TRACKS AND PREMISES AT QUEBEC

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, to ratify and confirm an agreement respecting the joint use by His Majesty and the commissioners of the Transcontinental railway of certain tracks and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Quebec.

Mr. POWER: Is this a continuation of the agreement of 1912, or are there any changes?

Mr. MANION: This is an agreement of 1915, and so far as I know there are no changes in its terms. This merely extends the time.

Mr. POWER: Is it for 99 years?

Mr. MANION: Yes. The last bill was for 999 years and that should be long enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The C.C.F. will be in power.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, respecting fruit.

He said: This bill is a redraft of the 1901 Fruit Act, together with amendments. In addition there are some changes, of which perhaps three of the most important are: that brokers should be bonded; a change in the grading of fruit, making it impossible to offer fruit for sale not fit for consumption; and, third, the addition of honey in grading in this bill. The 1901 Fruit Act was asked for by producers in the trade, and each regulation and amendment has been submitted to the producers from that time until this. This bill has been before practically all the fruit conventions in Canada during the past year and has been endorsed by them, and any regulations based on it will also be submitted to the trade.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

JORDAN MEMORIAL SANATORIUM

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Are there any persons at present at Jordan memorial sanatorium, The Glades, New Brunswick, who are receiving pensions from the Dominion government as a result of military service?

2. If so, what are the names and amount of pension received by each?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. Yes.

2. H. K. Bartsch, $100 per month; M. T. Blacklock, $110.50 per month; L. Wheaton, $16 per month; Mrs. M. C. Savoie, $60 per month; all members of the staff of the institution.

In addition to the above mentioned there is a non-pensioner, a recipient of war veterans' allowance, who is a patient at the institution, on whose behalf $20 per month is being paid by the War Veterans' allowance committee, $15 of which is applied to his maintenance and $5 is paid him for comforts.

*ORDER OF PRECEDENCE

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Has the government cabled to London in connection with the matter of precedences at the opening of the present session of parliament?

2. If so, what is the text of this cablegram and the text of the answer received?

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to answer this question orally.

As I have already stated in this house, His Majesty the King, in the exercise of his prerogative right to confer rank or place upon subjects of His Majesty resident in Canada, is advised by His Majesty's government in Canada. This government has not given any advice to nor sought any advice from London in respect to any change in the table of precedence bearing date December 3, 1923, which was established on the advice of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister.

The place of precedence at state functions which was given by courtesy to the Apostolic Delegate of the Holy See by the government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1899, as modified by a decision of the government of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King in 1927, has not been changed by this government.

A question arose before the opening of this session of parliament as to whether a cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church was entitled as of right to precedence over the Apostolic Delegate at state functions in Canada. At the request of His Eminence the Cardinal-Archbishop of Quebec the decision of this question was held in abeyance.

When the views of the Roman Catholic Church are definitely ascertained, this matter will, in due time, receive further consideration.

*BANK OF CANADA BANK NOTES

Mr. FOURNIER:

Will the bank notes of the future Bank of Canada be bilingual?

Mr. RHODES: This information is not and will not be available unless and until the Bank of Canada is established.

Mr. SPENCER:

Will the bank notes of the future Bank of Canada have the king's head printed thereon?

Mr. RHODES: The answer to this question is the same as the one I just gave with respect to the previous question concerning bank notes of the proposed Bank of Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF ACT STATISTICAL REPORTS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Are monthly statistical reports on the operations under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1933, being prepared?

2. If so, over what period have such reports been prepared?

3. If such monthly reports have been prepared have they been published for the information of the members and the general public?

4. If not, will the government publish such reports monthly in future?

Mr. GORDON:

The report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief setting out the federal assistance rendered to provinces and municipalities in their relief efforts, is now in the course of preparation and will be laid as hitherto on the table of the house in conformity with the provisions of the statute as soon as possible after the end of the fiscal year.

[Mr. Cahan.]

HORSE CLUB POLICY

Mr. DONNELLY:

1. Has the Dominion government changed, improved, or extended, during the last twelve months, what has been generally known as its "Horse Club Policy," and, if so, what are the changes?

2. Have any stallions been purchased or aptions taken under the said scheme, and, if so, give the following information in each (individual) case: (a) age; (b) price; (c) breed; (d) from whom bought?

3. What charge does the government intend to make for the services of these stallions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Yes. Date for receiving applications changed from June first to April first. Minimum service fee lowered from $12 to $10 and maximum from $25 to $20. Protest fee from $100 to $50. Number of inspectors for reinspection reduced from three to two.

2. No.

3. The charge for services of stallions under the club policy must not exceed $20 and must not be less than $10.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF WORK—GORDON-FRANCOEUR AGREEMENT

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. At what date was the Gordon-Francoeur agreement signed, relative to unemployment relief in the province of Quebec?

2. What were the works recommended for the county of Megantic, according to the list prepared by the Department of Public Works, or Department of Highways of Quebec?

3. At what date were the said works recommended, and at what dates were they accepted by the federal authorities?

4. Did the department send an inspector to the district before the acceptance of the program submitted by Quebec for the county of Megantic?

5. If so, for what reason?

6. At whose request?

Mr. GORDON:

1. The agreement entered into by the dominion and the province of Quebec under the provisions of The Relief Act, 1933, was signed on behalf of the dominion by the Hon. W. A. Gordon, and on behalf of the province of Quebec by the Hon. J. N. Francoeur, on the 26th of July, 1933.

2 and 3. See statement attached.

4, 5 and 6. In accordance with the policy of the department, inspectors, where practicable, visited the districts wherein it was proposed to carry out works for the relief of unemployment with a view to determining the unemployment situation and the necessity and practicability of the said works as relief measures.

The following schedules of works proposed to be carried out for the relief of unemployment in the county of Megantic were submitted by the province of Quebec in accordance with the terms of the agreement entered into on July 26, 1933, between the dominion and the province respecting unemployment relief:

Schedule No. 3.—Highway No. 49—Black Lake and township of South Ireland, county of Megantic. Relocation, widening, grading and other works preliminary to the construction of a pavement. By day labour. To remedy unemployment in Thetford Mines and Black Lake: Total estimated cost, $10,000; man-days work provided by project, 5,000; basis of contribution 50 cents per man-day, dominion proportion, $2,500; number of unemployed, 140.

The above schedule was received on August 9, and approved by the dominion on August 16, 1933.

DOMINION COMPANIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Secretary of State whether any progress has been made in regard to the proposed revision of the Companies Act in accordance with the agreements reached or reported to have been reached at the interprovincial conference?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): The hon. member gave me notice of this question and I presume it is asked in view of certain telegrams which have appeared in the press purporting to emanate from the Department of the Attorney General of Quebec. At the meeting of the interprovincial conference in January last, a report was made of the understanding reached at a meeting of the representatives of the attorneys general of the several provinces or their deputies to consider a draft Companies Act which had been prepared at the office of the Secretary of State and submitted to them for their consideration. That reports reads as follows:

The law officers of the several provinces or their deputies met Thursday, January 18th, to consider a draft Companies Act which had been submitted to them by the Secretary of State.

Representatives of several of the provinces suggested that they would probably retain the form of act which has already been adopted by their respective legislatures, such as incorporation by letters patent, or by memorandum of association or by grant from the crown; but that this would not preclude the acceptance by all the provinces of the material provisions of such a bill as may be agreed upon.

After a general discussion of the scope of the draft bill then presented, the unanimous opinion was expressed by the provincial representatives that the law officers of the several provinces should, on or before March 1 next, send to the Secretary of State suggestions of such amendments or changes in the draft bill as they might deem expedient, and that, thereafter, the Secretary of State should convene at Ottawa such law officers or their representatives as could conveniently attend, for a further discussion of proposed amendments or changes in the draft bill; and that, in the meantime, the draft bill should not be widely distributed nor introduced to the parliament of Canada for public discussion.

That report was unanimously adopted at the conference. A few days later the department of the Secretary of State sent a copy of that report, together with additional copies of the draft bill, to the attorneys general of the several provinces, with a suggestion that on or before March 1 next they should send to the Secretary of State suggestions of such amendments or changes in the draft bill as might be deemed expedient. No suggestions have been received from the department of the attorney general of either of the provinces, and no reply has been received to that letter which was so sent.

This morning there appeared in the public press despatches from Quebec, from one of which appearing in the Gazette this morning. I read as follows:

Chas. Lanctot, K.C., deputy attorney-general, returned here to-day from a conference at Toronto with the Hon. W. H. Price, attorney-general, at which conference the draft of the federal legislation was studied, and the decision come to that it did not meet the wishes of the provinces, nor carry out the conception of the provincial authorities at the interprovincial conference as to what uniform Companies Act Ottawa had in mind.

It will be recalled that at the 1933 interprovincial conference there was agreement that the time had come to have uniformity in legislation as regards companies, it having been admitted that the disparity as between legislation of the provinces, and of Ottawa, has been of a nature to constitute "bidding" for a companies incorporation. The federal authorities in 1933 agreed to draft a uniform act which would apply to all, and this draft was submitted at the interprovincial conference held last January.

Premier Taschereau, speaking in the legislative assembly, following this recent conference, expressed the view that agreement had been reached, that Ottawa would bring in its legislation this session, and the provinces follow suit. He told the house there were only minor differences to be adjusted.

Mr. Lanctot and Hon. Mr. Price, however, found at Toronto this week that the ideas of Ottawa are not suitable in a number of respects and hence decided that there must be further adjustments of the different viewpoints. To this end the intention is that there shall be a committee representing the provincial governments named, and they will discuss by correspondence what should be done, and come to a decision during the course of the present year, and then acquaint Ottawa with their joint viewpoint.

It is pointed out that while the provinces are anxious for uniformity, so that existing evils of company law may be curbed, if not altogether done away with, that the provinces as regards company law are in an independent position as to Ottawa, their constitutional position being excellent, and if they are willing to agree on legislation common to all the country it is only because of the general welfare.

I wish to add that no representative of the government or of the department of the Secretary of State was notified to attend the meeting alleged to have been held recently in Toronto, and no intimation has been received as to any conclusions reached at that meeting. I, like other hon. members, have simply had the opportunity of reading these statements purporting to issue from the office of the deputy attorney general of Quebec to the effect which I have read.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister if it is not a fact that the draft bill is in the hands of the provincial governments for study?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, and they were to communicate their suggestions to the office of the Secretary of State on or before March 1. None have been received.

Mr. GRAY: In view of what has been said, will the Secretary of State tell the house whether or not he will proceed with the revision of the Companies Act this session?

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is some necessity of proceeding with a revision of our own act. As to whether the government will decide to delay it for another year awaiting suggestions from the attorneys general of the various provinces I cannot say now.

JACQUES CARTIER CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspe): I would like to ask if it is the intention of the government to contribute towards the celebration of the 400th anniversary of the landing in Canada of Jacques Cartier, and if so, what amount?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why don't you pay the bill yourself?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the hon. gentleman will have to put the question on the order paper and await the return of the Prime Minister.

STEAMSHIP LOVAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) aware that the steamship Lovat, with a cargo of provisions bound for the Magdalen Islands is held up in the ice of one of the ports of Prince Edward Island, and, is it the intention of the hon. Minister of Marine to dispatch an icebreaker to clear a way for the Lovat.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker it is the first time that my attention has been drawn to this matter. I shall immediately make inquiries and shall endeavour to give all possible help to the people of the Magdalen Islands.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Agriculture—contributions to empire bureaux, $21,535.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister give a short explanation of the purpose of those bureaux?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The purpose of these bureaux is to gather from various research institutes and research workers throughout the empire information on the results of their research work, and to disseminate the same to the various dominions; also the collection of facts and statistics with reference to agriculture and to disseminate that information. Research workers from any part of the dominion visiting the United Kingdom immediately get in touch with these bureaux and are given every assistance to follow any studies and research work they may wish to take up. There were eight in all, established at the beginning in 1929. The term of the agreement ends in the year 1934-35. This year with the dropping out of the activities of the empire marketing board two other bureaux, the imperial bureau of entomology and the imperial bureau of mycology, have been put under the direction of the council of the imperial agricultural bureau for administrative purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where are these bureaux situated?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The location of these different bureaux, with their directors, is as follows:

Bureau—Location—Director of Bureau—
Soil Science, Rothamstead, Sir E. J. Russell, O.B.E., D.Sc., F.R.S.
Animal Health, Veterinary Research Laboratory, Weybridge, W. Horner Andrews, D.Sc., M.R.C.V.S.
Animal Nutrition, Rowett Institute, Aberdeen, J. B. Orr, D.S.O., M.C., M.A., M.D., D.Sc., F.R.S.
Animal Genetics, Edinburgh, F. A. E. Crew, M.D., D.Sc., Ph. D., F.R.S.E.
Plant Genetics (other than Herbage), Cambridge, Sir R. H. Biffen, M.A., F.R.S.
Plant Genetics (Herbage), Aberystwyth, R. G. Stapleton, C.B.E., M.A.
Fruit Production, East Malling, Kent, R. G. Hatton, M.A.
Agricultural Parasitology, St. Albans, R. T. Leiper, M.D., D.Sc., F.R.S.

Mr. POULIOT: A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M; the Minister of Agriculture is so bright that he has just quoted the alphabet several times in reading the names of these gentlemen who are high officials of the British Department of Agriculture. It was a joke to listen to the minister quoting all those letters. What does it matter to us if a man has seventy-five thousand letters after his name, if the trade of Canada is going down? The fact is that you cannot take any bloke and put a lot of letters after his name and make him more efficient; in the meantime our trade is going to the dogs and we have a dumb Minister of Agriculture who is proud to get up and give this illuminating information to the committee. He tells us that Sir Somebody, K.B.D.H.Z., is head of something; it must be a high degree in the Ku Klux Klan. We hear that in the committee, and everyone listens to it and finds it interesting and illuminating. But the farmers cannot get decent prices for their products; the trade of Canada is going to the dogs, and even our trade with Great Britain is decreasing. The minister did not even know that the British trade constitutes only 9 per cent of the world trade; we had to teach him that last year. We are asked to sacrifice our chances in regard to 91 per cent of the world's trade in order to secure a part of the remaining nine per cent.

I am glad to see that my hon. friend, the minister, is in his seat to-day; he was not courageous enough to stay when I was quoting statistics the other day during the debate on the address. I am here for information on behalf of the farmers of the east, and I am sure this will also interest the farmers of the west. We are not to be impressed with humbug of any kind; if my hon. friend over there cackles it will make no impression on me.

Before coming to the figures to which I wish to refer let me go back to that great expert in agriculture, the minister to whom we have been listening. He is impressed with the letters that follow the names of these distinguished gentlemen abroad who are members of the empire marketing board; like his leader, who is more impressed by words than by thoughts, he is more impressed by letters than by facts, and while he describes to us those knights of the British Empire, those gentlemen who put the letters O.B.E. and so forth after their names, those wonderful gentlemen who know so much about agriculture and the marketing of agricultural products, our poor farmers cannot get enough from the sale of their products to live decently and bring up their children in due comfort.

Well, Mr. Chairman, let us take those illuminating statistics, and I will ask the hon. gentleman to answer a layman in agriculture, as I am. I do not pretend to be an expert, but the knowledge I have has been obtained from the farmer himself, who has access to my office when he comes to see me. I listen to the farmer, so my knowledge of agriculture comes from the producer himself. I have some knowledge also from the official figures which I have obtained from the bureau of statistics. Let us take item by item, and I will ask the hon. member for South Essex to keep quiet.

Mr. GOTT: I merely invited my friend to come in, because he was missing a good speech.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend were a man he would stand by us when we complain about the policies of the government, especially with regard to tobacco.

Mr. GOTT: I will stand by the farmer, which is more than the hon. gentleman can say.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman talks in his own county, but he is afraid to speak out in the house.

Mr. GOTT: I will stand by the farmer, and that is more than the hon. gentleman is doing now.

Mr. POULIOT: That shows that my hon. friend does not understand a word of what I have said, and if I spoke to him I would waste my time.

Mr. GOTT: All the hon. gentleman's friends are laughing at him.

Mr. POULIOT: Let the hon. gentleman learn the alphabet which was recited by the Minister of Agriculture; it would help him, even if it is printed in London. Let us take agricultural products; let us take tobacco.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Would the hon. gentleman speak to the item under discussion?

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member had better speak about something he knows more of than he knows of tobacco.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the item under discussion is item 50 on page 20, entitled "Contributions to empire bureaux." I will explain my point.

Mr. GOTT: Here is a good cigar, made from Canadian tobacco, with the compliments of the hon. member for South Essex.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend, but I wish he would hold it in his mouth when I am speaking so that he will not disturb me.

Now, sir, we are discussing these contributions to empire bureaux, which amount to $21,535. This concerns the marketing of Canadian products; it is of as much interest to the Minister of Agriculture as it is to the Minister of Mines or any other minister in charge of a department which has to do with Canadian products. Therefore I believe I am perfectly in order in discussing on this item the sale of tobacco in England, the consumption here and so on. What about tobacco? If we compare the exports of 1933 with the exports of 1930 it will be seen that trade with the British Empire increased by $2,499,203, while trade with foreign countries decreased by $96,529, leaving a net increase of $2,402,674. As to manufactured tobacco, trade with the British Empire increased $8,248, and that with foreign countries increased $2,453. That is a total increase of $2,413,375, and there is also an increase in home consumption. This fact, namely that there is an increase in exports, and also an increase in home consumption looks very well. But what is the complaint? The complaint is made by the producer against the go-between, against the intermediary, against the one who takes the whole profit and leaves nothing for the producer. I have seen in that wonderful paper, the Border Cities Star, one of the best papers published in Canada, and probably one of the best published on the North American continent that the tobacco growers of western Ontario are complaining that they are not receiving enough from their tobacco sales. They complain that it is the few who get all the profits at the expense of the farmer who on his land is growing the tobacco. That is a very serious matter and is more serious when we realize that tobacco is one of the very few commodities in connection with which the government can boast surpluses in exports and in consumption. Therefore, if the price of tobacco is good, it is good only for those few wholesalers who, at the expense of the producers, reap huge benefits, while the producer is complaining that he is not being fairly treated.

Mr. GOTT: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. POULIOT: If it is polite I will answer it.

Mr. GOTT: It will be. The hon. member has mentioned the Border Cities Star. I should like to ask him how it is that he has never mentioned it or complimented it until to-day. Is it because he went into Essex, and they put his picture in the paper? Is that the reason?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, usually praise is wasted in this chamber when hon. members opposite are continually burning incense under the nose of the Prime Minister. I wanted to pay that compliment to the excellent newspaper I have mentioned at the beginning of the sitting when the atmosphere was not vitiated by all this stuff that is usually burnt under the nose of the Prime Minister. I took this opportunity because the Prime Minister is not in the house to-day, and for that reason no incense is being burned. I wanted to pay a well deserved compliment to a paper which is a great credit to the journalism of Canada.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member has not paid me the courtesy of an answer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member should not insist upon it, because his picture should be published in that paper with his head up side down. We have a good tobacco business. When I was interrupted I was showing that the exports in tobacco have increased, that the home consumption has increased, but that on the other hand at the expense of the producer the price of tobacco has fallen, and he receives nothing like fair compensation.

Mr. GOTT: On a point of order; I wish to say the consumption of tobacco in Canada has not increased.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask you, sir, as chairman of this house, to see to it that interruptions of that kind are not tolerated when I am speaking on serious matters. I am discussing the tobacco business, an industry which interests many farmers in Ontario, in the province of Quebec and in other parts of Canada. It is a matter of high importance, and I have not discussed it in a frivolous way. At times I joke with the hon. member for South Essex, but I pay no more attention to him than that. I regret very much that when we are discussing a matter as important as this one, one which is of vital importance to so many farmers, the hon. gentleman should continue making his jokes, sending cigars across the floor of the house, and speaking as if his electors were not interested. I hope, sir, that you will use your authority to make the hon. member keep quiet; otherwise I shall have to ask the assistance of the sergeant at arms to expel him from the house while we are discussing a matter of such concern to his electors. If they were here and saw him making his jokes and interrupting when an hon. member is speaking concerning a commodity as important as tobacco, and the exports and consumption of that commodity, no one would vote for him at the next election. I am very sorry for him if he cannot understand any better, but I believe his electors should not suffer from that. As he has said that home production did not increase, I shall give the figures supplied by the bureau of statistics.

Mr. GOTT: I said consumption not production.

Mr. POULIOT: In the year 1932-33 there were 2,217,447 more pounds produced than in 1930-31.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): I should like hon. members on both sides of the house to maintain order.

Mr. GOTT: On a question of privilege, may I say that I did not say production of tobacco in Canada has not increased; I said consumption of tobacco in Canada has not increased. I do not wish to have it twisted by the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, if the consumption of tobacco has not increased the hon. member may see to it by leaving the chamber and smoking in the lobby the cigar he offered me.

Mr. GOTT: You will not help it.

Mr. POULIOT: We will have increased consumption of tobacco to the extent of one cigar, and in the meantime we will have peace. I have quoted figures concerning tobacco from page 556 of Hansard.

There has been some very attractive advertising in connection with honey from the province of Quebec. It has appeared in a very excellent monthly, which has never published my picture or mentioned my name, but which I value just the same. I do not judge publications from the standpoint of the publicity I obtain in them. I refer to the publication called "Quebec" issued in London by the Canadian government. In that monthly Canadian honey has been widely advertised. The deputy minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec, Mr. Grenier, has gone to London in order to open markets for Canadian honey. That is a worthy project, but there is something more to consider. Figures which have been supplied show that the exports of honey to the British Empire were greater to a value of $119,215, but that those to foreign countries were less by $7,952. That leaves a total increase of $111,263. What about the home consumption? The home consumption of 1932-33 compared with 1930-31 showed a decrease of 9,535,689 pounds. We export $111,263 worth more, but we consume 9,535,689 pounds less. What is the advantage of exporting $111,263 more of honey, if we consume 9,535,689 pounds less in Canada? It seems to me that although the advertising in the "Quebec" monthly is very good, yet advertising for consumption of Canadian goods in Canada is not efficient. Therefore they have to take every possible step to improve the marketing of that product. But here in Canada we consume 9,500,000 pounds less of honey. Does not the Minister of Agriculture think that it would be much better to advertise Canadian honey in Canada in order to bring about normal consumption of this product in our home market. That would mean an increased home consumption of 9,500,000 pounds. It would be superfluous to export $111,000 of honey if our home consumption increased by 9,500,000 pounds. That is my view. Would it not be better to take steps to preserve our home market, as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has so often urged? We have a local market, but in that local market consumption is gradually decreasing, dwindling to nothing, and I think it is high time to advertise Canadian goods in Canada in order that our home consumption may be brought up to the point where it stood a few years ago.

Not only have we lost our foreign market, but on account of that the home trade in Canada has gone down so much that the Canadian people have no more money with which to buy Canadian products. We have an instance of that in the figures for the consumption of honey in Canada. The honey itself is just as good as it was two years ago, just as highly recommended as a food for young and old; its quality is first-class. Why do our people eat less of it? Because they have no money with which to buy it. That is very sad. Does not the Minister of Agriculture believe, after due consideration, that it would be much better to spend at least half of this amount of $21,535 for the advertising of Canadian goods?

There are other products which need advertising at home. The average price of eggs in Canada in 1933 was 21 cents per dozen as compared with 37 cents in 1930. The increase in our export of eggs has been $352,000 worth. On the other hand, the home consumption of eggs decreased in the year 1932-33 as compared with 1930-31 by 45,959,763 dozen. We exported $352,000 worth more of eggs, but on the other hand our home consumption in the last three years has dropped by 45,959,763 dozen. Where is our local market? The case is similar to honey. Does not the Minister of Agriculture believe that it is of great importance to start a Canadian purchasing campaign in order that Canadian products may again be sold at home on the same scale as prevailed two or three years ago?

Why is the home consumption of eggs so very much less? There is a very good reason. It is that the people who have no money to buy honey have no money to buy eggs either. I am told that in several places eggs are forbidden to people on the direct relief lists. That is one of the reasons why eggs are not now sold in such large quantities as they were two or three years ago in this country. There is a little increased exportation, but the home consumption is so very much less than it was that the Canadian farmer is asking of himself, what of the future? Will it be worth while, he asks, to keep my poultry? Will it not be better to kill the chickens and eat them instead of purchasing grain and other stuffs to feed them? The price of eggs is very low at the present time. The price goes up slightly at certain seasons, but the average price is low and the consumption is small. So what encouragement has the farmer to keep his poultry in good condition and to continue in the egg business? I would ask the hon. minister if he has no plan for restoring our local market. The hon. member for West Calgary, who is otherwise called the Prime Minister, has often said in this house that we have the local market. Well, our local market does not amount to so much after all because you can take item after item and always you will find a decreased home consumption. There might be one item in which the home consumption has increased, but only slightly. We cannot have regard only to exports. We have to consider home production, imports, and home consumption as well. Of course, the exports are a little higher, but the home consumption has decreased so much that the farmer is very anxious about his future.

There are some very interesting figures about the dairying industry in connection with those three very well-known dairy products, concentrated milk, butter and cheese.

I take first concentrated milk. In 1933 as compared with 1930 we exported $380,000 more to the British Empire but $1,231,000 less to foreign countries, which means a net loss in exports of $851,000.

Of butter we exported $468,643 more to the British Empire and $52,000 less to foreign countries, or a net increase of $416,000. The price of butter has been very low, although it has risen a little lately; but let us not forget that it is now winter. I do not know how long it will last. We heard a lot about butter during the last campaign, and we hear a lot about it from the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), who has a great announcement to make. He speaks about the high price of butter now. I will ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can supply me with the following information in regard to butter. What was the average price of butter each month from 1922 to 1930, to the first of July, 1930, and the average price of butter each month from July 2, 1930, to date? I think you will see that the average price of butter during the last three years has been one-half what it was from 1922 to 1930. But if he wishes to be fair the compilation should be made month to month—January for the first period and January for the second period, average price for the first period and average price for the second period. Then you would see that the statement of these gentlemen with regard to the increase in the price of butter signifies something more than just a verbal utterance in the House of Commons.

There is also cheese, Canadian cheese which is very good—an excellent Canadian product. The exports to the British Empire were $4,688,904 less, and this is not the first time that we are voting money for the empire bureaux. Last year we voted $21,000 and this year it is $535 more. And the appropriation was not all required last year; some money was left. If the hon. gentleman boasts of the fact that the increase in the shipments of butter abroad was $416,000, how can he explain the fact that the total loss in the exports of cheese was $5,130,401, according to the information that we have received from the bureau of statistics? What is the use therefore of exporting more butter, a small quantity amounting to $416,000, if we suffer a loss of over $5,000,000 in the exports of cheese? How can he explain it? For those who do not know, they say that the quantity of exports is larger than ever; but you will understand that the farmers have to sell two pounds of butter now for the price of one during the first period I have mentioned. And it is the same with every product. They have to sell two sheep for the price of one, two lambs for the price of one—

Mr. LACROIX: Six lambs.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend from Beauce says six lambs.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. gentleman does not know.

Mr. POULIOT: I try to make it as favourable as I can, but the facts are much more unfavourable than I have indicated, and instead of making jokes in connection with a matter which is so serious to the farmers of the country, the hon. gentleman should listen sympathetically. Well, here we are voting more money—what for? Is the Minister of Agriculture proud of the fact that our exports of butter are four or five hundred thousand more while our exports of cheese are five millions less? We lose ten times more in our exports of cheese than we gain in our exports of butter, and it is on the advice of a distinguished trade expert, Sir So and So, B.D.G., K.F.G., X.Y.Z., and this famous agriculturist known the world over, Sir So and So, Z.Y.X.—it is reversed. The first one was distinguished in trade and the other one was distinguished in agriculture; therefore the former is X.Y.Z. and the latter is Z.Y.X., most distinguished gentlemen who accomplished such marvels. Thanks to their ability, thanks to their genius, we ship butter to England and other places amounting to four or five hundred thousand dollars more. But is it not also due to their great experience, their genius, their high sense of trade markets, that we are exporting cheese to the extent of five millions less? I say therefore, what is the use of contributing money to that board? My hon. friend is impressed by these advisers. Who are they? Are they responsible or is he responsible? If he is responsible for it he should resign, and if they are responsible we should not vote a cent for that board. This work should be done by Howard Ferguson in London. What is the use of having him there, paying so much money to Howard Ferguson, to give banquets to seven hundred guests in the presence of the Prime Minister, while the farmers here are starving? What is the use of having Howard Ferguson over there if he is good for nothing? What is the use of giving so much money to him while his work is being done by that bureau? Did he give a satisfactory explanation to the Minister of Agriculture? If he did, I should like to hear from the hon. gentleman. Is the minister satisfied that we should be exporting five million dollars less in cheese?

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes and has not come anywhere near touching the subject before the committee. I do not intend to speak forty minutes but only forty seconds; I merely wish to refute what the hon. gentleman said with regard to tobacco and to show him how little he knows about it. The consumption of cigars in Canada is down twenty-five millions and the consumption of cigarettes is down one billion, but the price of tobacco to the consumer is just the same. The price of tobacco to the producer is so discouraging that it will be difficult for him to raise crops in the years to come. The price of tobacco must go up. I suggest to this house and to the country that there is a combine in the buying of tobacco owing to the fact that the representatives of the British Leaf Tobacco Company, that is the Imperial Tobacco Company of Great Britain, and Ireland, come to Canada and buy through the representatives of the Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada. If there is not a combine, there is a monopoly, which is much worse. I make these remarks merely to show that I have a little more knowledge of tobacco than is contained in the book used by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is any report of the activities of these empire bureaux available to which the house might have access?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are a number of reports on each of the subjects I mentioned in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver. The hon. member for Témiscouata, in speaking, passed over a couple of items which might be of interest to the committee; that is, why the appropriation was not completely expended last year and why this year there is apparently an increase in it. The money is to be paid in sterling and last year, on account of sterling being at a discount, the full amount of the vote was not required. This year, when the estimates were compiled, the fact that sterling was at a premium accounts for the additional sum shown in the appropriation.

There are available reports dealing with soil research, animal health and those I have mentioned, and I shall be only too glad to give copies of those reports to any person who wishes to get them. The whole work of these bureaux is not research; it is not advertising; it is not trade; it is simply the collection of information and the distribution of it. The agreement was entered into in 1929 for five years, expiring in 1934-35.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: One reason there is some criticism of this appropriation is that last Friday the Prime Minister had before the committee, an almost similar item, that appearing on page 54 of the estimates dealing with agricultural bureaux. As it was very meagerly explained and as the Minister of Agriculture has not elaborated, some hon. members do not seem to know what it is all about as there appears to be duplication although I think there is none. This appropriation has been in existence since 1929 and has met with very little criticism because the bureaux is both a clearing house and actually engaged in important research for the information not only for the other parts of the empire but for ourselves. For illustration the investigation into the important question of wheat rust and the animal pathological work conducted in the laboratory at Hull, anybody who would slip over there for half an hour or so and examine what is one of the best equipped laboratories on this continent would know what the present government is doing and what the preceding one did in this respect. These central bureaux in the British Isles act as a clearing house for information from the dominions as to the progress each one has been making in the different branches of research. This enables each part of the empire to know what each other part is doing and what progress it is making in each branch of activity. This is important work and we might, I think, let this appropriation pass. If I wanted to make a general attack on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, I would prefer to make it on some other item than this and particularly on one that is being reduced. This is one of the two that are being increased. I would feel like commending the minister for keeping up this work. Are all the other dominions reporting and paying up their quotas?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That seems to be satisfactory. If I felt justified in making any remarks at this stage as to the general trend of the department in reducing every vote except two at a time when agriculture is out at the elbows and down at the heels and needing further instead of reduced help, that would be my criticism, but this does not seem to be the time for it. Therefore I rather feel like supporting the minister in making the slight increase shown in regard to this item which was first introduced for a very commendable purpose.

Mr. VALLANCE: With all deference to the ex-Minister of Agriculture and his solicitude for this particular item, there are some questions that can be asked regarding this bureau only at this time. What are the other parts of the empire doing and what are their respective contributions to this bureau?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The contributions are as follows:

United Kingdom	£3,750
Through Colonial Office	3,750
From Canada	3,125
From Australia	3,125
From India	2,187 10s.
From Union of South Africa	1,562 10s.
From New Zealand	1,250
From Irish Free State	625
From Southern Rhodesia	250
From Anglo-Egyptian Sudan	250
From Newfoundland	125

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this all based on the pound sterling?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a word to say in answer to one remark from the minister. He spoke about the jumping of the pound sterling. I admit that the pound sterling has had ups and downs for some time, but on the other hand, at the last world conference which was attended by the Minister of Finance and at which sixty-four nations were represented, the matter of stabilization of money appeared on the agenda. It was therefore intended to be discussed, but it was not considered because the United States did not think it a fit time, and then the sixty-three other nations including Canada and its representatives the hon. member for West Calgary and the Minister of Finance all quit and said: We will wait until the United States agrees to take the question into consideration before coming together as a whole. Those sixty-three nations had to wait for the United States to have stabilization of money which is essential to world trade. Stabilization was not brought about and because of this I do not see how the Minister of Agriculture can mention the ups and downs of the pound sterling as, if it has affected our trade, this is mostly because the government have had no policy in regard to the matter.

I asked the hon. gentleman several questions. I asked him first whether the vote for this bureau was necessary seeing that we have Howard Ferguson as High Commissioner in London. This is a fair question. If Howard Ferguson is such a genius, such a mixer in trade as well as in politics, we do not need this bureau. It is a waste of money to vote $21,000 and the government should rather give half of it—

Mr. GOTT: On a point of order, we are on item 50, page 20, and the hon. member has consumed forty minutes of the time of the committee and is now attempting to repeat his speech. Is this permissible on the same item?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): In supply a certain amount of latitude is given to members.

Mr. POULIOT: I asked my questions in the mildest language. I am just as nice as one can be. As one of the two hundred and forty-five members of this house my only intention is to seek to defend the Canadian exchequer. When I speak now I do not speak for the pleasure of speaking, I speak on behalf of the farmers of my constituency, who have been told that the Prime Minister is a superman and that the Minister of Agriculture is his right hand in matters pertaining to agriculture. It is all very well to tell the farmers to produce more tobacco, produce more hogs, produce more sheep, produce more eggs, produce more butter, but when the time comes to sell them they get no decent price. I am not against trade with Great Britain, I am not against that item in itself, but I find that the result is disastrous, that this government is neglecting our home trade in order to promote an artificial British trade or to justify the silly Ottawa agreements. In the debate on the address their merits were extolled, the hon. gentlemen who proposed and seconded the address in reply both praised the Ottawa agreements very highly. But what have they produced? Our trade has been destroyed, and when I ask information about the work which Howard Ferguson is doing in England with regard to Canadian trade I receive no answer. Who is responsible for that loss of $5,000,000 in the exports of cheese? Is it the empire bureaux or is it Howard Ferguson or is it this government? Someone must be responsible. We are told it is the pound sterling, but the pound sterling is not drafting the policy of this government with regard to agriculture and marketing.

I also asked another question of the hon. Minister of Agriculture; I will repeat it because he does not seem to have understood my English well. It is not my native language but I speak it with all earnestness and to the best of my ability. Another question that I put to the hon. gentleman, as the hon. members who are here will remember, was this: What was the average price of butter from the year 1922 to July 1 or August 1, 1930, month by month? What was the price in January, February, March, April and so on; and on the other hand what has been the average price of butter in each month of the second period, from July 2 or August 2, 1930 to the present time. I have no answer, yet the hon. gentleman must have that information before him all the time, he must have it with him here in order to answer these questions, which are fair and reasonable. When we hear hon. gentlemen opposite say that the price of butter is higher now, they do not take that earlier period into consideration, but it is most essential to do so.

Therefore my first question will be: Who is destroying the Canadian trade? Is it Howard Ferguson, the empire bureaux or this government? If it is Howard Ferguson, why is he kept there as high commissioner? If it is the empire bureaux why do we have this item in the estimates? If it is the government, why do they not resign? If I repeat a third time the second question I do so in order to be understood clearly; I also hope to have an answer about the average prices of butter in those two periods.

Then I would ask the hon. gentleman, how is it that if the exports of honey have increased the home consumption has decreased by 9,500,000 pounds? Can he explain it to me? Some Conservative members tell me often that I am not an expert in agriculture. I admit it, but I am here to defend the rights of the farmers and make known their grievances to this government; I do that conscientiously, when I ask a question I do not ask it to make trouble, I ask it to get information because my mind is not yet satisfied. I want to get that information. I may be laughed at by those who do not know how to read and write, but sir, I do my work conscientiously, in that respect I believe I am above reproach, and when hon. members on the other side of the house treat me fairly they may be assured that I observe the golden rule; but I pay no attention to those who use abusive language or anything of that kind. I am now defending the rights of those who suffer, of those whose interests are entrusted to the Minister of Agriculture, the farmers, and I ask him kindly to give me that information. If he answers me in an appropriate way and to the point it will be much more satisfactory.

Mr. GOTT: They are slippery questions.

Mr. POULIOT: Slippery for those who are always in the mud.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be very pleased to furnish the hon. member with the information he has asked for in respect to butter. It has nothing to do with this item, however. It can be very properly and thoroughly discussed under either the live stock item or the dairy item.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman very much, but I understand that the work of the empire bureaux relates to the whole Canadian production. Am I right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It relates to research work and information obtained by research workers. It is simply to prevent duplication; instead of each dominion corresponding with every other dominion, it is all passed through this imperial bureau.

Mr. POULIOT: Finally I would ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture to teach manners to his colleague.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has just told us this is a vote that was commenced in 1929, $21,000 appropriated last year, $21,535 this year; and he has given a very satisfactory explanation of the work of the bureau. On Friday we were discussing item 207, miscellaneous, which is a new item this year of $18,690. I want to draw the attention of the minister to the particulars of that item:

Canada's portion of expenditure of the Imperial economic committee, the Imperial shipping committee, and the executive council of the Imperial agricultural bureaux for 1934.

There seems to be some duplication. If the department was getting on with $21,000 from 1929 to the present why is a portion of the new vote of $18,690 applied to payment of the executive council of this bureau?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As far as I am aware item 207 has nothing to do with this item at all, because the cost of the council of the imperial bureau is paid out of this vote. It may be for some special work outside of this, but there has been no change whatever in the type of work that is being done by this bureau.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that both items have a similar description; that is under item 207 the executive council of the imperial agricultural bureaux is covered by part of the $18,690 vote, and then here we have, I assume, the usual vote, at least the vote last year and this, $21,000. It immediately occurred to me that there must be some overlapping or some mistake in connection with the appropriation, because it covers the executive council and surely, as this is a new item this year, the executive council must have been covered by the previous vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that it is still covered in that way. I shall be glad to look into that matter and let the hon. member have the information.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the minister if all the dominions are as one with regard to these bureaux? I understand that the grants are being made by the different parts of the empire, but I should like to know if there is complete harmony with regard to these bureaux and with regard to the policy covered by this appropriation.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I believe so.

Mr. McINTOSH: And was this action taken by the dominions simultaneously, or did one part of the empire lead in this matter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe it was the outgrowth of a number of conferences of scientists extending over a period of years. It was felt that it would be a saving of duplication and would avoid a great deal of wastage to have the work handled in this way, and to that everyone agreed.

Mr. McINTOSH: And back of each empire government was the support of the people in each case?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I think so.

Item agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Immigration and colonization—empire settlement scheme, including grants authorized by the governor in council, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We would like some information about this item.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to ask the minister if this has anything to do with the oft reported attempt of someone in Great Britain to locate British settlers on Canadian farms.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): This is an item that arises out of an agreement entered into between the Canadian Government and the British Empire Settlement Board in 1927. The substance of the agreement was that a number of British boys should be settled in Canada, and the arrangement set out in the agreement was that if the youngster saved $500 he would be entitled to a loan of $1,250 from the British empire settlement board, a further loan from the Canadian government of $1,000, and an additional sum of $250 from the province concerned. No loans have been made under the agreement, but probably there will be applications during the year, and this item is inserted in the estimates so that the department may be in a position to comply with the terms of the agreement.

Mr. LUCAS: Did the minister say that to date no loans have been made?

Mr. GORDON: No loans to date.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister tell us how many have been settled under this scheme, and how many during the past year?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figure of those who have been settled under this scheme, but none has been brought out during the last four years, since 1930.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the minister tell us how many of the boys brought out previous to 1930 have lived up to their agreements and how many have thrown up their hands and gone back home or migrated to other parts of the country?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures as to how many have returned to Great Britain, but according to my information—though I stand to be corrected in this connection—I do not think any have gone back. As to how many have lived up to the agreement, I think they have done fairly well. My own view was that the agreement was not perhaps as provident as it might have been, because my view is that if a young fellow can save $500—and apparently some of them are doing it—perhaps he would be following the course of wisdom if he did not start in to borrow, but instead saved another $500. I would not encourage anyone to expand by borrowing if it is possible to save. That may be a little old fashioned, but I have found that it works out very well in any sort of business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask if any other schemes have been suggested to this government by the British government or by private parties, in reference to settlement?

Mr. GORDON: There have been no direct suggestions to the Canadian government. Various schemes have been talked about, but no definite plan has been suggested by anybody to the government. The Imperial parliament has discussed the matter of empire migration on many occasions, and we are all acquainted with the difficulties that are associated with any plan to distribute the people of the empire throughout the dominions. We know what has happened in a measure in Canada during the last few years, as well as in Australia, from which country a great many more people have returned to Great Britain than migrated. I offer it as a suggestion, whether the outline of any plan comes before me or before anyone who may follow me, that any scheme or plan had better be looked at from very long range and gone into with the utmost care. It has been said on many occasions by men in high places, as well as by others, that we are not attracting British agriculturists to Canada. Well, Mr. Chairman, anyone who makes that statement has little conception of the situation that obtains in the United Kingdom, where perhaps less than seven per cent of the population are agriculturists of a desirable type. It is most difficult to attract from the United Kingdom to Canada an agriculturist who is doing well there; no country wants to give up that type of agriculturist. So I say that any plan for the migration of people, no matter how desirable it may appear, should be examined with the utmost care. No such scheme has been placed before the government, however.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the government considered at all the General Hornby scheme to place certain settlements in particular communities throughout western Canada?

Mr. GORDON: I have read something about it in the press but the scheme has not been laid before me. Anything I have seen has been merely in the press.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not know whether or not the minister has the information, but I understand that there is already one settlement out at Lashburn, Saskatchewan, in my own constituency.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know of it. If settlers are being placed there, they certainly have not brought the scheme before me, and if any such scheme had been on foot I should think it would have been brought before the Department of Immigration.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think I am not divulging any secrets, because I believe most hon. members of this House of Commons, particularly those from western Canada have been, may I use the word, lobbied by the same gentleman, General Hornby. So, while I do not wish to doubt the minister's word, I cannot conceive of a scheme which has been suggested and has gone so far but has not been drawn to the attention of the government. The gentleman in question has been in this House of Commons and has attended at the offices of hon. members. He visited me, soliciting my cooperation. In addition to that pamphlets have been sent out to all hon. members.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am very glad this question has been raised, because I have been keenly interested in it. Either General Hornby or someone representing him went to the county of Oxford and waited on the county council. Through their instrumentality options at a certain price have been taken on one hundred farms. It seemed to me there was not sufficient authority to warrant so much action being taken, and I was very much interested when General Hornby came to my office to try to explain the scheme. It seemed to me that he, with probably the best intentions in the world, was pretty much of a visionary and was counting on certain action which he expected would be taken by the British parliament. He appeared to think that all the expense was going to be paid by the British parliament, and that it was going to buy farms in this country at some arranged price, so that people could be brought out. I am very glad to hear from the minister that nothing definite has been done, because I believe a great deal of unnecessary unrest has been stirred up throughout the country, and many very deserving people have a wrong idea of the meaning of the scheme.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have been on my feet four times, Mr. Chairman. Can you not see me?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think every hon. member in this house—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. member has spoken once.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have not.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe every hon. member in the house received a copy of General Hornby's scheme for overseas settlement in Canada. He goes so far as to say the following:

> I am glad to be able to tell you that locations for the first ten settlements under my plan have now been selected in the eastern provinces, namely; two in the province of Quebec; four in the province of Ontario; two in the province of Nova Scotia; and two in the province of New Brunswick. Each settlement is to consist of around one hundred farms —one thousand farms in all, establishing one thousand new British settler families, probably 4,000 or 5,000 persons.

Then he goes on to say:

> My plan for old country community settlements in Canada was presented to the parliamentary migration committee of the House of Commons at Westminster, and to the overseas settlement department, dominions office, in my memorandum No. 11 of July 14, 1933; its financial side was further explained in my memorandum No. 12 of August 9, 1933. Copies of both of these documents are on record at the overseas settlement department, Caxton House, Tothill Street, London, S.W. 1.

I think it is passing strange that this gentleman should go to the extent of appearing before a committee of the British House of Commons and not inform the government of Canada of his plans. I would assume that should such an extensive immigration policy be launched it would have to have the endorsation of and be acceptable to the dominion government.

Mr. GORDON: So that there may be no misunderstanding, no plan has been placed before me, and I believe I can make the same statement for other members of the government, so far as General Hornby is concerned. I do not however wish to appear to mislead. General Hornby saw me sometime in the early fall, stating that he was going to Great Britain in connection with some scheme for British settlement. I expressed no opinion about it either one way or the other, because he was by no means clear as to what his plan was. I do not think that he knew himself, exactly, what the plan would be, but rather he was going to Great Britain to interview some people he knew with respect to a scheme which he was evolving in his own mind. As I said a minute ago, a great many press dispatches have appeared in the newspapers discussing the possible plan of General Hornby, but no plan, as such, other than that which I have learned from press dispatches and not more than two interviews with General Hornby, was submitted. I see that in the British House of Commons in December of last year a resolution reading as follows was adopted:

That this house is of opinion that the time has now come when His Majesty's government should get in touch with the governments of the dominions with a view to putting forward a scheme for the voluntary redistribution of the white peoples of the empire, and the stimulation of shipping and trade under the flag.

A number of observations were made by various members of the British House of Commons, but nothing other than the adoption of the resolution seems to have come of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was it carried?

Mr. GORDON: The house adopted the resolution I have read.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did not the government act upon it?

Mr. GORDON: No, we have received no intimation from the government of the United Kingdom, and I would suggest that if any plan of settlement of the British people throughout the various dominions, as indicated in the resolution, is to be considered, we might well wait until we receive an official communication from the British government, and not depend upon the plans of an individual which may or may not be sound, and which perhaps have small chance of receiving support either in the United Kingdom or here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McINTOSH: He saw you at last.

Mr. SANDERSON: I wish to point out that the remark you made to me a minute ago, namely that I had spoken, was not correct.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): I apologize.

Mr. SANDERSON: And if I had spoken once I have the privilege of speaking a dozen times more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): But three hon. members cannot speak at the same time.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask a question. I understood the minister to say that the agreement was entered into in 1927.

Mr. GORDON: I believe that is correct.

Mr. SANDERSON: When does it expire?

Mr. GORDON: There has been nothing done under the agreement since 1930, so far as any further immigration is concerned. While so far as I know the agreement has not been formally cancelled, yet—

Mr. SANDERSON: Is there any definite time in the agreement as to when it terminated?

Mr. GORDON: I am not sure about it; I have not the agreement before me, but I could quite easily get it.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many provinces entered into the agreement?

Mr. GORDON: I would have to have the agreement before me in order to say that. I do not carry that information in my memory.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to the Hornby agreement, it seems to me that the minister has hardly gone as far as this committee might expect. It is very gratifying that the minister has not entered into any arrangements with regard to this matter, but I do not think the situation is quite satisfactory when we find that a private individual is actually obtaining options on lands and is proposing to bring in settlers without having his scheme definitely recognized by this government. I take it that the Immigration department ought to be held responsible for the immigration of people to this country, and when we consider that for the last year or two the Immigration department has been busy chiefly with deporting people from this country, and further, that the government is now entering into a scheme to try to lessen production in this country, I think it is absolutely absurd to permit the British government or anyone else to bring more people into Canada. It is not what the British government may desire to do. Surely we have a right to think of things in Canada and of our own people here, to say nothing of the rights of those who may possibly become agricultural settlers in this country. For years and years past we have been busy in this house protesting against the bringing of people into the country where conditions do not permit them to make a livelihood, and any of us who has been connected with social work knows of the hardships, and often the very severe hardships, through which people from Great Britain have had to pass before they could get a foothold in this country, and now within the last few months we have had the exhibition of large numbers of them, running into the tens of thousands, having to be deported because they could not make a go of it. Under those circumstances I think it is cruel to bring anyone into this country, nor is it fair to the people who are here to have an added burden put upon them until we change our economic arrangements so that the people here can make a living.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not wish to enter into a general discussion of the question of immigration or of the policy Canada should adopt, but there are some facts which are being brought to our attention very forcibly from day to day. As to the Hornby scheme, the minister says that the government has not been approached, and probably we should not discuss it. All I have to say of the Hornby scheme I have already said. There is one fact I should like to mention. I do not know whether it is because I myself am an immigrant, but I find quite a number of my own countrymen in this city appealing to me from day to day, at least in my office, and I should like to ask the minister to what extent have British immigrants been sent back to the old country within the last two years. A Scotchman called on me the other day, a stone mason, now on relief in this city, and who will have been in Canada five years next July. He has received notice that he is to be deported before the expiration of his five years. I would like to know from the minister how many individuals there are in that position whom the department is contemplating sending back to the old land.

Mr. GORDON: I can procure those figures on some other item. There has been a misconception, I think, and perhaps a little loose talking in places as to people who have been returned to their own country. Some have talked of tens of thousands and that sort of thing when the actual figures, which have been tabled in the house, will disclose that that is not the situation. I am relying now upon my memory, but if those figures are examined, and they were analyzed for me by the officers of the department not so long ago, they will disclose that of those who were returned to their country of origin the percentage of deportees returned as such, that is against their will, was comparatively small. The house must bear in mind that prior to 1930, rightly or wrongly, and I am not complaining against what was done, many hundreds of thousands of people were invited to come to Canada, and in spite of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, I think the time will come when this country will again be sufficiently attractive so that many more hundreds of thousands of people will come here from Great Britain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister think that that time is here?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think, so far as the hon. member is concerned, that that time will ever come.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not an answer to the question. Does the minister think that that time is now?

Mr. GORDON: No, of course it is not now. There were many people who never had an opportunity to become established. They were not here long enough. They had little if any funds when they landed, and a very large percentage of those returned were sent back to the United Kingdom at their own request. Then there was a considerable percentage who refused to accept employment. There was another percentage who would accept employment but only under conditions as to wages and so forth that were impossible at the present time. But the percentage who were sent back to Great Britain out of all those who were returned is comparatively small, and before my estimates on the Immigration department are through I shall have those figures available for the committee.

Mr. VALLANCE: I find that a return was brought down to an order of the house moved for by my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Beaubien), appearing at page 589 of Hansard. I was not aware of that fact before. It shows that in the last four years 13,080 have been deported to the British Isles.

Mr. GRAY: Referring to the Hornby scheme, rightly or wrongly the impression has got abroad through the press that Hornby was encouraged to go to the provincial governments by this government. I should like to know from the minister, if he will give it, exactly what encouragement or suggestions he did give to Hornby when he was here following the meeting of the chamber of commerce.

Mr. GORDON: I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have explained the situation as well as I can. On the two occasions, once last fall and once I think probably a month ago, when General Hornby saw me, my attitude towards his activities was simply that I could hear only representations made from the United Kingdom, and on neither occasion did General Hornby have any plan that I could call a plan to lay before me. I have received no overtures or plan from the British government.

Mr. GRAY: Was Hornby encouraged to visit the provincial governments?

Mr. GORDON: Oh no, I did not encourage him one way or the other.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has the minister heard from any of the provincial governments regarding the scheme?

Mr. GORDON: I think not.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps I might add a word just to show that the government, so far as other ministers are concerned, took exactly the same attitude as that taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration. Within the last month I received a letter, which I did not mention to the Minister of Immigration but which I did to the Prime Minister, from the management of the Canadian National Railways. General Hornby had asked them for assistance financially for his immigration scheme; he had also asked the same of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they asked our advice about it. My advice was that we should not take any part in this scheme at all. I mention that just because it shows that apparently the government was, from different angles working along exactly the same line, and I think it is hardly fair to suggest, as has been done, that the government was in any way encouraging this scheme.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would ask the minister to be good enough before his items are through to bring down figures of deportations on a racial basis, and also showing the number who were deported for destitution, the commission of crimes, and for other causes under the act. I should like to know definitely the number of requests that have been received from different racial groups for deportation. I ask for that information because I believe that until this country reaches the stage that has been reached in Great Britain in social legislation in the past twenty-five years immigration is out of the question. It is out of the question to people in the old land where there is unemployment insurance, health insurance, besides widows' pensions and many other forms of social legislation such as we find there; they cannot be expected to come to a country where they are more or less left to their own resources without protection in case of unemployment and adversity. That point of view quite often is not sufficiently stressed—the lack of desire on the part of the people of Great Britain to leave that country in view of the absence of social legislation here to take care of the hazards that beset people engaged in every walk of life. I was in England this year and I was told that people were returning from different parts of the world at the rate of 1,000 a week. I should like the minister to get that information.

Mr. GORDON: I believe I can secure the information with fair accuracy. From 1900, say, until 1930, there would be probably 30,000 or 35,000 deported, and from that time on the ratio is greater, though not that number. How far back does the hon. gentleman want me to go?

Mr. MITCHELL: Since the beginning of the depression; from 1929, say.

Mr. GORDON: Beginning with the spring of 1929?

Mr. MITCHELL: In a time of prosperity there is usually emigration to various countries where conditions are good. Suppose people wanted to leave this country; are there any prosperous countries to which they could emigrate?

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps I can satisfy the hon. member in part with a statement just handed to me. It covers the years 1932 and 1933.

Immigrants deported as Public Charges during the calendar years 1932 and 1933

This review for the two years will, I hope, set at rest some very extravagant statements that have been made by those who have not been acquainted with the facts. We all like to face facts, and if they are not pleasant we want to face them anyway; but we do not want to have spread throughout the country extravagant and misleading statements. Nor do we want statements calculated to pour salve on wounds without being helpful.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was in a number of countries in Europe this year, and I wonder how many people wanted to go back, say, to Italy. How many wanted to go back to Germany or to Poland?

Mr. GORDON: We rarely get requests from people wanting to go back there. I will try to have a definite statement made with regard to the other countries.

Mr. HEENAN: While the minister is preparing that report, I hope he will also give us information with respect to what kind of employment was refused by these men, and what were the impossible conditions of employment that they demanded and were not given?

Mr. GORDON: I would like to make the return this session.

Mr. HEENAN: I hardly think the minister would countenance the deportation of a Canadian citizen or a man from Canada unless the hon. member had positive proof that conditions of employment offered were such as would afford a Canadian standard of living.

Mr. GORDON: But a Canadian citizen is never subject to deportation.

Mr. HEENAN: I said: A man from Canada. I have heard it said by some people, I do not know by whom, that those in opposition are supposed to offer congratulations to the government when they are doing right and to give helpful suggestions. I rise at this time to say to the Acting Minister of Immigration that I am fully in accord with the position he has taken with respect to immigration to Canada. He has, however, suggested that we might wait until such time as a concrete system of immigration is offered to the government. I do not agree there because that might be too late. Inasmuch as gentlemen in another house of parliament, that at Westminster, have, because of their action in carrying a resolution, not hesitated to say to the people of Great Britain and Canada what their views are with respect to emigration from the British isles to this country, this is an opportune time for us in Canada to say something as to what we might approve in this country.

When I said that I rose, because of being in opposition, to be helpful to the minister, my mind went back to around 1929; it could go back further, but it went back more especially to 1929 when the present Prime Minister sat on this side in opposition and advocated that the more people we brought to Canada, the more work and employment there would be for those who were in this country; when the Minister of Railways said that Canada might be the mecca for the surplus people of the whole world if we had a proper government and a proper fiscal policy; when the organizer of the Conservative party, General McRae, then member for Vancouver North, advocated bringing either 250,000 or 300,000 families to this country at an expense of $300,000,000, or $30,000,000 a year for ten years, and when that glorious old Tory, the Hon. Howard Ferguson, was making a trip through Europe canvassing the various countries there to send their surplus people to this province and criticizing the then government because we were too careful in our selection of the type of immigrant we wanted to come here. I am wondering where that policy has gone. Why the change? There is now in office a government that is satisfactory to the Minister of Railways, a government that, I hope, has a policy that is satisfactory to him; and he said that if we had that policy and that government, this country should be a mecca for the surplus people of the whole world. What is the trouble now? I would say to the Minister of Railways that I am glad he has changed his view. Responsibility is a great thing.

Mr. MANION: So is irresponsibility.

Mr. HEENAN: For fear I might be charged with misquoting the Minister of Railways, it will be found that when he was supporting General McRae's proposition, he said this:

> We have one of the greatest countries in the world and if it were properly handled it should be the mecca for all the desirable peoples in all the overcrowded portions of the earth.

Again he said:

> My complaint is not so much that the number of British immigrants is not larger, as that our immigration of all classes is much too small. The question is often asked how many can we absorb in this country?

Again he said:

> I submit that we can take many more immigrants of all kinds.

Again:

> I submit that we have a need for people of all classes.

I am not entirely blaming the Minister of Railways because that was the general view of the Conservative party when they were in opposition. The Conservative press throughout the country lambasted the government of the day, pointing out that we were trying to hold Canada in a narrow channel and to restrict immigration. We have heard the Acting Minister of Immigration this afternoon speak of the proportion of agriculturists to be found in Great Britain. Anyone who knows anything about industrial England is well aware that very few people in that country are engaged in agriculture and that you cannot make an agricultural out of an industrial population. So where are we to get these agriculturists and what were we to do with them when we got them here?

I think the Acting Minister of Immigration and the government should tell General Hornby what we propose to do in this country. Who is financing him? Is it the British government or some select few people who want to get rid of the unemployed population, trafficking in humanity, throwing people from one country to another? Is that the game in which Canada is to be engaged? General Hornby appearing before labour people in the city of Winnipeg has a plan all set out for so many thousand people to be settled in certain communities and all that sort of thing. He has even provision made for their return to Great Britain if they do not make good. How are our Canadian workers to be safeguarded so that these immigrants will return to Great Britain? All these questions must be taken into consideration.

I say again that I congratulate the Acting Minister of Immigration and the Conservative government on their right about face on the immigration question. I think I can congratulate the Conservative press because, since this government came into power, they realized it could not provide work for the people who are here much less for those it might bring in from outside.

In conclusion, I hope the minister will view and continue to view with alarm any proposals that are made by anybody outside Canada.

Mr. MANION: I do not intend to delay the committee long, but that speech of mine has been quoted so often by my hon. friend and others that I should like to refer to it for a moment. I did speak after General McRae, but my hon. friend is quite incorrect in saying that I supported General McRae's resolution. I remember it very well; he proposed, I think, the bringing in of something like 250,000 or 300,000 people to the Peace River territory. My hon. friend will search my speech in vain to find any word of mine supporting that scheme. I did at the same time speak of immigration, and I did say that in those days of great prosperity—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Well, surely my hon. friends are not finding fault with me for pointing that out. I did say that in those days of prosperity, with the proper policy, this country might well be the mecca for the suitable surplus people of the different parts of the earth. I adhere to that position absolutely. Everyone at that time, I think it was 1929—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May 22, 1929.

Mr. MANION: I think at that time everyone in Canada, Mr. Beatty, Sir Henry Thornton, nearly all the business men and most of the politicians, including my hon. friends who were then in power, were taking the attitude that we should bring immigrants to this country. No one then thought that in the following October the world was going to be overtaken by the greatest depression that had ever occurred, and that it was going to continue for four years. I take the attitude now that when the depression is over, when Canada is once more on the upgrade—it is now to my mind, but not back to normal at all—when it is back to normal I believe Canada will require more immigrants. I do not believe that this country with three and a half million square miles, double the whole area of Europe exclusive of Russia, will continue to limit its population to the ten millions in the country at the present time. I believe the time will come when, normal conditions being restored, we will again bring immigrants to this country and be able to absorb them. I do not wish now, especially in the discussion of my hon. colleague's estimates, to get into any debate on this subject, but I desire just to point out, as I did yesterday in Montreal, what is my firm conviction. I mentioned also, without criticizing my hon. friends—because I said everyone at that time advocated bringing in immigrants—that my hon. friends in three years during their regime brought in 436,000 immigrants. They were proceeding in accordance with my belief at that time that we should bring immigrants to this country, because conditions were good. During the last three years, in contrast to the 436,000 brought in by my hon. friends opposite in their last three years, my hon. friend the present Minister of Immigration has allowed in only 60,000, and I think quite rightly; because I entirely agree with those in this house who take the attitude that in times like these when we cannot look after our own Canadian unemployed we should not bring in immigrants. But I get back to where I started, that is, that I believe that when we get back, if ever, to a normal world condition, and Canada is enjoying deserved prosperity, we will once more be a mecca for good types of immigrants from various parts of the world, and will be glad to get a great many of them.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): In rising, sir, to take part in this debate, I have no intention of delivering a speech which might serve, perhaps, in ten years, when the world will have again settled down to normal conditions. Under the present circumstances, we should refuse to participate in the colonization policy of the Empire and not encourage it by contributions to send settlers who would certainly become a burden to this country. The government must be aware that, for the last three years, it has been unable to provide for the needs of our unemployed. It behooves the government to place the little money which remains at the disposal of our fellow-citizens and not contribute to again increase the number of unemployed.

That is why I am opposed to this item of $10,000 to participate in this colonization plan. Members on the government side who hail from Quebec and who have, for the last three years, been criticizing, on hustings, the former regime for having fostered immigration in this country, must have been shocked in learning to-day, in the house, that their friends are ready to foster immigration to Canada, even in these times of depression.

I wish to protest, sir, against the expenditure of $10,000 and I request the government to put into practice what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has been preaching for the last three years: "Canada First." Let us endeavour to first help our fellow-citizens to earn a livelihood and let us leave in their own country those who have not the means to settle in Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise merely to register a protest against a statement made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in dealing with immigration. He said that only seven per cent of the British people are engaged in agriculture, therefore good agriculturists could not very readily be made out of the other ninety-three per cent. I take exception to that statement; some of the best agriculturists that western Canada has produced came from the industrial centres of Great Britain.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River quoted from the famous speech made on May 22, 1929, by the present Minister of Railways, who says that during the years we were in office we brought in 436,000—

Mr. MANION: The last three calendar years, I said.

Mr. VALLANCE: That makes it that much worse. He now asserts that this government has admitted only 60,000. Let us see how that compares with the statement quoted by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. If the farming country is as prosperous as the Prime Minister and some of his followers claim, we should be able to absorb hundreds of thousands of all classes of immigrants from all countries. Even the 436,000 brought in in those three years were not enough; the Minister of Railways thought we should have brought in hundreds of thousands from all countries. How then does he justify his present commendation of this government's position in admitting only 60,000?

Mr. MANION: Simply by world conditions, that is all. I did not criticize the late government for bringing in that number, and I said so; I simply pointed out that they had brought so many in and we had cut the number down to 60,000, giving round figures from memory. As a matter of fact this government has been forced to reduce the number, not because I do not believe every word I said then, but because of world conditions, a depression such as the world never experienced before, and in which we share.

Mr. VALLANCE: All I wish to say is that in May 1929 the present Minister of Railways made that statement. In 1930 he and his colleagues in the present administration went about the country preaching blue ruin, and to-day he is Minister of Railways simply because of that. They spoke of the deplorable conditions existing in Canada, and said that it was not a world condition but peculiarly a Canadian condition; there was no depression in Europe, they said. Why, the depression in Europe was four years old at that time, before it ever struck Canada.

Mr. MANION: I did not discuss the depression in Europe at all. I do not know what my hon. friend is talking about.

Mr. VALLANCE: In 1930 the hon. member said it was peculiarly a Canadian condition.

Mr. BROWN: Due to the policy of the Canadian government.

Mr. MANION: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In every speech he made.

Mr. VALLANCE: It seems so many want to talk to the minister that I am not going to be privileged to say much more. But I just want to put the minister straight on this, that his attitude in May, 1929, was that we should bring in hundreds of thousands of immigrants from all countries.

Mr. MANION: You were doing it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then on the 5th day of March, 1934, he stands up and excuses this government by telling us that we brought in 460,000 immigrants at the very time he was telling us we should have brought in hundreds of thousands more. Now he says, in appreciation of this government, that they brought in only 60,000. I hope that when the government goes to the country, which probably will be this year, his attitude will be different —as I know it will—from his attitude in 1930. They pulled that stunt, to use the vernacular, in 1930, but it cannot be repeated in 1934.

Mr. BROWN: The thing that impressed me in this discussion, after listening to the Minister of Railways and his recognition of the fact that there was a period of great prosperity before this government came into power, no matter who was responsible for it, was my recollection of the vicious, bitter, uncalled for attacks that were made upon the Minister of Immigration of the previous government. I may say to hon. members of the house who are here for the first time that if they have thought sometimes the government opposite have been subjected to severe criticism, they should have sat in this parliament from 1922 to 1930. We all remember the attack made upon the government with regard to the customs department; we all recall the bitter attacks made upon the then Minister of Immigration, and if I am ever disposed, as I sometimes am, to let up on my criticism of the present government, my thoughts go back to the attacks made upon the late Hon. Robert Forke when he was Minister of Immigration. It was not only the private members of the then opposition who attacked him; I cannot forget how the present Prime Minister spoke of the late Hon. Robert Forke as a man who was temperamentally unfitted for the great position which he held. A whole session was devoted by the opposition to attacks upon that gentleman.

Mr. VALLANCE: Just along the line of what my hon. friend has said, on Thursday night I was greatly tempted to rise and recite just what the hon. member for Lisgar has stated the present Prime Minister said across the floor of the house to the then Minister of Immigration; I should have done so had it not been for the esteem in which we all hold the present Minister of National Revenue. We all remember the Prime Minister saying: "Why can you not remember it?" and "Why, Mr. Chairman, what a spectacle; a minister of the crown not able to give the information." We were too kind on Thursday night, in sheer deference to the new Minister of National Revenue, but as the hon. member for Lisgar says, sometimes we get a little warm under the collar when we listen to hon. gentlemen opposite now that they are sitting to the right of the speaker.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I have often heard Canada referred to as the mecca of the workingman, but I have also heard people in this country refer to Russia in the same way. The hon. member for East Hamilton asked with regard to the number of workmen in this country who have asked to be deported to Russia, and I was wondering if that number was very large.

Mr. GORDON: There will be little difficulty in finding that out. While I have not the information before me I can say that we have very great difficulty in returning anyone to Russia because of the passport troubles that I presume are well known to my hon. friend. However, I will secure the information before my estimates are through.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: But are they very anxious to go back? That is what I want to know.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know of any that have expressed themselves in one way or the other.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Minister of Railways said that 60,000 immigrants have been brought to Canada since this government has been in power.

Mr. MANION: No, I did not say that; I said in the last three years, and I was speaking of calendar years.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Very well, but I will take the figure of 60,000. The Minister of Immigration has said that since this government has been in power some 26,000 people have been deported, so in view of that fact would it not be just as well to change the name of this department from immigration to deportaton?

Mr. GORDON: If I might put my hon. friend right, there has been no such number of deportations. I think the number would run closer to 16,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: According to a return tabled by the minister on February 15, the figure is about 26,000, of whom over 13,000 were British subjects. Coming back to General Hornby's scheme, may I say that this man has been going across the country addressing boards of trade, Canadian clubs and other organizations, creating the impression that there is a big scheme under way to bring immigrants to this country. He has caused a great deal of unrest in many localities, and I should like to ask the minister if he does not think it would be advisable for him, as Minister of Immigration, to give to the press a statement pointing out that there is no foundation to this scheme and that this government has not encouraged it in any way. I think it would be a good thing, because it would relieve the erroneous impression that has gone abroad.

Mr. GORDON: What is his scheme?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not know.

Mr. GORDON: Neither do I. Am I to give a statement to the press condemning a scheme when I know nothing about it?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If General Hornby interviewed the minister a couple of times the minister must have some idea of the scheme.

Mr. GORDON: I said he did not have a very clear idea when he saw me.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If he is getting locations of land and so on, surely the department could find out about his scheme.

Mr. ROBINSON: The department is not a police force.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, they have a certain responsibility. To-day thousands of people cannot find work and cannot get enough to eat, but the impression has been going out that under this scheme thousands of immigrants will be brought to Canada to settle in different parts of the country. With all respect I think the minister should issue a statement denying these reports.

Mr. McINTOSH: Did I understand the minister to say that he does not know the Hornby scheme, a British migration movement, that has been discussed with the different provincial governments?

Mr. GORDON: I do not.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

Mr. McINTOSH: I have an outline of the scheme here if the committee would like to hear it; it is very brief. With regard to Prince Edward Island General Hornby says that he has not yet visited that province at the request of the government, but that he intended to do so at the very earliest opportunity after his return to eastern Canada. With regard to Nova Scotia two locations have been selected and the approval of the provincial government has been obtained. In New Brunswick there are two selected locations, and again the approval of the provincial government has been given. In Quebec two locations have been chosen but approval has not been given. In Ontario four locations have been selected, in the counties of Middlesex, Oxford, Brant and Glengarry and Stormont. No approval has been given as yet. In Manitoba two locations have been provisionally accepted, but the approval of the government has not been given. In Saskatchewan the number of locations selected is four. Approval has been given by the Saskatchewan government to those four locations. I understand one of them is at Lashburn, a short distance from North Battleford. In Alberta the number of selections is six; no approval has yet been given, but negotiations are of course going on between General Hornby and the provincial government. In British Columbia the number of locations selected is one; no approval has yet been given.

Then, following these locations in the nine provinces this statement is made in the memorandum broadcast by General Hornby:

> The above mentioned twenty-three settlements, each to consist of one hundred farms are the first instalment of what will undoubtedly become a great overseas migration movement from the old country—a voluntary, spontaneous and continuous movement, involving eventually the establishment of no less than 250 such community settlements, 25,000 farms in all, absorbing at the outset 25,000 new settler families, 125,000 persons, and maintaining an uninterrupted flow of at least 5,000 families, 25,000 persons, to Canada every year. Every county in the United Kingdom, and every town of importance should have its community settlement in Canada, to take care of its selected immigrants.
> For the next few months in Canada our work will be confined to the lining up of the farms to make up the proposed settlement at each of the twenty-three selected locations.

But these are only a forerunner of a large movement which is to take place from year to year after these locations have been definitely settled, approval given by provincial governments and all details worked out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say any more, but may I add simply this: that if the department at Ottawa through the minister has not had this policy of General Hornby presented to it, apparently the federal government is either directly or indirectly linked up with it. For instance, in the memorandum from which I have been reading I find information which I believe the minister should have, and which I am quite pleased to give him. It is as follows:

> For the same reason I welcome the step taken by the federal government in placing the services of the staffs of the land settlement department and the soldier settlement department at the disposal of the provincial governments, for the purpose of making surveys and reports, where required.

There is a definite link up between the Department of Immigration and Colonization of the national government with the colonization departments of the different provincial governments. Consequently I think the headquarters at Ottawa ought to have all the facts and all the details of this policy to give to the house, so that information may be given not only to parliament but to the country.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask the minister if this authority was given to the soldier settlement board, and to the land settlement board?

Mr. GORDON: Officials of the soldier settlement board, who are really the land settlement branch of the immigration department, since we started colonization at home, have been constantly at work endeavouring to tabulate, so far as possible, suitable available lands for colonization. It is a difficult task, because many of these lands are privately owned. I have not had the officials of the department go to the trouble of tabulating these lands in any great detail, because of necessity they change from week to week and from month to month. But if General Hornby or General anybody else wants to go to the department and get all the information they have in matters of this kind, he is at perfect liberty to do so.

I can say only this, that I am amazed at some hon. members going to the length of utter condemnation of British settlement in Canada, because I by no means agree with the view that the right type of British settler would not be a very welcome person in Canada, and I should not like to see the time when he would not be welcome. Remember, there are other schemes constantly affecting and concerning settlement in Canada. We have the community settlements of western Canada, which have grown up in the last fifteen years, and we have other types of settlement, both assisted and unassisted. To the extent that our predecessors in office put forth their activities towards inviting and encouraging the right sort and type of settler to come to Canada, I have no complaint. But I do have a complaint which I shall now register, in case I have not done so before, that when I took over the administration of the Department of Immigration there were permits granted to hon. members on both sides of this chamber, to railway companies, to various agencies of all kinds and characters. Remember, there was not just one man's name on a permit, and information showing where that man's background was investigated, but on one sheet of paper there would be authorization for admission of large numbers and these were sent to Europe and traded in among the steamship lines at so much a head. That is the kind of immigration I condemn and will continue to condemn.

But I commend the late government to the extent that their activities were conducted—and they were in some measure—towards the invitation given to the right type of person to settle in Canada. They are entitled to that commendation, and I have no hesitation in giving it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, having sat in this house since 1921 I find it interesting to listen to this discussion on immigration. Fortunately or unfortunately I happened to be Minister of Immigration at a time somewhat similar to the present. At that time the force and eloquence of the opposition were directed to the desirability of widening the field for immigration, and of the expenditure of more money for that purpose in order to bring in more immigrants. Not only that, but the financial houses in eastern Canada, and the railway companies, were putting up money for the purpose of encouraging people to come to Canada. Sometimes I have been incensed when, sitting in this house, I have listened to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite who, on the occasion to which I have referred, were most vociferous in their declarations that the government was not doing its duty and was not getting more people to come to Canada.

Let me say now, as I said in 1921, that I do not believe the Canadian government should spend a dollar in bringing immigrants into Canada. Any man who is worth his salt and wants to come to Canada could be examined, but we should get away from the idea of inviting people to come to this country.

Mr. GORDON: We are not at the present time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I know you are not at the present time. With one exception I am not complaining about what is happening now. When the minister states that he believes British settlement would be worth while, I agree, but when we listen to the returns to which references were made by the hon. member for Provencher we find that fewer continentals than Britishers were returned. I wish to bring that to the attention of the committee.

Mr. GORDON: I gave the explanation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But I may also direct my hon. friend's attention to the fact that not in this house but outside of it, much of the difficulty experienced in the present day with respect to unemployment was brought about by the uncontrolled flow of immigration into Canada in former times. If it was uncontrolled my hon. friends opposite must take their fair share of the responsibility because there was only one group in this house, which sat in the far corner to my left, which from the day it entered the house consistently up until this moment opposed immigration into Canada. The Conservative party, on the other hand, backed by the financial interests of eastern Canada and the transportation interests, were continually driving any government and any minister who would listen to them into unlimited immigration. It was the only way in which we could pay our public debt; that was the argument, but unfortunately these immigrants, and it is no reflection upon them to say so, have become a burden to us to-day rather than a help in paying our public debt. This is not the first time that ministers have had to sit back and take a castigation over immigration, not by a long shot, and a castigation from the very gentlemen who now seek to adopt a defensive attitude. It is just as well that they be reminded of this once in a while because I had to take my share when hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting over here. I sat for four days where the Minister of Immigration is now sitting, listening to sixty-five members in the far left corner of the house demanding that the immigration estimates be cut in two if not abolished altogether, because we had no place in Canada for immigrants, while from the Conservative benches in this house, then the opposition, there was a most vociferous demand for increased immigration all along the line. I need only remind hon. gentlemen opposite that as late as 1927 or 1928 the then member for Vancouver, now Senator McRae, propounded a scheme to the house which if it had been put into effect would only have added to our present difficulties. So I say that hon. gentlemen opposite are not warranted in the criticism which they are levelling against the government that preceded them in office. True, the late Hon. Mr. Forke when Minister of Immigration entered into agreements with the railway companies to bring people to this country, but it was done upon the insistent demand of hon. gentlemen opposite then sitting on this side of the house, and various organizations throughout the country, churches and everybody else, were behind that demand. Now we are all agreed that that policy was a mistake; for we have a very serious state of affairs in this country. The present difficult position in which we find ourselves is not by any means due entirely to immigration, because in comparison with the number of people in Canada our immigration during the last eight or ten years did not amount to very much. I shall have something to say later, Mr. Chairman, as to other causes for our present conditions, but this is not the time or place to enter into such a discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I happened to be in the House of Commons when the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) was Minister of Immigration, and I remember the debates to which he has made reference. I challenge him to say that at any time the official Conservative opposition of that day ever advocated uncontrolled immigration into this country.

Mr. VALLANCE: As late as 1929.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not uncontrolled; we urged selected immigration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What about General McRae's scheme?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): His scheme was never crystallized in the form of resolutions, and was never the policy of the Conservative opposition. As to the criticism of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) he himself never had any concrete policy on immigration. I remember him standing in his place in this row and making a speech, seven hours in length, if I recollect aright, and when he got through no one knew what his policy was, not even himself, and I leave it to my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) if I am not right.

Mr. POWER: He must have been a good man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The trouble was that the government had no well formulated plan in those days, and they were bringing in people who did not stay here. We had the spectacle in this country of one million Canadians leaving Canada under the regime of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and they brought in about as many immigrants from continental Europe.

Mr. DUFF: The only reason they do not leave now is that they cannot get out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be too bad if it deprived my hon. friend of any assistance. My reply to the hon. gentleman who has been scolding the minister is this, that when he was Minister of Immigration his government spent all kinds of money to bring people into Canada, and then by a policy of attrition, wearing down the industries of this country, they drove out the immigrants they had brought in, or drove out our own people, and Canada lost just that many. Through the policy or lack of policy on the part of the late government we lost millions of Canadians whom we shall never replace.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are getting them back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. Some of them will never come back. We also had a lot of southern Europeans brought into this country who never should have been brought in.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We are feeding over one million people in this country through the policies of this government.

Mr. GORDON: There seems to be some difference of opinion whether this item should pass or not, and so, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the item stand.

Mr. DUFF: I think you had better.

Mr. GORDON: Your suggestion is not helpful.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In view of the discussion that has taken place we will let item 52 stand and take up item 160.

For administration of the Explosives Act (chap. 62, R.S., 1927), $7,000.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister was willing that I ask a final question, but if he thinks it will take too long now I am content to abide by his decision and await a subsequent opportunity.

Mr. GORDON: There will be ample opportunity.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is quite a reduction here. Is it due to the inspection by the mounted police?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Administration, $318,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How is the reduction accounted for?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): We try as far as we can to have the officers moved around as little as possible, thus saving in travelling expenses.

Mr. REID: How many camps are under the jurisdiction of the department in British Columbia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That would not come under this item.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the minister classify this item into the various units that comprise it, so that it will be a little more intelligible?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This vote is for pay, allowances, transport and travelling expenses of militia officers holding staff appointments; that is, the staff appointments at Ottawa and in the various military districts which exist in every province of Canada.

Mr. SANDERSON: This is the permanent force.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How long are we going to keep up these military districts with all this paraphernalia in every province? They were there when we were in power, but they were being gradually reduced. I do not think we are confronted with a war in Canada. There is of course a good deal of war material to be housed and that has to be taken care of. But are we going on indefinitely with all this business of war preparations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These are the key men who run the whole institution, and they have to be prepared to instruct and administer the whole militia force. There is no increase in them. It has been generally felt by every government since we have had a country at all that we must have a military force, and so long as we have a military force we must have a head and a staff to administer it. The general vote has been cut down in the last few years from something like $22,000,000 to about $12,000,000, but that has been in the non-permanent militia and in the buying of supplies, and matters of that sort. We must however keep the administrative divisions ready and capable at all times.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We had all these military districts before the war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We had all the military districts as at present except Regina. During the war one was formed at Regina, and one was also formed at St. John.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are any of the officers who come under this vote used as supervisors of relief camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: What proportion of this is for Saskatchewan?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is a certain amount of it for the headquarters in Saskatchewan. At Regina there is a district officer commanding who is paid out of this vote, the general staff officer and the assistants and the quartermaster general.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the amount, approximately?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The amount is $15,476.

An hon. MEMBER: Does this include the non-permanent personnel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is there any increase or decrease in the personnel?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is practically no increase in the permanent force. We are estimating in another vote, in the permanent force vote, for about thirty or forty less than last year.

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to join with the hon. member for Melville in objecting to this vote. We have a reduction of $170,000 in the money being voted for militia purposes whereas there is a total reduction of over $800,000 in the estimates for agriculture. I object to this vote. I am one of those who cannot see why, in times like these, we should not reduce this vote for military purposes. When you live in a district where the people are living from hand to mouth, where a man is given $9 to buy clothing to last him the whole year—boots and shoes, overshoes, underwear, overalls, socks, and everything else—you can readily realize how absolutely ridiculous a vote of this kind is. It is absurd for us to be voting money for military purposes while being so penurious in the matter of expenditures for the relief of people who are in dire necessity. I wish to register my vote against this whole item.

Mr. POWER: Are any of the officers covered by this vote employed in looking after relief camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. There are no officers particularly engaged in that. Of course, those in the department may have something to do with it, but they are not in charge of the camps.

Mr. POWER: Some officers of the permanent force have been placed in charge of camps.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, but not in this administration vote.

Mr. POWER: Are they getting extra pay?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no one in this vote getting extra pay. At Lac Seul a couple of permanent force officers get extra allowance while there—about $90.

Mr. POWER: What about Valcartier?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot be sure about Valcartier. When we come to that I will have the information.

Mr. McINTOSH: Would the minister give the approximate amounts that will accrue under this vote for each of the three western provinces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For Regina I gave the amount, $15,476; for Calgary, $15,731, and for Winnipeg, $17,812.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For Victoria?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The amount is $14,162.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Lighthouse and Coast Service—Amount required to pay compassionate allowance to John Davidson, formerly lightkeeper at Cape Mudge, B.C., $500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it the intention of the minister to begin the estimates of all the departments to-night?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I think this is the last one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There were three mentioned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the third.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is about the fifth.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $6,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is this another department?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is fisheries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend has brought down two more departments than were agreed on the other day.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, if there is any objection—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We certainly object.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to say to the Minister of Justice that if we go into all these departments, the government will be relieved of the necessity of moving for committee of supply on any day other than Thursday and Friday, and he can have committee of supply on Thursdays and Fridays automatically, thus depriving members of the opportunity of bringing before the government any matters which they want to discuss before the end of the session. For that reason I do not think the government should ask us to open any more departments.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then we shall return to one already introduced.

Item stands.

MINES AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

Geological Survey—
For explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others, $83,500.
For publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc., $65,000.
For maintenance of offices and museum, expenses of special exhibitions pertaining to natural resources, purchase of instruments, chemicals, books of reference, miscellaneous assistance and contingencies, and expenses of the Geographic Board of Canada, $70,202.
For museum equipment, $5,000.
For purchase of specimens, $300—Total, $224,002.

Mr. POWER: There was no mention of our taking up the estimates of the Department of Mines.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, we are in it.

Mr. COOTE: Where are the surveys to be carried on this year under the first item:

For exploration, surveys and investigations: wages of explorers, topographers and others.

I am given to understand unofficially that very little work is going on.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): It is unfortunate, but the number of survey parties had to be reduced very materially because economies had to be made. The parties for this year's operations and the places where they will go have not yet been finally determined and probably will not be for three weeks or a month. Officials of the department and I have been as careful as we can to see that the parties are so arranged that there will be no interruption in the continuity of the geological survey work. Of course I am hopeful, as I am sure every member is, that the time will not be too long delayed when additional parties over and above those that are now being sent out will go out as times improve. Arrangements for the work of the summer have not yet been perfected.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How have the survey parties been allocated? By provinces?

Mr. GORDON: In the past the parties have been allocated not according to provinces, that is by reason of any demand or pressure from them, but purely to make a continuous projection of geological work. Of course my hon. friend knows that the geological surveys of Canada were started officially in 1842 and have proceeded from that time on, having regard to those areas where it would seem that the projection of geological surveys would result in the greatest good; but they have not been allocated to provinces as such. There is one province, I think, British Columbia, where according to statute these surveys must be carried on. But the arrangement made is: first, to see that the continuity of the geological survey is not disturbed; second, to see that the geological surveys are carried on where they will disclose the best areas for prospecting and so forth, and, third, to arrange with those provinces which have provincial geological surveys so that our work does not overlap theirs. That practice was pursued by the hon. member for West Edmonton and it is a very proper one.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is an increase of $15,000 in the second item:

For publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc.

Will the minister explain that?

Mr. GORDON: We found that there was a large number of geological reports that for various reasons had not been published at the time the geologists went into the field. Some of them were delayed a considerable length of time. That, together with the necessity for providing for salaries for some staff that had been transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Mines, and who before they were released from the Department of the Interior had been mainly engaged upon work for the Department of Mines, accounts for the increase in that item.

Mr. SANDERSON: Perhaps I did not hear the minister correctly. Are salaries included in this increase of $15,000?

Mr. GORDON: I find I was mistaken in regard to that item. The increase for publications is for the publication of a book known as the Birds of Canada. Let me explain that to hon. members so that we shall not get into a difference of opinion as to the desirability of this publication. Judging from the number of applications we have in the department for this book, from schools and other educational institutions, this money will be repaid in a very short time. I have no doubt that it will cost the country nothing, and it is indeed a very valuable work. The plates are all ready and have been for some time, and I believe it is desirable to proceed with the publication of the work.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a matter of fact you are always short, are you not, in your estimates for publications? I should imagine it would be worse than ever now owing to the activity of mining.

Mr. GORDON: It is difficult to balance the cost of publications with the revenue received, but we are doing our best to have them balance. This, I believe, is one item that will balance.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very glad to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister upon what he has just said. That publication on birds is very good; it is sold at a reasonable price. It is very commendable for several reasons, and should be widely distributed. It should be used for presentation as prizes in schools.

Has the hon. minister any objection to our taking at the same time item 161 of the same department? Items 161 and 162 are closely related; one is for the mines branch and the other for the geological survey. In vote 162 there is an item for purchase of specimens; if I understand correctly it is for the purchase of specimens of minerals, therefore it would not be out of place to discuss both items together. Would the minister be kind enough to tell the committee whether the last year for which the value of mineral production is available is the year 1932, and if we cannot get now the value of production for the year 1933?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the hon. member can get from reliable sources, the production of minerals throughout Canada for the year 1933, and I think, even up to the end of last month. While the department may not have those figures, they are available generally to the industry. They are kept pretty well up to date by many publications in Canada and by the department. If the hon. member would like to have a record of the mineral production of Canada up to the end of 1933 I shall be very glad to let him have it.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. minister. I got some information from the bureau of statistics but it was only for the years 1930, 1931 and 1932. I will ask the minister if the value of production of metals, including gold, and the value of non-ferrous metal products, increased or decreased in 1932 as compared with 1930, and how much.

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures available at the moment, but if the hon. member has any difficulty in getting them I can either furnish them before the estimates for this department are concluded or give them to him personally.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman very much, and as he cannot give it to the committee right now I will give it myself. The decrease in the value of production of metals including gold, and of non-ferrous metal products for 1932 as compared with 1930, is $108,691,098. Why have we a decrease in the value of those minerals? Now that the minister has the figure it will be easy for him to tell the committee. At the same time I will ask what minerals are included in that list.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know what the hon. member is reading from. It may be a speech of the Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT: I am reading from page 635 of Hansard.

Mr. GORDON: There are many factors that affect the value of mineral production. One would be the very low prices for copper, lead and zinc. My hon. friend knows that copper, for instance, dropped from 24 cents to less than 4 cents per pound, and while in lead and zinc the reduction was not so marked yet there was a very great contraction in the price of those metals. Gold, on the other hand, increased in world price. As I said a moment ago, it could scarcely in fairness be anticipated that I would have available on short notice the figures asked for, but I will have them before these estimates are passed.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman, and I ask him if he would be kind enough to tell the house if that decrease in value of production means a decrease in labour employed, and if so, how many miners have been put out of work on account of it? That is one question. Then I would ask if the exports of the minerals I have mentioned have been larger in quantity although smaller in value?

Mr. GORDON: I think the hon. gentleman will have to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce for those figures; or if he would wish that I get them for him I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Now we will take another classification of minerals in the same item:

Value of non-metallic minerals and structural materials production; and value of non-metallic mineral products, except glass.

This is a description which comes from the bureau of statistics; what are the non-metallic minerals and structural materials? If the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to give that information I would be thankful.

Mr. GORDON: It is quite obvious that the figures requested by the hon. gentleman come within the purview of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Of course there are parts of the interrogation that I can answer, with respect to structural material, that is brick, building stone and things of that character, the investigation of which falls within the purview of the Mines department. The marketing of these materials, how much is exported and imported, and the values and so on do not come within the activities of the Mines department.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that asbestos is included in the non-metallic minerals. The minister has said that these figures come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I must tell him that I obtained these figures from the bureau of statistics, but they came from the Department of Mines; they were certified by one of the employees who comes directly under the jurisdiction of the hon. gentleman. Therefore I will ask him with regard to the value of non-metallic minerals, structural materials and so on. What was the value of the production of these minerals in 1932 as compared with 1930; is there a decrease or an increase and, if so, why? I see the hon. gentleman is not going to answer.

Mr. GORDON: Oh, yes; I will answer. The statistics the Mines department has concerning the production, the values, the imports and exports of these materials were procured from the bureau of statistics. I cannot follow the hon. member for Témiscouata when he says that the bureau base their figures on certifications from the Mines department. There may be something of which we have some special knowledge but generally, and I think entirely, we rely upon the bureau if we need statistics of that character.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman, but I may tell him how I proceed when I want statistics. I do not write to any particular employee of the bureau; I write to the Dominion Statistician who refers my letter to some of his officials. When we ask questions about different departments we receive answers certified by different people. In this instance the report on the value of the mineral production of Canada was certified by a gentleman whose name I have not here but who signed as chief of the mines branch. Perhaps it was the mines branch of the bureau of statistics, but I was induced to believe that he was under the jurisdiction of the hon. gentleman.

At all events we have a Department of Mines. The minister is very genial, but this question of minerals is of the utmost importance to Canada. Here we have the products of the land, of the sea and of the mines, and we cannot neglect any of them. I do not insist on an answer with regard to these figures, but I will put them on Hansard so that each member may draw his own conclusions. In 1932 the value of production of non-metallic minerals and structural materials except glass was $203,599,158. In 1930 the value was $307,710,915, showing a decrease in 1932 of $104,151,757, which means that the people engaged in cutting stone, in quarrying, in the mine shafts and so on have suffered a great loss. I agree that these matters could be discussed under the items of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but they come mainly under the estimates of my hon. friend. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has general supervision over the trade of this country, but these matters are of particular interest to the house at the present time. In the same way this afternoon we discussed the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

There is still another item which is of the utmost importance. I refer to the value of glass production, including pressed and blown glass and the bevelling, cutting and so on of plate glass. In 1932 the value of this production was $8,469,895 as compared with $12,191,752 in 1930, or a decrease of $3,721,857. For that small industry such a reduction represents a panic. In the same category we find the value of chemical production; in 1930 this amounted to $119,969,637, while in 1932 it had dropped to $95,279,376, or a decrease of $24,690,261. What about the home market? Prices are falling all the time, and with these figures it is easy to see why so many miners are unemployed.

Another important item is iron and steel and their products; this is a very large Canadian industry. We have the British Empire Steel Corporation in Cape Breton, the Algoma Steel Corporation in Ontario and other large plants, and this is a matter of interest in many provinces. In 1932 the value of this production was $226,205,543, while in 1930 it was $569,745,973, a decrease in 1932 of $343,540,432. The total decrease in the value of the production of the articles I have mentioned is $584,795,205. It is almost inconceivable that mineral production has decreased by over $584,000,000. My hon. friends opposite can check my figures, because they may be found at page 635 of Hansard. I reecived them from the government, either the Department of Mines or the Department of Trade and Commerce, through the bureau of statistics.

Mr. GORDON: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he refer to primary production or to manufactured articles?

Mr. POULIOT: The information is not detailed. I shall take the liberty of asking the minister to give me some explanation in that connection. I am ready to hear him, if he is kind enough to speak, because I asked about the value of mineral production and I received an answer about the value of iron and steel products. The last line of the information contains this expression, "decrease, $343,540,432." If this figure concerns primary industry, all right, but I wish to know. I do not say it is all right because I am satisfied with it; I am very sorry about it, and I am sure the hon. gentleman himself is very sorry. I should like to know from him if these figures relate to primary products or to manufactured products.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. GORDON: The items we have under review at the moment have nothing whatever to do with the sale of mineral, precious or otherwise, but have to do, purely, with the scientific investigations of the Mines department, which deal with ore dressing, metallurgy and geological surveys, which are self-explanatory. Although I have no figures, nor has my department the figures to which the hon. member for Temiscouata has addressed himself, I would say that the larger figure would cover the manufactured article. While I do know the hon. member is deeply concerned with the possibility of miners being out of work, the fact is that with the exception of certain places connected with the coal mining industry of Canada, miners are not out of work. In fact, in a number of places it is very difficult to obtain the services of experienced miners who can carry on the work in the rapidly expanding precious metal mining operations of Canada. I can but repeat that it is not the function of the Department of Mines to collect and tabulate the figures to which the hon. gentleman has referred. That is a matter for the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have no doubt those figures could quite easily be determined, and if I can be of any assistance to the hon. member in getting them together I should be very glad to do so. As far as these items are concerned the Department of Mines does not engage in the sale of or advertise for the sale of the minerals, but does try to solve under the first item, the metallurgical problems with which miners are met; under the second item, the projection of geological surveys, in order that they may reach the hands of the prospectors and the mining fraternity generally, and the publication of reports. I am not prepared to go into the figures to which the hon. member has made reference, because they do not come within the compass of the activities of the Department of Mines.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. member for his courtesy. I shall not insist, therefore, but will take advantage of his generous offer to supply me with more information. I have approached the matter with an open mind, and shall be thankful to him if he is kind enough to assist me in obtaining the desired information.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister one or two questions in connection with the vote now before the committee concerning geological surveys, and particularly about those surveys in British Columbia. There may be a general decline in the value of minerals produced throughout Canada, but I have the honour to represent a district in which there is a very substantial increase in the amount of minerals being produced, and a section in which there is intense activity. In addition to that I wish to remind the minister that by statute the federal government is obliged to take charge of all the geological work there may be in British Columbia. I regret very much that conditions are such that it has been found necessary to reduce this vote, as I consider it one of the most important in the estimates now before us, so far as British Columbia is concerned. I should like to ask the minister if it is not possible to continue the geological surveys in that part of British Columbia particularly where there is intense activity in the search for gold. I refer to the Cariboo and Bridge River areas, both of which are very active and in which a great many people are looking for minerals. Each man seeking minerals needs geological information. The department sent one small party into the Cariboo district last year. I assume their work has been valuable and will be available for miners next summer. I should like to be assured that there will be no suspension of that particular work in the current year.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask if there is any possibility of proceeding with a resurvey of the Nicola coal mines area. I have been asked by the Merritt board of trade to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and should like to have some assurance from him that the work will be continued.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I notice, with considerable grief, that the first portion of item 162, "for explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others" has been reduced by about $44,000. I am one who believes that at this particular time the natural resources of Canada should be developed to their utmost. I understand, know and appreciate that the government is labouring under difficult conditions, but I should like to know from the minister whether or not there is any possibility of maintaining those wonderful surveys and investigations of explorers which come under his jurisdiction. It has been my great privilege to come into intimate contact with the topographical surveys, the geological surveys, the hydrographic surveys, the aerial surveys and those of the militia department and others. The people connected with this work have carried out most worthily the difficult tasks allotted to them. I take the greatest pleasure in reading the maps produced by these various branches, and from the reading of them I believe I profit more than I would from the reading of an ordinary novel. I want the minister to be impressed with the fact that at this time nothing should be done to curtail in any way the splendid work that these various branches of government activity have been carrying on. I should like to ask the minister why the expenditure under the item has been reduced, and what one may expect in the way of reduction in efficiency of the work of these various branches of surveying activity which, up to the present, has been carried on so efficiently.

Mr. GORDON: Answering the question and observations of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser), it is quite true that under the statutes the Dominion government has certain obligations with respect to carrying on geological work in British Columbia. I am not entirely unacquainted with the mineral industry of this country, and it would not need the impulse of statutory enactment to move me towards doing everything possible to supply what money is necessary in order to advance the interests of that great industry. I had in mind with respect to British Columbia, although it has not been definitely decided upon, as I pointed out a while ago, the placing of parties this summer at Bridge river, Cariboo, Kamloops, North Vancouver island and at Finlay river. That program may be subject to some change when the work of the coming summer is finally decided upon.

With respect to the questions put by the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) I would be the last one to disturb the very efficient staff that has been built up through the years in the geological survey. This reduction in the vote will not in any way interfere with that staff, but rather the parties in the field will be cut down and some of the staff who perhaps have not been engaged in actual field work will be used in that work this summer. That will have to be determined, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that the reduction will not affect the permanent staff here to which he has made reference. The reduction in the number of geological parties I trust will not continue during the years that follow, but confronted as this country is with very serious financial problems I have found a great willingness in the mineral industry, represented as it is by so many men active in carrying on that great work, to have economies made at this time, temporary—it is true, in order to relieve the taxpayer and the treasury to as large an extent as possible. I have had the matter up on a number of occasions with the representatives of the mineral industry, and they seemed to be quite in accord with the efforts we are putting forward to exercise the greatest possible economy without injuring seriously the efficiency of the geological survey.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. COOTE: These are false economies, in my opinion—

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the consent of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), may I say, Mr. Chairman, that I regret in the discussion of these estimates that everybody gets up and asks a question out of tune and out of time so that it is impossible for an hon. member to get his questions and answers on the record in any intelligible way. I have sat here listening with interest to the discussion, and if my hon. friend from Macleod will allow me sufficient time to ask a question or two I shall be satisfied to sit down. I think it would help if hon. members would follow that practice for the sake of the record.

I wanted to ask the minister a question with regard to the next item, No. 162, for the publication of French and English editions of the reports, maps and illustrations. I notice that there is an increase of $15,000 in this item. Does that mean that there will be an increased publication in French? I gathered that the minister said a few moments ago that there was an increase in certain items because of certain publications. If the minister will increase items of this kind by fifty or sixty or seventy thousand dollars I shall have no objection to voting the money, provided that such publications as the one I hold in my hand, Les Oiseaux de l'est du Canada—The Birds of Eastern Canada—by Doctor Taverner, be translated into French and distributed. I think that such reports and a report on the birds of western Canada should be translated into French, as well as various reports on the geological deposits in Canada, and if that were done I should have no objection to voting a larger amount than this, provided that the minister give us the assurance that the reports from the Mines branch will be put out to the public in French within a reasonable time. I know that the French calls for two operations and the English only one, but if the reports were published more nearly concurrently in French and English, I should be glad to vote any amount of money. It has been my privilege to see and to appreciate the work of the translation into French of some of the technical reports from the Mines branch, and I mention the Mines branch at this moment because only the estimates of that branch are under consideration at the moment. I have in mind some reports of 250 and 350 pages, for instance, the report on the Rouyn district, which has been translated into French. It is astonishing to me that these reports are not more widely distributed amongst the colleges, universities and institutions of learning in Canada. I think the government, and I have said this on a number of other occasions, should take steps to see that these technical publications, on which such a tremendous amount of money is spent, and properly spent, are put into the hands of the proper educational institutions. I have in mind, if I am in order in mentioning it, a pamphlet published by the Department of Agriculture last year on beef and its uses, and the ways of cutting it. I distributed over six hundred copies of that pamphlet in the educational institutions of this city. We pay a tremendous amount of money for the compilation of these reports and a tremendous amount of money for their translation, and then unfortunately there is no activity shown in distributing them so that they may serve the purpose for which they are prepared. I have no hesitation in approving of this increase of $15,000 if the minister will say that it will mean an easier distribution of the publications in English and French of the editions of reports, maps, illustrations and so on, and that something will be done with a view to further distributing these educational reports among our institutions of learning.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think that anyone will disagree with the observations that have been made by the senior member for Ottawa. This increase will take care of that work, covering the birds of both eastern and western Canada, and will also take care of an appropriate number of reports in the French language. In the department there has been built up, over a great number of years, a mailing list that covers universities, colleges and libraries of all kinds, and reports that would seem to be suitable to these institutions are mailed to them. With respect to the publication of reports in the French language, that is now being done, not in its entirety it is true, because there are many reports in which, as I think the hon. member for Ottawa will agree on reflection, very few people in the province of Quebec would be interested; but those reports generally in which, in the opinion of the officers of the department and of myself, the people in that province, or in other French speaking parts of Canada, would be interested, are published in French. Take for instance the expansion in northeastern Quebec; the reports in that connection are printed in both English and French. I do not think however that the interest which would be taken in the province of Quebec in some other reports would really justify their publication in French. Certainly reports are now and have been for some time published in the French language, wherever, in the opinion of the department, they would usefully serve French speaking Canada. That practice, I think, is a proper one.

Mr. COOTE: I understand the minister to say, replying to the hon. member for Cariboo, that the first item here for geological explorations, surveys and investigations had been reduced by $44,000 because it was the desire of the government to effect economy. But the previous vote which the committee passed, for administration under national defence, was reduced by one per cent whereas, in this geological surveys vote, the reduction of $44,000 is equivalent to a 35 per cent cut, as compared with the amount voted last year.

I suggest that this is the wrong place to practice economy. It is false economy, at a time like this, to cut down the amount spent on geological surveys. The object of these survey parties is to explore new areas particularly for the purpose of discovering any minerals that exist therein, and I believe that this offers at the present time some hope for employment in new industries. I think we should encourage the opening up of new mineral areas in Canada.

I would express my appreciation of the service I have received from the geological surveys branch on different occasions; but this year when I inquired for certain maps of districts in the northwest territories I was informed that no surveys had yet been made of some of those districts. I think the government might very well increase rather than decrease the vote for surveys, particularly in that territory. Some new gold fields might be found, and the production of gold in Canada would help us to discharge the foreign debt which worries us so much.

Will the minister tell me how this vote of $83,000 compares with the same vote for the last four or five years? Is not this a steady cutting-down of the amount spent on geological surveys, and after all is it not false economy? In what better way could the government spend money now than in opening up new mineral areas in Canada? Are there not districts in the Northwest Territories, where metals are now being discovered, in which the department has not yet made regular surveys and issued maps of the districts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, in order to carry out the arrangement made on Friday night, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Chevrier.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this measure known as the "Bureau for Translations Act" is submitted for our consideration, under the plea of economy and efficiency. The speeches, however, to which we have listened, proved that economy and efficiency were not at stake in this bill. Experience has shown that this system had been tried in other countries and found wanting.

I shall not, this evening, attempt to repeat the arguments presented to the house against this bill. I shall discuss another aspect of the question. Relying on my experience as a parliamentarian of long standing, may I state that it is an easy matter for me to observe, at present, that all conservative regimes when they apprehend that their end is near, always resort, before going out of office, to a reorganization scheme of this nature. Is it, this year as in the past, a sign of approaching elections? We expect so. Once, in the past, it was the civil service reorganization. As ever, with economy and efficiency of the service as their aim, the Civil Service Commission sprung up. This institution, as all know, is a great drag on the country and its mechanism has had an entire different result from the one expected. I had often the occasion of expressing my views on this institution and its effects. I shall, this evening, summarize my thoughts in this respect by stating again that it is an institution in which political influence, by indirect means, has its elbow-room and, in which the staff is recruited mostly on the grounds of friendship, relationship and sometimes loveship. Owing to this institution, the representatives of the people have seen their prerogatives decrease and have been so checked that they can hardly be of service to those that have given them a mandate.

I am aware, and I have heard it stated, recently, in the house, that the question of patronage is held in horror by certain members. They prefer not to be pestered by people who seek privileges, positions or a service. However, after all, I think it is incumbent on a member, owing to his mandate, to look after legitimate requests and claims of those who have entrusted him with this mandate. And the fact of replying that what they request is entirely out of his hands, that it is within the purview of an independent institution, which has the authority over their request or desire, cannot possibly satisfy those interested. The representative who wishes to fulfil his duty, in my opinion, can not be satisfied with the part he plays.

Later on, always on the eve of an election, we had the Young classification, which had very little results; then came the Griffenhagen reorganization. If we question, always from an efficient and economic viewpoint, the people, especially the French Canadians of Ottawa, we find that the latter always lost many of their rights.

Now, so far as efficiency, after these thorough reorganizations, it certainly has not improved since the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), discovered in the course of his numerous travels, stacks of French publications valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars which were not distributed. It is admitted that the only and unique reason was that these bundles of publications were out of date, issued at a time when no one required them, because the English version had been issued long before, and, therefore, the French version had become useless. Consequently, no efficiency resulted from such an organization, and we have every reason to believe that such a departure, this year, will have the same result.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Are you censuring the hon. member for Labelle?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): If the hon. member will kindly let me proceed, he will be in a position to know whether I am censuring him or not.

The hon. member for Labelle is supporting the measure. He quotes figures which are not official but confidential, and he endeavours to prove that the translators do not earn their salaries, besides being the cause of all the evil inherent to the questions relating to French in our parliament.

May I, sir, express a totally opposite view. First, the figures he quoted are not official, therefore they are difficult to contradict since they are confidential. On the other hand, we are obliged to take them for what they are worth. They are not official, since the hon. Secretary of State stated, replying to a question put by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St. Père) that these figures were not issued by his department or by himself, directly or indirectly. The following are the figures quoted by the hon. member for Labelle. I think we must take the word of the hon. Secretary of State in his reply to the hon. member for Hochelaga. First, if he had in his department translators unemployed, he would certainly be aware of it. If there were work to be done in his department, as one who attends to his duties, as we all know, he would certainly have given out the work to these unemployed officials. We are aware, on both sides of the house, that the hon. Secretary of State has certain work of his department done by outsiders. If there were translators unemployed in his department he would, first, utilize them instead of giving out the work.

In quoting these confidential figures, the hon. member for Labelle stated that in the Department of Agriculture seven translators, in the course of a year, had translated but 568 pages each; in the Immigration department, two translators had only translated, in the same period, 46 pages each; in the Public Works department, three translators had only translated 108 pages; in the Mines department, three other translators 148, and in the Trade and Commerce, four translators 1,719. Dealing with the unreliability—may I say—of the figures quoted by the hon. member for Labelle—because it is inconceivable that a man, in the course of a year's work, succeeded, without dying of languor, in translating only 46 pages—dealing with the unlikelihood of such figures, I took the pains to obtain a confidential, not official list, of the departments of Agriculture, Immigration, Public Works, Mines and Trade and Commerce, and what is very strange, the information obtained greatly differs from that of the hon. member for Labelle. For instance, in the Agriculture department, seven translators translated 742 pages, each; in the Immigration, instead of 46 pages, the two translators had to their credit 568 pages and, in the Public Works department, three translators, 715 pages. In the Mines department, where the work is exceedingly difficult owing to the technical subjects, the three translators translated 572 pages. In the Trade and Commerce department, instead of 1,700 and a few pages, there were 1,425 pages of similar schedule work.

Seeing that our figures differ entirely, it would be interesting to have the hon. Secretary of State appoint a committee of members, so that those interested could give evidence as to the amount of work they have accomplished during the period mentioned, and, thereby discover whether in the figures they quote the hon. member for Labelle is nearer to the truth than the hon. member for St. Mary's. This procedure would entail no delay and permit the house to give, perhaps, a more intelligent vote on this bill. Another important point, as the interested parties have not been heard, this committee would afford them an opportunity—which would be highly appreciated—of defending themselves against those who insult them and proving their gratitude to those who wish to do them justice.

According to the statement of the hon. member for Labelle, the stenographers of the House of Commons should be placed in the same class.

One must have very little knowledge of what takes place in the house to make such a statement. Both sides of the house are aware that to find a qualified French stenographer, the Civil Service Commission held a number of tests and that all of them, without exception proved a failure, owing to the difficulty of obtaining qualified men. I may even state that a number of official court stenographers, those who take down court evidence, have failed when put to the test, here. Disheartened, after a few days of trial, they were forced to return home and take up their work in the courts, where their remuneration is higher than that received at present, by the Hansard stenographers of the house. Yet, we heard an hon. member state in the house that the government is at liberty to dictate whatever terms they please to stenographers of the house. I state that if the Civil Service Commission, after a number of tests, were unable to find one qualified person, the government is not at liberty to dictate whatever terms they please to these officials.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Now, sir, may I somewhat discuss the question of the translators of the House of Commons, with whom I have the pleasure of being better acquainted than with the others. I had, personally, the opportunity on numerous occasions, since I am in parliament, to see them at their work, translating technical subjects which I had brought up in the house, such, for instances, electrifying our railways, occupational or trade disability, tuberculous cattle, the question of fruit and vegetable sprinkling, and the regulations which govern this trade abroad. All these subjects embody numerous formulas of industrial, organic and inorganic chemistry, etc., and I am able to state to the house that their work, in so difficult a field, which obliged them at times not only to show much patience, but also to make researches devoid of any interest, was perfect, and I wish to bear witness of my appreciation.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): May I, sir, in support of my contention, borrow one of the arguments of the hon. member for Labelle. This may seem somewhat paradoxical since he made use of it to prove quite the opposite. The argument of the hon. member for Labelle is as follows: He was obliged, at times, to pause two hours in searching for the exact term which would express his thought. I am willing to believe him, although I confess that it must have been an extraordinary thought, for, in the natural course of events,

> Ce que l'on conçoit bien s'énonce clairement,
> Et les mots pour le dire arrivent aisément.

At all events, if it took him two hours to translate his thought, what merit must the translators of the house have when they must translate the thoughts of others, which is much more difficult! What merit must these men have? That is why I think that his argument may be retorted. If it be so deserving of praise to be a translator, why then criticize the translators, especially those of the House of Commons.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): When the thought is not there, it cannot be translated!

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Perhaps, I admit.

I have been, sir, a general practitioner for thirty years—and when called upon between sessions, I still carry on—and I have had the opportunity of treating, among my clients, workers in various occupations; industrial workers, printers and hand labourers. In my career as a medical man, I observed that although they are all workers, there are, among them, people who are entitled, in all fairness, to higher salaries than those of their neighbour. To illustrate somewhat my argument, may I take, for instance, the printer who constantly comes in contact with antimony salts and who is compelled to retire at 45 years old; because his sight is defective. This man whose eyesight is affected at such an early age is entitled to a higher salary than the one who can earn a livelihood up to 60 or 70 years old. The same applies to polishers of copper and various metals. I now come, sir, to the brain worker who is obliged to accomplish his work at continuous high tension. It is unfair to wish to relegate him with his colleagues in offices so as to exact from him, during 12 months, mercenary work, with a decreased salary. I entirely disagree with such views. We have witnessed in our educational institutions, in our colleges and universities, students whose health has been ruined by over work, men hardly having reached ripe age, become sometimes the victims of this brain overwork. I think there is, at present, legislation being enacted which will force a class of workers, who are worthy of all our sympathy and who certainly earn their salaries to adopt this manner of living. We have no right to enforce such legislation.

I intend to vote against this measure, because, in my opinion, economy no more than efficiency are at stake. I am rather inclined to think that it is a sign of an approaching election, that the present administration, already on its last leg, wish to erect themselves a small monument to remind us of its regime, in case they were refused a return ticket at the next election.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It must then be a popular measure?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): This has no resemblance whatever to a measure.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Previous to closing my remarks, sir, may I quote an excerpt from the speech of the hon. member for Labelle, who I have always had in esteem and still have:

> I ask the hon. member for Ottawa, but in particular the hon. members for the city of Montreal. When this measure is explained to their constituents, what figure will they cut? When their constituents are starving, fathers have no bread to give to their family, will they boast of having voted in the house to allow fifteen gentlemen, some of them bachelors, to earn $4,000, in five or six months, so that they may rest seven months? They will soon find out what French Canadians think of this so-called claim of race rights.

I have never thought for a moment that the French Canadian race was in jeopardy owing to this bill; it is perhaps entangled, as in the past, in various classifications and reorganizations, that is possible, but it is not in jeopardy. If such had been the case, it would have happened before now; more than ever French Canadian cooperation must act in concert with that of the English Canadians to attain success and prosperity.

Since the hon. member for Labelle delivered his speech, like similar literature, it has travelled around. I communicated with my own constituents so as to find out their views on the matter, but more especially, to find out whether my life was threatened. I can state to the house that my constituents are in no way upset over the brilliant speech delivered by my hon. friend on this question. This is in a few words what they think: It would be more appropriate for him to utilize his great gift to solve more serious problems which are of more interest to us, such as whether profiteers will be allowed to sell us coal at $18 or $20 per ton, when the thermometer registers 35° below zero, when direct assistance is insufficient, forcing us to cut down the rations of our wife and children and barely saving them from freezing.

The milk and bread trusts are especially making my people uneasy. They wonder whether the government through its Federal Relief Act is not able to find means to raise their morale. They wonder whether there are in the house orators who can shake the walls with the echo of their voice so as to force the government to adopt means to sustain life and afford them a livelihood, especially at present, and the possibility of having on May 1st—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Then, you contend that the hon. member for Labelle has not carried out his duty?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): I would request the hon. member to speak in his turn.

The people of St. Mary's wish to know whether, on May 1st, they will be among the 50,000 heads of families having no other lodgings—because the city of Montreal or governments will not have paid the rent due to the landlords—having no other lodgings than the stars above.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): There is no mention of this in the bill.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Take things easily, now.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It is the hon. member who is out of sorts.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, there still remains to find out whether we are going to uphold the French and English races in this country—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): The race will survive, have no fear.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): — whether we shall promote peace and give them a livelihood and especially, protect them against profiteers. That is what I intend to do, at the opportune time.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, before entering into a discussion of the question, it is needless for me to remind anyone in the house and, I might even say, anyone in Canada of the fruitful and extensive public activities of my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), by whom the present bill was so ably explained last week. In the eyes of Canada, and especially French Canada, he stands out as a brilliant statesman, broadminded by nature and culture, actuated by a deep sense of responsibility and patriotism, and always taking, in matters of language and religion, the highest plane of justice, freedom, fair-play and tolerance, with a chivalrous leaning towards the weaker party, coupled with a keen fighting instinct. He has many times and for many years upheld the Quebec claim with his convincing eloquence and his extensive constitutional experience. And such a fight he has carried even to the point of personal sacrifice. Speaking for myself and my Quebec colleagues on this side of the house I wish to express to the hon. Secretary of State how deeply we all appreciate the fine and powerful support we have received from him in the past. It was an especially gratifying tribute to him and to the spirit of his bill that even such a brilliant and eminent personality as the distinguished member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) could not help supporting and praising the present measure in most emphatic and vigorous terms.

Now Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss in French the present bill from the two points of view involved, the constitutional aspect and the technical point of view.

(Translation) I wonder, sir, whether the opposition which is unlatched against the bill—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Is genuine.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): —is not entirely due to a simple misunderstanding. May I be permitted, sir, to review as briefly as possible the status of French, at present. First, we have section 133 of the B. N. A. Act which provides for the optional and compulsory use of the French and English languages. Section 133 reads as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

To summarize, section 133 of the B. N. A. Act, provides, first, the optional use of either French or English in the parliamentary debates of the two Chambers and before the Supreme Court of Canada and the various Quebec courts; secondly, the compulsory use of the two languages in the parliamentary journals and reports of both Chambers, respectively, in the publications of the archives and proceedings and in the printing and promulgation of the acts of Parliament.

This section 133, and section 93 of the same act, which grant to provincial legislatures the exclusive right to legislate in matters of education, constitute according to the statement of the distinguished Senator Belcourt, whose memory is imperishable, the total aggregate of our legal rights to the French language, officially recognized, in Canada. May I, sir, further include sections 47 and 72 of the rules and regulations of the House of Commons, which read as follows:

> When a motion is seconded, it shall be read in English and in French by Mr. Speaker, if he be familiar with both languages; if not, Mr. Speaker shall read the motion in one language and direct the clerk at the table to read it in the other, before debate.

Section 72 provides:

> All bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

Let us now, sir, examine section 3 of the act and see if this section 3 does not add to the total aggregate of our rights. Section 3 of bill No. 4 reads as follows:

> 3. (1) There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau for Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

As the hon. member for Labelle so well pointed out in his splendid speech, the English version says:

> It shall be the duty . . .

Which means, if I am not mistaken, that, according to section 3, first, the bureau shall translate all documents—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): No, all the documents that it is requested to translate.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation) —debates, bills, acts, proceedings, correspondence and administration reports and, secondly, the departments shall collaborate with the bureau to facilitate its efficient and speedy translation. The branches, agencies and commissions appointed by parliament or by order of the governor in council shall be likewise, that is, shall collaborate, just like the departments.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Will the hon. minister permit me to put a question?

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Am I to understand from the minister's remarks that certain official reports such as that of the superintendent of insurance, which are published only in the English language for a number of years past, shall, in the future, be translated in all departments, in the French language, whatever may be the nature of the official reports? In other words, will section 3 of bill No. 4 bind the government to have all official reports and documents, whatever may be their nature, translated by the Bureau for translations?

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): My reply will not be unintelligible. My answer is: Yes. That is bill No. 4 applies the provisions of section 133 to all departments and branches of the public service. The subsection 2 applies these provisions to all branches, commissions and governmental agencies; in other words this section 3 spreads the application of section 133 to all reports of the administration, and others, such as documents, debates, bills, proceedings, correspondence, whether they should emanate from the superintendent of insurance or otherwise.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): May I be permitted, sir, to summarize from a legal angle, by submitting the following argument: Briefly, bill No. 4 completes section 133; it implements the spirit in which section 133 shall be construed or, if you wish, it is the recognition, in legal form, of what section 133 intimates but does not express. Section 3 of bill No. 4 confirms in a federal statute the interpretation that we, from Quebec, have given to the spirit of section 133 of the B. N. A. Act. In my opinion it is a step forward in the laying of our claims and is this not, sir, the most essential aspect of the question? I suggest to all who have protested against this bill to peruse those sections. First, section 133; secondly, sections 47 and 72 of the Rules and Regulations of the House, and finally, bill No. 4, and compare them, that is all I ask of them; all I ask the French Canadian press, is to publish this section 133, sections 47 and 72 of the Rules and Regulations of the House and bill No. 4.

[Mr. Bouchard.]

My hon. friend, the member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois), in his noteworthy speech delivered on March 2, 1934, put a question to the hon. Secretary of State. At page 1116 of Hansard, he said:

> If the hon. Secretary of State would publicly state that it is a greater guarantee for the French language, I could be more lenient towards the measure under consideration.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Well! Before the hon. Secretary of State replies to this question, I answer: yes, it is an additional guarantee.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): My request was that the hon. Secretary of State should do so himself.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), at page 993 of Hansard, stated that this bill could be abrogated as easily as it is enacted. True. That applies to all measures enacted by parliament. To my mind, it is a strange argument. Conclusion, let us not enact any measure, let us not even vote for a bill if it implies a step forward in favour of the rights of the French language because it might be abrogated next year or in a few years!

May I now, sir, broach the technical viewpoint of the question. What are the advantages to be derived from bill No. 4?

In my opinion, the advantages to be derived from this bill will be to secure the simultaneous publication of the French and English versions of all documents. That is what we have requested for many years and that is what we shall actually realize. For instance, this year, only 12 French reports compared to 29 English reports are at the disposal of the house, and in previous years the situation was worse. With the new organization which the bill suggests, these reports will be issued simultaneously in French and English. I have here a list, somewhat long, but which I shall curtail, of the various annual reports which are to be found in the report of the King's Printer. First, we find that the annual report of the Pensions and National Health department for the year 1928-29, was issued in English in February, 1930, and in French in July, 1931, namely, a delay of 17 months.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Are the translators to blame?

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): We find that the report of the Secretary of State for the year 1929-30, was issued in English in March, 1931, and in French in January, 1932, namely, a delay of 10 months.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Who is to blame?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Was the English version handed over immediately to the translators?

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): The report of the Labour department for 1929-30, was issued in English in March, 1931, and in French in March, 1932, namely, a delay of 12 months, and so forth. I have here a list of 15 reports the French version of which was only issued long after the English one, and the delay varies from 17 months to 12, 9, 7 and 6 months.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): Who is to blame?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Your system.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Such are the conditions we wish to remedy.

The second advantage we find in this measure, is that it defines and specifies the responsibility in connection with the translation. With the present system, this responsibility is vague and undetermined. Sometimes no one knows who is responsible for the delay. In the future, one minister alone will be held responsible for the translation and, if delays occur in the translation or if it is not satisfactory, he will equally be held responsible and must account for same.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): While the other ministers will wash their hands of the whole affair!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): It is unfair to blame the government unless the latter is given full authority to act. This authority, in the future, will devolve on the Secretary of State or any other minister of the crown who may from time to time be appointed by order of the governor in council, pursuant to paragraph 2, section 3.

Third advantage: this measure will improve the translation.

It is quite clear that in translation as in other work, specialization gives better results. This bill will in no way hamper specialization. It shall be the duty of the superintendent to see that translations are done by the most qualified translators, according to their fitness and training. His duty will be to encourage specialists.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Fourth advantage: a better distribution of work.

Is it fair and rational that a number of translators should be overtaxed with work while others are unemployed for months?

Reports, such as those of the imperial conference or interprovincial conference, must be speedily and well translated. However, as such reports are not published by any department, no department is therefore responsible for their translation or publication. Thanks to the bureau created by the present bill, these reports will be translated and issued simultaneously.

May I, sir, refute certain objections raised against this measure?

It was stated that this bill will destroy the bilingual character of every department. The report of the Sellar commission was even quoted. The Sellar commission, if I be not mistaken, settles this question.

The reports states:

> From the information before the committee, the general consensus of opinion in the departments is in favour of the statu quo.

Which means that the deputy ministers prefer keeping their translators in their departments. We have no desire by this bill, and nothing to the contrary is stated, to deprive the various departments of translators who are already there doing their daily task. These translators will remain in the departments if the latter wish to keep them. Far from wishing to destroy the bilingual character of departments, the present Act increases it, even totally and definitely so, by translating not only the reports which departments table in the house but also, pursuant to the letter of the law, all reports of the administration and others, all documents, proceedings and correspondence.

By what distortion can it be said that the new act places the French language on the same level as foreign languages? I fail to see. All are aware, it goes without saying, that no foreign language is recognized by our constitution. The only two official languages are French and English, and the former is given, by the new act, rights which implement its status and extends its sphere to all official papers of the administration.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Now, sir, the opposition made use of the word "centralization". What the bill really proposes is not so much centralization as unifying, coordinating supervising and controlling translation.

The criticism implying that the translation of technical matter will not be done by experts in the subjects, is not, in my opinion, well founded, because it is our desire that translators who have specialized in certain subjects should continue to devote to them their special care.

Translation work is not generally conducive to promotion in a sphere other than the translation service, and the chances of promotion referred to in certain speeches will certainly be as numerous in the bureau for translations as they are at present.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That is good news.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): I acknowledge, however, that the case of the translators of debates, the conditions under which they work during the session, differ from other public employees and must be given special consideration when the organization of the bureau for translation takes place.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): It is contended, in this respect, that the new act does not follow the practice of other bilingual countries. First, we must admit: we are masters in our own house; I admit the Frechette report, to which my hon. friends opposite referred, is a well put together report; on the other hand, it is twenty years old. Much technical progress has been made since that date. After all, as to the principle, the present act conforms with the Frechette report by acknowledging the advantage to be derived from specializing. However, where it is superior, is in seeking to combine the benefits of specialization with those of centralization. Far from being a hindrance to specialization, this bill aims at completing and perfecting it by giving it all the advantages of a sole and central supervision.

My hon. friend the member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois) stated, in his speech of March 2, that the house had enough serious questions to settle without bringing up such a burning question. Why burning? Why burning, sir? Because of a well intentioned opposition, if you wish, but not sufficiently informed. We shall settle this burning question in favour of the rights of the French language. For years we have heard complaints about the deficiency in translation, and when we propose a remedy, we are told: Keep out, it is a burning question!

I summarize, sir. Here is a measure which in the opinion of the government, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, aims at placing French on a sounder—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): To win elections.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): —more satisfactory foundation than it has ever been since confederation. Here is measure that emphasizes more so sec. 133, and completes it; which, as I stated a moment ago, implements the spirit in which must be interpreted sec. 133; which is a recognition, in a legal form, of what sec. 133 intimates, but does not state, which implements in an act and the abrogation of which will be found difficult, the interpretation, we, from the province of Quebec, have given to the spirit of sec. 133. Yet, we have to carry on the fight against whom? Against our own compatriots of the French language.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Shame!

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, such is life, such is politics! One must not take offence or lose one's temper. We shall pursue our task, in spite of taunts; however, putting to account whatever beneficial may be found in the criticism and suggestions. We shall endeavour to attain the aim we have been following for ever so long, but more especially since we are in office, since 1930, namely, the complete recognition of the rights of the French language pursuant to the spirit of our constitution and in keeping with the spirit which inspired the discussion and negotiations of the confederation pact, in keeping with our history, traditions, the written and unwritten law; recognition of the French language rights—

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Also of the Imperial conference.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): —of its status in parliament, in departments and all fields of Canadian activities.

I appeal to my compatriots, to the French Canadian press, to trust in us. Surely the French language's rights are not—as it was stated at the outset of the opposition in danger through this bill. Within a few months our opponents, such as the Droit and other newspapers—as I cannot cast any doubt on their good intentions—will recognize that they were somewhat led astray.

You must make a distinction between the accessory and the principal. Here, sir, the principal is the additional guarantee given to the French language and the sanction of rights unceasingly claimed during many years. The accessory is how, when, and by whom translations will be carried out.

I shall close my remarks by an appeal to my compatriots on the other side of the house and to the French Canadian press. I say to them: if my reasoning is wrong, keep on the fight. But if I am right I beg of them, on behalf of the cause which is dear to us, to cease firing on their own troops.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I closely followed the speech delivered by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré). His statement displayed much enthusiasm and, I think, sincerity, however, as he is only one in the cabinet, I am afraid that his influence and patriotism will make no change whatever in the methods prevailing since confederation, in the the various departments in connection with translation. I do not intend to discuss his statement or the purport of section 133 of the British North America Act, from a legal angle. The spirit of this act exists since confederation, and if, in the past, translation has been delayed in the various departments, it is due to the negligence and antipathy of certain deputy ministers, not to say of ministers themselves, in transmitting immediately to translators the reports to be translated.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I do not think that this bill will in any way change the mentality existing in the various departments, and force the deputy ministers, as well as the ministers, to transmit the reports sooner to this bureau for translations. This bill was submitted to the house, in my opinion, at a time when our efforts are required to obtain unity, collaboration and union of the two great races in this country; I, therefore, think that to obtain such results this bill should have been postponed a few years more. We need cooperation and unity, if we are to judge from the views expressed by French Canadian public societies of Quebec, which we must admit, must be able to understand the purpose of an act. It is not because we have heard in this house French Canadian members argue in favour of this bill that we must conclude that it is to the advantage of the French Canadian race.

The hon. Solicitor General, so as not to differ in opinion with his colleagues, was forced to make the statement he did. As to the views of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I think, he is out of date. He dislikes to mingle with the crowds and rather seeks small parties so as to better shine.

This bill will not improve the translation of the various departments. All depends on the good intentions of ministers and deputy ministers and the standing in which the French language is held by each department. If delays have occurred in the past, they will, I think, perhaps, occur still more in the future, because reports will have to be transmitted from departments where they have been prepared and then sent to the bureau.

I was amazed to see such a bill introduced in the house. The improvement suggested by the hon. Solicitor General could have been carried out in each department without upsetting the whole system and preventing a large number of French Canadians, in various departments, from profiting of the promotions due to them on account of their efficient services.

So far as efficiency, I do not think that a translator placed under one minister, in particular, and centralized can possibly make a more efficient and perfect translation. I think that is fooling oneself and endeavouring to make the people believe that this bill was introduced with the idea of improving translation and affording to the French Canadians a greater protection and fair play. A number of French Canadian members opposite rely on the word of the Secretary of State and on the bill itself; however, we of the opposition have a better knowledge of what took place in the past, in the departments as regards translations, and we are aware that, in the future, even with the centralization of translators, the same thing will happen. Our rights and our language in parliament and the departments have been respected because we have insisted, fought for them. Thanks to such means we were able to obtain some satisfaction as to the respect due to our rights.

More than ever, the majority in this country, must make it a duty to respect the rights which the French Canadians were given under the constitution.

Because of this respect of our rights, we must have unity of action in the administration of this country, without which, we are all destined to perish. We must live as brothers, but in order to obtain that end, we must respect our mutual rights. By this bill, the centralization of translators, one replaces an evil by another; that is all. One wishes to centralize the translators, place them under one roof, not so much for efficiency sake in translation or economy, but so as to decrease, in various departments, French prestige. And it is for such reasons, that I most strenuously oppose the bill. I expect the majority to respect the rights of the French Canadian minority and leave things as they are. I trust that the French language will be more respected in the future and that the translation of all governmental reports will be speeded up.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with much interest the speeches delivered, on both sides of the house, on the second reading of bill No. 4, introduced by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). From the viewpoint of the French language, numerous arguments have been set forth, and I think we all agree on the subject. The hon. Solicitor general (Mr. Dupré), if I am not mistaken, endeavoured to prove, just now, that bill No. 4 constituted a complement to section 133 of the British North America Act. Although the letter of the law is not very precise as to the use of the French language and the publication in French of the various official documents of Canada, we have always been under the impression since confederation, and especially within the last twenty years, that the French language was to occupy a place of honour in this country. Translators were appointed in all departments. That was an official recognition of the French language. These translators, scattered here and there, over the government departments, occupy, each of them, a place of honour and translate not only the documents of their departments but often those of other departments when their special qualifications are required. They were, so to speak, the French ornament of each department, and they are still. They accomplished their task scrupulously. Perhaps, defects appeared, at times, but this is not a reason to blame the system. There are no rules without exception, if in such and such a department unqualified translators are met with, let them be replaced. However, one must not, for such a reason, upset the entire system of translation and concentrate them in a large study hall.

It is stated that one of the advantages of the act will be to ensure the simultaneous publication of English and French documents. I respectfully submit that this is a myth. They must first be printed in English before the translators begin their work. Complaints come from the government side that documents, proceedings and departmental reports were not translated in sufficient numbers or when required. It must be that the departments were short of men or of qualified persons. Yet, we find in the explanatory notes that this bill is introduced to obtain more efficiency and to economize the public moneys.

I take it for granted that our translators, on the whole, are efficient. In no way was it proved that there existed unqualified, lazy persons or parasites; translators that sleep over their work. Then if you wish to have a larger output of translated reports and obtain the object which the Solicitor General mentioned, more translators will be required and, therefore, it will be at a greater cost to the country. All have complained, for twenty years, under all administrations, of the small number of translated publications. If you wish to have a larger number of these, additional translators will be required, the cost will increase, as a greater efficiency can not be obtained at a lower cost; the two clash.

It was with pleasure, sir, that I listened, just now, to the sincere statement of the hon. Solicitor General. One says in English—it sounds better than in French—it is a pious wish. However, from a legal angle, I shall examine clause 3 which reads as follows:

> There shall be a bureau under the minister to be called the bureau for translations, the duties and functions of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of parliament of Canada.

Where is to be found the obligation of implementing the last provision of section 3? Where is the principle? It is a matter of collaboration, nothing else, one cannot interpret as a stipulation the wish momentarily expressed in the speech of the hon. Solicitor General.

I deny to any commission the right of removing from the House of Commons the translation service; such a privilege is adherent to the House and Senate; these translators are our distinguished collaborators. They are, so to speak, the radio broadcasting our speeches both in English and French—always at the right time, I trust—and informing the people who like to read. I enjoy seeing our translators in this building, on the first floor where we can easily get information. I should not like to have to walk to the Confederation building or the Public Works buildings, and in a large study hall—reminding me of my college days, when I use to call on my fellow student—and having to knock at the door and ask the supervisor or superintendent whether I may speak to such or such a translator to complain, to alter or to be more explicit about some part of my speech.

We, members of the House of Commons, are perfectly satisfied with the translation of our speeches. It reaches us within 24 hours after the text is published, and so far as members are concerned we have no complaint to make about the official translators of the house. If it happens, as the hon. member for Labelle stated, that some of them work less than others, let an investigation be held. Let the house, through its worthy Speaker, inquire whether there is room for improvement on the debates staffs and make changes if necessary.

Section 3 continues:

. . . and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

Where is to be found in the bill, in the legal sense, an immediate and statutory obligation to translate these documents? Absolutely no such stipulation is inserted. It is a collaboration—just like the collaboration between members on your right, sir and those on your left.

An hon. minister has just stated that he had before him, I think, 15 reports which had been translated out of a total of 29. He assures us that in the future such will not be the case. This can apply just as much to former ministers as to the present ones, I wish to be quite frank in my arguments—however, were any reasons given why these documents were not translated in French? It is not simply a case of applying a remedy, the cause for such deficiency must be found, yet no one gives any explanation. Again I state if you wish to remedy present condition, obtain more efficiency and economy in this service, gentlemen, I fail to see how you will do it, with the goodwill which characterize each of you! For such and such a department you will require translators. Where will you seek them? By virtue of bill 4, clause 4:

may be transferred to the bureau as herein provided . . . the translators of the various departments.

You will then, take them in all departments, removing these translators from the various govermental departments so as to place them in this new bureau for translations, at the head of which there is to be a superintendent and supervisor. If you are not going to dismiss them, you will have the same men, the same intellects, the same qualifications and you will have the same efficiency.

Another reason given is the better distribution of the work. But is not a translator familiar with the work of his department, better qualified to do that departmental work, where he has been stationed for 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 15 or 20 years, where he has specialized himself in all its branches and acquired a technical working knowledge? Is this translator not in a position, to-day, to prove himself more efficient? I say: certainly, yes. It is contended that there is no future in the department for this translator; well, if he is a competent man, he can study the various activities of the department, and his chance for promotion will come. You will be unable to get qualified translators, because they will be untrained for this special work, even though our students in technical schools, in the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Commerciales, briefly, in High Schools are well tutored—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Not in the University of Montreal!

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): As to the University of Montreal, I wish to praise it for the splendid work it carries on in developing our gifted youths; to it, we owe our own education. It is the university where I followed my law lectures.

If these translators are brought together and submitted to strict rules, like in a college, if they are concentrated in a large office, their efficiency will be decreased. If it is intended by this bill to replace them for the sake of economy, where will you find immediately qualified men for the various departments? If you are in earnest you will keep the same staffs; otherwise, how are you going to maintain this bureau of translators? It is impossible, incomprehensible. If it be otherwise, then you wish to retire or dismiss some of them. If they are dismissed, others will have to replace them. This will simply mean the dismissal of efficient translators to replace them by ordinary ones. One may sometimes find fault with translators, but a good translation is not an easy task. Give a text to translate to ten persons and no two translations will be alike, while if a qualified translator is given the same text, his will be the only good one.

"Responsibility": "a responsible minister." But the present ministers are all responsible. If the work of translation is not being carried out, especially since 1930, it must be because there is some deficiency somewhere, in the departments.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Will my hon. friend permit me? ?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): I think that the statement that the work of translation is not being carried out, especially since 1930, is an absolutely unfounded charge, because never has the translation been so well done and kept up than since 1930.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): It is not what I stated, I did not fix any particular date; I mentioned just now all the governments which have been in office, within the last twenty years. However, I am ready to abide by your statement. You have made a special study of the question and you have just stated to the house that the English documents, for the most part, were not translated. Then this deficiency rests with certain departments, the translation having been neglected in those departments.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): I mean that the translation, although deficient, is better than before. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend without his consent.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): He is sufficiently perplexed, at present.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): At all events, whether this defect existed before 1930 or since 1930, it simply means that documents were not translated in time, both under your administration and the previous one. We, therefore, agree. In the cases mentioned, there has been a deficiency somewhere. Why were these documents not translated under both administrations? Because no one supervised the work or else there were not sufficient translators. You cannot deny this fact. And should you intend to supply all the translation you spoke of, no economy will result since more translators will be required to obtain more efficiency. Therefore, the explanation given to the house for enacting this bill, namely more efficiency and economy, falls short.

I contend that in placing all these translators under the same roof, all these young men, brilliant as most are—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): They will be contaminated!

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Had they not been brilliant, they would not have been kept in the employ of the state. I take too great a pride in the welfare of my county to imagine that in all the departments there are no efficient officials. By confining all these translators from the various departments in the same office at the bureau for translations, individual differences will be levelled down and that will hinder their chances of promotion.

Under the circumstances, particularly after hearing the arguments put forward to-night, I am more convinced than ever that this bill is useless and will not make for efficiency in translation unless more money be spent. Then where would the economy come in?

I have no orders to give to anybody, I have no desire to give any nor am I conceited enough to do so, but I may say this: Instead of this wild topsy-turvy with no better result and with greater cost, because they will have to increase the staff, wherever there are not enough employees in a department let the minister in charge of that department appoint some. He need not apply to the Civil Service Commission; he has only to look for competent men and bring them into his department. Let him go and get them in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, anywhere, provided that they give satisfaction. And then let each minister determine what reports must be published in French.

Last year I asked the government if the evidence brought before the radio committee of the house would be translated into French and the answer was that it would not be translated, although it was a very important inquiry.

Section 3 of Bill No. 4 gives no assurance whatever that the Solicitor General's dream will come true.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, much importance is being given to the bill now before us. The Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), after the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) endeavoured to show a moment ago that the effect of this measure would be the recognition of additional rights for the French language. He maintained that under section 3 of this bill, every one of the documents and reports of the various departments will have to be translated, even those that are not mentioned in section 133 of the British North America Act. I do not think that is the legal interpretation which can be placed on this measure. This bill was presented merely for the purpose of organizing the translators into one central bureau. These translators will be left to interpret themselves the constitution and in this I see rather a danger than an extension of the rights of the French language, because the interpretation of section 133 of the British North America Act will be entrusted to a group of civil servants. The chief translators or one of the translators may take a fancy to say that section 133 does not permit or compel him to translate such or such document; he will be free to interpret the law as he likes. And what authority will parliament or the various departments have to induce that translator to construe the spirit of the law such as we have always understood it to this day.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this bill, not only is far from giving additional rights to the French language but is dangerous on account of the false interpretation that might be placed on the laws which presently guarantee the use of the French language in this parliament and throughout the Dominion. Further than that, I think we should not give this measure the interpretation that has been given to it by the hon. member for Labelle the other day and by the Solicitor General to-night.

At any rate, I am sure that the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) when he drafted this bill, never thought of granting additional rights to the French language in this country. The object as expressed in the explanatory notes annexed to the bill contains nothing of the kind, and there is not a word about it in the bill itself. These explanatory notes state why the measure was submitted and the results which are expected from it. According to these explanatory notes and the information given to us by the hon. Secretary of State when he presented this measure the other day, it is a matter of efficient translation and economy. The hon. Solicitor General has seen fit to tell us that the efficiency will consist mainly in the simultaneous publication of various reports and documents which must be translated. I believe the bill itself says the very opposite. Section 3 deals with a Bureau of Translation whose duties will be to translate reports that have alreday been published. We cannot translate a report before it is published and there is no doubt that nothing in the bill provides for a simultaneous publication in both languages. If such a clause were inserted in the bill I might approve of the measure in so far as efficiency is concerned. But no such thing appears in the bill; it is quite the contrary.

Mention was also made of improving the translation. Some are under the impression that all translations are alike. The present translators of the various departments carry out their work to the best of their ability. Either they are efficient or they are not. If we employ the same translators, there will be no change in the translation. If the translation is well done, to-day, I do not see the necessity for this bill.

A more fair distribution of the work was alluded to. I do not think that the work can be better distributed since it is distributed among the various departments which have their own translators. Each department has its bilingual character owing to the presence of its translators; if these are removed we destroy the bilingual character of the departments and create a sole bilingual bureau, in the parliament buildings.

Let us examine the constitutional side of the question. This bill concentrates in a bureau all departmental translation as well as that of the two chambers of parliament. This provision is the most amazing part of the bill. I fail to see how the two chambers of parliament can be controlled by a bureau for translation and forsake their prerogatives. According to the strict letter of the constitution, I fail to see why parliament should thus divest itself of its prerogatives. The government, the House of Commons as well as the Senate should have under their control the translation, especially that of the debates.

According to this bill, the house will lose control over the translation, which is so important to parliament. I repeat that this bill, in my opinion, does in no way increase the prestige of the French language; quite the contrary, there is danger that the act will be so interpreted as to turn against us instead of in our favour. We shall always have to carry on the struggle to maintain the rights of the French language, so long as we remain a bilingual country and are in the minority. We must, therefore, always stand by our guns, if we wish to uphold our rights. I do not think that this bill will add a dot to the rights of our language; on the contrary, it may constitute a danger; all will depend on how the translators themselves interpret the act. On the other hand, if the bill stipulated that the publication of the various reports and documents, both in French and English, shall be simultaneous, if the bill provided that all parliamentary documents, even those which are not stipulated in section 133 of the British North America Act, shall be translated if parliament was given control over the translations, especially those connected with the debates of the house, well truly, I think I would endorse this bill and would not feel justified in voting against it. However, nothing of the kind is to be found in this bill.

I beg to move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to revert to the orders for motions? Inadvertently two formal motions were omitted to-day when the order was called.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. GUTHRIE moved:

That the name of Mr. Smith (Cumberland) be substituted for that of Mr. Gagnon on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Cotnam be substituted for that of Mr. McDade on the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO AND REPORT UPON OPERATIONS OF RADIO COMMISSION

Mr. GUTHRIE moved:

That Messrs. Ahearn, Beynon, Cardin, Gagnon, Garland (Bow River), McLure, McKenzie (Assiniboia), Morand and Wright do constitute the select special committee of this house pursuant to the motion adopted on the sixteenth day of February, 1934, to inquire into and report upon the operations of the commission under the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932, as amended at the last session of parliament, and to have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses and to report from time to time to this house.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Tuesday, March 6, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

First and second reports of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By leave of the house I beg to move:

That the recommendations contained in the first report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce presented to the house this day be concurred in.

[Mr. Jean.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: The report says 1,000 copies. Was it not agreed upon this morning that it should be 1,500 instead of 1,000?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My recollection is 1,000. If there is any error, we can have it corrected.

Motion agreed to.

PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Mr. STEVENS moved:

That the special committee appointed to inquire into price spreads and mass buying be empowered to print its day to day proceedings and evidence in the English and French languages for distribution to the committee and to the members of the Senate and House of Commons.

He said: This is merely clarifying a previous motion made to that effect.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHEVRIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, the second point I wish to raise is one of privilege affecting more the privileges of the house than the personal privileges of a member, but it falls within rule 41 as to decorum in debate. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), as reported at page 996 of the debates of March 5, said this:

So that a half-witted, blunt or ignorant deputy minister, such as were to be found under various governments and even to this day.

Those are not words which, in the light of what has already been stated to the house, should have been used. May I be permitted to quote from page 4908 of Hansard of May 11, 1933, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), on a question somewhat similar to this, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I think that ought to be withdrawn. There are certain amenities that should be respected. Has this parliament degenerated to that sort of thing? I just leave it to you, sir. If a member can talk that way about a man who cannot defend himself on the floor of this house, about his whiskers, then all I can say is that this parliament has reached a low level.

I quote from the same page, 4908, where the chairman said:

> I would ask the hon. member . . . to remember one thing; in England the House of Commons is considered a gentleman's club, and that should apply to Canada also.

May I also cite Bourinot, fourth edition, at page 358:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the speakers of the British and Canadian houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

I mean, sir, that personages of high official station would include, under our parliamentary procedure, such persons as deputy ministers. I submit that even though this parliament may have certain immunities as far as excessive language in this house is concerned, such language should not be used as against those who have not the privilege of defending themselves in this house; and if the hon. member cannot be asked to withdraw at least he should be censured.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: You would!

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman has quoted some excerpts from a speech delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). We stand here, sir, by the rules of the house and the standing orders. May I quote to you on this point of order standing order 41 which has not been amended since 1927 and which reads thus:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

The gentlemen who have been referred to by the hon. member for Labelle, and on behalf of whom the distinguished senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has just spoken, are not included in this restrictive enumeration. No one of them is His Majesty, no one of them belongs to the royal family, no one of them is the governor or the person administering the government of Canada, no one of them is a member of either house. Therefore the rule by which we all stand, rule 41, does not include those gentlemen. I am in full sympathy with them, but I contend that what is said by any hon. member, the member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) no more than any other, is not the regulation under which we sit here and debate questions that are submitted to us. I contend that any hon. member can express his own view, but a distinction should be made between any hon. member's personal view, whether he belongs to the cabinet or is a back-bencher, and the standing orders of the house. Such views are not a standing order of the house. This order contains the enumeration by which all members are governed. For the ten years that I have been a member here no hon. member has attacked the governor, no one has attacked His Majesty, they all observe this rule. The hon. member for Labelle, for whom I have great respect, enjoys freedom of speech. I believe that a member of the House of Commons is entitled—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I will ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to put out of the house the asses that are braying so loudly. When I say that I do not wish to cast any reflection upon any hon. member of the house. Sir, what I say is, that the rules of the house are contained in this green book. They are the law of this chamber. No member may do anything which is not permitted by those rules; when he does you can rightly call him to order, he has to stand by your ruling. I have great respect for opinions expressed by hon. members, other than by banging their desks; when a member shows his intelligence by reason and argument I have great respect for his views; but I do not govern myself by, and no one can compel me to be governed by the views expressed by an hon. member personally. All we have to do is to stand by the rules of the house. In conclusion my contention is—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just concluding. I say that we are not bound by what is said by any hon. member of this house. We are bound by the rules of the house, and according to those rules the hon. gentleman, I am very sorry to say, is out of order in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that the statement made by either hon. gentleman calls for a ruling from the chair. As Speaker I say that, even though the wording of standing order No. 41 specifies only certain persons who may not be spoken of disrespectfully or offensively, it is not the custom or practice of the house to use disrespectful or offensive words in regard to any one for that matter, and I do not think the house in general approves of the use of such language, even though it may not be specifically prohibited by the rules. The words to which the hon. senior member for Ottawa referred were spoken on February 26 last. The hon. member was not under the disability that some of us are in being unable to understand the French language as spoken, he was present in the house and understood what was said at the time, no objection was made by him, and I do not think it is incumbent upon the Speaker now, on March 6, to take any action in the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated his point of order, and the matter cannot be further discussed.

POOL TRAINS

MONTREAL-QUEBEC AND TORONTO-OTTAWA PASSENGER SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would like to get some information from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). He may not be able to give it to-day but might give it to-morrow. It is with regard to the pooling of trains between Quebec and Montreal which is announced to take place on the 10th instant. It is a peculiar pooling, in that all the Canadian National trains are taken away and all the Canadian Pacific trains remain. This will cause much inconvenience to the travelling public, and still more to the employees of the Canadian National Railways. I would like to have full information as to the conditions under which this pooling has been agreed to, in order that we may discuss it with full knowledge of the facts.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman said, I do not know the facts at the moment and cannot answer fully. I shall do so as soon as I get them. But let me say one thing now; that is that where trains are pooled and what my hon. friend calls the Canadian Pacific trains continue to run, the fact that the time of a pool train corresponds with the time table of the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National matters not, because pooling means that the returns are pooled, so that it is as fair to one railway company as the other. I mention this so there will be no misunderstanding.

[Mr. Speaker.]

As to questions relating to hours, with which I presume my hon. friend is chiefly concerned, I shall make inquiry and endeavour to give a full explanation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are the employees also pooled? Are Canadian National employees going to work on Canadian Pacific trains? Because only Canadian Pacific trains are being retained, and they are being operated on the Canadian Pacific line.

Mr. MANION: As far as the employees are concerned, we put a clause in last year's bill which the railways claim they are living up to, providing that whenever any pooling is done every effort shall be made to be perfectly fair to the employees of both railways. In regard to the specific instance my hon. friend refers to I cannot give a particular answer, but the railway managements are endeavouring throughout the country, wherever there is pooling of shops or trains, to balance the employees of one railway with the employees of the other. However, I will give the hon. member a fuller reply as soon as I look into it.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): While the minister is on that subject I should like to direct his attention to the proposed removal of trains Nos. 552 and 553 from the Toronto-Ottawa service. The trains leaving Ottawa have been packed to capacity, and I do not know how the service is going to be maintained if these trains are cut off. I direct the minister's attention to the further fact that if these trains are taken off it will mean that about seventy employees of the railways, including the crews of the two trains both ways, will be seriously affected by this decision of the railway companies. I should like to know on what basis the railway commission has decided to allow these trains to be cut off.

Mr. MANION: As my hon. friend knows, as Minister of Railways I have nothing whatever to do with the pooling of these trains; this is done under an arrangement between the managements of the two companies for the purposes of economy. I did have a statement which I received this morning, which unfortunately I did not bring with me, in regard to the pooling between Ottawa and Toronto and Montreal and Toronto, showing that they claimed a saving of something like a million passenger train miles per annum. They usually estimate the cost at $1 a mile, so they figure they are making a very great saving. However, I merely emphasize the fact that neither the government nor myself, as minister, has anything to do with the pooling of these trains. This is done by the railway companies themselves for the purposes of economy, and certainly they are endeavouring to give service to all who require it between these stations. I shall deal with my hon. friend's question when I deal with the question asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

FARMERS' STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Recently complaints have been received from Myrnam, Alberta, with regard to the refusal of the agents of five grain companies to buy any but tough grain. As a consequence the farmers in that vicinity have gone on strike, and at many other points in northern Alberta sympathetic strikes are in progress. I should like to ask the minister if the matter of the Myrnam farmers' strike has been brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce and, if so, what steps have been taken in connection with it, and also whether the board of grain commissioners has done anything to settle the grievances of the farmers in regard to the grading of grain.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If I had been given notice of the question I think perhaps I could have given a more satisfactory answer; I am speaking now only from memory and from a casual conversation I had yesterday with the chairman of the board of grain commissioners. He intimated to me that there had been some trouble in the area to which my hon. friend refers, and he also intimated that the difficulty had been adjusted. I have no further information on the subject, but I will take the question as a notice and deal with it tomorrow or as soon as the chairman of the board comes back to Ottawa. I expect him back to-night, but I am not quite certain.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. DUBOIS (Nicolet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on February 20, last, I drew the attention of the house to the fact that documents which I had requested in connection with the breaking up of the ice-bridge between St. Angèle de Laval and Three Rivers had not been tabled, it was, however, pointed out, in these documents, that the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) had received requests from the authorities of Three Rivers, through their member, for the help of ice-breakers so as to facilitate the service between St. Angèle and Three Rivers. This document was not included in the returns, and I, therefore, requested the Minister of Marine to kindly have it tabled. The latter informed me that he had tabled all the documents which the department had furnished him.

I can make inquiries, said he, and if there exists further correspondence, I shall be pleased to either lay it on the table or communicate it to my hon. friend.

It is now March 6 and I have not yet received anything. These requests made by the authorities of Three Rivers through their member (Mr. Bourgeois) must have been either made orally or in writing. I do not see why the hon. minister could not reply to me orally, if the request was so made, or else table the document if it was made in writing.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after an investigation, I wish to state to my hon. friend that there is no correspondence as indicated. It is quite possible that the hon. member for Three Rivers, at the time, made such requests orally. I cannot say positively.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Chevrier.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I stated, last evening, that the bill under discussion, has not the import which the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), seem to have given it. Far from being an additional guarantee of the rights of the French language, it is of a nature to restrict it by leaving to the bureau created by this bill the care of interpreting the guarantees given to our constitution. Besides, it takes away from the different departments the bilingual character which must be theirs under the present system.

If it is a fact, as has been said, that section 133 of the British North America Act limits the compulsory use of the French language to the printing of the house records and of the statutes, I fail to see how the proposed legislation shall fundamentally place the two languages on an equal footing. If the intention be really to create that equality of standing, as far as the two languages are concerned, in the various departments of the public service, it can be done in a far safer way than through the centralization of translating staffs. Let us provide for the appointment of bilingual officers in every department. Such efficiency, production and economy as might be secured under the latter plan are surely more apparent than in the indefinite cooperation provided for in sections 3 and 4 of the bill now before the house. If it is desired to ensure the simultaneous publication of the house records in both languages, would it not—the only way to achieve the end in view—be better to leave the translators in direct contact with the ministers and officials entrusted with the preparation of such documents, as is the case at the present time.

I am willing to admit that to a certain extent there is room for improvement in the present system, but the conditions could not be improved through the crowding of the translators into one department. For instance, the French edition of the Hansard is being issued two or three days late. Why? Because of the fact that the translators have to wait for the English text proofs from the Printing Bureau. Should the typewritten copy, as it is being prepared, be handed over to the translating staffs, the French edition of the Hansard could be made available practically at the same time as the English edition. The same could be done, if desired, in connection with all other publications. But such is not the object aimed at by the hon. Secretary of State in introducing this legislation. The object in view may be found in his explanatory notes of the bill:

> It is believed that the organization and administration of the proposed bureau for translations will result in improved efficiency and a considerable saving of public funds.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the debates translators, as well as the other translators generally could discharge their duties in a more efficient manner than they do at the present time, and I fail to see how economy would result from the proposed bureau for translations.

Efficiency and economy can only be obtained through the competency of the translators, and whatever system is put in force, better results in every respect will be secured with qualified men and the cost of translation will be accordingly less.

On the other hand, there was no demand from anywhere for the proposed legislation. The majority of those who are more directly affected by the bill, are opposed to it. The French press in this country has declared itself against it. Most of the French speaking members in this house are also opposed to the measure. I even suspect that, at the start, our honourable friends from the province of Quebec who sit on the other side of the house, were not in favour of the proposed plan. Why such an insistance to have it carried out and how are we to account, Mr. Speaker, for that distorted construction which is being placed on the bill? Has the hon. Secretary of State stated at any time that the end he had in view when introducing the bill was to recognize the principle of an equality of status for both languages, and does the bill itself contain a single provision the intent or letter of which warrants such an inference? Not a single word in the whole bill justifies that construction being placed on it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the bill in its details as well of the unfairness it involves as far as the translators are concerned. The point has already been fully covered and it is needless for me to go over the same ground again. But I am of the opinion that the arguments put forward in support of the bill have not been proven and that the objections raised against it have not been refuted. Our friends on the other side of the house have taken us to task because we failed to offer to them any advice as to the position they should take. Should they be willing to take a friendly word of advice from their friends on this side of the house, I may say to them in concluding: Do not press this bill to the end, or it might prove a boomerang against yourselves.

Mr. L. E. PARENT (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the discussion on this bill, I feel that I owe it to my electors of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, to state my views before I cast my vote on the motion now before the house. By this Bill No. 4, entitled An Act Respecting the Bureau for Translations, introduced by the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), it is sought, on the ground of efficiency and economy, to place all the translators under one direction and systematic control. The bill, Mr. Speaker, has met with a great deal of opposition, especially in the French section of the press in the province of Quebec, and even, I may add, in some districts of the province of Ontario where groups of French Canadians are located. The Secretary of State said that the various statements of the French press as well as the opposition, in a general way, against the bill had taken the form of violent outbursts. The discussion was as to whether this bill was harmful to the French language in this country or if it restricted its rights.

The hon. Secretary of State, in presenting his measure, explained that the criticisms levelled at the bill

"are due to lack of information as to the provisions of the bill, or an entire misapprehension as to its purpose."

The unrevised French edition says:

Ces critiques, je crois, viennent d'un manque de renseignements ou de malentendus quant au but de la mesure.

And he added:

The government, let me assure you, is not endeavouring to destroy the confederation pact, or to preclude the use of the French language in the debates of parliament, in the reports of proceedings of parliament, or in the administration of the several departments and agencies of the government of Canada.

But, sir, the bill must be construed as it stands before the house and not according to the explanatory statements of the hon. Secretary of State. We may grant the hon. Secretary of State that he is quite sincere, but why did he not submit a bill worded in the very terms which he used in this house?

What does the bill say? It is stated in the explanatory notes that:

The existing translation service has developed without systematic direction or control; and it it desirable in the interests of efficiency and economy that it should now be organized and the work of translating so distributed that no translator shall be idle or overworked, under paid or over paid.

Then further:

It is believed that the organization and administration of the proposed bureau of translations will result in improved efficiency and a considerable saving of public funds.

Mr. Speaker, did the hon. Secretary of State submit this bill only for the purpose of economy and to have systematic control and direction of the translation of debates, proceedings and public documents?

I shall now read section 3 of the bill and later make definite statements about it: Section 3 of bill No. 4 provides that:

3. (1) There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau of Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

Mr. Speaker, the only thing that this bill provides for is the manner in which translation shall be done, namely: through cooperation. It does not specify that all documents shall be translated and printed in both languages. It is not clear. It only explains the way in which translation shall be carried out. It is not stated in section 3 of this bill that "every one of the documents" shall have to be translated; but only "all documents." It is indeterminate. They might be more or less numerous and it will all depend on the collaboration of the heads of the various departments of the public service. Moreover, this bill adds nothing whatever to the existing rights of the French language as provided for by section 133 of the Confederation Act.

Yesterday I listened very attentively and with great interest to the speech of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre): As he praised the hon. Secretary of State, he said that this bill would greatly add to the rights of the French language and the translation of debates and other documents in both languages. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that nothing in this bill is adding one iota to the rights that the French language has already acquired or to the spirit of the Confederation Act concerning the use of both languages in this parliament, as it has been interpreted heretofore. I say that the wording of this bill ought to be changed and amended. If the hon. Secretary of State is sincere, as I believe he is, he will explain before the committee entrusted with the drafting or amending of this measure, why it is necessary to change the wording of section 3, especially in order to have it stated that not only " it is the duty of" the departments, but that the departments "must" translate, publish and distribute every one of the documents, in both English and French.

Some may say, Mr. Speaker, that the word collaborate with implies an obligation and means what the Secretary of State explained when he presented his measure, namely that the bill will in no way infringe on the rights of the French language as regards the translation of documents. Mr. Speaker, if you refer to the Larousse French Dictionary, you will find that the word "collaborer" simply means:

Travailler avec une ou plusieurs personnes à un ouvrage d'art, d'esprit, etc.

I wonder if that really is the meaning given to the word " collaborate " in section 3 of bill No. 4. I think that this house is right in criticizing and in saying that the phraseology of this bill is incomplete within the meaning and the spirit of confederation.

In the course of his remarks, the hon. Secretary of State laid special emphasis on the questions of efficiency and saving of public funds. That is the practical side of the question which deserves examination. The administration of all the departments is similar to the administration of any business concern. When a reduction of certain expenses or of certain fixed charges is desired, appropriate measures must be taken. I do not wish to criticize the hon. Secretary of State for having paid special attention to that point, because I know that in a time of depression like this, any government or business concern must try to cut down expenditure. But how does the Secretary of State propose to attain this object? It has been said that useless expenditure to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars has resulted from errors in translation, which had to be corrected on the galley proofs sent back by the King's Printer for revision. These galley proofs have to be revised a second time, and so as to avoid this useless expenditure or loss of money, it is now proposed to centralize the translators, in the hope of bringing an improvement. The hon. Secretary of State claims that the present system is responsible for the errors and omissions of the past. I shall not attempt to find who was responsible for the errors complained of; errors may happen anywhere, nothing is perfect in this world. Even admitting that those errors may have cost the amount mentioned by the hon. Secretary of State, should he not, before presenting such a bill, consult the heads of the different departments and ascertain if all the translators have done their duty, if certain departments are not short of translators, and finally if at certain times of the year some translators are not overworked. Would it not have been possible to hold an investigation so as to find out in what departments the work is not done as it should be, and to try some corrective measures for six months, for one year, or even for two years, before bringing down in this house a bill which antagonizes a large section of the population of our country? If the complaints are justified, a little investigation would have removed the cause of the trouble.

I am surprised that no report whatever should have been presented to the house, and that we are not told of any efforts made to remedy the conditions and to remove the cause of the errors found in the work of the translators of the various departments. Instead, we are told: "We want to centralize the translators in order to economize public funds."

There shall be a bureau for translators, according to the terms of the bill. The hon. Secretary of State says that the bureau shall be divided in two branches, but there is not a word to that effect in the bill. There shall be a bureau; that is all. Where shall that bureau be located? Will it be on Sussex street, on Wellington street, a mile away from the centre of the city? Where is it going to be? We do not hear a word about that. One thing is certain; everybody knows, and it will be an extraordinary spectacle when the law shall come into force, to see messengers running around the city of Ottawa—

Mr. MERCIER (Saint-Henri) (Translation): On bicycles?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): —on bicycles, on street cars, walking, motoring, with bundles of papers, with state documents, with departmental files concerning the smuggling of narcotics, the arrest of high placed individuals, or with other papers of the highest importance. And do you think that no errors could happen during the handling of all those documents? I have every confidence in our staff of messengers, but some of them may be weak; such is human nature and it cannot be changed. All those documents shall first be taken from the departmental files and registered by an official, then the chief of the department will hand them to a messenger, who will start on his journey through the streets of the city—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): And the country-side.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): —in the direction of the bureau for translations. There, he will deliver the papers which will be registered on an index card by the receiving clerk, who will stamp the hour and date of reception, and inscribe the nature of the documents received for translation. The chief of the bureau must then take the document and hand it to one of the translators. Then the work of translation begins. When the work is completed the translated text must be submitted for revision. The revision over, the document comes back to the chief once more and then starts travelling again—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The same messenger, with his bicycle.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): The same messenger riding a bicycle or driving a car will bring it back to where it started from, the official files, whence it will be forwarded to the King's Printer who, mayhap, will receive it rather late. I have counted seven formal stages through which the document must necessarily pass.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): A genuine "pigeon hole".

Mr. PARENT (Translation): And it is estimated that each department,—there are 47 of them in the service,—will handle an average of twenty documents each and every day. Multiply 47 by 20, then multiply that result by 7, and you get the fabulous number of more than 5,000 manipulations that these documents will have to undergo every day under a centralized translation service such as that proposed by bill No. 4.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The translation marathon.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Without mentioning the danger of certain indiscretions, of involuntary losses or omissions, on the part of the messengers. But there is more than that. Can one admit for a single instant that documents of the highest importance should be temporarily withdrawn from the official files and allowed to leave the premises of the different departments?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): A very serious matter, indeed.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): And what would happen if at that very moment, for some important reason, or some matter of emergency, a neighbouring department should request the instant return of a document so withdrawn?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): The Secretary of State did not foresee that.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): You can imagine the frantic search that would result to find the wanted document among the two or three thousand that would be in the hands of the translation bureau.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): A game of "hide-and-seek".

Mr. PARENT (Translation): All these things must be considered when it is sought to establish a centralized organization like that proposed by the hon. Secretary of State under bill No. 4.

Mr. Speaker, the centralization of the translation service means the centralization of our translators. A translator, it has been said repeatedly and I say it again, is a specialist. I will add that his work calls for professional qualifications. Time was, when we wanted any document translated, official or otherwise, we used to enlist the services of some University graduate—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Or some amanuensis in Montreal.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): —to have that translation done. For years now the translators of the various departments, by dint of constant application and study, have become specialists in the terminology of the subject dealt with in their respective departments. Moreover the professional character of the translators' work has been duly recognized and a technological association founded in Ottawa. Why? For better training of the young men who graduate from our universities and who thus have the inestimable advantage of self-improvement and of specialization along one or more lines, under the guidance of the technological association. The latter is made up of translators who have had years and years of experience in translation work. A number of works have been published, and as time goes on their number will be added to, by translators whose purpose is to acquaint posterity with the fact that to be a translator does not imply the mere understanding of one language or another, or the stringing together of words from one language to another, or the spoken use of one or more languages: the translator must grasp the full meaning of a given text and reproduce in the other tongue the very intention and the thought the given text is meant to convey.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Are you in favour of the status quo?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Of the status quo, such as it is? Yes. With improvements? Yes; but not along the lines set out in bill 4.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Confounded!

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Crushed!

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Amended!

Mr. PARENT (Translation): We must realize, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend knows it, that no such change as that suggested in the bill can be undertaken after an experience lasting sixty years: If the centralization of the translation services were at all feasible, the thing would have been done before now. An investigation was held and committees appointed to study the proposed system; in every instance the suggestion was rejected. And with very good reason: If you take every translator in the departments, or ten of them from ten different departments, and throw them together with all their notes and encyclopedias, where will you put them? Will they be grouped in a large class room, as in their school days? Will they all be placed under the watchful eye of the superintendent? No, Mr. Speaker, a translator needs no supervision, because it might happen that being a specialist in certain subjects, he would know more about them than his chief or, as we often hear, he would know more than his teacher. If all the translators are grouped in the same building, or in the same room, they will not be able to work with the same efficiency as if they were in separate offices, and they will have to work under worse conditions than in the past. Why not leave them in their respective departments where they have access to the other documents essential to the proper interpretation of the texts they will be called upon to translate?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): If they are centralized, every time they will need some document a messenger will have to be sent for it. In certain cases, fifteen days may elapse before they get the papers they need. It is impracticable.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That never occurred to any one.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Lots of things have not occurred to these gentlemen, and if the Secretary of State had taken the trouble of making the slighest investigation—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): If he had known his business.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): —he would have found that the objections raised in this house are sufficient to justify the six months' hoist moved by the honourable member for Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, as very few members have discussed this bill, I think that I should be allowed more than forty minutes, but I shall conclude my remarks. I have not yet mentioned a group of men who occupy an important place on the "staff" of the official translators.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): My hon. friend has the hiccups.

Mr. MERCIER (Saint-Henri) (Translation): We will have a game of croquet.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I am speaking of the translators of the House of Commons and of the Senate. In the course of his explanation of the bill, the hon. Secretary of State said that he intends to have a separate branch for the translators of the House of Commons and of the Senate. Why did the sponsor of the bill make that declaration so readily? Because, after listening to the arguments on this point, the Secretary of State came to the conclusion that they are well taken and that the bill will not detach the officials of the House of Commons and of the Senate to place them in a department. Why? The House of Commons and the Senate are two representative bodies created by the British North America Act and their officials are responsible to the two houses and not to a department. That cannot and must not be changed, they are a distinct body under the terms of the British North America Act and they must remain officials of the houses of parliament and not be placed under the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: What part of the British North America Act is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. PARENT: I am referring to section 133 of the British North America Act by which I say the translators are members of the staffs of both houses of parliament, the Commons and the Senate. They are vested with rights by the spelling of the law of that article of confederation. Therefore I say that it is impossible that a group from the staffs of both houses of parliament should be separated from those staffs and be put under a minister of the crown. There is no staff of the House of Commons or of the Senate that is directed and supervised by a minister of the crown. The staffs are the staffs of the House of Commons and of the Senate.

Mr. CAHAN: But the hon. gentleman knows well that other services of the House of Commons and of the Senate are performed by departments which are under the direction and control of ministers of the crown.

Mr. PARENT: But the minister surely will not put on the same footing the services of the translators because the translators are in a sense the voice of the representatives of the people of the whole country. We are not going to set their service side by side with that of the employees of a department. Certainly not. I absolutely object that the translators of the House of Commons should be considered on the same footing as employees of any staff outside the House or the Senate coming under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand the argument. Thank you.

Mr. PARENT: That is what I wanted to point out.

(Translation): It would greatly decrease the prerogatives of the House and Senate, if the group of officials, placed by the Confederation Act under the two chambers, were removed. We must bear in mind that we represent the people. The hon. ministers opposite, who are held responsible for the administration of this country, are aware that these officials translate their speeches. What do they translate? They translate the voice of the representatives of the people, yet, it is the desire to lower their status, to remove them and place them behind a departmental screen known as a Bureau for Translations. I protest. I do so for the honour of my country, on behalf of our fathers who signed the confederation pact. When this act was signed by the representatives of Great Britain and those of Upper and Lower Canada, the spirit of this pact stipulated that both English and French should be on the same footing in both houses of parliament, and that it was an official duty for the translators to translate from one language to the other and vice versa, the words spoken by the representatives of the people in this country. I am absolutely opposed to any steps, being taken to establish a difference between these two languages and lower the standing of this group of translators of the house and senate.

I have just stated, sir, that this bill could not be enacted without doing a grave injustice to certain translators assigned to the translation of the debates of the house. The work is of a special and technical nature more than any other, because the subjects discussed here are more complicated than those met in the correspondence of the various departments. I, therefore, state that parliament would make a mistake in forsaking the authority over the translators and its privileges. There is a restriction embodied in this bill but there is also an open door so that, in the future, this bill may serve as an excuse to say to the French Canadian people: By this bill, you have agreed to a kind of compromise. You had, by virtue of the British North America Act acquired rights, which had been adhered to since 1867. By virtue of this bill No. 4, you have agreed to a kind of compromise, you have agreed to discuss the questions as to the extent of these rights and what they embody I state, sir, that it is untimely to discuss our rights. I shall therefore oppose this bill by voting for the amendment.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I do not entertain all the fears of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) in connection with this bill. I have read it carefully and I see in it nothing but an administrative measure. However, it touches one of those topics which arouse the susceptibilities of a substantial group in this house. There are many such topics and several such groups and I need not go further back than the beginning of this session to find an instance where the mention of a subject, however innocently intended, aroused the feeling and support of other groups.

All the arguments for and against the bill have been so broadly canvassed that I do not think I can add very much thereto. However, there is one point to which I should like to address a few remarks. I am vitally interested in good translations and I think that the house as a whole is likewise interested. At the proper time, I should like to see those translators who translate the debates of this house and of the Senate placed on a different footing from the other translators. Nothing is more difficult to translate than colloquial language. It is racy and frequently tinged with slang which, after all, is language in the process of gestation. The translators of the debates of this house and the Senate work under great pressure; they work long hours and cannot during the period of their service enlarge their acquaintance with languages and their evolution. This is necessary to the skilful performance of their task. Men of broad culture and a profound knowledge of both languages are absolutely essential to the proper carrying out of the work of translation. I suggest that it is necessary that these translators should have some leisure in which to cultivate and develop those characteristics so essential to their work. By making the position attractive a higher level of native talent and educational attainment will be secured which will assure to the houses better translators and better translations. It may not be possible to allow these translators six or seven months of inactivity each year but the spirit of the spoken word can be translated into another language only by men who have seized that spirit and who have a knowledge of literature, art and those things which go to make up culture. For these reasons, on behalf of the translators of this house and of the Senate I bespeak special treatment, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the translation of those debates which it is their primary duty to translate.

Mr. CHARLES E. FERLAND (Joliette) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, history and tradition teach us that you are invested with extraordinary powers. As a result of a miracle which tradition alone can account for, there are two persons in you. At the one time you are both Speaker and chairman. When at the request of a messenger from the upper house you leave this chamber to lead the honourable members to the Senate, for the purpose of moving the passing of a supply bill, you are acting as Speaker. You are the "speaker", and you speak on behalf of the house. But on your return to this chamber you cease to be speaker, because you do not speak frequently enough to subsist as such, but you then become the chairman whose duty it is to supervise the proceedings in the house.

Mr. Speaker, were I invested with your powers, endowed with your authority, and had I the opportunity to discharge your duties, I would, I think, order the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) to kneel down before the mace, symbol of royal authority, and there seek pardon from the university of Montreal for the insults he directed against that institution. I would also, perhaps, give him a penance, it being lenten time; I would invite him to meditate on the eleventh verse of psalm 32, the psalm of penance, which reads as follows:

> Nolite fieri sicut equus et mulus
> Quibus non est intellectus.
> Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, > which have no understanding.

Mr. Speaker, it might seem rather cruel on my part to have joined others who have spoken before me in condemnation of the speech I have referred to in connection with the university of Montreal where I read law. I greatly admire and have great respect for the most dignified, most learned and eminent men who are on the teaching staff of the university of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, bill No. 4, entitled "An Act concerning the Bureau for Translations" means a complete upsetting of the established system and I place no reliance on it. This is not the only confusion for which the conservative party may be held responsible since it has come into power. Quite an important part of its policy tends to bring about confusion in the old practices under which the people have been content and have prospered in the days of the former regime. It reminds us of an old French ditty according to which good king Dagobert had donned his breeches inside out. In this instance, Mr. Speaker, not only has the government done likewise, but through its nefarious policy, is about to lead this country into a state of chaos. This bill No. 4 is a piece of legislation the results of which we feel to be of a harmful nature, and the honourable member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois) fittingly pointed that nothing good could be expected to come out of this lump bespattered, with flour.

In the course of a well prepared speech, the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) very gracefully danced on a volcano, as he was dealing with this momentous question of the French language in this country. He made a discovery. He found out the bill meant an additional recognition of the rights of the French language in Canada. Commenting section 133 of the constitution, and quoting the opinions of Hon. Senator Belcourt, of everlasting memory, he insinuated and implied that previous to the introduction of that bill No. 4, the French Canadians did not enjoy equal rights in the Dominion, or, in other words, he inferred and implied that our rights were not adequately safeguarded by the British North America Act. Let me in the first place reply to him on that particular point. Section 133 of the constitution to which the hon. gentleman referred reads as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

Personally, I have not the slightest doubt but that, according to both the spirit and the letter of the constitution, the two languages, in parliament and in the legislature of Quebec, as well as in the courts of Quebec, are on an equal footing in Canada.

The hon. the Solicitor General has mentioned two rules of this house, the one making it compulsory to read the motions in both languages, and the other, to translate all bills in both the official languages as well.

He also intimated that these two sections were sanctioning rights in some cases, which they are referring to. Well, the hon. Solicitor General, since he saw fit to admit that the only rights established by the constitution in favour of the French language come from section 133, could have added that not only Hon. Senator Belcourt never contended that English and French had not equal rights, but that he devoted his life—and what a life of sacrifices, devotion and patriotism—to claiming equal rights for the French language, not as a charity, but in virtue of the constitution and as a matter of equity, and also to claiming freedom of speech to allow one to express himself in both languages, which freedom was sanctioned by the spirit and the letter of the Constitutional Act.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him? I would not like him to attribute to me words that I never uttered. I never said or intimated that we had not equal rights. On the contrary, we have equal rights in this country.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make note of the Solicitor General's admission—

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Nobody contends that we have not equal rights.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): —which admission is after all in conformity with the traditions of all French Canadians, as regards the constitution and its interpretation. But if we enjoy equal rights in this country and in all departments of the government, so far as the French language is concerned, if we have a right to have our public documents and reports published in French, if we have all these rights, why does the Solicitor General say that this new act is a remedial measure which implements a previous legislation, namely section 133 of the constitutional act? Is it not an intimation, as some hon. member said before him, that we have not equal rights, since we must have a new legislation to implement the previous one? But is this bill actually a remedial measure? Last evening the hon. Solicitor General said so. He said: Under section 3 of Bill No. 4, the government hereafter will be compelled to translate all proceedings, documents, reports and papers mentioned in that section. I say no. The bill does not go as far as that. I think the Solicitor General gives a wrong interpretation of the act.

Let us see what the bill says in section 3:

> There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau of Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate . . . in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports.

This means that hereafter the bureau of translation will be centralized in a building and shall contribute to the translation from one language into another, of all documents or of any documents. But the bill does not go farther than that.

Did not the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), who has just resumed his seat, state a moment ago that there was nothing else in this bill than a mere question of administration? It is obvious that there is no sanction of rights which we did not possess previously. Why make such statements to the people of this country? Why prepare electoral literature which will allow them to say in the next election: We have gone a step forward with regard to the French language; we have won a splendid victory, and God knows, at the cost of great hardship and painstaking. Our leader, the Prime Minister, had stated last year that Canada was not a bilingual country. Our leader, the Prime Minister, had stated—

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Let me finish my sentence and then you may ask one.

If we believe the statement of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), deputy speaker of the house, our leader, the Prime Minister threatened to resign last year if we voted for bilingual currency; and we French Canadian Conservatives of Quebec, we won a splendid victory; we have provided in the statutes that hereafter the government will be compelled to translate in French all parliamentary documents, all departmental reports, when at present there are in the Department of Interior 185 documents dealing with natural resources that are not translated into French, 37 very important ones in the Department of Agriculture that are not translated into French, and more than fifty per cent of the documents in other departments which are distributed to the public only in English.

This bill, a victory? No, it is not a victory. But if it is sought to interpret it in that way, I say any such claim is pure camouflage. Indeed, I defy the hon. Secretary of State to maintain that this bill means that in future the government will be obliged to have all the documents of the various departments translated. I defy the Prime Minister to so state on the floor of this house. I defy the hon. Solicitor General, as also the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau)—two of my friends and two of my distinguished colleagues at the bar of the province of Quebec—to move an amendment to the bill specifying in black and white that in future all documents mentioned in section 3 must be and shall be translated into the French tongue. I repeat that I defy them to so move; I know they will never propose any such amendment, because section 3 cannot be interpreted in that way and the government would not accept any such measure.

Now you may ask your question if you wish.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): I wanted to ask my hon. friend from Joliette to say when and where the right hon. Prime Minister—who is absent to-day, and my hon. friend knows he is absent—stated that he was opposed to bilingualism in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He is absent; but he is well represented by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon).

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): Ask him to deny that he said it.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, if the question interests my learned friend I shall obtain the quotation for him; I haven't it at hand just now. I refer him to the French speaking members of the press gallery and to the general opinion throughout the province of Quebec, where it is held that he made the statement.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is not an answer.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): And I shall bring him also a declaration by the Prime Minister of the love he bore Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in days gone by, when the Riel question was a burning one in the west.

The hon. Solicitor General attempts to convince the country that the government is doing us a favour or presenting us with a gift. It is evident that if by the terms of this bill the government were to be obliged to have French translations made of all documents, whatever their nature, that would be a genuine victory, a privilege, a gift; but until it be so written in the bill, until a responsible English speaking member of the government so declares, until we are given some definite assurance, I say that I refuse to believe it.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman has been defying those on this side of the house to state this and state that. What I say to him is that this bill provides for the translation into French and English of all official documents of general import. There may be private documents that will not be and never have been translated.

Mr. FERLAND: Why does the minister not insert that provision very clearly in the bill, if it means that in future the government will be obliged to have a translation made of all documents mentioned in section 3?

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the bill as drafted carried with it the implication that official documents are to be translated. Of course there are in the departments certain documents in English or in French which relate to the ordinary daily intercourse between officials of departments, and which are more or less private; in such cases translation is not necessary. But I am dealing with official documents published in connection with the administration of federal affairs.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this bill, in my opinion, and according to the interpretation made of it by the French press of the country, does not imply that in future all documents will be translated into French. All the bill says is this: all official documents translated will in future be translated in the bureau instead of in the different departments. In other words, not only does the bill offer no guarantee for the French language, but the French language is not even mentioned; it is reduced to the same status as Chinese, Arabian or Russian. We must have translators of foreign extraction. Under the bill such translators will be on the same footing as the other translators. I say that this bill not only does not grant any new privileges or additional guarantees to the French tongue, but that it reduces French to the same status as foreign languages, which would please a certain number of English fanatics in this country—I am alluding to no one in this House of Commons—certain narrow-minded people who are forever claiming that we, of French Canada, have no more rights in this country than the Chinese or the Poles.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Those are unfortunate words, not at all helpful to the present cause.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. Solicitor General notes a lack of skill on my part. Alas, genius is not a boon of daily occurrence. But I am under the impression that he went the wrong way about this matter.

I do not want the impression to be carried abroad that this diffuse, obscure and indefinite bill means that all public documents shall be translated, when no particular section of the bill says so, and when all presumptions are to the contrary. In fact, what have been the arguments brought forward in favour of the present bill? Is there a single word in the bill to the effect that the French language shall have better consideration? Not one.

Let us read the explanatory notes. Briefly, they state that the object of the bill is to ensure more efficiency in the translation and a saving of public funds. How can you reconcile this idea of saving with the prediction of the hon. Solicitor General that we shall have a French translation of hundreds of documents formerly published exclusively in English? Considerable amounts shall then be spent in the name of economy. But who shall profit from those economies? Surely not our French speaking compatriots. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we know that this bill does not apply to one single English translator. We know also that, with the exception of a few translators of foreign languages, the majority of translators are French-Canadians. They are the ones who are concerned in the present bill. Then, who shall have to carry the burden of this measure of economy if not our French-speaking compatriots? Why look for insignificant savings at the expense of French-Canadians when we know that for years, if not for generations, we have never had in the different departments and in the public service the proper share of representation to which we are entitled by reason of our situation and of our numbers? Why stop at such ludicrous savings? For the last two years, the government has been spending millions for all kinds of works. Why, in the name of economy, make an attack upon three millions of French-Canadian citizens?

Mr. Speaker, I can see in this bill no guarantee that the rights of the French language will be safeguarded. It should never have been introduced in this house and should not be passed. If our hon. friends wish to be sincere, it is easy to come to an agreement. Let them be generous and add to this bill just two or three words to the effect that, in the future, all documents shall be translated into French, instead of deceiving us with words, and using language which might be interpreted one way in one province and differently in another province.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Quebec will understand the situation made for our compatriots who shall witness the abolition of a certain number of positions of translators for the sake of economy.

Mr. Speaker, one of the objects of this bill is efficiency in the public service. It has been said that the translators are not qualified and, as an example, three so-called wrong translations of words have been quoted: "incomber," "auditeur général," and "orateur" to designate the Speaker of the House of Commons. I shall establish that those three expressions are conformed to tradition, to our parliamentary usage, to the rules, to the genius of the language and to the best dictionaries. The words "It is the duty of," in subsection 2, of paragraph 3, have been translated by "il incombe." It has been contended that it is not a good translation. I am of the opinion that it is excellent translation, as a matter of fact, it is the most elegant. Let us look at the dictionaries; we shall see that this expression has received the seal of the French Academy. Mr. Speaker, could there be a higher authority than the French Academy? "Incombe," according to the dictionary of the French Academy, vol. 2, p, 22, is said of a function, of a duty imposed upon a person, of a responsibility which falls upon some one.

In the bill, it is said that the department or the officers shall have the duty to do such or such a thing.

Incomber, v.n.—Il se dit en parlant d'une charge, d'un devoir imposé à quelqu'un, d'une responsabilité qui retombe sur lui.

(Dictionnaire de l'Académie française, II, p. 22).

Incomber, v.n.—Etre imposé. (Dictionnaire Hatzfeld et Darmesteter).

Incomber, v.n.—Etre imposé, en parlant d'une charge, d'un devoir. "C'est à moi que ce devoir incombe." (Littré.)

Incomber, v.n.—S'emploie quelquefois dans le langage ordinaire, en parlant d'une charge, d'une responsabilité, d'un devoir qui est imposé à quelqu'un, qui est au nombre de ses obligations. (Bescherelle.)

Incomber, v.n.—Etre imposé, revenir comme une obligation, "Les devoirs qui nous incombent." (Larousse.)

Incomber, v.n.—Se dit d'une charge, d'un devoir, d'une responsabilité. "Il s'effraya de la lourde charge qui lui incombait." (Paul Guérin, "Dictionnaire des dictionnaires.")

Incomber: to be the duty of . . . (Hamilton et Legros, "Dictionnaire international français-anglais.")

Incomber: to be the duty (of) . . . (Clifton et Grimaux, "Dictionnaire français-anglais.")

I now come to the translation of the word "auditeur général." Father Lejeune, who has enriched the spiritual inheritage of our people with a work entitled "Dictionnaire général du Canada" authorizes the use of the expression "auditeur général," as being the exact and correct translation of auditor general. Our compatriot Pierre Daviault, a translator on the staff of the House of Commons, in a volume entitled "Questions de langage" at pages 26 and 27 expresses himself thus:

Auditor General—Auditeur general—The etymology of the word "auditeur" dates back to the period when accounts were, in practice, so complicated that, at the "cour des comptes" there were young members specially appointed to note the numbers and figures called out, then to repeat them, saying: "Audivi."

Whence the name "auditeur" which has remained with them and which has become synonymous to "vérificateur" in France. The "Cour des comptes" comprises, to-day, twenty-seven auditors.

May we add to this definition that the word "auditeur" is in use only in the administration of a state, and, in Canada, only to translate "Auditor General. " In the commercial vocabulary "auditor" is translated by "vérificateur." In certain cases, "apurateurs, contrôleur, censeur" may be used.

Dictionnaire financier, international, théorique et pratique of Mr. A. Méliot, fourth edition, Berger-Levrault, editors, Paris, 1912, page 305.

Censeur, Censure—La censure—namely the auditing of accounts—is done by auditors known as "censeurs, commissaires des comptes ou auditeurs," just as they still are known at the "Cour des comptes." The etymology of this work dates back to the period when accounts were, in practice, so complicated that there were young members specially appointed to note numbers or figures called out, then to repeat them, saying: "Audivi," I heard. Whence the name "auditeurs" which has remained with them and has become almost synonymous to auditor, in England as well as in France.

I shall now take up the translation of your title, Mr. Speaker; it is the most important word: "Orateur." I again quote an excerpt of the same work by Mr. Pierre Daviault, a remarkable work which I advise all who wish to polish their language to read:

Speaker.—In all British countries, the president of the House of Commons, is known as "The Speaker." Humourists add that he is so called because he never speaks. It is a jest not only out of fashion but untrue. The Speaker is the person who addresses the King or his representative, on behalf of the Commons. He is the spokesman (porte-parole) of the lower chamber.

How is this word to be translated? In the common parlance. there is no hesitation: "président" fits in well.

But. in the official language? Let us bear in mind that the Speaker does not entirely fulfil the duties of a president, in the ordinary sense of the word. The administration staff of the house have adopted "Orateur" from the very first days of confederation; if I am not mistaken (65 years! that counts in the life of a young country). Such a venerable tradition should compel us to use "Orateur" without protest. However, many dislike the word. A number of persons contend that it should be strictly translated by president or that we should designate him as "Speaker." The Speaker is appointed for the entire parliament. He is the mouthpiece of the house. Whence his title of Speaker (Orateur) ...

Maurel Dupeyré in "les Usages du Parlement anglais," quoted by Eugène Pierre "Traité du Droit politique" page 496.

In "Larousse" a dictionary which is in the hands of all primary school children, to the word "Orateur" we find: "Orateur": see Speaker.

And to the word Speaker: Speaker (pronounced "spikeur." English word from to speak "parler"), masculin noun, president of House of Commons in England. The Speaker has his quarters in the Palace at Westminster.

James Alexander Manning, in his work entitled "Speakers of the House of Commons" and published in 1850, says:

Sir Thomas Hungerford one of the Knights of the Shire for Wilts, styled in the Parliament Rolls: "Monsieur Thomas de Hungerford, chevalier, qui avait les paroles pur les communes d'Angleterre en cest Parliament (Rolls of Parliament 51 Ed. 3 Anno 1377 No. 87).

As one may judge the translation dates far back. Therefore, briefly, sir, "Orateur" and "Auditeur général" have been officially adopted in Canada since confederation. It is to be found in the statutes and all official documents. It is certainly not the task of translators to alter it. Moreover, they are French words, as many examples prove it. It is possible that some dislike it. However, for a personal preference, not founded on unquestionable reasons, can one censure and charge the translators of inefficiency?

Before resuming my seat, I wish to pay due credit to the efficiency of the translators, more particularly to the parliamentary translators with whom I am more acquainted. It is incontestable that the translation, in our parliament, is done very speedily. The speech which I am now delivering will be translated to-morrow sent to the King's Printer, printed, the proofs read and in two or three days I shall have the translation on my desk. Can one imagine a more perfect or efficient system, sir,? Of course, perfection does not exist on earth. There is perhaps only one perfect man in this house. There are most likely only those angels known as women, who are, relatively speaking, perfect in this country. In this genleman's club there is very likely but one woman to whom the appellation may be given and who enjoys, may I say, the distinction of nearing perfection, but there is no such a thing as perfection throughout Canada. Therefore, if perfection is to be found nowhere, one must admit that incompetency does not exist amongst the translators, who are all men of great knowledge, for the greater part well possessed of the genius of Shakespeare's tongue as well of that of Racine, familiar to the utmost with the contents of dictionaries and capable of turning out translation to a degree of expertness such as to elicit praise as in the case of translations which I once happened to submit to a member of the bar in Ontario, a man of high standing in his profession and one of the best read men in English Canada. Speaking for instance of a translation made by a Mr. Vallières, he declared it to be beyond reproach, that it could not be improved upon by either the addition or elimination of a single word, that the language used was of great purity, the technical terms most appropriate and that, in short, every thing was expressed in a most elegant style.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks, I wish to state that when taking this position in connection with the bill now under discussion, I am in excellent company. In fact, I am in agreement with the distinguished representatives of the French press in this house, and my opinion also is in harmony with that of the French speaking members of this house, whether they be on the Conservative or Liberal side, as to the construction to be placed on the British North America Act. My views also concur with those of the French Educational Association of Ontario, an organization the membership of which includes men of high standing and in which the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is the leading figure.

The French Educational Association of Ontario is the guardian, so to speak, of the rights of the French language both in Ontario and in parliament. Under date of March 2, 1934, the following letter was sent by that body to the Secretary of State:

Honourable Minister,

I am instructed by the executive committee of the French Educational Association of Ontario to express to you their strong opposition to the bill respecting the bureau for translations, the second reading of which was moved by you, a few days ago, in the House of Commons.

Judging from the explanatory notes of the bill as well as from further indications given by yourself to the house, the object of the proposed legislation is to add to the efficiency and usefulness of the translation departments as well as to lower the costs in connection therewith.

It is not within our purview to say whether the legislation, even if faultlessly applied, will really achieve that three-fold purpose, but it is permissible to entertain some doubts as to the results hoped for by its promoters, considering the arguments put forward in the house against the bill, the opposition of the deputy-heads of the different departments in the public service as well as the evidence adduced by persons fully conversant with the difficulties involved in the translation from one language to the other.

Apart of this, the proposed legislation gives rise to serious objections:

(a) Contrary to what has been claimed by some, the bill does not confer to the French language any right in addition to those already provided for by the constitution; it rather tends to limit those rights in removing the bilingual character of the organized services in each department, and in putting the French language on the same footing as the foreign languages in the Dominion civil service;

(b) It confers to the minister, or to whomever may be entrusted with the administration of the bill, the right to transfer to the new central bureau the translators of the different departments, and as a result, provides for the eventual wiping out of the translating staffs of such departments. The outcome would be a lowering of the French prestige in those departments and an encouragement of the practice constantly increasing in certain sections of the dominion administration whereby official business is only transacted in the English language, even when dealing with the province of Quebec;

(c) It places under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, the translating staffs, including the present and future heads in that branch of the service, thus depriving many French-speaking officials of their rights to promotion to higher positions in their respective departments, rights which they are enjoying under the present system;

(d) It does not follow the practice in force in countries with two or more official languages and where the rights and privileges of the minority are respected by the majority, particularly in Belgium and in Switzerland; the present system applied at the present time to the Dominion translating services is based on the report submitted in 1911 to the government by Mr. Achille Fréchette on the efficiency of the translation branches existing in the above mentioned countries;

(e) It is met with open opposition on the part of the deputy-heads of every department, and is in contradiction with the report of the Sellar committee appointed in 1932 by this government. It is also opposed by the higher officials of the House of Commons, and of the Senate; by the officials concerned, by the majority of French-speaking members, by many English-speaking members, by practically the entire French press, by every important French organization or association in Canada, and lastly by nearly the whole French population of the country;

(f) No case was made to show that the defects complained of are attributable to the existing system and in our opinion the proposed legislation is not the only way in which the various translation services can be made more efficient, more productive and less costly.

Therefore, we regret being compelled to register, on behalf of the French-Canadian population of Ontario, our strong protest against the passing of the proposed bill respecting the translators.

With the assurance of our most respectful consideration, honourable minister, we beg to remain,

Sincerely yours,

L'Association Canadienne-Française d'éducation d'Ontario,

(Signed) Edmond Cloutier, Secrétaire.

Ottawa, 2nd March, 1934.

Mr. CAHAN: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is reading what purports to be, if I followed him correctly, a personal letter addressed to me.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. CAHAN: This letter certainly should be laid upon the table of the house where I may have access to it and an opportunity to reply.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I say, on the point of order, that not only did I receive a copy of that letter but that a large number of hon. members of this house have also received it.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I think I have a right under the practice of this house to have the original laid on the table where I may have access to it.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay the letter on the table of the house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Every French member of this house has been circularized.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I assure the house I do not remember seeing it, although it was addressed to me, therefore I ask that it be laid on the table.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): The letter is now filed.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand then that the hon. gentleman will table a copy?

Mr. FERLAND: This is a copy.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): He has acceded to your demand.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): A copy is on the table.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, after having heard the elaborate and conclusive speeches of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I did not think it would be necessary to discuss at any great length the bill relating to the translations bureau. It seems so apparent to all those who have studied the bill and heard the admirable presentation of his case by the Secretary of State that the proposed legislation consists essentially in the improvement of the work of translation and thereby the maintenance of the rights of the French language in all matters pertaining to departmental administration. The eloquent speech of my hon. friend from Labelle demonstrated beyond any shadow of doubt that the regrettable campaign conducted against the government in the Liberal press, and, I am sorry to say, in some independent newspapers circulating among the French population of Canada, is uncalled for, unjust and unfounded. This unjustified opposition is discouraging not only to those French Canadians who sincerely believe that in voting for this bill they fulfil their duty towards their race in securing the improvement of the status of the French language in parliamentary business, but also to all broadminded, just, courageous and enlightened English-speaking members such as the Secretary of State, who perhaps more than any of his compatriots of his own generation has seized every opportunity to show his sincere sympathy and appreciation of the French race and the French language and the rights of minorities.

Those who heard the masterful defence of this bill last night by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), and who remember his clear, well presented and unanswerable arguments will see, I hope, their apprehensions dispelled. But hon. gentlemen opposite persist in following the tactics adopted by their board of strategy and attack the bill on the ground that it unnecessarily persecutes the translators and may destroy the efficiency of translation. Briefly they insinuate that in voting for this bill we are unfaithful to our duties, our race and our language. The speech of the hon. member who just resumed his seat is an illustration of the narrow and partisan view some hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted towards this beneficial legislation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I rise to a point of order. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to impute partisan motives to any hon. member on this or the other side of the house.

Mr. GAGNON: I did not impute motives at all; I said the speech and the arguments used by the last speaker illustrated the narrow view taken by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I have a sincere regard and a great sympathy for the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Ferland); I think he is a nice gentleman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I ask for a ruling on my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GAGNON: I like the hon. member for Joliette, and I am sure he will regret—

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), and he has asked for a decision.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): I do not see any imputation of political motives in the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GAGNON: I like the hon. member for Joliette, and I am sure he will regret having intimated that the Prime Minister said, either last year or this year, that he was opposed to the rights enjoyed by the French language in Canada. I am sure no one can challenge my statement when I say that if anyone, inside or outside of this house, ever intimated that the Prime Minister has said that he is against the French language, this gentleman, be he a member of parliament or be he not, has uttered an absurd and infamous lie.

Let us approach this legislation with an unprejudiced mind; let us discuss it as calmly and as coolly as possible. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), whom I am pleased to congratulate on his remarkable progress as an English speaking debater, said he was surprised that no French speaking member on this side of the house had risen to defend this bill. The hon. gentleman was quite right; we were purposely silent during the first two days of the discussion of the bill. We were anxious to see if hon. gentlemen opposite would have the audacity to pretend that they are better patriots and better serviteurs de la pensée française than the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the hon. gentleman a monopoly of that?

Mr. GAGNON: No, I never pretended to have a monopoly of it, but hon. gentlemen opposite have pretended to have a monopoly of patriotism. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that, at first, the French Conservative members of this house were alarmed when this bill was introduced. This legislation took us by surprise, and the translators complained bitterly. Before the session opened we had not heard that any such bill was being drafted, and when we read the arguments against the bill coming from certain quarters and appearing in some French newspapers we did what might reasonably be expected of members of parliament; we thought over the whole problem, studied the proposed legislation carefully and compared it with the provisions of article 133 of the British North America Act. We discussed the bill among ourselves and with our ministers; we met some translators and heard their views. Then we forwarded to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) a memorandum in which we expressed our opinions and requested that the bill be sent to a special select committee in order that all interested parties might appear and defend their rights, and in order that the whole problem might be fully investigated and studied. We did not do what has been done this afternoon and on previous occasions; we did not rise in our places and read copies of letters which have not been seen by the Secretary of State. We asked that by all means the translations be kept as efficient as possible and that French translators should not be discriminated against in any shape or form. Unmindful of the campaign of insinuation and slander that was being launched in some quarters, we arranged to meet the Secretary of State, and we asked some translators to submit their views to us. It is true, sir, that we did not ask the views of the translators who apparently are leading the opposition to this bill and who have supplied our Liberal strategists with the arguments with which they think this bill should be met.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell me the names of one or two of the translators who were interviewed, so that we may judge as to whether or not they were competent?

Mr. GAGNON: That question certainly is not worthy of my hon. friend; he cannot expect that I will give any names, but he need only look to the galleries of the house to see what is going on. Finally we became firmly convinced that there is nothing in this bill which in the slightest degree is unfair or unjust to the translators. On the other hand it brings about a great improvement over the existing situation with regard to translations not only in the House of Commons and the Senate but in the different departments of the federal administration as well.

I am very glad, sir, that the French Conservative members of this house have been able to help the translators instead of doing as some hon. gentlemen opposite have done and spreading through the province of Quebec the idea that the government was attempting to destroy and abolish the rights of the French language by creating a bureau for translations. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Jean), raised the constitutional issue. Of course that might be expected, but I say to him that if he had listened carefully to the speech of the Secretary of State in moving the second reading of this bill he would have noticed that the minister mentioned that it was intended to organize two branches of translators in this bureau. One branch will comprise the translators of the House of Commons and the Senate while the other branch will include the translators of the different departments. This creation of two distinct branches is not set out in the bill, but I sincerely congratulate the Secretary of State upon having decided to keep the translators of the House of Commons and the Senate under one administration while the translators of the different departments are to be under another. I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, that this amelioration of the bill is due only to the efforts of the French speaking Conservative members of the house. No; other gentlemen whom hon. gentlemen opposite attack slyly have proven to be true friends of translators and have constantly defended the sound principle that the House of Commons ought not to abandon the control over its own officers.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member has no right to accuse hon. members opposite of attacking gentlemen slyly. He has no right to do it, and I demand that he withdraw the statement.

Mr. GAGNON: I shall abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. When very often in this house I hear attacks made by hon. gentlemen opposite against people who cannot defend themselves, for instance against the Clerk of the House, I say that such attacks are unworthy and are not courageous.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member should not say attacks are "unworthy." He has used two expressions which are unparliamentary and I demand a ruling upon them. We are waiting for a ruling.

Mr. GAGNON: Now,—

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, what is your ruling? The hon. member has no right to proceed until a ruling is given.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): To what rule does the hon. member refer?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It is in the book.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Gobeil): It may take some time.

Mr. GAGNON: In order to save time, Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw the expressions which have displeased the house.

Coming to the merits of the bill, is it necessary that I should repeat the arguments used so eloquently by the Secretary of State, the hon. member for Labelle or the hon. Solicitor General? Hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken against the bill have delivered very interesting lectures about translations, and about what they ought or ought not to be. But do hon. gentlemen opposite sincerely believe that hon. members on this side of the house are ignorant of the great difficulties in connection with the science of translation? Do they believe, seriously, that we remain indifferent to the future of translators who are in almost daily contact with hon. gentlemen of this house? What advantage would there be in our approving of the proposed legislation if we were not seriously convinced that it constitutes a great improvement and will not be at all harmful to the work of translation?

It has been said, and I repeat emphatically, that the object of the bill is, mainly, to ensure that French copies of all documents, reports of departments, reports of proceedings of this house and reports of commissions submitted to the government or to parliament, be printed, published and delivered to the public at the same time as the printing and distribution of English copies. If such laudable results were to be obtained, I ask you sincerely, Mr. Speaker, if they would not constitute a great improvement upon the existing practice. Must we not consider with a sympathetic mind a bill which contemplates such happy consequences?

I regret sincerely that a few minutes ago the hon. member for Joliette said that by this legislation the French language was not more protected than were the Chinese and Japanese languages. Surely the hon. gentleman has not read the bill very attentively, because if he had read section 4 at lines 6, 7 and 8 he would have found that the only two languages which are expressly mentioned are English and French. If, sir, the French language is expressly mentioned, and if it is provided that documents in French shall be translated into English, or vice versa, I believe it is unfair and unjust to say that the French language is not more protected than are the Chinese and Japanese languages.

For the last fifty years I have been curious enough to study the Hansard of the House of Commons, and I have found some very interesting details with respect to translation. Some of these details of course are well known to all hon. members. Nevertheless I shall quote what I have found in order to prove that the situation has not improved very greatly upon the condition which existed fifty years ago. One of the first protests lodged about the delay in the production of French papers and documents was made by the Hon. T. C. Casgrain who is reported in Hansard for the year 1898 as follows:

> I do not think that the French version of the debates has yet been published. It had not been some time ago. The English version was received on the first days of this session.

I find that one of my predecessors in the county of Dorchester, Mr. J. B. Morin, on May 6, 1902, spoke in connection with this matter; and he is reported in Hansard for 1902, volume 2, page 4354, as follows:

> I would like to know why it is that the Hansard printed in French is too late in being distributed to the members. I only see the French Hansard ten or twelve days after the speeches have been delivered, and during the recess I do not receive it for four or five months. I do not see why it should not be sent to us in a couple of weeks at least. I was down there a couple of weeks ago to see if there were any printed in French, and was told that they would not be ready for four or five months. If they are not ready for four or five months is it any use to have them at all. When we come here at the beginning of the session we cannot get a French report of any kind.

In 1906 the Hon. T. C. Casgrain complained again, and is reported in Hansard of 1906, volume 2, page 3323 as follows:

> Although a number of bills are on the order paper for second time, they are not printed in French. I do not wish to put any obstacle in the way seeing that the session is well advanced, however, I do not want this to be a precedent.

In a debate in this House of Commons in 1907 the hon. member for Labelle, the same hon. member who represents Labelle to-day, is reported in Hansard of 1906-07, volume 2, page 3663, as follows:

The ground of complaint is that though the quality of both languages has been conceded by all governments and by the house, the French translation department is treated as an unimportant department. If we had an adequate number of translators for the work of translating both the debates of the house and bills and other documents published under the authority of this parliament, there would not be any such delays.

And then, later on:

We receive letters almost every day from our constituents asking us when they can get a certain document in French. The French version of the debates are often from two to three weeks behind, and those of bills and other public documents are often a month or more. I have known of a delay of six months before we could get the French translations of certain public documents. Almost every year there is an extraordinary case. For example, the records of committees of this house have to be translated and printed.

I will be fair enough to admit that in 1910 Sir Wilfrid Laurier was alive to the situation and saw that the question of translation was discussed before a special committee of this house. A committee studied the matter, following which Mr. Frechette, to whose report reference has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, was sent abroad in order to study the matter. The committee of 1910 studied the matter of centralization of translation, but as Mr. Frechette reported in the negative no action was taken. I have quoted the extracts from Hansard to show that notwithstanding complaints which had been sent by public bodies, by French newspapers and by many public corporations in the province of Quebec and elsewhere we are not much more advanced than we were forty or fifty years ago. Of course, there have been some slight improvements with respect to the translation of debates of the house. With respect to the translation of documents of departments the situation is still so imperfect that French translations of committee reports and reports of departments are sometimes published six months and more after the issue of the English copies. Is it not imperative, sir, I seriously ask you, that appropriate measures should be taken to achieve a considerable and definite improvement? The proposed bill will put a stop to such an undesirable state of things. When this bill becomes law the members of parliament who have done nothing during the long years of parliament to improve the situation, and who may have been tempted or are now tempted sometimes, no matter to which political party they belong, to make political capital out of the late production of French translations must admit that when the French copies are delivered at the same time as the English copies the whole of our French population will be very much better satisfied and will be grateful to members of parliament for this new legislation. There is no doubt, I humbly submit, that this bill ought to receive the unanimous support of all the French members of this house irrespective of party affiliations.

The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois), for whom I have a great admiration, have spoken of the disapproval of this legislation by a certain number of French newspapers of Quebec and Ontario. That is unfortunately true, but after having read all these articles carefully we cannot do other than draw the conclusion that the writers have been unduly apprehensive or that they have been misled by some of the translators or their friends. They argue as if it were true that the translators would be dismissed or their numbers considerably lessened on the passing of this bill. I sincerely believe that with the new bureau for translations in operation the number of translators will have to be increased instead of being decreased. The economy that the government is endeavouring to bring about does not consist in the reduction of salaries of translators or in their retirement or dismissal, but in the stopping of that obnoxious and ridiculous practice of having two, and sometimes three or four galley proofs prepared before the typewritten document is finally printed and published. The Secretary of State has said, and has not been contradicted, that last year $75,000 was misspent in the revising, resetting and reprinting of documents which should have been corrected, not on the printer's galley proof, but on the typewritten document written by the translators.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman has made reference to the amount that it costs for the correction of galley proofs of the French translations. Does he know how much it costs for the correction of the English galley proofs?

Mr. GAGNON: The hon. gentleman cannot expect that I can answer a question like that. He has only to read the speech of the Secretary of State where he will find all the details set out.

Mr. VENIOT: He did not refer to that.

Mr. GAGNON: Is it not true that more translators could be employed if we could save $75,000 a year and bring about the reforms that we ask for. The attitude of the men at the printing bureau who are fathers of families and are receiving small wages compared with the translators ought to interest parliament as much as the attitude of the translators. The Secretary of State has explained that because the service of translation is improperly and imperfectly organized he has been obliged to dispense with many French-Canadian printers who in December last had no means to pay for food, fuel and shelter. The creation of the new bureau will enable the government to economize and keep these people in their jobs. Need I recall to hon. gentlemen opposite that printers of French are French-Canadians just as much as the translators of this house or of the departments? The poor printers may be less learned in the sciences than the translators. They may have fewer friends among the newspaper men, because a great number of the translators are old journalists, but on the other hand I respectfully submit that the case of the poor printers is just as deserving of sympathy as that of any other civil servant who painfully and honestly performs his duty and earns his daily bread.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) has given a somewhat exaggerated picture of the operations of the proposed bureau. Speaking at page 1021 of Hansard he said:

> Suppose this department is organized and a head is appointed to supervise all translations coming therefrom. The Secretary of State has a document to be translated and he calls up the bureau for translations and asks for a man. Possibly the subject relates to agriculture, and of course the bureau, following railroad rules, first in first out, in order to divide up the work, so that no one will be overloaded and everyone will have the same proportion, sends out a man who probably has taken two years at university in the study of medicine. This man knows all the medical terms, and he is called upon to translate something relating entirely to agriculture. There will certainly be a good many technical terms quite unknown to him, and he accordingly produces an erroneous translation. What will be the state of affairs if the minister happens to be a gentleman who is acquainted with one language only? Vice sersa, suppose the Minister of Health calls for a translator to give him a translation of something dealing with medical questions. He calls up the bureau and as translators 5, 6 and 7 are out, No. 8 is assigned to this work. He is quite familiar with agricultural terms but he knows nothing whatever about the terms used in medicine. Could anything be more ridiculous?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke seriously believe that the bureau for translations will function in the ridiculous way which he described in a rather humorous fashion? Surely he must credit the chief of the bureau with some common sense. The hon. member has had much experience in the lumber and papermaking business. What would he say if the foreman of one of his mills would indifferently call a chemist to do the work of an engineer or a chauffeur to do the work of a paper-maker? He would think his foreman had gone crazy. Why would the future chief of the bureau for translations use less common sense and good judgment in the management of the bureau than the foreman of one of my hon. friend's lumber or paper mills?

Other hon. gentlemen opposite have described the pitiful fate of the translators and have depicted the future bureau as being a place where the translators will be pressed together like sardines under the terrible eye of a supervisor who will impose silence upon them just as a schoolmaster does upon his school children. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite where in the bill do they find even the suggestion of such ridiculous proposals which, as a matter of fact, they can find only in their own imagination. The chief of the bureau for translations will have to be a man thoroughly conversant with the French and English languages. Very likely he will be a French-Canadian, and eventually one of the translators will become chief of the bureau. Does any hon. member seriously contend that the future chief of the bureau will be a despot or autocrat who will think only of cutting the translators' throats? Some hon. gentlemen smile, but nevertheless that is the kind of argument that we have read in some of the newspapers and which has been used by some hon. gentlemen opposite in opposing this bill.

Many hon. gentlemen have referred to the report of Mr. Achille Frechette, who in 1910 was chief of translation of the House of Commons, and who declared himself against the centralization of translation. I have nothing to say against that gentleman, but it seems to me that many changes have taken place since 1910. At that time radio was nonexistent and aeroplanes were very imperfect. Bleriot had only recently been hailed as a great man for crossing the English channel. Do hon. gentlemen seriously believe that because a suggestion was considered impracticable in 1910 it could not be acted upon in a practical fashion in 1934? The translators will not lose their liberty under the provisions of this bill. Those who are experts in certain lines will continue to do the work for which they have special training and experience. Those who are experts in agriculture will not be called upon to translate matters relating to mineralogy. The Secretary of State has stated in unequivocal terms that the translators of the House of Commons will remain under the jurisdiction and control of that house. The vacation which these translators use for historical and literary studies may be preserved. A section of the Civil Service Act protects them in that respect. I am surprised that hon. members opposite who have been so free in picturing French Canadian Conservative members as traitors to the French language have not invoked that special legislation which has so far protected the translators and ensured them a long and restful vacation.

This is not the time and place to attempt to improve this legislation; it should be done when it is brought before the committee which has been specially constituted to study the bill and make a report to the house. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have acquired lately a great knowledge of translation matters and I invite them to appear before that committee and suggest any remedies they may have in mind. In order that the translators may have assurance with respect to their salaries, I suggest that a special clause be inserted to guarantee that these salaries shall not be decreased and that the privileges which they have enjoyed so far shall be maintained. The committee will have to bear in mind that the translators assigned to the different departments sometimes work until only five o'clock in the afternoon, whereas the translators connected with the House of Commons and the Senate sometimes work very late into the night; so much so, that after a long and strenuous session these translators find themselves exhausted and in need of a good rest. I should be pleased to recommend that their vacations be as long as possible and I am sure that this phase of the matter will be considered carefully and sympathetically.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It would be a new bill with those changes introduced; we have to vote on the bill as it is at present.

Mr. GAGNON: We have voted on bills before which have gone to a committee and come back in a state hardly recognizable. Why should it be otherwise with this legislation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: We hope so.

Mr. GAGNON: The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has had a great many years of experience and he should know that the procedure followed by the committee considering this bill will be the same as that which has been followed ever since parliament has been sitting.

The strongest criticism against this bill is that it will have the effect of reducing the importance and influence of the French language. No one has attempted to prove that the creating of a new bureau will have such michievous results. On the contrary, instead of translations being left entirely to the discretion and good will of the heads of departments, henceforward they will be under the direction of a chief of translations appointed by order in council or statute who, by his culture, training and functions, will be interested in maintaining, defending and improving the status of the French language. The definite pronouncement made last evening by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) should go far to reassure those who are unduly apprehensive in this regard. Should this bill pass, for the first time since confederation the translation of departmental reports and public documents will be upon a permanent statutory basis. The hon. member for Ottawa has referred to section 133 of the British North America Act. Many hon. gentlemen opposite invoke this section more often when in opposition than when in power. I am sure Le Droit, which attacked the view presented in the speech of the hon. member for Labelle, will be interested in knowing what Senator Belcourt said about this in 1912 when speaking at the Congrès de la langue français à Québec.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Hackett): The hon. gentleman has spoken the allotted period of forty minutes.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the reminiscences of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). I was a member of this house when complaints were made by his predecessors from Montmorency and Dorchester. I have been hearing these complaints all during the thirty-four years I have been a member. I was Speaker of the House in 1910 when Mr. Frechette was instructed to visit Belgium and Switzerland to ascertain the best method of carrying on translations. Belgium is a bilingual country, French and Walloon being the official languages, while Switzerland is a trilingual country, with German, Italian and French. During the thirty-four years I have been a member there has been constant complaint of the lateness and delay in the publication of documents in French. The older members of the house will remember these complaints. The translators have always contended that the delay was due to the printing bureau. Canada is English by an immense majority, but it seems to have been forgotten that both languages were put upon an equal footing at confederation. In this country French is just as official as English. The statutes are not translated; they are supposed to be originally French. All documents should be printed simultaneously in both languages.

What would happen in this house if French members were to speak nothing but French, if they were to move amendments in French, raise their points of order in French, make their motions in French and ignore the English language completely? Where would we be? Could the business of this house be carried on? Those who are familiar with the work of this house will know what would happen. The French members have always made it a point to learn the English language, and I think this is greatly to their credit. I have known some of the most brilliant members of this house who, in their early manhood, knew hardly any English at all. They later became masters of the English language and they set a fine example to the English speaking members. I am glad to know that to-day it is becoming fashionable throughout Canada to learn French. If a Canadian wants to realize the importance of this language all he has to do is to go to Europe; unless he knows French he is lost entirely on the continent. English is the business language all over the world, but French is the language of the day in Belgium, in Switzerland and everywhere on the continent, as the minister himself will admit.

I am sorry I have only a few minutes and cannot fully discuss the bill, but the hon. member for Dorchester has discussed a bill which is not before the house; that is the unfortunate part of it. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) is a distinguished gentleman, an outstanding Canadian, a man who represents in this house a constituency which is largely French-Canadian, and it cannot be conceived that his object in bringing before the house such a measure is to deprive the French people of their constitutional rights, which, if this bill as it stands passes, they will not possess hereafter, but which they possess by virtue of the constitution which made confederation possible. We all know that without Quebec there would not have been confederation; Quebec was the connecting link between the maritime provinces and Ontario. Those who are interested in the subject need only read the debates of confederation, the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier, and others to realize that both languages are official; that Canadians, whether French or English, are equal in the eyes of the law and that in this parliament the French and English languages are equal. Of course this is not so in a number of the provinces, but it is fast becoming so. As people become more learned and know the advantages of two languages, they appreciate the value of a knowledge of French. I can remember some distinguished men who have entered this house, among whom I could mention two or three prime ministers, who have consulted me as to the best books to read in order to learn French rapidly and who admitted afterwards that they were sorry they were handicapped by not having begun earlier in life to learn the French language.

The question now before the house is: How should we give satisfaction to the two or three million French people living in Canada? If we are going to spend $250,000 a year to translate, as under the law we must, the translation should be done in accordance with the best traditions so that we shall get value for our money and the people will have these publications in their proper season. Fancy the English speaking members of the house having to wait for three days for the English Hansard, or sometimes six months or more for reports of some of the departments! That is the difficulty with which we have to contend. Similar complaints to those voiced by Thomas Chase Casgrain, former member for Montmorency, Jean Baptiste Morin, former member for Dorchester, and others, who sat here thirty-five years ago are rampant to-day. Almost every day we have people write us to send them such and such a report in the French language. When we reply that we cannot do so because the report is not printed, they ask: When will it be printed? If the members of the house and of the committee which is going to study this bill want to know the real facts of the case, they should just summon the press gallery representatives of the French newspapers of Canada and find out how they are treated in the way of translation, how they are handicapped, how all documents, announcements and pronouncements are invariably thrown at them in the English language and they must translate them on the spur of the moment otherwise the French population of Canada, reading those newspapers, will be deprived of the advantage which they should possess.

I understand the minister intends amending this bill very materially and making probably two sections of this new bureau of translation.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not necessary to amend the bill in order to accomplish that.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand he intends to amend the bill if amendments suggested are shown to be advantageous.

Mr. CAHAN: I can assure the hon. gentleman in that regard.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister knows the difficulty of translation of parliamentary language; it is a language of its own. In parliamentary language there are forms and expressions which are not found in any other. Those who read the debates of the French House of Representatives will find that a large number of our expressions are unknown in the parliamentary language of France and that it is only with time, experience and study that a man becomes competent to translate parliamentary language. Therefore, if we have a staff specially trained in that work, it would be very unfortunate to disperse them, to put them to other work after they have become expert in the work they are at present doing. The same thing applies in the case of every other department. For instance, a man has spent years making a special study of mining, agriculture, finance, if you like, or any other branch and he is put at a moment's notice at some other work. The invariable result is that the work he will do will not be as good as that to which he is accustomed. I am sure the minister is willing under the circumstances that this bill should be materially amended, and he should remove any suspicion of doubt that the French people of this dominion are being unfairly treated in this matter. It is the duty of every member of the House of Commons to work to bring about a cementing together of and a better understanding between the people of this country, because therein lies its salvation.

Mr. CAHAN: I entirely agree with the hon. member.

Mr. MARCIL: Minorities, as the minister knows, are always very sensitive in regard to their rights, and if there is the least suspicion that they are going to be deprived of any of the advantages they now enjoy, a great deal of harm will be done. In the meantime I shall have to vote for the six months' hoist, but if, when the bill comes back from the committee for third reading, it is materially improved, I have an open mind and I shall deal with it then on its merits.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

BUFFALO AND FORT ERIE PUBLIC BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ont.) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, an act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): It is not my intention at the moment to oppose the second reading of this bill, but I would like to call the attention of the house to it, particularly the attention of those members who may be on the private bills committee. There seems to be some misapprehension in the minds of hon. members, and also in the mind of the public, as to the position we put ourselves in when we vote for or against the second reading of a private bill. Those of us who were in the house when the Georgian Bay canal bill was discussed will recall the situation that arose then. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was then leading the opposition. The Prime Minister of the day propounded the view that when a private bill came up for second reading it got that second reading as a matter of course, unless the house was opposed to the principle of the bill. The hon. member for South Wellington accepted that view, but there was a difference of opinion between the two hon. gentlemen, the Prime Minister of the day contending that the principle of that bill was the construction of a canal, while the hon. member for South Wellington contended that it was the construction of the canal by private interests. So we had a sham fight in the house for three or four weeks, and finally the bill went to the private bills committee and was killed.

I make these remarks because of a report that appears in the Montreal Witness from its parliamentary correspondent referring to a private bill that was before this house a few days ago, providing for the establishment of a company to loan money. The remark is this:

> The five Liberals voting for the bill were Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Hon. P. J. Veniot, J. L. Ilsley, F. W. Gershaw and Ross Gray, even after he had spoken against it.

I want to point out that it is not at all inconsistent for an hon. member to speak against a bill and yet vote that it be allowed to go before the private bills committee where the measure can be discussed on its merits and where those promoting the bill may have a chance to present their views. Private individuals certainly have a right to come to parliament and present their views to the private bills committee.

As I said, it is not my intention to oppose the second reading of this bill. As far as I understand the bill at the moment, I am opposed to it, but I conceive that it is quite possible for me to be opposed to it and yet be willing that it should go to the private bills committee to be discussed on its merits. I think it desirable that there be a full attendance at the committee so that we may hear the matter discussed from all points of view. Certainly if some of the objections that occur to me at the moment are not removed I shall oppose the bill not only in committee but when it comes back to the house.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Hamilton East): I can state in two minutes my objections to this bill. They relate to section 1, and to paragraph 23 of the schedule, which says:

> Bonds and property to be tax exempt. The properties of the Buffalo and Fort Erie public bridge authority shall be exempt from all taxes and assessments by the state or any municipality or municipal subdivision thereof and the bonds shall be exempt from taxation except for transfer, estate and inheritance taxes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this principle is to be carried into the bill, I contend it is absolutely unsound. This bridge was not built for the benefit of the people at large; it was built to make money, and now having run into deep water like many other concerns during this depression they come to this house and ask for a change in the bill providing for their incorporation. If it is sound and logical to grant that exemption to this particular company, I think it is sound and logical that it should be granted to every business organization in this dominion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: —that finds itself in difficulties at this time. I think it is a sound principle that this and every organization of like character should stand on its own feet.

Mr. HANBURY: That is good Liberalism.

Mr. MITCHELL: It may be, but it is sound common sense.

Mr. SPOTTON: Quite a difference.

Mr. MITCHELL: I merely express this opinion so that when the bill comes before the committee the committee will have some knowledge at least of what I consider the clause of the bill that is of sufficient importance that it at least should be thrown out.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, on division.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Chevrier.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after listening to my hon. friends opposite, this afternoon, discussing the stand taken by the press of this country on this bill No. 4; I wondered whether their mind had not been influenced by editorials which we have read of late. It might be interesting to know who organized and spread the campaign undertaken by a number of French Canadian newspapers, even before this measure was introduced in the house.

We did not intend, sir, to carry on a long debate over this bill. We had even hoped after the masterful statement made by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), followed by the convincing speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who is unquestionably an expert on the subject, that the house would have adopted the second reading and referred the bill to a committee.

However, our hon. friends on your left, sir, put up a concentrated opposition; however, I do not doubt it is genuine. But judging from the speeches delivered this afternoon, I cannot do otherwise than state that this opposition is directed by the general staff of the Liberal party and aims at influencing public opinion.

I listened, to-day, to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Ferland), who stated that this bill had been so draughted that it could be interpreted one way in one province and another way in another. Judging from the standard of speeches delivered, this afternoon and for some time past, my opinion is, that they were delivered in view of influencing public opinion and intended as political propaganda. I have, sir, not only read—

Mr. VENIOT: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has just made a statement in French, with regard to the speeches made on this side of the house this afternoon, attributing a motive to the speakers on this side. He says that in those speeches hon. members on this side wish to influence the public for election purposes. He has no right to make a statement of that sort.

Mr. GAGNON: I humbly submit, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is absolutely uncalled for, because the Minister of Marine is entitled to say that the speeches made on the other side of the house were intended as political capital. There is nothing unparliamentary in that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) be good enough to elaborate the point of order? I did not quite comprehend it.

Mr. VENIOT: The Minister of Marine, in his remarks, said he was convinced that the members on this side, in opposing the bill, were making their speeches with the main object of influencing the public for election purposes. He is attributing a motive to us, and he cannot do so.

Mr. DUPRE: I have listened to the words uttered by the Minister of Marine, and I submit that they are absolutely in conformity with parliamentary procedure. No one was mentioned; it was simply an allusion to the fact that on the other side of the house speeches were made with such and such a motive, merely a political motive.

Mr. MANION: On the point of order, I suggest in all frankness that a great many speeches made on all sides of the house are for the purpose of influencing public opinion. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister of Marine is ruled out of order for making such a statement, most of us, when we make speeches in this house, in which we endeavour to influence public opinion by explaining our position, would be ruled out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not suggest that we are not allowed to make speeches to influence public opinion. My point is that no hon. member has a right to stand up in this house and say to any other member, "You are making that speech to influence the public for political purposes." That is attributing a motive, and under the rules of the house no motive may be attributed.

Mr. ERNST: Not an improper motive.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot believe that the hon. member for Gloucester is serious in raising the point of order.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I was stating, a moment ago, that a campaign had been cleverly organized, even before this bill was introduced in the house. And when I read in a newspaper that this bill was directed against French influence in this country, I greatly regretted that the author of this article had summarily set aside the statement and the clear, sound precise and genuine explanations made in the house by the hon. Secretary of State. Moreover, that he had summarily disregarded a career well fulfilled, in the course of which, the sponsor of this bill, the hon. Secretary of State, has always given proof of fairness towards all races and languages in this country and shown much sympathy towards his fellow-citizens speaking the French language—no one can deny this fact—often at the expense of his popularity. I invite the author of this article to visit Montreal where he will meet in all quarters French Canadians who will uphold and praise the attitude which the hon. Secretary of State has always taken towards all races of this country. He will also become aware that, in his constituency, our colleague has no more devoted, sincere and enlightened constituents than those speaking the French language.

Mr FAFARD (Translation): Is the hon. minister aware that the Secretary of State has no translator in his department and that he does not speak the French language.

Mr. DORION (Translation): We shall have some.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Glancing over the speeches made by the opposition and reading the articles published in newspapers, we must conclude that the opposition to this measure can only come from an inexact or even false interpretation, to some extent, of the provisions embodied in it. After all, if we consider these speeches and articles, there are only four objections to the bill; first, it would deprive this house of one of its most cherished privileges; secondly, it would result in lowering the value and efficiency of the translation in the various departments; thirdly, it would make the position of translators in this country more precarious; fourthly, it would endanger the status of the French language in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, all these points have been fully discussed since the opening of this debate. I want to be as brief as possible, but I must admit that the first objection does not impress me very much. The house is the sole guardian of its own privileges, but it is never prevented to waive them from time to time in the interest of a more efficient conduct of public affairs. These privileges, however, are but a sequel to our duties as members and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that our primordial duty is to ensure, through sane and proper legislation for the country and its people, the wise conduct of public affairs.

Should our rights and duties, in the fulfilling of this task, become conflicting, and if the ones have to supersede the others, who is the member of this house who would dare maintain that our duties ought to give precedence or bow to our privileges? Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if this measure is a wise one, as such, if it is a proper one, if it is calculated to improve the translation service in this house and in all departments, would it become bad, as such, just because it would slightly infringe upon the privileges of the members of this house?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): There are many "ifs" in that.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) says that there are many "ifs". If he listened to the speeches delivered on the other side of the house, he must have realized that all the arguments of our hon. friends opposite are based on "ifs".

Mr. Speaker, the second objection to this bill is that it will result in lowering the value and efficiency of translation in all departments. That is a serious objection, because it strikes the very principle of the bill; but I wonder, Mr. Speaker, where one can find either in the spirit or in the letter of this bill, any proof of the claims of our hon. friends opposite. In order to judge, you must first ask yourself whether the present system is giving all the results that you are entitled to expect from it and whether it works out efficiently and rapidly enough. It is an extraordinary thing that although our hon. friends made long and frequent speeches and carried on a splendid effort, not one of them cared to suggest any improvement that might be brought into the present system. It is surprising that it is the press of the country that complained most frequently and most violently about the present system, about the documents being published in one language only and also about the delay in the translation. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that very often these complaints were fully justified. Therefore, it is strange that when we are about to remedy that condition, when we wish to improve the translation system through a bill that has been thought out and studied during many months by men who, I believe, know something about translation, it is strange indeed that these same newspapers, even before the bill was submitted to the House, protested most strongly against the improvements which we wanted to bring into the present system.

Is there one member in this house who will maintain that the present system is perfect?

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DUMAINE (Translation): Nothing is perfect in this world.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Will you say that there is no place in the present system for improvement, that there is no need to change it, considerably if necessary, in order to make it fully efficient? For it is the French race, the French section of this country that has had and still has to complain about the present system of translation. It was for us to complain, because, quite often, the French editions were useless owing to the tardiness of the translation.

What we want to secure with this measure is precisely a more elaborate translation of all official public documents, a translation which might not be any better than it is now —because I do not wish to criticize our translators or the translation that has been done up to now—but which will be carried out in the shortest possible delay.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): There is nothing to that effect in the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The idea of centralization seems to terrify our hon. friends of the opposition and especially the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). In his speech the other day, he depicted the continuous parade of "Baby-Austins" and messengers hurrying to and fro between the central bureau for translations and the different departments. More than that: he attempted to show the superintendent distributing work to his 87 or 88 subalterns and ordering, for instance, the specialist in geology to translate the report of the investigation on milk production and distribution. Better still: at certain times, my hon. friend for Ottawa seemed to think that the different specialized translators would leave all their knowledge at the door of the central bureau, which is also the fruit of his imagination, because no central bureau is mentioned in the bill; that question is left entirely in the hands of the superintendent or of the minister in charge of the department.

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): This is a reasonable deduction from my hon. friend's remarks. He even went so far as to exhume the report made to this house in 1910, by Mr. Achille Fréchette, and which has since been quoted so often. That report had been made at the request of the Internal Economy Commission of this house following a special survey trip to Belgium and Switzerland. That report shows that Mr.

Fréchette proposed Belgium as a model. But, Mr. Speaker, what were the conditions in Belgium, in 1910, according to Mr. Fréchette? This is what he says on this subject on page 4 of his report:

Each of the different departments has its own translation staff, except the department of Foreign Affairs, the occasional translation business of which is done by the very comprehensive staff of the Ministère des Chemins de fer, Postes, Télégraphes et Marine, counting sixteen members. Beside the work for the foreign affairs, this staff is also expected to do that of the Universal Postal Union, the international conventions and the proceedings of the peace conference. The Finance department has one translator proper; science and fine arts, two; interior and agriculture, two; war, three; justice, three; colonies, two; public works, one.

Briefly, 16 translators were centralized in one department and were at the same time doing the work of two or three other departments, while 14 others were scattered in the remaining departments. If I am not badly mistaken, even at such a remote period, as has been said this afternoon, we can discern the beginning of a system of centralization.

But will such a centralization be carried as far as the hon. member for Ottawa and some of his colleagues of the opposition seem to think? As I said a few moments ago, nothing in the bill justifies such a thought or supposition, and in his illuminative explanation the Secretary of State proved the contrary. In fact, nothing in this bill will prevent a translator, specialized or not, who has enough work for every day of the year, to remain in his present office while being subject to the supervision of the superintendent; that would entirely conform to the letter and to the spirit of the act. I say, Mr. Speaker, that nothing in this bill provides for the grouping in one office or in one building of all the translators, including those of the House of Commons and of the Senate. And I have been pleased to hear the Secretary of State declare that a special department would be organized for the translators of the House of Commons and of the Senate. The technical and specialized translators shall remain so under the new system resulting from this bill. Is it because they would be under a unified control, or under a minister responsible to this house, that the translators would cease to be employed as specialists? The contrary is evident, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. members of the opposition should do the Secretary of State the honour to believe that the superintendent would not be such a fool as to trust the translation of laws to a specialist in geology. The only conclusion which we may draw from the speeches of my hon. friends is that the translators are going to be thrown helter-skelter in the different centralized offices. The superintendent, and the minister in charge also, will be acquainted with the competence and the special qualifications of each translator, and will distribute the work accordingly. In the first place, the object of this bill is to ensure a fair distribution of the work.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear! hear!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The hon. Secretary of State has proved in black and white that such is not the case presently.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Rather in black.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —and not one single member of the opposition has been able to say so. It is plain, too, that at the present time all the translators are not treated in the same way, both as regards promotion and as regards the work itself. Another thing we want,—and I feel convinced that the bill now before the house offers a means of obtaining it—is the translation of a greater number of documents from the different departments.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): A greater number!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): At the present time the number of documents to be translated is left to the discretion of the various deputy-ministers. Under the bill a chief will be appointed who will see to it that all public documents, from all the departments, will be translated into both languages.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Will he be given more authority than the deputy-minister?

Mr. DUMAINE (Translation): Section 6 of the bill refutes all that.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Our translation service will be under a minister responsible to the people and to this house. As things are, Mr. Speaker, if we have any fault to find with the translation, we must complain to Your Honour, and you have no responsibility in the matter; when the translating is under a responsible minister we will at least be able to obtain a hearing for our complaints and have things set to rights. I say that is extremely important for the French element in this country.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, what we want most of all is to ensure a service sufficiently prompt to permit of the simultaneous publication, in both languages, of all reports, bulletins and documents of immediate interest that a delay in translation might cause to become absolutely worthless, such as the French reports on the cattle industry, on dairy products and divers other farm produce, mentioned in "Le Devoir" of February 20th, over the signature of Mr. Albert Rioux.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): We obtained simultaneous publication by getting away from centralization.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): It is by having a competent superintendent who will see to it that the translating is done efficiently and rapidly, in all the departments—

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Will the hon. minister allow me a question?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friend made his speech the other day without being interrupted.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): I'll make another one.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I have only forty minutes at my disposal. The hon. member will have a chance to speak on the main motion; if he so wishes, he can then produce his arguments.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He can also appear before the committee.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Read the article by Mr. Rioux.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The fear exists, apparently, that the present bill will make it difficult, if not impossible, to recruit and to train specialized translators. This is another statement based on a supposition that is entirely gratuitous, that is, that the superintendent of the bureau will have no consideration for the proficiency of each translator, and that the men will be continually transferred, constantly shifted around from one place to another, as it has been alleged. It is absolutely unreasonable to presume any such thing. At the present time our foremost experts have assistants who are being trained under them. Do the hon. members of the opposition really believe that when the service is brought under one head this excellent practice will disappear? What is there to justify any supposition of that kind? After all one is bound to recognize that the minister who will be made responsible for this service, the Civil Service Commission and the General Superintendent, who will be called upon to organize it with him, without being endowed with genius, will at least have ordinary intelligence and ordinary judgment.

Well-deserved praise has been given the initiative and the zeal shown by a number of translators who are forever on the look-out for technical information to perfect themselves in their art, who prepare dictionaries and technological manuals of all kinds, and who have established a system of reference-files where they store up their acquired data and their discoveries. Putting the service under one head will prevent, what has sometimes happened in the past, the loss of the fruits of such persevering study and research, and will facilitate the creation of a sort of library, of a card-index system, that the effort of every translator will make more complete every day, and which will be an inexhaustible mine of information. In the past certain translators took all their notes with them when they left the department. Under a direction such as we intend to establish for this service, nothing of that sort can occur.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): They will simply laugh at the very idea.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I say it again, the intention is not to pile up the translators into one large office, nor under one roof, but to secure uniformity, as well as equalize results, in order to obtain greater production and higher efficiency in the translation service.

Once more, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed strange that, in all the speeches delivered against the proposal by the hon. members sitting at your left, and after which the sound argument put forward by the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), remains unimpaired, in all these speeches, do I say, one would look in vain for the assertion that the existing system is faultless, that it fully meets with the requirements of the conditions at the present time as well as the legitimate demands of the public at large. But, when the hon. Secretary of State, who has given considerable time to the matter, introduces a bill drafted after due reflection and meant to put an end to legitimate causes of complaint, we are at once confronted with a mass onslaught from within the ranks of the opposition, specially from the members representing my own province—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Quite so. Hear, hear!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —the very one which, in the past, has had to suffer the most as a result of the delays we are endeavouring to eliminate.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): From the very outset, in this debate, we have been told time and again that translation is a complicated art requiring a full knowledge of languages and even, quite frequently, a great sum of learning. We oftentimes hear hon. members extoll the high competency and the unceasing efforts of our translators, a tribute to which I am only too pleased to associate myself with as much sincerity as any one else, if not in so many words; we have heard the commendation of decentralization so ardently advocated, would it seem, in 1910, by Mr. Fréchette who, after all, only approached the problem in so far as the debates of this house, the sessional papers and the legislation were concerned, a fact which detracts to a singular degree from the value of the conclusions it is sought to draw from his report. It must be pointed out that, the author of this report referred incidentally to the various departments of the government, for he had been appointed by the Commissioners of Internal Economy of this house for the sole purpose of reporting on the translation service of the house and of the Senate, a fact which, in my opinion, considerably lessens the importance of that report in this debate.

As I was saying at the outset, I read every one of the speeches delivered by my hon. friends; I have listened to those delivered this afternoon and I was wondering where, in these various speeches, could be found a single reason, a constructive argument warranting the continuation of a system which led to the deplorable state of affairs so clearly set forth by my hon. friend the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You could not have read my speech for I have not spoken yet.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The other day, I heard, and then read, the speech delivered by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard). He himself found fault with the present system. In fact, did he not complain of the translation of the treaty on the St. Lawrence ship canal? Therefore, it is to be inferred that my hon. friends admit that a change is necessary in the translation service.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It is because it was translated without charge by a friend of the Secretary of State.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): At least, so far as this bill is concerned, the change we are making is commendable.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It is not the result of translation and these changes are not contained in the bill now before the house.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friend shall be given the opportunity of giving all the explanations he may desire to give at a later date.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): He is the specialist in interruptions.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): To the hon. members on the other side of the house we ask: Why such a strong opposition to this proposed legislation? The answer which we get is that it shall entail the elimination of comparatively high positions and lower some translator chiefs to the rank of subalterns. Mr. Speaker, I already stated, and I feel bound to say again, how I hold in high esteem the translators generally. I am pleased to pay tribute to their ability; I know that most of them, are not of the kind who would be content with getting through their actual work in a more or less indifferent manner; on the contrary, they are constantly delving into research work, following closely the evolution of languages, familiarizing themselves with recent discoveries and inventions, in order to add to their technical vocabulary—

Mr. CHEVRIER (Translation): The hon. minister differs with the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I am giving my personal opinion; I agree with the hon. member for Labelle when he says that this measure is calculated to improve considerably the present conditions.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If you agree with him, he must be wrong.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I thank the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): He said it just the same.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): We are told, Mr. Speaker, that our translators were deeply moved by the announcement of this measure.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): And rightly so.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): They are uneasy and fear wholesale dismissals. Where will you find in the bill that is now before us and especially in the principle of this bill, the least thing to fear for these competent and hard working translators?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): If there are dismissals, you will he held responsible for them.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): They will certainly not complain in the future when the work will be more equally divided, in order that one translator may not be called any more to translate 1,719 pages within the year, and another only a few pages.

Then did our translators and those who, in this house and outside, mean to hasten to their rescue, read carefully paragraph 7 of section 3 which promises plenty of work, much more than they had in the past, therefore surely preventing a reduction of the translating staff. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this section contains the sanction of a principle that has been perhaps imperfectly recognized in section 133 of the Confederation Act. And, protected as they are by the Civil Service Act, how could they fear any lowering in rank involving a reduction of salary? Again, it is not a concentration camp for translators that the measure is calculated to establish, but an intelligent centralization and even a rather mitigated one, in practice, of the various services, with the sole object to ensure a greater measure of efficiency. I do not see what could prevent the chiefs from remaining chiefs, because the superintendant to be appointed, as it was already stated, will not claim any relationship to the great man referred to the other day, who is known in history as Pic de la Mirandole. Our superintendent will not claim to be possessed of the learning and special knowledge of our chief translators. Therefore he will have chiefs in the various translation branches.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): So much the better.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): His duty, if I understand the bill aright, will consist mainly in co-ordinating and distributing the work, with a view to having it carried out promptly, but without meaning to so teach anything to the specialists and technicians under him.

Having always in mind the interest of the translators, there is another aspect of the question that our hon. friends seem to have missed. Do they fully realize, that the present system is liable to depreciate the value of the translation service, especially for the French language? With the tardiness and considerable delays that it allows, the present system will finally make the translation of many documents useless, because by being so delayed they have lost all their value.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It is not the translators' fault.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): It is not the translators' fault; it is that of the departments.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): It is the fault of the present system, because the French edition of reports and journals of present interest are published only several days and even weeks after the English edition.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Whose fault is it?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Then what happens in such a case? The ratepayer, merchant, manufacturer or farmer, who needs it immediately, takes the habit of reading it in the English text and therefore does not ask for the French edition. Our hon. friends opposite should realize that when the deputy ministers see the French editions being piled up in the cellars, they cease having these documents translated, and that is at the expense ot our race and of the French language.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): But it is their own fault, because the English original is sent too late to the translators.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friend will have the opportunity to answer; he might even be called before the committee.

Mr. DORION (Translation): But he won't go.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): I won't go? I shall go if I am called.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): If I understood correctly some of my hon. friends this afternoon, they have raised a weak opposition to the bill now before the house—I am speaking of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). He even suggested that it would be a good idea to refer the bill to a committee where it could be amended.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It certainly does need amendments.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friends will be called upon to make suggestions.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): I suggest that you call before the committee the translators whom you have accused when they have no way of defending themselves.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I concur in the opinion of those who think that a measure such as the bill now before the house may be discussed without resorting to dishonest or disloyal arguments, and without inflaming public opinion. It is wrong to say that the present bill concerns only the French-speaking members and the people of the province of Quebec. It should interest as well all other members of the House of Commons, because translation is not only made from English into French, but also from French into English.

This bill rests on two principles which have been clearly defined by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). By the way, I hope he understands that all those who oppose the bill have not the least intention of casting reflections on his personality, his character, his sincerity and his broad-mindedness. We have known him in public as well as in private life; we respect him as a private citizen as well as a statesman, and we have the highest consideration for his professional and legal ability. Therefore, this bill should be discussed in the light of the reasons and principles to which he has given expression in the course of his explanations. What are they? They are neither a safe-guard for the rights of the French language, nor a reinforcement of the position it occupies in the parliament of the country. It is childish to say so. Here are his reasons: economy and greater efficiency in translation. They are the only two arguments brought forward by the Secretary of State, and they are also the inspiration of this bill.

The translation of documents costs too much, and the printing costs too much because the translation is not ready in time. Those are the true reasons. It is useless to look elsewhere in trying to justify the position taken by the government, or in the desire of crowning with a halo the Secretary of State and the government for this so-called recognition of the principle of the rights of the French language. This bill adds nothing whatever to the rights of the French language, which shall continue to exist even if this bill be rejected or withdrawn. It does not add one iota to the rights of the French language, as we have them to-day. In my humble opinion, I prefer the present recognition of the rights of the French language in the several departments to the recognition which would come only from a central bureau of translations.

Economy? Shall the enactment of the present bill result in any saving? Not at all. From the discussion and the answers given to the questions from this side of the house by the hon. members sitting at the right of the Speaker, an increase in the cost must be anticipated.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) has just said that a greater number of books and documents will be translated than in the past. This should be more expensive. I have no complaint on that ground. But it is a flat denial of the argument of the Secretary of State who wants economy. Further, every member of this house knows by experience that centralization, in all spheres of human activity, has not resulted in economy. Generally speaking, the methods of administration have become worse when centralization has been introduced in the public services. It has resulted in poorer service at a higher cost. The centralization of all the translators of the public service, or of certain translators will produce no saving in the cost of government. We shall see a great number of officials in charge of this new bureau of translations, an increase in the number of translators and supervisors, a new staff of employees who will be going forward and backward between the bureau, the different departments and the House of Commons; in other words a general increase in the number of employees. If there are, to-day, translators who are remiss in the accomplishment of their duty, there will be men directing this department who will earn their salary less than the translators earn it to-day: they will act as overseers.

The hon. Secretary of State said: It may very well be that a complete centralization will not be brought about in the one place, the one building; we may establish certain departments in certain government buildings, small staffs where a certain number of translators, accustomed to a particular line of work, will be retained under the direction of a special official. It is evident that this will incur additional expense. The more there are of these branch translation offices the heavier will be the appropriations voted to defray the cost of the translation service. Therefore, from the standpoint of economy, let us not deceive ourselves; it is childish to pretend that any saving may result from a like reorganization of the service.

Will there be an improvement in the translation? I doubt it. When instead of being under several heads who control them or who are supposed to control them, the translators will be brought together in one building, under the direction of one chief, it is quite possible that there may be just as much neglect as the translators are accused of to-day.

I think it is unjust to say that the translators attached to the different departments are not useful and do not do their duty. Among the translators—I make no claim to knowing them all; but I do know some of them—are some who are officials of sterling worth who render valuable service to their respective departments. In this service as in every other may be found certain civil servants who are not up to standard; but if we look into all the branches of the public service we find the same faults that the present bill seeks to remedy.

The translation will be not one whit better than it is to-day. It may well be, and I am quite prepared to admit it, that my experience is rather limited with respect to the translating done in the House of Commons. If I understand the matter aright that is where the evil lies that the hon. Secretary of State is trying to eradicate. Then why not restrict the reform to the translators of the House of Commons and of the Senate, adopt measures suitable to this category of translation, appoint a translator as chief of the service, and give him the requisite authority to direct the employees under his jurisdiction. Why not leave the translation in the different departments entirely independent of that done in the House of Commons and the Senate; in this way, as the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) so well pointed out, the translators at present attached to the various departments would remain in line for promotion in their respective departments. If these employees of the several departments, French-speaking employees mostly, are organized into a central bureau or placed under a new director, they will lose their chance of promotion, will no longer be able to try for the position of departmental chief or of assistant deputy minister. Oh, I know quite well that the hon. Secretary of State told us beforehand that these men will be entitled to promotion in the translation bureau. But there the chances of promotion will be meagre indeed. When the hon. Secretary of State will have the power, under this bill once it becomes law, to order the transfer of a translator in the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) to the central bureau of translations, because of his exceptional proficiency, that translator will have to leave the work he has been doing in the Marine department and come under the direction of the translation bureau where he will be barred from all prospects of promotion, save the opportunities, few and far between, afforded by the bureau itself. He will be deprived of the advantages he enjoys at present in the department, where he can aspire to any position in that Department of Marine. You have there a serious consequence of this measure, brought to the attention of the house by the former Postmaster General and other hon. members; an argument that remains unanswered by our friends on the other side.

My very good friend, the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) has not answered it; my very good friend the hon. Minister of Marine has not answered it; and, foreseeing the objections, the hon. Secretary of State did not answer it either. He insisted that the translator could be promoted within the translation bureau. But promotion within the translation bureau would not have the same importance, far from it, as promotion in the different departments of the public service, as things are to-day. There you have a disadvantage; the employee will have fewer opportunities for promotion if this bill, in its present form, becomes law. In future those who enter the government service through the translation bureau will be deprived of their chances of rising to higher positions in our civil service.

Efficiency! I doubt that the proposed system, once adopted, will ensure greater efficiency. But if certain evils exist, if certain employees are remiss in their duty, why not deal with them in the translation service as they are dealt with throughout the government departments? Does the hon. Minister of Marine expect us to believe that if a translator, in his department, does not do his work properly but loafs away his time, that my hon. friend has not the necessary authority to make this man attend to business as he should? Why does the hon. minister wish to throw this responsibility on the superintendent of the Translation Bureau or on the hon. Secretary of State?

It may be that when we ourselves were administering the affairs of this country certain unpalatable things occurred and that we might be charged with neglect in certain instances. I do not agree with those who claim that the administration we set up was absolutely above reproach: like the present government, ours was made up of human beings, with the usual measure of human frailty. I say in all sincerity that if I were to be called once more to-day to administer the affairs of the Department of Marine there are certain things I would not go about in just the same way. There is always room for improvement in any situation; but I maintain that each minister should not be relieved of his due responsibility. The minister who has a translator directly under his authority is better fitted to make that translator toe the mark than would be any official appointed to preside over the destinies of a Translation Bureau. I repeat: When errors or faults crop up, correct them; indolent and careless employees, people who fail to give proper attention to the tasks assigned them, should be dismissed. When in any department certain employees are found who are not properly fitted for their work, do you reform that department, do you abolish it and merge it with some other department? Is it fair to solve the problem in such a roundabout way, when you can strike directly at the root of all the trouble? Once more I say: let the faults be corrected, you have all the authority you need.

I cannot accept the eloquent plea made by the hon. Secretary of State in explaining his bill, when he stated that he had to go outside the service to have a translation made of the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): A pretty weak argument.

Mr. CARDIN (Translation): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have difficulty in imagining the hon. Secretary of State, with the English copy of the speech from the throne in his hand, going from one department to another looking for some one to translate it, and coming back to his own office without having found a translator. It may be that from a technical viewpoint, and with microscopic hair-splitting, one may conclude that, technically speaking, certain employees of the House of Commons, of the Senate and of the different departments, might refuse to do this work. Well, I am very humble if I compare myself to the hon. Secretary of State, I am quite a small man, intellectually as well as physically, compared to him. But, were I in his place, I would like to see the translator, employed by a government of which I was a member, who would have told me he refused to translate the speech from the throne. It appears to me that the government cannot very well be proud of the fact that they must publicly declare: We had to go outside the translation service to have the speech from the throne translated because we could not find a translator to do this work. It is certainly not an argument in favour of the bill; and if I were the Secretary of State I would not have advanced a reason of that sort in a public document. I am convinced that if the hon. Secretary of State and the members of the government had applied to the officials of the House of Commons they would have found somebody to do this translation. Furthermore, if they had applied to some of the secretaries of the present ministers they would have found five or six only too glad to translate the speech from the throne, and their translation would have been of a high order. There would have been no necessity of going outside, and for a poor translation, at that. That is not an argument. Even supposing, from a purely technical standpoint and, I repeat, by splitting hairs with the aid of a microscope, the statement might be true, from a strictly legal point of view, there is a remedy to hand for a situation of that kind. Without interfering with what has been termed the privileges of the House of Commons and the Senate, this house could certainly pass a simple resolution saying that the debates translators shall be required to translate such and such documents under the direction of the House of Commons. A resolution of that kind would cause no disruption whatever and leave untouched a system followed since confederation; it would also meet all requirements in the way of translation.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the reasons put forward by my good friend, the distinguished Secretary of State, I fail to see any argument justifying the introduction of this bill. That instrument is called a bill but, strictly speaking, it is not a bill. Upon examination and after a single reading, one cannot help but come to the conclusion that is a mere statement to the effect that there shall be a bureau for translations and that all departments shall collaborate with that bureau. How will the new body, thus created, function? By means of regulations to be made at a later date by the minister appointed to administer that bureau. The powers of the superintendent or of the minister in charge of that particular branch of the service are also to be determined by such regulations as may be made at a future time. To-day, the only thing asked from parliament is leave to adopt regulations, the right for the Secretary of State, or any one else acting in his stead, to make regulations of his own choice or which the government in power at the time may be pleased to authorize. There is nothing else in the bill; it merely contains a statement concerning the establishment of a bureau for translations and the power to make regulations.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is not how it should be done and the opposition should not be asked to support that bill or statement until such time as sufficient reasons are given in justification of the measure. Why, before presenting the bill, did the government not inquire into the matter and then come before the house with the conclusions resulting from such investigations in order to substantiate the facts contained in the explanatory notes of the bill? Why that beclouding of the issue? Why do they speak of reports having been submitted, and should we deem such reports to be of a confidential character? Why that concealment of the truth? Why are they withholding information given to the Secretary of State or to the government? If there should be any of the officials whose behaviour calls for their being denounced in reports of the kind, then parliament and the country are entitled to know who they are. The members of the opposition are not afraid of the light, even at the risk of finding amongst these officials some who entered the public service at a time when the Liberal party was in power. Hold an inquiry and disclose to the public and to the house such information as warranted or does now justify, in your opinion, your proposal. Then, in the light of such information, we would be in a better position to pass judgment on the bill. But you are now asking that the opposition should give its approval to a mere blank and to accept reasons which you refused to disclose to the house.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no ground whatever for the charge that the opposition's agitation against this bill is uncalled for. We are entitled to discuss the bill before the house and we have several reasons, and valid reasons, to protest against it. Our opponents are in the wrong and display a lack of generousness in their efforts to discredit our opposition to this legislation. Our sincerity is at least equal to that of those who support the government, and in that respect we feel that we easily measure up to them. I am willing to admit that they are acting in good faith, but let them concede to us the right to have an opinion of our own, and recognize that as far as sincerity, patriotism and broad-mindedness are concerned we rank as high as them.

We are opposed to the bill because we sincerely believe that it should not meet with the approval of the House of Commons. May I be allowed to humbly offer a suggestion to my good friend the hon. Secretary of State in whose fairness—I repeat it—I place great confidence? Why does he not postpone the consideration of his bill instead of pressing it to a conclusion now, at a time when the measure is necessarily incomplete. He should refer the matter to a committee of the House of Commons, a committee representative of the various groups in the house, in order to investigate the conditions under which the debates of the house and other public documents are being translated, and to ascertain the defects of the present system. Then, when all such defects, or faults, if I may use the term, are disclosed to the committee, the government will be in a position to act from a knowledge of the facts and submit a proposal for the establishment of a more appropriate system for the translation of debates and public documents.

Now, I know very well that they will reply: We want to take the bill to the committee. But this bill contains nothing. If you go now before the committee you will hold the very inquiry which I ask of you to make beforehand and upon your return from the committee you will have to submit a different bill, for this one will not fit as it does not remedy the evils which an inquiry would disclose. To use a popular expression, why put the cart before the horse? Before enacting a statute you must be well informed. Why should we adopt a bill before getting some information? Why should we go to the committee with an incomplete bill and then come back here with the information which should have been given to the house before presenting this measure. Light is what is required; we want the information which the Secretary of State and the government refused to give us and which supposedly resulted from private and discreet investigations. Let us appoint a committee of inquiry and see that light be made on the subject of translation. And when that is done, when the defects are disclosed and the imperfections of the system are known, then we shall be able to adopt a law, but not regulations.

I can assure the hon. Secretary of State that I have no hidden motive when I make this suggestion and he will permit me to think that my good faith is equal to his. I am aware of his solicitude for those who speak my own language in this country and I know that he would like to help them. But I would not like to see any of their privileges, any of their chances of promotion in the public service to be taken away from them. What I am saying about my own compatriots applies also to our English speaking fellow-citizens, for the time may come when translation from French into English will be more important than it is to-day. If the French speaking members spoke more often their mother tongue in this house and if we insisted more than we do to-day on the rights and prerogatives of the French language in this parliament, the translation from French into English would become more important than it is to-day and the translation of documents from French into English would be of great import. Therefore, I repeat what I said at the outset: The translation service is not only necessary, useful and profitable for the province of Quebec, it is of essential interest for the English speaking citizens and members of parliament.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. members of the government, after further considering the matter, will come to the conclusion that rather than protracting this discussion it is better to make an investigation of the translation service and then submit a bill which will be a real bill containing in its provisions to be voted by parliament, the remedies to be applied. We must not, as provided for in this bill, depend on regulations to be made later on by the minister. Regulations have not the same weight as a law; they can be altered too easily. It would be far better if the proper remedies were set forth in an act of parliament rather than in the unsteady prescriptions of regulations which very often are intended to remain buried under the dust of some office or the library of a department.

Mr. CAHAN: If no one else wishes to speak, I intend to close the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the Secretary of State speaks now, he will close the debate on the motion for the second reading of the bill.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I for the second time speak on the bill before the house? I have the right, after speaking to the amendment, to address myself to the main motion, and I do so for the purpose of drawing the attention of the house to some of the arguments advanced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre). I listened with great attention to his remarks and I wish to congratulate him on the purity and eloquence of the English which he used while speaking in a tongue not his own. But I would have been better pleased had the hon. gentleman continued his speech in English so that the English as well as the French members might have understood the situation as he laid it before the house.

There was no necessity for the Solicitor General to heap eulogies upon the head of my good friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in order to convince this side of the house that the Secretary of State was broad-minded and sincere in introducing this measure. I am sure the Secretary of State believes down in his heart of hearts that this is the only method of remedying an evil, if I may use that word, that for years has crept into the translation of the debates of this house and of public documents in general.

My hon. friends opposite who have spoken on this question, especially the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), and the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), threw across the floor in the face of French members on this side the taunt that we were influenced in our opposition to this bill by a desire to arouse an uncalled-for agitation in the public mind, especially in Quebec. Far be it from me to wish that anything I might say should be interpreted as an attempt to arouse any such feeling. I am proud of the fact that I am of French extraction. My ancestors came to this country around 1700 and they preferred to accept deportation at the hands of unjust officials of the home government rather than give up their rights so far as their race was concerned. We Acadian people of the maritime provinces long thought the blame for that injustice should have been placed upon the home government, but as we grew older and as the historians of the French Acadian race made researches, going not only to England but to France and searching the archives of those countries, they were able to convince us that the blame at that time lay, not with the home government, but with the unjust officials who were acting without the authority or consent of the home government. Therefore we Acadian people have changed our views somewhat; we are proud of being numbered among the French race of the Dominion of Canada, and being proud of that fact, had I thought the interpretation placed upon the bill by the Solicitor General was the correct one, I would have hesitated to some extent to oppose the measure as I have opposed it. But the reason I say it would have been better had the eloquent Solicitor General continued his speech in English is that the house as a whole, English and French members, would then have seen at a glance that it was unjust and unfair to impute to the French members on this side a desire to raise the race cry. The whole contention of the Solicitor General was directed to an appeal to the French Canadian members on this side not to oppose the bill because it was giving them greater privileges than those contemplated under the British North America Act. I am going to quote a translation of the speech of my hon. friend, to show that it is poor grace on his part or on the part of the Minister of Marine or of the hon. member for Dorchester to impute the motives they have imputed to the French members on this side of the house. The hon. gentleman made the following statement in French:

> May I, sir, summarize from a legal angle, by submitting the following argument: in a word, Bill No. 4 completes article 133; it implements the spirit in which article 133 shall be construed, or, if you wish, it is the recognition, in legal form, of what article 133 intimates but does not say. Article 3 of Bill No. 4 confirms, in a federal statute,—

And this is what I want the members of this house to listen to.

> —the interpretation that we of the province of Quebec, have given to the spirit of article 133 of the British North America Act. In my opinion it is a step forward in the laying of our claims, and, sir, is this not the most essential aspect of the question?

I am sorry that the Solicitor General is so narrow in his outlook that he has left out the French part of the population of the rest of Canada. Then he goes on:

> You must make a distinction between the principle and the accessory. Here, Mr. Speaker, the principle is the additional guarantee given to the French language and the sanction of rights unceasingly claimed during many years. The accessory is how, when, and by whom translations will be carried out.

In conclusion he says:

> I appeal to my compatriots on the other side and to the French press, and I say to them: if my argument is wrong keep on the fight. But if I am right I call on them to cease firing on their own troops.

Was there ever a more deliberate attempt to raise the race cry in this house than that of the Solicitor General in that speech? Mr. Speaker, may I say to him that we French members on this side of the house have never brought into question the status of the French language under the British North America Act as far as the parliament of Canada is concerned. We feel that in that respect the status of our language is fully safeguarded by section 133 of the British North America Act. An argument may be made as to the status of the French language outside of parliament, that it has not found protection under section 133, but I am not arguing that point at present; that will be argued in due time if ever the question arises again. But let me say this: believing as we do that the status of the French language is protected as far as this parliament is concerned by section 133, the evil that exists in connection with the translation of the English debates into French can be remedied without enacting a measure that has aroused such strong opposition. Our friends on the other side who have spoken, few though they were, seem to believe that they are the only ones to be looked upon as true champions of the French rights and the French cause in this country. Let me say to my hon. friends that I have never been afraid to raise my voice in the province of New Brunswick—and for that matter in the province of Nova Scotia where I was brought up and where I lived until I was twenty years of age—on behalf of my people, and I have always received a hearty response from a large number of those who differ from us in both religion and nationality. I want to pay that compliment to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In opposing this bill we are actuated by motives just as sincere and just as honest as the motives which prompt hon. gentlemen on the opposite side to support it.

There is a remedy for the existing evil. It is not fair to criticize a measure unless one is prepared to submit something constructive. I have never contended that the translation system in practice at Ottawa is perfect; I know it is not. I know there are poor translators on the different staffs—not many, but sufficient, perhaps, to cause the question to be raised as to what can be done to improve the system. Let me, sir, offer some suggestions. First, have it arranged that each department shall have departmental reports ready before the fall of the year and handed to the translators before the English text of the report is printed. At present what do we find? Departmental reports in English are handed to the translators in many cases only after the English edition has come from the printing bureau. This suggests one way of avoiding the tardiness that has worked itself into the printing of the reports. Matters should be so arranged that these reports shall be given to the French translators as soon as the English version is complete, or, better still, as twenty, thirty or forty pages of the copy are completed and certified by the proper authorities, those pages should be handed over to the French translators. It would then be found that the French version would be ready to go to the printer within two or three days after the English version is ready. In this connection it is said—and I hope the Secretary of State will not take umbrage at what I am going to say—

Mr. CAHAN: I fully agree with what the hon. member has said so far.

Mr. VENIOT: It has become an almost universal practice among ministers of the crown—I am not going to include myself in this category; for when I was in the government these reports were ready in time—to delay sending to the printers until the fall of the year the reports for the year ending the previous March 31st. If the minister would issue an order that these reports must be ready soon after parliament prorogued, say the last part of July or the early part of August, there would be no further cause for complaints about tardiness in the printing of those reports. I do not think that I am far astray when I say that the Secretary of State himself is a sinner in that respect. It may be that the excess of work in his department, and the necessity for his travelling to Europe on important Canadian affairs, has put him in the position where he could not see that that work should be carried on in the manner in which I suggest.

Third, do not pass documents to persons outside the service for translation. Now, the Secretary of State cannot make me believe—and I always like to accept his word—that of necessity he was compelled to go outside the service to get somebody to translate certain important documents. He did not tell us that he had applied to the various departments for the purpose; he did not tell us that he could not find a competent translator in any of the departments to do that class of work. I say to the Secretary of State the implication is that among the translators no one could be found to do the work.

Mr. CAHAN: It is true, nevertheless.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to accept my hon. friend's word, but I cannot accept it, knowing the qualifications of certain translators in the employ of the government.

Mr. CAHAN: But they were not under my control or direction.

Mr. VENIOT: What did the ex-Minister of Marine say? He would like to see the translator that would refuse, should the Secretary of State make a request, to comply with that request.

Mr. CAHAN: I have seen some.

Mr. VENIOT: Then you should have done your duty and you did not do it.

Mr. CAHAN: They are not under my control. If the hon. gentleman wishes to provoke a full discussion of the weaknesses and frailties of the present translation system, he had better continue along that line, because I am prepared to go into a discussion from which I have refrained absolutely up to the present moment.

Mr. VENIOT: The Secretary of State has refrained from revealing the contents of some secret investigation he made, and this house is entitled, especially when a bill of the kind comes before it, to have that information.

Mr. CAHAN: It will have all the information. If this goes to a committee for investigation it will have ample opportunity to ascertain the facts.

Mr. VENIOT: I understood the hon. gentleman was going to close the debate; he had better wait until I am through.

Mr. CAHAN: Then please don't address your remarks to me personally.

Mr. VENIOT: I am addressing them to the Secretary of State, not personally to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot in this parliament separate myself from my official position.

Mr. VENIOT: I am addressing the Secretary of State through the Speaker.

Mr. CAHAN: That is better.

Mr. VENIOT: Now let me go further. Fourth, do not allow young bilingual clerks and typists to handle the translation of any documents. This is carried on too much and I know it, and the Secretary of State agrees with me. No. 5: With reference to the debates of the commons, see that a typewritten copy of the English transcript is handed to the Commons staff of translators just as soon as the English reporters can furnish it, and have the French translators begin translating when they receive that typewritten copy. Instead of doing that, what happens? Why, Mr. Speaker, the French translation of Fridays' debates is not out yet—why? Because the French translators are not allowed to handle the translation of these debates until after they have gone to the King's Printer and come out, not in galley form, but on loose page forms and transferred to the translators of the Commons and Senate for publication. Is that fair? Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State I believe knows that; and I believe he has known it for some time. Why then did he not attempt to apply that remedy?

Mr. CAHAN: I know more than that. I know that the debates of one of the chambers of this parliament, which should have been in in September, 1932, are coming only within the last month, into the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for printing—more than one year's delay. Talk about three or four days!

Mr. VENIOT: Is that the fault of the translators?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know, but it is a shameless condition.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman is leaving that impression and that is why I ask the question.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know that it is the fault of the translators.

Mr. VENIOT: No. 6: Weed out any incompetent translators. I would not stand for a moment having in the translation service of the country any man who did not carry on his work faithfully and properly. Weed them out and put in men who will do their work properly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we were told the other evening by the Solicitor General—and if I quote him incorrectly I hope he will put me right; I do not wish to misquote him—that translators will not be removed from departments to the central bureau if the heads of the departments do not wish it. I understood from him that that was what he had in his mind. Now, if that is the case what will happen? The Secretary of State has told the house that there will now be two branches of the translation bureau, as I understand; one will be the branch in charge of the translations of the House of Commons and Senate, and the other will be the branch in charge of the translators from the various departments who will be transferred there. If what the Solicitor General says is correct, what will happen if ministers of various departments refuse to allow their translators to go to the central bureau? There is absolutely nothing in the act that compels them, and therefore you will have a disarrangement of the whole shooting match, so to speak.

I have another objection to the central bureau; I find it in my notes and I will deal with it right away. That is to say, there will be no privacy, as in the various departments, in connection with the translation of important documents. Perhaps forty or fifty or sixty from the various departments will form the central bureau, and there cannot be that privacy which exists in the various branches of translation of the different departments. Again, may I call the attention of the Secretary of State to this fact? There is nothing in the bill which compels the production at an early date of the reports from the various departments. No doubt, when a close scrutiny is made of this bill, the Secretary of State and the committee will discover things that are lacking, which we may not discover at the present moment. I wish to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to that part of it. Under this bill there is no control given to the chief superintendent of the bureau over the production of papers for translation. That being the position I cannot for one moment understand how it will be possible to create greater efficiency unless some of the methods I have suggested are adopted. If they are adopted there is no necessity for a central bureau; if they are adopted the remedy is easy, and the evil could be eliminated without the organization of what must become a very costly bureau. It is well known that concentration or centralization in all branches of government are, in the end, more costly than before centralization has taken place. What is necessary to-day, as I stated when I spoke previously, is specialization. If specialization in translation is carried to the proper point we shall not have the spectacle of the enormous number of mistakes that the printer has to correct after the proof is read.

While I am on that point, let me ask the Secretary of State how it is that in talking about extra costs incurred because of these numerous mistakes he did not at the same time take the house into his confidence and tell us what cost was involved in the correction of the English version.

Mr. CAHAN: The cost which I mentioned applies to both the translation of the English into French and of the French into English.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not what I asked. There is an English version published entirely in English, which is not a translation.

Mr. CAHAN: It contains translations.

Mr. VENIOT: In many cases they do not contain translations.

Mr. CAHAN: That is preliminary copy we get from day to day.

Mr. VENIOT: No. Some of the departmental reports are not translated into French; many of them are not. None of the reports of the Department of Mines is translated into French.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. CAHAN: Which one does the hon. member say is not translated?

Mr. VENIOT: I say there are several. You are in a better position to find out than I am.

Mr. CAHAN: I have a complete list before me.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, and you may deal with it. The Secretary of State has told us on many occasions he has had to procure outside help for translation. In particular he mentioned the translation of the speech from the throne. Hon. members know that the speech from the throne contains expressions to be translated into French which would almost require the services of a technical translator. Many of the ordinary translators do not begin the work of translating such a document having in mind the thought that one cannot attribute to His Excellency the Governor General the first person singular. In many instances that mistake is made.

I do not know who translated the last speech from the throne, nor did I attempt to find out. I do know, however, that it is an example of the worst French that has ever appeared on paper. I make this reference, sir, in order to prove my argument that specialization is necessary. Had this document been given to a translator who had specialized in such documents, the errors which have crept in would have been avoided. I do not pretend to be an authority on the French language. Unfortunately for me I did not have the opportunity of obtaining an education in my native tongue; my tuition was entirely in English. But I do know the significance of a translation from English into French which does not indicate in French the meaning of the English text. Let me refer to one or two points in the speech from the throne in connection with which the translation must be criticized. I find the expression:

> You are summoned for the dispatch of public business at a time when there are sound reasons for believing . . .

And so on. What translation do we find? This is the translation:

> Au moment où je vous réunis pour expédier les affaires du pays, de fortes raisons . . .

And so forth. Where does His Excellency the Governor General say "je vous réunis pour expédier les affaires du pays"? He says: "You are summoned," and it should have been easy for the translator to find a phrase which would give a proper translation. Let us consider another translation which puts an entirely different meaning on one part of His Excellency's speech. Referring to the unemployed young men in the camps, it is stated in the speech placed in the mouth of His Excellency by the government, that these men are employed in the camps because they lack employment. In the French translation the impression is left that they are not so employed because they are out of work but because they are unmarried. That is an entirely different version from the one which appeared in the English text.

Then, referring to the trade arrangements with Germany and Austria, what do we find? His Excellency refers to the favoured tariff treatment given by those nations to Canadian products. The French version does not refer to the products of Canada receiving such treatment, but indicates that the tariff of the other countries is receiving it. I could go on with more examples, but there is one remarkable rendition of English into French to which I wish to refer. His Excellency uses the expression, "after the fullest discussion," and the translation of the words "fullest discussion" appears as "d'une abondante discussion." It would not take a Frenchman versed in the principles of translation to give a better translation than that. Who ever heard of "abondante" in that sense? Nobody.

I could give many other instances, but before concluding may I draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the interpretation placed by the Solicitor General upon section 3 of Bill No. 4, that there is a greater status given to the French language in the parliament of Canada. As I have stated before, under section 133 of the British North America Act the status of the French language is recognized. But the Solicitor General states that we have before us a bill which, by act of parliament, will give a still greater status to the French language. When the Secretary of State rises to conclude the debate, will he say whether he is prepared to subscribe to the interpretation placed upon Bill No. 4, so far as the French language is concerned, by the Solicitor General?

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I briefly express my views of the present discussion? I have not the presumption of being able to add much to the speeches delivered on both sides of the house; however as the representative of the constituency of Laprairie-Napierville, destined to disappear from the electoral map, I deem it my duty,—on behalf of my constituents,—to state my views on the present bill.

Previous to discussing the merit of this measure, I am greatly pleased to associate myself with the hon. members who preceded me in this debate in expressing my appreciation and proclaiming the ability, equity and broad-mindedness of the Secretary of State, the sponsor of this bill. I take pleasure in expressing to the honourable Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) my sincere appreciation of the distinguished tone of his remarks and of the high plane on which he has placed this question. I think it is perfectly useless, in an assembly like this, to indulge in vulgar personalities, and it is a real pleasure to hear an honourable member of this house, from any party, speak with dignity and respect the opinions of his opponents, while upholding his own views.

It has been a labour of love for me to study in all its details the history of my country. I have noticed in our parliamentary history that in the time of John A. Macdonald, Laurier, Tarte, Lemieux, Tupper and all the other illustrious men who have graced this parliament, public affairs were always discussed in the same spirit that the honourable Solicitor General has shown in the present debate. It seems to me that we should be inspired by that exalted spirit of our forefathers, and that we should be respectful of that tradition in this house. It is for that reason that I take the liberty of expressing my sincere gratification to all those who have spoken in the spirit we have noticed in the Solicitor General's remarks.

In the part I intend to take in discussing this bill, I shall give first place to the personality of the honourable member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). Our honourable friends sitting to the right of the Speaker attach much importance to his authority. Mr. Speaker, I shall say that since my early youth I have followed closely the political struggles which have characterized the history of recent years, and I have always taken great interest in the speeches and opinions of the honourable member for Labelle. I have not always shared his views, but I have always had some admiration for his character. Although I dislike violence in discussion, and while admiring the great moderation shown by our illustrious leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I used to take pleasure in going to the political meetings where Bourassa was thundering with his fervent eloquence and proclaiming his patriotism, which nobody ever questioned.

We must admit that times have changed. I do not think that the honourable member for Labelle, with his customary modesty would deny or resent my opinion that he was representing no other views than his own when he spoke in the present debate. He certainly was not expressing the opinion of his electors, and notwithstanding all the respect we may have for his character, I do not think that the people of the province of Quebec would follow him in the direction he has taken a few days ago.

Mr. Speaker, any man may change his own mind. I think Mrs. Asquith said one day that only God and fools never change their mind. She was perfectly right. The honourable member for Labelle has changed his mind many times in the course of his career. That may be a proof of his intelligence. But too frequent changes of mind may be the cause of errors. In my humble opinion, the honourable member's attitude towards this bill may be one of the worst blunders of his political life. The honourable member is undoubtedly sincere; nobody will question his integrity or his sincerity, but he may have erred.

On the same subject, I shall call the attention of honourable gentlemen opposite to the opinion of a man who ranks high in the history of our country, especially in the history of the great movement which had the honourable member for Labelle as its chairman and leader for a good number of years, I mean the nationalist movement. I am going to quote the words of one of the principal apostles of that movement, Mr. Oliver Asselin. Referring to the honourable member for Labelle, his old comrade of the nationalist movement, he said in the course of an interview given to a newspaper, on June 2nd, 1925:

The contradictions which are to be found in the last twelve or thirteen years of Mr. Bourassa's political career would fill a large volume.

I shall not read the rest of that article, and I have not quoted that paragraph in any derogatory sense to the honourable member for Labelle. He would be the first to have a good laugh at it. I only wish to say to the honourable Solicitor General and to the other members opposite, that they make a mistake in relying too much on the authority of the honourable member for Labelle, as he did in his eloquent speech of yesterday in favour of this bill.

Allow me now, Mr. Speaker, to discuss certain points of this bill. The honourable Solicitor General says that section 3 of the bill shall result in greater efficiency in the translation services. But he insists especially on the point that the rights of the French language are enlarged and made more secure by this bill. He gave us his interpretation of section 3. But he did not say a word of section 6 .

I respectfully submit that, from the legal standpoint, section 3 has not the force claimed for it by the hon. Solicitor General. The section says:

[Mr. Dupuis.]

3. (1) There shall be a bureau under the minister, to be called the Bureau for Translations, the duties and function of which shall be to collaborate with and act for all departments of the public service, and both houses of the Parliament of Canada and all bureaus, branches, commissions and agencies created or appointed by act of parliament, or by order of the governor in council, in making and revising all translations from one language into another of all departmental and other reports, documents, debates, bills, acts, proceedings and correspondence.

For the accurate understanding of the consequences of this section and should add, after the word "correspondence," that the minister under whose authority the department will be placed, will be empowered to decree, by order in council, under section 6 of the same bill, what documents are to be translated, and the said documents will be translated on the order of Secretary of State. To prove this, may I be allowed to read section 6?

6. (1) The minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may make all regulations which are by him deemed necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Section 6 goes further still. Here is subsection (2):

(2) Any such regulation so approved by the governor in council in pursuance of this act shall be of the same force and effect as if it had been enacted herein.

The broadmindedness of the hon. Secretary of State is admitted by all the members of this house, without distinction of party. But what guarantee have we that at some future time there may not come on the scene a Secretary of State, of whichever party it may be, who will take a narrow-minded view of the situation and, for instance, restrict the use of the French language in the various departments, by having translated only such documents as he sees fit? He is empowered, under section 6, to have translated only such documents as he deems proper. That part of bill 4 causes some anxiety. I submit that the powers granted the minister in charge of the translation service are far too wide and may lead to radical departures, the consequences of which can readily be foreseen. We should not grant such wide powers to any one individual; let us keep our prerogatives.

Mention has been made of privileges. I think the hon. Secretary of State admitted that when the bill is up before the committee he intends to move that the translation service be divided into two branches. But then, to repeat the question asked by the former Minister of Marine, why bring down a bill for the purpose of regulating the translation service in the House of Commons and the Senate? This house has the power to regulate the said service by a resolution of its own. I will go even further than the hon. member for Richelieu: I say that the government, by an order in council, can regulate the translation service in the House of Commons and in the Senate, just as the Senate has the power to regulate its own translation.

We are told that the privileges of this house are not affected. It seems to me that the British people, and, following in their wake, the Canadian people, have, for generations past, fought enough and striven enough, at the cost of untold sacrifices, to gain the privileges, the prerogatives and the rights that we possess; and we should not consent to have them done away with through any such bill as this; we should not allow any further breach in the constitution.

The British North America Act, section 18, defines the privileges and the powers of the House of Commons. Section 18 was substituted in 1887, for the previous section. This section provides that no act passed by parliament must exceed the privileges that the House of Commons presently enjoys. I quote, in English:

—but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and by the members thereof.

It is evident, therefore, that the section was drawn up with the most scrupulous care, so as to jealously preserve the prerogative of this house. We are told that the matter is not one of importance. I noticed, a while back, that the hon. Minister of Marine said that no importance attached to the sacrifice of these privileges, if the rights of the French tongue were increased thereby. I take the liberty of quoting his hon. leader to contradict him.

In his speech on the address, at the beginning of the session, speaking on the subject of titles and the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, January 30, 1934, the right hon. Prime Minister said, page 100 of Hansard, speaking of the House of Commons and of its members:

They may pass a resolution, if they so wish, asking, nay instructing the Prime Minister by a majority of the chamber that they do not wish any further recommendations to be made.

And he added:

That privilege lies in this House of Commons. But I do entreat those who are concerned about the maintenance of our institutions, who love our constitutional liberties and realize the extent to which they rest upon the exercise of prerogative, and extent of which some have little understanding because they have not investigated, not for one moment to conclude that the House of Commons by a majority vote in 1919 could divest the soverign of this empire and of this dominion of the prerogative which he possesses in respect of honours and awards.

If I may interpret freely the words of the right hon. Prime Minister, I would earnestly urge the hon. members opposite to abstain from concluding that the House of Commons, by its vote on the bill now being considered, can divest itself of its prerogatives which are in respect of constitutional liberties secured as a result of the struggles waged by our ancestors.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how it happens that, in this year of our Lord 1934, the government decided to introduce this bill. Was it really a case of emergency? Would it be that the defects referred to by the Secretary of State and concerning which information was denied to us, are of such seriousness, so far reaching that, in his wisdom, he deemed it necessary to introduce his bill at the present time? Could he not have waited another year or so, or, as was quite properly pointed out by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), wait until the house had obtained further information through a full investigation, by a committee of the house or a royal commission, of the charges laid? Why the urgency in connection with the bill? I do not know. I think the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) himself has given us the real reason. We are told that the bill will result in a considerable saving of public funds. A few minutes ago, with the eloquence that characterizes him, the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) has shown that instead—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You should not spoil his speech.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): —instead of resulting in a saving, the proposed system would prove most costly.

The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé, may I say incidentally, will be kind enough to refrain from interrupting me. I think he should save up his energy in order to obtain from the government a million dollar subscription in behalf of the university of Montreal. That would offset to some extent the aspersions made by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil). Mr. Speaker, I fail to see what motives are actuating the government in pressing the bill. From my hon. friends opposite, and particularly the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), I may inquire whether they could not have devoted the energy, the time and the money now being spent in connection with this totally unwarranted bill, to a better end than that now sought by them, to more urgent and worthy matters. Surely, in the constituency represented by the honourable Minister of Marine, there must be some people in want. Far from me the idea of appealing to popular feelings, but after all, we must be mindful of the people since we are their representatives, we must realize their hardships, their needs, and remember the promises made to them in order to come into power. So, I urge the hon. members on the other side to implement their pledges instead of exerting themselves to secure the passing of a bill which perhaps might be considered in days of prosperity but should never have been introduced at a time when hardships prevail in every home, despair is assailing the hearts of the people, and doubts are entertained as to the future ahead of us. Would it not be more useful and a hundred fold more appropriate for the honourable members of the government to try to redeem their promises of 1930? These pledges have been so often recalled in this house that it would be a waste of time for me to mention them once more. The government knows what was promised. In order to avoid being considered as vain boasters, as men lacking in sincerity and unmindful of the people, the members of this government should, from this very day, devote the time we are spending now in this house on a bill that could perhaps be considered at a later date, for which there is no urgency to the passing of measures likely to bring relief to the people, and thus redeem the pledges taken by their leader as well as the false promises made after him.

I would ask the honourable minister, whom I hold in great esteem, with whom I have always dealt fairly and whom it is my intention to always treat with the fairness that should become a representative of the people, to redeem the promises he made in his constituency and elsewhere in connection with the Victoria bridge, when he undertook to abolish or reduce the tolls charged for the use of that bridge, in the interest of the farmers of the south shore who transport their products to Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): That has no connection with this bill.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Could he not better employ the time he spends uselessly and come to the relief of farmers who are on the verge of starvation, and whose self-denial is so greatly admired by all? The Canadian farmers, whatever race they belong to, have set an example to all the countries of the world as well as to our various social classes. They have shown their courage and self-denial in the present crisis. But the people's patience and spirit of sacrifice must not be taken advantage of. It is high time that the hon. gentlemen who hoisted themselves to power through pledges that they soon forgot, although they may have been genuine at the time, it is high time, I state, that they redeem these pledges. The people clamour for relief, the more so because members of this government made promises which then seemed genuine.

To use the words, sir, of one of the greatest geniuses the world has known, I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Canada has her eyes on you, she expects you to redeem your pledges, she awaits your help. I do not expect you to relieve the crisis which, at present, prevails over the whole world; however, I am honest enough to admit that the crisis has somewhat to do with the distress existing, to-day. May I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they were as frank in 1930? Why did hon. gentlemen not mention that the distress which had made its first appearance in 1929, was the result of a world wide crisis? Yet, at that period, the people were more prosperous than to-day. They are becoming impatient. Of all nations, the Canadian people have shown the greatest fortitude. No doubt they are still willing to bear up; however faced with the distress of the people, hon. gentlemen must act, they must discontinue these useless discussions, these measures which have no earthly reason to exist; relieve the people and they will be grateful to you. What I desire—hon. gentlemen also desire—is the welfare of our country. The constituency I represent will disappear after parliament is prorogued; let the government fulfil its promises and I shall support it. I shall willingly lend a hand to the hon. Minister of Marine, if he will only redeem one-tenth of the pledges of his leader! Are hon. gentlemen ready to redeem these pledges?

The hon. Solicitor General explained the difference between the principle and the accessory; he informed us that the principle was an additional guarantee to the rights of the French language which the bill assures us. That is establishing such a fine distinction between section 133 of our constitution and this bill, that I am at a loss to follow him. The subtlety is so great that my answer to the hon. Solicitor General is: of what service are the laws which are not put into practice?

I do not wish to appeal to race prejudices and my hon. friend the Solicitor General has neither the right to do so. Whatever may be the races which form the population of this country, I am certain that the monopoly of justice, equity, truth and of all that is good in the human heart is not centred in one race, in particular. It does not belong more to the Canadians of French origin than to the Canadians of English or Scotch origin. It is in the heart of all well thinking citizens —and they are the majority. I place more trust, sir, in what is good in my fellow-citizens, whatever religion or race they belong to, than in any useless law text. To use, in closing my remarks, the thought of one of the greatest writers of modern France, may I say:

What matters whether justice is embedded in the law, if it is not deep in the heart. And if the heart is bad of what good is the equity which governs the law. Keep the compass and the level away from the crafty surveyor, for with well adjusted instruments, he will apportion unfairly. As long as men are misers and cruel, they will interpret the kindest laws cruelly and will despoil their brothers with words of love.

Mr. Speaker, the law counts for little. It is the spirit of the law, the spirit born from feelings existing in the heart which counts. I shall close my remarks by stating that the whole of this discussion is futile; we have thrown away considerable money uselessly; we have wasted too much time in the discussion of this bill, and were I permitted to make a suggestion to the government, I would say: Set aside all these measures, do not endeavour to decoy the people with such humbug as that of the inquiry on the spread of prices. The government endeavours to becloud public opinion with investigations such as the committee on agriculture held on milk, last year. I ask the hon. Minister of Marine, as well as all his colleagues: Where is there a farmer who sells his milk at a higher price since this inquiry was held? What authority has this house to interfere, even by a whit, with the rights the farmers possess in each province, in connection with milk? This question is within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures; however, hon. gentlemen opposite wished to justify themselves by holding this investigation and it had absolutely no results. At present, there is an endeavour to lull the public by holding investigations such as the spread of prices, the radio and another one, the name of which has escaped my memory. Forget all this useless legislation and get down to brass tacks so that the people may say: Party lines have been broken, we shall support you if you come to our relief—the government has set aside party strife, they endeavour to prove their goodwill, give us proof of this goodwill and I feel certain the Canadian people will feel happier than at the present time.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, no one has been more surprised than I at the reception which this bill has received from certain of my hon. friends who sit to your left. There is evidently a misapprehension in the minds of my hon. friends who think that this bill is projected to attain some partisan end or some political advantage. I can assure them that I was never less partisan than when I introduced this bill and endeavoured to place it fairly before the house for consideration of hon. members on both sides. I find that there is a considerable difference of opinion, but I trust that when this bill is referred, as it certainly will be, to the select special committee, those who are interested will appear and give evidence with regard to the utility of this measure.

There are some matters in connection with the present translation system which must be amended. A political institution cannot survive unless it is efficiently maintained and utilized as an instrument of public service. The present translation system is defective. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), even the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), and other hon. members have suggested that modifications and changes might be made in the present system which would prove to be of great public advantage.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the desire of the house to continue the discussion of this bill or to adjourn, it being now eleven o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Cahan the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 7, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

First report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

QUESTIONS

3. 570.

4. Nil.

LIFE INSURANCE BUSINESS IN CANADA

Mr. COOTE:

1. What was the total amount of loans on policies of life insurance companies operating in Canada on December 31st, during each of the last ten years?

2. What was the total amount of policies lapsed in life insurance companies operating in Canada during each of the last ten years?

3. What was the total amount paid to policy holders and beneficiaries in each of these years?

4. What was the total amount of premiums paid by policy holders during each of these years?

5. What were the number and value of ordinary life insurance policies in force in Canada at the end of 1932, or any other available date, in each of the following groups: (a) under $1,001; (b) $1,001 to $2,000; (c) $2,001 to $3,000; (d) $3,001 to $4,000; (e) $4,001 to $5,000; (f) $5,001 to $10,000; (g) $10,001 to $20,000; (h) $20,001 to $30,000; (i) $30,001 to $40,000; (j) $40,001 to $50,000; (k) $50,001 to $100,000; (l) $100,001 to $500,000; (m) $500,001 to $1,000,000; (n) over $1,000,000?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to these questions it is obvious, since the decision of the privy council, that the dominion government is not in possession of all the information that has to do with the questions asked, as the provinces are solely in possession of information with respect to some companies issuing life insurance policies in Canada. Under these circumstances any answers given would be wholly inadequate and improper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions dropped.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. On what date or dates was the Combines Investigation Act passed in Canada?

2. In what year was same act declared intra vires by privy council?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Assented to June 13, 1923.

2. January 29, 1931.

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. From 1921 to 1925, inclusive, were there any firm or firms investigated under the Combines Investigation Act?

2. If so, how many firms were investigated and what was the name of each firm?
3. Was there any fine imposed, what was the amount imposed on each firm and what amount was paid by each?
4. Was there any firm dissolved after preliminary investigation, and if so, what was the name of such firm?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Yes, from 1923 to 1925.

2. Three principal investigations: (a) distributors of fruits and vegetables in western Canada; (b) coal dealers at Winnipeg and other places in western Canada; (c) wholesale distributors of New Brunswick potatoes. Over 50 other cases dealt with.

3. Western fruit combine case. Fines totalling $200,000 imposed and paid, in 1926, $25,000 on each of four companies and four individuals.

5. What are the total annual salaries, including deductions, paid to the deputy ministers appointed to replace those retired since August 7, 1930?

EGG AND HOG GRADING ACTS

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome Missisquoi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Egg and Hog Grading Acts should be amended.

He said: In bringing this resolution before the house I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not averse to the grading of farm produce provided the farmer is not exploited in the operation. If the farmer is properly safeguarded I am decidedly in favour of the grading of farm produce, with the idea of improving the quality. The farmer does not desire to have impossible regulations and restrictions imposed against the middleman who undoubtedly plays a very important role in the economic life of the farmer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PICKEL: I agree that he is justly entitled to reasonable remuneration for his services so performed.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is desirable that hon. members preserve better order. When one conversation is going on it is bad enough but with fifty it is difficult for the member speaking to make himself heard.

Mr. PICKEL: It would be almost impossible, Mr. Speaker, for the farmer to-day to make the necessary contact with the consumer to dispose of his goods if it were not for the intervention of the middleman. But I do not think it is necessary that the middleman should make a fortune in a year or two while the farmer is forced to a lifelong struggle for a mere existence. This pathetic and unbearable plight of the farmer did not spring up overnight, it has been coming on for a long time—for many years. Much time has been occupied in this chamber in discussing this problem of the betterment of the farmers' position. Much valuable time has been lost in the futile debates that have taken place here simply because hon. members did not and do not realize or fully appreciate the grievous burdens under which the farmer is compelled to labour. Apparently many hon. members consider that if the agriculture estimates are increased continuously and consistently from year to year, that is about all that can be done for the farmers. This attitude of mind was well evidenced in the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume) on the debate on the address. The farmer need not expect much assistance from members of his mentality. In the case of this hon. gentleman, however, nothing much else could be expected because he is a distributor, and later I will have more to say about that phase of the question. Much can be done by this government to assist the farmer and enable him to get back on the road to prosperity, without the expenditure of a great deal of money. Legislation could be and should be enacted at once to regulate the orderly marketing of the products of the farm.

It is not my intention, sir, to criticize the intricate framework of these two grading acts, but I should like to point out to the house some methods by which the products of the farmers are put right into the hands of the packers and commission men. Let us take first the Hog Grading Act and look at its inner workings. The hog grader is a government employee, but he never comes in contact with the producer. He lives with the packer; they are bosom friends; they are pals, and he is going to do anything he can to help his pal. The hogs are sent to a central point for grading, where they are looked after and graded and where the price is set by people whose object is to make the price and grade just as low as possible. I should like to cite one or two instances to indicate the hardships that have been worked on our farmers, and I could mention scores of cases of this kind. In one of the best swine counties in this dominion, where they have spent a good deal of time and money on their stock, from 1922 to May 1, 1932, one dealer averaged one or two carloads a week; probably over the whole period he would have shipped between 12,000 and 15,000 hogs. Out of that number he had two selects. Another dealer took in a load of about 45 hogs to Montreal. He took them to the abattoir, and one of the graders who came around stepped in amongst the hogs and said, "You have two selects." This gentleman replied, "I think we had better put these into a pen here and wire Ottawa to have someone come and grade them. I have been a swine judge at a number of fairs in the province of Quebec for a good many years and I know a great deal more about hog grading than you will ever know." They became rather hot under the collar and argued for a while; finally they cooled down, and then this same grader gave him 37 selects out of the lot instead of 2.

The Egg Grading Act is worse than the Hog Grading Act. The egg grader is not even a government employee; he is a little two-by-four clerk in the employ of the commission house, and naturally he is going to do all he can to help the commission men. I could give the details in scores of cases where the egg producers throughout the eastern townships have been exploited in the shipping of eggs to Montreal. The condition has become so bad that the small dealer in the country will not buy ungraded eggs because every time he sends a crate of eggs to Montreal he loses. As a result the farmer is penalized; when he does take his eggs to the grocery store to exchange for goods or cash he receives a very small price because the shipper cannot afford to pay him more and take a chance on the grading in Montreal.

I should like to cite two instances with regard to the grade of eggs which were shipped to Montreal. One crate of select eggs was picked up in the morning and reached the Montreal market at noon. In two or three days the producer received a letter from the commission house giving the grade of the crate; there were two dozen selects, two dozen first, and the remainder were mostly seconds, cracked, rotten and so on. Two or three days later he picked up another crate of specially small eggs; there was not an egg in the crate that would grade over a pullet's egg. In two or three days he received a return showing that the grading was just as good as it was on the case of selects. This demonstrates that they do not look at the eggs at all; they just guess at them. I think they have a blank grading which they send out to the farmer, and they are stealing fifty per cent of his eggs all the time.

I have a particular case in point. On June 6 last we telephoned to a packing house in Montreal for a crate of select eggs. They were sent over, and I have here the tag which was attached to the crate. They were tagged, according to law, with letters an inch high, and we paid $6 for the crate of thirty dozen eggs, at the rate of 20 cents a dozen. That crate of eggs was shipped out by express to the eastern townships; it was repacked into another crate in the presence of witnesses and shipped back within twenty-four hours to the same packing company for sale. Here is the result: We paid $6 for the crate. It was returned to the same packing house within twenty-four hours and the return we got from it was $3.20. We had extras, $8\frac{1}{2}$ dozen at 15 cents; first, 13 dozen at 12 cents; seconds, 6 dozen at 10 cents, and cracked, 19 at 9 cents, I want to say right here that when the crate reached its destination in the eastern townships there was not a cracked egg in it, but when those eggs reached Montreal there were 19 cracked and 4 rotten. That is the kind of grading we have to put up with. I have all the evidence before me to prove what I have said, including express bills and all other documents.

As I stated before, it is not the object of the farmers to have impossible regulations imposed against the consumers, but we have to have some method by which the farmer will be assured of a just return for his goods. As conditions exist to-day I say that neither hog grading nor egg grading is satisfactory. The department states that it is doing good work, and that the consumption of eggs is increasing. I say, however, that the farmer is paying for it. He is giving his eggs away. Perhaps by making a gift of them consumption may increase, but that is not what he is farming for. He must make a living on his farm and under present conditions he cannot do it.

I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Tummon, that this matter be referred to the committee on agriculture, or a special committee, or, if it has time, the committee investigating price spreads and mass buying which is now sitting. This matter could be considered and grading regulations could be adjusted. I contend that a small good egg is just as good as a large good egg. There should be two grades, good eggs and bad eggs. Further, in my view the proper way to sell eggs is by the pound, just the same as you would sell hogs or sheep. I believe I have outlined the only logical way for the marketing of eggs.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) on hog grading and egg grading. Last year he came along with a motion about milk, stating that the farmer was not receiving enough for that commodity and that the consumer in the city was paying too much. The matter was referred to the committee on agriculture and a report made. No legislation, however, was passed, the matter was simply referred back to the provinces. especially the province of Quebec.

To-day the hon. member offers a motion with regard to hog and egg grading, and asks to have it accepted by the farmers in this house. My recollection is that a few years ago Sir George Foster brought before the House of Commons a measure to have eggs sold by the pound. After discussion by members then sitting in the house the suggestion was considered unsatisfactory and was withdrawn. I must say that I see a difference between a small egg and a large egg. I do not think a consumer would pay as much for a dozen small pullet eggs as he would for the larger ones. When we go to buy eggs in the Montreal markets we find that there is a difference in the prices of eggs, small and large. The purse of the consumer also must be graded. If the Montreal consumer, paying forty cents for a dozen eggs, received four big eggs and eight small ones, he would be the subject of exploitation. On the other hand we do not want to exploit the farmer. We must remember that the consumers in the city like to get what they pay for, especially the working men in the labouring districts.

The hon. member said there should be a difference between the price paid for bad eggs and that paid for good ones. That is a reasonable and normal proposition. Certainly no one has a right to sell bad eggs on the market. The hon. member has told about shipping eggs to the city of Montreal. He said that four bad eggs were found in a crate shipped to the eastern townships and then immediately shipped back to Montreal. I do not think the fault could be traced to the egg dealer in Montreal or to the wholesale merchant. I believe it was only an accident. The hon. member cannot get away from the fact that the crate came from the country to Montreal. The four eggs were put in the crate before they were returned to the hon. member's district, and I believe it was just a case of error. One cannot draw a general conclusion from such circumstances.

The remarks of my hon. friend bring to my mind another point. When last year he spoke about milk, and again to-day about hogs and eggs, he said that the farmer is not satisfied, nor is he himself satisfied with the government's present agricultural measures. Why is he not satisfied? I must remind the hon. member that the administration is in the hands of the party to which he belongs; he is friendly to the government now in power. Why has he not asked before, and why does he not ask immediately for some redress for the grievances about which he has spoken? To-day he suggests that the question of hog grading and egg grading be submitted to the committee on agriculture. In my view the result would be the same as it was last year in connection with milk and milk products, namely lots of noise and plenty of soap box speeches, but no action or results for the farmers.

Mr. J. T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in support of the resolution of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel). I believe that these regulations are so complicated—and I am now speaking particularly of those concerning poultry and eggs—as to make them unworkable. It is impossible for the ordinary farmer to grade his own produce, with the result that he must ship it to town and take the returns which come to him, without any possibility of verification or checking. I do not suggest that all packers and all middlemen are unjust and unfair, but it has come to my knowledge, and an instance has been given to-day by the hon. member introducing the resolution, that unfair practices are sometimes indulged in by the middleman. We do know that the producer is receiving a price for his commodities which, when compared with the prices paid in the cities for those commodities, is altogether too low. It occurs to me that it would be well to have these regulations inquired into and thoroughly revised. I know, for instance, that a club just outside of Montreal began buying its eggs from a producer, and it immediately came into conflict with these regulations because the producer was unable to give the certificate, which can emanate only from a licensed dealer. As the producer, the small producer at all events, can never qualify for the licence, he is not permitted to deal in these commodities, in a way that is profitable to himself. It might be that a produce exchange in the large centres which would provide for the carrying out of this inspection and the application of the act under the joint auspices of the producer, the middleman and the consumer would remedy the ills of which the farmer so justifiably, in my estimation, complains.

I think there are too many classes and kinds of poultry and eggs. I have, for instance, before me the regulations, and I find that ducks for purposes of marketing are divided into ducks and ducklings. A duckling reaches maturity eleven or twelve weeks after hatching, yet under the grading act a duck which is much older than that may be classified as a duckling, and the producer who sends a duckling to a foreign market is obliged sometimes to certify that the duckling is not a duckling, although it is in fact a duckling within the meaning of the regulation. This is merely an instance of the inadequacy of the regulations. I have much pleasure in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) asking that the regulations be reviewed and revised by the committee on agriculture.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken up very much of the time of the house this session, but I feel that the farmers of my constituency are being very unfairly treated in this matter of grading. The resolution seeks to amend the act. I would say, do away with the hog grading act altogether. It is vicious, it is unnecessary, it is absolutely against the farming interests of the country. It is in favour of the packer and not in favour of the agriculturist.

We have throughout Canada a number of hog graders. To my mind that service is an absolute waste of money. Let these agricultural students go back to the land and make money in other ways than by grading hogs for the farmer in the stockyards for the benefit of the packing industry. The total amount of money paid out for hog grading in 1933, according to the information I have received from the Department of Agriculture, was $43,-540. If you would turn that money over to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), and I say this advisedly, to be used in putting out pure bred animals for the farmer, instead of wasting it on these chaps who are absolutely useless in any stockyard, you would be doing more good for the country. Is it not an insult to the farmers of western Canada to say that they do not know the type of hog that is demanded in the British market? The farmer knows better than these hog graders just what is wanted. I had occasion at one time to come from western Canada with four thousand hogs, when hog grading first started, and I have never touched a hog since because all the profit I got out of those four thousand hogs after they graded them in the city of Toronto was $47. I have never bothered with the hog industry since.

If hog grading in the early days did serve a purpose in teaching the farmer what type of hog was wanted for the British market, it is absolutely not needed now because the farmer knows thoroughly the type of hog that is being asked for.

Take the farmer's hog in the stockyard. The hog is put through three or four grades, and if you follow those hogs on to the rails in the packing plants you will find that a good many of them are converted into Wiltshire sides and are going over to the old country market. So the farmer is the loser. It is the farmer who is suffering, and instead of asking, as this resolution does, that the act be amended I would say that it be wiped out altogether in the interests of agriculture. When I say that, I am not speaking without experience; for fifty years of my life have been spent on the stockyards in Canada. I have watched this business of hog grading going on. Now that I represent an agricultural district in this house I am speaking on behalf of my farmer constituents when I ask the Minister of Agriculture to wipe this hog grading off the books altogether and give the farmers in western Canada a chance.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not know whether I caught correctly the remarks of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) but I understood him to say that the egg inspectors were not in the employ of the government but in the employ of the commission houses. My hon. friend nods his head and says that that is correct. If that is the case, I think we should have an explanation from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) because I am of the opinion that there are egg graders who are employed by the Department of Agriculture under the regulations of the Dominion government. If that is not so, we are sadly astray in our view of the situation.

I am not opposed to the grading of agricultural products, but I do know that there is some dissatisfaction regarding the egg grading regulations. I do not say that these regulations are not perhaps in the interest of the farmer himself, and undoubtedly they are a great protection to the consumer; but still there seems to be some difficulty over the country storekeeper who takes in eggs and reships them to an egg grading plant in one of the larger centres.

If the Minister of Agriculture speaks to-day I should be glad to have him clear up that point as to whether or not the inspectors are in the employ of the government.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like most emphatically to deny the allegations made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) that the men engaged in hog grading at the different live stock yards throughout the country are bosom friends of the packers, that they are in league with the packers and are working directly against the farmer. I do not think that any hon. member of this house, no matter where he sits, can afford to make a statement like that without submitting at least some evidence as a basis for his statement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not speaking of hog graders simply as Minister of Agriculture for the dominion but as a farmer myself in Saskatchewan, and I want to say that I have never found anyone more anxious to help the farmer in improving the quality of his hogs, in getting better production stock, in the feeding of the stock, and so directing the farmer that with an intelligent operation of his hog industry he can obtain a higher percentage of selects or bacon hogs, and in that way get a greater return from them, than the hog graders in this country. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) has stated that these men would be better engaged if they assisted in the improving of the hog industry. The fact is that that is what they are doing. They are not being paid only for grading hogs, they act as field men. They give a good deal of their time to the working out of our hog policies. I do not intend to take any time in discussing this phase.

As a farmer, I cannot speak too strongly in favour of the work these men are doing. The cost is less than one one-hundredth of a cent per pound; it is in the neighbourhood of two cents per hog. At the present time we do not believe that the grading regulations or the carrying out of those regulations are all that they should be. A continual study is being made of these matters but the fact is that a system of hog grading was asked for by the producers, not by the packers or by the government. It was only after it was felt that there was a very strong demand for such a system that steps were taken to work one out. At the risk of being misunderstood, I think it can be said that the present system of grading is not of such a character that it can be told from a live hog whether that hog will make a Wiltshire side. All that can be done is to arrive at some idea of the conformation of the hog and whether it will be finished properly when processed. We have always felt that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction with the system, but it has been carried on more as promotion work than with the idea of stating whether or not a hog will make a proper side. We cannot tell simply by looking at a hog just what the finish will be or the amount of lean and fat there will be in the side after killing. The only way this can be done is by grading on the rail.

Hon. members opposite have advocated that a change should be made to grading on the rail. Conferences have been held, both during the tenure of the previous government and our own, between producers, packers and the departmental officials. An attempt has been made to find out how these difficulties can be overcome. One of the greatest difficulties in grading on the rail is identification. Hogs are shipped in carload lots from Edmonton in Alberta, say, to Moncton in New Brunswick. If these were graded on the rail the farmer would have to wait until they were slaughtered and graded before receiving his settlement. The great difficulty has been to work out a proper means of identification. This is more difficult in Canada than it is in Denmark where they have mostly co-operative plants drawing hogs from small areas. Different methods of tattooing have been tried out but they were not found to be altogether successful. Different tags have been tried as well, as this is the method of identification used in Denmark and Sweden. It is now believed that if some changes were made in the machinery of the packing plants a method of identification could be worked out. The present machines take off many of the tags along with the hair and we feel that with some slight changes being made we can work out a proper method of identification. Within the last three years hundreds of thousands of hogs have been tested on the rail as an experiment. We feel that this is the only absolute test of the value of a hog. Under the proposed regulations it is possible for a farmer to enter into a written agreement with certain packing plants to have his hogs tested on the rail by government officials. It is difficult to say what has been the value in dollars and cents in the past of these grading regulations, but I believe it has been considerable. I was in Winnipeg in January and met live stock commission men from Winnipeg, Montreal, Toronto and various other places in Canada. I have heard some drovers and some hon. members, both inside and out of the house, raise objections to hog grading. It has been stated that money was being taken away from the farmers. I put this question to these live stock commission men from all over Canada: Do you think you get more money for the hogs sold in any one year when they are graded than you do when they are not graded? The answers I received were two nays and five yeas. One of the nays came from a commission firm in Montreal.

In this connection I might state that Montreal is one of the places where grading has not met with favour and over a number of years the quality of hogs handled in Montreal has declined more than any other place in Canada. The prices received have also declined. We have found that in those places where grading has been effective there is a steady increase in production and quality. The farmers in these places are not the kind who are in and out; they continue to produce more hogs at a uniform rate.

Mr. DUPUIS: Are there any officials of the Department of Agriculture available to the farmers in the district of Montreal to give help in the classifying and raising of hogs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are hog graders in Montreal who grade and will give assistance on request.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that only in the city of Montreal? I do not understand that they raise hogs in Montreal.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Hogs coming into Montreal.

Mr. DUPUIS: Are those men at the disposal of the farmers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. Hogs come into Montreal from eastern Ontario, Quebec and from western Canada as well.

I think there is a misunderstanding between the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) in connection with egg grading. The great proportion of egg grading is not done by government officials; it is done by the merchants who buy and ship the eggs. We have in our employ only forty-one egg graders and it would take a large army of graders to grade all the eggs delivered by farmers to the different stores throughout the country. These egg graders check up the grading of the storekeeper. It must be evident to hon. members that in the very nature of the work of these men they can deal with only a few storekeepers. We realize that the regulations have been evaded but when our graders find that the grading is out of line, steps are taken to check up the merchants and ensure that right grading is undertaken. A number of conferences have been held in an effort to improve our egg grading regulations. Personally I have been of the opinion that there were too many grades. We had specials, extras, firsts, seconds, fresh, storage, and so on. We had a conference with our egg graders, produce merchants, producers and some members of parliament, and went into the whole question. I felt that if we called one class of eggs firsts there should be none higher than that. It was decided to drop "firsts," "extras" and all that nomenclature in grading, and to draw up new regulations for the grading of eggs, A, B and C. Perhaps the hon. member who spoke first is not aware that eggs are now graded according to weight, because it does seem the only fair way to grade them.

I have before me a number of letters of approval with regard to the way in which the new grading regulations are working out, but I can assure hon. members that if the subject is referred to the committee on agriculture, no one will welcome more than I any suggestions that can be offered to the officials of the department or myself looking in any way to an improvement in the grading of eggs or hogs.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. John-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house when the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) discussed his resolution that in the opinion of the house, the Egg and Hog Grading Act should be amended.

I am fairly well acquainted with the question of hog grading on the Montreal market. As to egg grading I am not qualified to discuss the question. The grading of hogs is very important, however, it would be more important for the government to take the necessary steps—not similar to those taken after the coal investigation—so as to protect the farmers on the Montreal market or throughout the dominion. The house is aware that farmers are at the mercy of a trust, perhaps more powerful than the coal trust. There is in Montreal a company known as the Canada Packers Limited which controls the hog market. Others such as William Davies, Canadian Packing, Harris Abattoirs, Gunn-Langlois and Gunn Limited are controlled by the Canada Packers which entirely controls the Montreal market. Mention must be made that the Montreal Abattoirs is also known as the Wilsills; however, the latter is far from having the importance which Canada Packers has.

The farmer as well as the dealer who wish to ship hogs, sheep or beef to the Montreal market, are at the mercy of these two powerful companies; of those who require a commission of 5 or 10 per cent.

I have just heard the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) state that an inspector is placed at the disposal of farmers to grade or select the hogs shipped to the Montreal market; this means that the farmers receive $1.00 more per head. I have here the "Journal d'Agriculture," dated March 3. One notes, for instance:

Bacon hog (select), 180 to 220 pounds, $10.
Bacon hog, $10.

But no bonus for the latter. I wonder why a grade of hogs is given a bonus when the other, hogs of the same weight, is not. One contends that it is for the finishing. I am well acquainted with the subject and I state that on 25, 40. 50 or 100 head, you will not find 10 animals which are finished the same way. Whether it be a steer, lamb or hog, I do not think it possible to add to the animal half an inch of fat or remove one quarter of an inch; that cannot be done. With this humbug known as select, if you have 100 head, there will not be 10 which will receive a bonus of $1.00. The majority of salesmen on the Montreal market are dealers who travel through the rural sections, make their purchases from the farmers, load their trucks and ship to the Montreal market. At all events, I state that these dealers are at the mercy of trusts.

What the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) stated, just now, was the truth, speaking of his trip to Toronto; he had brought there 4,000 hogs and returned home with a profit of about $40. I also know some who came to Montreal with as many head and made very little profit.

Another item:

Hogs ready for market 100 to 230 lbs. $10.
Light hogs and to fatten 120 to 160 lbs. $10, a cut of 25 to 50 for 100 lbs.
Heavy hogs, 240 to 270 lbs., $10, cut of ½ cent per lb.

This means that when the dealer or farmer arrives on the Montreal market and a purchaser appears, he is told that the animals are graded and that lowers the price. If a dealer sells 100, 200 or 300 pounds of fresh roast pork at 15 cents per pound, he makes no mention whether the hogs weighed 120, 140 or 180 pounds, he sells it at the same price. The dealer pays the farmer according to the price he receives himself, and the price is set by the trusts.

The same may be said about eggs which are also graded. The farmers refuse to ship eggs to the Montreal market, because they inform us that when they do so, the report they receive, after grading, show that 95 per cent of their eggs are graded as third class.

I think, sir, that it would be desirable that a thorough investigation be held so as to expose these trusts which exploit the farmers. There are companies which make enormous profits at the farmers expense, just as there are coal companies which exploit the consumers in Quebec.

Take, for instance, lambs. A large number are brought to the Montreal market at the end of September or in October. The majority of these lambs are males, immediately a reduction of 1 to 2 cents per pound is made on the price compared with the price paid for females. These lambs are slaughtered and placed in cold storage. The price paid is 4 cents per pound and with the overhead charges the cost amounts to 9 cents per pound, yet in winter these lambs are sold at 14½ cents per pound. They are the same lambs, mostly males, which are sold at your dealer. There is no grading when they are resold, the grading is only when they are purchased.

It is seldom that a dealer or farmer goes to the Montreal market with any merchandise and that the latter is graded as first quality.

The same applies to calves purchased wholesale and for which the same price is paid. When slaughtered the trusts sell them at various prices according to whether they weigh 60 to 65 pounds or 80 to 90 pounds, etc. The grading is the cause of the spread of prices. I do not find fault, it is their business. Nevertheless, I think that the dealers who purchase these animals from the farmers should be dealt with fairly, because, as I stated just now, the dealers pay the farmers according to the prices they receive on the Montreal market. I am not acquainted with the Toronto market, however, according to what I have heard, the same conditions prevail there, for I think the Canada Packers have their headquarters in Toronto and branches throughout the country which exploit the farmers, just as in Quebec. I agree with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. If the government investigated the facts which I have submitted to them and which are my personal observation, I think it would prove very helpful to the farming class. The government contends that they are always willing to do all they possibly can for this deserving farming class, but once in office this good will is forgotten.

I state that the Canada Packers and other establishments of the kind in Montreal and Toronto should be dealt with like the coal companies of Montreal.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I regret that I was not in the house when this discussion began. I only came in when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) was, I presume, about halfway through his speech. I think in this matter I agree heartily with the Minister of Agriculture. It has been a matter of regret to me that during this parliament there have been attacks made on the grading system as applied to farm products, and the hon. member who sponsored this resolution seems to have been one of the leaders in making those attacks. When we come to deal with the dairy item in the estimates I propose to put on record some facts showing the effect the grading system has had on cream production in the province of Manitoba. The high standing Manitoba now occupies in connection with dairy products is due largely, I believe, to that grading system.

However, at the moment we are dealing with the grading of eggs and hogs. The resolution is very indefinite; it simply says that the Egg and Hog Grading Acts should be amended. I do not suppose anyone will contend that the grading of hogs is by any means one hundred per cent perfect. I think we can well admit that it is not and that when grading on the rail becomes practicable it will be better than the present system. I was interested in the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that he thinks they are now reaching some system of grading on the rail that will be satisfactory; I hope that may be the case. Any person who has given any consideration to the matter will, I believe, recognize that the difficulties of grading on the rail in a country like Canada are enormously greater than in such a country as Denmark where hogs are packed within a few miles of the place where they are raised. However, I do believe that though as I say the grading system as applied to hogs is not one hundred per cent perfect, yet there has been great improvement in the quality of hogs because of the grading system. I think the Minister of Agriculture will agree with that, as well as the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). In the early days of hog grading considerable objection was raised on the part of the producers, but in my judgment and as far as my observation goes in my own community, these objections have long since disappeared. Producers generally, I believe, are satisfied that the quality of the product has been improved and that, while mistakes may be made at times, and it may not be possible for a hog grader to do his grading with perfect accuracy, generally speaking not only has there been an increased percentage of select bacon hogs but the whole level of hog products has been raised. In my opinion it would be a great mistake to go back to the old system because if we are to take advantage of the splendid opportunities open to us in the English market it can only be by maintaining a high quality of product. I hope nothing will be done that will tend to lessen the standard or take away from farmers the inducement to raise a high quality produce. Therefore not only by reason of this discussion but from what I have heard the Minister of Agriculture say on former occasions, I am likely to be in close agreement with him on this matter.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Now that the principle of grading all farm products has run the gauntlet of successive governments I think we can take it that grading has come to stay. In 1922 only one farm product that I know of was sold on the basis of grade, that was grain. Since then successive governments have extended the grading policy, until now practically every exportable article, at all events, goes forward to the markets of the world on the basis of grade, that being the only way to get the best market and to encourage quality. I have to commend the Minister of Agriculture for taking the stand he has taken to-day; it is exactly what I would hope he would do, and what I hope successive governments will do. To go back now to the old haphazard way of selling eggs as eggs and pigs as pigs would be a terribly retrograde movement, particularly as we are now looking more and more to the British market as the chief market for our farm products. As the house knows, the British government passed in 1931 the Farm Marketing Act, the purpose of which is standardization of farm products, and also to provide for the marketing of the same. Newspaper reports indicate that this government is contemplating bringing down a similar act, to provide for the marketing of farm products in Canada on the basis of grade. I look forward to such legislation with pleasure. I really cannot understand why my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins), a gentleman who has spent his life among live stock, should speak deprecatingly of the principle of grading. I sympathize in a measure with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel); no doubt he feels impelled to take the stand he has taken, not an unreasonable stand; he is asking only for amendment and amendments are always in order. I have no doubt that some of his constituents have not yet grasped the idea on which grading is based, which is, not to make government positions, not to worry the farmers, but to encourage them to produce quality products by paying for them on the basis of grade and quality. The principle is so preeminently sound that I cannot conceive of it being abandoned and the old order restored.

With regard to grading hogs on the rail, I think that is good, although it can only be carried out in the larger centres. In small countries like Denmark it is all done that way as far as I know. Most of the hogs are delivered to the abattoirs in trucks, slaughtered immediately, and are on the rail before the farmer has got his chores done around town and wants to go home. He gets his grade before he goes, so it is quite practical there and I think it is a good policy to aim at here; it is the correct policy wherever the country lends itself to it. I am glad to see that the department has adopted that policy, and probably it will be extended as time goes on, as that was the original intention.

The question of the grading of eggs always has been a knotty problem in this house. Eggs are amongst the most difficult farm products to grade, because the quality will not stay put very long. If eggs are exposed to high temperatures, for instance, of course the quality will depreciate, and the original grader has to allow for a little deterioration which must take place in the time which elapses before the eggs reach the ultimate consumer. The new regulations which were put into force last November, I think, have simplified the grades and made them more understandable to the purchasing public. I think that is an improvement, and it is what we expect. All legislation, all regulation and all progress is based upon the experiences of the past and there is no system of doing anything that is not capable of improvement as time warrants it. I can assure the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that I shall be delighted to do anything I can to improve the grading of hogs, eggs or any other commodity. I notice on the order paper a fruit act which carries out the same principle, and while this looks pretty drastic on the surface I think it is all right.

I wish to assure the minister—and this is chiefly what I rose to say—that I am only too glad to be able to lend my support at this time. When I took charge of the Department of Agriculture my predecessor often gave me the benefit of his experience and his support at times when I needed it, and similarly I hope to be helpful to my hon. friend because I know what it is to have to stand up not only against one's own colleagues but also against the great body of members coming from rural districts who become irritated with every little restraint that is put on them and that they do not understand. They come back to the minister and say, "Why do you want to be worrying about these things? Let matters stand as they are. This is pure theory, it is claimed, and merely irritates the worried and already overburdened producer." But I find that if we persist in these matters and be frank with the producer, eventually the principle is accepted; then the details are improved upon and finally the whole country wonders why the plan of grading was not adopted long before. Just at this time, when we are looking to the British market, we should go forward and not backward, on quality, quantity and continuity, and that is why I rose to extend to the minister my support in his endeavour to improve matters in this respect.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): I do not propose to take up very much of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure I would be the last to oppose either the hog grading or the egg grading act. As the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has already intimated, however, there is a feeling throughout the country that justice is not being meted out, particularly in connection with egg grading, and I think there is room for improvement, because at the present time the producers are pretty well at the mercy of the retailers with regard to the grade of their eggs. If something could be done to improve that condition I think it would be appreciated throughout the country. The ex-Minister of Agriculture also said that this is one of the most difficult problems with which we have to contend, and I quite agree with that statement. As the hon. gentleman said, the fact that they do not stay put very long with regard to quality increases the difficulty of properly grading them.

It was a pleasure to me to see the agreement to-day between the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the ex-Minister of Agriculture in connection with the grading of hogs and eggs, and I think this would be an opportune time to place this matter before the agriculture committee. I always feel that nothing is so good that it cannot be improved and perhaps, if we send these acts to the agriculture committee for further discussion, we may find that there is room for improvement here as well. If we cannot improve them, well and good, but if we can improve them I am sure it will be appreciated throughout the dominion.

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) is to be congratulated for having brought this matter to the attention of the house. I think enough has been said during the course of the debate to show that there is some misunderstanding with regard to grading and that there is a difference of opinion as to what is done and how it is done. I think it very desirable that the question should be further ventilated, and the right way to do that is to send it to the agriculture committee. I therefore beg to move:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

the question of amending the egg and hog grading acts be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF FUEL

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF FEDERAL COMMISSION OF CONTROL

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) moved:

Whereas, the federal government contributes its share in its allowances to the unemployed;

And whereas, the coal business as carried on in Canada should be altered;

Therefore, this house is of the opinion that, in the public interest the federal government should appoint a commission in order to control the importation of all fuels in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid this motion is not in order at the present time; it deals with a matter awaiting the adjudication of a court of law, and should not be brought forward in debate. I have observed by the press that the matter sought to be dealt with in this resolution is now the subject of litigation, and therefore it is not open to the house to discuss it at this time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has your ruling been given, sir, or may we speak to the point?

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall be glad to hear any remarks on the question of order. In my opinion the motion is not in order and is not open for discussion, but if any hon. member wishes to address the Chair I shall be glad to hear what he has to say.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution could be discussed without reference to what Your Honour has in mind with regard to a certain case which is actually before a court of law. That matter is absolutely independent from these proceedings; there are other companies importing coal apart from those the activities of which have been reviewed by the courts. I quite realize that if anything is said by the hon. member for St. Mary with reference to what is actually before the court he would be liable to be called to order, but until he does say something of the kind I do not see that he is out of order in bringing this matter before parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: The article reads as follows:

Appeals of five coal companies from convictions and fines totalling $30,000 on charges of forming a combine will be heard at the next sitting of the court of appeals. Postponement was granted at the request of defence counsel when the cases were called to-day.

The companies are the two Canadian import companies, two F. P. Weaver companies and the British Coal Corporation. They were charged with forming a combine in restraint of trade against the interests of the public.

The resolution reads:

Whereas, the federal government contributes its share in its allowances to the unemployed;

And whereas, the coal business as carried on in Canada should be altered;

Therefore, this house is of the opinion that, in the public interest the federal government should appoint a commission in order to control the importation of all fuels in Canada.

Surely a discussion of that resolution would be within the rule prohibiting the discussion of matters awaiting adjudication in the courts.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I think perhaps your ruling is a little broad, Mr. Speaker. I am inclined to agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). So long as the debate contains no criticism of the matter before the courts, and does not involve a discussion of the cases being considered, I do not think it should be excluded in this House of Commons. The particular cases which you have mentioned to the house as having been noted in a newspaper dispatch do not involve the whole question of the importation of coal into Canada, but only, I believe, the importation of British coal; outside of that there could be consideration of importations from the United States, Russia and other countries. I think that so long as the discussion does not in any way involve matters actually before the courts it cannot be out of order. However, if in the course of debate such a discussion is entered upon by any hon. member I believe Your Honour should intervene and call the member who transgressed to order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On the point of order, may I say that there is a rule determining to what extent a press dispatch or clipping may be used in this House of Commons. To what extent is the house seized of the fact that the matter is sub judice when we have, for the moment, no other knowledge than that which is contained in a press notice? I make this submission for Your Honour's consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: It is common knowledge.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am entirely in the hands of the house. If it is the desire of hon, members to proceed with the resolution, I am content.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Your Honour was entirely right in pointing out the difficulties before allowing the discussion to proceed.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to specially draw the attention of the house to certain trade abuses of too long standing and the victims of which have been not only the unemployed but the whole population of Canada.

Owing to the length and rigour of the winter from which we have just emerged, Providence seems to impose upon the government the task of investigating all unhuman coalition or conspiration practised in the fuel trade of Canada, in the milk and bread trade as well, and to so legislate that trusts, with hearts of stone, be forced to respect, first, our laws and be prevented from accumulating fortunes over the distress of the people.

Anthracite coal does not exist in the two old provinces of confederation, and is practically nil in the other provinces. The United States, England and Scotland, at present, supply Canada, in this respect, through the medium of Canadian companies. On October 13, 1932, the hon. senator from the division of Rougemont drew the attention of the senate to the fact that rumours had spread that certain coal companies had combined so as to maintain high prices for coal, namely up to $17 per ton, in Montreal, when, in the past, the same coal could be purchased for $7 per ton. He requested that the question be brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) for immediate consideration. On the promise of the hon. leader of the senate that this would be done, the upper house proceeded to another subject.

On October 21, 1932, the hon. senator for the division of Rougemont, having been informed, from a reliable source, that British anthracite coal cost the companies which imported it, $5.30 per ton, on the wharves, at Montreal, introduced in the senate a resolution adopted by the Labour Board of Ottawa, requesting the government to hold an investigation on the prices of coal in Canada, and enforcing, if necessary the act dealing with coalitions. Then, always through the intermediary of the leader of the senate, it was suggested that the senate should proceed with this question in conjunction with the Federal Fuel Commission.

On November 9, 1932, the hon. senator for the division of Rougemont again presses his point and introduces a resolution from the secretary of the Central Board of the Municipal Associations of Ottawa, requesting that the government hold a public investigation, and not an inquiry in camera, as was being done.

To force the government to hold a public investigation over the operations of these various importing companies, the act requires that the request be signed by six persons who render themselves responsible for serious and heavy liabilities, especially, to-day when we are aware of the numerous subtleties of the act invoked in a recent investigation ordered by the province of Quebec and which ended by a fine, rightly deserved, imposed on some of these companies. I do not intend to carry on, in the house, the trial of the coal importing companies whose case is pending—an appeal having been lodged—and who may appeal even to the privy council and obtain, in four or five years, a judgment corresponding to the one in connection with the Labrador coast. I have not the right.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Then why bring up the subject.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Well, it is my privilege to state that the fine and accumulated costs will be entirely compensated, if we permit any of these companies to further shamefully prey on the unemployed and the public at large.

I refer to no one in particular in my resolution, however, I wish to discuss the question of coal imports, as a whole, such as practised in this country, so as to hinder any fleecing of the people by certain groups who wish to organize in such a way in order to transgress the law and prey shamefully, next winter and in future years, on the public at large. That is the outline of my theme.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You are aware that an appeal has been lodged. Then, why bring up the subject?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): I would beg of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé to observe the rules of the house. If he wishes to discuss the subject matter he will be given full opportunity. What I request of him is to act like a gentleman towards me as I intend to act towards him.

Undoubtedly the question which I have brought up is of wide interest, since it affects the federal treasury, which contributes one-third in the cost of the fuel distributed to the unemployed. It has been established that the public was shamefully fleeced. In this connection, I do not wish to refer to the companies whose case is pending; others are not yet so, but will probably be later on. And we cannot help—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Did you discuss this subject, under the previous regime?

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): I beg of you, Mr. Speaker, to see that the rules of the house are observed. Otherwise, I shall have the painful duty to request the Sergeant at Arms to fetch a very small bench for the hon. member, if he continues to carry on like a school boy.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): He will be put out.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): We shall go out together.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Under the circumstances, seeing that the government contributes to the relief of unemployment, I think it is their duty to-day as it was last year—instead of sending us from Caiaphas to Pilate and refusing to hold an investigation when all the consumers of Ottawa, day after day, requested them to do so—to proceed as they thought proper to do in the Beauharnois corporation affair. On the request of a humble member, protected by his parliamentary immunity, the government, one will recall, thought themselves bound to take action publicly and at the country's expense.

It was directed against certain hon. members of the Senate, which was a more serious affair, while in this case it only affects certain importing companies of American, Russian and Scotch coal. I think, sir, that this question should be looked into, because it is a more serious one than that which prompted the inquiry over the charges of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner). This inquiry was directed against only a few wealthy individuals, in a very limited district, who were taking some risks in this enterprise; while these companies speculate on the distress of the people and especially at a time when no one is working, no one has money to purchase coal during an exceptional hard and long season. At the time of the Beauharnois inquiry, people were doing well and those who speculated could afford doing so.

The hesitation of the government since these coalitions have organized, seem to denote that, at times, friendship takes precedence over duty so as to allow these companies, in the grip of a Siberian cold, 40° below zero, not only to maintain the high prices of coal, but to even raise them. And this while sister companies are fined by the courts for having obliged unemployed, receiving the dole, to pay the coal as much as $20 per ton. If one takes into account the humidity absorbed by coal heaped on the wharves, exposed to the weather since the summer, these poor people are made to pay as much as $20 per ton for coal worth $5 per ton, this is most unreasonable. I think the government should intervene as soon as possible, setting aside all party lines and having no other goal than the welfare of the people.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): I think that you yourself wish to make political capital out of this.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): The present price of coal is most ruthless. It is a known fact that these companies can purchase this product at $5 per ton, owing to lower wages, cheaper transport and handling during this crisis. These trusts take advantage of this to squeeze their victims, forcing, at times, heads of family—I saw many in the course of this winter—receiving, at times insufficient relief, to ration off the bread of their children so as to prevent them from freezing to death.

This situation would never have existed had the government performed their duty at the right time. They hesitate, at present, to expose the impudence of this trust which endeavours to carry on by unending court procedure, compensated, during that time, by the enormous profits they realize. At all events, I request, by my resolution, the control over coal trade and all coal imports. Let the importer, in the future, be forced to come before a commission, having the authority to fix the price of fuel. If the government have not the courage to assume the responsibility, which is theirs, in this respect, the people will soon have an opportunity to choose representatives capable of enforcing the laws of this country and to protect it against those whose conscience seem to entirely forget the human side.

Urgency is as much required, in the sense of this resolution, during this world wide depression, as it was during the Great War. The situation is as serious now as it was at that period, when all were working and receiving high wages; to-day, the problem interests people who have been without work for the last year or two, and who are completely destitute. It is urgent that the price of coal be fixed by the government as they did, in war time, for butter, which sold at 29 cents per pound with a tendency to rise, and which they fixed at 22 cents, the same as they did with the price of cheese.

The public does not expect the appointment of a commission like that of 1919, whose main prerogative was to hold inquiries which furnished profiteers new means of monopolizing and further squeezing the people, but they expect to see a commission authorized to control the purchase of fuel imported and fix the sale price so as to allow dealers a fair profit only.

This question of fuel imports raises the question of the embargo on Russian coal and oils. It is admitted by analysts that the Russian coal is richer in calories than the Scotch, English or American coal. I fail to see why the government maintains an embargo on Russian coal which, according to my information, could be retailed at $6 per ton on the wharves at Montreal. The same applies to the Russian gasoline which could be retailed at 12 or 13 cents per gallon. Why does the government, in these times of depression, maintain this embargo, when Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany and our neighbours, the United States have restored trade relations with the soviet republic; when our liabilities impose on us such urgent economy to triumph over unemployment almost nation-wide; when we know, by the history of all countries, that in order to bring on revolutions, to spread socialist, communist and bolshevist principles, there are no surer means than to permit profiteers to spread distress among the people through their abuse of power or the tolerance of their extortions; when we, with a small population of hardly 10,000,000 souls, know through experience that our attitude can in no way influence the antisocial principles of Russia; when Great Britain and all European nations, as well as the United States by their entirely opposite attitude condemn our conduct?

The mother country, queen of the sister nations of the British Empire, which fixes the world prices of all products, after having considered the trade offers of precisely those against whom we maintain an embargo, applies it to our products so far as the economic conference agreements permit it. Is it not plausible to think that we expose ourselves to be the tools of either the British or American trade, when, through experience we have found out that they are certainly neither the one nor the other more scrupulous than our Canadian coal importing companies; when we know that after Canada placed the products of Germany on the black list, so that our consumers and merchants would not encourage her trade, Great Britain managed to send us boots and shoes manufactured in Germany, after having wiped out the country of origin's trade mark on the boxes and replaced it by one of English origin?

Are we not permitted to think that the United States and Great Britain, being able to obtain a superior quality of coal to theirs, at $3 per ton, and gasoline, also of a superior quality, at 2½ cents per gallon, which can be mixed to their products, without possibility of being detected, and shipped to a market like Canada, where they will be paid for their coal $17 per ton, and for their gasoline 29 cents per gallon, are we not permitted to think that they will not even take the trouble to mix their products before shipping them to us? They may, themselves, utilize all these imported products, seeing that they are of a superior quality, and ship their own, just as we note in Canada certain provinces purchasing electric current at advantageous prices, for their own requirement and sell their electric current to the United States at enhanced prices.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Tell us something about the electric current trust.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): The purpose of my resolution is to prevent speculation on the people's distress and to prevent other nations from considering us as a nation so greatly deprived of intellect that we cannot assume any other part than the one of being unceasingly duped.

I think, sir, seeing that the Canadian people are struggling with depression and witnessing its spirit, each day, weakening, that energetic measures are necessary to solve the problem of unemployment.

Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. This resolution may seem to a few—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Out of order.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): —somewhat radical. However, under the extraordinary situation we have to face, I think it is only just that coal and gasoline importers should be, in the future, forced to address themselves to the federal commission for their purchases; that transportation should be under control, as well as assurances and the handling of goods in this connection, and that the price of fuel should be fixed so as to allow dealers a profit of 12 per cent net. I shall add: if we wish to restore our upset equilibrium, which all admit, there are no other means than to establish a better distribution of profits in trade.

The Canadian people can no longer put up with the gnawing of these seasonal profiteers who, like birds of prey, watch for their victims. No matter what may be their social standing, the organizers of such coalitions practised on such a large scale, under so sad circumstances, during a crisis which has lasted so long and through such a hard winter, cannot expect less than being placed under the control of government authority. And it would be only fair.

Our duty to our country takes precedence over friendship as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) stated recently; we are the people's servants, the guardians of our fellow-citizens' welfare. Therefore, I am led to believe that it will be an easy task for the members of the house to set aside all party lines and to consider this resolution from a human and legal angle.

It is no more a question of playing the part of Pontius Pilate! No one in this house will deny that these coal companies, brushing aside all human feelings, have organized a shameful coalition, and this, in spite of our laws. It is our duty to immediately organize the full trade, in order to forestall the sad plight which we witnessed last winter.

May I, sir, in closing my remarks translate freely the words of one of the intimate friends of my colleagues opposite, on an occasion almost similar to this one: Gentlemen of the House of Commons, you should be most scrupulous not to offend our fellow-citizens, those —namely the nation—you must consider yourselves the servants; I beg of you not to violate the fundamental and traditional rights of the people in respect to their legislators. The country is passing through a difficult period, times are very hard (I should think so, 40° below zero and coal at $20 per ton, when practically no one has work!) Few are the Canadian homes which have not to struggle with economic difficulties. All wonder whether this present regime will be able to carry on. Even, at the present hour, while we are discussing, the question of our democratic institutions is raised, some contend that they will not survive the upheaval. Public opinion is no doubt more restless than at any time that members can recall, even supposing that you were to legislate as in normal times, can you proclaim to the country and the world at large that the dealings of these coalized companies, which we are especially discussing, to-day, have not transgressed the law and outraged human feelings? Are you going to approve of such dealings? If you do not control them what will the people think of the House of Commons? Moreover, what will they think of our institutions whatever they may be?

I still quote the hon. friend of my colleagues opposite. Should your decision lessen the confidence in parliamentary institution, should it hinder this confidence, the responsibility will fall on each member of the house and the responsibility will be a sad and lasting one.

We have no right, sir, to provoke the people by these kind of coalitions which, I think, are not the only ones operating in this country. It is time—if it is not too late—for the government to act energetically, at the risk of losing some friends, if we do not wish to see those of the underworld replace those who have the care of maintaining order. That is why I have introduced my resolution and I trust that it will receive due consideration by the house.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to second this resolution. It fell to the lot of an hon. member sitting on the opposition benches to courageously point out to the house and the country that we are, at present, at the mercy of a fuel trust.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Of what?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Fuel.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What trust?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I would request the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) to quietly proceed signing the letters he addresses to his constituents whom he is powerless to help.

I was stating that it fell to the lot of an hon. member of the opposition to point out to the country at large that we are at the mercy of a fuel trust, and I shall state it is not the only trust operating in this country. Throughout the entire world trusts are being organized to exploit the consumer. If to-day we are undergoing one of the most severe crises which the country has ever experienced, it is because we are at the mercy of financial trusts and that this government has absolutely done nothing in the last three years to remedy the situation.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What about the coal investigation?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It is thanks to a representative of the Liberal party in the Senate, if an investigation was held, and not to this government.

Mr. HACKETT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is discussing the coal inquiry which it was pointed out by the Speaker when the resolution was presented could not be touched upon because the matter was sub judice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has a good excuse, because the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) asked him to talk about the coal inquiry.

Mr. GAGNON: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree that he should not discuss it.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) contends that the debate is in order as it is now being carried on?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) has not entered into a discussion of the coal investigation. He simply mentioned it and then carefully kept away from it.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I was explaining how it happened that an inquiry on coal was held. It was because there are, among the Liberal membership, men who understood their duty, but especially who understood—

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker, again I rise to a point of order. I take exception to any discussion of the coal inquiry which at present is before the courts. The hon. gentleman is proceeding to explain by whom it was initiated and by whom it was carried to a conclusion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, in justice to the hon. member who is addressing the house, I must say that he has not referred at all to the trials. He simply referred to the inquiry instituted in the Senate, not at all to the case before the courts of Quebec. However, I would join with my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) in asking the hon. member for St. Denis to try to avoid even a reference to that inquiry.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I understand, Sir, that I may continue, being quite in order.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Not in order, but in the state of matrimony.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I realize that hon. members opposite dislike that we should refer to this subject; however, when any step is taken in the interest of the people, it is always due to the Liberal party.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Why not?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Those who realize our situation, also realize that it is due to a few profiteers who met behind closed doors in order to speculate on the honesty and money—

Mr. DORION (Translation): Money is made to speculate.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —of the consumer and also on fuel, such as it exists today. It is unquestionable that the Canadian people have been fleeced and will continue to be so, as long as this government remains in power.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): The fuel is becoming red hot.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): This government succeeded—

Mr. DORION (Translation): To defeat your party.

Mr. DENIS (Translation):—to hoist itself in office by means of alluring but false promises, and you have to admit that it has been unable to carry them out. It now requests the people to be very patient and trust in better days. I congratulate the Canadian people for their fortitude in putting up with a government so neglectful of the interests of the people. It contented itself with throwing a few millions—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Into the provincial treasury.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —to the people, to relieve unemployment.

In my opinion, the primary cause of the crisis from which we are suffering is the spread existing between the cost of production and distribution. It is high time that the government should carry out its pledges and assume the responsibility of checking these public impostors who take advantage of this spread between the cost of production and distribution. Coal is not the only trade in which that happens—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Electric current.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) is perfectly right, when he says electric current also.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Present him with an electric iron.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It happens in the milk, bread and even in the manufactured jam trade—

Mr. DORION (Translation): In patent medicines.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): In jam.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —even in jam, construction material, etc. I could enumerate many other trusts where this happens, and which are to blame for the existence of this crisis which will continue as long as we lack an energetic government, which lives up to its obligations towards the people. My friends opposite smile.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): We find it sad.

Mr. DORION (Translation): We not only smile, but laugh.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Let them laugh because when the people present themselves at the polls and when their seat in the house is in jeopardy, they will not find it so funny.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): It is a real cyclone which is approaching.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): And, were I to be personal—

Mr. DORION (Translation): Do not cause us any sorrow.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —I might point to some that are opposite to me, who will be the first to be left at home at the next election.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): For all the enjoyment we derive from listening to your utterances in the house, we might as well be at home.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I hear the voice of the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Lafleche), probably, he will be the first to disappear.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I would rather disappear at once, than further listen to you.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): You were very uneasy, the other day, while listening to your friend the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil)—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I was not in the house.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —when he insulted what we hold very dear in the province of Quebec: the University of Montreal. I trust that you will be as patient as you were when listening to him, for I do not cast any aspersion on our national institutions.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Which ones.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I request the government to seriously consider this resolution and act immediately so as to find rational means to control these trusts and all profiteers. In acting thus, it will render a great service to the community.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the debate on this resolution closes I should like to make a few observations. I have had great difficulty in following the remarks of the hon. members who have spoken, but without transgressing that very sound rule with regard to the discussion of matters which are sub judice, I think it desirable that the position of the government should be made clear.

I gathered from the remarks of the hon. members that they have unconsciously placed the blame, if one wants to call it that, on the government for such action as was or was not taken with respect to the institution of a coal investigation under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act. I should like to make a few observations with respect to the procedure followed, and I think I shall be able to convince hon. members that the government adopted the course which was contemplated by the statute.

Under the act, any six British subjects resident in Canada may sign an application, accompanied by a statutory declaration, that in their opinion a combine as interpreted by the act exists. This application comes before the registrar appointed under the act and it is incumbent upon him to take such steps as he deems necessary to investigate the position set out in the application. It will be noted that the six persons who sign this application do not need to set out the reasons for their belief; any six persons can start the law in motion. The act has a further provision in section 12, which reads:

> Whenever such application shall be made to the registrar, or whenever the registrar shall have reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, or whenever so directed by the minister, the registrar shall cause an inquiry to be made into all such matters—

And so forth. Now, with respect to the coal inquiry, the matter was discussed in another place and certain statements were made which were brought to my attention as Minister of Labour charged with the responsibility of administering the Combines Investigation Act. Those charges were made by men of prominence, and without any delay, without awaiting the signatures of six persons, I directed that the inquiry take place; and it took place just as rapidly as an inquiry could be carried on.

When the investigation was over and the registrar's report, as contemplated by the statute, was handed to me, two courses were open. I might in my discretion do nothing; or I might send the report of the registrar to the attorney general of the province concerned in order that he might review it, because the provinces are charged not only with the responsibility of administering the criminal laws but with the responsibility of taking proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act if, after they have reviewed the registrar's report, they come to the conclusion that there has been an invasion of the provisions of the statute.

Every bit of evidence including the report was transmitted by me to the province of Quebec as the statute contemplates. I have heard it said, in fact I believe the premier of Quebec is reported to have said, that he has done his duty when Ottawa failed to do it. This government, with meticulous care, right from the beginning instituted the inquiry and followed it up with the transmission of the evidence to the proper authorities in the province of Quebec. They in their judgment, after reviewing the situation, did their duty—yes. They carried on certain proceedings to which I will not make reference because the cases are in the courts to-day.

Then the act further provides that if after the transmission of a report to a province it seems to the law officers of that province, who are charged with the responsibility under the British North America Act of enforcing these laws, that there has been no invasion of the act, and three months elapse and nothing is done, then the federal authorities may still step in and cause an information to be laid, based upon the registrar's report. The province of Quebec, doing what they regarded as their plain duty, based upon the registrar's report and the advice of their law officers, laid certain information against some companies, and those proceedings are now before the courts, and I will go no further in speaking concerning the position of those cases because that is, I think, an invasion of the rules of this chamber. But let me make it clear—and I do not think any member of this house wants to misinterpret my actions or the actions of the government—that right from the beginning of this investigation the federal authority took steps with patient regularity, just as rapidly as they could be taken, to see that the terms of the Combines Investigation Act were carried out.

With respect to the resolution itself, I must again acknowledge that I was unable to follow the speakers who have preceded me owing to my lack of knowledge of the French language. However, I hope, if I am here another session, that I shall be able to overcome that difficulty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are doing very well.

Mr. GORDON: One part of the address made by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) had reference I believe to the admission by Canada of Russian coal. It is true that the federal government has excluded the importation of that fuel, one of the reasons being that that coal is being mined by forced and convict labour. That is not denied. Another reason is that we have developed a very large business with Great Britain, which is in competition with the anthracite fields of the United States. No one will deny that the price of anthracite coal has been very materially reduced in the last four years; whether it should be reduced further is something that I am not able to answer. But at any rate we do know that there is the keenest kind of competition in that business to-day between British and United States anthracite dealers.

I wonder whether the member for St. Mary, when he advocates the admission of Russian coal and condemns the government for the action they took, would also condemn the government for banning the admission of Russian pulpwood, concerning which the province of Quebec and the operators there have definite views. The reason Russian pulpwood was excluded was this. It is well known, it is admitted, that particularly in the northern sections of Russia the lumbering operations are carried on by convict and forced labour. I wonder if the government are to be commended or condemned because they banned the importation of Russian pulpwood and pulp and products of that character when we knew and the industry knew and the bush operator knew and the workmen knew that any price at which Canadian pulp might be sold would be undercut by the Russian pulpwood operators, who were carrying on their business by forced and convict labour.

The present administration has seen fit to subsidize or enlarge the subsidies with respect to Canadian coal. Some have criticized us for so doing; it may be that the government is open to some criticism, but I think I can safely say that if this administration had not given assistance to the coal industry, particularly of Nova Scotia, there probably would be no coal produced in that province to-day.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: And we thank you for it.

Mr. GORDON: The amount of coal moved under the subventions from the province of Nova Scotia into central Canada now amounts to almost one and a half million tons. Assistance was also given to western Canada in connection with the movement of coal into the industrial areas of Quebec and Ontario. It is true that there is shown a great shrinkage the world over in the consumption of coal, but examination of the figures will show that the shrinkage in Canada is at least no worse than it is in other coal producing countries. There are some who say that this industry should not be subsidized, and arguments may be advanced in favour of that opinion. My own view is that the coal industry in Canada, built up as it was over a long period of years; towns, villages and communities having been established about the operating coal mines, and the industry being national in character, any government is justified in lending reasonable assistance to that industry in order that it may be kept going and that the wage earners engaged therein shall not be disturbed and probably have to seek employment elsewhere. I think that particularly at a time like this, no better form of relief could possibly be granted than the assistance that the government has given to the coal mining industry of this country.

Now, sir, I do not know that it would be helpful to say more at this time; perhaps an opportunity will arise later when the estimates are before the house to go more carefully into the matter of the production of coal, the assistance that has been given, and all the interrelated matters having to do with that most complex industry. At the moment I shall only say that we have our Combines Investigation Act, and as long as that act is on our statute book this house will expect me to do no more and no less than see that its provisions are observed. I shall most certainly see that that is done.

Mr. J. T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) has brought in a resolution suggesting that it is in the public interest that the federal government should appoint a commission to control the importation of all fuels into Canada. That may be a topic for useful debate, but before my hon. friend reached the point of his resolution he devoted some time to criticism of the government under several headings. The first point, and the one that seemed to arouse the greatest resentment in his bosom, was that the government had not held an even and fair scale in the conduct of its business. He asked, Why should there have been a public inquiry in the Beauharnois matter and a private inquiry in the coal matter? I think that to ask the question is probably to answer it. The records of the house for the year 1931 show that on the 10th of June, 1931, by unanimous consent it was ordered:

> That Messrs. Dorion, Fiset, Gardiner, Gordon, Jacobs, Jones, Lennox, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Stewart (Lethbridge), be a committee to investigate from its inception the Beauharnois project for the development of hydro-electric energy by the use of the waters of the St. Lawrence river so far as the matters referred to are within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing words in particular to investigate the matters referred to in the speech made in the House of Commons by Mr. Robert Gardiner, the hon. member for Acadia, on the 19th day of May last, as reported on pages 1731-1740 of Hansard, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Mr. Speaker, there is the charter, given unanimously by this chamber to nine gentlemen. It is beside my point to enter into the hinterland of the Beauharnois investigation or to follow it to any of its conclusions, sinister or othewise, but I would draw to the attention of my hon. friend this fact, that the reason that investigation was parliamentary, public and all-embracing was that this house in its wisdom decreed that it should be just so.

Mr. HANSON (York): Unanimously.

Mr. HACKETT: Unanimously. If an investigation was conducted in another way, in another place, into another set of circumstances, it is simply because the statute under which that investigation was brought about required that it be carried out in the manner in which it was. Under paragraph 12 of the Combines Investigation Act the minister ordered the registrar to ascertain whether or not in his opinion sufficient grounds existed for a prosecution. Mark that well; under section 12, in the normal functioning of the statute, the minister instructed the registrar to ascertain whether or not in the registrar's opinion, after hearing all the witnesses, there was reason for a prosecution, which is a public investigation.

Does it not seem wise that anybody and everybody should not be subjected to the ignominy of a public investigation on mere suspicion or on what may be ill-founded information? This house debated the Combines Investigation Act long and carefully and decided that it would be most effective if a trusted servant of the government should be afforded the opportunity of investigating privately and deciding whether or not a public investigation, if that is what you wish to call a trial, should take place. And it is specifically enacted that this investigation shall be private. I hope I have made it clear to the hon. member who represents St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) why in the one instance the investigation was public and why in its incipient stages the other it was not. When the registrar made his report his findings were forwarded to those officers who, under our constitution, are charged with the administration of the laws of which it was said a breach had been committed and they, however reluctantly, in the fulfilment of their duty put those laws in motion.

I think it well that there should not be confusion on these issues. In these days, when there is some suffering and when there are many people out of work who are easily incited to rebel against their lot, it seems to me unfortunate that the agencies charged with the preservation of law and order should be without reason accused of partiality in the administration of their offices.

My friend from St. Mary raises another broad question which I think will bear some scrutiny. My hon. friends from St. Mary and St. Denis say these are trusts, that these are combinations. I would point out that all trusts and all combinations are not in themselves illicit, and are not in themselves baneful; it is only those which operate in restraint of trade that are harmful. This is so true that in a neighbouring country, one of the great countries of the world, they have abolished their anti-trust legislation; they have torn up their Sherman statute and today have consolidated, amalgamated and combined, if you like, for the purpose of doing away with the cost and loss incidental to competition. I am not arguing for trusts or combines; I am keeping carefully away from the question which is before the courts, but I think it well that my hon. friends from St. Denis and St. Mary should realize that they must go a step further than merely establishing that there is a combination or trust, before they can complain of the activities of such an organization. Would it surprise my hon. friends if I told them that the whole world is cartelized, that in a number of industries the world is divided, A taking this continent and B taking that continent? Are we to conclude that ill necessarily results from organization and discipline? I am not urging that greed may not characterize these activities at times, but when that has been established it is time to complain. The charge is inadequate, however, if it merely states that competition has been eliminated. We in this chamber spent weeks and even months in dealing with our railways, and what was the source of the trouble? It was the cost of competition, the unnecessary expenditure which resulted from the efforts of these contending companies to wrest business from one another, and if I understood the purpose of the legislation which was enacted last session, its chief object was to do away with the cost that is incidental to rivalry.

My hon. friend from St. Mary has gone very far indeed; he has suggested that it is the function of this government to appoint a commission to control the importation of fuels into Canada. He has not told the house exactly how far he wishes to go with his control. Does he wish to have all traffic in fuels become an exclusive prerogative of the crown? Does he wish that we should be forced to go to the commission and buy our coal at such reduced prices as we buy our beverages from the liquor commission? Does he wish that the government should have a monopoly of wood, coal, crude oil and electricity, of course, we must remember that a great many people are using electricity these days for purposes of heating—would he include all these in the activites of a vast commission or combine controlling one of the essentials of life in this northern climate? I think he has much to explain. Before he can hope that this chamber will consider his suggestion seriously he must carry his definition much farther. Before he has gone very far he would find some difficulty—and may I add that the government of my native province is as alert as any other in the vindication of its rights. If the federal government attempted to establish a monopoly in the province of Quebec on a necessity of life such as fuel, it would not be long before the provincial government would make it clear that the field was not unchallenged. I wonder whether or not my hon. friends from St. Mary and St. Denis have had the advantage of a long discussion with the ex-minister of Justice, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) as to the constitutionality of their suggestion? I should be greatly interested and none the less edified by his opinions as to the feasibility and the legal possibility of the suggestion embodied in this resolution.

it, as well as the distribution. If untoward results were not to ensue, fuel would have to be sold like beverages—for cash; and I fear if it could be sold only for cash quite as many would go cold as have gone thirsty during the last two or three years. I suggest to the hon. member, by way of digression, that he could not have read the newspapers very carefully if he is under the impression that the spread between $5 for run-of-mine and the retail price for refined coal of $14 or $15 for anthracite is net profit.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: In justice to the different provinces producing coal, would the hon. member state to which coal he is referring?

Mr. HACKETT: British coal, to which reference was made in the newspapers, and of which I think my hon. friend from St. Mary was speaking.

I will say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that until the resolution is elaborated it is without any possible significance. It can have no meaning, and is not worthy—possibly I should not put it as bluntly as that, but I think until it has been brought into the realm of practicability it should not further detain the deliberations of the house.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I regret on account of lack of knowledge of the French language it was impossible for me to follow the remarks of the hon. member who introduced the resolution. I gathered from the previous speaker's remarks that the resolution placed on the order paper and the arguments used by the sponsor in support of it are not sufficiently cogent to justify the application of the remedy he had in his mind, or to warrant its being employed as a medium to control the importation of coal into Canada.

Just before resuming his seat the last speaker pointed out what he thought were certain anomalies in the resolution, and in that connection I must wholeheartedly agree with him. My main purpose in rising at this time, however, is to inform the house that the importance of the coal industry to the province of Nova Scotia cannot be overestimated. I woud like to say also that it would be impossible for me to express in words sufficiently high praise of the present government for the various aids it has given since 1930 to the coal industry of Nova Scotia. The industry is a difficult one to operate and manage. There is such a vast spread between costs of production of coal mined in Canada and coal mined in the United States that it is impossible for the coal industry in any part of Canada to survive unless it receives some sort of governmental protection, aids or other assistance by way of bonuses and reduction in freight rates to enable it to compete with the cheaper mined coal coming in from the United States. I have not the figures before me, I shall speak in round numbers and subject to correction.

May I point first of all in a general way to the tremendous shrinkage in the importation of bituminous coal from the United States to Canada during the last four years. As I recall the figures, there has been a shrinkage of approximately 5,000,000 tons in a single year, which means that about 5,000,000 tons less bituminous coal came into Canada from the United States last year than in 1929. As has been suggested, the tonnage imported is practically cut in two. With respect to the coal sold in what is usually termed central Canada, figures which have been made available only recently by the fuel board indicate in a very forceful manner the splendid results to the industry brought about by the government aids granted during the last three years. In order to make the facts known to the house I shall put on record a few figures for the past five or six years showing the amount of Nova Scotia coal marketed in central Canada on account of the aids this government has supplied since it came into power.

In 1928, through the government aids in existence at that time, Nova Scotia marketed in central Canada 114,080 tons; in 1929, which was the last complete year of the old government that figure had increased to 304,533 tons; in 1930, to 372,056 tons; in 1931, to 401,597 tons; in 1932, to 703,691 tons; and in 1933 the amount of Nova Scotia coal marketed in central Canada jumped to 1,482,961 tons. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the figure jumped from 114,000 odd in 1928 to nearly 1,500,000 in 1933, and that increase was due exclusively to the assistance granted by the present government for the marketing and movement of Nova Scotia coal to central Canada.

The coal industry in the province of Nova Scotia has been struggling during the past number of years on account of many causes, including the general shrinkage in markets for fuel in Canada due to world conditions, and on that account it has been doubly hard for the industry to survive and compete. I agree with the assertion that were it not for the assistance granted by the present government a number of the coal mines in the province of Nova Scotia would be closed to-day. My hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. MacDougall) says that we would not have a pit working to-day, and I have no doubt that is correct. There are between twelve and fifteen thousands miners engaged in the coal industry in Nova Scotia, and about one hundred thousand people in the province directly dependent on that industry. Coal royalties in the province run to approximately $500,000 a year; last year it was a little higher. As I said at the outset, it is impossible to overestimate the importance of this industry to the province.

The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) states in his resolution that the coal business of Canada should be altered. If by altering he means changing the present regulations reducing the present government aids to the coal industry, then absolutely the province of Nova Scotia is firmly opposed to any such policy of alteration. If altering means increasing the assistance or aids which this government has so generously supplied, naturally I am not opposed to that, but I do not think we are in a position to-day to come clamouring to this government for an increase in the assistance which they have given. The results are showing just exactly what we hoped. I would not go so far as to say that they are all we require, but under the conditions that exist to-day we have no complaint in respect of the policy inaugurated by this government in assisting the coal industry of Nova Scotia.

With respect to the appointment of a commission to control the importation of fuel into Canada, possibly it might be set up with some beneficial results, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with what the hon. gentleman had in mind in that regard to elaborate on the question. I want to say, however, that in Nova Scotia we have had two royal commissions in recent years dealing exclusively with the coal industry in the province, and then we had another Duncan commission dealing generally with maritime claims and the coal industry and all other industries in the province. So we know pretty well the exact position of the coal industry, the costs of production at home and the costs in other countries. Those of us who were here previous to 1930 felt and urged that we should have additional tariff protection for the coal, and that was granted by the present government when it came into power. In 1930 there was a duty of 50 cents a ton on bituminous coal, and this government increased it to 75 cents a ton, the highest duty that ever was imposed on bituminous coal in Canada. There was no duty on anthracite coal when this government came into power, and the government imposed a duty of 40 cents a ton on anthracite. A duty of one dollar a ton was placed on the importation of coke. Bonuses were also given to coking plants which enabled a large quantity of Nova Scotia coal to be processed in a plant near Montreal, the amount so used last year amounting to nearly 150,000 tons. These, together with the reductions made in the railway rate and the other aids granted, make the contribution of this government to the coal industry of Nova Scotia of a magnitude never previously experienced in Nova Scotia with respect to any industry, and I doubt if it has been exceeded by any other government in respect to any other industry in the dominion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the people of the province of Nova Scotia appreciate what the present government has done for the coal industry and appreciate it all the more because if it had not been for that assistance some of our mines would have been closed and hundreds of our miners thrown out of employment, and we would have had many thousands more on unemployment relief throughout the province than we have to-day.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCOME TAX

Mr. HANBURY:

What is the amount of income tax in (a) Canada, (b) Australia, (c) New Zealand, (d) England, on (1) $1,000; (2) $2,000; (3) $5,000; (4) $10,000; (5) $20,000; (6) $50,000; (7) $100,000; (8) $150,000?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

(a) Canada:

Income	Single person	Married person
$ 1,000	—	—
2,000	$ 30 00	—
5,000	180 00	$ 120 00
10,000	661 50	546 00
20,000	2,394 00	2,173 50
50,000	10,363 50	10,069 50
100,000	27,846 00	27,447 00
150,000	49,318 50	48,867 00

(b) Not available.

(c) Not available.

(d) England:

Income	Single person	Married person
$ 1,000	$ 37 50	$ 6 25
2,000	165 62	106 25
5,000	765 62	703 12
10,000	1,890 62	1,828 12
20,000	5,250 00	5,187 50
50,000	19,487 50	19,425 00
100,000	47,800 00	47,737 50
150,000	78,175 00	78,112 50

Mr. COOTE:

What was the amount of incomes of individuals assessed for the purposes of the income war tax reported in the year 1931-1932 from each of the following sources: (a) wages and salaries; (b) business and partnership profits; (c) other profit; (d) rents, royalties, interest and dividends; (e) other sources?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

(a) Not available.
(b) Not available.
(c) Not available.
(d) Not available.
(e) Not available.

Statistics are not maintained in such a manner as to give information requested.

WELLAND CANAL

Mr. DUFF:

1. How many tons of freight passed through the Welland canal in the year 1933?
2. What was the cost per ton of freight handled through said canal, including interest on capital expenditure as well as maintenance and operating charges, for the said year?

Mr. MANION:

1. 9,194,130 tons.

2. Capital expenditure, March 31, 1933, $129,088,846.52; no computation of interest on capital investment; operation, fiscal year ended March 31, 1933, $349,626.32; repairs and maintenance, $389,234.18; revenues, $110,357.41.

COAL INVESTIGATION

Mr. RAYMOND:

What was the total cost of the inquiry carried on during the years 1932 and 1933 by Mr. Fred McGregor, registrar, under the Combines Investigation Act, relative to the importation and the prices of English coal?

Mr. GORDON: $40,451.30.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TIES

Mr. HOWARD:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways purchase railway ties from Joseph Gobeil and J. L. Audet of La Patrie, Compton county, or from either one of these gentlemen?
2. If so, what price did the Canadian National Railways pay these gentlemen for such ties?
3. What quantity was bought during the season of 1933-34?

Mr. MANION: The information requested is not of record with the Department of Railways and Canals, and the Canadian National Railway management take the ground that it is not in the public interest to publish information of this character.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SOREL YARDS—EMPLOYEES

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. What was the number of employees: (a) permanent (b) supernumerary, in the maritime timber yards of Sorel during each month of the year 1933?
2. What is the total amount of salaries which have been paid: (a) to the permanent employees (b) to the supernumerary employees during each month of the year 1933?

VICTORIA—VANCOUVER ISLAND SERVICE

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce a contract with the Canadian Pacific railway for a service between Victoria and the west coast of Vancouver island for the current year ending March 31, 1934?
2. Does it contain a clause requiring them to carry the mail free of charge as stated in Hansard of March 2, 1934, at page 1241 if so, how does it read?
3. During the current fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, has the Post Office Department a contract with the Canadian Pacific railway to carry mail for the same route at fifteen cents a mile if so, how much has been paid them for such service for each month in the current fiscal year to date?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

LAPOINTE PIER—VANCOUVER

Mr. NEILL:

1. Was a contract awarded on January 6, 1933, by the Vancouver harbour commissioners for extension to Lapointe pier?
2. Were tenders called for this work; if so, from whom were tenders received and what were the amounts of each tender?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This question should stand as an order for return, and I will lay on the table of the house any information I receive from the harbour commission.

DEATH OF LORD ABERDEEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with it seems to me altogether fitting that some reference should be made in this house to the fact that one who from 1893 to 1898 was governor general of this dominion has passed to the great beyond. Lord Aberdeen succeeded to his great place while still a young man; he was not the elder son of his family but, owing to the death of the elder son, he became the Earl of Aberdeen. It was an old and historic title; it was associated with Canada because he was the ninth baronet of Nova Scotia. He took his duties in life seriously and when, at the age of 46, he came to this dominion as governor general he had, by application, fitted himself for the discharge of those great duties.

That he and the Countess of Aberdeen endeared themselves to the Canadian people I think is beyond question, and when he returned home on the termination of his services in this dominion he continued to be actively engaged in the public life of his country. Twice he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for a few months in 1886 and for a period of ten years from 1905 to 1915. His great services there were rewarded by his sovereign by his being advanced a step in the peerage, to a marquisate. He always identified himself with the interests of his church and was high commissioner of the Church of Scotland on more than one occasion. He was lord lieutenant of his county, and I suppose there is no member of this house who does not recall seeing in the Illustrated London News photographic reproductions of his reception of his sovereign, as lord lieutenant of the county, at the great Highland sports held from year to year. In later years he lived a quiet life; he was an author of some repute. Perhaps the Scots were better able to appreciate the humour of some of his anecdotes than were some of us who are Canadians, but his writings were very widely read and he was very well known in America by reason of some of the anecdotes he told of his experiences both in Canada and in the United States. He was a democratic peer, with a high sense of public duty and obligation. He discharged the duties of his great position in a manner worthy of the great traditions of a name that had given a prime minister to Great Britain. If I think it fitting, as I do, that we should record our realization of the way in which he discharged his duties here, I believe, although there is no precedent, that it is but right that in this parliament, if it be in session, when those who have served the state faithfully as representative of the Sovereign pass to their reward, we should pay some tribute to them, to their services, their worth and their work as they pass from us.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will convey to the Marchioness of Aberdeen and her children the sympathy of this house in the great loss that she and they have sustained in the passing of a devoted husband, a loving father and one who, by public service, greatly endeared himself to all who believe that service to the state is one of the duties and obligations of high position. I am reminded of words that I am sure pass through the minds of many of us when we contemplate service so great to this empire extending over more than four score years. I think we realize that in such service we have some explanation of the reason why, midst the falling of thrones and institutions, those of our empire continue to exist.

> The glories of our blood and state
> Are shadows, not substantial things,
> There is no armour against fate,
> Death lays his icy hand on kings.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the opposition): I rise to associate myself and hon. members on this side of the house with the felicitous tribute which has been paid by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the memory of the late Marquis of Aberdeen and Temair, who for five years held the high office of Governor General of this dominion. I should like to express my appreciation not only of the tribute the Prime Minister has paid but of his establishing the precedent of voicing, on behalf of parliament and the country, abiding remembrance of those who, as great public servants, have come to Canada from other parts of the British Empire and made worthy contributions to the history of our land. In this, I think the House of Commons will heartily concur.

To speak of Lord Aberdeen and to recall the fact that it is some forty years or more since he came to Canada as the representative of the crown, causes one to recognize that one is referring to a previous era in British history, the era of Queen Victoria and of Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, an age which occupies a unique place in history. The lives of Lord and Lady Aberdeen were closely associated with those of the Gladstones, and the traditions of that time come naturally before our minds.

I suppose the most appropriate reference at the moment is to remind the house, as the Prime Minister has done, of what was said in our parliament of the late Lord Aberdeen on his return to England, after having spent his five years here. An address was moved in this house by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister of the day, in which Sir Wilfrid, on behalf of the House of Commons, expressed the warm appreciation felt by the people of Canada of the public services of both Lord and Lady Aberdeen, of the very acceptable manner in which in the performance of the different functions pertaining to royalty they had discharged their duties as representatives of the Queen, of the great service they had rendered to art, science and letters during their stay in Canada, and, above all, of their democratic sympathies and close identification with those causes which have to do with human welfare and social well being. Nothing could have reflected better the success of Lord Aberdeen's administration in Canada than his reappointment to the vice-royalty of Ireland in subsequent years.

To many of us in Canada the death of Lord Aberdeen will mean not only the passing of a great public servant, one who has been true to the highest traditions of devoted and disinterested service to the state, and to the church to which he belonged, but the loss of a very dear personal friend. Lord Aberdeen possessed to a marked degree those qualities of generous sympathy, kindly interest and loyalty which win for their possessors many intimate friendships. He never lost touch or association with Canada and its people, but maintained both by the welcome he gave Canadians visiting the old land, and by return visits to Canada of Lady Aberdeen and himself.

Recalling the nature of the life-long services of Lord and Lady Aberdeen to great causes, recalling how closely for nearly sixty years they were united in purpose and in the happiness of their domestic life, and recalling, above all, their devotion and their fidelity to the faith of their fathers, I desire to join in all sincerity in the sympathy extended by the Prime Minister on behalf of parliament to Lady Aberdeen, who has been so greatly bereaved, and to the members of her family.

Like the Prime minister, I would conclude in reference to Lord Aberdeen and his many years of public service with what seems to me to be an appropriate quotation. Recalling his ever sunny nature in the face of vicissitudes and anxieties of which throughout life Lord Aberdeen had his full share, it might truly be said of him, slightly transposing Wordsworth's familiar lines:

> His high endeavours were an inward light
> That made the path before him always bright.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps not unfitting that the tribute from this corner of the house should come from one who has lived in two countries in which Lord Aberdeen so well displayed his undoubted talents. It is within my memory as a young man that Lord Aberdeen held sway as Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. I remember very well indeed the kindliness with which the Irish people always regarded him, and I feel certain that I am but expressing the views of hon. members seated about me when I add my word of tribute to the memory of this man.

POOL TRAINS

MONTREAL-QUEBEC, MONTREAL-TORONTO, AND TORONTO-OTTAWA PASSENGER SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) made some inquiries regarding the pooling of trains between Montreal and Quebec. I promised at that time that I would get whatever information I could. I telegraphed an inquiry to Mr. C. P. Fullerton, chairman of the board of trustees. His reply points out that the passenger train pooling arranged for in the Montreal-Toronto, Ottawa-Toronto and Montreal-Quebec services, as extended effective March 11, will produce a total saving of approximately 1,000,000 train miles per annum, divided approximately evenly between the two companies, and, on the basis of a conservative estimate, will represent a saving to each company of approximately $500,000 per annum.

The total number of engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen affected by the reduction of passenger train mileage is ninety-six. This is also divided approximately equally between the two companies. A number of employees of other classes that incidentally will be affected cannot be definitely determined until services are actually in effect, but these will likewise be divided approximately equally between the two companies. In practically all cases employees displaced by pooling arrangement will retain employment by exercising seniority rights to other positions, resulting in junior employees being returned to freight service. With the improvement in traffic, Mr. Fullerton states that the management is convinced that after the extension of pooling, as arranged for, is in effect, there will be more men in actual employment than at the time the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, became effective, and that with continued improvement in traffic, there will not be any increased unemployment but rather the contrary. Arrangements as made for the pooling of passenger train services were adopted only after careful consideration of all the conditions involved, so as to effect economies by avoiding duplication of train services and still maintain, with as little disturbance as possible, adequate service to the public.

In regard to the statement as to displacement of all Canadian National service between Montreal and Quebec, the Canadian National Railway operates, and will continue to operate, between Montreal and Levis, the Ocean Limited and Maritime Express, two trains in each direction daily, and has arranged to provide another train between Charny and the Palais station at Quebec connecting with the Maritime Express to and from Montreal.

Mr. Fullerton points out in this telegram that he has conferred with the Canadian Pacific, and that this statement which I have just read is a joint statement of the two companies.

May I add that I am advised that 80 per cent of all passenger traffic between Montreal and Quebec has always been carried by the Canadian Pacific railway, as it is an older line and passes through more of the settled communities on the north shore.

May I add as well that in the pooling of passenger trains, the economies and the profits, if any, are split equally between the two railway companies. In this regard it may be well to point out that according to an official statement, which I hold in my hand, the increase in gross revenue, for the first two months of this year, as compared with 1933, for the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways together, has been $6,700,000, of which $3,900,000 increase has gone to the Canadian National Railways, and $2,800,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I mention this in reply to suggestions, which are sometimes made, that in agreements between the two companies the Canadian National Railways is getting an unfair deal.

These figures of earnings show that apparently the management of the Canadian National Railways is looking after the interests of the Canadian National quite capably, and I have no doubt that the arrangements made between the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railway officials are made on a fair and equitable basis to both companies.

In regard to the inquiry of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), as to train service between Ottawa and Toronto, I have made inquiries and am informed that while some changes have been made in the time of departure and in the connections, there has been absolutely no change made in the service between the two cities except it is claimed to better it somewhat.

Mr. JACOBS: Did Judge Fullerton say how much would be saved if we all walked?

Mr. MANION: He does not want us to walk.

[Mr. Manion.]

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, I am precluded by the rules of the house from making any comment upon what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has just stated on behalf of the management of the Canadian National Railways, but I should like to ask him how no unemployment will result from this pooling when three trains of the Canadian National Railways in each direction are eliminated from the service between Montreal and Quebec and use is being made instead of the Canadian Pacific trains. The employees seem to believe that the engines will not be repaired in the Quebec shops but that everything will go to the Montreal shops of the Canadian Pacific, and that as a result many men will be deprived of work.

Mr. MANION: The answer of the management to that, as I read it in the telegram, is that the increased traffic which is taking place, and which was shown by the figures I gave in my own remarks, will take up the unemployment which would naturally be caused by the pooling arrangement. There is no doubt that unemployment would be caused by that arrangement, but the traffic, particularly freight traffic, is increasing to such an extent that the men who are displaced from the passenger trains will take the place of certain men who were on freight trains. In other words, their claim is that the increased freight traffic will pick up the slack. I am giving that explanation as Mr. Fullerton gives it to me.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if he has any information to give in answer to the plea that was made by His Honour the Mayor of Montreal for cooperation in the matter of the train service between Ottawa and Montreal. The two trains are running pretty nearly at the same hour, the Canadian Pacific at 3.30 and the Canadian National at 4.20. If there was cooperation one train might be dispatched at 6.15.

Mr. MANION: I did look into the matter a few days ago when either my hon. friend or someone else asked me to do so, and I was informed that the two railways have no reason to doubt that the best times for the trains to run are at the present hours. After all, they are handling the trains, and I cannot instruct them to change the hours. They claim that the only people who wish to travel on trains at other hours are people who travel on passes.

Mr. DUPUIS: An exchange of services.

FARMERS' STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) asked a question about a reported strike among farmers delivering grain at a place called Myrnam, in Alberta. The question is to be found at page 1207 of Hansard. I have an answer from the chairman of the board of grain commissioners which I shall read:

A dispute arose at Myrnam between the farmers of that neighbourhood and the local grain buyers, chiefly over the question of the grading of wheat locally. The farmers organized and on the 4th December declared that they would deliver no more wheat to the Myrnam elevators, of which there are five, until such time as their demands were met. Their demands chiefly centred around the question of buying tough grain, and subsequently narrowed down to a demand that the buyers in the local elevators be removed.

The matters in dispute were not matters over which the board had jurisdiction, i.e. the sale and grading of grain locally and the personnel of the buyers in the elevators. The board, however, took various steps in connection with it. Our assistant commissioner immediately called a meeting of the farmers of the place, and the chief inspector from Edmonton was sent there for a week in an endeavour to establish a correct basis for grading. Commissioner Hamilton subsequently went to Myrnam and met the strike committee and attended a very large meeting of the neighbouring farmers.

As a result of these meetings the board, feeling that there was a certain amount of responsibility on the trade for the manner in which their representatives there had permitted the situation to develop, called a meeting of the companies interested and managed to induce them to change their buyers. There has not yet been time to see whether the strike farmers have accepted this and that business is now being conducted as usual.

ALBERTA COAL INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if there will be an investigation into an industry in which there have been serious reductions in wages, very low standards of living, extremely intermittent work, and certain charges now put forward that there is discrimination against union men who are active, namely, the coal industry in the province of Alberta?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If my hon. friend will send me particulars the matter will be given consideration.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the bureau for translations.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the discussion which has taken place on the second reading of this bill clearly discloses that there are members who voted for the six months' hoist who nevertheless recognize that the existing translation system, or lack of system, requires very considerable reform. The existing system has developed without supervision or control in the most haphazard way, and in many respects it functions inefficiently and fails to achieve satisfactory results.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) fully recognizes the difficulties of the problem, which he suggests might be solved by a resolution of this house. The government are advised that an act of parliament will best serve to solve the problem.

The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) was forced to invent the plea that on account of my physical stature I might force the blue book translators of this house, over whom I have no direction or control, to do such translation work as I might deem necessary, and if I understood his suggestion aright—he speaks French with a clear enunciation and I think I was able to follow him—he even suggested that I might go into another department than my own and possibly seize one of its translators by the ear and force him to undertake the translation of important official documents which require immediate attention. My hon. friend is very facetious at times but he must recognize that the government of this country cannot be efficiently administered on those lines. Year after year the members of this house and the Senate have complained of the inefficiency of the present service. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) has quoted a few of those complaints, going back to the years 1902, 1906, 1907 and 1910. If members of the house desire to note the complaints which have been made in another place they may look at the Senate debates for May 26, 1926, and April 13, 1927. I might add to that oral complaints which I have received that the translation of the Hansard of that other place for September 1932 has only within the last few weeks been presented to the department of public printing for the printing of the French text.

In 1909, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a committee of this house considering the matter requested that an inquiry be made into the translation service, and Mr. Achille Frechette was sent abroad to Switzerland and Belgium to make an examination of the translation systems which prevailed in those countries. Mr. Frechette was formerly chief of the translation branch of the House of Commons. He made his report in September, 1910, twenty-four years ago, setting forth the results of his official inquiry regarding the translation of debates, sessional papers and laws of parliament of Belgium and Switzerland, where the dual language system prevails. To that report several members of this house have made reference during this discussion, though they do not appear to have read it with sufficient care to have understood its real import.

In Belgium Mr. Frechette then found that a stenographic report of the debates of their parliament is published in extenso under the name of Annales Parlementaires but only in the language in which the respective addresses are made, and in certain cases a synoptic report or resumé of the addresses is prepared for publication. The translator prepares the resumé only for distribution to the daily press, and he is the only translator belonging to the House of Representatives in that country. In Switzerland stenographic reports are made only of debates concerning federal laws and federal decrees which correspond to our orders in council. These speeches are published at the close of each session in the language in which they are made respectively in the bulletin stenographique, which comprises about 600 pages. As to the rest of the translating, at the close of each speech in parliament the translator sums up the conclusions of the speaker in German if the speech is made in French and in French if the speech is made in German. This is the only translator belonging to the house.

In Belgium there are fourteen other translators distributed among several departments for special work in those departments. The system which prevails in these two countries is so different from ours that Mr. Fréchette's report provided very meagre assistance in solving our problem. Our translation work is at least ten times that of either Belgium or Switzerland. As I understand it, the purport of the conclusion of Mr. Fréchette's report is that most of the work devolving upon the translators' branch of the House of Commons should be removed from that branch on the ground that the number employed constituted an abuse which should be remedied—the term used by Mr. Fréchette is "abuse"—but that the translation of the votes and proceedings might well be retained for the House of Commons branch. Mr. Fréchette's report was not acted upon and the centralization of which he then complained in the House of Commons branch still continues. In my humble opinion this requires redress and reform, at least to the extent of which Mr. Fréchette complained. I think the conclusions of the Fréchette report may well be considered by the select special committee to which I trust this bill will be referred. The centralization of the work of translating departmental and other reports, which was then centralized in the appointees of the House of Commons, still continues and the abuses of which Mr. Fréchette complained have never yet been remedied. It was the intention of the government to submit a remedy in this bill now before the house for its second reading.

Reference has been made in this debate to the report of a select committee on the civil service which was appointed by the Senate in 1924. That special committee was set up on the motion of the leader of the Liberal government in the Senate, Senator Dandurand, and consisted of the Honourable Senators Béique, who acted as chairman, Belcourt, Bennett, Black, Bradbury, Calder, Dandurand, Sir George Foster, Hardy, L'Esperance, McCoig, Pardee, Robertson, Ross (Moose Jaw), Ross (Middleton), Turgeon, Watson and White. The appointment of the committee was authorized by a resolution which appears on page 12 of the journals of the Senate for 1924. At page 149 appears the circular letter addressed by Senator Béique on behalf of the committee to the various deputy ministers. Reference to translating is made on page 151, while the final report appears at page 494, et seq of the journals. In the report, as separately printed, the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission appears in appendix 2, page 21. I direct the attention of hon. members who are interested in this matter to this report and I have no doubt that it will receive the careful consideration of the select committee of this house to which I trust this bill will be referred. The report of the committee of the Senate had no results and, in my opinion, matters have gone on from bad to worse.

In connection with another issue which has been raised in this debate, may I say that the only work of translating required by section 133 of the British North America Act, 1867, is, first, for the use of both the English and French languages in the respective records and journals of the Senate and of the House of Commons, and, second, for the printing and publishing of the acts of parliament in both these languages. If printing in the French language, exclusive of the debates conducted in French, were confined to the provisions of section 133, the total cost would be very modest indeed. The annual cost of printing the documents of the House of Commons in the French language, as prescribed by section 133, is as follows:

Journals of house and appendices	$ 8,800 03
Votes and proceedings	2,066 34
Orders of the day	1,590 54
Bills for second reading	2,595 10
Bills for third reading	1,312 68
Statutes of Canada	2,792 35
Total	$ 19,157 04

These printings in French are under the direction and control of the Speaker of this house and the expense of printing is less than $20,000 per year. But these printings comprise a very small portion of the printings in French for which successive governments have borne the expense. The vast body of printed translations is directly connected with the due administration of government with which the Speaker of the House of Commons is not directly concerned, although the centralized bureau for translation is now under the control and direction of the Speaker of this house and not under the direction and control of the government of the day. I submit that in any case these translations should be under the direct control and supervision of the government which must assume the responsibility, not only for the proper and efficient translation but also for the timely printing, publication and distribution of the same. As I have pointed out, there is sometimes a delay of six months or even a year between the date of the publication of the English edition and the date of the publication of the French.

Mr. MARCIL: I would point out that some reports have never been translated into French.

Mr. CAHAN: I assume that that is so. I would point out that in the course of time we publish both French and English editions of twenty-eight annual departmental reports. These are of considerable volume and hon. members are quite familiar with them. There are also published twenty or more annual supplementary departmental reports, exclusive of the Canada Year Book—the little blue book, so-called—and twelve to fifteen daily, weekly and monthly periodicals. In addition to these annual, monthly and weekly publications there is a large number of reports relating to the general assembly of the League of Nations, the labour congress at Geneva, commissions on railways, monetary policies, currency and the like, the translation of which is the direct responsibility of government and in relation to which the authority of government should be maintained. In addition to the publications I have mentioned, of which there is a separate edition in English and French, we publish also a large number of works in bilingual form. These include four annual departmental reports, twenty-two supplementary annual reports, four periodicals such as the Canada Gazette, the monthly bulletin of business statistics, the monthly summary of trade of Canada and the quarterly trade reports. There are also annually published from ten to twenty or more miscellaneous documents of the government printed in bilingual form. This vast body of material, printed in the French language, has increased from year to year under successive governments, not, I think, because of any constitutional obligation arising out of the meagre requirements of section 133, but because successive governments in Canada have really desired to provide for the people of Canada of French descent, printed in their own maternal language, all important official documents of the federal government of the country for their information and instruction. A considerable portion of this work of translating departmental reports is, as I have stated, performed by the eleven blue book translators, so called, who, though they have no part in the proper work of the House of Commons, are unfortunately, and I may say I think improperly, attached to the Speaker's staff, and who are naturally disposed to think that they are not directly responsible to the government, which they appear to serve on sufferance.

The government is held by the public responsible for the efficient and speedy performance of their work, and it has therefore decided to assume that responsibility and to ask of parliament the statutory authority which is necessary for its effective performance. That authority will be conferred by the terms of the bill now under discussion. The government might have proceeded, by order in council and by appropriate votes in the annual estimates, to create a bureau for translations, leaving the existing staff of blue book translators to seek other employment. But as a matter of justice to men who have been long employed by successive speakers of this House of Commons, the bill provides that such employees shall be preferred in the creation of the new bureau.

I should like to say to the translators who have participated so ardently in the widespread propaganda and lobby against this bill that they must understand from now on that this government assumes responsibility for this bill, and that it will not be moved, on grave questions of public policy, by intimidation or threats emanating from any members of the public service of Canada. I suggest to these gentlemen that they forget the active part which they have taken in propaganda and lobby, that they separate themselves from this unseemly strife which prevails throughout the country, and that they seek hereafter to cooperate cordially with the representatives of the government in a joint endeavour to improve this important branch of the public service, from which the government has no desire to retire them, but every desire to retain their useful services.

It has been clearly explained that the translators who will be transferred to the bureau will not include those discharging secretarial stenographic services in the several departments who are exclusively employed in conducting the English and French correspondence of those departments. The minister who will have charge of the administration of this act, after careful consultation with the heads of the departments and with the civil service commission, has the right to designate the officials and employees who may be transferred to the bureau, but the persons so designated may only be transferred to the bureau by order of the governor in council. Thus every reasonable precaution will be taken that experts required in any department for translating scientific or technical work will not be so transferred if such departmental service would thereby be rendered less efficient.

It has frequently been incorrectly stated during this debate that all the department heads are opposed to the creation of the proposed bureau. I say most postively that that is not a fact. So far as I am aware, ten or more department heads are decidedly not so opposed, while several of the departmental heads who were consulted, such as mines, national revenue, national defence and post office, stated that for strictly technical work they will require the continued services of certain of their translators who are now employed by them and who are trained in the special work in those departments. I have no doubt whatever that the governor in council, after full inquiry, will give favourable consideration to the particular needs of these departments. There should be no difficulty in organizing the work so as to provide fully and satisfactorily for all these special requirements.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and his colleague from Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) pleaded in mournful voices, and with a wealth of unfounded assertion, that if this bill is enacted the translators will no longer enjoy the right of promotion to become deputy ministers of departments or chiefs of branches, and that they will be promoted only to petty positions from time to time available in the proposed bureau for translations. In 1887 and 1888 I sat in the press gallery reporting the proceedings of this parliament, and since that time I have taken more than a merely casual interest in parliamentary and governmental affairs. But I have yet to learn, during the last half century, of a single translator who has been promoted to be a deputy minister or chief of any branch of any department of the government in this country.

I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite who made use of this argument can now recall any such promotion. A few weeks ago a translator of the Senate was appointed a member of the civil service commission, and such promotion is, I believe, unique in the history of parliamentary institutions in this Dominion of Canada. I say deliberately that no translator employed under the provisions of this bill will be deprived of the possibility of promotion to any advanced position in the civil service for which he is otherwise qualified.

In the translation branch of the public service there are a very considerable number of positions with salaries ranging from $3,300 per year to $4,100. The hon. member for Richelieu also contends that this bill provides no remedy for the evils of the present system, which are obvious even to his blinded eyes. These evils, in my opinion, result from an utter lack of authoritative and efficient administration. The essential cure for negligent or incompetent administration is to provide capable administration; and I am personally confident that there are competent men available, of the French Canadian race, preferably those already experienced in the existing translation services, who, under a competent superintendent responsible to a minister of the crown, will make effective the necessary reform.

The hon. member for Richelieu admits that he has never given much attention to matters of translation and that he is sadly in need of enlightenment. This bill, I trust, will go to a select special committee of the house, and as my hon. friend is anxious for enlightenment, possibly the hon. senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), who has already by his voice and vote declared against the principle of the bill, might within the prescriptions of standing order 65, seek to substitute for himself the hon. member for Richelieu on that committee, in order that the latter might more successfully seek personal intellectual enlightenment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And a very worthy substitute he would be.

Mr. CAHAN: The only difficulty is that he has disqualified himself in the same manner and to the same extent as has my hon. friend who moved the six months' hoist. The senior member for Ottawa in moving the six months' hoist said in a most dramatic manner:

> At this moment I defy the Secretary of State to affirm in this house that this bill will be the official recognition of the French language. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman does not answer.

It was not my duty to reply in the course of debate, but I deemed the question frivolous because, as the hon. gentleman well knows, the official recognition of the French language at the present moment appears and appears only in section 133 of the British North America Act of 1867.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Why does the Secretary of State not say that this would be a further recognition of the French language?

Mr. CAHAN: It certainly is and I have said so; I have said so in the house in the most emphatic way in which I am capable of expressing myself in the English language. But as fundamental constitutional acts such as the British North America Act frequently require supplementary statutory provisions for carrying into full effect their constitutional provisions, this bill is brought before the house for the purpose of placing and, if enacted, will place the use of the French language in official documents of the Dominion government on a basis so broad and stable as to exceed the most sanguine anticipations of the fathers of confederation whose maternal language was French.

The hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois), if I understood him correctly—and I endeavoured to follow him—stated that if I as Secretary of State would declare that this bill increases the guarantees for the use of the French language in the administration of federal affairs, he would regard the bill with more favour. If the hon. member for Nicolet will read section 133 of the British North America Act of 1867 and read and consider both subsections of section 3 of this bill of which he read to the house only the first subsection, he will appreciate the broad and liberal spirit in which the majority of this house propose to carry into effect the provisions of section 133 of the British North America Act of 1867.

Mr. DUPUIS: What about section 6 of the bill?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not discussing section 6; I shall discuss it when the bill comes into committee. My hon. friend was so lacking in intelligence in presenting his case the other day, that I do not think it is necessary to refer to what he then said or what he is now saying.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: I rise to a point of order. I ask the Secretary of State to withdraw that expression.

Mr. SPEAKER: To say that a member is devoid of intelligence is not parliamentary.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say that he is devoid of intelligence. He has some, but I shall withdraw the remark. The house may anticipate with confidence the vote of the hon. member for Nicolet in favour of the second reading of this bill, for otherwise—and I trust this is parliamentary—I feel I would be disposed to doubt the complete candour of the hon. gentleman in making the statement which I have quoted.

The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) frankly admitted that if the bill had been introduced by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), he, the hon. member for North Timiskaming, did not think any member of the house could possibly vote against it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: I regret indeed if the fact that I as a member of the government introduced this bill, should prejudice its sane and sound provisions in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BRADETTE: I rise to a question of privilege. I used those words because of what the hon. member for Labelle said as to the spirit and nature of the French language, and the proposal contained in Bill No. 4.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member's remarks were correctly quoted in the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: I was being misinterpreted by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) insisted that a high standard of French translation should be maintained in this country. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it will be maintained throughout the service by the selection of translators with special technical qualifications to translate technical documents and also by the selection of others who are specially qualified by training and experience to supervise the work of less competent translators before, as is now the case, immature, unrevised and otherwise unsatisfactory translations are sent to the printing bureau for printing.

The hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Fafard) gratuitously interjected in the course of the debate a reflection upon my knowledge of the French language. I sincerely regret my personal deficiencies in this respect, but though the hon. member for l'Islet has mingled freely with Canadians whose maternal language is English, I would not hesitate to challenge him that I shall, without the use of a dictionary, prepare as exact a translation of French prose into English as he can translate a similar document from English into French.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Who will be the judge?

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I am coming to. The difficulty is in finding a judge, because hon. gentlemen have been complaining time and time again, using no unrestricted words of condemnation, of the translation by a translator of this house of the Address of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of parliament. I have received statements from certain gentlemen who have qualifications as translators and who are bilingual by education and experience, one of them, for instance, being Mr. Pierre Lefort, special representative of La Presse in the gallery of the House of Commons, who writes:

> I have no hesitation in stating that the translation of the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of the present session is in all respects a remarkable one. By its directness of treatment, use of the active form and choice of the right word, it bears the stamp of a translator of the very first order.
> The translator has succeeded in avoiding the rut of the passive form, which simply transposes the English form, but is ill-adapted to French language, producing therein dull, lifeless sentences. The right word and the proper construction, present throughout the whole of this translation, restore to the French language its true genius, made of clearness, strength and conciseness.
> This translation demolishes the current fable that English is more concise than French and better adapted to our administrative needs. It would indeed do honour to the translators at Geneva, sometimes offered as examples, and of which the League of Nations is so proud.

Another gentleman, a very eminent man, Canon Emile Chartier, vice-rector of the university of Montreal, has also written to express his opinion in the same connection. He writes:

> I would not hesitate to say that nowhere has the translator distorted the sense of the original text, but rather that he has rendered it with marvellous accuracy, and that moreover he has relieved the heaviness of certain English sentences, either by making their subordinate clauses principal or their principal clauses subordinate.
> I consider on the whole that the translator may well be satisfied with his work: the translation of so technical a text exposed him to errors of interpretation that, for my part, I fail to perceive anywhere.

Mr. BOUCHARD: He is no translator; he is just a literary man.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the minister permit this question? How did it come about that he received those letters?

Mr. CAHAN: You will have to seek the information from them. I am not proposing, and this bill does not propose, any new centralization in the work of the translators. The translation of the blue books and of the large bodies of important material emanating from the administration of government is centralized in this little bureau here. What is really proposed by the bill is not centralization but, as my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) said, the coordination, direction and supervision of translation under a superintendent directly responsible to the government and for which the government will be responsible to this house and to the country, as it is not now.

The criticism, as I have already stated, which has been repeated so frequently, that the translation of technical matter will not be made hereafter by specialists in the particular subjects dealt with certainly is not based on facts, nor is that an intelligent criticism in view of the fact that the government will assume the responsibility with respect to such matters. It is the intention of the government that any translators who have specialized in particular subjects shall continue their work in respect of the same subjects, and where possible their services will be utilized to supervise the work of the less competent translators.

The work of translation, as I have already stated in reply to another criticism, does not ordinarily lead to promotion to administrative positions outside of the translation bureau or the translation service. But, sir, I have consulted with the law officers and with the civil service commission, and I am confident that if this measure is adopted there is nothing in the measure or in its administration which will prevent any translator in the public service, however humble may be his position, from obtaining higher offices in the administrative services of government if he can show to the civil service commission that he is properly and fully qualified therefor.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Would the minister allow a question? In making this statement has the minister considered the chief translators? Are they to remain as chief translators, or are they not?

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot say, because I will not have their appointment, but there will be positions in this service that will require the services of chief translators to the full number of, if not a greater number than, those at present engaged on the House of Commons staff. I agree with what was said by the Solicitor General and others, that special attention should be given to the work of the Hansard translators, whose conditions of employment during the session differ from the conditions under which other civil servants are employed, and that such translators should receive special consideration in effecting the proposed reorganization of this bureau for translations.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add that there was no partisan or political motive in the preparation and submission of this bill. The superintendent of the bureau and the heads of its branches, to whom my hon. friend refers as chief translators, preferably should be men whose maternal language is French. In any event, in the organization of this bureau the minister and the civil service commission may be reasonably expected to exercise ordinary intelligence and if they do so those whose maternal language is French certainly will have the preferred position. I am confident that the select committee, to which I shall move that this bill be referred, will give its provisions careful and unprejudiced consideration, ever keeping in view the paramount purpose of perfecting means for the radical improvement of this branch of the public service.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. In the course of his remarks the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) said that under standing order 65 I was disqualified from sitting on that committee.

Mr. CAHAN: That was not what I said.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman will withdraw that statement I shall not press my point, but I want the house to understand that I shall not sit on any committee if there is any doubt in the minds of hon. members of this house as to my right to do so. In the first place I submit that rule 65 does not declare anything; it simply says:

> It shall always be understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle of a bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

When I was nominated to the civil service committee, sir, I had not declared or decided against the principle of this bill, nor had the bill at that moment been referred. As a matter of fact it has not yet been referred to any committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is premature in raising the point of order now. The question of his eligibility to sit on the committee, if there is any question, will arise in due course.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But this is a point which affects my personal dignity, and as a member of this house I will not sit on any committee until this point is settled. I will not sit on this committee unless the matter is settled by the house here and now.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) cannot allow me to indulge in a bit of humour in discussing this bill. At the time I made the remark I had more in view, the enlightenment which the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) desired to receive during the course of his speech. I am not raising the question of whether or not the hon. gentleman is qualified to sit on the committee; there is no member of the house whom I would rather see sitting on that committee than the senior member for Ottawa.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I accept those words in the spirit in which they are uttered.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on the Civil Service Act.

BANK OF CANADA

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, owing to the exceptional importance of the measure before us and the necessity of avoiding the possibility of any misunderstanding or misrepresentation concerning the attitude of the official opposition on the second reading of this bill, I have thought it advisable to follow the example set by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) at the time of introducing the resolution on which the bill is based, and to reduce to writing that which I wish to say at this stage.

We propose to allow the government to proceed with this bill in the manner which was followed a week ago to-day by all parties in the house with respect to the bill on banks and banking, which is the customary procedure of the House of Commons with respect to measures of this kind, and to permit the bill to go immediately to the select standing committee on banking and commerce where its provisions may be studied in detail, in relation to each other, and to those of the bill on banks and banking, which has already been so referred. It is our intention not to delay or obstruct its progress to the committee on banking and commerce by proposing any amendment which would have the effect of dividing the house, and which, without doubt, would be certain to promote lengthy debate at this stage. Our attitude at this stage, second reading, continues to be that which I outlined on the resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill, and which was based on the assurance given by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that in allowing the resolution to pass without debate we were committed to nothing beyond the principle of the establishment of a properly constituted central bank for the control of credit and currency in the public interest, and for other functions as set forth in the preamble to the bill itself.

May I at this point quote the words in the preamble of the bill, which is designated, An act to incorporate the Bank of Canada:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

And so on. The statements of the Minister of Finance and of the right hon. Prime Minister to which I have just referred appear in Hansard of February 22. The quotation I should like to make from the remarks of the Minister of Finance are to be found at page 830, and are as follows:

> In conclusion, I desire to assure the house that the government has given careful thought and study to the drafting of this bill. At the same time, in submitting it to the banking and commerce committee, it invites that committee to give it the most careful examination and scrutiny, and if in its judgment any amendments can be made which will be designed to accomplish more fully the purposes of the measure or to strengthen its provisions, they will be not unwelcome.

Following the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister is reported at page 837 as follows:

> We are merely pronouncing in favour of a central bank, and when the measure has been introduced and the bill given the first reading the house will have an opportunity to consider later the extent to which it approves of the details as they appear in the measure.

Then, again, at page 839:

> As the minister has indicated, to the extent to which this house in committee, that committee representing every section of Canada, concludes that amendments to be made there will enable this bank properly to discharge the functions of a central banking authority, such amendments will be welcome.

I might refer to another statement made by the Minister of Finance, and reported at page 843 of Hansard as follows:

> I believe the statement I made at an earlier stage, when moving the house into committee, will indicate that the government is prepared to deal sympathetically with any suggestion towards strengthening the bill, and which has in mind the main object of the bill, which may emanate in committee.

It is because we base reliance on statements made by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to the effect that in committee every opportunity will be given hon. members on this side of the house to move such amendments as they deem necessary to further the object of the bank as a properly constituted central bank, properly constituted that is from our point of view—a subject which will have to be considered very carefully—that we think it proper to discuss the matter in committee rather than to provoke a debate at the moment which might be protracted and would prevent the bill reaching the committee for some time to come.

When second reading of the bill is passed, we understand it is to be referred at once to the select standing committee on banking and commerce where full discussion may be held on each and all of its provisions; also that when the bill is reintroduced in committee of the whole, and upon third reading, we shall be free to propose any amendments which we may regard as appropriate and necessary. Were support of the second reading of the bill as it stands to be construed or capable of being construed as committing those who support the second reading to private ownership or private control as against public ownership or public control of a central bank, we would not be prepared to allow the bill to go to committee without prolonged discussion at this stage, or without immediately presenting or supporting one or more amendments.

It is perhaps as well that I should make perfectly clear at once what the matters are to which we believe the committee will have to give very special attention, and mention of which will the better serve to make our position known.

A central bank, as we view it, differs from other banks in that its function is primarily regulatory and controlling—and not commercial in the sense of being intended primarily for private profit or gain. In other words, the functions of a central bank in the world of banking and finance, as we view it, is that of subordinating the special to the general interest or, to express the matter more concretely, that of subordinating the private interest in banking and credit to the public interest. In no sense should the bank be, or be permitted to become, a banker's bank. It is and ought to be a government bank, the government being representative of the interests of the country as a whole. Its main purpose is and should be to protect the public interest in banking and credit.

We believe the provisions of the present bill, as drafted, do not go far enough to secure these ends, and that, as the bill now stands, there is a possibility of private interests exercising the control which, under a measure of the kind, should be secured to the state. How the regulatory powers necessary to effect such control in the public interest, as contrasted with private interests, may best be effected, is something to which the committee will have to give special attention and to ensure which we feel will necessitate change in some of the provisions of the bill as they now stand.

There is one other matter on which we of the official opposition are also agreed. It is that the provisions of the bill should be such as to ensure that the Central Bank of Canada will in no way be in danger of becoming subordinated in the discharge of any of its functions to the banking institutions either of Great Britain or of the United States or of any other country. We believe that the personnel of its board of directors, including the governor, deputy governor and assistant deputy governor should not only be British subjects, but persons ordinarily resident in Canada. With Canada's experience and reputation and position in the banking world what it is, we are confident there can be secured for a Canadian central bank an efficient and highly qualified personnel wholly Canadian.

I hope the government will realize that in taking this attitude we are trying to expedite the consideration of this measure in the one sphere in which it can be most carefully studied in detail, and seeking to avoid the development of difficulties until that is absolutely inevitable. We do this in a desire to further what we feel is an all-important public measure, and in order to afford as great a measure of cooperation as adherence to our views as to what should be the governing principles will permit.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not, like the minister and the leader of the opposition, reduce my remarks to writing. Had I known I was privileged to do so perhaps I could have made a better job of presenting our views to the house. However, I hope hon. members will bear with me while I present those views in the best way I can.

The occasion of the second reading of any bill, we are told, is the time at which the principle of the bill should be passed upon by the house. The proposed bank is to perform a function of government. It is to be given the power to issue legal tender for Canada, a function which since confederation has been performed by the state itself. Since ancient times the issue of money was the prerogative of the crown and zealously guarded as such. It is the most important thing in our whole economic system. The issue of all money is to be turned over to this bank, and it should be noted that this bank is to be given a perpetual charter. To me the principle to be decided in connection with this bill is whether the institution which is to be given this very great power shall be established under private ownership or public ownership. In other words, is it to be another private bank, or is it to be owned by the people of Canada and operated by a body of men representing the various economic activities of the Canadian people and responsible to parliament? In reality is it to be an arm of the government?

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) I think stated that it was in the public interest that this should be a government bank or words to that effect. I believe that that is a correct statement of the position, and that is a vital principle which should be decided upon the second reading of the bill. In 1931 I moved in this house a resolution asking for the establishment of a central bank, but I said emphatically that it should be a nationally owned central bank. Those are the words that were used in the resolution. While this bill would establish a central bank it does not provide for national ownership and control. I say again that I consider that a vital principle. Control is perhaps the most vital thing but the way to ensure national control is to provide for national ownership. I think beyond a doubt it is fair to say that one of the outstanding principles to be decided now is whether this bank is to be under private or public ownership, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, before I conclude I intend to move:

That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to the matter of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank should be owned by the government and that the governor and directors of said bank should be appointed by the governor in council.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not opposed, and we are not opposed, to the setting up of a central bank. We think this step should have been taken years ago but we believe that it is vital that the bank should be a publicly owned institution. The bank as proposed in this bill represents the view of a minority of the members of the commission. That is something that should not be forgotten. The two members of the commission who recommended the setting up of a central bank as now proposed in this bill were neither of them Canadians. They were both from outside of Canada, and one of them was a director of the Bank of England.

Mr. BENNETT: I might correct the hon. gentleman. He had been a director of the Bank of England, not was.

Mr. COOTE: I am glad to accept the correction of the Prime Minister and I regret if I misstated the case. Two members of the commission were opposed to the setting up of a central bank, and the Hon. Mr. Brownlee, while approving of the idea of a central bank, was quite emphatic that it should be publicly owned and controlled. Perhaps I might quote in part what he said. After referring to the recommendation as made by the other two commissioners, Mr. Brownlee said:

I dissent from this suggestion and recommend that the capital be subscribed by the government of Canada, and that all directors and executive officers be appointed by that government, each appointment to be for a fixed number of years.

The source of capital is in itself of little significance. The control of the bank is of great significance. The election of directors by private shareholders means private control, and notwithstanding the limitation of the rate of dividends, this control might place earning capacity as a first consideration. The only reason advanced in favour of private, as against national, control is the fear of political influence. I am not impressed by this argument. I believe the selection of directors and executive officials by a government would be as wise as that of a body of shareholders, the majority of whom might vote by proxy. It is admitted that the state must ultimately retain sovereignty in matters affecting currency. Emphasis is placed upon the necessity of close accord between the bank and the government in all that pertains to the external value of the country's currency. The primary purposes of a central bank are, in paragraph 206 of the report, defined to be the regulation of the currency in the best interests of the state, and by wise and timely cooperation with similar institutions in other countries to mitigate as far as possible fluctuations in the general level of economic activity.

In times of stress the policies of the state must prevail, whatever may be the constitution of such a bank. In normal times I am of the opinion that the function of the governor, deputy governors and board in carrying on all the functions of such a bank would not suffer as a result of appointment by the government. It is suggested, in the plan in the appendix that the government should exercise partial authority in the selection of the executive officers of the bank. In my judgment it should exercise full authority.

So far as I am personally concerned I am heartily in agreement with the Hon. Mr. Brownlee, and may I again quote from the report of the commission, page 93:

The state must ultimately retain sovereignty in matters affecting currency.

The control of currency and credit can in no sense be defended as a legitimate form of private enterprise. Surely no one is going to dispute that. It seems to me a backward step, and not a step forward. The bank shall be given control of credit. Credit is the lifeblood of industry, and through credit, employment and purchasing power is controlled. Real power is exercised by those who control credit. They would have more power than the government itself. The very life of the nation economically speaking, is to be committed by this bill to the care of a privately owned institution. The control of credit is really the control of the nation, and any government that leaves the control of credit in the hands of a privately owned institution, in the hands of a private bank such as this, will find itself unable to control the political policy of the nation unless it happens to coincide with the policy of the financiers. I think we should be clear on this point, that the issue confronting us today is whether the government or a privately owned institution is to be in control of the economic activities of the nation and economic conditions in Canada.

Quoting again from the report itself, "The powers exercised by a central bank are very great." I think it is a matter of supreme importance that the bank shall be established in such a way as to ensure that its powers will at all times be exercised in the best interests of the people of Canada. The great power of a central bank is due to the fact that it is given sole control of currency, and it is also given control of the volume of credit outstanding at any time. Through the control of credit it can control price levels and general economic conditions. Many people fail to realize the extent to which economic conditions are affected by the policy of our banks. To those who have never given the subject much thought the following sentence from a speech delivered by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, at a recent meeting of the shareholders of the Midland Bank, London, should be of very great interest:

> Nothing in monetary practice is more certain than that contraction of the volume of money, or even failure to secure an adequate increase, tends both directly and indirectly to put a brake upon business of every kind, and to produce the very troubles—unemployment, unremunerative commodity prices, unbalanced budgets and general depression—which have been apparent in almost every country of the world in the past four years. With expanding population and production we need some expansion in the supply of money, or it will inevitably follow that consumption will not keep pace with production. There may in any circumstances be temporary maladjustment between production and consumption of individual commodities; but if the supply of money is adequate the price level of all commodities taken together will be kept approximately stable, and general consumption will be maintained.

I want to draw the attention of members of the house to this last sentence. Mr. McKenna says:

> It follows then, that the policy of the Bank of England is of the utmost concern to everyone, for no one escapes the effects of general depression and not one of us fails to benefit from sustained prosperity.

If the policy of the Bank of England is of the utmost concern to everyone in England, and Mr. McKenna is in a good position to know, it follows just as sure as night follows day that the policy of the Bank of Canada will be of the utmost concern to everyone in Canada. That being so, it surely follows that the Bank of Canada should be owned by the state and controlled by a body of men responsible to the representatives of the people and subject to our criticism instead of responsible to the shareholders of a privately owned bank. Let us not underestimate the power of privately owned banks. I should like to quote the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, now Prime Minister of England, as follows:

> Finance can command the sluices of every stream that runs to turn the wheels of industry, and can put fetters upon the feet of every government that is in existence.

I should like to quote from another authority, a former king of a European country. He was reported last year in a Toronto paper as follows:

> "You think," he said, "that the Bank of England is a national institution. The French think the Bank of France is a national institution. The Germans think the Reichsbank is a national institution. And the truth? The truth is, they are all controlled to some extent by a group of international financiers whose one interest in life is power. The power to rule the world. I tell you they rule the world."

I think this former king knew what he was talking about and, therefore, we should be careful in setting up a Bank of Canada to see that it is owned by the nation itself. I think it is fair to say that the international bankers were very successful in controlling the world up to 1931 by means of the gold standard. But that standard has broken down and they now hope to control the world through a system of central banks. There is a growing conviction in the minds of many Canadians that the setting up of a privately owned central bank would be a step to bring Canada under the sphere of influence of the Bank of England, in other words, under the domination of the Bank of England in so far as monetary policy is concerned. This would be Canada's contribution toward setting up an imperial money power of which the Bank of England, because of its long experience and influential position, would be the dominant influence. I view with alarm such a situation and I think we should be warned by the experience of Great Britain and British governments with the Bank of England. Their policy has not been one of close cooperation with governments to raise the standard of life of the British people. They may cooperate but they seem to do so to carry out the policy laid down by the Bank of England. The words of the Right Hon. Mr. Churchill, as delivered less than two years ago in the British House of Commons, were referred to by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) in his speech delivered on January 31, 1934. I think it is very clear from his statements that England was put back on the gold standard on the advice of the bankers. He and his government had been warned by such outstanding men as the Right Hon. Mr. McKenna, Mr. John Maynard Keynes and many others that if they did so unemployment would be increased in Great Britain and it would be impossible for that country to balance its budget. In spite of everything they followed the advice of the bankers and returned to gold. I think the last sentence of the speech of Mr. Churchill already referred to is worth repeating. It is:

I say quite seriously that this monetary convulsion has now reached a pitch where I am persuaded that the producers of new wealth will not tolerate indefinitely so hideous an oppression.

So far as we can gather, the results which followed were brought about by the government following the advice of the Bank of England. The policy of the Bank of England has been the policy of the British government. The deputy governor of the Bank of England is reported as having testified before a committee in England last year that the difference between the treasury and the Bank of England was the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. I think it is also fair to say that the policy of Sir Montagu Norman is the policy of the Bank of England. This control by Sir Montagu Norman is now referred to in England by a great many people as the second Norman conquest. Are we to have a Norman conquest of Canada? Sir Montagu Norman is quoted in Hansard of February 9, 1932, as follows:

Unless drastic measures are taken to save it, the capitalist system throughout the civilized world will be wrecked within a year. I should like this prediction to be filed for future reference.

Since that time he has been reported as saying that he was not at all sure that he could see daylight ahead. However, England seemed to be following his policy. But there are lessons to be learned from the experience of England. We find such a good Tory as Lord Beaverbrook stating in his paper the Daily Express in April, 1932:

The time is long overdue for a reversal—and a dramatic reversal of the monetary policy of Great Britain.

The national need is for a steady expansion of credit facilities. The Bank of England is the obstacle in the way of that need, and because of its vested power it has imposed upon the government for ten years a policy of deflation.

In other words, the Bank of England, which owes no responsibility to the electorate, dictates the government's financial policy.

The system is definitely wrong. It has played an enormous part in bringing about the post-war economic distress, and the men who conducted the bank's affairs then are still in charge.

It is no use tinkering with the question of reform. The present situation should be brought to an end.

The government must be master in its own house; the government must dictate the nation's monetary policy; and the Bank of England must be relegated to its rightful place as the servant of the nation.

Are we taking advantage of the advice contained in that editorial by Lord Beaverbrook. About the same time, in another issue of his paper, after pointing out that he is a banker of practical experience, he says:

We must abandon the policy of the Bank of England, which has been frankly directed to lowering the standard of life in this country.

And again:

It should be our policy to make money both plentiful and cheaper. It may be fairly cheap at the moment. I do not deny that. It is certainly not plentiful. Until we have made it plentiful we will not be able to maintain the standard of wages here. How can it be made plentiful?

Here is his suggestion:

Send the Bank of England about its business! Let it continue to perform the functions of a joint stock bank.

Establish a central bank, owned by the nation, equipped with all the powers necessary to provide abundant credit and hedged about by all the restrictions required to safeguard the permanence and stability of the structure.

That is the solution.

Give us the right to establish reasonable credit and sufficient banking facilities for the people, and you will get the present wage-level, stability of commodity prices and prosperity for our people.

I suggest that the first step towards providing prosperity for the people of Canada would be to make the Bank of Canada a servant of the nation. It should be publicly owned and controlled and be hedged about by all the restrictions suggested by Lord Beaverbrook in his editorial.

I think we could well take to heart the experience of the United States in connection with its federal reserve banks. This experience should help us in deciding for a publicly owned and controlled Bank of Canada. There has recently been introduced in the United States congress a bill to establish a central bank in that country. The control over this bank would be exercised by a board of seven directors to be appointed by the president with Senate approval. These directors would be representative of agriculture, industry and business generally and would be headed by a governor and deputy governor in the manner of a central bank. The authority would then be free from any control except that of the government. All profits from its operation, after deductions, for reserve, would go to the treasury. In short, it will be equivalent to a state appointed and a state owned central bank directed to control credit and currency on what has been loosely described as a "commodity dollar" basis. I think we should profit from the experience of the United States and establish this central bank under state ownership and control. The federal reserve banks of that country are bankers' banks; the stock is owned by the banks and the system has not been found to be satisfactory. They are now proposing to set up a nationally owned central bank. Personally, I do not want to see Canada in the position of having to go hat in hand to a privately owned central bank, as an individual now has to do, to obtain money to carry on the services which the people should have.

Speaking of the United States naturally brings to mind the national recovery plans that are under way in that country, and there is a growing need and growing demand for some national recovery plans to solve some of the problems that are facing Canada—the farm problem, the unemployment problem, the debt and interest problem, the railway problem. In the solving of any of these problems the matter of money and money policy stands out prominently like a sore thumb. We shall find it impossible to deal effectively with any of these problems without the application of an entirely new money policy.

For the last few years money has been our master. Whether or not we could institute new policies has always been determined by money policy. I submit that money should be made to serve the needs of the people. This bank will control credit, and if governments are to be held responsible for economic conditions, surely they must have something to say about the control of credit. The chief duty of the bank will be to control the amount of credit outstanding at any time. The policy governing the operations of the bank would unquestionably be a matter of concern to the government, for the control of credit is the central problem of economic recovery. The wise use of national credit is the most important factor in establishing prosperity and happiness among the people. We have no reason to believe that the national credit will be used to the fullest extent possible if handed over to a privately-owned central bank, and for this and other good reasons I say that the bank should be owned by the nation. For every nation to-day, currency policy is or should be an administrative or government problem. For that reason the closest form of cooperation between the Finance department and the central bank is absolutely essential.

May I quote a few sentences from the February issue of Lloyds Bank Monthly of London. I read the following:

> At the present time currency policy is virtually an administrative problem rather than a policy determined for the nation by the gold standard, and for that reason the closest form of cooperation between the treasury and the bank is rendered essential. . . . The currency policy that is desirable in the future must be determined by the primary needs of the nation.

That being so, who should determine the policy, the government or a privately-owned bank?

> The first need is to do all that is possible to facilitate and accelerate a recovery from the present trade depression and to employ to the fullest extent our resources of labour and capital. The second is to promote a rise in prices to approximately that level which prevailed before the advent of the depression. . . . The third need is to establish and maintain a monetary system which will prevent the recurrence of the disastrous events of the last four years.

And let us not forget that the disastrous occurrences of the last four years have come while we have been under the direction of privately-owned monetary institutions.

I would also quote the following words from the Right Hon. Mr. McKenna in his recent speech at the annual meeting of the Midland Bank. He said:

> The Bank of England on its own responsibility acts from day to day as it thinks proper. But such freedom in a matter vitally affecting the whole community should obviously be subject to limitations set by higher authority. . . . Even while operating on the gold standard the Bank of England had a considerable field for the exercise of independent judgment, but with the removal of the statutory obligation its powers over the quantity of money were so wide, whether in the direction of increase or decrease, as to be for practical purposes unrestricted. It therefore became urgent that the Bank of England should be given some definite guidance as to its future policy, and obviously the government alone could have the necessary power and authority to instruct the bank.

But if that is necessary in England it is necessary in Canada also; the government of Canada should have the power to instruct the Bank of Canada, using practically the same words used by Mr. McKenna.

Money policy is essentially a government problem to-day and the government should be free to determine such policy and to see that it is carried out. If governments are to be held responsible for economic conditions—and we know that they are held responsible; the people will turn out any government that allows these unsatisfactory economic conditions to continue—then surely the government or a government institution should have control of credit, which really determines economic conditions.

The Prime Minister, speaking on this question of a central bank, with reference to the ownership of the various central banks in the world, said in effect that there were thirty-six central banks in the world, six of which were owned by the nations in which they functioned, while the others were not. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that at least six of them are nationally owned, but that does not tell the whole story; and while I cannot place on record a complete statement showing the ownership and control of these banks. I have here a statement which will at least illustrate the situation. There are two central banks in which members of the government are directors. These might be called state banks, and they exist in Russia and in Finland. There are central banks where the state, on paper, has no control—the Bank of England, the Bank of Denmark and the Bank of Germany. But in these three cases there is a long tradition against private banking control. However, these banks may be called privately owned banks. In all other central banks there is state control of a sort, which is exercised through some appointments being made by the government. The government appoints the governor or directing head and generally some directors, even a majority. This statement I have here shows, in the various countries, those appointed by the government and those elected by the shareholders:

Central Banks—Directors

	Appointed by Government	Elected by Shareholders
Australia	All.	None.
Austria	Chairman.	Others.
Belgium	Governor and deputy.	Others.

A final point: It must be remembered that in most cases where the governor, chairman, president or whatever he may be called is appointed by the government, he is given very considerable power, much more than that of an ordinary chairman.

In passing, I think it is worth while pointing out that in the two countries which have made most headway in the last three years, Sweden and Australia, the central banks are publicly owned. Sweden has achieved a stable price level, while Australia has come very close to it. The improvement in the price level in Australia compares rather remarkably with the situation in Canada. In a recent article Professor Copeland of Melbourne, Australia, shows that their export trade expanded by more than 25 per cent in 1931-32 and 30 per cent in 1932-33, as compared with the three pre-crisis years. He states further that the banking policy of Australia was sound in the crisis mainly because it was less orthodox than that which so-called sound financiers would readily pursue. He says that it is a mistake to concentrate on the external situation and that Australia made her main mistake in not depreciating sooner.

There is one other point which should be mentioned in connection with this bank, and that is that the nation is the ultimate source of credit. The case of the Canadian Pacific bond guarantee of $60,000,000 is a good example. It was the guarantee of the dominion that made it possible for the banks to advance the $60,000,000; the guarantee made the security gilt-edged. The currency of the central bank will be based three-quarters on the credit of the nation and one-quarter on gold. It seems to me that this is another added reason why this bank should be in every respect of the word a national bank.

I believe the chief cause of poverty in the midst of plenty is an obsolete money system. It is the duty of parliament to bring to an end this disgraceful state of affairs in Canada and we cannot do this unless we adopt a new money policy. The setting up of the Bank of Canada as our own bank under national control to enable us to make full use of the nation's credit in creating sufficient purchasing power is the first step in abolishing poverty in the midst of plenty.

The reason advanced in favour of private ownership and control as against national or public control is the fear of political interference. In reply to this argument I would say that the Finance Act has been administered by a government department for nineteen years and I never have heard even a suggestion that there was political interference or that political influence was used to secure any improper advances under the Finance Act.

I recognize the difficulty which the Prime Minister finds in connection with partisan appointments, but surely we can arrange such a method of nomination of men for these positions by the various economic bodies in Canada as would do away with that fear. I have already instanced the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. Surely the government and the people of Australia have not suffered because this bank is publicly owned. I say that the Bank of Canada should be a nationally owned bank. It should be "an arm of the government." It should be operated in the service of the people without any profit motive. The board of directors or governors should be appointed by the governor in council from slates of names prepared by the various bodies representing the major economic activities of the country. Why should we at this time set up another privately owned bank? Let us make it in reality as well as in name the Bank of Canada. In conclusion, I move, as I have already intimated, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine):

That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to the matter of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank should be owned by the government and that the governor and directors of said bank should be appointed by the governor in council.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say at once that I am in entire agreement with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in respect to the attitude he has taken this afternoon in regard to this measure. While we will agree to disagree with respect to certain features of the bill, we are in agreement, I assert, with respect to the appreciation he has of the character of the debate which ought to take place upon the second reading of a bill.

I am sorry that I am not in a position to say the same to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who has, I respectfully submit, failed to appreciate the distinction between a debate upon the principle of a bill and the question of the details of a bill, however important or vital they may be, because the fact remains that at the moment the principle which we are discussing is: shall we have a central bank?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that is the only principle.

Mr. RHODES: That is the only principle. The point whether this bank should be publicly or privately owned as well as questions respecting the numerous other details incidental to the bill are matters of detail which can be dealt with by way of amendment in the regular course as we proceed in committee on banking and commerce, or in committee of the whole house, or upon motion on the third reading of the bill.

The hon. member has moved an amendment. Let me say at once that I think he has in so doing placed himself in an indefensible position. In the first place his amendment is strictly out of order and contrary to the rules of the house. On that point I do not ask for an immediate ruling; possibly Your Honour may wish to study the matter over the dinner recess or even longer, and I do not press for a ruling at the moment, but I wish for a few minutes to discuss the question of procedure and to refer the house to May, 13th edition, at page 391, from which I shall cite but one sentence which comes under the provisions headed Second Reading of Bills. It reads:

Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the bill.

That main thesis is followed by two authorities which are cited in a footnote upon the page from which I have just read. The first is to be found in the Hansard of Westminster, third series, for the year 1868, at page 1571, in which the Speaker makes the following ruling:

> Before the hon. member moves his resolution I wish to point out to him that it exceeds the limits prescribed for such motions by the rules of the house. It is a resolution which in reality anticipates discussion on every clause of the bill.

The other citation is with respect to the second reading of a bill and is to be found in the British Hansard, fourth series, 1905, at page 1149. It is with respect to a motion moved by Mr. Arthur Henderson by way of a resolution on the second reading of a bill just as the one my hon. friend proposes to move to-day. The Deputy Speaker, who was at the moment presiding, ruled:

> The motion of the hon. member is out of order, for the reason that it anticipates amendments embodying the same principle which may be submitted in committee on the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? In his judgment is it permissible for any member other than a minister in committee to move an amendment of this kind?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the committee is for.

Mr. RHODES: I propose in my discussion on the question of procedure to make that very clear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This involves an expenditure of money.

Mr. RHODES: It has nothing to do with that at all. The hon. member for Macleod was in another respect unfortunate in moving this motion. He professes, as does every hon. member of this house so far as I know, to believe in the principle of a central bank; indeed, he has advocated it for years. Yet in moving this motion he moves a vote of want of confidence in the government which brings in a measure to introduce a system which my hon. friend has advocated for many years. Furthermore may I point out that he has been unfortunate in another circumstance. If it were in order for him to proceed with his amendment he places himself in this position: It is a well known and established rule of practice not only here but at Westminster as well that you may not proceed twice in the same session with the same matter. If my hon. friend's amendment were to carry it would have the effect of defeating this bill and of preventing the accomplishment of the very measure which my hon. friend has consistently advocated for so long.

I do not propose to weary the house with citations or to use them to any greater extent than is necessary to establish my argument, if not to the satisfaction of my hon. friends opposite and to my right at least so far as is necessary in my judgment to satisfy myself. I will say, however, that if hon. gentlemen will refer to page 299 of May, thirteenth edition, they will find that it has been an established principle at Westminster for over three centuries that the same matter may not be introduced twice in the same session. There are decisions on that point without number, not only in the House of Commons but in the House of Lords as well.

Mr. IRVINE: How does that apply to this particular motion?

Mr. RHODES: Because if this motion were to carry it would mean the defeat of this measure and it would not be possible to introduce this same measure again this session. That is according to well established practice. I have just given the citations; if my hon. friend cares to look them up he will find that what I have said is correct.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Only, may I submit quite respectfully, if the principle of this measure is definitely that of private ownership, but I thought the hon. gentleman was contending that it was not so definite.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know whether or not my hon. friend was present when I mentioned that point a moment ago. The principle of the bill is not the question of private ownership; the principle of the bill is whether we shall have a central bank. I care not how vital the question of ownership may be in the mind of my hon. friend; the fact remains that it has not to do with the principle of the bill. It is a detail, whatever importance my hon. friend may attach to it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then may I ask the minister a further question. Why should it be regarded as a defeat of the bill if an amendment is adopted that does not affect the principle of the bill?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps my best answer would be that this is the practice of parliaments, and that it has been so for a great period of time. The reason is obvious; the motion is that the bill be read a second time. My hon. friend has moved in amendment that it be not read a second time, and if his amendment were to carry all we would have would be a pious resolution of this house, and we would have lost the second reading of this bill. He would have killed the bill, in plain English.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not necessarily.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, absolutely, my hon. friend to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. IRVINE: Could not the government adopt the principle? That would save it.

Mr. RHODES: Of course my hon. friend may think it is competent for him to make the rules of the house as he proceeds, or that they are a mere matter of argument or of his own opinion, but whether or not my hon. friend attaches any weight to the decisions of this house I may point out to him that the matter has been the subject of decision in this house on different occasions. I will refer my hon. friend to the journals of the House of Commons for the year 1884, where this specific point was dealt with on April 17 of that year. The citation is to be found at page 462 of the journals. Objection was taken under similar circumstances on the ground that the same question had been negatived by the house on a previous occasion during the same session, and Mr. Speaker said:

—the same question had been before the house on the 18th March last, and the house decided that the Liquor Licence Act should not be repealed, and it would not be reconcilable with that previous decision if the house were now to agree to consider the proposed amendment.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, and I quote from May:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

Would my hon. friend kindly indicate to me what sort of amendment could be moved here?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the principle of my hon. friend's amendment?

Mr. RHODES: May I ask my hon. friend to be good enough to bear with me until I have finished my argument. Then if he wishes to submit any questions, if Mr. Speaker does not object certainly I will offer no objection either. I would refer the house also to the British Hansard for 1890, third series, No. 347, at page 743, where the order was called for the second reading of a bill which had for its purpose the parting with the island of Heligoland under an agreement with Germany. There the Speaker ruled that it was competent for an hon. member to move a resolution superseding the motion for second reading but that it was not competent to add words to the motion that the bill be now read a second time.

Let me just indicate the anomalous position in which my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) has placed himself. Being a consistent proponent of the idea of a central bank he now takes the only constitutional course which would prevent our securing a central bank in Canada, and he does so despite the fact that he has three opportunities open to him to move a motion which would have the effect of making law what he now attempts to say by way of resolution. In the banking and commerce committee it is competent for my hon. friend to move that the shares of this bank shall be publicly owned exclusively, he may make that motion again when the bill is in committee of the whole house, and he may make it, on the third occasion, when the bill stands for third reading, by moving that it be reported back to the committee of the whole, with instructions to amend in a certain particular.

I put this question to my hon. friend: Is he prepared to take the position that unless this is a central bank constituted entirely as he, and those who think with him, desire, he will deny a central bank to the people of Canada? Because, unless he is prepared to take that position, he is entirely inconsistent in his motion, in view of the fact that these opportunities are open to him on three subsequent stages to make the motion I have indicated.

Mr. COOTE: May I say to the minister that in the past I have been told I was out of order in moving directly a motion which entailed the expenditure of public money.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is, the introduction of a bill.

Mr. COOTE: Unless, of course, it is introduced by way of resolution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is introduced by way of resolution.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, this bill is before the house by way of resolution. My hon. friend may be surprised, but it is a fact nevertheless, that with an absolutely open mind I entered upon a consideration of the respective merits of public ownership versus private subscription of capital and independent management under strict government supervision. I want to say to this House of Commons, with all the solemnity I possess and in all sincerity, that I am just as strong in my convictions in favour of the provisions contained in this bill as is my hon. friend from Macleod with respect to his attitude to the contrary. Let me say to my hon. friend that while he has placed himself in an anomalous position I know he has been actuated by the best of motives. I am prepared at once to accord to him sincerity of purpose, and to believe that he has had in mind only the rendering of the best service to the people of Canada. All I ask is that he shall accord to me that same sincerity of purpose in presenting my views.

I wish briefly, and not as fully as I might, to discuss the question of procedure. Many people unthinkingly are jumping to the conclusion that the question is one of judging between the merits of public ownership and unbridled private ownership. Only this morning I picked up a newspaper published in Ottawa which said the following:

> In the proposal before parliament this session to set up a central bank of Canada, sovereignty over the monetary system is to be transferred almost entirely to private interests.

Mr. Speaker, this is an absolute misstatement; it is not the proposal at all. The proposal is that the capital which shall be supplied for this bank will come from private sources, but it by no means follows that there will be unbridled private control. It would be equally fair if this same newspaper had said that the board of railway commissioners were exercising private control over our railway rates in Canada, because parliament in its wisdom had seen fit to delegate to that body certain authority which parliament theretofore had possessed. It would be equally true to say that we had handed over to the tariff board, a body of private persons, certain powers by parliament. It would be equally true to say that we had handed over to irresponsible private persons the important functions and duties now performed by the civil service commission. It would be as true to say all these things as to say, as this newspaper has said, that we are going to hand over to private interests the sovereignty of our monetary system. Under the measure now under consideration it is proposed to clothe the management of the bank of Canada with certain authority, to provide that they shall have certain independence of action, certain independent scope within which to conduct their operations, but we have placed a very strict series of controls over the management and control of that bank. May I say here and now that, so long as they will not cripple the operations of the bank, the government will be only too happy to give favourable consideration to further suggestions of a salutary and desirable character.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) at the outset of his remarks quoted, if I mistake not—because owing to interruptions in the chamber I could not hear everything he said—quoted from Right Hon. Reginald McKenna. It so happend that only a few days ago the monthly review of the Midland bank for the months of January and February came to hand. In this publication there is a front page article by Right Hon. Reginald McKenna from which I propose to quote two paragraphs. He states:

> In several previous addresses I have spoken on monetary policy, a subject which has necessarily involved discussion of the functions of the Bank of England. I have done so because the matter is of immediate concern to the shareholders of a clearing bank; our daily operations are directly influenced by the policy of the central bank, and the whole trade of the country is deeply affected by it. Happily, the Bank of England has acquired an unrivalled reputation for complete disinterestedness. It is actuated, not by motives of profit, but, within the limits of its independence,—

And I emphasize the word "Independence"—

> —by its view of what is best in the public interest, and its action has therefore to be judged solely by the test of economic need.

Then, on the following page:

> Within definable limits its action is prompted by its own independent judgment; that is to say, the Bank of England on its own responsibility acts from day to day as it thinks proper. But such freedom in a matter vitally affecting the whole community should obviously be subject to limitations set by higher authority, and for the reasons I have given it becomes of great importance to the business community no less than to the joint stock banks to know whether such limitations exist and, if so, what they are.

My hon. friend from Macleod referred to the fact that there are some thirty-six central banks in the world, and of these only six are publicly owned and controlled. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) referred to this fact on a previous occasion, but I think it is well that we should bear in mind the particular countries and their experiences and then make deductions therefrom.

It is true that the only British country in which there is a central bank publicly owned is Australia. That bank was established by a labour government, not for the purposes of a central bank at all, but as a commercial bank in the ordinary sense in competition with privately owned banks in Australia, and it has only recently evolved as a central bank. It may be—it is not for me to say—that the Australian people have the genius to operate a publicly owned bank and escape the dangers inherent in that system, many of which I shall point out as I proceed; but certainly they have not operated it as a central bank for a sufficient length of time to enable us to make any deductions of the kind—admitting, if you will, for the sake of discussion, that they have succeeded up to the moment.

The other countries in which central banks are publicly owned are Sweden, Latvia, Finland, Bulgaria and Russia. Of the remaining thirty countries seventeen have central banks which are wholly privately owned, and this list includes such leading countries as England, France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Germany and Switzerland. In addition, in the United States the federal reserve system is owned by the private member banks. In the Union of South Africa the reserve bank is owned jointly by the banks and by private shareholders. In Chile, Colombia and Peru the central bank represents a combination of public and private ownership. In Czechoslovakia, Greece, Japan, Jugoslavia, Lithuania, Roumania, Poland and Esthonia, the state owns only a limited portion of the shares of the central bank, but even in some of these cases there is provision for the state gradually disposing of its shares. While the tendency during the nineteenth century, particularly as regards actual statutory provisions, was somewhat to stress the control of the state over the central bank, the trend of recent years has set very strongly against granting the state power to interfere with the functions of a central bank. This reaction from the earlier tendency is due to the experience of many countries during the war period, which exhibited in extreme degree the danger of direct state ownership and control. In the League of Nations reconstruction schemes for Austria and Hungary, the independence of the central bank was stressed as a cardinal feature, as it was also in the new statutes devised during the post-war period, for instance, in Esthonia and Greece by the Financial Committee of the League of Nations. In other countries where central banks had existed before the war the tendency has been to divorce the institution from active political control. Thus when the Reichsbank was reorganized in 1924 the necessity for independence was stressed to such a point that the new German Bank Act was made to begin with the following sentence:

> The Reichsbank is a bank independent of government control.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman say that that is true of the Reichsbank to-day?

Mr. RHODES: I say that the statement I have just made is true.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does he say that the statement holds true to-day?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend may have his own opinion as to how well they have lived up to their objective in that regard.

In Czechoslovakia a partly independent national bank whose stock is owned only in part by the state has replaced the banking department of the ministry of finance. The National Bank of Bulgaria affords another illustration of a state owned bank which is gradually undergoing evolution in the direction of emancipation from government control. In the new Bank Act for that country for the year 1924 the bank was given a greater degree of independence by the Ministry of Finance than it had previously enjoyed. I mention these facts as evidences of the trend away from complete government operation of central banks. A further amendment was made in 1926 to the Bank Act of Bulgaria introducing for the first time an independently elected element into the administrative council. Finally, in 1928 the Bulgarian government entered into an agreement with the League of Nations undertaking to "safeguard the independence of the Bulgarian national bank from any political influence whatsoever."

The Esthonian Bank Act also provides for gradual disposal to the public of the shares held originally by the state.

I think it would be well, Mr. Speaker, if we took cognizance of the attitude of those who ought to be able to speak with at least some considerable degree of authority on this subject. At the International Financial Conference held at Brussels in 1920 the following resolution was passed:

> Banks, and especially banks of issue, should be freed from political pressure and should be conducted solely on the lines of prudent finance.

The economic experts responsible for the report of the committee on currency and exchange at that time included A. C. Pigou, of England; Charles Gide, of France; Professor M. Pantaleoni, of Italy; G. Bruins, of the Netherlands—I shall not vouch for my pronunciation but the spelling will appear correctly in Hansard—also the eminent Swedish professor, Gustav Cassel, whom, if I mistake not, I have heard quoted very frequently, with a rolling of the tongue as if it were a sweet morsel, by hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen to the extreme right. So his view upon this question is at least not in accord with their own, and as they quote him with approval on so many occasions I do not see how they can disown him upon this.

At Genoa in 1932 the international economic conference resolved as follows:

Banks, and especially banks of issue, should be free from political pressure and should be conducted solely on lines of prudent finance. In countries where there is no central bank of issue one should be established.

At the world monetary and economic conference, which was held last year and was participated in by representatives of some sixty-four countries, the following resolution, which again emphasizes the necessity of independent central banks, was passed:

The conference considers it essential in order to provide an international gold standard with the necessary mechanism for satisfactory working, that independent central banks, with the requisite powers and freedom to carry out an appropriate currency and credit policy, should be created in such developed countries as have not at present an adequate central banking institution.

The hon. member for Macleod and his associates have quoted very frequently certain conclusions of the Macmillan Committee on Finance and Industry which was set up in the United Kingdom. No doubt the house is well aware that among the members of this committee were the Right Honourable Reginald McKenna, Professor J. M. Keynes, and Professor T. E. Gregory. These gentlemen are frequently cited as authorities by hon. gentlemen opposite. Paragraph 33 of the report of this committee, which appears on page 17, reads:

In the sphere of central bank legislation two tendencies may be observed. The first concerns the degree of elaboration of the constitutional code by which the bank is to be governed. There are what may be called the British and continental traditions in these matters: The first leaving the bank much more free to develop its constitution in accordance with changing circumstances, and limiting the degree of state interference to a minimum; the second regulating machinery in detail, emphasizing the subordination of the bank to the organs of the state, and admitting some, in certain cases much, state participation in the affairs of the bank itself. Such detailed regulation is explicable in many cases on the ground that the bank has been set up in an environment generally favourable to state paternalism or under circumstances, such as a disorganization of the currency, which made detailed regulation appear advisable. Nevertheless, rational consideration of the problem will show that a central bank which is able to adjust itself to new necessities and exigencies without requiring an amendment of its constitution or powers on every occasion when innovation is considered desirable possesses the inherent advantages which an elastic structure has over a rigid one.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

While it is true that the recommendations of the Canadian Macmillan commission with respect to the ownership of the capital stock were not unanimous, I think some respect must be paid to the recommendations of the two distinguished British members, not only because of their attainments and great ability but because of their wide experience and knowledge and the study they have given to this matter. I think I should quote paragraph 219 which will be found on page 65 of the report. It reads:

The functions discharged by a central bank being of such vital importance to the economic and financial life of a country, it is perhaps natural to ask whether they could not be adequately performed by some direct organ of government. It has in practice been found that a central bank can give most effective service to the community if it is free from the fear of interference for political ends in operating the delicate mechanism of the national monetary and financial machine. Certain statutory limitations have almost invariably been adopted in order to emphasize the national character of the bank. Thus, apart from the detailed provisions of the legislative act constituting a central bank, we may refer to the customary provision that the profits of the note issue should accrue, either directly or indirectly, to the state; that in most modern instances a limit is set to the profits which may be distributed to the shareholders; and lastly, that the state should have a final voice in the appointment of the governor and deputy governor and sometimes of certain of the directors. Within this legislative framework it has been found that there are preeminent advantages to the state in entrusting the special and highly technical functions of a central bank to a body not subject to the vicissitudes of political life.

If there may be said to be a leading authority upon central banks, I think that is to be found in the book entitled Central Banks by Sir Cecil H. Kisch and Mr. W. A. Elkin. It would well repay hon. members to read this book with some care. I should like to quote one or two short passages therefrom, as follows:

Monetary policy should be independent of political contingencies and the surest way to secure this result is to place the control of the note issue in the hands of a bank.

And again:

Central banks have more and more come to be looked upon as analogous to large public trusts and less and less as departments of state.

I should like to quote from another authority which should be of particular appeal to hon. gentlemen immediately opposite. During the sessions of the Liberal summer school at Port Hope last year, the only monetary expert from outside of Canada who was heard was Professor T. E. Gregory. I should like to quote from a memorandum which this gentleman wrote in 1930 as an addendum to the report from the select committee on the central reserve bank bill to the parliament of Australia. He said:

In discussing the form of government of a central bank, the first point which necessarily arises is the ownership of the bank. The present reaction against state-owned central banks finds its origin naturally in the difficulties to which central banks were exposed in the war and post-war period—difficulties to which most banks were subject, indeed, but which naturally are most acute when the state is the sole owner, because this means that the power of appointment is vested in political hands. That there exists in certain countries a strong political feeling in favour of state-owned banks cannot be denied, but the strength of that feeling can be modified if the following points are borne in mind and brought prominently before the public: (a) The inherent danger that a state-owned bank will under political pressure be made a mere instrumentality of unsound finance; (b) The case for a government bank is obviously weakest where there is a broad capital market capable of providing all the initial capital required, and where there is a fund of banking and general business experience upon which the bank can draw for its executive personnel. This applies without doubt to all British dominions.

Now I wish to deal, not with all but with some of what I deem to be the more important objections in practice to the government ownership and operation of a central bank. The first danger, in my judgment, is the inescapable danger of political pressure, of partisan interference in the administration of the bank. As the Macmillan report indicates, it is vital to the effective working and operation of a bank of this character that not only should there not be the fact of, but also that there should be removed the very fear of, political interference with the operation of such a delicate and complicated piece of mechanism as a national monetary and financial machine; and that, because its operations are of such tremendous importance as affecting price levels and consequently the incomes of every individual citizen of the country.

To my mind—I say this with all deference—there is a deadly danger which I could illustrate by referring to the conditions that obtained in the year 1929, when the world was having that wild monetary jamboree. Admittedly it would be the function and the duty, and perhaps the main purpose of a central bank, to control a period of inflation such as took place during that time—to apply the brakes, to "mop up" all the loose credit, and to endeavour in every way possible, which would be open to a central bank, to restrict and curb the operations of such a period. There may be some day a government so ideal as to be prepared to consider solely the interests of the state and to forget party interests. But I doubt it. I believe governments will always be composed of human beings, and being human they will exhibit the frailties of human nature.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is not that true of bankers also?

Mr. RHODES: I should assume that even my hon. friend would accede to the truth of that statement, that bankers are human—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope so.

Mr. RHODES: —and that being so I do not see the force of his interjection. Now, let us assume that we had a central bank wholly state-owned and operated during that period, with an election four or five months in the offing. The government then would be placed in a most equivocal position. It would have its plain duty to the country to consider on the one hand, and on the other hand it would be looking to its political future; and I leave it to the judgment of the house what the decision would be under those circumstances. To my mind that is a vital objection to the complete operation and control of a central bank by a government which, I care not how well intentioned it may be, is bound to give heed to political considerations of a larger or a smaller character, to a greater or a lesser degree.

Furthermore, a bank controlled by the government would inevitably be subject to sectional pressure and influence, a pull and haul from different parts of the country for certain special consideration and treatment; and again I leave it to the judgment of the house what the result would be if a government were supported by a slender majority and a certain group, not necessarily my hon. friends opposite and to the right, but any party, came to the government and said, "If you don't do thus and so as a matter of monetary policy we will vote you out of office." What would happen then? I do not need to elaborate on the danger of the position I have just indicated; all I have to do is to point it out.

There is another vital objection to complete governmental operation and control of a central bank, and that lies in the danger of lack of continuity of policy. I do not think I need labour that point except to say this: first, that continuity of policy is necessary because, in the operation of any credit or financial institution, the confidence of the public is absolutely essential to success, and that confidence is more than apt to be lacking if there creeps in political management or political interference with policy, with frequent changes as a result of political influence. In the second place, I think we shall all agree that one of the major functions to be performed by a central bank is to control the total volume of credit and currency with a view to achieving a greater measure of stability in our economic life, and more specifically with a view to smoothing out as far as may be possible, by means of monetary action, both short run and long run fluctuations in the general level of commodity prices, which have been a serious difficulty if not indeed the curse of our modern system of free economic enterprise.

Now, there is one other objection. I know that many hon. gentlemen will not agree with me, but I wish to say with all the seriousness at my command that it is my firm conviction that we cannot successfully operate a government central bank in Canada which is subject to patronage. Why did parliament divest itself as it did and hon. members divest themselves of the right to make political appointments in the public service, many of them of an important and some of a minor character? It was because there was an appreciation of the evils inherent in the system of patronage. I can speak with some little experience upon this point not only because of the number of years that I have been in public life, but also because I think I could fill a bushel basket with the numbers of letters from individuals and their uncles and sisters and cousins and aunts with respect to persons who seek employment in the new central bank of Canada. I already have, I think, applications sufficient to staff at least two dozen very large institutions of that character, to say nothing of letters from people who want to sell real estate, to furnish supplies, to rent buildings and whatnot. I have replied to every one of those individuals, no matter how deserving they might be, and how much I might wish to be of service to some whom I knew, in every case the same, that their applications will be placed before the management of the central bank when it is established and their chances of selection will depend entirely upon the judgment of the management. In my opinion there would be no surer method of killing or at least of crippling the central bank to such an extent as to render it useless as the exercise of patronage in appointments to its personnel, because I know of no other institution where men and women must be selected solely upon the basis of their fitness, qualifications, integrity and ability to give service apart altogether from political considerations whether they be of a personal or party character.

Mr. SPENCER: Does that argument apply to appointments of deputy ministers by the government?

Mr. RHODES: It may in degree, but I would answer my hon. friend by saying this, that I venture to think any government worthy of the name, whether it would be this one or any other, or a government of which my hon. friend was a member, would have to select men solely for their fitness for the post, and I venture to prophesy that no appointments will be made of deputy governors or governors except of individuals who have not applied for them; in other words, the government will seek the man and the man will not get the job because he has sought it.

Mr. SPENCER: I did not mean the deputy governors of the bank; I meant the usual practice of the government in appointing deputies to the different departments of the public service.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend means deputy ministers. If he wants to carry the argument to that length, he might very well say that members of the judiciary are partisan because they are appointed by the government. There must be some reasonable measure of discretion in dealing with the question of patronage and it should not be carried to the lengths my hon. friend is suggesting, The government might select for a high post in the judiciary a man who has held marked political leanings, but I have never heard it suggested, and certainly I have known of no instances in practice, that when his appointment has been made, that man has not brought dignity to the bench, certainly in the majority of cases, and has shed his political partisanship.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that also true of bankers?

Mr. SPEAKER: An hon. member should not interrupt a member who is addressing the chair.

Mr. RHODES: Not only do I believe bankers are human, but I really think some bankers are honest. This statement may surprise my hon. friend, but I think in Canada he will find just as high a degree of honesty, integrity and probity amongst members of the banking profession as amongst any other group of people of whom I have knowledge.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister did not catch my point. My suggestion was that if the bankers were appointed by the government, would they not then exercise independence just as the judges, I believe, exercise independence, and not be subject absolutely to the whims of whatever political party might be in power.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must surely know that when I was talking about patronage in the matter of appointments I had no reference to and I had not the slightest idea of discussing appointments of governors or deputy governors. That was not what I had in mind, and my hon. friend should know that. I was referring to clerks and employees, the purchase of supplies and printing, the securing and location of premises; where credit should be extended, and a thousand and one other things. I know my hon. friend is more intelligent than his question would indicate.

There is another grave objection, and to my mind it is just as serious as some of the others which I have urged. In giving utterance to these objections I am not for a moment suggesting that I have exhausted the field; I am drawing to the attention of the house only some of the major ones. The objection to which I would now ask the house to give consideration is that which would arise out of incompatibility between the government as a borrower in the public markets and the government as a regulator of the volume of credit and currency. Canada this year has a heavy refunding program. What would be the attitude of the Minister of Finance or of a government confronted with a heavy program of refunding?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the possible, and indeed I almost feel like saying the probable, conflict of interest which would be bound to arise between the government, as the regulator of credit through the management of a government owned bank on the one hand, and its interests as a borrower upon the other. There is an incompatibility of interest here which cannot possibly be avoided. With a state owned central bank this fundamental incompatibility is inevitable. If the government is in control of the administration of money market policy it is bound to find itself in the equivocal position of being called upon to choose between two courses, one of which may be immediately convenient to itself and the other conducive to the ultimate interests of the country as a whole.

In its most extreme form this weakness or danger of public ownership is, in my judgment, illustrated by the case of a government which, unable or unwilling to finance itself by other methods, leans too heavily upon the central bank, forcing the latter to make excessive advances and usually bringing about financial disaster both for the bank and for the community. Historical instances of this, particularly in war time, are not uncommon. Kisch and Elkin, in their book on Central Banks, to which I made reference this afternoon, refer to two interesting illustrations in the history of Spain and France, and even at the risk of wearying the house I will quote one rather long paragraph from that work, illustrative of this point. They say:

> In the latter part of the last century the proceedings of the Bank of Spain were prejudiced by obligations imposed on it by the state, and even before the Spanish-American war it had only been by advances from the bank entailing currency expansion that the treasury was able on occasions to meet its engagements. The result was seen in a heavy depreciation of the exchanges and in the price of public stocks. Resolute efforts were required later to restore the position. Developments in France between 1923 and 1925 also offer a striking example of the same phenomena. The advances by the Bank of France to the treasury were limited by law, the maximum having been raised from time to time as appeared desirable. During the war and in the following years increases became frequently necessary as the purchasing power of the franc fell and the exigencies of the government increased, but even the enhanced power to borrow from the bank was insufficient to satisfy the needs of the government. Acting under government compulsion, the bank eventually exceeded the legal limit for advances to the treasury, and published balance sheets devised to hide the fact. When the situation was made public, in April, 1925, the Minister of Finance admitted that the legal limit had been exceeded by 1,200 million francs in December, 1923, and that by the following June the excess had increased to 2,325 million. Early in 1925 the excess rose to over 3,000 million francs. This had inevitably involved further issues of paper currency, with the result that the volume of notes in circulation rose to 43 milliard francs, although the maximum issue had been fixed in 1920 at 41 milliard francs. There can be no question that the power of the government to force increased loans from the Bank of France intensified the depreciation of the franc and contributed to the financial crisis that culminated in 1926. Such extreme abuses of government power are of course only possible when a country has ceased to be on a gold basis. As long as convertibility is maintained the worst evils resulting from government intervention in banking and currency control are avoided. Doubtless the governments which have laboriously dragged themselves out of the morass of inflation will not readily slip back; nevertheless, if the control of the operations of the central bank lies directly or indirectly with the government, it becomes fatally easy for the government to finance itself for a time by means of book entries and short loans from the bank, a course which is the first step towards currency depreciation and inconvertibility.

I have spoken from the viewpoint of the dangers inherent in government operation, but there are also objections to unrestricted private operation. I am quite ready to admit the evils of the principle of purely private ownership, but I should like to remind the house that the fundamental principle of all the banking legislation which the government has brought down this year is that, for the first time in this country, the control of currency and credit should be taken out of the hands of purely private institutions, that is to say, of private, profit-seeking corporations. No doubt there are others, but I think there are three main objections to the purely private ownership of a bank. If it is to have the sole right to issue and control legal tender paper currency it is felt that it would be inappropriate to give such right to an institution not owned by the state. Professor Gregory has stated the answer to this objection in a paragraph which is both succinct and forceful. He says:

> The fact that the central bank ought to be State owned because of the right to issue and control the currency is deficient, in so far as it neglects to prove that the state ought not, in its own interest, to delegate these powers. Granted that the power to issue and control currency is a matter of prerogative, it is still open to question as to what is the best instrumentality for this purpose. The state has the power to determine what is the best instrumentality, but it does not in the least follow that a state bank is the best instrumentality. Indeed, all experience goes in the contrary direction. The terms upon which the state ought to delegate its powers ought to be such as to allow the management of credit conditions to be undertaken with the least danger of abuse. What those terms are can best be gathered from economic experience, and is a matter upon which political science can throw no light.

The second objection is based on the undesirability of allowing excessive profits to accrue to private shareholders, or indeed of allowing the profit motive to obtain at all. But it by no means follows that this motive shall prevail in the case of a privately owned institution, and we believe that in the measure now before the house we have guarded against that danger. In the bill it is provided that the maximum dividends payable upon the stock of the bank shall be 6 per cent, which would be an annual charge of $300,000. It will be recalled that in their recommendations the royal commission said the rate might be either 5 per cent or 6 per cent. If in the judgment of the committee or of the house it is deemed desirable to reduce that rate from 6 per cent to 5 per cent the government will be entirely in accord with such action being taken.

The final and perhaps the greatest objection which can be lodged against private management is that the bank might be dominated by bankers and their interests or by other financial interests. In the measure before the house we believe we have absolutely safeguarded against that danger.

In the remarks I have already made I have on the one hand dealt with the objections to public ownership and on the other with the objections to uncontrolled private ownership. It is our belief however that there is a happy medium, a middle course which may be adopted with the greatest degree of advantage. It by no means follows that we should go either to one extreme or to the other. We should free ourselves on the one hand from the evils of political interference and on the other from the danger of control by selfish private interests or management on the basis of the search for private profits. In this connection I would direct the attention of hon. members to the safeguards we have provided in the measure.

First, the shares of the Bank of Canada cannot be held directly or indirectly by a bank or by any bank director, officer or employee. It is believed that adequate power has been provided to enforce these prohibitions. I may add further that if amendments can be suggested which will provide further safeguards in respect of the matters dealt with in these provisions, they will be entertained without any equivocation so far as the government is concerned.

The second factor is that the amount of stock which any individual may hold is limited to fifty shares, representing a total investment of $5,000. This, it is believed, will ensure a wide distribution of stock ownership, and the impossibility of the stock being controlled by any individual or group of individuals.

May I point out further that power is given to the Minister of Finance to exercise discretion in the matter of the distribution of stock, and may I say that if I am the one who has to deal with the allotment—and any responsible minister occupying this portfolio would, I am sure, deal with it in the same way—it will be my endeavour to see that the stock is distributed among individuals and throughout the country as widely as possible

Mr. BOURASSA: Would the minister permit a question on this point? So far as I understand him, he reserves to himself, as Minister of Finance, the right to control the allocation of shares. Would that go the length of controlling the individual subscriptions, or simply the apportionment of the amount of each subscription?

Mr. RHODES: I do not think it would go to the extent of discriminating as against individuals, but it would have to do with giving favour to the smaller subscriber, and where there was oversubscription the scaling down of subscriptions would be upon a basis which would make for the largest number of subscribers and the widest possible distribution.

Mr. BOURASSA: I should not like to be disagreeable, but in order to help the minister make the point clear may I ask this further question: Suppose some corporation had twenty or possibly fifty different persons each subscribing small amounts, what degree of control could the minister exercise over such collective subscriptions, which would be tantamount to one large subscription?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will be the first to admit that no measure or no precaution can avoid a possible odd abuse. But I would say this, that in the first instance the provisions of the measure guard against ownership of the stock by banks or those who hold stock, as individuals, indirectly for the banks. Furthermore anything in the nature of a concerted move of that kind would be bound to be disclosed. At all events, I am sure there would be a most careful scanning of the subscription lists to avoid, if possible, the arising of just such a contingency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the list be made public?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, the list of shareholders, and their holdings, would be made public. The criticism might be urged that those shareholders who lived near the great centres, such as Montreal, Toronto and the eastern section generally, would have an advantage in group action as compared with the smaller shareholders who live in the more distant portions of the country. To guard against any danger in that respect an unique provision in this measure has been provided whereby the individual must give his proxy to the Minister of Finance. It goes beyond the usual method, which obtains in most companies, of giving a proxy to an individual who is, as a rule, designated by the corporation or by the board of directors, inasmuch as it provides that the individual in giving his proxy to the Minister of Finance may indicate to the minister the desire of the shareholder as to what method of treatment shall be accorded his vote, and the Minister of Finance will instruct the scrutineers in accordance with the wishes of the shareholder in question.

Mr. LUCAS: Will there be any supervision in connection with the allotment of these shares so far as the various parts of the country are concerned? My point is this: As the capital is limited, it might easily happen that unless there was some supervision over the allotment of shares, the central part of Canada might secure the total amount. In such circumstances there would be no shareholders in the outlying parts of the country.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member's question is eminently fair, and I would answer it in this way: While it would be impossible to make with exactness a territorial division, it will be the endeavour of the Minister of Finance to see not only that the shares are distributed as widely as possible, so far as individuals are concerned, but that they may be spread over as great an area of the country as possible, so that even the small subscriber in the most outlying portions will not be overlooked to his prejudice and to the advantage of those living nearer the large centres.

Another safeguard is that the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor are, in the first instance, to be appointed by the governor in council, and that thereafter when they are selected by the board of directors their appointment must be approved by the governor in council. Another provision which will have a beneficial effect in the matter of continuity of policy and assurance of the benefit of experience of those who have served as directors, is found in the provision for rotation.

The sixth provision is that all by-laws of the bank must be approved by governor in council, and when so approved such by-laws have the same force and effect as if enacted by an act of parliament.

The seventh provision is that the profits of the bank are definitely limited, and the private profit-seeking motive has been entirely eliminated.

In view of these provisions I believe it may be fairly said that ample safeguards have been erected against the dangers which some people fear may arise or exist in a bank owned by private shareholders. At the same time, we have avoided the evils which both logic and experience have revealed as appertaining to direct government ownership. In other words, we are setting up in Canada, to perform a most vital function, a new kind of organization, a quasi-public institution, which can best be defined as a public trust. It is the considered view of the government, I may add, that only by such form of institution can the Bank of Canada have its most likely chance of assured success.

In introducing this measure a question was submitted to me as to what would happen if there should arise a conflict of view between the management of the bank, on the one hand, and the government of the day on the other. I replied at that time:

> Unquestionably the authority of the governor and the board of directors of the bank would prevail.

In answer to a further question implying that this would mean the negation of responsible government in Canada, I replied:

> Well, Mr. Chairman, the authority and power of parliament is always supreme, and it is none the less supreme because of the fact that parliament, in its wisdom, may delegate a portion of its authority in this instance, as it has done in numerous other instances.

I believe that my answers were absolutely in accordance with the position. I do not think it is necessary for me to reaffirm the fact that parliament is always supreme, and if through an institution of this kind an abuse should arise it would always be open to parliament to correct it. Upon this point I should like to quote from the evidence given by Professor Gregory before the Royal Commission on Banking and Currency:

> The Chairman: Indeed, in emergency situations the government has to take drastic measures which may, I suppose, override the policy of the central bank.
> Mr. Gregory: I think that the history of European central banks in the last few years has rather tended to show that in moments of emergency the central bank is almost bound to be subordinated to wider considerations of national safety, national honour and other considerations of that kind.
> The Chairman: In its relation to the executive government of the country where it functions it must always occupy a subordinate position?
> Mr. Gregory: Subordinate but not necessarily dependent.
> The Chairman: I think the words are well chosen. Subordinate in that the ultimate executive responsibility for the country's policy lies with the government of the day, but the view you have stressed is that there ought to be an independent adviser, accessible to the government at all times, with a special fund of knowledge and able to give special authoritative advice.
> Mr. Gregory: Yes. I should like to formulate it in this way, that in the end, since the government of the day possesses sovereign legislative power, it must necessarily have the last word in disputes, if they unfortunately arise, between itself and any other agency whatever in the state.
> The Chairman: I agree.
> Mr. Gregory: But I would also urge that the fruitful functioning of a central bank depends upon the government or governments insisting upon objectives which are within the scope of the instrumentality which it has created. Furthermore nothing to my mind could be more fatal to the prestige of a central bank than constant interference with the details of its administration, or with its day to day operation of any policy whatever. I do not think any man with self respect is going to act as the office boy of the administration if he is going to carry out his work properly.

I have occupied more of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, than I had expected to take, and I regret very much that I have had to use so many quotations, but I felt that the importance of the measure warranted my doing so. I have only this last word to say, that the bill of necessity had to be introduced as a government measure. But that being so I hope that it will not in any sense develop into what might be termed a party or political measure. I do not for one moment assert that the bill is a perfect bill, but representing as it does long study and careful preparation I believe that it is a well balanced measure. We may improve it as we proceed in committee, but this one thing is sure, that it would be most unfortunate if an agency such as a central bank, which is fraught with such great possibilities of service to the people of this country, should be handicapped in its initial steps by having attached to it anything in the nature of party difference or acrimony. I do not say that by way of lecturing. I say it in all seriousness and without any desire to impute the slightest suggestion that there may be any party viewpoint attached to its launching. If we launch this bill along the lines we have indicated and it develops in the light of experience as we proceed that the measure can be improved, it will be open at all times to parliament to strengthen its provisions. We shall grow and gain with experience. I trust, therefore, that the bill will be considered on its merits and that it may be expedited in its passage to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the point of order which has been raised by the minister, I should like to ask a question, if I may, of the mover of this amendment, and that is what declaration of principle is there in the amendment that he has moved?

Mr. COOTE: I tried to make it clear when I spoke this afternoon that there was a vital principle contained in this bill and that was the principle of private ownership, the turning over to a privately owned bank of the right to issue legal tender in Canada, a right that has been exercised by parliament for the last sixty odd years. It seems to me that nearly everybody in the house is agreed on the subject of a central bank, but there is this vital principle involved: Is the central bank to be the bank of Canada or a private bank? I do not know whether I have made myself clear to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is speaking about the bill; I am speaking of his amendment. What is the declaration of principle in the amendment? That is what I should like to know. So far as the bill is concerned it has been made perfectly clear by the ministry, and the official opposition so regard it, that the only principle in the bill is the principle of the incorporation of a central bank. But my hon. friend has moved an amendment, and as I read it I cannot see any declaration of principle in it at all except the declaration that this bill shall not be given second reading. That is what the amendment says, that the bill shall not be proceeded with, but that the government should further consider. There is another statement which is equivalent to saying that the government shall go on considering whether they shall reintroduce it once it is thrown out. There is no declaration of principle in the amendment that I see. If there is I ask the hon. member to explain what it is.

Mr. COOTE: With the permission of the house, which I must have in order to answer, the amendment asks that the government shall give further consideration to the question of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank shall be owned by the government, and that the governor and directors of the bank shall be appointed by the governor in council. We are asking the government to provide for public ownership before they proceed with the bill. We have to use what might be called roundabout language, because if we specifically asked that the ownership of the stock be vested in the government the amendment would be declared out of order on the ground that the motion called for the expenditure of public funds. So in order to come within what I might call diplomatic language we are requesting the government to give consideration to this question.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): May I intervene between my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Coote)? I think the point of order raised is well taken. My hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) puts us in this position: Either to vote against his amendment, which would make us appear as being opposed to the principle of public ownership, or to vote with him and thereby prevent the second reading of the bill, which would mean that we did not want the establishment of a central bank. Surely my hon. friends do not want that. May I suggest that the only proper method in which my hon. friends to my left can express their view as being in favour of the establishment of a central bank is, first, to vote for the second reading of this bill. I assume that most hon. members of the house are in favour of the establishment of a central bank. That is all we would be voting for at the present time. The principle of a bill is usually expressed in the preamble. Now, in the preamble of this bill, there is not one single word, or the slightest intimation, as to the character of the bank, as to whether it is to be a government owned or a privately owned institution, under the control of the government. Let me suggest a remedy to my hon. friends. After we have voted for the second reading and when the bill comes back from the committee, they would have the right and, according to their views, the duty to ask the house to refer the bill back to the committee in order that there shall be introduced the principle which they desire to introduce. They can ask that a clause be inserted to the effect that the bank shall be publicly owned instead of the clause which provides for private ownership. From my little experience of parliamentary procedure I think this is the only manner in which a clause in this bill can be changed.

I had not expected to take part in this debate. I did not bring down my notes; but now that I am on my feet I shall express some of my views on the matter. I have studied this question for several months, not to say years. I have read more than once the report of the commission. I have consulted men of the money trade—all this, in an effort to enlighten myself, but I am afraid that the more I have read and the more I have consulted, the more doubtful I have become. Nevertheless, for the one reason given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), although somewhat late in his political career, I am in favour of the establishment of a central bank. Such an organization seems necessary to carry on our international relations in financial and commercial matters. After many years, the Prime Minister found out that which men who are not in business knew already: that Canada is really at the mercy of either London or New York in its dealings, not only with foreign governments, not only with central banks abroad, but in all its commercial dealings with foreigners. The Canadian banker, the Canadian exporter and the Canadian importer are all practically at the mercy of the bankers of London or of Wall street. This is my main reason for voting in favour of the second reading of this bill. We should have the means of helping ourselves, not in antagonism to American or English finance, but on a ground of approach which may put us on a footing of equality with the bankers of the British Empire, the bankers of the great republic to the south and the bankers of the world at large. This one object is worthy of our attention and approval; and for that reason I am entirely in favour of the second reading of this bill, as are, I am sure, my hon. friends to my left. There should be no division of opinion as to the principle of the bill as contained in the preamble. The second reading simply means that the House of Commons of Canada has decided to establish a central bank.

I shall not endeavour to enter into a discussion of the details of the bill. It will come back to us after passing through the scrutiny of the committee; and we then will be either enlightened, or perhaps more puzzled than ever, by the findings of the committee and the further evidence brought before it. I am not prepared to-night to pronounce myself either for or against public ownership. In principle and theory, a central bank, the object of which is to control the issue of currency, credit and foreign exchange for the benefit of Canada at large, for the benefit of the federal treasury and the various provincial exchequers, for the benefit of all Canadians, consuming, exporting and importing, should be a public institution. This should be a department of state, just as the defence of the land is in the hands of government, just as the making and the application of laws remain in the hands of public powers, either federal or provincial, according to their respective jurisdictions. In theory, it seems to me uncontrovertible that this bank should be a public institution. But in this respect, as in many other instances, I find myself again more British in my tendencies and tradition than a large and growing number of my fellow citizens and fellow members of English origin. I do not believe in theories applied rigidly. Actual and concrete circumstances must always be considered, and also, the characteristics or the shortcomings, if you like, of a people, of a civilization or of a form of government. I am afraid that with the spirit now prevailing in this country, to exploit the public treasuries, federal, provincial and municipal, and to expect from governments and their various departments a remedy to all evils, a publicly owned and publicly operated bank would be at the mercy of those people who expect to get all the money they want or desire. The administrative body at the head of the bank would be subject to all influences, political, industrial, financial and commercial, to a larger degree than a body of individuals having a relatively small private interest in an institution remaining under the authority that has constituted it, the parliament and the government. On the whole, in practice, it will give us a greater guarantee of good administration than would be the case with a government operated bank. Under different circumstances, after some years of experience, after the people of Canada have grown wiser, when they have recovered some of the self-confidence they had in the past, and retraced their steps on the wrong path they have followed, ever since the war, of looking to governments for everything, then it might become possible and might be desirable to change the constitution of that bank and make it a full fledged, publicly owned institution. That is all I have to say in that regard at present; and for that reason at least, unless something new develops, which I do not expect, I could not support my friends in their amendment, apart from the objection I mentioned a moment ago.

On the other hand, may I avail myself of my old age, of my long experience in public affairs in Canada, and fair knowledge of public matters in some other countries—France, England and the United States especially, and I might add as well Italy, Switzerland and Belgium—to say that I would not put too much emphasis on the statement made so eloquently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), with regard to the exercise of authority by parliament. We know in practice what the authority of parliament means, once a body of this importance is created; we know that the authority of parliament remains largely theoretical. Look at the railway commission; look at the new body instituted last year—and of this I speak freely, because I voted with the government and with the Minister of Railways. But every time a casual question is put to the minister, with regard to any matter, large or small, relating to railways, he gets up and says, if I may put words into his mouth: "Although I am the Minister of Railways I have nothing to do with railways; I have no control." I am afraid that to a certain extent the authority of parliament and of the government over the new bank will be something akin to the authority of the Minister of Railways over the Canadian National railway system; though it must be admitted that there are a few points in this bill which invite, nay, force the Minister of Finance to interfere, first, in regard to the constitution, and then in the working of the bank.

I put a couple of questions to the minister with regard to shares, and he answered very courteously, as usual. It seems to me that a good deal of care must be exercised in that regard. My hon. friend said that it would be difficult to scrutinize the personality of each subscriber; nevertheless, more care should be taken than usual. The names of all subscribers should be well known. The circumstances surrounding their subscription could be easily ascertained by representatives of the government in the various centres in which the subscription lists will be opened. Not only should the list of subscribers be published after their subscription had been accepted, but, like banns of marriage, they should be published beforehand, so that if anyone feels that eight or ten or twenty subscribers on the list, in the city of Montreal for example, or in Toronto, or in Winnipeg, are likely to be disguised representatives of some private bank or some other concern, then the minister will have ample time to make inquiry before the certificates are delivered to the subscribers in question.

With regard to the powers of the bank and its reserve, I have a single observation to make. I congratulate the minister on having taken one precaution which he indicated on the first reading—he may have repeated it this afternoon; I was not here. In the Macmillan report, there was a recommendation which struck me at once as extremely dangerous, as capable of defeating the main object which I mentioned a moment ago, namely, that through the central bank we should make ourselves, as far as a small and indebted nation can be, masters of our finances. I am referring to the recommendation that, among the powers of the bank, the directors might at their will dispose of any portion or all of the gold reserve, and exchange it for foreign securities. That power would be extremely dangerous. I understand that the bill remedies it; but I hope it will be made quite clear that if the directors should in any way, directly or indirectly, try to evade their responsibility in this regard, they will be liable to the severest penalties that can be imposed. From my point of view it would be the gravest breach of faith with the people of Canada that that body could commit. What would it mean? What would it mean in times of stress such as we have passed through, since the war as well as during the war itself?—I hope no such event will occur again—but what would be the significance of the suggestion contained in the Macmillan report? The directors of our bank could at a particular moment transfer all our gold to London, New York or Paris for whatever purpose they chose, taking in exchange foreign values, good, bad or mediocre.

Now, we know what role the great central banks play, very beneficent at times, a great safeguard for the governments of the countries in which they function, under some degree of state control. But we know also that foreign governments make use of these central banks for political purposes. We know the glorious but tremendous role which the Bank of England and the Bank of France have played in international affairs, both in peace and in war. If the safeguard which the minister has introduced is not made absolutely imperative, if it is not guaranteed in such a way that it cannot be evaded, nothing could prevent at any particular moment the governor and the board of directors—I forget the proper designation of the Bank of England—

Mr. BENNETT: It is the court of the bank.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, the court of the Bank of England or the regents of the Bank of France—nothing, I say, could prevent them from making a private arrangement with our central bank to draw our gold to Paris or London, giving us paper in exchange, paper which might be valuable or valueless but which undoubtedly, in the mind of the French or of the English government, would have for its object to tie us financially and politically to any policy they might pursue. That was done before the war: it was done during the war, and it is being done now, in London as well as in Paris, in Berlin as well as in Rome. Well, situated as we are, being, as the Prime Minister has so well said, an immense country with a small population and with a tremendous debt, we should make the directors or governors of this bank understand that their role is not to play the game of international finance in connection with international politics, but to play the role we assign to them: to be the guardians of Canada's credit, federal and provincial; to see that no province by its extravagances endangers not only its own credit but that of the rest of Canada. One province in bankruptcy means the shaking of the credit of all the other provinces and of the dominion as well. The bankruptcy of such a large city as Montreal or Winnipeg would not only endanger the credit of Quebec or Manitoba, but react upon the credit of Canada. The main duty we expect from the governor and directors of the bank is to see with a clear eye and to make use of a firm hand to give justice to all. Any undue favour to one or two or three municipalities or provinces at the expense of the credit of Canada, would be an injustice to all, including that province or that municipality receiving such undue favour; because it is not doing a favour to a debtor on the verge of bankruptcy to entertain him in that state; better wipe off or reduce his debt; better make the operation, cruel as it may be at the moment, than to let the canker worm penetrate through the whole body of the nation, and thereby endanger our national credit.

I have spoken at much greater length than I intended, but I hope in the committee those few points will be considered. I hope that the governor and directors of the bank will be paralyzed, so to speak, in the matter of political finance, internal or international; that they will be given ample power, first, to deal with international finance having for its sole object the maintenance, as much as possible, of the currency of our country in proportion to the currency of the countries with which we deal, France if you like, but especially the United States and England; second, to help as much as possible the exchange of trade between Canada and the various countries which are likely to be interested in trading with us, not only for a short time but for a long period; and third, to endeavour if possible to reestablish on a proper footing the whole credit of Canada, federal, provincial, municipal and corporative, so that we may look in the future to some years of sound finance, sound production, fairly distributed consumption; or, in other words, so that some degree of social and economic justice will result from the application of this bill when it becomes law. I will therefore vote for its second reading with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been raised as to the amendment and I am prepared to deal with it. Does any hon. member wish to speak to the point of order. If not, the motion is that the bill be now read a second time, and it is moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine):

> That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "In the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to the matter of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank should be owned by the government and that the governor and directors of said bank should be appointed by the governor in council."

As I was not in the chair when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) began his remarks taking exception to the amendment on the ground that it is not in order, I have read the transcript of his statement, those of other members and the authorities cited, and have heard the arguments just concluded.

Standing order No. 1 of this house provides that:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this house.

There seems to be no standing order of this house governing this case and consequently we must follow the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom. For this I refer to May, thirteenth edition, at page 391, dealing with amendments proposed to the motion that a bill be read a second time. May says:

> Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the bill.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod does deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved in that it provides that stock in the bank should be owned by the government, whereas the bill by section 16 provides that the stock shall be allotted to the public with certain restrictions in regard to chartered banks and foreigners. The amendment proposes that the governor and directors should be appointed by the governor in council, whereas the bill by sections 8 and 9 provides that the directors be appointed by the shareholders. This is an amendment which may be moved in committee and not such an amendment as can be moved on a motion to read the bill a second time. Further, the amendment attaches conditions to the second reading of the bill in that it calls for further consideration of the matter set forth in the amendment before the bill is given second reading. I therefore consider the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the house has listened with interest this afternoon and evening to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the second reading of this very important bill to create a central bank of Canada. The minister has indicated that the house should cooperate with him and the government by making suggestions how we may, if possible, improve the various sections constituting the bill, and I hope anything that I may say to the house may be taken by the minister and the government as being in the nature of constructive criticism.

I propose to discuss the measure not as an expert in banking or finance, but from the point of view of the average citizen, to ascertain whether in the setting up of this corporate entity through which the very foundation of our national credit structure is to be controlled, we have given it the powers by which it may become an effective force nationally and internationally. If I should ask the house to-day what is Canada's greatest need, I think I could sum it up in one word—trade. Slowly recovering from the madness of economic nationalism which beset almost every country including our own, the world is gradually realizing once again the need for world trade. Leading economists have been outspoken in the matter and I quote but one, Sir Arthur Salter, an economist whose words have frequently been quoted in this house on other matters. Sir Arthur Salter on October, 1932, had this to say:

> Further development of world organization lies between greater freedom of trade and intercourse between nations and large economic units Not more in the way of isolation.
> The former will help to remedy currency and price situation in a normal way; the latter would aggravate that situation and bring certain nations to bankruptcy. The former would lead to peace and progress; the latter almost certainly to civil and international strife. The world is the only real economic unit.

Even this government, with its progressive nationalism and the introduction of policies which have helped to reduce the trade of Canada by almost two-thirds since they came into power in 1930, recognized this fact when they set up the commission on banking and currency. In the order of reference, P.C. 1562, we find the following:

> That it is also advisable to consider whether and in what respects the banking institutions and the monetary system of Canada may be modified, extended or developed for the purpose of facilitating intra-imperial and international cooperation in public policies designed to promote the revival of domestic and foreign trade and enterprise and the general increase of employment and to ensure a greater measure of stability in respect thereto.

Lord Macmillan recognized trade as one of the most important services that could be rendered by the central bank. At page 63 of the same report he said:

> The services which a central bank may perform in the international sphere are even less easily dispensed with in the modern world than those which it can render within the borders of a state. Whatever changes may occur in the volume of international trade and the comparative positions of various countries, there has never been a time when external financial inter-relationships have assumed more importance than in the last decade. The reason for international monetary cooperation is urgent and constant.

Again in section 164 of the same report we find the following:

> Canada presents a number of prominent economic characteristics which determine the special nature of her financial problems. These characteristics are mainly:
> 1. Excess production in relation to population;
> 2. Dependence on international trade;

In paragraph 166 we find this statement:

> Within her borders are immense and varied natural resources. The exploitation of these resources by an active and enterprising people has led to an output of commodities of many kinds greatly in excess of the consuming power of the existing population.
> 167. In order to dispose of this surplus, Canada has necessarily to find markets abroad for a considerable proportion of her production.

I need scarcely say here, because I do not wish to get into anything controversial, that the liberation of external trade has been and ever will be, I hope, one of the chief planks in the platform of the Liberal party. If liberation of external trade is one of our greatest needs and under this act we are marshalling the resources of the nation into one corporate body, what powers are we giving to that body in order that it may perform this very important function? I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to section 20 of the bill, under which the business and powers of the bank are set out. I think that in respect of those functions which I have just outlined we are indeed falling far short. I shall read only clauses (e) and (f) of subsection 1 of section 20:

> (e) buy and sell short term securities issued by the United Kingdom, any British dominion, the United States of America, or France, having a maturity not exceeding six months from the date of acquisition by the bank;

(f) buy and sell securities issued by the United Kingdom or the United States of America, having a maturity exceeding six months from the date of acquisition by the bank, but the bank shall at no time hold such securities in excess of one-half of the amount of the paid up capital of the bank;

What are we doing? I submit that at the very outset in the creation of this central bank we are tying the hands of the board of directors by limiting the securities in which they can deal. I have only to point out that in short term securities they are limited to those of the United Kingdom, the dominions, the United States and France and that in the long term securities they are limited to the United Kingdom and the United States, cutting out the long term securities even of our own sister dominions. Are we to stop there? Are we to tie the hands of the board and say that they shall not encourage trade with whatever country it may be good business to trade with? Where are we to look for our increased markets? First I suggest that we should look to those countries which are becoming increasingly good customers. I find that Japan is running a close second to France in that regard. France buys from us $17,000,000 worth of goods, Japan buys $16,000,000 worth and Belgium buys $14,000,000 worth, in round figures. On the other hand our imports from France amount to $13,000,000, from Japan to $6,000,000 and from Belgium to $5,000,000. So I think we should encourage trade with these latter two countries.

Then, Mr. Speaker, what about developing trade with the South American countries? When England sought new markets where did she turn? She turned to the Argentine and financed industry and agriculture there, and as a result England has developed a trade with that country of which Canada is rightfully jealous. Let us look at our trade with two countries in South America, Colombia and Peru. Our imports from the small country of Colombia total about $5,000,000; she stands tenth in the list of countries from which we import, but she stands thirty-eighth in the list of countries to which we export. Should we encourage trade with Colombia? This bill does not do so. Peru stands seventeenth in the list of countries from which we import and thirty-fifth in the list of countries to which we export. Should we encourage trade with Peru? In my opinion, in tying the hands of the board we will not encourage such trade. These countries have become world minded; we have large investments of capital in them. Someone may say it is private capital, but after all the investment of private capital is made possible through the shares held by Canadians. So I think we should continue the friendly relations we have established with these two countries by virtue of our investments and if possible increase our exports to them. It may be said that financial conditions make this impossible at the present time, but my reply is that by this bill we are building for to-day and forgetting to-morrow. We are tying the hands of the board, as I have said, and I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can that the past is gone; the present is here. Let us build for the future on the facts of to-day and the hopes of to-morrow. If the bank that we have set up and constituted is to play its part in the economic life of the nation; if internally we are to have relief from the unemployment burden which bears so heavily upon us, then I say that this bank should be in a position to treat with, to work out arrangements with and to encourage trade with whatever country it considers it good business for the nation to deal with.

If, on the one hand, we have been restricting too greatly, on the other hand in my opinion we have under this same section of the bill been too liberal. Under clause (j) of section 20 we are to continue the policy of governmental paternalism to the provinces. Clause (j) is as follows:

Make loans or advances to the Dominion government or the government of any province on the pledge or hypothecation of readily marketable securities issued or guaranted by the Dominion of Canada or any province.

Let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the expression "readily marketable security." If those securities are to be readily marketable, then let the provinces carry out the power that was vested in them by the founders of this confederation through the terms of the British North America Act, of which every province is so proud when we meet in interprovincial conferences, and which they always place before any federal government as a stumbling block to any remedial legislation which may be suggested by it. Let them carry out that power which was vested in them under section 92 of the British North America Act, namely that of borrowing money on the sole credit of the province. If securities are readily marketable what is the need of a central bank in connection with any of the securities they may have? They do not need a central bank; as is their power, they may go on the market. In spite of what the minister has said this afternoon, cannot hon. members imagine what pressure will be brought to bear both directly and indirectly in the purchase of those securities? Does anybody doubt that if this measure as at present constituted becomes law the central bank will become the banker of the provinces? In a return brought down only a few weeks ago upon the request of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) we find facts which are somewhat startling. The return shows loans made by this government to the provinces during the last three years. The figures show that in that period Manitoba received $8,000,000. Saskatchewan, $23,000,000, Alberta, $8,000,000 and British Columbia, $7,000,000. I have given only round figures. I frankly admit and quite realize the position in which the government was placed with respect to assisting for relief measures, but I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that $7,000,000 was loaned to the province of Saskatchewan for the purposes of general administration.

Mr. BOWMAN: Does the hon. member object to those loans?

Mr. GRAY: I certainly object to that one, namely the loan for general administration purposes.

Mr. BOWMAN: What about the rest of them?

Mr. GRAY: I do not except from this statement my own province of Ontario. In that province to-day some municipalities are defaulting, commissions are being set up by the provincial government to supervise municipal affairs, at a time when the provincial burden of debt is weighing heavily upon the taxpayers. I say that it is time that the provinces, individually, put their houses in order. It is time that, if possible, in every case they were doing their own financing; it is time they realized that they must pay as they go. If not, and this subsection remains, may I repeat that I fear whether the bank is privately or publicly owned we will make of it a political institution for the support of political friends.

The purpose of the central bank is the handling of credit for the benefit of production and distribution, rather than the earning of excess profits. How can control be exercised over drastic fluctuations in our commodity price structure in such a way as to ensure stability? It can be done only in this way, Mr. Speaker, namely by the government being able to appoint as governor of the central bank a man with the proper perspective of conditions internal and external, in order that he may determine just where the cleavage begins between sound banking and the avaricious manipulations of monetary and currency credits of profit making financial institutions. Where are we to find a man to fill this position? I hope to show in a moment or two that if we permit this legislation as at present framed to become law we may be setting up a virtual dictator.

Before turning to that point, however, may I refer hon. members to clause 6 of the bill describing those men who would be qualified and those who would be disqualified for appointment. In the first place, the governor and deputy governor must be men of proven banking experience, and each shall devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office. I have no complaint as to that. I point out again, however, that he shall be a man of proven banking experience, and that he must devote his whole time to his office. Then, in clauses (a), (b), (c), and (d), disqualifications are outlined. The first is that he shall be a British subject, and second that he shall not be a member of either houses of parliament or of a provincial legislature. Mr. Speaker, I protest that it is becoming a popular pastime of late for commissions—and even the government, if we recall the tariff board bill—to reflect upon the integrity and policy of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. If the officials to whom I have referred, are to devote their whole time to their work, of course a member of either house could not act. But, as I shall demonstrate in a moment or two, that is an absurd supposition when we are speaking of bank directors. If a necessary qualification is that a person's whole time shall be devoted to his work, then that person could not be a member of the House of Commons or the Senate. I say to you, sir, that men of ability might easily be found in either house of parliament and, as I said before, I protest against the inclusion of this particular subsection.

Then, turning to clause (d) I must ask the minister the definition of a "financial institution." We have indicated as being disqualified all those who may be directors, officers or employees of any bank or financial institution, or have interests as shareholders in any chartered banks or other financial institutions in Canada. What is a "financial institution"? Is an insurance company a financial institution? Apparently so, because Lord Macmillan so described them at page 29 of the report of the commission. Or are our large manufacturing institutions with heavy bonded indebtedness to be considered financial institutions? Again, we find the expression "or has an interest as shareholder in any chartered bank or other financial institution in Canada." May he be a shareholder or director of a financial institution in the United States? If he is a shareholder of a bank or a financial institution in Canada he is barred; is he barred if he is a shareholder or director of a bank or other financial institution in the United States? Where is our red-blooded Canadian?

An hon. MEMBER: He has just gone out.

Mr. GRAY: Is he barred if he is a shareholder or director of a bank or financial institution of the United Kingdom? In short, Mr. Speaker, are we to eliminate Canadians as the governor and deputy governor of this bank unless we accept retired or discharged bankers? I hope the minister will give earnest consideration, as my honoured leader said this afternoon, to the appointment of Canadians before adopting the alternative proposed under this bill of entrusting the finances of this nation to someone out of touch and out of harmony with business conditions in this dominion.

Let me look for a moment at section 7 of the bill. This is the section giving powers to the governor of the bank, and as we have it before us to-night these powers may mean virtually the setting up of a dictator. Are we to set up as we did under Bill A, which became the railway act, a man in whom vast power is centralized? Section 7 provides:

> The governor of the bank shall be the chief executive officer and shall on behalf of the board have the direction and control of the business of the bank, with authority to act in connection with the conduct of the business of the bank in all matters that are not by this act or by the by-laws of the bank specifically reserved to be done by the board or at a meeting of shareholders.

It is not enough that the by-laws should be made by the governor in council. In the creation of this corporate entity that is being set up, we as a parliament should know what the by-laws are and what powers are specifically reserved, but under the section as now drafted we do not know. From a casual reading the governor is given all the powers that could possibly be vested in one man. The safety valve, I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, in the business life of a nation is the fact that one man's mistakes are balanced by another man's wisdom. If we constitute this bank as the bill proposes I very much fear that a dictatorship will be the result. Distrust in the world to-day is due in large part to the concentration of power in the hands of small groups of individuals. The concentration of power, whether it be in the hands of the governor of the central bank or in any other institution, is inimical to the best interests not only of the people of Canada but of the peoples throughout the world.

Where are we to find this superman? Can we discover him out of the debauch of American finance? It is unthinkable. Can we decide between the two diametrically opposed schools of thought in England to-day, and pick our man from Lombard street? Can the government out of the morass of international finance pick a man capable of filling this position? Can we pick a man charged to manage the central bank and control the agricultural and industrial credit structure of this dominion in such a way as to ensure uniform and uninterrupted progress of production and distribution, and so that at no time will the individual or collective interests of the people be jeopardized either by unsound expansion or too greatly contracted credit. This is a momentous task that we are setting ourselves.

Let me give this note of warning. The soundness of the chartered banks in the dominion to-day has been maintained through the suffering of the Canadian people. How did they do it?

When the financial storm clouds broke, the octopus known as the Canadian chartered banks sucked through hypothecations and the powers given to them under section 88 the lifeblood of our people. The people of Canada did not find themselves in that position as a result of lack of business acumen on the part, for instance, of our hard-working agriculturists. It was not because of a lack of business ability on the part of our professional men that they found themselves sold out day after day by the managers of their banks. It was not even the aftermath of individual Canadian optimism. It was the disastrous result of taking the advice of bank presidents, bank directors, and bank managers, men whom we had been taught since our school days to look up to for guidance and advice in our financial and investment affairs. We have learned, Mr. Speaker, by painful results that there are no supermen.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not even in the government.

Mr. GRAY: This bill is being sent to the committee on banking and commerce and I should like to impress on the minds of the committee the need for so fortifying the administration of this controlling institution as to leave no doubt that the soundness and safety of the Canadian financial structure will be maintained. By this I mean that dictation or influence by our present privately owned chartered banks must be eliminated. Neither must this central institution be subjected directly or indirectly to the force of individuals or corporations from the outside. The Canadian central bank can serve a useful purpose, but it must be put in a position to serve the interests of the Canadian people as a whole nationally and internationally.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, referring to the speech of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gray), and who has expressed so forcefully the opinion that the present bankers should not have any control of the central bank, may I say to him now that it is my opinion that there is only one way to stop that, and that is by public ownership of the bank. If he knows of any other way to stop it, he failed to say what it was. Ten or fifteen or twenty years hence he or somebody else in the seat he now occupies will have to admit that what I am saying now is true, that your financiers, whether they be the present chartered bank owners or the bankers to be created by this legislation, will control the destiny of the financial life of Canada.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that we in this corner of the house have very greatly appreciated the force of the argument for private ownership put forward by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes)? May I also say that we very highly appreciated the fine spirit which he exhibited and the courtesy which he extended to us in the debate. We just as frankly say to him that while we heartily disagree with the principle of private ownership of the financial institutions of Canada, nevertheless we realize, of course, that the government is perfectly sincere in giving us this legislation. We frankly disagree with the private ownership of this bank and we advance our opinions just as the hon. minister himself advanced his.

May I at the outset, Mr. Speaker, say that this bill on the basis of private ownership is surprisingly good, and I question very much if hon. members of this house when it is considered in committee will find very many sections of the bill which they will be able very greatly to improve. Judging the central bank solely as a private institution, the government has presented us with a most excellent bill. I think it is revolutionary in one or two of its aspects. For instance I doubt whether there has ever been in the history of Canada a banking bill presented to parliament which was more against what the present bankers want. When I say that I realize fully that this bill contains even now too much of what bankers desire, but should not have.

This bill provides that we shall change from a gold basis where we redeem our notes in specie, to a bullion gold basis. It provides also that we shall reduce our gold reserve behind our notes to twenty-five per cent. It provides that this provision may be set aside temporarily by order in council or completely by parliament. The central bank is to control all gold and the profits therefrom are to go into the coffers of the state. The central bank is to issue all currency and to have some measure of control over credit. All of these things are excellent as far as they go, and indicate that there is a tendency towards the financial policies which have been advocated for at least twelve years from this corner of the house. I regret to say that it is only a tendency, although I congratulate the government on the distance it has gone. I must say that the bill is far from what I think it ought to be in matters of great importance, to which I shall refer in a few moments. However, the bill goes far enough to justify the policies which we have advocated for many years, and I do not think that the proposed legislation has come to where it is to-day without having encountered great resistance from certain quarters. There have been other governments in this country which either refused to face that resistance or did not realize that they ought to have faced it. The fact is that they did not. We needed a central bank at the last revision of the Bank Act eleven years ago just as badly as we need one now, but no member of the government at that time came forward to give us even a central bank even as good as the one proposed. I can remember that the Minister of Finance of that day contented himself with defending the position of the bankers and stating that the Finance Act as it existed in those days performed all the functions of a central bank and, therefore, such a bank was superfluous.

When the Minister of Finance was speaking this afternoon and when he spoke on the resolution upon which this legislation is based, he indicated that the mind of the government was open for suggestions for the improving of this legislation and would welcome constructive criticism. I accept that invitation just as frankly as it was given by the minister, and I want to make one or two observations. I must thank the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) for enlightening me as to the great difference between a principle proper and a principle in legislative parlance. I find that the principle of this bill is a central bank privately owned, to have absolute control over the financial policies of this country. I trust the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) will find out sooner or later that the principle of this bill is much greater than is to be found in the preamble.

After having stated my view on the private ownership of a central bank, I shall have something to say in regard to the gold standard principle which is accepted by this legislation and the implied absence of a change in our monetary policy sufficient to furnish purchasing power for the consumers. I am at a great loss to know why the government should have gone to such great pains to try to take power away from the hands of the present bankers and then to deliberately put it in the hands of a private corporation to be created by this bill. That is precisely what is being done. The powers that are given to central banks in general and to this one in particular are very great indeed. This bank will have the sole power of issuing all currency and will have a certain prescribed measure of control over the credit of the country. Having control of the issue of currency and having control of the credit, this central bank will have the power to determine the nature and exent of our national industrial system. It will have the power also to influence and probably to determine entirely what shall be our international policy. With the powers which this legislation places in its hands, this central bank will be able to make credit cheap or dear, scarce or abundant; it will have the power to supply credit to industries here and to withhold credit from industries there; it will have the power to cause or prevent industrial expansion at will. Controlling currency and credit as it does, this central bank will determine not only our national but our international policies. In addition, it is to have the right to advise the government and to make the government take that advice. It will have the power to make connections with central banks in other parts of the world and it is anticipated that it will connect with other countries in a great financial network of financial imperialism, the centre of which in all probability will be the bank of international settlements. It is unthinkable that such tremendous powers having such far-reaching effects upon the social, business, political and economic life of this country should be placed in the hands of a private institution.

Let me refer to the functions of this bank as specifically defined in paragraph 206 of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency. This reads:

> In the first place, from a national point of view, the central bank, within the limits imposed by law and by its capacities, should endeavour to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation and should so far as possible control and defend the external value of the national monetary unit. In the second place, from the international point of view, the central bank by wise and timely cooperation with similar institutions in other countries, should seek, so far as may lie within the scope of monetary action, to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of economic activity.

These are laudable objectives for a central bank, but I submit that they are entirely beyond the scope of a privately owned institution. These are prerogatives which belong specifically to government and should under no condition be delegated, even for a moment, to a private institution. Surely no one in this house will question for a moment that the government should control the credit of this country. The royal commission frankly recognized that principle in paragraph 207, which says:

> A central bank is at the same time an instrument and a force. As an instrument it is the means by which the state—which must necessarily retain ultimate sovereignty in matters affecting the currency—can give effect to the national policy.

That the power to control the national policy has passed from the state to the banking institution that is proposed, there can be no doubt. I asked the minister this question:

> Supposing the central bank was endeavouring to regulate the control of credit in Canada, and supposing the policy it adopted in order to do so was contrary to the policy of the government of the day, and they clashed, which authority would make the decision?

The minister replied:

> Unquestionably the authority of the governor and the board of directors of the bank would prevail.

Discussing his answer to my question tonight the minister went on to say that of course his answer presupposes that this parliament is always supreme. Yes; this parliament has been supreme in the same way for the last ten years. But who controlled the financial policy of this country? The chartered banks have controlled it, and the mere talk about the supremacy of parliament does not alter the facts of the matter; for the bankers, not only for the last ten years but for a great many more years, have had full control of the financial policy, the power having been delegated to them by this parliament, and I am not very much interested in the abstract question of the extent to which parliament has yielded its powers. I am not interested in that; I am interested in the fact that these powers, which properly belong to the government and to parliament, are being exercised by private institutions for their profit and to the detriment of the economic life of the dominion.

If this legislation is passed I hold that this government is yielding sovereignty in matters of financial control. True, this parliament may have the power to recapture that sovereignty; I am not questioning that. But I am saying that by delegating these powers we are practically yielding sovereignty in the matter of control of financial policy. And, if you please, we are to yield this power to a private institution because of a thing called political influence. Let me remind the minister and this house that it was the abuse of power by private bankers and by none other that has led to the great and universal agitation for public control of finance to-day. Let me offer an example or two of maladministration of finance, both in this and in other countries, by private banking during the last few years, to go no further back. Everyone will realize that the drastic deflation policy of the post-war period was a policy of the bankers, universally applied, entirely destructive in its influence upon the business and industry of every country where applied. That policy, followed for years, indicates the stupidity of bankers, the incapacity of bankers, an incapacity that was frankly acknowledged by the leader of the greatest central bank in the world, Sir Montagu Norman. I am just reminded that he was getting married at that time, and his vision ought to have been clearer then than at any other time.

Another example of the bankers' failure is this. Take the world's debt, which stands to-day at over four hundred billion gold dollars. Who devised the system by means of which that tremendous debt was pyramided? Private bankers. And who were the people who actually administered that system and made the loans represented by these debts? The private bankers. The private bankers of the world have made the greatest mess of the world's history, and we are in the middle of it now. And now we are going to start another group of private bankers and put into their hands the power to guide the financial destiny of Canada. Not only have the bankers been the greatest failure in history, accounting more than any other class for the present economic position of the world, but it is true to say that there is no class in this country in which the people have less faith in the handling of the financial situation than they have in the bankers at the present time.

It would appear that the government is aware of the incapacity and unpopularity of the bankers, from the manifest effort to exclude them from even holding shares in the central bank. Let me quote the minister in this regard—and here is a splendid principle, which I regret to say was forgotten in the drafting of the bill. When speaking on the resolution, commenting on one of the functions of the bank being to give expert advice to the government, the minister said:

> It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the exercise of these functions lies outside the power of any simple commercial institution or group of commercial institutions.

Now, this is what I want you to listen to particularly:

> No purely profit-making institution, operating in a competitive system, can afford to place social interest before its own in regard to credit policy.

Now, sir, that is truth; that is a statement of a great democratic and honest principle, and I regret to say that the minister has not followed it in the drafting of the legislation. But I would raise this question: Can the present bankers be excluded from holding shares in the central bank? I submit that they cannot, that there is no legislation which this government or anyone else can pass that would prevent them from getting control; and I propose to indicate how they will get it. Take the National Trust Company and the Montreal Trust Company; both are subsidiaries of banks in this country. These companies have 832 directorships in a number of business concerns, and in addition to that there are 183 companies in this country that have a president and directors on one of the big three banks in Canada. Now, these companies may buy shares in the central bank stock. So far as I know, there is nothing in the legislation which will prohibit individuals in these companies from doing so. So that such individuals, being already directors on one of the various banks of the country, will also have control of the stock and control of the directors of the central bank. That is only one way in which the bankers may overcome the legislation now before the house in so far as it tries to exclude them from holding shares in the central bank. The government however shows continued faith in private ownership, in creating a new group of private bankers. The minister admits the danger of this, and he thinks that safety lies in the limiting of profits. I quote him:

> Limitation of profits removes dangers inherent in private ownership.

He is referring to the private ownership of the Bank of Canada. Well, the answer to that is this, that so far as the central bank is concerned, if the shareholders are heavy holders of interest bearing securities, which in all probability they will be, they could very well afford to dispense entirely with profit on their central bank stock in exchange for the more lucrative possibilities of increasing the value of their securities. This they could do by controlling monetary policy through the central bank, and that is the real danger in the proposed act. The sincerity of the government notwithstanding, this profit-limiting provision amounts to throwing a sprat to catch a mackerel. Let us ask by what magic officials of private corporations supposedly become wiser and more virtuous as public servants than men and women who have been elected by the public and charged with the specific duty of giving the public service? In what is that extra wisdom or virtue to be found? Does it lie in the mere buying of a share of stock? Is it to be found in the fact of private ownership of a share of stock or where is the difference to be found?

Suppose, for instance, the government sell central bank stock to 50,000 Canadians and the directors and governor of the bank are elected as provided for in the bill. Does any one for a moment suppose that by that method we may feel assured that we shall get a wiser or more honest or able governor of that bank than we would if he were appointed by the Minister of Finance, or the governor in council, or the leader of the opposition, or any other gentleman who might be entrusted with the powers and duties which now devolve upon the present administration? I do not think anyone will actually say that we could expect to get a wiser or more virtuous governor of a bank by having him elected by 50,000 shareholders of a private corporation than if he were selected by the elected representatives of the Canadian people.

Political influence is the scarecrow in the name of which public ownerships is condemned. Frankly I do not pay much attention to that. I admit the argument of the Minister of Finance this afternoon was one which would blast all parliaments and all governments whatsoever; it had no other effect, for if we are to take him seriously—and I believe he meant that we should do so, because I believe he was speaking fervently and sincerely—then he is simply indicating in greater eloquence than he is aware of that this institution is bankrupt and the sooner we say so, the better. I regard this political influence story pretty much as a scarecrow, but if political influence is so bad that we cannot make our institutions honest and efficient, then let us cleanse out the bad influence, or stop the whole business, and start another kind of institution. Personally I think this is more or less old wives' fables. The Canadian people have a greater need to regret the influence of bankers over governments than to regret the influence of governments over the banks. I do not speak of the present government in that regard; I mean Canadian governments in general and at all times.

It is true that government appointees are suspect. Party strife in this country as in others sometimes has gone to unreasonable limits, and the people of Canada, being true democrats, have been inclined to believe what both sides said. One side blamed the other for being corrupt; the other blamed the first for being corrupt, and the people came to believe them both. That, I say, has more or less destroyed the good faith of the people in all governments. The private institutions of this country, sensing the tendency towards socialization in every department, are exploiting the exaggeration of political conflict to which I have referred in order to hold on a little longer to their private privileges. Before I leave that point, supposing what the minister said this afternoon is true and that a private corporation can run this banking system better than can the government, then frankly, why not start a new corporation for all government whatsoever? Let us have $10,000,000 of capital stock instead of $5,000,000 which is the amount of stock fixed for the Central bank, but in every other respect organize a company to govern Canada just as we propose in this legislation to organize one to govern the financial part of government, and thus take out of the hands of a political institution such as this parliament all government whatsoever; then we shall have applied in government that efficiency and that holiness which supposedly belong exclusively to private institutions. Then we shall have government by corporation, and end political influence forever. Why not do that? If what the minister said this afternoon is true in regard to a bank, it is just as true in regard to every other department of state, and the same inefficiency which he anticipated in connection with a bank must be found in every other department, so that the sooner we admit that frankly and form a national private corporation to govern Canada, the better. But let me say that I would rather take my chance as a Canadian with a nationally owned bank and its governor and directors appointed by the present government or the opposition than with a bank the governor and directors of which were appointed by the shareholders of a private corporation.

The bill provides for private ownership; it does not, however, provide against political influence, because the government appoints the first officers of the bank, but it appoints those it cannot control after the appointment is made. The minister tells me that the word of that appointee becomes final when there is a clash in policy between the government and the bank directors he has appointed. Therefore the very worst kind of political influence still remains in the legislation. The government retains just enough influence to get the blame, but has not enough power to determine policy, and it may find itself in a position where there will be a strong man following a policy detrimental to the government's interests, and it will not be able to stop him because he has been elected in the manner provided by this legislation which gives a private company power to control him. Such a situation is not only possible, but, I should say, very likely to happen; for does anyone hold that the interests of a private bank always run parallel to the national interest?

Instead of the interests of private banks running parallel to the interests of the state, they more often run across or contrary to public interests. Let me take the Bank of England as an example. We have in that institution one of the oldest and most efficient private banks and central banks in the world. Let me, as hastily as I can in order to get my thoughts expressed before my time is up, refer first of all to what contemporary statesmen of Great Britain think of the central bank of that country. First I refer to the words of the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, the present Prime Minister, They were quoted this afternoon, and I must not stop to quote them again, much as I should like to do so; but hon. members who heard the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), will recall how he quoted Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to the effect that the banking institutions of any country had full control over any government. Let me turn next to the Right Hon. David Lloyd George who, as usual, is fearless and outspoken on the matter of the Bank of England. Speaking in the British House of Commons, on February 12, 1930, he said:

> I want to urge the Chancellor again not to be too frightened of the city of London. Since the war the city of London has been invariably wrong in advising the government. . . . Rapid deflation was a mistake, and it had an injurious effect. . . . The precipitate establishment of the gold standard was another thing which undoubtedly dealt a staggering blow at our export trade.
> They have been wrong every time. . . . Now there is no doubt at all that they are using the whole of their tremendous influence for the purpose of restricting the raising of money for national development. Take the cause of depression throughout the world at the present moment. There is not a man who has examined it who will not tell you that a very large part of it is due to the mishandling of monetary questions on the advice of the money barons.
> These men who have mishandled this monetary question not merely advise what to do, but establish a veto upon every proposal which is made for national development. We got rid of the veto of the House of Lords. Take care that you do not establish a more sordid one.
> If you go to the city of London, what is their only remedy for depression? Their only remedy is by placing artificial barriers to prevent plenty from reaching want.

The same right hon. gentleman, in an interview in Forward on January 7, 1931, said:

> The city is the stronghold of reaction. All the time when I was chancellor of the Exchequer up to 1914, I had to fight the city. And then in 1914 the city had to come crawling to the government for assistance.
> Talk about public control! It was that that saved the city in 1914.
> No government will ever get a big program through unless it is prepared to face up to the reactionary money interests in the city of London.

Then Right Hon. Philip Snowden, speaking on the Gold Standard Bill on May 4, 1925, said:

> Since the report of the Cunliffe committee, the government and the Bank of England have begun a policy of very rapid deflation, in the course of which, few people will dispute, there have been very serious consequences. It has ruined thousands of businesses, and it has greatly enriched those who were the holders of fixed interest bearing securities. It is in a large measure—certainly I would not be so foolish as to say wholly—responsible for the grave trade depression and the widespread unemployment that we have had during the last three or four years. We fear that this precipitate return to the gold standard may have similar consequences though not of course to the same extent.

The same right hon. gentleman, in Labour and the New Social Order, published in 1926, wrote:

> The banking business of Great Britain is rapidly developing into a great monopoly. Private banks have disappeared, and five great banks now control the great bulk of the business of the country. Since July, 1918, the big five have absorbed twenty-one joint stock and private banks. This money trust, together with the Bank of England, which is at the same time a private concern and a semi-public institution, fixed the bank rate and the rate of discount for treasury bills which, in their turn, determined the price of money to traders and other borrowers. The nationalization of the banking system would effect economies of administration; it would give greater security to depositors; it would secure for the state the enormous profits made by the joint stock banks, and it would give to the state more effective control over the regulation of prices.

Now may I turn from contemporary statesmen to one whose words, I am sure, will meet with considerable approval in this house. I refer to Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and I quote from his life by Morley:

> From the time I took office as Chancellor, I began to learn that the state held in the face of the banks and the city, an extremely false position as regards finance . . . . The hinge of the whole situation was this, the government itself was not to be a substantive power in matters of finance, but was to leave the money power supreme and unquestioned. In the conditions of that situation I was reluctant to acquiesce, and I began to fight against it by financial self-assertion from the first. I was tenaciously opposed by the governor and deputy governor of the bank, who had seats in parliament, and I had the city for an antagonist on almost every occasion.

That indicates that this is not a new fight. The right hon. gentleman lost the fight then, and no one has ever won it since. I could multiply these quotations; they would all go to strengthen the conclusion that the interests of central private banks do not run parallel with the interests of the state, and that when they cross each other, when the interests of the state clash with the interests of private banks, then the wisdom and advice of private bankers carries the day, because they have the power. Now we are about to build up in this country a central bank constructed largely on our concept of the central bank in Great Britain. That institution has a great heritage of confidence; it has a great good name for honesty and efficiency; it has given more advice to governments than any other institution; it has forced its advice on governments to a greater degree than any other institution, and it has been wrong oftener than any other institution of which I have knowledge. We would do well to take warning from British statesmen at this stage.

If I had time I should like to quote other authorities, but let me point out that the central bank legislation as it is proposed now is legislation which will give to a private institution the power to control credit, industry and national policy, both internal and external. The institution which controls the credit of this country will control the policies also, whether or not it wants to or whether or not it has the brains to do so. It will do that because it will have in its hands the very helm of the whole national life. The government should and must control policy. I should like to quote Sir Thomas White who advocates, if we are to have any bank of this kind at all, that it should be publicly owned. Reference has been made also to Hon. J. E. Brownlee; I intended to quote that hon. gentleman, but my time is almost gone and as yet I have not had a chance to deal with the second point which I intended to develop.

My second point, sir, is that of the financial principle underlying the policy of the bank regarding credit control. In my opinion that is even more important than the general question of control, for we might have a government controlled bank with a wrong policy, a policy of deflation as bad as that of the present banks. So the policy that is to be followed for the next few years in Canada in regard to the control of national credit is of supreme importance. What is that policy? Judging from the statement of the delegates of the British Commonwealth of nations, who met after the conference in London, which statement was quoted by the royal commission and which seems to have had a tremendous influence upon the government in bringing forward this legislation, the policy that will govern the money policy of Canada in the near future and perhaps for a long time to come will be the old time, rigid, sound money policy which has been played out for half a century. Those delegates stated that they:

> —now reaffirm their view that the ultimate aim of monetary policy should be the restoration of a satisfactory international gold standard.

Who ever heard of such a basis as the ultimate aim of the monetary policy of a nation? Certainly we can understand a bank having a monetary policy of that sort, but never a nation. With such a policy our credit will be controlled in the interests of the money markets; it will be controlled in the interests of the sound money policy of the bankers.

I turn for a moment to deal with this question from another angle. I think we may take it for granted, from one statement made by the minister, that the gold standard is to be used alone for international exchange, though when we look at what he says in another place we begin to wonder which of the two principles he wants to follow. He made that statement in one speech, but in another he said:

> The ability of central banks to maintain any monetary standard largely depends upon its control over internal credit policy.

If that means anything it means that our internal credit in Canada will be controlled by the gold standard to which this legislation is committed, and that, sir, is a dangerous policy to follow. Are we in this country to commit ourselves to a policy which will prevent us from producing abundance when we have abundant means with which to do it, and which will prevent us from consuming the goods that may be provided merely for lack of a bookkeeping system called money? This policy of making the gold standard the basis of our credit control is just as stupid for international relations, in my opinion, as it is for internal economy. That was the reef which wrecked the world economic monetary conference. President Roosevelt refused to pare down his internal economic policy to some artificial gold standard set up by the nations of the world.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What has been the result?

Mr. IRVINE: It is too soon to speak of the result, but if my hon. friend knows anything about it at all he knows that the little increase in prosperity in Canada is merely a reflex of the increase that has taken place in the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not defending the policy of President Roosevelt; I am pointing out that stabilization of exchange on the gold standard was the reef which wrecked the conference. President Roosevelt refused to do it; he devoted his policy to the internal economic problem of the United States, and by his actions he said, "We will establish a gold basis, if we have to, in keeping with the economic life of the state." He flatly refused to limit economic development in the United States to any gold standard basis of stabilization.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I correct my hon. friend's remark? Roosevelt changed his policy in regard to stabilization of currencies, confining his policy to raising internal price levels; it has not anything to do with gold.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend has said better than I could what I have tried to say. I hope he will look at Hansard and discover that fact. I am simply trying to point out that President Roosevelt refused to have anything to do with gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Gold was not a factor, as far as Roosevelt was concerned at that time.

Mr. IRVINE: Gold was a factor in the international policy which wrecked the international conference. As I have said, President Roosevelt refused to bind his economic policy to that, and proceeded on an entirely new basis of national policy.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, it is with some natural humility I follow the excellent oration to which we have just listened, and may I be the first to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) upon the devastating manner with which he dealt with the argument of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) this afternoon. In the years I have sat in this house I do not believe I can remember a ministerial pronouncement having been so utterly torn to shreds.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind. No doubt I shall have more hollow interruptions before I have finished.

May I at the outset deeply deplore the fact that for some reason or other the Macmillan commission in Canada, quite unlike the commission of the same name which acted in the United Kingdom, did not undertake a comprehensive and thorough survey of the entire banking and credit system of Canada, nor did it make recommendations which would be of assistance to this House of Commons in revising the Bank Act. Apparently it contented itself—evidently, according to instructions—with an examination of the field in respect of the possibility of creating a central bank. That appeared to be the purpose to which it devoted its major attention. True, it heard a great deal of evidence, and listened to pronouncements from many people who appeared before it on various matters, but it devoted its constructive efforts almost entirely to the question of setting up a central bank in Canada.

I now wish to direct the attention of hon. members to some of the statements made in the report of the commission which bear out what I have just said. "We conceive" said the commission, "that our larger concern is with the question of the establishment of a central bank. That, no doubt, is why we are required to consider the advisability of establishing some form of central bank in Canada." It is to be regretted however, that in the wording of a section which follows shortly after this one a most unhappy conclusion may be drawn, for the report says that the creation of the central bank is to be "with the single aim of improving and strengthening the Canadian banking and financial structure." I submit that under no circumstances should a commission of this character have regarded as the sole aim either of its activities or of a structure it proposes to erect that it should strengthen and perpetuate the Canadian banking and financial structure. If these were the instructions received from the government, then I venture to say that they were the most stupid, unintelligent, ill informed and destructive instructions which could have been given to any body with such a task in hand. The commission's chief aim should have been to devise the most suitable monetary and credit system for the people of Canada.

Further on, at paragraph 13, the commission points out that the question of socialization was brought before them by several witnesses. This angle of the matter, however, was not regarded by the commission as coming within the terms of their reference. Yet in the report I find this expression: "The world will not return to the status quo ante," and again: "In such a time of difficulty, experiment is justifiable." The world was not going to return to the original status in respect of monetary or any other matters, said the commission, and in the next breath that experimentation was justifiable, immediately following a statement that it had no power to experiment or recommend experimentation in nationalization. What is before us is not an experiment; it is simply the establishment in Canada of another of the chain of central banks which to-day, subject to a few very powerful ones, because of their preeminence and long standing, are taking over the very world itself and vesting power in the hands of an increasingly small number of private, powerful groups in the world's financial field.

Following that, as to the question of socialization I refer to the quotation offered by the hon. member for Westaskiwin and attributed to the Minister of Finance, who, speaking to the original resolution, said that no purely profit making institution operating in a competitive system could afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policies. I submit the words "in regard to credit policies" are unnecessary. The minister could have left those words out and simply said: "No purely profit making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own." Of course, that is true. It is true of every institution under the present system. We are proposing through this act, to superimpose firmly upon a privately owned banking system a privately owned central bank. The present commercial banks will continue to possess the immense and profitable power of the allocation of credit. The central bank is to have the great controlling power over the volume of credit. The central bank will determine within the limitations provided, the volume of credit within the country. I say that in so far as internal affairs are concerned, the allocation of the credit is as important as a determination of the volume of credit. We are thus placing in the hands of private individuals power over the very economic life and stability of our nation.

A feature which to me is most interesting is the precipitateness with which the government suddenly changed its mind in respect of the important question of a central bank. It is only a few years since the Prime Minister of Canada said it might be possible in fifty years from that time—1931—to think of such an institution, and that doubtless if they were in power at that time the necessary action would be taken. Well, only three of those fifty years have elapsed, and yet we have the government introducing this bill to the house having for its purpose the establishment of a central bank. It is true that at the time he made that speech it was made on the proposal of the hon. member for Macleod that we would have a nationally owned central bank, and not a privately owned one. There is just the possibility that the Prime Minister may have intended to refer to the principle of private ownership of a central bank. However, as I said a minute ago, before three years of the fifty have elapsed we are asked to consider the establishment forthwith of a central bank.

Again, at page 1551 of Hansard for 1931 the Prime Minister said: "I should like to know just wherein the central bank would at this time better serve our conditions than the present Finance Act?" No one in this house has yet answered that question. Neither the Minister of Finance nor any other hon. member has indicated to the Prime Minister wherein the central bank is going to serve better the interests of the country than did the Finance Act. And, a little later on, having given full illustration and complete description of how the Finance Act had been administered, the same right hon. gentleman said: "What more than that could a central bank do?" Now, I ask him: What more than that is it proposed that this bank will do? The chief difference between the two institutions is, in my opinion just this: Under the old Finance Act the government, through the Minister of Finance, was able to exercise a certain power in respect of the volume of credit in the country. The treasury board could, in relation to the administration of the act determine upon a great increase in the credit volume or a contraction in the credit volume. Now we are asked to delegate to a private institution this very control, giving over the last vestige of what was referred to as the sovereignty of the people of this country over their credit power.

I wonder if the speed or haste with which the change of mind occurred had any purpose or intent behind it. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in June last the Prime Minister declared his intention of appointing a royal commission for the purpose of investigating the whole banking and currency and credit system in Canada. The right hon. gentleman then left for England. Most hon. members, probably all of us, know the troubles into which he got over there. But to resolve our deliberations into mere facts the commission that was to have been appointed immediately after June was not appointed until August. I do not yet know why. When it was appointed the Prime Minister of this country selected from Great Britain certain eminent but extremely orthodox gentlemen—men like Sir Charles Addis, for whose reputation I have a very great respect, but for whose orthodoxy in matters of finance I have nothing but the deepest regret and, contempt. When I find men like Sir Charles Addis, who all his life has been an associate of big business and related to banking in a direct way, selected to come over here to determine what our financial institutions are to be in Canada, I am frankly shocked.

Shortly following that, we learned the Prime Minister had succeeded in negotiating a loan, doubtless financed through the Bank of England, for fifteen million pounds, and it is significant that that was the first loan of importance that Canada had been able to secure in London since the Grand Trunk scandal. I wonder if these really are unconnected matters. It would be as well if these things were cleared up. I will tell the Minister of Finance why I would like them cleared up and of the fear I have in regard to their possible implications.

We find—but not until a certain dinner was held at Canada House in London—that two estimable gentlemen, Messrs. Kershaw and Fisher, accompanied the royal commission during its travels throughout the Dominion of Canada. They were neither heralded nor sung. No one knew of them or what they were there for. No publicity attended their travels, and yet it now develops, as a result of after dinner speaking at Canada House, that Messrs. Kershaw and Fisher were two officials of the Bank of England, and it is suggested that these gentlemen had a great deal to do with the drafting of this very bill and of the report. These facts are to me extremely significant. The occasion upon which this dinner was held was a celebration in honour of Lord Macmillan. I have also heard it suggested that Mr. Kershaw will probably be the first governor of the Bank of Canada. I would like the government to take the house into its confidence in regard to these matters.

I am raising these issues because of this fact: There has never been a central bank in existence in this world that has had the tremendous and overwhelming power at all times of the Bank of England. In only one period was her supremacy in international finance challenged, and that was when, following the war, New York attained a position in foreign exchange markets comparable with that of London. But that lasted for only a brief period, and even the great money market of New York is now shrinking once more to second place. Let it be noted that men associated with the treasury and directly associated with the bank itself have time and again indicated that the policy of the privately owned Bank of England, could determine not only the position of England in respect of financial matters but quickly thereafter the policy of every money centre in the world.

I happen to have adopted this country as the place in which I was to live and bring up my children and to die. It was one of my aspirations when I came to understand and to know Canada that it should be not only politically free but economically free, and that implies financially free. But I say to the Prime Minister and to the government that if they establish a private central bank in Canada of the character that is proposed in this bill, it will, in the very nature of things, become to all intents and purposes a subsidiary of the Bank of England. Its policy will be dictated and decided by the Bank of England, and we shall through the Bank of England be involved in the future in international commitments. The matter is serious. It is so serious that I decline to support the second reading of any bill for a central bank if it is to be privately controlled or to turn over this power to private individuals. If Canada is proud of the position she has to-day attained as a nation free and equal in all respects with the mother country within the ambit of the union known as the commonwealth, then I say to the Prime Minister and those associated with him that he is sacrificing what is more important than political freedom if he sacrifices the financial autonomy or invites the possibility of losing the financial autonomy of Canada. It is true that in actual practice up to this stage Canada's financial policy has in no small degree been determined by other private banking institutions, notably the federal reserve of the United States of America. It is not many years ago that some hon. gentlemen opposite were shocked and showed annoyance when I submitted to them that our financial policy in Canada had been for years, and was at that time being, directed from New York. They did not like the truth, but they are getting the truth to-day even from the mouths of their own government. But while that was true, we did still possess the power to reassume the control of our own financial institutions and to conserve and reserve them for Canada, and for Canada beyond anything else, first, last and all the time. It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat it in closing this section of my remarks, that if we now set up a privately owned central bank it is inevitable that sooner or later it will become a part of the ring of central banks that may become a sterling union, and whether it does enter the union or not it will be subjected to the powerful influence and credit policies of the Bank of England.

Mr. BENNETT: It is entirely improper to make that observation in respect to the Bank of England, especially in view of the fact that last year the hon. gentleman voted to tie Canada to sterling as a condition of the Ottawa agreement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all—

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what you voted for.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The right hon. gentleman's remark was not a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. R. G. Hawtrey, a gentleman of some reputation in banking circles in Great Britain, and who I think held an office of some importance with the treasury, says at page 26 of his book, Trade Depression and the Way Out:

Under the earlier conditions—

That is, prior to the ascendancy of New York following the financial debacle after the war.

—when the London market possessed the sole leadership, credit restriction in London would soon have been followed by credit restriction in all other centres, and the question whether there would be any differential effect making contraction relatively more severe in British industry would not have arisen.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

A dozen quotations of that character could be cited to prove my point in this connection.

I am afraid that the powers of a central bank is much misunderstood. I do not agree with those who suggest that a private central bank would prevent bank failures; it has not in other countries. I do not believe that a private central bank will provide more funds for agriculture or for other industries; it has not in other countries. I would like to ask this question: In what country has a central bank prevented collapse or assisted in the speedy recovery from a collapse? Not one central bank has succeeded in doing any of these things. The reason may be that the control of most of these banks has been in the hands of private bankers with intelligence of the type described by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin in the closing part of his remarks.

As a matter of fact, as a rule private bankers are not concerned with national or public interests except in so far as they affect themselves. Their primary concern is the well being of their shareholders, and therein lies a danger which should be pointed out at this stage. With all due respect to the Minister of Finance, I submit that under conditions such as we have in Canada, six per cent is an extremely substantial dividend. It is not a low rate and it happens to be the common or customary rate provided for central banking institutions. The minister and the government are not providing any safeguard in this dividend against the possible effects of the directors of the bank being governed by the interests of their shareholders should a conflict occur between those interests and the national well being. After all, they have to make a showing for their shareholders. This has been so true in the past of other banks that it is not necessary for me to strain the point; it must be clear to all.

A central bank may determine the quantity of credit available to bankers for commercial purposes but, as I said earlier, the commercial bankers determine the allotment and allocation of that credit. We had a striking illustration of this fact on this continent in quite recent years when there was a complete failure on the part of the commercial banks of the United States to extend to the public and to the consumers the vast amount of credit which was made available by their federal reserve system. Hon. members will recall that two years ago this spring the federal reserve bank of the United States purchased long term securities and other frozen assets from the commercial banks with the idea of increasing their reserves so that a flow of credit would become available for industry and recovery be brought about. What the commercial banks actually did was to make their own position liquid by selling their frozen assets to the federal reserve bank and then sitting tight. The effect upon the public was not that which was expected by those who were responsible for putting that policy into operation. The direction of credit is a function so important and so peculiar in itself that it should never at any time be exercised by individuals whose actions may be determined by the interests of their shareholders.

It is obvious that the officials of the central bank provided for by this bill are to be in absolute control of the major monetary policies of Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and the hon. member for Macleod that to put a power of that magnitude, a power which will dominate the very economic life of our people, into the hands of such a group is not only unwise but is a betrayal of our duty as trustees of the interests of the people. To whom are the directors of this bank to be responsible after it has been created? To the people? There can be no reply. The minister himself has intimated the superior position in which the governor of this bank would be in the event of a conflict of opinion on policy. I need not repeat his statement; I think it has been put on record at least twice. The history of private central banks does not provide us with any justification for optimism that the central bank of Canada will be governed by any other interest than that which affects its own stockholders.

The bill states that the officers are to be appointed by the government. This is a peculiar anomaly. In one breath there is condemnation of a publicly owned institution because of the danger of political patronage; in the next breath we find that the first governor, deputy governor, assistant deputy governor and directors are to be appointed by the government. May I ironically suggest that of course there will be no possible taint of patronage in those appointments; they will be free from any stigma in that regard.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance that there is just as much danger of political interference in a privately owned bank as there is in a public one. This has been so in industry all through this country and it is especially possible in the case of this bank, since the first directors and officials are to be appointed by the government. Bankers all over the world have used the argument of political influence in order to keep the people from obtaining control of the banking machine and preventing bankers from continuing to exercise their terrific and powerful privileges over the rights of the people in respect to monetary and credit matters. What does this criticism or objection imply? Accepting it at full face value, the objection to a publicly owned bank on the ground of political interference means but one thing, that our political leaders will betray their trust as guardians of the public welfare. For the life of me I cannot imagine that the polished, the accomplished and the erudite Minister of Finance would suggest such a thing to this house. Yet he does it, both directly and by implication; he suggests that our political leaders would prove untrue to their trust if they had jurisdiction over such an institution. Another inference from his criticism is that the bankers would always decide against their own special interests should they clash with those of the public. If he can show me one single case in history where the bankers have set aside their own interests to take care of the public or the national well being, I will withdraw this criticism. Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Prime Minister can give me one instance, because it does not exist.

I do not deny the possibility of political pressure and political influence, but the house knows quite well that the heads of the bank and the government would have to answer to the public, not only at election time but through criticism in this house. This would be the case from the time the bank was first set up. If there was any wrongdoing it could quickly be brought to public attention; if there was any wrongful diversion of privilege and power to banking interests, it could quickly be brought to the attention of the public and the house and corrected. But if this is left solely and solidly a private institution, it will not be made to account. It will be supreme in itself and master of the destiny of the people of Canada. Even Sir Thomas White himself, a gentleman of no mean attainments in banking circles, has ridiculed this idea that political interference is a just reason for the abandonment of the principle of public ownership of such an institution. Moreover, it is interesting to note that while he did not agree with the necessity for setting up a central bank at this stage, he did agree that if one was set up it should be a public institution. That is his opinion, and I regard it as a particularly strong one, considering the position he has held, and the reputation he still enjoys in Canada. He says, respecting the Finance Act:

It was suggested during the course of our hearings that political influence might possibly affect unfavourably the administration of the Finance Act because the Treasury Board which authorizes advances and fixes rates of interest payable thereon is composed of members of the government. With regard to this I have only to say that if by "political influence" is meant partisan or improper influence not a shred of evidence has been adduced before the commission in support of such a suggestion.

"Not a shred of evidence has been adduced", and if there is any body that could have lent itself readily to political influence in regard to monetary matters it would have been such a branch of a department of government. I resume the quotation:

> The fact is that authorization of advances under the act is an almost purely routine matter of administration carried out by the Treasury Board, aided by the recommendation of the Minister of Finance and the advice of his chief officials. I have no hesitation in asserting that the administration of the Finance Acts under all governments has been wholly free from any such influence.

I submit with all respect that these words of Sir Thomas White, coupled with the words already referred to of the Hon. Mr. Brownlee, are sufficient to justify my contention that the argument against a publicly owned central bank on the ground of political interference is not substantiated by the facts and cannot be sustained except by the high imagination of those who wish to preserve the private ownership of such institutions.

As to the limitation of dividends, I discussed that point a moment ago, but I submit once more, in order to emphasize it, that there is no safeguard here whatever. I wish I were getting six per cent. There is no farmer in my riding who does not wish that he could get six per cent to-day; he would regard it as an extremely handsome return on his investment, and he would be very certain to look after his own private interests if he were receiving such a rate. As a matter of fact a good deal of his public interest to-day is due to the fact that he is not getting six per cent, and I know of no farmers in the west who will approve of this privately owned central bank. But whether the dividend rate be low or not, whether it be six per cent or nothing, the power and the privilege is so great that it is going to be in the interests of the commercial bankers to get control; and those of us who know the rapidity with which the war loan bonds drifted quickly into the hands of the banks since the depression can readily realize how quickly we shall lose any stock we might hold in this privately owned central bank. The proxy limiting provision of the act is in my opinion as excellent a safeguard as could have been provided for a private institution; yet even there, while it is true that a number of individual holders of shares may delegate to the Minister of Finance power to exercise their proxies in a particular direction with regard to a particular policy, I submit that the public are usually so out of touch with national economic and financial conditions that they are not in a position to determine accurately questions of national monetary policy.

I think it was the Prime Minister who the other day suggested that one of the cardinal features of a privately owned institution that commended to him its superiority over a publicly owned bank was the fact that the shareholders' meetings provided such an effective check upon the management of the institution. While my experience has not of course been anything like so broad as the right hon. gentleman's in respect of shareholders' meetings, nevertheless I have been at some and I know this, that any hon. member of the House of Commons can get more information from any minister of any department than the average shareholder can get from the directors of an average company at an annual meeting. I have known private companies that would not even disclose to the shareholders the salaries they were paying their president and vice-president and officials. I know private companies in which the annual shareholders' meeting is a ridiculous farce, a clear railroading of the routine business of the company, under the guidance of the management, as quickly as possible and with the least amount of trouble. So that to suggest that as a strong argument for a privately owned institution is in my opinion quite absurd.

There is just one last point I must touch upon before I conclude. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen have studied the report closely and have observed that in it for the first time in Canada—for the first time within my memory at any rate—an accurate compilation of the total assets and the total liabilities of the Canadian banks was set forth on a given date. So far as I remember, we have never before been able to obtain that information. I find for example that the total assets of the Bank of Montreal are stated in the table to be $761,375,702 and its total liabilities $759,824,543, or an excess of assets of only $1,551,159; yet that bank felt quite free to take up $22,404,000 of the Canadian Pacific Railway loan. I wish I could go into a bank with only such a meagre excess of assets over liabilities and secure anything like a proportionate amount.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that that includes more than $70,000,000 of capital and rest in the liability column.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I give the following figures showing the comparative total assets and total liabilities of each of the chartered banks:

Comparison of total assets, and total liabilities of each chartered bank.

Bank	Total assets	Total liabilities	Excess assets	Share of C.P.R. loan
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)
Montreal	$ 761,375,702	$ 759,824,543	$ 1,551,159	$ 22,404,000
Nova Scotia	273,368,244	272,668,632	699,612	5,180,000
Toronto	118,430,178	117,737,176	693,002	2,632,000
Provinciale	45,863,404	45,487,446	375,958	.....
Commerce	570,943,398	568,605,481	2,337,917	10,524,000
Royal	719,471,977	717,653,478	1,818,499	12,280,000
Dominion	124,530,334	124,195,968	334,366	2,808,000
Canadienne Nationale	135,453,649	134,972,748	480,901	1,500,000
Imperial	132,132,986	130,844,789	1,288,197	2,632,000
Barclay's	7,896,046	7,888,926	7,120	.....
Totals	$2,889,465,918	$2,879,879,187	$ 9,586,731	$ 60,000,000

I have wondered, since I read the figures of the excess in the assets of the banks and of the amounts they had taken up of the Canadian Pacific loan, whether it was not because of the position in which the banks found themselves that this government undertook to make a guarantee of the Canadian Pacific loan. This is an interesting matter which should be and, I hope, will be discussed in the house before the end of the session.

In closing I submit that the terrific power to dominate society that rests in the hands of private institutions which have control over the lifeblood of industry, over that without which the exchange of goods cannot take place, over that without which people cannot buy the goods that are produced nor can the goods be produced, that power the control of which permits individuals to determine whether there will or not be employment of our citizens and to determine our international policy in trade matters, should at no time be delegated by responsible parliaments to private individuals. It should be retained for the people and exercised by a publicly owned independent body created by the government and responsible to parliament, and to no other body than that. I am opposed to the passage of this bill which embodies the private ownership principle.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am opposed to that principle and I propose to vote against private ownership of a central bank in this dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, will you call it eleven o'clock?

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, March 9, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 30, respecting a certain patent of the American Dairy Supply Company—Mr. Anderson (Toronto-High Park).

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. DENIS (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister to lay on the table of the house correspondence between him and Mr. George C. Vaudrin. I should like to know if the right hon. gentleman has that information.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I understand they did not find any correspondence in the office, but I shall have it looked into again. I personally have no recollection of it, but there is a very large body of correspondence and I shall have another search made for it.

CAIRO POSTAL CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Whereas, on February 27, at page

979 of Hansard in answer to a question about the Cairo postal congress the Prime Minister said:

> Wherever the Postmaster General may be I am sure that upon his return he will satisfy the very laudable curiosity of the hon. gentleman.

and whereas on March 8, at page 1434 of Hansard, under the heading "Adjournment—Business of the House" the Prime Minister said:

> Mines and immigration were opened and agriculture was opened. There are post office, interior and fisheries. Whichever is most acceptable and best suited to the convenience of the opposition we shall take.

therefore may I ask, sir, if it is the intention of the government to have the post office estimates passed before the return of the Postmaster General, and if that is the reason why the Postmaster General has been playing hide and seek in three continents, namely, Asia, Africa and Europe?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RUMOURED ABANDONMENT OF LINE BETWEEN HOPE AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways and Canals. A report has reached me from British Columbia to the effect that abandonment of the main line of the Canadian National railway from Hope west to Vancouver has been under consideration. I should like to ask if the minister has any information in that connection, or if the statement is correct?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have never heard of it before, so I really know nothing about it.

COMPLETION OF LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask of the genial Minister of Railways and Canals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: Surely you do not wish me to modify my question, do you? May I say I have a letter from a leading business man in North Battleford to the effect that a statement was current throughout the district that the railway from Frenchman's Butte to Elk Point in Alberta, and from St. Walburg north to Edmonton, will be completed this summer. May I ask the minister if he is in a position to make a statement to parliament in connection with these two important northwestern lines?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): We will not know anything about the plans of the Canadian National railways until their estimates are before the house. In the near future their estimates will be before us and we will know more about it then. Up to the present, however, I know nothing about their suggested plans concerning the completion of lines in the west.

BANK OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Rhodes for the second reading of Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Bank of Canada.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): "Are we in danger of Fascism in Canada?" is a question sometimes asked among the workers. Thinking in terms of brown shirts, parades and salutes I would say no, but when I come to a measure of this kind I am rather doubtful. In the days of the Romans we are told it was their practice to erect two upright spears, then place one transversely upon them and force their conquered enemies to pass under the spears, sub jugum—under the yoke—and usually a heavy tribute was exacted from the conquered enemies. It would seem to me that in the bill now before us we are arranging for the people of Canada to pass under the yoke, and if the bill is passed they must expect to pay a heavy tribute in the years to come.

For years we have had in this country a financial dictatorship but it has been somewhat concealed. By this legislation, instead of challenging that dictatorship, we are in reality legalizing and stabilizing it. The Finance minister warns us against any possible delay in giving the people the benefits of a central bank. I would say that the people have waited for some years for a central bank, and I think they can afford to wait a little longer rather than that we should saddle this country with what I regard as a private tyranny.

The bill provides for the creation of a private central bank. The amendment which we moved from this corner would seek to alter that so as to make the bank a public bank, but that amendment has been ruled out of order. Under those circumstances I think I must join with my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) and take the position that the only course for us is to vote against this bill. I cannot see how we can possibly separate the bill from its contents. The main principle of the bill is that the bank shall be a privately owned institution. That is the proposal which comes before us. Could we have altered that to a publicy owned bank I would gladly have voted for the bill.

Let me point out that we do not object to a commission or board with wide powers, but we do object to the setting up of a body independent of and superior to the authority of parliament. I must quote again the statement of the Finance minister in reply to a question by my colleague from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) because I do not think it can be broadcast too widely. He asked:

> Supposing the central bank was endeavouring to regulate the control of credit in Canada, and supposing the policy it adopted in order to do so was contrary to the policy of the government of the day and they clashed, which official would make the decision?

The answer of the Finance minister was:

> Unquestionably the authority of the governor and the board of directors of the bank would prevail.

Here we have the unequivocal statement that we are at the moment being asked to erect a body whose decision would be superior to that of the government. It is an abdication of the powers of parliament. The Finance minister in order to try to justify his position is driven to the most specious reasoning. He refers to the board of railway commissioners. I submit that there is no such sovereign power given to the board of railway commissioners. It is true that they are free from everyday interference in the carrying on of their work, as undoubtedly this bank should be, but still the great railway policies of this country are decided, not by the board of railway commissioners, but by this parliament. I recall that a few years ago, even with regard to a specific matter, that of the Crowsnest pass agreement, this parliament overrode the decision of the railway commission, and last year the special railway legislation which was passed surely indicated the supreme power of this parliament.

The Finance minister also referred to the tariff board, but again I point out that there is no sovereign authority in the tariff board. The tariff board does not override the decisions of this house. It may perform a valuable function, but still its reports go to the government. The government assumes responsibility, and we ratify or reject the measures that are in consequence brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it interfere with the hon. gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must realize that what he has just said negatives his argument because is it not parliament that is supreme and will continue to be supreme in the case he has just mentioned? And it will similarly be supreme over the decisions of the bank.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then may I point out that the Finance minister is at variance with the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no. We are at one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Because the Finance minister said that if there was a clash the will of the bank should prevail.

Mr. BENNETT: With the government, not with parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There may be a distinction there, but I doubt it very much. But I am glad that the Prime Minister is now being converted to the idea that parliament, rather than the government, should be supreme. It is a new doctrine from him, very new, for all along he has taken the ground that it was the government that assumed supreme responsibility, and we know that only in the most indirect fashion indeed has this government thought that it had to come to parliament. I think that that reasoning does not carry us very far.

The Finance minister also refers to the civil service commission, and suggests that it too is free from interference. Well, if I may venture on a colloquialism, it is to laugh, for anyone who knows the pressure that has been exerted from day to day on the civil service commission and the large number of reservations that are constantly being made of positions that are not to be filled by the commission will understand how little real independence has been exercised either under this government or the governmnt that preceded it, by the civil service commission. If the bank was to be as subject to as much interference as the civil service commission the situation would indeed be a difficult one. No one would suggest that it be subjected to interference as is the civil service commission. At the same time I say that it would be an impossible situation if the authority of the governor of the bank were to be superior to that of the government of this country.

It is true that the powers of parliament are being curtailed. The decisions of the Imperial conference have the effect of practically taking over taxing powers. Again. in connection with our estimates we have large blocks of expenditures which we commonly call uncontrollable expenditures. A recent bulletin of the Citizen's Research Institute states:

> Including the interest paid by the dominion on guaranteed railway bonds, the total debt service cost $193,894,024, or $3,700,000 per week. This item alone cost $18.45 per capita, or 63 per cent of the gross revenue.

That is, 63 per cent of our gross revenue under present conditions does not come within the control of this parliament but automatically goes to the debt service.

By this bill we place under private ownership and control the issuance of currency, always regarded as the prerogative of the crown, and secondly the control of price levels, which is most important to the whole financial and economic life of this country. I should like to ask where is the leader of His Majesty's opposition at this time. He likes to boast that his grandfather helped to secure responsible government in Canada, but now it would seem that he himself acquiesces in the great betrayal, for such I think it will be considered in the years to come. We are taking away truly responsible government in this country in one of the most important spheres in which government should have control.

Mr. IRVINE: The right hon. gentleman has not yet decided whether to do one thing or the other.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: While the discussion was going on last night there lay on my table the evening newspaper in which appeared a fine photograph of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) arm in arm. It is delightful to know that they do find it possible to avoid political differences.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the hon. member were there, would he have refused to be photographed?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is very delightful to see these two gentlemen together and it would seem to be somewhat symbolical. In dealing with this bill we are now finding that in the realm of financial affairs as well as in connection with a centennial celebration these two gentlemen can walk hand in hand.

Mr. BENNETT: While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is the sinner?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: An hon. gentleman behind me asks the Prime Minister to tell who is the sinner.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) would have us follow the lead of countries which have privately owned banks. He mentioned the Reichsbank, but I would point out that under the Dawes scheme this bank was reconstituted as a private institution. While that was so in 1924, to-day the government has a very large measure of control. Under the Dawes scheme the Reichsbank was set up in such a way as to secure the payment of reparations from Germany. Germany was a defeated nation and was bound to pay tribute to the allies, and our Minister of Finance suggests that we should organize our bank along the lines of the reorganization of the Reichsbank immediately after the war. Not a very high ideal for Canada! Further than that, he speaks of the central banks in the smaller European countries. I would point out that those banks were set up by the international bankers in order that the money lenders of Europe should be secured and in order that the local governments would not be tempted to give the welfare of their own people priority over the repayment of loans made by these international money lenders. That was the real position and yet, forsooth, the Minister of Finance thinks that Canada should follow the lead of the smaller nations of Europe in the setting up of her central bank. He said very little about the central bank of France. Although that institution is under private ownership, in reality the governor is appointed by the state and there is a very decided exercise of control by the treasury. The Minister of Finance could not deny that there is a central bank in Australia, but he sought to disparage that organization by saying it had been set up in the first instance as a commercial bank by a Labour government and had only more recently been acting as a central bank, therefore the time was too short to judge of its permanent success. Our point is that it has succeeded so far. I would rather follow the lead of one of our sister colonies than that of the countries of Europe where the organization of central banks was such as to make sure that the international money lenders would get their own back with interest.

There are some lessons which could have been learned from the United States. It is true that the federal reserve system of that country is not a fully public institution, but there is a good deal of public control. During the banking crisis of last year there was set up a universal system of supervision and control which shows that even in the United States, supposed to be the headquarters of capitalism, they have reached the stage where it is found essential that the government should control financial operations.

We all recognize that this bank is being modelled more or less on the Bank of England. I submit that as there is now in England a very strong agitation for the nationalization of the Bank of England we might hesitate in setting up a bank on the model of one that has proved to be anything but satisfactory even in England. The Minister of Finance suggested that politicians were human and therefore, he was afraid that they could not resist pressure which might be put upon them. I interjected by saying that I thought the bankers were also human and that it seemed to me that the pressure which would be put upon the bankers by their own personal interests and those of the class which they represent might be just as strong as any pressure put upon politicians by the public at large. It is often sought to give the impression that after all bankers are rather superior to mundane considerations, that they are ultra patriotic. I was interested recently in reading a study of the times of Napoleon in a book entitled "Monarchy or Money Power" by R. McNair Wilson. I should like to read one paragraph to the house as follows:

How often have governments come to the rescue of the financial system only to be told later that they have been playing the prodigal and living beyond their means!

Napoleon had the satisfaction of exposing the patriotism of money to the world and of revealing to what a great extent the English cabinet was able to be influenced by the city of London. He was to pay dearly and soon for his pleasure. There was no more agitation against the issue of notes while the war lasted. On the contrary, every available ounce of gold was invested in the armies of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, paper promises by these countries to pay being accepted in London at very severe rates of discount. The bankers won. Louis XVIII was restored by British arms and British diplomacy to the throne of his ancestors. Loans were placed at his disposal, though Napoleon had left a France which enjoyed a credit balance.

A year later the man whom every king and every banker in Europe called "usurper" won back his throne with 800 men and without the firing of a single shot. On this occasion he had no option but to raise a loan for the defence of France. The city of London accommodated him with £5,000,000. With this sum he equipped the army which Wellington defeated at Waterloo.

A rather surprising statement but one which will be found to be verified by Gourgaud. That is the kind of patriotism to be found among the bankers. We all know that the money lenders are international in their point of view but they are also powerful in purely national affairs. I should like to quote the statement made by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in his book Socialism, Critical and Constructive published in 1924. He said:

One can stand at a point in the city of London and be within a stone's throw of a handful of banks and financial agencies which by an agreement come to quite legally, though perhaps in defiance of the intention of law or government decree, would influence materially in a very short time the business operation of the country.

Nor is the growing importance of American finance in international trade an assuring event. One of the things that can be assumed as a certain consequence of the war is that finance is to hold a more important grip on international industry than hitherto, and that in their own interests communities must protect themselves so far as possible against an imperious international financial trust.

And again:

If international finance is to fight within itself, the battle is to strew the world with industrial debris; if it is to combine the slavery of labour, both in its aspects of toil and of management, is inevitable, and the politics of the world will become the will of finance. For finance can command the sluices of every stream that turn the wheels of industry, and can put fetters upon the feet of every government that is in existence.

Those who control finance can paralyze the nation, can make it drunk, can keep it normal. And in all their transactions their own interests are put first.

Let me emphasize that their own interests are put first. He continues:

Of course, these interests are involved in the general interest. They cannot flourish in a dead economic state.

But they fix exchanges, bank rates, capital values, they can tighten or loosen the purse strings of governments and manufacturers, they control the means upon which the political and industrial state depends for its existence. If a Labour government came into power they could starve it. A financiers' counter revolution would be more effective than a soldiers' one.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald seems to have been gifted with powers of prophecy in that passage.

An hon. MEMBER: What year was that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In 1924; and that is precisely what happened to himself and his own government. Apparently, with his eyes wide open to the exact situation, he allowed himself to be duped a few years later and the bankers again won. Now we are proposing in this legislation to set up a domination of bankers or of a banker who will be able to defy the government that is in power. That is the actual situation. Further behind that banker would be the international bankers.

I agree with the minister that a central bank is a natural and inevitable development of our financial system. The chartered banks are essentially commercial banks, but their functions have been gradually extended until they have not only become deposit banks, taking in the savings of the people and on the basis of this providing for short term loans—and I may point out that they have gone on the basis of a ratio of ten to one—but in addition to that, through the provisions of the Bank Act and because of the lack of adequate machinery to put into operation the provisions of the Finance Act, these commercial banks have in practice been banks of issue. They have influenced price levels and, further, they have exercised an influence on foreign exchange matters and have been the government's own bankers. One might have thought that was sufficiently wide scope, but in more recent years they have entered the field of investment banking, either directly, taking up certain issues, or more generally indirectly through the means of the interlocking directorates of which we heard the other day. In addition to that they have been expected to supply agricultural credit. This has been done through the extension of short term credits by arrangements that have proved ruinous to the farmers and have left them without the power of securing further loans, even short term loans, from the banks.

This central bank legislation proposes to take over at least four of these functions I have enumerated. The central bank is to become a bank of issue. Its obligation will be to control price levels, and it will arrange foreign exchange matters and act as the government's bank. This, I suppose, is not the place to discuss the need for control over the distribution of credit; but that would still be quite untouched by the proposed central bank. I would point out that banking is the key industry which affects all others; no industry can be carried on without adequate supplies of credit. Banks alone, under modern conditions, are able to supply these credits, and they cannot only make credit in general cheap or dear, scarce or abundant, but they can also direct credit to one industry or firm rather than to another, and so prevent industrial expansion in this or that field. In our judgment, credit is of the nature of a public utility and should be publicly controlled.

This is not the place either for me to discuss the need for adequate agricultural credit, but I would point out in passing that this should enter into any general scheme of Canadian financial reorganization.

Again this is not the place I suppose to discuss the need for a national investment board, but I would point out that neither the proposed revision of the Bank Act nor this bill which we have under consideration to-day provides for such a board. If the principle of the nationalization of insurance, which was advanced from this corner the other day, could be adopted, we should have abundant funds available for investment purposes. To-day these funds are all gathered up and put in the hands of private institutions for investment. If national insurance were carried into effect all these funds would be gathered up and made available for an investment board to put into such enterprises as were socially of value.

So far as I can see, the main objection to a publicly-owned bank seems to be that it would be subject to political pressure if indeed it would not leave the way open for political corruption. It does seem to me that if we adopt that attitude the statement of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) becomes true and we simply recognize that parliament to-day has ceased to be of value to the people. The argument goes altogether too far. If we are not able to govern in the sphere of finance we are not able to govern in lesser spheres, and if we do not govern finance, then it is only a question of time until government in other spheres becomes a veritable farce. I should rather like to think that by means of added responsibility we should gradually come to a higher conception of government. As J. A. Hobson said some time ago:

> May not the conception of public control as a junto of officials and politicians, slowly grinding their own axes, be displaced by a more intelligent conception of a really representative control in which the various factors comprising the public interest shall be duly represented under a system removed from immediate political or class pressures?

If there are objections on the ground of possible dangers under a publicly-owned bank, it seems to me that there are also decided objections to, and inevitable dangers in a privately-owned institution. Undoubtedly class interests would prevail; only fairly well to do people could own stock; and, as was pointed out last night by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), this means, as in ordinary companies, that the control would not be widespread but would rather be concentrated in a few hands, ultimately in the hands probably of one person. This was very well expressed in a short paragraph I was reading the other day in a book by John Strachey:

> It is quite true that claims to a participation in the profits of the great modern centralized and concentrated enterprises are now, by means of the sale of shares, quite widely distributed amongst members of the property-owning class. But it is very naive to suppose that this constitutes any diffusion of effective ownership or control. A small shareholder, or indeed the whole body of small shareholders collectively, in a great modern company, have about as much control over it as they have over the Grand Ilama of Tibet. They take what dividends the directors, who own the controlling blocks of shares, like to pay them, and read, devoutly, the financial columns of their newspapers, where city editors tell them what the big capitalists want them to think.

That is about what would happen in the case of a national bank if it were organized on the basis proposed in this bill.

While I cannot go quite so far as my colleague the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that the main cause of poverty in the midst of plenty is the money question, undoubtedly that question is of prime importance. May I ask: Can we look to such a bank as that which it is proposed to set up, to make any radical changes in the money system? I hold in my hands an article by Mr. A. de V. Leigh entitled Realities and Make-Belief published on March 25, 1933, in the Times Trade and Engineering Supplement from which I quote the following:

> The experts are like squirrels, able to crack nuts—however hard these may be—with the greatest skill and cleverness, but being, so far as progression is concerned, circumscribed by their cages, they can only run round and round in circles. They recognize that what is necessary is to put more tokens into the pockets of consumers, but these tokens can be obtained only by being borrowed at interest. This implies repayment of more than has been put in, so that they are once more back at the point of only being able to recommend more debt to cure a system which is breaking down on account of too much debt.

I would point out that if it becomes necessary to change the money system, it is extremely difficult to have this done by a bank that is to a large extent removed from the pressure of public opinion and that also by its very constitution is in the hands of those who are interested not only in maintaining the status quo but also in seeing that their own immediate financial investments are protected. The bank must make money and one cannot read the reports of the Bank of England without realizing that that bank is not altogether indifferent to the dividends paid to its shareholders. Further, suppose by any chance the time might come in this country when the people generally think, in order to relieve themselves of the burden of debt, some sort of reflationary process is necessary. Would a privately owned bank agree to anything of this kind? I cannot think that is possible. A privately owned bank is in the hands of people who would undoubtedly lose money by such a process.

Some years ago France got rid of the greater part of her public debt by a process commonly called inflation when the franc was reduced from 20 cents to 4 cents. I wonder whether that would be possible if we had a privately owned bank in this country, in which not only the stock was owned by private individuals but the management was under the control of a governor not responsible to the dominion government. Again may I read a paragraph from a very interesting book called What Everybody Wants to Know About Money, edited by G. D. H. Cole. I think he puts the whole situation very clearly:

> More than once it has become plain that the only real alternative to government control of the banking system has been, not the separation of the financial and political powers, but rather the control of the political by the financial authority. The British Labour government of 1931 is by no means the only government that has been brought down since the war by the action of the financial world. For example, the same fate overtook the short-lived socialist government of Norway, and bankers' pressure upon governments has been a familiar feature of the world's history during the past dozen years. It is no easier for banks and governments to separate their spheres of jurisdiction to-day than it was in medieval Europe for pope and emperor to live side by side without clashings of authority.
> In these circumstances the question appears nowadays to many people to be not whether bankers ought to be allowed to carry on their own business without public interference, but whether governments or banks are to have the last word in matters in which they are both inevitably concerned.

That is a clear statement of the issue before us to-day. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has stated very distinctly that when there is a clash, the bankers are to have the last word. We in this corner—and I hope we shall be joined by at least some members of the Liberal party—would like to provide that when there is a clash, the government must have the last word because in the long run the government is responsible to the people. Such a bank would be quite removed from contact with the ordinary rank and file of the people; its governor would not be required to present himself for election nor to keep in touch with nor to be guided by the will of the people. If we have reached that stage, it is about time we give up even the semblance of democracy. Surely the people themselves have the right to decide. Whilst we talk about the danger of political influence, we must remember that if we have no political influence we are thereby giving up the very essence, the very foundation of democracy. It may very well be that sometimes democracy may make mistakes in its decisions, but that is the only way in which higher levels can be attained. We believe the ultimate control of policy should rest with government, but detailed administration should be left to the appointed board; that governments should have the right to appoint and dismiss members of the board; that there should be a minister of state responsible for answering in parliament for the affairs of the board, but that parliamentary discussions of financial matters should be confined to questions of policy and not matters of detail.

We find a very fine example of this in the arrangements connected with the British Broadcasting Corporation which is a separate corporation, if you like, but the control of which finally is with the government. There is to a certain extent a similar arrangement in Great Britain under the Central Electricity Board. I cannot see why some such arrangement cannot be adopted in this country whereby we may have a board having under its control this bank and directing its administration but in its general policies subject to the government and to parliament.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would not think of taking up the time of the house at this stage were it not for the fact that the bill at present under discussion is in my opinion probably the most important measure we have had before us this session. The difference among various members with regard to this bill is whether it is wise to make the bank publicly owned and controlled or whether it should be privately owned and controlled. First of all I want to congratulate the government on some very constructive work they have done in the drafting of this bill. They have gone a long way; they have met the wishes not only of this corner of the house but, I believe, of the people in general, in regard to many clauses of the bill. If for instance it were a publicly owned and controlled bank that they were setting up the following features I think are requisite to satisfy the public demand. First, if we are going to recognize gold as being of value as a monetary base then I think it is absolutely necessary that the country should have a monopoly of the gold; and that is planned for. Second, it is equally important that it should have monopoly control of the note issue. That also is arranged for. Third, there should be some control over the private or commercial banks with regard to the amount of money they make available by the supply or withdrawal of money and credit in accordance with the public welfare. That also is arranged for. Fourth, arrangements should be made to regulate credit; that is taken care of in the bill. Fifth, there should be an effort made to regulate as far as possible foreign exchange; that also has been looked after. Sixth, I think it is desirable that the central bank should be the fiscal agent of both the federal and provincial governments, so far as they see fit. If therefore, it had been arranged to make this a publicly owned and controlled bank I think all those features are quite in order and in accordance with public demand. At page 98 of the appendix to the report of the Macmillan commission, I find this statement:

> It is not necessary for a central bank to have capital larger than is required to provide for its initial expenses, office buildings, etc.

So the Macmillan commission recognized that a comparatively small capital outlay is needed to start this bank. That being the case, and as we are continually voting in this house very much larger amounts of money than would be required for the capital setup of this bank for public works and for one purpose and another, it seems to me a very simple matter for the government itself to bear that expense. Under the bill presented to us it is provided that the capital shall be subscribed by shareholders. Even with the limited amount of capital required it would be possible to have no less than 30,000 shareholders. It seems to me unlikely that so many shareholders, spread from one end of this dominion to the other, although having the interest of shareholders in the bank, can in any effective way control the election and choice of the important officials needed for the conduct of the bank. Obviously they would be less qualified by knowledge and ability to choose such officers than would members of the government acting for parliament who would not only have considerable information themselves, but would have the right to call in advice from any quarter of this dominion.

I congratulate the drawers of the bill on the effort they have made to avoid any relationship between the commercial banks of this country and the so-called Bank of Canada which would lead to commercial bank control, but I have not seen in the bill now before the house any provision to divorce the trust companies from that relationship, although several of such companies are very closely connected through interlocking directorates with the banking fraternity. It seems to me most important that that feature should be taken care of, because as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) said last night, it would be very unlikely that if the banking fraternity wanted to get control of this central bank through the control of shares they would not find ways and means of doing so, unless we take particular care with respect to the trust companies with which they are so closely affiliated.

I was interested to observe that in section 20 (j) of the bill provision is made for the provinces to be financed to a certain extent by this central bank. This provision meets a wish expressed by me in presenting a bill two years ago to this house asking that the same privilege should be given to the provinces of this dominion as is enjoyed by the private banks of the country of obtaining advances on certain securities deposited with the treasury board. My bill was turned down at the time, but that feature is taken care of by this section. I am very glad to see this recognition of that need.

The position that we are going to find ourselves in in regard to this bank it seems to me is that the government of the day will be dictated to by the shareholders. I know that the Finance minister in his very able speech yesterday tried to show that certain safeguards are provided against that. The minister was very explicit in his reply to the question asked him the other day by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, when he said that unquestionably the authority of the governor and board of directors would prevail. I noticed that the minister said at the same time that parliament is always supreme. I would like to believe that parliament really has that supremacy, but when all is said and done, under our parliamentary setup what the cabinet says is usually accepted by those supporting them, and as they have a majority in the house it is a question whether parliament as a whole has much power if the cabinet has made up its mind.

One argument advanced by the Finance minister yesterday and which he stressed at some length, as to why this should not be a government-owned bank, was in regard to political appointments, and the likelihood of patronage creeping in and resulting in inefficient management. He dwelt at some length upon that point, yet I think that part of his argument was probably its weakest part. For instance if appointments made by the government of the day of officials of the central bank are to turn out bad, how is it that the government of the country through the civil service has on the whole carried on so well up to the present time? I have only to refer to the various commissions that are appointed, not by the civil service commission but directly by the cabinet, such as the grain commission, the railway commission, the tariff commission, and the judges throughout the country and the legal advisers; on the whole very good service has been given; they do not fall by the wayside simply because they were appointed by the government of the day. Last but not least I would like to refer to that class of officials which I mentioned yesterday, the deputy ministers. Without mentioning any by name, which would be very unfair, I do not think there are among them any that you might term "weak sisters." On the whole we have a very fine body of deputy ministers in this country. They have been appointed by different governments of the day, and the result has been very good indeed. If the government of Canada can make a success of appointing a deputy minister, why should they not be in a position to appoint governors, deputy governors and directors of a bank which is going to be the Bank of Canada?

It has already been said that the subject of a central bank has, for some years past, been discussed in this House of Commons. Probably hon. members in this part of the chamber do not take any credit for having raised the matter before other groups raised it, for it may be that we are a little closer to the people who have been asking for the setting up of something such as we are now considering. Although the Prime Minister only two years ago rather discounted the idea of a central bank for some years to come, we find that after visiting London he made great haste. I have often wondered why it was he became so active in connection with the formation of a central bank, and why he acted on such short notice. Was it because of pressure or influence brought to bear upon him in London? Why is it that only within recent months he has made up his mind to bring about the formation of a central bank which at one time he thought would not come into operation for many years? Was it because he was able to get a loan from London about that time of some £15,000,000 at four per cent? Why, we may ask, did we have to pay four per cent when only a year or two previously we ourselves had financed a loan of some $35,000,000 at one per cent? When I say we did it at one per cent I mean that that was the difference between what we charged the banks for an issue of dominion notes and what the banks charged us for the bookkeeping they were doing for the federal government. When we recognize that a loan was made from London at that time, the first which had come from that source for many years; when we recognize that one of the members of the commission which travelled across Canada was no less a man than Sir Charles Addis who at one time was connected, if not now, with the Bank of International Settlements; when we recognize, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that two officials of the Bank of England travelled across Canada with the commission, the presence of whom was not advertised, are we to take it for granted that there was some pressure exerted in connection with the setting up of a central bank which would have the effect of bringing it under the influence of the Bank of England? While on the one hand I must congratulate the government of the day upon doing all they can to guard against private bank control of the central bank, on the other hand, there seems to be a real danger, and one which I believe we have overlooked, of a possible disadvantageous influence from outside banks such as the Bank of England or the Bank of International Settlements over the Bank of Canada. There does not seem to be a realization of the influence such a condition may have upon the whole country.

Mr. RHODES: May I ask the hon. member a question? In view of what he has said, how does he justify his action last year in voting to tie the dollar to the pound sterling?

Mr. SPENCER: That is not entirely in line with the argument I am placing before hon. members at the present time. At particular times it may be worth while to tie the dollar to the pound sterling. But what I am trying to emphasize is this, that Canada should be mistress of her own house. The market to which we should pay most attention is the market within Canada. Our first aim should be to see that our people, with their great possibilities for production of goods and services, should be able to take full advantage of them. Our people can take full advantage of those possibilities if we have a financial system which at all times will enable them to have sufficient purchasing power, so that they may be enabled to make those exchanges. And if, as has been done in the past, we find ourselves in the position where on the one hand we have an abundance of goods and services while on the other we have an increasing number of people who are not only unemployed but under employed, and therefore not in a position to make those purchases, or in a position to take the fullest advantage of our great powers of production and services, we invite inevitable chaos. The fear I have therefore, is of adverse effects upon our whole financial system brought about by outside influence.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Last night the hon. member for Bow River placed on record some figures with respect to the total assets and liabilities of Canadian banks. He took the liabilities from the assets and showed in each case the balance in favour of the banks. Then he went on to show how much of what is now known as the C.P.R. loan of $60,000,000, was taken up by each of those banks. Without taking up the time of the house by repeating the figures I should like to make some observations in this connection. One big bank in Canada which had an excess of assets over liabilities of $1,551,159 took a share of the C.P.R. loan equal to $22,404,000. Another one with a balance of assets over liabilities amounting to $699,612 made a loan of $5,180,000. A third one with assets over liabilities amounting to $1,818,499 made a loan of $12,280,000. One may wonder how this was done, but the explanation is very simple. The situation shows, first of all, that the banks did not loan other people's deposits, because in each of these cases they loaned from six to ten times the total amount of the balance between their assets and their liabilities. As the Prime Minister quite properly pointed out, it shows that the security was put up by the company in question, backed, by the way, by the guarantee of the dominion government. What was it that enabled the banks to write into existence this $60,000,000? It was the security put up by the railway company, in the first instance, supported by the guarantee of the federal government. Therefore the transaction is based entirely on the assets and on the credit first of the railway company and secondly on the credit of the nation. It is because the banking fraternity have taken the privilege, and have been allowed to write credits into existence to any amount that they could get away with, and because such action is permitted, that we take the stand, that such an important function should be under much more drastic government control. When we face the possibility of having a government bank, a Bank of Canada, we feel that such an institution should be entirely under governmental control and not in private hands. Although there have been certain safeguards allowed—and we sincerely hope those safeguards will prove effective—at the same time there is no guarantee that they will be effective. We in this section of the house fear that the safeguards will not be strong enough, and that ultimately the institution will come under complete private control.

The present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) one of the ablest members in this house, and as we know, an authority on financial matters, when speaking in Toronto last year made two outstanding statements. The first was:

> Bank deposits consist largely of credit money which has been created by the banks.

I have just outlined that that was done with regard to the Canadian Pacific loan. The second statement was:

> The cheque system enables the banks to create credit money at will.

Of course, that is along similar lines. It is clear that, first, the creation and control of credit money is part of the crown's prerogative. Secondly, that prerogative is created for the benefit of the people and cannot be exercised to their prejudice. Thirdly, that prerogative has not been parted with, and cannot be parted with except by statute. Fourthly, the exercise of this power by any private corporation is without legal warrant, and consequently is illegal, differing in degree only and not in kind from the art of the counterfeiter. Fifthly, it is not in the interest of the state to renounce its sovereignty. It is because of these considerations that we lay so much stress upon parliament not giving up its control of the creation of credit and of money matters in general because through the control of private interests whose main incentive is profit, and who favour certain businesses with which the banks are connected by interlocking directorates, these great functions have not been always and may not be exercised in the interests of the state.

Our real problem, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me is one of purchasing power. In purchasing power can be found the key to various problems that we have confronting us at this time. It is the key, for instance, to the unemployment problem. It is the key to the underemployment problem. It is the key to the undernourishment problem, because we know full well that if this country with its vast riches of goods and everything that is required in the matter of food, clothing and shelter made proper use of its powers of production, plus its powers of distribution, there need not be anyone undernourished. Again, it is the key to the glut of commodities, because if we had proper means of transferring the many commodities that we make to the people who want them there should be no glut. Any surplus there might be would be very small indeed. Purchasing power is the key also to the stagnation of our trade. Some people think that trading must be done first before you can obtain money, but you must have money in some form before you can trade. If those who control money simply decided to take it out of existence by cancellation of loans, which can be done so easily under our financial system, it would at once put a crimp into our trade and would make trading impossible except by way of barter.

Lastly, the lack of purchasing power is in no small degree responsible for our difficulties with regard to taxation. A large proportion of our people are not in a position to pay their taxes. Further, when I remind this house that the total amount of income tax that is paid annually in this country is paid by less than three per cent of the population, in other words that 97 per cent of our people have not a sufficient income upon which to pay income tax, I think it will be recognized by everybody that something is wrong with our financial system.

In closing, I should like to put on record the reasons for the lag in purchasing power. I quote from the New English Weekly, a well known English paper:

> So much misunderstanding, misrepresentation and misinterpretation has lately overlaid the discussion whether industry distributes a deficiency of purchasing that it is necessary for us categorically to restate the causes of the obvious deficiency. The passage from Major Douglas' "The New and the Old Economics," and our columns are open to any Goliath of economics to show us where we are wrong.
> Categorically there are at least the following five causes of a deficiency of purchasing power as compared with the collective prices of goods on sale:
> (1) Money profits collected from the public (interest is profit on an intangible).
> (2) Savings, i.e. mere abstention from buying.

Everyone must recognize that to the extent that savings are not used to buy goods or services or loaned to others to buy goods there must be an equivalent amount of goods and services idle. It goes on:

> (3) Investment of savings in new works which create a new cost without fresh purchasing power.
> (4) Difference in circuit velocity between cost liquidation and price creation, which results in charges being carried over into prices from a previous cost-accounting cycle. Practically all plant charges are of this nature, and all payments for material brought in from a previous wage-cycle are of the same nature.
> (5) Deflation, i.e. sale of securities by banks and recall of loans.

With regard to the last-mentioned cause of the lag in purchasing power, we are giving to the central bank known as the Bank of Canada the power of inflation and deflation within proper limits, also the sale and purchase of securities, the making of loans to the federal and provincial governments and to banks, and the recalling of those loans. If the strings which the government are providing in this act in order to make the bank function as a semi-government bank are sound and strong, well and good; but we are afraid that they may not be strong enough to take care of the interests of the public. It is for that reason that we criticize severely the setting up of this Bank of Canada and turning it over to the control of private shareholders, who, through the manipulation of share control in the years to come, may bring the bank under the control of a few people, just as we find the shares of our private banks to-day in the hands of a few. If that takes place, not only shall we have lost one of the greatest opportunities that we have ever had of placing this country in a position to start out on a new era of prosperity, with a new and better standard of living, but we shall find ourselves in an infinitely worse position than we are in to-day.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, in introducing the resolution on which the present bill is founded, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) made the following statement, which will be found at page 824 of Hansard:

> The bill which is founded upon this resolution is one of unusual importance and significance.

That is a statement upon which I think all parties in the house are agreed. The Finance minister went on to say:

> It marks an advanced stage in our economic and financial development as a nation. The proposed central bank should not, I submit, be regarded as a break with the past; we are not departing from the system which was served us so well. Rather the central bank should be regarded as another stage in the natural evolution of our banking system.

I feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that that is tantamount to saying to the Canadian people that the evolution will be so gradual that they need not expect to see any change come from the establishment of this central bank. I was sorry to hear the minister make the statement that we should not expect any break with the past. I believe when the great war ended there was a distinct cleavage with the past. As the soldier was demobilized and fumigated, he left off his old uniform, put on a new suit of clothes and went out to face a new world. While it may have taken ten or eleven years to recognize this fact, I think that what occurred during the great collapse of 1929 and the four years of depression which followed has brought home to us the realization that we must face the future with an entirely new outlook and that we can never go back to pre-war day conditions. The minister stated that this proposed legislation marked an advanced stage in the economic and financial development of the nation. We have been told that thirty-six nations already have central banks, most of them privately owned. Will any hon. member say that any of those nations with privately owned central banks were outstanding in preventing unemployment or easing the situation through the great depression? It seems to me that we are simply placing ourselves in the same position as those nations which accepted central banks some years ago, and therefore adding to the danger of a world domination of banking policy.

Realizing the importance of this question, earlier in the session I introduced a resolution asking for a national system of credit and finance to be controlled in the interests of all the people. My object in doing so was to bring on a discussion of this very important question before any banking legislation was brought down. I sought to have the government fully advised of the views of the members of the house before committing themselves to any definite legislation. I was told that as my resolution anticipated legislation to be brought down, the time was not opportune for the carrying on of such a discussion. We now find that both the old parties feel that the second reading of the bill is not the proper time to discuss this question. Not long ago an eminent professor in the United States stated that there were only sixteen men in the world who understood anything about finance. There was no Canadian in that list, but I ask hon. members not to take the professor too seriously. During the debate on my resolution the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) seemed to take the opinion of this professor as final and to assume that the question of finance was too vast and sacred to be discussed by the ordinary individual. In fact, the minister went so far as to twit myself and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) with having the temerity to rush in where angels feared to tread. I do not lay any claim to being a financial expert, but I think I can say without any spirit of egotism that I possess, at least I hope I do, average intelligence and common sense; and I believe if these qualities alone were applied, some solution of our difficulties might be found.

In claiming that our present financial system is at fault I find myself in very good company. One has only to quote the inaugural address of President Roosevelt made last year and recall his indictment of the system and the money changers. One could quote scores of other prominent people throughout the world who are convinced that the root of our trouble lies in our financial system. I should like to put on record a statement of a former governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Vincent Vickers, who said in 1932:

> Obviously he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must rely upon the long experience and the wider knowledge of the Bank of England; but when things go wrong, terribly wrong; when we are told one day that the national safety depends upon the adherence to the gold standard no matter what the sacrifice; and a week or so later that our abandonment of it will bring salvation and prosperity to our industries; when the pulling of old levers no longer moves the signals; when the patient no longer responds to the old prescriptions . . . then surely it is time for the government to seek advice elsewhere, and to encourage open discussion, rather than attempt to "shelve" the question, as was done at Ottawa, and to avoid the issue because it is so difficult.

The fear of discussing monetary questions is a splendid example of the atmosphere which has been built up around the whole matter of finance. We have been taught to believe that finance was a subject for supermen and that it was the rankest kind of heresy and sacrilege for an ordinary individual to delve into the matter. It was surrounded more or less with a veil of mystery. But the disclosures of the last few years have rent that veil asunder and the picture disclosed was not altogether a pleasant one. With the idea prevailing that finance was a subject for supermen, the result has been that the ordinary individual has given very little thought to it. To-day we find that Mr. Average Citizen knows very little about financial matters. However, that condition is changing rapidly and to-day throughout western Canada many study clubs are engaged in the discussion of monetary problems. Right in this city there are many such clubs and one has only to travel across Canada in a smoking compartment to realize that finance is the main topic of discussion among the people. Speaking on the British budget in April, 1932, Sir Robert Horne said:

> These questions of currency always seem very remote from the ordinary life of the people, who have not had to consider them for more than 100 years, and yet the question of currency sits down at every table that is spread with a meal in every cottage or castle throughout the country.

Aristotle said that money exists not by nature but by law; it is the law that says what shall be legal tender, and it is in this house that we make the laws. I think everyone admits that there is something wrong, but when we come to decide just what it is there seem to be almost as many opinions as there are people. In my opinion, it is important that we first make a proper diagnosis of our trouble. When this is done we may then be in a better position to deal with it. In this house there are many hon. gentlemen who are prominent in the medical profession, and I think they will agree with me that the most important thing a medical man has to do when called to see a patient is first to make a proper diagnosis of the disease. As a matter of fact, until that is done more harm than good may come to the patient. If the doctor cannot tell at a glance what is wrong with the patient, I understand that he begins what is known as the process of elimination. In other words, he will first test the heart and if he finds it functioning properly he eliminates that organ for the time being, then examines the lungs, the liver and so on, eliminating each organ as he finds it properly performing its function. Now, if we apply that test to our body politic we can start with agriculture, and I presume that if I asked whether there was anything wrong with agriculture to-day almost everyone in the country would hold up both hands. But let me ask, what is the function of agriculture? The answer is the function of agriculture is to produce the foodstuffs required by the people of the world; and will anyone say that agriculture is failing in that respect? I do not think anyone will say so when we find the elevators bursting with grain, and that a policy of curtailment of production is proposed. Indeed, we see various countries destroying a part of their crops; we learn of coffee being burned, of cotton being ploughed under. I doubt whether there is a country in the world where the farmers are producing as much per capita as they are right in the Dominion of Canada. So far as agriculture is concerned therefore I think we can very well eliminate it in our search for the trouble; it is performing its function one hundred per cent.

Let us turn then to industry; and when we find many of the great factories in the last few years have either closed down or have been running part time, unable to sell their goods, their one great desire being to open up and to manufacture the things people need. We must admit, therefore, that so far as industry is concerned, it was never more efficient, never more prepared to supply the needs of people everywhere. And so we eliminate industry.

What about transportation? Was there ever a time in the history of the world when all the means of transportation were so efficient, never were we able to transport goods to the far corners of the earth so rapidly. And so we eliminate transportation.

Coming to labour, I would ask whether labour was ever more efficient than it is at the present time. Is labour refusing to work? I say, no. When we find thousands of people unemployed, not because they wish to be idle but because they cannot get an opportunity to earn a decent living, we must conclude that there is unemployment for some particular reason. One has only to read the evidence that has been adduced in the committee on mass buying and spreads to see where labourers have been working from fifty, sixty, to seventy-five hours a week and receiving only from $1.50 to $6.50 a week. I claim that when any individual works such long hours for such a pittance, it is evidence that labour is doing its utmost to earn a living and so keep away from charity. We have to confess therefore that labour is performing its function efficiently.

This brings us to the next organism that functions in the body politic, namely, finance. Now, what is the function of finance? In my opinion its proper function is to facilitate the exchange of goods. It is the link between production and consumption, and here we find every one of the organisms that go to make up the body politic anxious to perform its particular function and, indeed, performing it on the physical side 100 per cent, and yet because of the financial system the people are not able to make use of the goods which we are in a position to produce. It is the burden of debt which is strangling these various organisms and like a cancer will finally destroy them.

Let me give an illustration. A customer wants a box of matches; the storekeeper has matches on the shelf: what is the thing that keeps them apart? If the man has money in his pocket and walks in and lays the money on the counter he can walk out with the matches, but if he has no money no transaction takes place. Money is the link which connects the two. The thing we have to realize is that we have passed from the age of our ancestors, which was an age of real scarcity. The present money system was developed under that condition and apparently it will not function in an age of plenty. Our only scarcity to-day is artificial. I believe I am right in saying that there is practically no demand for goods that cannot be met if we are able to place the money on the table: yet there is a vast unfilled demand. On one side we find producers straining to produce, while on the other side there is unemployment, with consumers not allowed to consume. Something stands between, and that thing is finance.

I might give another illustration. Here is a beautiful section of country divided by a very deep ravine. People wish to trade with one another and they decide to build a bridge. That bridge is built, not simply as a thing of beauty to look at but for service. By and by trade develops and the bridge is no longer large enough to accommodate the traffic between the two sections of the country and so the people decide that they will have either to enlarge the bridge or to build a new one to take care of the increased traffic. They do not say, "The bridge not being large enough, we will restrict the traffic to suit the bridge." But apparently that is what we are doing to-day in the matter of finance. We are capable of producing in vast quantities, but because we cannot get sufficient tickets or tokens for the exchange of goods we are starting on a policy of curtailment, trying to limit the wants of people to the amount of money the banks see fit to let them have.

Professor Murdock of Perth university, in the New Era of Sydney, Australia, has written an article which admirably describes the situation:

> The world is not suffering from a lack of goods to-day, but from a lack of tickets for the exchange of goods. To give you a picture of what is happening in this world of ours, I must ask you to imagine a village—not a poor village—but a very wealthy one—threatened with floods. All the villagers come in haste to the railway station, where as it happens there is a train large enough to accommodate all of them, with steam up ready to go. They rush on board, but the guard comes along and asks them to show their tickets. Rather impatient, because the waters are rising rapidly, they get out and rush to the ticket office, only to be told that unfortunately there are no tickets to be had; the last were sold yesterday, and no new supplies have come along. They all rush back to the train, where they find the engine-driver engaged in putting out his fires. "I'm very sorry," says the station-master, "but I'm afraid you'll have to drown. If it's any consolation to you to know it, I shall have to drown with you. There's no help for it. Obviously the train can't carry passengers who haven't got tickets. That has never yet been allowed." So they all drown for lack of tickets.
> What would you think of a railway company which, instead of printing tickets sufficient for the number of passengers it might be required to carry, limited the number of passengers and the number of trains to make them fit the number of tickets it had printed? That is what happens in the world to-day.
> Instead of creating the right amount of money to carry on all the business possible in the world, we limit the business to make it fit the amount of money there is. We close factories, we limit production, we throw men out of work, we starve people, simply and solely for lack of money; and yet money is a thing we can create in precisely whatever quantities we choose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the hon. gentleman who wrote that article?

Mr. LUCAS: It is by Professor Walter Murdock of Perth university, Australia. I think that article admirably describes the situation which faces us to-day. On the one side we have a practically unlimited power of production and on the other unemployment and near starvation. If our money grew on trees and the trees failed to produce a crop, of course we might understand why we had a shortage of money. But even then by our scientific development I believe we would be able to turn the problem over to our scientists and in a very short time they would develop trees that would produce sufficient quantities of money. If the system we have at present is called sound money and it produces the existing situation, then I am sure none of us wants sound money.

There are those again who believe that only hard work and thrift constitute the solution for the present situation. That may have been all right for our forefathers whose great problem was scarcity and famine and whose only asset was a strong back and a pair of hands to produce a living. To-day the situation has entirely changed. With the development of science and power we are able to produce in such abundance that the whole outlook of mankind has been changed. If a man works harder, he naturally produces more; if he is more thrifty, he consumes less and therefore accentuates the very situation with which we are confronted.

One of the problems facing the world at present is how to learn to make use of the leisure time which is being forced upon us by the power driven machinery which we have produced. There is no question that the problem of our forefathers was one of scarcity and famine. In those days transportation and means of communication were limited and a famine was very serious. I am of opinion that with the development of science, transportation and the means of communication, there can be no such thing at present as a world famine. We are reaping wheat in every month in the year. Let us consider our tremendous power development; it is estimated that in this country we have potential water power to the extent of 44,000,000 horse-power, and so far we have developed approximately 7,000,000 horse-power. Engineers tell us that a horse-power is equal to the power of ten man units, so if we multiply 7,000,000 by ten; this means that we have turned loose in Canada over 70,000,000 men to assist us in our work of production and this is not taking into account power produced from steam, gas and oil. On top of that, in a very short time we shall probably be considering the development of the St. Lawrence waterway which will add the power of more millions of men. In the United States it is claimed that the great Boulder Dam scheme is equal to the power of 18,000,000 men. The development proposed in the Tennessee valley by President Roosevelt will supply power vastly beyond that amount. If anyone will go into any large power house in our country and see the giant turbines there developing power equal to millions of people, the whole thing being controlled by a handful of men, he will get some little idea of how men are being displaced at the present time. Rudyard Kipling in his inimitable style in a few short lines graphically describes this development in M'Andrew's Hymn.

> That started as a boiler-whelp—when steam and he were low.
> I mind the time we used to serve a broken pipe wi' tow!
> Ten pound was all the pressure then—Eh! Eh! —a man wad drive;
> An' here, our workin' gauges give one hunder sixty-five!
> We're creepin' on wi' each new rig—less weight and larger power:
> There'll be the loco-boiler next an' thirty miles an hour!
> Thirty an' more. What I ha' seen since ocean-steam began
> Leaves me na doot for the machine: but what about the man?

Yes, the question is: What about the man? It is estimated that in the United States even if we get back to the so-called prosperity we had in 1928-29, there will be six to eight million men unemployed. Therefore the development of this power means that men are compelled to stand idly and helplessly by and watch the machines do the work. The development of science in the technical and mechanical fields has been such that man has been placed in an entirely new relation to production. He has brought into being forces that answer to his will in such a way that if they were properly organized and directed, he could be released from drudgery and at the same time satisfy all his material needs. Tremendous changes are taking place in production, industry, transportation and means of communication and many of us who are living to-day have witnessed a great deal of that transformation. There has been wonderful progress in certain directions, but the contradiction of our present system is such that it cannot distribute the goods. Under a system where wealth can be produced in such abundance and where human needs can be satisfied on a scale which would have seemed impossible prior to a generation ago, poverty is rampant, poverty not because of scarcity but in the midst of plenty. It is my firm belief that the root cause of our trouble lies in the present private control of our financial system, and just as the industrial revolution which commenced approximately one hundred years ago changed the whole condition and outlook of man, what is needed to-day is a financial revolution.

We all remember reading about James Watt as he watched the power of steam raise the lid on the kettle, and about Michael Faraday as he watched the needle swing from his crude induction coil. Those men had a vision of harnessing some force, and to-day that vision has become a reality. All the great developments that have taken place in the past have required some outstanding individual to carry them through to success or to get them initiated, and I think anyone who is fair and unprejudiced will frankly admit the sterling qualities, wonderful ability, tremendous energy and driving force of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if he could only grasp the vision of the new world in which we are living, because I believe he is faced with an impossible task in trying to make the present financial system work. I am reminded of the story of General Wolfe as he sailed to the battle of Quebec; he was quoting that beautiful poem, Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard. He is reported to have said: "I would rather have been the author of that poem than take Quebec." Mr. Speaker, I should like to say with all sincerity to the Prime Minister that I would rather be the author of a humane system of finance that would enable men and women to retain their self respect and earn a decent livelihood than attempt the impossible task of bolstering up a system which may have served in the past but which, in my opinion, will not meet the needs of the future. I think if the Prime Minister would devote his great talents to this work his name would be emblazoned imperishably on the pages of history. This is an opportune time for the change. President Roosevelt has broken with the past; the Bank Act is being revised; a new central bank is to be established. I hope that Canada will give a lead to a weary and debt-ridden world. This is no time to scoff at new ideas. Let me quote what Goethe said two centuries ago in regard to the advance of new ideas:

[Mr. Lucas.]

If anyone advance anything new, which contradicts, perhaps threatens to overturn, the creed which we for years respected and have handed down to others, all passions are raised against him and every effort is made to crush him. People resist with all their might; they act as if they never heard nor could comprehend; they speak of the new view with contempt, as if it were not worth the trouble of even as much as an investigation or a regard; and thus a new truth may wait a long time before it can make its way.

Is there any hon. member who will rise and say that he is proud of our present condition, or that he can see any hope of meeting our present indebtedness?

Speaking when the bill for the central bank was introduced, the Prime Minister informed the house that there are thirty-six countries at present with central banks, most of them privately owned. I asked at the beginning of my remarks: Do any of these countries stand out as being in any better condition to-day than the countries without a central bank? Australia has a publicly owned bank, but if my information is correct the original purpose of the Australian bank was to finance the nation, and during the war it financed successfully and with advantage to the producers the sale of meat, wool and butter to the amount of £436,000,000, and in addition financed Australia's part in the war to the extent of £350,000,000, or a total during those years of £786,000,000. When it is remembered that at the beginning of the war the Australian bank was less than three years old, this was a remarkable feat. In fact it looked as if it were going to be too successful, and legislation was introduced in 1924 that had the effect of crippling the main activities of that bank. It would seem that under this amendment it now functions as a central bank chiefly to bolster up the private banking system of Australia.

While there are a lot of proposals before the world at the present time for financial reform, and while I have not sufficient information to commit myself to any particular one, I do believe that the scheme proposed by Major Douglas offers more hope than anything else that has yet been suggested. I think it at least deserves close study. Major Douglas is no wild-eyed socialist; in fact his plan is the very antithesis of socialism. He at least appears to have placed his finger on the sore spot of our present system, that is that the total amount of wages, salaries and dividends, by which alone purchasing power is distributed to the people, is not sufficient during any given period to purchase the products made during that period. Major Douglas proposes setting up a national credit account, a compensated price and a national dividend based on the productive capacity of the country. This could be done with a proper use of our social credit. Of course this is revolutionary in relation to our present financial system, but it is a revolution which it is claimed would improve without destroying our system of private enterprise and those things which we hold so dear under our present economic order.

If I might quote the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on March 6, speaking at Toronto, to the Rubber Association of Canada, in the last part of his speech he is reported as follows:

> Senator Meighen declared that unless something was done to decrease unemployment "we are blindly inviting the most appalling disaster democracy ever faced."

It is claimed that Major Douglas's scheme would greatly increase purchasing power without causing inflation. It is claimed that it would solve our unemployment and old age pension problems. When such bodies as British Rotary and the Southampton chamber of commerce eulogize this scheme—and we find the London chamber of commerce propounding something very similar,—it cannot be brushed aside with contempt. Major Douglas was here about ten years ago, but of course at that time very few people were giving thought to the financial question. I would like to quote a prophecy he made when he appeared before the banking and commerce committee at that time, which will be found in the journals of the house for 1923 at page 443. On that occasion he used these startling words:

> If you go along the lines that you are following at present and if you continue along these lines for any considerable period of time —I am not going to tie myself down to date— I am perfectly certain you are heading for the most terrific disaster that the mind of men can conceive.

That prophecy was made eleven years ago, and I think it has been amply fulfilled. I am informed that Major Douglas is at present in New Zealand, having previously visited Australia, and that he may return home through Canada. From the reports I have read of his meetings in Australia and New Zealand he has received a wonderful ovation; in one place something over 12,000 people came to hear him, I would like to take this opportunity of suggesting to the Minister of Finance, in view of the importance of the question we are now dealing with, and because we are setting up a central bank, something we have never had before, that we at least give Major Douglas an invitation to appear before the banking committee at this time. I think we will all agree that we are taking quite a different view of financial questions from that which was taken ten years ago, and we cannot afford to pass this legislation without the most serious consideration from all aspects.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, $35,000.

Mr. DUFF: What is the reason for this decrease?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): There is a saving in the spending of this item.

Mr. DUFF: What is the $35,000 spent for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The proposed appropriation includes necessary provision for the examination of masters and mates, $14,300; navigation schools, $5,700; temporary relief for distressed seamen, $2,500; investigation into wrecks, $5,000; registration of shipping, $2,000; removal of obstructions in navigable waters, $1,500 and inspection of livestock shipments, $4,000. In the year 1932-33 the expenditure was $28,605. I must add that the expenditure up to the present date in this fiscal year is $25,000. For that reason we believe $35,000 will be a sufficient vote.

Mr. DUFF: Where are navigation schools established in Canada?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is a school at Halifax, and also schools at Yarmouth, Saint John, N.B., Quebec and Prince Rupert. There is also a grant to the navigation school at Queens university.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister think there are sufficient schools of navigation to encourage young men to take to the sea?

Mr. DURANLEAU: These schools are not instituted for the purpose of inviting young men to go into navigation, or to take training in navigation. The purpose of the schools is to offer them an opportunity to study navigation so that they may obtain their certificates as mates, seamen and masters.

Mr. DUFF: I understand that, but it seems to me that if there were sufficient schools in the country more young men would be likely to apply for masters' and mates' certificates. The difficulty now is that these schools are so placed that it is a hardship for many of the young men in Nova Scotia to attend; they have difficulty in getting to Halifax or to Yarmouth. My idea is that in a number of Nova Scotian ports, where there is shipping, other schools could be established at small cost.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If we may judge by the attendance of young men at these schools I do not think it could be said that more schools are needed. For instance, the Halifax school is open during twelve months of the year, but the average monthly attendance is only seven. That school serves the whole province.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid the argument used by the minister is not a good one. I have always been taught that most of the brilliant young Canadians come from the farm or the village. Take Scotchmen, if you wish—I know of thousands of young men born in the highlands of Scotland away from the cities and towns who, like Dick Whittingdon, travelled to London and took charge of the government of Great Britain. I know, further, of a number of cases in this great Dominion of Canada where men born on farms or in little fishing villages on the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, have gone far in the life of this country. I do not expect that many people in the city of Halifax will attend the navigation school; no one would expect they would. That is the reason I have hinted to the minister that it would be much better to close the navigation school at Halifax and to open small schools in other parts of the province within easy reach of the seamen. It is a hardship for the people from Cape North or Neil's Harbour, or Canso, to go to Halifax to attend school for three or four months so as to obtain the necessary knowledge to become a mate. The same statements would apply to the western part of the province. For instance, let us consider the county in which I live. My opinion is that there should be a school for seamen and sailors in the county of Lunenburg, because it is in that county sailors are made. They do not make them in Antigonish, but they make them in part of Guysborough. There should be a school at Canso; there might be another one at Sherbrooke. As I say, the fact that only seven students attend the navigation school at Halifax is not an argument against the establishment of further schools. I must say that the teacher at the Halifax school is a most estimable gentleman; he knows his business, and it is not his fault that there are only seven pupils.

The point I am trying to impress upon the minister is this, however, that the department should endeavour to establish small schools in the rural sections of the province, and not particularly in the city of Halifax. The trouble in Nova Scotia is that Halifax is getting too much. In my opinion it would be a good thing to put a fence around Halifax, and do something for the rest of the province.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister has said there is one school in the city of Quebec. What opportunity does that offer the people of Bonaventure and Gaspé who are living four hundred or five hundred miles away from Quebec? What advantage is the Quebec school to those poor fishermen who wish to enter schools of navigation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that young men who wish to qualify as seamen obtain their early experience on steamships, or some other type of boat, and when they have acquired a certain degree of experience they attend schools and study for the purpose of obtaining the certificate of a master or mate. I understand that those young men who are anxious to gain their livelihood in that line of work gladly go from Gaspe to Quebec for the purpose of studying for a few months. At that point they take their examinations.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister imagine that under the present state of affairs, with fish selling at about two cents per pound, young men from Gaspe and Bonaventure could afford to attend the school at Quebec? Would it not be better to open a school in the Gaspe peninsula which is four hundred or five hundred miles from Quebec, so that those young men could have an opportunity to qualify?

Mr. DURANLEAU: May I remind the hon. member that the men in charge of fishing vessels do not require masters' certificates.

Mr. MARCIL: But outside of men on fishing vessels, may I point out that there are fishermen in Gaspe and Bonaventure who are five hundred miles away from Quebec. How can those poor people undertake to go to Quebec to follow a course of education? Why not establish a school of this kind somewhere on the Gaspe coast or on the north shore of the St. Lawrence between Chicoutimi and Saguenay where the fishermen live and where the sailors are born?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We would gladly do it to please my hon. friend and his electors, but it is not very convenient to establish schools in every part of all the provinces. We have a school now in nearly every province, one at Halifax and another at Yarmouth for Nova Scotia, one at Saint John for New Brunswick, one in the city of Quebec, one at Kingston and another at Collingwood for Ontario, and another at Prince Rupert for British Columbia. So far as I am aware there have been no complaints from the public that there is an insufficient number of navigation schools. We are disposed to do anything that is reasonable to help the navigators, but in these times when we have had to reduce expenditures generally we did not think of increasing the number of schools. But in the future, if things continue to improve, as I think they are improving, if we see there is a necessity for more schools, this government will be disposed to do anything reasonable.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister say how many students attended the school at Quebec last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Last year the school at Quebec was open for three months and had an average monthly attendance of sixteen.

Mr. MARCIL: You have a school in Yarmouth, and it is not as far for Nova Scotians to go to Halifax as the distance from Gaspé to Quebec. Why should not the same argument apply for Quebec province as for Nova Scotia? If you have a second school in Nova Scotia, why not a second school in the province of Quebec?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should hope the results would be better from a second school established in the province of Quebec than from the second school in Nova Scotia because at the school at Yarmouth, which has been open twelve months on half time, the average monthly attendance was only two, which is not very encouraging.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Move that school to Gaspé.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister says he is willing to give all the facilities that are required as conditions improve. Why should not the government itself start to improve conditions by giving to the young people on the Gaspé coast the facilities for learning a calling? They are all sailors and fishermen, and they have certainly not the means to go such a long distance as to the school at Quebec. I know the minister cannot finally decide the question to-day but I would ask him to consider fully whether this is not an opportune time for him to establish a school to enable these young people to learn a calling. They live on the Atlantic coast, and naturally are all fishermen. They would ask for nothing better than the opportunity to qualify for a calling if they could only be given the chance by the government. I think the minister should consider the question of having a school either in Bonaventure or Gaspé for these young people who live such a long distance away from Quebec. The question has often been mooted. These young people of Bonaventure have no other trade or occupation to go into whereas there are many trades and occupations open to the people of Quebec city. Down on the Gaspé coast the opportunities are limited to farming, lumbering and fishing, and the minister knows that so far as fishing is concerned the Gaspé coast is far behind what it should be. Representations have been made to him time and time again by men of both political parties, and by such an eminent personage as His Excellency the Bishop of Gaspé, who is now taking charge of this question in the interests of his people. He has called the minister's attention repeatedly, I am sure, to the handicaps under which this population labours and to the condition of the fishing industry itself. I think application has been made for the establishment of a biological station down there. I do not like to bring that question up on the Marine estimates, but perhaps I might be allowed to make a reference to it. I should like to know from the minister if anything has been done in regard to the requests made by Bishop Ross and the people generally on the Gaspé coast. The question was discussed no later than yesterday or the day before in the Quebec legislature, and it was contended there that if an agreement could be arrived at between the two governments it would be for the benefit of the population. I have no doubt that the minister is impressed with the importance of the matter and is willing to do what is possible. He will admit that conditions at the present time are not at all satisfactory and that something should be done if we want to help these people to carry on their calling. I am not asking for the establishment of schools above Quebec in that part of the province where there are no fishermen or sailors, but down in that part of the province where the sea is the natural calling of the population. I hope that the minister, who acts in the dual capacity of Minister of Marine and Acting Minister of Fisheries, will come forward and say that the government of which he is a member will give these people some encouragement and say that he is in favour of a progressive policy. If there is a misunderstanding, as it were, between the government at Quebec and the government at Ottawa because the fisheries of the province are under the control of the Quebec government, it is unfortunate that the population has to suffer on that account. It is for that reason that I bring this matter up, in the hope that the minister will be able to give us some encouragement, and tell us that he has considered this question and intends doing something. If he will give us some assurance on that point I am sure that his announcement will be received with great pleasure by the population generally of that peninsula.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should like to remind my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that we are not at the present time discussing the estimates of the Fisheries department. We are discussing the estimates of the Marine department. However, I have no objection to saying a few words on the question raised by my hon. friend. As he well knows, the fisheries were transferred to the provincial authorities in 1923, I think it was, at the request of the authorities in Quebec. Since then the fisheries have been under their absolute control, but nevertheless we were asked last year by the authorities at Quebec to cooperate and help them in the administration of the fisheries of that province. I had conferences with the Minister of Fisheries of Quebec, one at Quebec and another at Ottawa, and I expressed my strong desire as Acting Minister of Fisheries to help the Quebec authorities in the way suggested by my hon. friend. It was suggested that a French school might be established in Gaspe for the fishermen and to train inspectors of fisheries—a French school, which would be of service to the French fishermen of the province and of New Brunswick and the Magdalen islands. The Quebec government was supposed to supply the building, and two or three French teachers would be supplied by my department. The matter will be discussed further with the provincial authorities. I understand that the Quebec government has sent to Europe two or three young men who had already some knowledge in fishery matters in order that they may perfect their studies abroad. These young men may become the teachers of that school. I hope to be in a position before long to do something in cooperation with the Fisheries department at Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: I wish to thank the minister for his announcement. I know he realizes the importance of this matter. It is all right to have English-speaking schools in the English-speaking districts, but in a population which is largely French it is only fair that the people should be taught in the language in which they are the most competent. I understand the university of Laval has offered the services of young men or even professors who would be qualified to take up this matter and start it along. It is unfortunate that the population should suffer through a lack of cooperation between the two governments. I do not blame either this or the provincial government and I am glad to know that the minister realizes the importance of doing something for these people.

The Magdalen islands, the Gaspe coast, the north and south shores of the St. Lawrence, Gloucester, Shippigan and other places along there are inhabited almost solely by fishermen and sailors. If a start could be made at Gaspe, the centre of the whole district, I am sure considerable improvement would be made. The minister would be entitled to a great deal of credit if he continued his cooperation with the Quebec government. I am glad to know that Mr. LaFerté, the Minister of Fisheries of Quebec, has met the minister in this respect. The Bishop of Gaspe has offered his most sincere cooperation, as has the university of Laval. A sincere desire is expressed throughout the whole district that this great part of our national domain in which is carried on one of the great industries of Canada should receive the attention it deserves. These people are poor, they are hard working, they have to face hard winters and are handicapped in many respects. During the last three or four years there has been a marked decline in the lumbering industry and many shanties and mills have been closed throwing thousands of men out of employment. The fishermen are forced to work hard to eke out a living of the barest kind and they are entitled to all the assistance the minister can give.

I hope the minister will continue his efforts to bring about a better understanding. The province of Quebec controls these fisheries but the dominion government expends a lot of money in the improvement of fishing conditions and the distribution of knowledge in connection therewith. This fact was pointed out only a few weeks ago in the legislative council of Quebec by the Honourable Mr. Kelly, who resides at New Carlisle and who is an authority on fishing matters. He pointed out many ways in which agreement could be brought about between the two governments with the cooperation of Bishop

Ross. The bishop exercises great influence in the district and he has the interests of the people at heart. Fishing will always remain one of the main occupations of these people and I think some effort should be made to bring this matter to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have followed the discussions and the debates which have taken place in the legislative council and the house at Quebec and during my trip last summer down the St. Lawrence I visited the fishermen of Quebec and New Brunswick. I had the pleasure also of meeting Monseigneur Ross at Gaspé and I was impressed by the great interest which this reverend gentleman is taking in fisheries. I was impressed by his competency to deal with these matters and I told him that this government would cooperate with the provincial government on the lines I have already stated. We are still of the same disposition.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to know if the minister has instructed his deputy to go to Quebec. I understand that the premier of Quebec has made the announcement that negotiations were under way and that Mr. Found had been instructed to come down there to learn the views of the Quebec government and see how cooperation could be brought about. Could the minister give me any information in this regard?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Marine and not the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Could the hon. minister inform me whether the instruction in those schools is gratuitous?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The instruction is gratuitous.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): What was the maintenance cost of these schools at Halifax and Yarmouth, last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I can inform the hon. member what were the salaries paid to professors. At the Yarmouth school, the professor works only half time and receives $810.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What is his name?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): A. W. Hillton. At Quebec the school has only been opened since four months and we have paid out $440 in salary.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): For sixteen students?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): An average of sixteen students per month.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): How many students are there at Yarmouth?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I stated a moment ago that there were on an average two students per month.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): At Halifax?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): The school, at Halifax, is open twelve months per year and we have paid $2,100 to the professor.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Do the buildings in which are located these schools belong to the government or are they rented?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I think that the buildings in which the courses are given are rented. There may be one or two exceptions where the schools might be located in buildings belonging to the Public Works department; however, I think that in most cases they are rented.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Could the hon. Minister inform us what is the rent of the school at Yarmouth, if he has this information?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): It is impossible to give any information in this connection to my hon. friend, because the renting of such buildings comes under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): No report is sent to the Department of Marine by the Public Works department?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Not in connection with the payment of rents.

Mr. DUFF: The minister made the statement that last year only two pupils attended the school at Yarmouth. There is a reason for this. In the old days when we had freer trade relations not only with the United States but with the rest of the world, when there were not so many tariff restrictions, Yarmouth was known as the great port of Nova Scotia. Many vessels were sailed from this port and in fact, many were built there and sold throughout the world. A great mercantile marine was built up, but this situation has changed to such an extent that now there are only two pupils in the school. However, this is no reason why some encouragement should not be given to other parts of the province.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I never said there were only two pupils last year, I said that the average monthly attendance was two.

Mr. DUFF: How many pupils were there altogether?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say; I have only the monthly average attendance.

Mr. DUFF: I am not criticizing the minister at all; I am not asking him to close the school at Yarmouth. What I want is to have that school and others encouraged, and I think the department should make an effort to induce more pupils to attend the schools. But there are other parts of Nova Scotia where in my opinion it is necessary to have schools in the interests of this country. As my hon. friend from Bonaventure said, fishing is so to speak the birthplace of the merchant marine. It is the boys who go in fishing boats that afterwards become sailors and later on in life even captains of ocean liners going out of New York and other American ports. These boys are virtually raised in fishing boats from the time their eyes open, almost, and I am impressing on the minister the importance of establishing these schools. When he says that they are being cut down owing to economy, I say to him that that is the worst kind of false economy.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I did not say that.

Mr. DUFF: I understood the minister to say that it was done in the interests of economy.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am misquoted.

Mr. DUFF: Then I apologize and take it back. But I want to impress upon the minister the seriousness of this matter. There exists in Nova Scotia a condition which this or any other government should remedy, and this government is no more to blame than previous governments so far as the fisheries and the merchant marine are concerned. I am not blaming this government. I came to this parliament seventeen years ago, hoping to do something for the merchant marine and the fisheries of the maritime provinces, and ever since I have tried to do my duty. I repeat, there is a serious situation in that province and an effort should be made to remedy it. All it costs for one of these schools is about five hundred dollars, if my information is correct, and I submit to the minister that a school should be established at North Sydney, in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria, and also one in the county of Pictou, which would serve not only the north shore of Nova Scotia but Prince Edward Island as well. There should be one at Canso and one at Lunenburg. It would cost only a couple of thousand dollars for the whole thing and it would encourage young men to go to sea, because our trouble in Nova Scotia is that, owing to lack of facilities and because of certain marine laws based on British board of trade regulations, it is almost impossible for the ordinary sailor to go to school to learn to be a navigator or to qualify to be a mate or captain. These people have not the money. I say to the minister and his officials that in the interests of this country, especially as regards the Atlantic coast—and I presume the same applies to the Pacific—a few thousand dollars should be spent to encourage men to go to school and take an interest in the merchant marine. And I am an outsider when I say this, that if you encourage Canadians to become masters and mates you will not have so many Englishmen on ships in the Canadian merchant marine.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: How much money was spent by the Liberal government during the nine years the Liberal party was in power, supported by the hon. gentleman? How much was appropriated to teach the young fishermen of Nova Scotia—the hon. gentleman's province and mine?

Mr. DUFF: Perhaps my voice was not loud enough, but if the hon. gentleman had listened he would have heard me say that I did not blame either the minister or this government; I said that both this government and previous governments were in exactly the same position, neither having done their full duty.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: With which I perfectly agree.

Mr. NEILL: Doesn't the minister think there should be a school in Vancouver? I understood him to say that the school was at Prince Rupert, but I would point out that Vancouver is a bigger shipping centre.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that there are private schools in Vancouver, as there are in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. REID: In this connection, may I point out something that affects mates and engineers on ships. Both in the port of Vancouver and at New Westminster there are many ocean-going ships that require mates, and when Canadians apply they are asked for their certificate from the British board of trade. A British board of trade certificate must be shown before any man can be engaged on these ships, and it works a hardship on Canadian seamen, of the rating of mates and engineers, who cannot produce these board of trade certificates from Great Britain. Seeing that there are schools throughout the country, I think that these two Pacific ports should be taken into consideration when the establishment of further institutions is being considered. There is one at Prince Rupert and I raise no objection to that, but in Vancouver and New Westminster schools should be established, because as I say we are faced to-day with that situation, where mates and engineers are refused positions on board these ships owing to the fact that they cannot produce the certificate of competency demanded. The information has come to me from the men's association that men have been brought out from the old country to fill positions on ships while in Vancouver and New Westminster there are men capable of filling them. This statement has been made in good faith, instances having been cited. I would ask the minister to consider the inauguration of such schools so that men around New Westminster and Vancouver may be able to qualify and so obtain the necessary certificates of competency.

Last year there passed through this house a measure known as Bill C1, to amend the Canada Shipping Act. That bill was passed and sent to the Senate. Section 681 reads:

> The governor in council may from time to time appoint, at such places in Canada as he deems advisable, one or more persons to inspect ships' tackle and to supervise, to such extent as may be necessary for the protection of those employed therein the work of loading and unloading of ships.

Why has not the government taken action to appoint an officer in the port of New Westminster in connection with this provision? Over four hundred large ocean going vessels entered that port last year from all parts of the world, Norway, Sweden, Great Britain, China, Japan and practically every other country, but there is no government official there to inspect ships' tackle. I wish the minister would inform me why an officer has not been appointed before this, and whether such appointment in the near future is under consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As regards the first question, this is the first time I have heard that navigators or mates have difficulty in obtaining certificates to go to sea. I have always understood, and my deputy minister informs me that there is ample opportunity in Vancouver for seamen to study at private schools, and so to obtain the necessary certificates. However. I shall be pleased to take the matter into consideration and get more information, and if something can be done to improve the situation it will be done.

As to the other question, the reason inspectors of ship tackle have not yet been appointed is that my department have drawn up certain regulations for the prevention of accidents in loading or unloading ships and these regulations have been forwarded to all the shipping interests, associations of stevedores and so forth on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts for their study and report. As soon as this is completed, we intend to appoint inspectors where they are required.

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear that they are to be appointed, but I still think there has been considerable delay. Last year when the bill was under discussion in the house, those of us who spoke about the inspection of ship tackle, and supported the bill, understood that an officer would be appointed at least as soon as parliament prorogued. It is all very well to send out regulations, but unless there is some official who has proper authority from the government, I do not think any regulation would be carried out at least officially. I would urge the minister to have an officer appointed very soon because ship tackle inspection is absolutely necessary. Sailing out of the port of New Westminster last year were four hundred large vessels, all with considerable tackle, some of it very poor; but there was no one in authority to tell the captain or the officers that they could not use that tackle. I need hardly draw the attention of the minister to the fact that such tackle may endanger the lives of the men who are working on those ships.

May I refer to just one other matter and this time it is not to offer criticism? Last year I appealed to the minister to have some money spent on navigation lights in the Fraser river and the minister was kind enough to say that the matter would be investigated. I am taking this opportunity to let him know I appreciate on behalf of the port of New Westminster the work done on the Fraser river last year by his department and through his good offices. That work, I understand, has been very nearly completed and, I am glad to say, at a lower cost than the first estimate given by one of his officials. In fact, I think commendation should be given to the marine engineer in Victoria who said that the navigation lights would cost $60,000, whereas the work has been completed at a cost of around $12,000 or $15,000. This is the first engineers' report I know of that has been well under the estimate. My reason, however, for speaking is to say that I appreciate the work done there, but in regard to the matter of ship tackle I would very earnestly urge the minister to have this inspector appointed right away.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I thank the hon. member for his words of commendation.

Mr. NEILL: The real trouble in regard to the non-appointment of those officers is due, is it not, to the fact that the act passed last year was never brought into effect? It was to be brought into effect on proclamation and if my memory is not incorrect, it has never been proclaimed. I can support the hon. member for New Westminster in regard to the need for this inspection because Port Alberni is also shipping a large quantity of lumber and an inspector is badly needed there.

Mr. DURANLEAU: An inspector would not have much to do if he had no regulations to enforce.

Mr. NEILL: The regulations are in the act, but the government has not put the act into effect.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The regulations have to be adopted by the department and approved by order in council. As a matter of fact they have been drafted and are being circulated throughout the country.

Mr. NEILL: Has the act been proclaimed?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think so. We have been waiting until the regulations were ready to be put into force; then we shall have the act proclaimed at the same time and we shall appoint inspectors. We had in view having a ship tackle inspector in Vancouver, but we thought it was not the proper time to appoint a man because no regulations had been adopted. It is very important that those who are interested in these matters should have the opportunity of being consulted on the regulations to be adopted. I hope within a few months we shall have complete reports from all sides and then we shall proceed, I trust, during the coming summer.

Mr. CANTLEY: This item deserves more consideration than has been given to it by any minister in recent years. One of the first occasions upon which I rose in the house was to support the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), the former Minister of Marine, when the same question was up. Let us consider for a moment the object of these schools. A young man has been going to sea for a couple of years; he has ambition and he goes to the marine school to get some tuition in navigation and passes for second mate. He then goes back to sea as a second mate and after he has spent two years at sea, he returns with a certificate of servitude of two years. He goes again to school and applies for a ticket as first mate. He passes the examination; he gets his ticket and again goes to sea. After two years further service he returns to one of these navigation schools where he studies for a master's certificate and if he is successful, he gets it. These young men cannot travel long distances; they cannot go to Halifax and spend five dollars a day for board and tuition, so these schools should be planted in at least three or four places in the maritime provinces. Forty years ago Yarmouth had more sail tonnage than any other port in Canada, but that has evaporated. Why? simply because steam drove sail off the ocean. In the seventies and eighties Nova Scotia owned more sailing vessels per head of population than any other country on the face of the earth, but that has gone due entirely, as already said, to steam superseding sail. While I do not often do so, on this occasion I support the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough because I think we should have marine schools at Halifax, Lunenburg, Canso, Sydney and Pictou. The total cost need not run into large figures, but these schools should be provided, where our young men would have the opportunity of attending them, and that without any undue expense. My hon. friend the "Admiral" has alluded to the fact that at present many of the commanders of the best liners on the Atlantic are Nova Scotians. Half the United States merchant fleet is officered by Nova Scotians, who in order to be able to serve on those ships have had to sacrifice their Canadian nationality. Our boats that are running to-day under government control to the West Indies are all manned and officered by Nova Scotians, all of whom got their first lessons in seamanship under sail. The total figure given by the minister for these schools does not amount to a bagatelle; let him double it and give these young men an opportunity to become efficient deep sea commanders.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I thank the hon. member for Pictou for the views he has just expressed. The department is willing to hear and to put into force any reasonable suggestion made in the house and the views of a man of the experience of the hon. member for Pictou are always carefully considered. I also thank the other hon. gentlemen for their expressions of views this afternoon and I can assure them the department will be pleased to study everything that has been said to-day.

Mr. REID: Can the minister throw a little light on the subject of mates' certificates? I think the trouble arises owing to the fact that ships coming to the ports of New Westminster or Vancouver demand a Lloyd's certificate; they will not recognize a Canadian certificate. They ask for a board of trade certificate from London. I think the reason they are afraid to engage seamen with Canadian papers is in case they might have to pay their fare back or bring them back here from the old country. I appeal to the minister to look into that. There should be some reciprocal arrangements between this country and Lloyd's, if we recognize a Lloyd's or London board of trade certificate, instructions should be issued to vessels coming from the old country to Canada to recognize Canadian papers of competency.

Before sitting down may I ask the minister if he has in mind the appointment of a ship tackle inspection officer for the port of New Westminster as well as for the port of Vancouver?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the latter part of the query, I am not prepared to say if an inspector will also be appointed at New Westminster, the matter will be considered. As to the other point, I am afraid it rests with the owners of the ships to accept or refuse any employee, but I can assure my hon. friend that if anything can be done by corresponding with the British authorities on the point suggested we shall be pleased to do it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Referring again to the appointment of inspectors, some of us supported and voted for the Canada shipping bill last year wholly on the score that we thought these inspectors would be appointed as soon as the act was passed. I have been after the minister ever since I came down here to have these inspectors appointed. My understanding is that at the end of 1932 there was an agreement between the department and the stevedoring companies, in Vancouver at least, as to safety regulations. I thought the safety inspector would have been appointed even before the amendment of last year. What is holding up the appointment? Is it that the minister has not heard from the shipping companies, or that they are not in agreement with him on the regulations? If that is the case, then the shipping companies should be hurried because the situation is becoming serious.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The reason is that we are waiting for reports from the shipping interests on the draft regulations. In fact we have received many reports. Recently we have met the shipping interests from Montreal who came to discuss these regulations and suggested some amendments, and we are waiting for the others. I am told that it will not be long now. The moment these regulations are adopted and approved by order in council we shall put the act in force and appoint the inspectors.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to thank my hon. friend from New Westminster for bringing this matter to the attention of the minister, and I would ask that the minister write to these people and tell them that delay cannot be permitted much longer.

Mr. QUINN: I would like to add a word in support of the observations of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) and to protest against the reduction in this item. It is unnecessary for me to add anything to what the hon. member for Pictou has said with regard to the services of captains, officers, mates and graduates of the marine school in Nova Scotia and the maritime ports and their position in the mercantile marine. I quite agree with the hon. member for Pictou that instead of curtailing this amount, increased facilities should be given to the people of the maritimes who are so well qualified to take positions in the navy and the mercantile marine. In this connection I might also draw to the attention of the committee the fact that in Halifax the positions of superintendent of pilots and supervising examiner of masters and mates have been temporarily joined; that is the supervising examiner of masters and mates at Halifax is now temporarily filling the position of superintendent of pilots. That should not be; these positions are of such importance that one man cannot fill them both. I would urge that a permanent appointment be made to the position of superintendent of pilots and also that an appointment be made of supervising examiner of masters and mates. This matter is of great importance to the people of the maritimes. I would request that the minister reconsider the curtailment of this item in his estimates.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will give the suggestions of my hon. friend serious consideration.

Mr. HEENAN: I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Pictou tell of the ships officered by Nova Scotians, particularly in the mercantile marine. I would like to point out to the minister that there is another class of seafarers that ought to be given consideration, especially on boats owned by the Canadian government. I have a complaint pointing out that the staff of cooks and waiters on the West Indies service numbers thirty-six, and they are all West Indians except three. Many of the men who have been applying for those position—coloured men—are veterans of the late war, and they have not been able to get places. It is true they were given a trial last summer, but the service upon which they were tried seems to have been disbanded, and these men are now unemployed in Canada, while thirty-three West Indians are on the ships belonging to the Canadian government.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

THE FIRTH-BREARLEY STAINLESS STEEL SYNDICATE LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 10, respecting a certain patent owned by the Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Limited—Mr. Kennedy (Winnipeg South Centre)—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to ask the hon. member sponsoring the bill to give the reason for the extension by legislative action.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to revive and extend the patents in respect of a certain invention commonly known as stainless steel. The reasons for which the legislation is asked are briefly as follows: The information I have before me sets out that the inventor, Harry Brearley, a British subject, residing in England, obtained a Canadian patent in 1915. In the normal course of events the patent expired at the end of August last. Prior to the date of expiration a petition was filed asking that it be extended for a period of six years, the reasons being as follows: This patent covers an alloy. Without going into the chemical properties of that alloy I may say that its outstanding property is the production of steel that is stainless in character, and is used largely in the manufacture of cutlery. The war being in progress the services of Mr. Brearley, the British inventor who was one of the leading engineers in the service of Thomas Firth and Sons, steel makers, were commandeered by the British government. The firms which developed the patent required to exert all their energies towards the construction of munitions until after the close of the war. So that for the period of the war and for some time following the inventor was unable to develop his invention.

The invention is set out briefly as follows: The production of the alloy, otherwise than for purposes of munitions, was from the first rendered practically impossible owing to the great scarcity of chromium, almost the whole of which was required for munitions, and the preoccupation of steel makers with war work and the necessity of utilizing the whole of the steel works output for government requirements. The British government for the time being prohibited entirely the manufacture of the alloy for purposes of manufacturing cutlery. At the time this prohibition was imposed the use of the alloy had not been developed for purposes other than cutlery and munitions, and therefore the prohibition of its use for the manufacture of cutlery practically amounted to a complete cessation of its manufacture for non-military purposes. So that so far as the inventor was concerned the years of the war were lost, and it was not until a couple of years afterwards that he could take steps to develop it. The patent is held by the parties named in the bill, namely The Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate, Limited, which company is composed of the Firth of Thomas Firth and Sons and the original inventor, Brearley.

The principle of passing legislation to extend the ordinary life of a patent has been accepted on more than one occasion in this house. I took occasion to look up the precedents, and I have before me at least seven instances where similar action has been taken. Therefore I suggest that once the principle has been accepted we must face the question of merits. With this in mind I have indicated the merits of the present bill. If the house would be interested in having a list of precedents I shall state them briefly.

In 1930 the principle was acted upon in the case of an application by Stauntons Limited of the city of Toronto. In that instance the patent was extended from 1933 to 1938, a period of five years. In the case of the Canadian Cinch Anchoring Systems Limited of the city of Montreal, the patent was extended from 1930 to 1936, a period of six years. In the case of A. P. Frigon, of the city of Montreal, the patent was extended from 1922 to 1936, a period of fourteen years. In the case of Gold Medal Furniture Manufacturing Company of Toronto, the patent was extended from 1906 for a period of six years. In the case of the Facer Solid Steel Car Wheel Company Limited, of Perth, the principle was acted upon and the extension obtained for a period of nine years. This bill asks for an extension of six years, being the time which it is estimated was lost.

Mr STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to the hon. member there is no doubt about precedents. The ones he has quoted, however, are Canadian. There are two questions I should like to ask him: First, has the patent been extended in England, where the patentee resides? The hon. member has not given us any special reason for the extension in Canada. Such extension would certainly keep Canadian manufacturers from using the product.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): In reply to my hon. friend I would say that already, under patent, articles have been manufactured in Canada, by licence from the original patentees. That is the system by which it is being developed. I have before me the figures showing the extent of development in Canada, if the hon. member would like to hear them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not interested in that, except as to this point: The company using the patent will have to pay a tribute to the patentee, and rightly so, during the life of the patent. He has enjoyed that privilege in Canada, and the only reason the hon. member gives for asking for the extension of the patent is the prohibition order of the British government made during the war, which would affect only Great Britain.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It is not a matter of affecting Great Britain alone. The condition which existed in Great Britain existed to the same extent in Canada. The steel works were used almost exclusively not only in Great Britain but throughout the British Empire for the manufacture of war munitions, and for that reason the articles which would be made under this patent could not be made. The time asked for is really equal only to the loss of time suffered.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are there any requests from the companies who under the patent purchased the right to manufacture?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I did not hear my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Can my hon. friend give any assurance that the companies who purchased the right to manufacture under this patent, expecting naturally at the expiry of the life of the patent to be free from paying any further compensation to the patentee, have made any requests?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Due notice was given in the ordinary course. The matter came up in the usual course in the private bills committee and no objection whatever was entered by any person or party.

Mr. GIROUARD: Can the hon. member say in what year the patent was first obtained?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): In 1915.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. MacNicol in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, $35,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Before the recess I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the plea made by hon. members from Nova Scotia for the establishment of three other schools of instruction in that province. I noted that the minister in his explanation stated that there were already two schools in that province, one at Yarmouth and the other at Halifax. I also noted that the number of students who attended these schools during the last year was two at Yarmouth and six at Halifax, while the school at Quebec had an average of sixteen students during the season. If we are to judge by numbers, those figures might go to prove that the sailors of the province of Quebec take a stronger interest in the school of instruction than do the sailors in the maritime provinces.

In view of the admirable patience with which the minister has listened to the pleas that were made to him I venture to call his attention to the needs of the lower St. Lawrence, including the counties of Témiscouata, Rimouski and Matane. As the minister very well knows, sailors' families have been established in all the parishes of these counties for over a century, and the officers and men who man the fleets running from Montreal down to Matane come from these families. The minister knows how expensive it would be for the sons of these families to travel from points further down the river to the city of Quebec to take a course of instruction at the school there. He will recall that in the county of Rimouski at Father Point is situated the pilot station for the lower St. Lawrence, and there he has an officer of his department, an ex-pilot, a very well educated man, who is extremely well qualified to take charge of one of these schools of instruction. I am asking the minister seriously to consider the establishment during the winter of a school of instruction at Father Point so that the sons of these families will have the opportunity of getting instruction. I can assure him that the expense connected with such a school would be absolutely nil because the school itself could be located free of cost either through the municipal council or in one of the buildings belonging to the Department of Marine or the Department of Public Works. Secondly, the instructor for such a school could be chosen from among the present personnel of the Marine department at Father Point. Captain Lachance would be an admirable instructor for such a school. I have already spoken of his qualifications. He is paid his full salary during the summer but receives only part-time salary during the winter. If he were paid his full salary for the whole year I am sure that he would be very willing indeed to undertake this task.

I make this appeal to the minister because like many of my colleagues in the house I have received numerous applications and demands for such a school, and we could do no more than refer them to the Department of Marine, where they have been told that the only school that exists in the province of Quebec was in the city of Quebec. The great majority of those who would like to take instruction in such a school could not possibly afford to pay their travelling expenses to Quebec and pay for their board there. It must be borne in mind that no allowance is made to the students attending these schools. They do not receive their railway fare or anything of the kind, but have to pay all their own expenses. In these times of stress it will be realized that it is not simply inconvenient but practically impossible for these young students to attend these schools, and therefore I hope the minister will give us people of the lower St. Lawrence the same—shall I say?—favourable consideration that he has promised those of the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): On behalf of the fishermen and mariners of northern British Columbia I wish to thank the Minister of Marine for establishing one of these schools of instruction at Prince Rupert. I have received many letters of appreciation of the fine service which the school at Prince Rupert is rendering, and I am therefore sorry to see that this vote is being reduced. These Canadian men make their living from the sea and this school is a great thing for them. Instead of decreasing the vote I think it should be increased, but I thank the minister on their behalf for establishing the school. The young men of Canada who make their living from the sea should receive every encouragement.

Mr. BROWN: Before the committee rose at six o'clock the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. MacInnis) was inquiring with regard to a bill which contained certain provisions with reference to labour. I think he was referring to the bill passed last session which amended the coastal laws. My understanding is that it has not yet been put into force.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is not yet in force.

Mr. BROWN: Is that because hon. members opposite representing farming constituencies made protests to the minister after having voted in favour of the bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not at all.

Mr. BROWN: Why has this law not been put into force? We should like to know why legislation adopted by the house in the face of very strong opposition has not been put into force. Is it because protests have been made by farmer members opposite?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. gentleman will recall that that law was to come into force upon proclamation. At the time there were certain difficulties which prevented its being put into force, and those difficulties have not been overcome.

Mr. HEENAN: Before adjournment I asked the minister if he would consider giving employment to the coloured stewards and cooks in Halifax about whom I spoke. I am wondering if he has given this matter some consideration during the recess.

Mr. MANION: I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the Canadian National Steamships rather than the Department of Marine. I heard some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman just before six o'clock and I have asked my secretary to look up the file and perhaps a little later I may be able to give my hon. friend some information. I dealt with this matter quite fully some time ago.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I should like to inquire of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether any progress was made at the dominion and provincial conference in connection with cooperation in the fisheries.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house this afternoon as I gave some explanation in this respect, notwithstanding the fact that we were not discussing the estimates on Fisheries but those on Marine. If my hon. friend will again put his question when the estimates on Fisheries are brought down, I shall be pleased to discuss the subject with him.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I am quite aware that the present discussion is on marine schools. What I wish to point out to the hon. minister is that the recruiting of sailors, engineers or seamen is especially done in the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé. There is no naval training school in the Gaspé peninsula. There is one in Quebec and it is the only one where the Gaspé people can qualify as seamen. The citizens of Bonaventure, Gaspé and the Magdalen islands are obliged to travel 500 to 600 miles to reach Quebec in order to learn this trade. I think this is not very encouraging. It would be much preferable to have a school in Gaspé or in the surrounding country or again make some arrangement so as to encourage the fishermen of that section of Quebec who wish to follow this occupation and are obliged to travel 1,500 miles to do so. Under the circumstances, I would inquire from the hon. minister whether he intends to establish a marine training school in Gaspé itself, or in the neighbourhood so as to encourage our fishermen and our seamen.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I must inform my hon. friend that the question has not yet been considered. To multiply these schools in the various sections of a province would be departing from the policy followed heretofore by all governments. There are marine schools in one or two locations in almost every province interested in navigation matters. I am willing to consider whether it would be possible to put into practice the suggestions made by my hon. friend, however, I wish to point out to him that it would be completely changing the practice followed heretofore.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): I am aware that such a policy should perhaps have been adopted before to-day; however, this is not a reason because nothing was done in the past, not to establish such schools in the future. I wish to point out that the marine school at Quebec is not centrally located. Schools should be established in localities easy of access for those who wish to become seamen. Quebec, I know, is a maritime port, however, it is far from the sea and there are few people from that section of the country who wish to become seamen, while in Gaspé, for instance, those who live along the shores of the gulf are naturally more attracted to this kind of life.

Item agreed to.

To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $40,000.

Mr. HANBURY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is to provide subsidies for wrecking plants, one at Quebec and one at Victoria, British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): What were the expenditures last year in British Columbia and on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have an agreement with the Pacific Salvage Company which runs until 1935 for $10,000 a year.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Is that the total amount expended on the Pacific coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, under agreement.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Would the hon. minister state to what companies subsidies were granted last year in the province of Quebec?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): To the Quebec Salvage Company.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $8,000.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): What unforeseen expenses were made last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Does my hon. friend refer to the present fiscal year?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Up to February 28 last, we had expended $4,164.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Could the hon. minister supply some details in connection with this amount?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): There are a number of small amounts. On the whole they refer to fees of notaries or lawyers and a few travelling expenses of officials.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the minister be good enough to give the names of those receiving salaries or fees?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Captain H. W. King; Captain J. O. Gray; A. C. Brown; C. M. O'Brien; C. K. Hanson; W. M. Griffin, K.C.; W. F. O'Connor, K.C.; A. Chassé; J. E. L. Heroux; J. Chevalier; L. Paulhus; R. Langlois, K.C.; W. T. Haydon.

Mr. DUPUIS: That covers the whole country?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Hydrographic and tidal and current surveys, and to provide for the maintenance and repair of hydrographic steamers, $400,000.

Mr. HANBURY: What is being done in hydrographic work in British Columbia waters?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The work is mostly on the west coast of Vancouver island.

Mr. HANBURY: What is the total equipment available in British Columbia waters?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The charting operations were carried out with the new hydrographic steamer William J. Stewart and the auxiliary houseboat tender, both parties working along the west coast of Vancouver island. The steamer carried out operations in the exposed offshore waters while the houseboat work was confined to more sheltered localities.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister has just referred to a steamboat called the W. J. Stewart. As everyone knows, that name is very improper; he could have been a very respectable citizen but he had a very disagreeable character. The name of the boat should be changed to Alex. Johnston in honour of the former deputy minister, who has not been replaced.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not name it Pouliot?

Mr. POULIOT: It would be more than an icebreaker in that case. I would suggest that the boat has had the name W. J. Stewart long enough and the name should be changed to Alex. Johnston in memory of the last deputy minister of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few comments in French in connection with this item. The other day, while perusing the last report of the Civil Service Commission, I noted that it was suggested to merge all cartography services of the various departments. This I think would be a mistake because, with modern inventions, more up to date methods are used in making the maps; there are the aerial, marine and ground maps. The marine maps are prepared from all such data.

Aviation plays an important part in the preparation of maps, and I think that those who specialize in this work can hardly be expected to do other work. I wish to ask the hon. minister whether he intends to foster specialization of cartographers or whether each of them is bound to be more or less jack of all trades. It is an important matter because marine maps are so absolutely necessary. The minister was kind enough to forward to my address, some time ago, a very complete map of the river St. Lawrence. This map indicates every reef—the government would be well advised to avoid them!—beacon, harbour, which are continuously useful to navigators not only every day, but at all hours and every minute.

I wish to ask the minister a further question. First, does he intend to encourage specialization in cartography and whether his department takes advantage of aviation and other means to obtain accurate observations in connection with geographical maps. I shall not further insist; however, it is an important matter.

There existed a service in the Interior department where members could have their geographical maps mounted on linen. The other day I was informed by a Civil Service commissioner that the person who looked after this kind of work had been dismissed. Would the minister be kind enough to inform the house whether, in the Marine department one can have maps mounted on linen so as to preserve them longer? It is not an economy to dismiss an employee who mounts maps on linen. Otherwise, the maps get torn sooner, and instead of having to give a person one map, a number of them have to be given out, because it is difficult to preserve them. I draw the attention of the minister to this fact and I trust he will be so kind as to give the house the information required.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, so far as the work connected with maps in the department, we intend to utilize our best qualified men and the most up to date methods.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): That is the government's policy. I also wish to inform my hon. friend that we take advantage of aviation, whenever possible, in the preparation of our marine maps, especially on the north shore of Quebec. I think we also utilize the services of aviators in British Columbia. I shall give serious consideration to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I thank the hon. minister. I would request him to inform the committee whether members who have geographical maps, which are continuously in use, could have them mounted by employees of his department.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I shall inquire from the department and shall be pleased to communicate the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I want to draw the attention of the minister to a representation made to him in regard to giving assistance under this item in the way of navigation lights and tidal and current surveys on the north end of Queen Charlotte islands at a place known as Whey Point. The fishermen and navigators on the coast have asked that some assistance be given at that point and the minister informed those who inquired and also myself that the matter would have his consideration and that something would be done. It is a necessity in connection with navigation in current and tidal waters on the north end of Queen Charlotte islands and I hope the minister will see that something is done at that place in the near future.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Radio aid to navigation service, to provide for the construction and maintenance of radio ship to shore stations and the general administration of the provisions of the Radio Act and regulations throughout the dominion, $590,550.

Mr. DUFF: Might I ask the minister whether this item is entirely within the province of the Marine department and has nothing to do with the radio commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Nothing to do with the radio commission.

Mr. DUFF: Who has charge of this work in the minister's department?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Commander Edwards.

Mr. HEENAN: Is it not a fact that the government has entered into an international agreement with respect to safety of life at sea and that a code has been drafted among several nations? I understand it was designed to assist some of the backward maritime nations. If I am correctly informed, several exemptions have been made by the Dominion government. For instance, an exemption is made in the case of coastwise shipping and of ships that keep off the rocks to the extent of about twenty miles. I would point out to the minister that there is more danger to ships that are closer to the rocks than to vessels that are far out at sea.

Mr. DUFF: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister will agree that if he went on the rocks he would be in greater danger than if he were out in the depths. If a ship at sea loses her rudder, there might be a chance of her getting assistance, but if she loses her rudder twenty miles or closer to the rocks, she needs more help than if she were out at sea. Would the minister give us an explanation of this exemption? For many years Canada has boasted of being a progressive maritime nation, in fact, words to that effect will be found on the portals of this building, and it seems to me the Dominion government ought to lead the way in regard to safety of life at sea rather than try to find loopholes in this international code in order to save a few dollars.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can answer my hon. friend by saying that no important exemptions have been granted which would have the effect of endangering life at sea.

Mr. HEENAN: I have under my hand an article which is based upon an announcement which appeared in the Canada Gazette. Unfortunately the article does not give the date. It states:

Among many exemptions, one of particular importance to Canada was that of ships sailing on fresh water, this excluding the great lakes from the scope of the convention. Coastwise shipping is also exempt.

It goes on to say, again quoting from the Canada Gazette:

(1) Passenger ships carrying less than fifty persons all told, provided they keep within twenty miles of the rocks, and do not sail further than two hundred miles between ports; (2) other passenger ships which were not required to be radio-equipped by the Radiotelegraph Act of 1913; (3) freighters which keep within one hundred and fifty miles of land; (4) all freighters of less than 2,000 gross tons, this limit of exemption to be reduced to 1,600 tons in 1938 unless extended in the meantime; (5) sailing ships; and (6) ships which make international voyages infrequently.

That is taken from The Canadian Unionist, a labour paper that is very much interested in men who follow the sea. If it be correct, the minister ought to recommend to his colleagues that this is a poor way of saving money.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Our regulations are standard, similar to those adopted by the United States and other countries. There is nothing special in our own regulations.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would like to ask the minister what has been done under this item in regard to navigation in the Hudson strait, Hudson bay and James bay. If my information is correct, there is no way of sending meteorological reports to the northern sections of the country. I know as an actual fact they have to get in touch with maritime ports in Baffin Land and similar sections through broadcasts from Chicago and other United States stations. The government should establish meteorological stations that will cover the whole section of the country including Hudson bay, James bay and the strait. Will the minister tell us of the activities that have been undertaken in the last two years in this regard?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall gladly go into the matter with my officials and see if we can remedy the situation.

Mr. BRADETTE: It seems a strange anomaly that at the present time we have to get meteorological reports on Hudson strait from an American station. We should at least have that service from Canadian stations during the summer months. Surely with this big expenditure during the last two years the department could give a certain amount of service in that section. It is absolutely needed.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have meteorological stations at Churchill, Chesterfield, Coppermine and Nottingham island, from which stations we have reports every day.

Mr. BRADETTE: Here in Ottawa?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, to Ottawa.

Mr. BRADETTE: I know for a positive fact that we cannot get these reports in my section. There must be some fault in the arrangements. If we want to get into contact, for instance, with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Baffin Land or in the northern sections of Canada, it has to be broadcast from Chicago or some American station. Surely with the amount that is being expended that service can be given by a Canadian station.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told that the radio commission is broadcasting messages to the north all the time.

Mr. BRADETTE: Through all-Canadian stations?

Mr. DURANLEAU: All-Canadian.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does the minister state that positively? In our section there has been much criticism on the ground that these broadcasts have to be sent through American stations.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is the first time we have heard of it. I am told by my officials that the radio commission broadcasts all the messages through Canadian stations.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the minister give particulars of work that has been done on these lines in Hudson strait and Hudson bay—the actual work accomplished during the last year in that radio navigation service?

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the last two years my department has built five stations at Churchill, Nottingham island, cape Hope's Advance, Resolution island and Chesterfield, all fitted with direction-finding apparatus.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister and the hon. gentleman permit me to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan)? The hon. gentleman mentioned the coloured ratings on the West Indies ships. I hold in my hand a file dealing with the matter, so the hon. gentleman will understand that this is rather an old question. I shall read some paragraphs from a letter of Mr. Allan, general manager of the Canadian National Steamships, to show the position they take in the matter:

> What these men actually want is to replace the West Indians on the vagabond cruise boats, to which, of course, we have no objection whatever provided (1) they will accept the same wages and (2) we can be assured that the service will not deteriorate thereby. It is most unsatisfactory to have half the crew engaged in Canada and the other half in the West Indies, as this means opening two sets of articles and causes confusion.
> I have promised a delegation of these men to give the matter some very serious thought, and if it is possible to work out an arrangement whereby they can be employed I will do so, but we will be in the unfortunate position that in the event of these men leaving in the summer time when these vessels proceed to Montreal, we may have to go short of ratings or depend upon picking up further men when the vessels return to Halifax.
> The three eastern passenger vessels, namely the Lady Nelson, Lady Drake and Lady Hawkins, now all carry white ratings. The additional expense to the company in breakage, etc., is averaging just about $500 a trip notwithstanding the fact that the men are paid the same wages as were the West Indians; the service is also falling off and we are changing approximately 40 per cent of the men each voyage in an endeavour to establish a satisfactory service.

In explanation of the last paragraph I may say that the fact was that a good many Canadians, both white and coloured, objected to the fact that there were so many West Indians on these boats, and wished to get the positions. The white Canadians who were asking for the positions—this is about a year ago—were mostly dining car men who were not accustomed to working on ships. I obtained positions for a considerable number of them on these boats, and it is to them Mr. Allan is referring. In my opinion we should, as far as we can within reason, give both white and coloured Canadians a fair chance to work on these boats, but it must not be forgotten that the West Indian islands pay subsidies to these boats and must be given some consideration. Also there are other points that have been put to me in this file, not by Mr. Allan, but by others, which make it a very complicated question which I prefer not to discuss here in the house, but shall be glad to discuss with my hon. friend on some private occasion, because it deals with matters that do not interest the house as a whole and that may be misunderstood. I assure my hon. friend that as far as I am concerned, and the government, we have endeavoured to get the management of the steamships to look after Canadians both white and coloured, but they make very strenuous objection; and in this letter some paragraphs which I have not read refer to some of the men who signed the letter that I think my hon. friend read before six o'clock, and state that in the case of one he was dismissed for cause. I mention that to indicate to the hon. gentleman the complications in the case. However, I have the matter in hand and will do everything I can to further it.

Mr. HEENAN: I shall be glad to discuss it with the minister.

Radio service, to provide for the general improvement of reception conditions to licensed broadcast listeners, $259,400.

Mr. FACTOR: In connection with this item I should like to draw attention to station CRCT in Toronto. Before the station was taken over by the commission—

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will permit me, this item has nothing to do with the broadcasting stations.

Mr. FACTOR: "For the general improvement of reception conditions to licensed broadcast listeners." I imagine that has to do with ordinary listeners.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As far as interference goes, yes, but not as far as broadcasting stations. That would come under the item concerning the radio commission.

Mr. FACTOR: Do I understand that this item relates to the improvement of general radio reception?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is for the improvement of reception.

Mr. FACTOR: That is what I am discussing now. The reception from station CRCT in Toronto was excellent until the radio commission took it over. They transferred it to a new wave length, 960, I believe, and now it is impossible to get good reception from that station. For instance, when the Prime Minister was speaking to the Western Conservative Association in London, I tuned in on that station to get the speech and it was impossible to hear the Prime Minister because of the hum and interference. It seems that a certain Mexican station interferes with this station and almost blankets it. I understand that a great many complaints have been made in respect of that interference, and that the technical expert of the department has endeavoured to negotiate with the Mexican government concerning it. I should like to ask what has been done in that regard and if any improvement may be expected.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told my hon. friend, this discussion should take place when the estimates for the radio commission come before the committee. The item concerns receiving sets only and interference by power lines and so on. For instance, if telephone lines in Toronto were interfering with reception in the house of my hon. friend, my department would attend to that; but I must say that this item has nothing to do with the difficulties in connection with broadcasting stations and wave lengths which come under the radio commission.

Mr. FACTOR: There is certainly conflicting jurisdiction. As I understand it, this item is for the improvement of reception conditions for licensed broadcast listeners. As a licensed broadcast listener who pays two dollars to the department over which the minister presides, I am entitled to make some complaint about the reception on my radio set. That is exactly the complaint I am making. As a matter of fact this payment is made out of the consolidated revenue fund and is charged to the department. The department is responsible for improving radio conditions and eliminating interference. It is impossible on the present wave length to obtain even fairly good reception of the programs broadcast from CRCT, formerly station CKGW. I should like the minister to explain the purpose of the vote. Is it not to improve the very thing about which I am complaining? If reception is bad it is the duty of the minister, through this vote, to improve it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This appropriation is to provide for the maintenance and general improvement of reception conditions of licensed broadcast listeners, including elimination, as far as practicable, of preventable interference with reception throughout the dominion. It provides also for expense in connection with the sale of radio receiving licences.

Mr. FACTOR: That bears upon the point I am making. I have received many letters complaining as I am now complaining. They state that reception from the station CRCT is very bad. I should like the minister to explain why he cannot use part of this vote, which is specifically for the purpose of improving reception, to try to eliminate some of the conditions which prevent good reception from that station. Has the minister's department made any investigations or received any complaints about reception from that station?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As has been stated, we have trouble with the Mexican stations, and of course it would be very difficult for us to eliminate them. As my hon. friend knows, last spring a North American radio conference was held in Mexico but nothing of a definite nature was agreed upon. As a matter of fact at the present time we are contemplating the construction of very powerful stations in Canada in order to protect our wave-lengths from Mexican interference.

Mr. FACTOR: The reception from radio station CRCT, is doing incalculable harm to the very principle of public ownership of radio. I have received dozens of complaints from citizens of Toronto complaining about the continuous hum and interference in the reception from that station. Surely it is not sufficient for the minister to say that nothing can be done with the Mexican government. If that is so, it is the duty of the department or of the radio commission to transfer the Toronto station to some other wave length, so that the people in that city will be able to get at least fair reception from the only station there operated by the radio commission. I want to ask the minister if he will be good enough to investigate the matter and, if he finds it impossible to do anything on the present wave length, have the station transferred to some other wave length.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to refer the matter to the radio commission, and forward the complaints of the hon. member. I am sure the commission will investigate the matter.

[Mr. Factor.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. member for Témiscouata was on his feet a moment ago, and he should be allowed to speak at this time.

Mr. POULIOT: I would respectfully suggest to the minister not to insinuate anything to the chairman of the radio commission, but to tell him to do this, and to do that, and to say, "Those are my instructions." The minister should speak firmly to the chairman, so that he may understand he is a civil servant and must obey the minister when he is told to do something. The minister should tell him, "You, Charlesworth, do this and do that. You are not to play tricks on me; you will have to listen to me and do as I say, otherwise no more salary for you." Then, the chairman will act at once.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any negotiations which may be carried on with the Mexican government, but I do not want to have the wave length at Toronto changed to the disadvantage of wave lengths now existing in other parts of eastern Canada. I know that influence from the city of Toronto is so strong that that city might get almost anything it desired, but, in the community from which I come, situated as it is not far from Toronto, we do not desire any change which while being advantageous to the city of Toronto would be to our disadvantage. That city has been fairly well provided with stations, and I must urge that any possible change in Toronto be to the disadvantage of conditions in Hamilton.

Mr. BRADETTE: Since the hon. member for Toronto West Centre has placed the case for Toronto before the committee, I should like to speak for nothern Ontario. About the end of last October the chairman of the radio commission promised the north country that a high powered station would be installed at Sudbury. From that date I have heard nothing more about it. It is true that the radio commission has established some local stations, one at North Bay, another one at Timmins and on the twentieth day of this month I believe there will be another one at Kirkland Lake. I shall not enlarge upon the situation, because, as the minister said a few moments ago, there will be a full discussion of the matter when the vote for the radio commission is before the committee. I must say, however, that at the present time we have no daylight reception in nothern Ontario so far as national programs are concerned. In the day time, we can get neither Montreal nor Toronto. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) has said that station CRCT is not giving satisfaction to the listeners in that city, and the statement he has made would apply just as strongly in northern Ontario. Since the change of wave length from 840 to 960 kilocycles some months ago we have not been able to get reception from Toronto in the day time.

Some of the newspapers are urging that the high powered station should be placed between Sudbury and Timmins; others say that it should be on the height of land between Haileybury and Cochrane. One of the newspapers in Kapuskasing, the Northern Tribune, has urged that the high powered station should be established on the James bay slope. I believe these statements will indicate to the committee that so far as our choice of location is concerned, we are not parochial. We want the greatest service for the greatest number of people.

The minister should be seized of the fact that agents sent by the government to collect the licence fee of two dollars have not been able to collect, and have received hundreds of letters from people who have absolutely refused to pay the fee. I do not sympathize with that action, although I know it is impossible for some to pay the fee on account of bad reception. Unless a station of at least 5,000 watts capacity is erected in northern Ontario we will not be able to get reception in the day time outside of that received from local stations. For the last two months we have not been able to get Montreal or high powered stations in other centres. I trust that the minister and his department will review the situation and that it will be found possible to do something for our section, particularly in view of its isolation. We do not receive the daily newspapers until twenty-four or thirty-six hours after they are printed, and it is therefore all the more necessary that we should have good radio reception. If we get it, we are ready and willing to pay the licence fee, but not under present conditions, I repeat, the radio commission will find it almost impossible to collect any fees in our section for the very good reason that we are not getting the service to which we are entitled.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to report the complaints of my hon. friend to the radio commission. I would also point out that he will have the opportunity to lay his complaints before the committee which has been set up on radio broadcasting and which sat for the first time this morning.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to inquire from the minister whether this semi-dual control which has been tried now for over a year is in his opinion working out satisfactorily. With departmental officials looking after reception, and with the sending stations in the hands of the radio commission, it does seem as if the present system was bound to lead to trouble. I can say quite candidly that the departmental officials must find it mighty hard to give satisfaction. They are the ones who are coming in contact with the radio listeners, and are the ones who receive complaints such as have been made here to-night because it is part of their duty to try to cure just such troubles. Right in this city we have exactly the same trouble with reception. It is not the fault of the department, but is the result of the adoption of wave lengths which apparently conflict with some of the more powerful stations across the line. I am wondering just where we are going to land with this whole radio business in Canada, and whether we are always going to be subject to interference in reception on the part of our neighbours to the south. There are times in Ottawa when it is utterly impossible to get anything like decent reception. It is not the fault of the receiving set or of the officials of the department who are trying to remove interference; it is because our sending stations clash with the much more powerful stations to the south. It does seem to me that something might be done by changing the wave lengths. We certainly did not have this difficulty prior to the radio commission taking control, or at least I never experienced it and never heard of it. We had perfect reception, and these more powerful stations across the line were broadcasting at that time just as they are to-day. But since the change took place we have had a great deal of difficulty. I think the minister might endeavour to see whether we could not return to something similar to the old conditions that prevailed before the setting up of the radio commission.

Mr. FACTOR: I cannot understand why this item is placed in the estimates of the Department of Marine. I was under the impression that the control of radio was entirely in the hands of the radio commission. Surely the general improvement of reception conditions for licensed listeners should be a matter within the purview of the radio commission. Why this dual control? I quite appreciate that the licence fee is paid to the Department of Marine, but when it comes to the changing of wave lengths, which are bound to play a part in reception, control is in the hands of the radio commission, while reception conditions come under the department. Surely it is an anomalous situation to have the Department of Marine in charge of the improvement of reception conditions and the radio commission looking after the changing of wave lengths, which go to the very root of radio reception. Why is this item under the minister's department instead of under the radio commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under the law as it now exists, only broadcasting is under the control of the radio commission. We have the same system in Canada as that existing in England: one body, the post office, is in charge of the collection of the licence fees from the listeners, and the British Broadcasting Commission has charge of the broadcasting. The Marine department collects the licence fees and eliminates interference, while the broadcasting is in the hands of the radio commission; but both come under the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Might I suggest to the minister that he had better put the whole of this particular branch of his department under the control that was in existence formerly, and let the radio commission select the programs and run that end of it. If there is another year of this sort of thing there will be a very insistent demand that something of the kind be done.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand the minister to say that under this item no questions may properly be asked as to the functions of the radio commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The item which concerns the radio commission is No. 233, on page 55, for $1,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): My opinion is that the radio commission is an absolute waste of public money. I have on several occasions had to complain of interference and so forth and I have never got any satisfaction from the radio commission. They refer you to the Marine department. When you go there, at least you get a decent and respectable answer. In my opinion the commission should be done away with and the whole matter put under the Department of Marine. Then we would know where to go with complaints. At present we go to the commission and they refer you to somebody else. We have too many commissions anyway, and the radio commission is one that we should do away with. The minister has to make the final decision and the whole matter in my opinion should be left to him.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You can get at him.

[Mr. Factor.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would invite my hon. friend from Skeena to lay his complaints before the special committee which has been set up especially for the purpose of hearing complaints as to the functioning of the radio commission under the act.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I must say that I have had justice done when I appealed to the minister, and I give the minister and the government credit for that. When I have failed to get satisfaction from the commission I have got satisfaction from the minister, and I thank him for it.

Mr. REID: How many trouble inspectors are there in Vancouver and vicinity?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Victoria and Vancouver fall into the same division. We have two electricians, one chauffeur, one stenographer and two cars.

Mr. FACTOR: How much money was spent from last year's appropriation to improve radio reception in Toronto, and what staff is available?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We are spending in Toronto a total of $15,220.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the department finding any difficulty in collecting the licence fee of two dollars?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have had a little difficulty in some sections of the country, but as a rule the citizens are well disposed towards paying their licence fees. As a matter of fact, in certain parts of the country, we have collected more this year than we did last year.

Mr. VALLANCE: The radio commission has been sending out letters advising individuals who had previously taken out licences that their licences are now overdue; was there much of that done by the commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Periodical notices are sent out to owners of radio sets who have not renewed their licences, calling their attention to the fact. I think it is the duty of the department to do this.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the commission agents out collecting licence fees, and if so to what extent? Have there been any prosecutions against individuals who have been operating radios without a licence?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Only one court action was taken this last year.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the minister found it possible to stop political interference with the radio commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I know of no political interference with the radio commission.

Mr. VALLANCE: A ruling has been made that every individual proposing to broadcast must first submit his speech to the commission; is that ruling always lived up to?

Mr. DURANLEAU: A regulation to that effect was adopted last year, but I cannot say just to what extent it is followed. I do know that all addresses are not submitted to the radio commission.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): These matters should not be discussed under this item.

Mr. MITCHELL: I take exception to the statement made by an hon. member that the money spent on this commission is wasted. If these were not his exact words, they indicate the purport of his remarks. This commission is in its infancy, and—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. member is out of order as far as this item is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: An hon. member was allowed to make the observation that this is a waste of money and I desire to take exception to that remark. I have no objection to being ruled out of order, but I think once an observation has been made the opportunity should be granted to another hon. member to express a contrary opinion. This commission is more or less in its infancy; it is a child of this house.

Mr. DUFF: Charlesworth is not in his infancy.

Mr. MITCHELL: Neither are you.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The remarks of the hon. member are out of order under this item.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and repairs to dominion steamers and icebreakers, $1,434,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have not some of the ships on the coastal service been sold?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Those belong to the Canadian National.

Mr. REID: Where is this money to be spent and how many vessels are used?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are twenty-five vessels in the service, made up of four on the Pacific coast, five on the Atlantic coast, three on the upper St. Lawrence and the great lakes, and the remainder on the lower St. Lawrence and the gulf.

Mr. NEILL: What are the names of the boats on the Pacific coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Estevan, the Newington, the Berens, and the Birnie.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): They would not be icebreakers because there is no ice out there.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: Would the icebreaker service in the lower St. Lawrence and the gulf include service for the Hudson bay and strait? Is there any icebreaker service up there?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: The Newington is an old boat and was never suited to the work it is performing. Is there any hope of having another boat to take her place?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend is quite right when he says that that boat is old and should be replaced. We are trying to have the necessary estimate approved to provide for the building of a new boat.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does the Jalobert come under this vote?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel dredging: (a) to provide payment for work performed and to be performed by contract, $3,750,000; (b) to provide for the maintenance and operation of the government ship channel fleet and the government shipyard, including all necessary repairs and reconditioning, $1,140,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: Could the minister advise if any negotiations are going on between the United States and Canada in connection with the low water levels occasioned partly by the Chicago drainage canal? As is well known, last year the water level of the St. Lawrence was the lowest it had been in the preceding forty years. I believe that the Chicago drainage canal is to blame to some extent, and I should be glad if the minister would enlighten the committee on the situation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have lately organized an interdepartmental committee of engineers to study the question of the St. Lawrence water level. The committee is composed of about seven or eight engineers from the departments of Marine, Railways and Canals, Public Works and the Interior, and they are meeting every week to investigate the whole subject of water levels on the St. Lawrence. Their object is to ascertain the cause of the low level in the port of Montreal and in that river. Of course, the diversion of water at Chicago will come under consideration, and there is a special item in my estimates in that regard, item 134, to provide for the investigation of water levels in the St. Lawrence river, $50,000.

Mr. MORAND: I suggest that when the department is investigating that question it should take into consideration St. Clair lake, which is a low and shallow lake. For the last year the low water has made the whole lake front practically a marsh. There is considerable agitation in the district. It is hard to say exactly what the cause is, but I should like to have an assurance from the minister that when the question of water levels in the St. Lawrence is being considered the great lakes as far as lake St. Clair will also be taken into account.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The scope of the inquiry which is under way does not include that part of the waters, but I shall be pleased to look into the matter to see whether the powers of the committee can be amplified.

Mr. REID: There is an increase of $1,459,650 in the item now under consideration. I wonder why dredging is done under the Marine department in the St. Lawrence whereas elsewhere it is done under the Public Works department.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Only the St. Lawrence ship channel is under the control of the Marine department, the change having been made some years ago—I think it was in 1906. I cannot say what the real reason was; probably it was considered that the Marine department was more interested in navigation matters and it was thought that the St. Lawrence ship channel should be under its control.

Mr. REID: Why the increase?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is due to the works done last year. We have tried to employ as many men as possible in our fleet and the contractors have done the same.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is the continuation of a contract. Is it the contract which was let three or four years ago?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How much longer will it take to complete it?

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: The contract is nearly completed according to the reports of my engineers; all that remains to be done now is to clean up at an expense of about $300,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That will complete the contract.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The agreement was passed on May 30, 1930.

Item agreed to.

Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $1,674,000.

Mr. DUFF: This includes salaries and allowances to lightkeepers. Three years ago, when this government decided to reduce the salaries of all public employees by ten per cent I protested vigorously, not only as that action affected lightkeepers but as it affected every other class of citizen, including judges. At that time I expressed the opinion that it was very poor policy and would not mean anything; I said it would not enable the government to balance the budget. My prophecy has been fulfilled; the money retained from civil servants—lightkeepers, charwomen, elevator men and others—

An hon. MEMBER: And members of parliament.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, and members of parliament; I was opposed to that too, and I was the only one that said so. I said at the time that it was not good policy and would not mean anything, because the very fact that this government gave the lead in the reduction of salaries induced employers of labour all over the country to do the same. It gave them the chance to reduce the salaries of their employees, and to-day we have before the committee which is sitting in this house investigating conditions in different manufacturing plants and other businesses in this country, an example of what this policy has meant. It shows conclusively to my mind that this government is partly to blame for conditions in the sweatshops where poor labouring people work practically for nothing. Now, here are lightkeepers in this country, situated away on rocky promontories and islands scattered throughout the Atlantic, the gulf of St. Lawrence, the great lakes and the Pacific, without facilities for educating their children. Half the time, especially in winter, these children cannot go to school. It is not fair that men in this class, filling responsible positions, most of them receiving very small salaries, should have had their remuneration cut by ten per cent. Before this item carries I should like to have a statement from the minister so far as he himself at any rate is concerned. We have just passed another item of $3,750,000, representing an increase over the previous year of $1,459,650, and if the minister had sufficient influence with his colleagues to get that increase of a million and a half—I congratulate him on that achievement; I am not objecting to it—then I think he ought to bring his influence to bear in behalf of these employees in his department. He is bighearted and he has a good open countenance, and I suggest to him that he should approach his colleagues at the first opportunity and urge them not to renew the act which has been in force for the last two years, whereby the salary of the Minister of Justice, and my indemnity as well, have been reduced by ten per cent. I plead on behalf of the lightkeepers, because I think the minister should be the first man to take the initial step to urge upon the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet the restoration to these employees of their full remuneration. If there are any people who are entitled to full remuneration it is these particular employees. Most of them get very small salaries and I would like the minister to ask his colleagues that these salaries be reinstated at one hundred per cent instead of ninety per cent. Before this item passes I should like some assurance from the minister on that point.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I would call attention to the fact that the salaries as included in the item do not provide for the ten per cent deduction because there is no footnote at the bottom as there is in the case of other items. Therefore the salaries are voted in toto.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The deduction is there just the same.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have listened with keen interest to my hon. friend's remarks. I have the greatest sympathy for the lighthouse keepers, and I fully agree with him when he says that these civil servants have a hard job to perform and should be protected as much as possible. But I would like to remind him that the ten per cent deduction was not made for pleasure; it was made because we thought that for the purposes of economy civil servants should contribute as other citizens are doing towards the reduction of our yearly expenditures. But I can tell my hon. friend that the promise made by the government two years ago and again last year will be kept and the moment business improved sufficiently the ten per cent reduction will disappear. I cannot make any promise for this year; it may be this year, but as soon as possible we will do away with the reduction.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad to hear the words of the minister. He said that this was done for the sake of economy; that it was not a pleasure to do it. As I said the first year this matter was brought up in the house, it was false economy. I said that it was not in the best interests of the country that the deduction should be made, because the government took $8,000,000 out of the pockets of its employees and therefore that money could not be spent in the country. Then I said that it had an influence with every employer of labour in Canada who wanted an excuse to reduce the salaries of his employees or labourers. In this way the deduction had a double-barrelled effect. It is all very well for the minister to say very seriously—and I know he is sincere—that he will endeavour to do what he can. What I am saying to the minister and what I said before is this: before he got an increase of about $1,500,000 making a total of $3,750,000 for dredging the St. Lawrence, the first thing he should have done was to have the salaries of the lighthouse keepers put back to the one hundred per cent. The hon. member for Rimouski said that the item did not provide for a ten per cent deduction.

Sir EUGENE FISET: There is no footnote.

Mr. DUFF: I know that, but I am afraid this item of $1,434,000 is made up on a basis of ninety per cent of salaries instead of one hundred per cent. Will the minister kindly tell me or the hon. member for Rimouski who is correct?

Mr. DURANLEAU: So far as salaries are concerned, this includes only ninety per cent.

Mr. MacLEAN: Last year when this item was up I brought to the attention of the minister a very unfair situation in connection with lighthouse keepers' salaries, to which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has referred. There are cases where the department provides living quarters for the lighthouse keeper, and in making the deduction of the ten per cent, not only does it deduct ten per cent from the salary which the lighthouse keeper receives, but it also estimates the value of the living quarters to the man who occupies them and deducts from his wages ten per cent of that estimated value, which is money that he really never gets.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That is not a statement of fact.

Mr. MacLEAN: It is.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No, it is not.

Mr. MacLEAN: Well, we will allow the minister to decide. To my mind such a procedure is unfair. It is hard enough for a man to have ten per cent deducted from money he actually receives, but to have an additional deduction made in respect of the estimated value of his living quarters is really treating the lighthouse keeper unfairly. I know this to be a positive fact. The hon. member for Inverness thinks it is not correct, but men in my constituency have come and showed me their accounts and said: We are subject to a reduction of not only ten per cent, but fifteen or twenty per cent. I wrote to the department and that was the explanation, that in addition to the deduction of ten per cent from the regular monthly payments received by them from the department, they were also charged ten per cent on the estimated value of their living quarters. That is extremely unfair and the minister should remedy it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not prepared to admit that it is unfair, because the rent paid by a civil servant is paid out of his salary. There is nothing extraordinary in that. If something is allowed for the residence of a lightkeeper, it is small, as a rule about $200, but it is supposed to be part of his remuneration just like that of any other employee who gets so much salary and pays his own rent. There is no difference at all.

Mr. MacLEAN: The minister imagines he has an argument there, but many of the lighthouse keepers are compelled to live in those residences. They have homes of their own a few miles away in which they would much rather live, but they are forced to live in the lighthouse in order to perform their duties and in many cases they are obliged to keep up a home some miles away in order, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said, that their children may be able to go to school, because in some cases the lighthouse keepers are in places where it is impossible for the children to go to school if they live in the lighthouses. Therefore these living quarters are of no benefit to them; they are forced to contribute ten per cent of the value that the department may put upon those living quarters. I contend that this is absolutely unfair.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Has there been any change in the regulations regarding lighthouse keepers since my hon. friend supported the former Liberal government in 1922?

Mr. MacLEAN: The answer to that question is that a Liberal government never deducted ten per cent from any man's salary whether he was a lighthouse keeper or anybody else. This is the first government that has attempted to do that, so that the effect was not visible before.

Mr. POULIOT: I remember very well the time I was arguing with the hon. member for Inverness about minimum wage laws and I was telling him that they should have minimum wage laws in Nova Scotia, the hon. member said that they were superfluous. At that time we were fighting for all the labourers throughout the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and my hon. friend was not defending the case of the miners who received such small wages in Inverness and other parts of Cape Breton.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I am not answering any imbecility.

Item agreed to.

Marine signal service, $92,750.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How in the world can the minister cut $6,000 off this very important service, when he has been paring it every year since this government took office? It must be a very important service to navigation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: With the advent of radio we can save the expense of some signal stations and give a better service.

Item agreed to.

Administration of pilotage, $118,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How many pilots have we in Canada? Is there a fixed yearly remuneration, or is it based on what they collect in each port? I have had many complaints; some pilots, I understand, get up to $20,000 and others are not getting anything, although they are all supposed to perform the same service—take charge of boats that come into certain harbours.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The pilotage districts are: Quebec, with fifty-three pilots; Montreal, with sixty-two; Halifax, twenty-three; Saint John, eleven; Sidney, fifteen; British Columbia, thirty-two, and Churchill, two. They are not all paid on the same basis; some are paid on the tonnage of the vessel and others on the draft of the vessel. It depends on the arrangements made.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How much does the highest receive, and how much the lowest, and where is the one that receives the highest and the one that receives the lowest?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no salary; the pilot gets what he earns. I know that at Montreal and Quebec there is a pool into which the pilots bring their earnings. They pay the expenses and their superannuation contributions and the rest is divided among themselves. That is what is done as a rule in these pilots' associations.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How much would a pilot in Montreal get after all deductions, and a pilot in Vancouver?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say exactly what they get. I know that the pilot in Montreal having the highest gross earnings during last season got $7,000. But they have to pay their travelling expenses out of that and their superannuation. I think the average net earnings run about $3,500 to $4,000. But I would remind my hon. friend that these pilots do not start earning money until they are over thirty. Apprentice pilots earn practically nothing for seven or ten years. I know assistant pilots who have been in the service for ten years now, and they cannot be admitted as pilots; according to the regulations the number of pilots cannot be increased, as each pilot is supposed to make so many voyages during the navigation season. So long as that average is not exceeded an assistant pilot is not admitted as a pilot. Sometimes a pilot starts earning his living at thirty-five years of age, and then does not work for a great many years as his eyesight must be first class; the moment he cannot pass the eyesight examination he has to retire.

Mr. YOUNG: What do they live on before they start earning?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, they get a few dollars. They work as mate or as assistant, and sometimes the assistant gets a little reward from the owner of the ship.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I have some figures from Vancouver, and it seems to me ridiculous that men should get such pay. That is why I am asking for these particulars so that I can see whether these figures are right or wrong. I would like the minister also to let us know what a chief pilot for British Columbia or the Pacific coast gets in gross earnings. I have some figures from the statistical department; they must be reasonably accurate, but I would like to have them verified by the minister.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not in a position to give the information at the present time, but if my hon. friend has a particular case in mind I shall be pleased to take it up.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): If the minister has the information as to pilots in Montreal he surely can give it in regard to pilots in Vancouver.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, I have the information as to Montreal, but unfortunately I have not got it for Vancouver. I can write to my hon. friend and give him the full information if he desires.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I wish the minister would do that.

Mr. HANBURY: Could the minister tell the committee what arrangement the pilots work under in British Columbia? I understand they have some cooperative arrangement, but I am not familiar with the details.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suppose my hon. friend knows that the pilotage is not compulsory on the British Columbia coast. Some companies have their own pilots; in fact I believe the Canadian Pacific has. I suppose those men are salaried.

Mr. HANBURY: I was not asking the minister for details as to remuneration, but was directing my remarks to regulations controlling pilots in British Columbia.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should be glad to send the hon. member a copy of the British Columbia pilot regulations.

Mr. HANBURY: I believe thirty-two is the fixed number of pilots. At the same time I should like to know what competition there is when someone wishes to become a pilot.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall supply the necessary information.

Mr. POULIOT: At this very moment who is the pilot of the ship of state in this House of Commons?

Mr. DUFF: I notice that the item has been reduced from $218,000 to $118,000. Can the minister explain how he proposes to save that much money?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I believe the hon. member knows that most of the money voted previously was loaned to the pilots' association. At this time they are collecting faster, and do not need so great a loan.

Item agreed to.

Meteorological service, including magnetic observatory, grants of $450 each to Kingston and Montreal observatories and allowance of $360 to L. F. Gorman, observer at Ottawa, $317,800.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I suggest that the minister ought not to close out his department, because the house is poorly attended on Friday evenings, and there may be some questions which hon. members would like to ask.

Mr. DUFF: The civil vote remains.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. members cannot very well ask questions pertaining to administration, unless the government would permit such questions on the civil vote. If the government will permit them, we could take up this vote.

Mr. POULIOTT: Is this item 149?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Yes

Mr. POULIOT: Is it due to the decrease of $75,490 in the appropriation for the meteorological service that we have so much snow this winter?

Item agreed to.

Canadian radio broadcasting service, $1,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the minister going to introduce this item to-night?

Mr. DUFF: It will take a week to discuss the item; we may have to sit on Sundays.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Very well; we will consider it later.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Publications, $23,039.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why the decrease of over $5,000? How does the minister propose to make the saving?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The sum of $23,039 represents an amount a little greater than that which was actually spent in 1933-34. We expect to be able to carry on with the same amount. Last year we did not spend everything that was voted.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the minister give the list of publications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should be happy to supply the hon. member with a list; it is a very long one.

Mr. DONNELLY: Probably it could be placed on Hansard.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Perhaps I did not understand the hon. member's question. This vote is not for the actual publishing or printing of the publications, but provides for payment to the personnel or staff which sends them out. I believe it includes also the cost of envelopes.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many are engaged in this work of sending out publications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the neighbourhood of twenty-nine or thirty, permanent or regular. Then there is a small temporary staff which from time to time is required to keep up with the work.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I ask the minister how a farmer is to know what publications are available? Is a list supplied to him? Must he write in, or how is he to obtain the information? Further, to whom is the information sent without application?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a list of publications together with supplementary lists of new publications. Any farmer writing to the department will have sent to him any special publication he wishes, and included in each publication there will be a list of all publications which, if he wishes he may send for.

Mr. McINTOSH: Why is there a decrease in the vote for these publications, if they are all so important?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have explained that there is not an actual decrease. We did not use all the money voted last year, so we are asking for a smaller amount this year.

Mr. GIROUARD: Did I understand the minister to say his department employed twenty-nine or thirty persons to send out the publications of his department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct.

Mr. GIROUARD: What is the average salary paid to these employees?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information before me, but shall be glad to send it to the hon. member.

Mr. GIROUARD: How many publications per month do they send?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not the information in that form, but shall be happy to supply it.

Mr. DUPUIS: Do I understand that these publications are sent only on request, or does the department send them to public libraries, universities, and so on?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are mailing lists. If a farmer for instance, sends in and asks for a publication his name would be added to the list. We also have lists of libraries, agricultural societies and various associations. We keep those mailing lists and send out the new publications.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the circulation nation-wide?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: In what parts of Canada is the circulation greatest? I should like to know where this special information is going.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the answer would be where there is the greatest number of farmers.

Mr. BRADETTE: If my information is correct the number of publications has been curtailed in the last few years. As a member of parliament I used to get several more publications from the department than I do now, and these publications were in most cases of great service to the farmers and settlers in our section. I should like to ask if that is the case.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am quite certain that no publications that are available will be refused on request of any person. There is no curtailment in the sending out of publications published for general distribution.

Mr. BRADETTE: I think members of parliament, senators and officials should be placed on the mailing list, because I have found these publications of great service. A member of parliament receiving them can distribute them to the farmers in his riding who are likely to benefit from the information. I think it should be possible for the minister to do that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We shall be glad to include the members of parliament who are not already included on the mailing list.

Mr. DUPUIS: Provided they can read them.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that this item of $22,000 is not to pay for the publications but for the expense of sending them out. It does not cover the salaries of those engaged in preparing the publications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is just to pay the expense of wrapping and sending them out?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, operation costs together with supplies.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to something that very often happens in my district. We have students taking short courses, and in many instances when we ask for a certain number of publications for distribution to these students our requests have been turned down. I think these publications should be distributed to the students in these short courses. In other instances, a professor in an agricultural institution will ask for a certain number of publications, and in some instances in the past, although not quite recently, his request has been refused. The department will reply suggesting that the students themselves write in for the publication. Now it is sometimes a troublesome thing for a farmer to get a pen and sit down and write a letter, and very often he does not know to whom to send it. I think it would be very much better if the department would comply with these requests for various publications from public bodies and organizers of short courses.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no reason whatever why that should not be done if the publication is still available. I believe that in the past, including the more recent past, difficulty has arisen through members of parliament as well as people outside asking for large bulk lots. It was felt that there was perhaps a good deal of wastage in that connection. However, I agree with my hon. friend that there is no place where better use could be made of these publications than in connection with university work and short courses.

Mr. McINTOSH: I asked the minister where the circulation of these publications was the greatest. The minister answered, among the farmers. Perhaps he misunderstood my question. I wanted to know in what part of Canada, in what economic area, there is the largest circulation of these publications.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My answer was not "among the farmers" but where the farmers are the most numerous, particularly where there is specialization in poultry, fruit and so forth. More publications are sent there as a rule.

Mr. BOWMAN: How often is the mailing list revised?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a list of publications at the beginning of each year, and as new publications come out a supplementary list is sent along to those receiving the original list. At the end of each year an attempt is made to combine as far as possible the new publications and the old in a revised list.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I recall that when the minister first took charge of this work he was very strong on this vote being an important one. He considered that it was very important that the information should be compiled from the various sources and sent out to the farmer on the ground that through the written word more farmers could be reached than in any other way, and with less expense. So strong was his view that he increased the vote in 1931-32 from $31,000 to $38,000, and I think that was commendable, but this year the vote is reduced from $28,000 to $23,000. Is that due to a falling off of applications or to the general financial conditions, shortage of money and such like?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As a matter of fact the demand for the publications is increasing. Although the vote has been decreased the number of publications sent out is increasing to a considerable extent. In 1922-23 the number of publications sent out, annual reports, bulletins, pamphlets, circulars, orders and regulations, was 776,906; in 1932-33, over 834,000. Market reports, circulars, press articles and so on were sent out to the number of 817,478 in 1922-23, and 1,497,050 in 1932-33. The mailing lists have also been added to considerably, and that is a very good indication that there is a greater demand for the publications. That demand has been met to a greater extent. The number of names on the mailing lists, special and general lists, in 1922-23 was 308,595 and in 1932-33, 550,907. The number of envelopes addressed, which is also a good index, in 1922-23 was 1,694,252, and in 1932-33, 1,912,696. In 1927-28 there were more envelopes sent out than in 1932-33. That seemed to be a heavy year. Requests for publications from individuals are not as great at the present time as in 1927-28, but the number of the more important publications sent out has increased.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I suggest to the minister that he did not answer the question asked by the ex-Minister of Agriculture. I understood his question to be why there was a decrease in this vote from $28,000 in 1933-34 to $23,000 in 1934-35, and the minister in his reply referred to 1932-33, and not to 1933-34.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I explained before, the vote for 1933-34 was not all used, and yet all requests were met. The estimate for 1934-35 is for slightly more than what was actually spent in 1933-34.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister give some explanation for the wide fluctuation throughout the years in this item? In the estimates for 1931-32 this vote was for $38,000; in 1932-33 the vote was only $7,500; in 1933-34 it was $28,231, and now we find it is $23,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That might have been caused by larger amounts being voted than were actually used. As far as I am aware, there has always been a sufficient amount voted to meet the requests of the public for publications.

Mr. DONNELLY: "Might have been" is no answer. In 1932-33 the vote was only $7,500; if that amount was sufficient, why should it be raised to $23,000? There must be some other reason.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When the vote was in the neighbourhood of $7,000 it was found that that was not sufficient. Certain publications could not be sent out when requested and they had to be sent out by the various branches of the department.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is it not just a matter of supply and demand?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This vote is to pay for the wrappings and the labour of sending out the publications.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It does not include the cost of publication?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all.

Item agreed to.

International Institute of Agriculture, $8,500.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this the institute at Rome?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: How is this appropriation spent?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A number of countries have agreed that they will each make a certain contribution so that machinery may be set up to receive statistics and information on agriculture from all countries that are parties to the agreement. This information is then sent out to the countries which have contributed. It is an attempt to prevent the wastage which would arise if this work were attempted to be done by each individual country.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is there a connection between this and the following item which covers the contribution to Empire bureaux?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In general principles only. In the one case it is the dominions of the empire; in the other it is international.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has the department sent a representative over to the institute meetings at Rome in recent years?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not sent a representative for some time; we are represented by the representative of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Who is he?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not recall the name of the last delegate but I shall be glad to give my hon. friend his name later.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do we receive as many publications from this institute to-day as we did back in 1931-32?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not give a definite answer, but offhand I would say that the number is greater because the work has become more detailed. I shall let the hon. member have that information.

Mr. DONNELLY: In that year we voted $13,500 while this year we are voting $8,500. That is a difference of $5,000, over one-third, and I should like to know if there have been any ill effects from this reduction.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say, no.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many countries contribute to the institute and upon what basis?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Seventy-five countries contribute; they are grouped into five different groups.

Mr. McINTOSH: Are the meetings annual and has Canada a representative at all important gatherings?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Either directly or through the United Kingdom representative.

Mr. McINTOSH: They are annual?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have meetings annually.

Mr. VALLANCE: Are the publications which are received from the institute available in the department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: What are they?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Examples are the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Sociology, the Monthly Crop Report and Agricultural Statistics, Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Science and Statistics, and International Bulletin of Plant Protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I recall that four or five years ago the United States practically dissociated themselves from this institute, I have wondered if they have restored their connection and are again sending over regular representatives.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They did last year.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister has named only four or five publications which are received, but there must be a larger number than that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The number is quite large, but it varies from year to year.

Mr. BOUCHARD: A few years ago when this vote was something like $13,000 a number of these publications were sent out free of cost. As a professor of agriculture I had the privilege of receiving copies and I should like to ask the minister if this distribution has been curtailed or if the agricultural institutions and colleges are supplied with these publications free of cost.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that they still receive them free of cost.

Mr. BOUCHARD: How many copies are sent out?

Mr. WEIR Melfort): I could not give the exact number, but I shall be glad to give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister says there is at least one meeting annually of the institute, and I think representation at that assembly is important. Could the minister tell us who represented Canada last year and the year before?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information before me. Last year we were represented by a representative of the British ministry, and I believe also the year before although I would not trust my memory.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister will bring down that information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My recollection is that they meet every other year.

Item agreed to.

Dairying, $234,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Perhaps this would be as good a time as any to remark on the general tendency to decrease practically every vote for agriculture. This year there has been a decrease in every vote but two, and every year we see these votes decreasing and decreasing. This would seem to be a time when agriculture should receive an increase in assistance rather than suffer a decrease. If any of us were sick he would want more care at that time than when he was well. Now agriculture is decidedly sick not only in Canada but the world over; yet we have withdrawn aid from a sick institution at a time when we should be nursing it. That is the complaint I have to make with regard to these estimates. There is a progressive reduction year after year, and if this keeps up, and if my good friend should have the opportunity of presiding over the department another four years, I am afraid the estimates and his department will have disappeared altogether by that time unless something is done to stop the downward tendency. I would convey my remarks as much to the hon. gentleman's colleagues as to himself. Since the revenues are supposed to be improving, and I think they are, I would bespeak a reasonable amount of the increase which is accruing from month to month to be devoted to the Department of Agriculture. I do not know what department will be instrumental in getting Canada back on her feet more than agriculture. That industry represents more people than any other in the dominion. I do not blame the Minister of Finance so much either, because after all it is the Prime Minister who has to say definitely what each department shall receive. It looks to me that the trouble lies between the minister and the Prime Minister so far as this regrettable continuous reduction in estimates for agriculture is concerned. This year it is lower than ever by three-quarters of a million; it is down to what it was about ten years ago, six and a half millions.

I am really getting anxious, wondering where this downward tendency will stop, and I hold the ministry as a whole rather than the Minister of Agriculture responsible for this absolute neglect of the major occupation of the people of Canada. I spoke of this last year and I will not speak harshly about it any more. I merely direct the attention of the ministry to this tendency towards a seeming neglect of the major occupation of the Canadian people. Why it should be I do not know. Evidently the relative importance of this industry has not yet been seized by the government, or it would have been given visibility to, in these estimates, by an upward rather than a downward tendency. I can only express my regret at it as I have done on former occasions, and I hope that the minister and his colleagues present will do something to stop this tendency. I am sure the minister's estimates go to the treasury board much larger than this; I feel confident that they do. I know that the heads of branches must ask for more than they get, and the matter must come in that shape before the ministry and the subcommittee of government called the treasury board. So that the whole government is to be held responsible for this, and I do not think the excuse of low revenues is sufficient to justify the decrease. Canada can never come back until agriculture shows a tendency to come back, and consequently the props should be strengthened under this department instead of being jolted from under it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is only natural that the hon. member (Mr. Motherwell) should be struck in this way with the reduction of estimates. The test I keep before me each year when the estimates are submitted and agreed to—and so far I have had no difficulty in having the request met—is this that the services in each branch will not be in any way impaired. A large number of reductions have been made possible, for instance by reorganization. I might refer to the live stock branch, but I do not wish to open up this matter here because I should prefer to have the items dealt with item by item. I can assure hon. members however that there has been no depreciation in the services given in each of these votes. In the majority of the votes there has been improved service as a result of reorganization within the particular branch, combining the heads of services, so that it is more flexible, uniting them in a common effort, than had been the case in various divisions before. Perhaps we have given the matter more attention because of the period of economic depression through which we have been passing; it has been necessary for us to endeavour, as we might not have done had it not been for the present financial condition, to make every effort to reorganize in order to save money. But we have always kept before us the one yardstick, namely, that there should be no depreciation in any service rendered agriculture in the various branches. And in most branches the services have been actually strengthened.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is something in that, but I am afraid that reason does not quite satisfy my hon. friend himself. He better than anyone else must know that some of the activities of the various branches have been reduced, the staff being reduced, possibly owing to reorganization. However, we will not discuss this particular item, which is not so conspicuous as some others. In the Health of Animals branch, for example, the activities can hardly be as general and widespread in the establishment of restricted areas for instance, as in the past. However, we will leave that vote until we come to it. I think my hon. friend knows better than anyone else that he has been jewing the votes down year by year, pinching off here and pinching off there, until so to speak the work has its eyes sticking out, wondering what is going to happen next.

I know you cannot make a substantial reduction in each of these estimates without affecting the service. You can lop off a few salaries, dismiss a few employees, getting rid of them by reorganization, and while that may effect a small saving I do not know but even that will have an injurious effect on the service. But generally, in the main work of the field men throughout Canada, whether it is one branch or the other, I am afraid you cannot take off four millions in three years without substantially reducing services, some here and some there, all making a considerable aggregate. If it can be done this way, how would it do to make the vote for agriculture a little lower still and save that much more money? I am afraid my hon. friend has come long ago to the point where no further reductions can be made without sacrificing the work to a considerable extent. There is something, possibly, in what the minister says in regard to reorganization, and perhaps some slight saving has been effected there. But to cut the aggregate vote nearly in two and at the same time to maintain the services is a suggestion which I am not quite prepared to accept at its full face value; not that I doubt my hon. friend's statement, but I do not think it can be done by anyone. Nor do I think my hon. friend believes it can be done, if he will analyse the work and compare it with what was in vogue a few years ago. However, maybe we have now come to the bottom of these ruthless cuts. Now that we are looking forward to the salary cuts being restored—the newspapers say there are prospects of it—maybe we have got to the bottom of these successive declines in agricultural appropriations. In other words maybe we have touched bottom in the matter of reduction in the agricultural estimates and another year will see a revival, an upward tendency. If that happens, I shall be the first to congratulate ourselves, the government and the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In that connection, as I suggested, I am anxious that each appropriation that appears in the estimates should be dealt with from that test as to just what changes have been made in the service and whether the work is suffering as a result of this. Personally I do not believe it is, and I think it has been possible, due to different things, to reduce the vote without in any way injuring the services. I shall be glad to invite discussion vote by vote along this particular line in reference to the services given.

Mr. BROWN: A few evenings ago, when we were discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) on hog grading, I said that I proposed to bring to the notice of the house the progress that had been made in dairy products in Manitoba brought about very largely, I believe, because some years ago we adopted and we have since consistently adhered to the principle of cream grading. I do this because we cannot too often emphasize the necessity of maintaining a high quality of all our farm products if we are to win in competition with the world.

About the year 1914 I believe, Manitoba butter was of such a poor quality that it could not be held over in cold storage, but since that time the principle of cream grading has been adopted and to-day no other province stands as high or anywhere nearly as high as Manitoba, if we may judge by the number of prizes that have been won at the various fairs throughout the dominion. I have in my hand a record of the prizes won by Manitoba at fairs held at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Regina, Vancouver, Ottawa, the Canadian National at Toronto, and London. I would like to put the whole list on Hansard, but I am afraid it is too long, so I shall give the record only for 1933, indicating the percentages of first prizes won by each province exhibiting. The figures are as follows:

Province—	Percentages of first prizes won
Manitoba	74.9
Saskatchewan	5.3
Alberta	10.6
Ontario	8.2
Quebec	....
Nova Scotia	....
British Columbia	1.0

The following is the percentages of all prizes:

Province—	Percentages of all prizes
Manitoba	55.4
Saskatchewan	15.9
Alberta	17.4
Ontario	8.7
Quebec	1.7
British Columbia	0.9

Mr. STANLEY: Was the hon. member at all these fairs?

Mr. BROWN: That takes in all the fairs. A summary of prizes won in 1933 is as follows:

Manitoba

155 Firsts.
154 Seconds.
72 Thirds.
2 Fourths.
1 First highest average score.
4 Highest scores.
1 Championship silver cup.
1 Gold medal Motherwell trophy.
3 Silver medals.
1 Highest total score.

Saskatchewan

11 Firsts.
71 Seconds.
28 Thirds.
1 Second high average score.

Alberta

22 Firsts.
59 Seconds.
39 Thirds.

British Columbia

2 Firsts.
4 Seconds.

Ontario

17 Firsts.
12 Seconds.
31 Thirds.
1 Silver medal.
1 Highest score.

Quebec

3 Seconds.
9 Thirds.

I put that on record because I think we cannot too often emphasize the necessity of maintaining high quality production, nor do I think we can too often emphasize the necessity of grading our farm products. Since the principle of cream grading has been adopted in Manitoba and has been consistently adhered to, the work being done in conjunction with the very effective dairy commissioner in that province, the result has been as I have indicated. Nobody will contend that commercial butter is equal to that which appears at these exhibitions, but the fact that this record has been made is to my mind a strong argument for the maintenance of the grading of our cream and of all our other dairy products.

[Mr. Brown.]

Perhaps just in this connection I might mention poultry. If there is one thing that has been an outstanding success in the west, it is the poultry pools where under government auspices or through the initiative of the government some years ago an expert poultry man was sent out. When we began to ship poultry through those pools some of the stuff that was brought in was so poor the people had to take it home again; it would not be accepted. But the people who brought that stuff in were able to see what good, properly dressed poultry really was, and the consequence has been that the whole standard of dressed poultry has been raised, due undoubtedly to the fact that this system of grading has been adopted. People have been able to see what good poultry is.

Speaking again on the grading of cream, I am not certain of this figure, but I heard it asserted that sixty per cent of the cream delivered to the creameries in Manitoba last year was table cream. People thought at first cream was simply cream, but they very soon learned that when cream was paid for by the grade, it paid them to take good care of their cream. I do not want to cast reflections upon other provinces, but some objection has pretty persistently come from Quebec. I can say this, that from my knowledge of Quebec there is no other country in the world better suited to the production of high quality butter than the eastern townships of Quebec and the Laurentian mountains across the Ottawa river. They have splendid pasture and the very best of running water, and there is no reason why a high quality of butter could not be produced. I know they tell us that it pays them better to produce cream and I know also very large quantities of milk from Quebec go into Montreal as liquid milk; but still I maintain that if the producers adopt and consistently adhere to the principle of the grading of cream as we have done in Manitoba, all the provinces will be able to come somewhere near the level that has been attained in my province.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Does the hon. member give the government any credit for that?

Mr. McINTOSH: Why, certainly.

Mr. BROWN: This was going on long before the present government came into power. I might say that as far back as 1924 the records were as high. I am willing to give the Minister of Agriculture every credit for consistently adhering to the system of grading farm products, and I am only sorry he has not had much support from eastern Canada up to date.

Mr. McINTOSH: A common practice across the way.

Mr. BOUCHARD: From his own side.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am pleased that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) took the time to bring to the attention of the committee the very excellent progress that has been made in the province of Manitoba in this connection. I am sure those of us who for years have been interested in this work have been impressed by the excellent showing that has been made in exhibitions, particularly by a number of the creameries in Manitoba. I think one of the most consistent winners for years has been the creamery at Shoal Lake. But the winning of prizes, although it speaks volumes in itself, has led to a certain misunderstanding with reference to the quality of butter that is produced in the various provinces. With the indulgence of the committee I would like to put on the record the picture as we have it; I think perhaps it is more representative of the industry as a whole in the various provinces.

TABLE No. 5

Creamery butter production and grading including butter scored from samples, 1933

Province	Production lbs.	Graded lbs.	% Total Make Graded	% First Grade	% Of the First Grade Scoring 93 and over

* Provinces which had butter scored from samples.

Considering that Saskatchewan has the highest percentage graded, and has almost fifty per cent high scoring first grade, I am informed that the truest picture of the relative quality of the production of butter on that basis put Saskatchewan in the lead. We have heard it stated on different occasions, and the impression seems to be held by many, that Quebec does not produce on the whole as good quality butter as some of the other provinces—

Mr. DUPUIS: Is that the affirmation of the minister?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I am just correcting a wrong impression. Quebec has out of a total of 37·6 per cent graded 85·67 per cent first grade, and of the highest scoring first grade 34·6 per cent, which stands well to the top of all the provinces in the whole picture.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is some compensation.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And it represents a very large amount of butter.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to immediately associate myself with the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in protesting. All admit that, at present, a normal and permanent recovery is impossible in this country unless measures are taken to help and develop agriculture more than what is being done at present. It is most amazing to observe that the Dominion Department of Agriculture, within the last few years, has considerably reduced its estimates. This year, I note that a reduction of $858,000 is made, last year $381,000, and the previous year $3,297,471. Ever since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has been at the head of this department, his estimates have been decreasing from year to year and I recall, a short time ago—last week, I think—that the hon. Minister enumerated what he contended he had done to help agriculture, on the whole, in Canada. I had the opportunity last year and two years ago to ask the Minister of Agriculture what steps he had taken to help the farmers of Quebec and Ontario. I was unable to get a satisfactory reply. I trust that before these estimates are carried the minister will explain what special steps he has taken to help the Quebec and Ontario farmers.

We are, at present, discussing an item which interests the dairy industry and if we are to put faith in the reports which have been issued, up to date, by the Department of Agriculture, one might be led to believe that our cheese exports, for instance, have greatly increased. It is true that the Quebec and Ontario farmers were told—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): It is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 12, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) asked me a question which I confused with another when I replied that there was no correspondence. I was in error for I find that the return had just been completed and sent to the Secretary of State. It is now tabled.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Naturalization Act.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the motion for leave to introduce I wish to state that I have had the opportunity of reading the terms of this bill and there will be no objection to its going to a second reading for consideration, but the terms of the bill are such that in view of our relations with the United Kingdom and other dominions, and in view of pending international action, I do not think the government or this house should accept it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

THREE RIVERS TERCENTENARY

Mr. BOURGEOIS:

Were there any negotiations between the federal government and the government of Quebec, regarding the contribution of each in connection with the celebration of the third centenary of the foundation of the city of Three Rivers?

2. If so, was there an understanding and was a proportion arrived at as to the share of each government?

3. Has the government received official notice of the motion passed by the legislature of the province of Quebec authorizing the lieutenant governor in council to approve a grant of $100,000 to assure the success of the festivals of the third centenary of the foundation of the city of Three Rivers, providing the federal government contribute an equal amount to the one mentioned above?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. The answer is no, but at a meeting held in Montreal at which the premier of Quebec was present and other gentlemen regarding the Jacques Cartier celebration, the premier of Quebec stated that he proposed to make a grant to Three Rivers of $100,000, and subsequently he said that that was dependent upon the federal government making a like contribution.

2. There was no understanding for there had been no negotiations and no discussion of the matter until it was mentioned as above.

3. So far as I am at present advised no formal or official communication of the passing of that legislation by the legislature of Quebec has been received.

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. YOUNG:

1. What is the total investment of the federal government in post office buildings throughout the dominion?

2. What rent, if any, does the Post Office Department pay for the use of these buildings?

3. What rent is paid by departments, other than the post office, for post office buildings not publicly owned?

4. What amount is paid by the Department of Public Works for fuel, light, water, janitor service, and other expenses (not including rent) on public buildings used for post office purposes?

5. What revenue is lost to the Post Office Department through the carrying of government or franked mail, free?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): To obtain the information asked for in this question would take a great deal of time and research, and it may not be possible to give the hon. gentleman the information that he desires after all that labour has been undertaken. I would suggest that he allow the question to stand and discuss the matter with myself and the officials of the department with a view to seeing whether we can meet his desires in a reasonable time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands.

APPOINTMENT OF TRANSLATORS

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Has the government, or the Civil Service Commission appointed any permanent or temporary translator or translators, during the past six months, up to date?

2. If so, for what department, commission or bureau have these translators been appointed; what are their names, age and salaries?

Mr. CAHAN: I think the answer to this question was given on February 14 last, at page 613 of Hansard, in reply to an inquiry from the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Desrochers). If that information is not satisfactory the hon. gentleman will perhaps state exactly the additional particulars he requires.

CHAMBLY CANAL REPAIRS

Mr. RHEAUME:

1. Was the cost of the work done at Chambly canal, last fall, by the federal government, paid out of the unemployment relief funds?

2. How many workmen were employed on the said work?

3. How many hours per day and at what rate per hour?

4. What was the place of residence of each employee?

5. On whose recommendation were they appointed?

6. Was the cost of the work done recently on the locks at St. John by the federal government paid out of the unemployment relief funds?

7. How many workmen were employed on the said work?

8. What was the place of residence of each workman?

9. How many hours per day and at what rate per hour?

Mr. MANION: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that neither of these works was done as unemployment relief work. It was work done in the ordinary course of repairs. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow the question to drop with that information, and if he wishes further information in regard to my answer and will ask for it in another form I shall be glad to supply it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

NORTH BAY FEDERAL OFFICE

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. Has the Department of National Defence, aviation branch, an office in North Bay, Ontario?

2. If so, when did it start to function and what are the main functions of that office?

3. How many are employed in that office, and what are the names, duties and salary of each?

4. What was the former address and occupation of each employee at the said office?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

4. Do applications for dependents' passes have to be filled in in a form similar to that required for members and senators?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MILITARY PENSIONS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and memoranda since January 1, 1933, between the Canadian Legion and the Board of Pension Commissioners or the Canadian Pension Commission, respecting action taken or to be taken in connection with review of pensions or deductions from or suspensions of pensions to recover alleged overpayments of pension, claimed to have resulted from alleged illegal marriages.

[Mr. Fafard.]

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and memoranda since January 1, 1933, between the Canadian Legion and the Minister of Pensions and National Health, respecting action taken or to be taken in connection with reviews of pensions or deductions from or suspensions of pensions to recover alleged overpayment of pensions claimed to have resulted from alleged illegal marriages.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and memoranda since January 1, 1933, between the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the Board of Pension Commissioners or the Canadian Pension Commission, respecting action taken or to be taken in connection with review of pensions or deductions from or suspensions of pension to recover alleged overpayments of pension claimed to have resulted from alleged illegal marriages.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYMENT OF MR. ROLAND GAMACHE

Mr. LARUE moved:

For a statement showing:—

1. The periods of time during which Mr. Roland Gamache, of Sayabec, worked on the Canadian National Railways from December, 1920, until 1927.

2. The salary received during each of these periods.

3. For a copy of all correspondence between the Canadian National Railways authorities at Campbellton, and Mr. Didace Gamache, in connection with Mr. Roland Gamache, during the years 1923-24-25-26.

4. For a copy of all correspondence between the Canadian National Railways authorities at Moncton and Campbellton, and Mr. Roland Gamache, during the years 1920 to 1933.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the order passing but I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that as the railway consistently refuses to give information of this kind I cannot see that there is any advantage in having the order passed. I have not consulted the railway with respect to this particular matter but I know very well that they have refused on several occasions to give such information.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STEEL RAILS

Mr. HOWARD:

For a copy of order in council P.C. 1285, dated July 28, 1933, and order in council

P.C. 126, dated July 27, 1933, guaranteeing certain advances to the Algoma Steel Corporation re manufacture of steel rails for Canadian National Railways.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) has made an error in his motion. The date of the first order in council should be June 28, 1933, instead of July, and the number of the second order in council referred to should be 1526 instead of 126. With these changes being made, there is no objection to the motion.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD:

For a copy of order in council P.C. 1229, dated July 28, 1933, covering grant of $13,439.28 to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, re interest on cost of steel rails for Canadian National Railways.

Mr. RHODES: This motion should be amended to read June 28, 1933, instead of July 28.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—ADVANCES OF $60,000,000

Mr. HOWARD:

For a copy of order in council P.C. 1076, dated July 2, 1933, guaranteeing advances to the bank to the extent of sixty million dollars, on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I might point out to the house that this order in council has been not only filed but embodied in Hansard. It was placed there by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on January 30, and will be found at page 99 of Hansard. Under these circumstances I trust that the motion will be dropped.

Mr. HOWARD: This order in council was not fully embodied in Hansard of January 30, and so far as I have been able to ascertain it has never been filed. I made inquiries in this connection on Thursday last.

Mr. RHODES: There is no objection to producing a copy but the officials advise me that it has been fully embodied in Hansard.

Motion agreed to.

LEASING OF NO. 2 GRAIN ELEVATOR

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the Department of Marine or any other department of the government of Canada, the Alberta wheat pool, the pool central selling agency, J. I. McFarland, or any officials of the above companies and the Vancouver harbour commissioners or any of their officials, relative to the re-leasing of harbour board No. 2 grain elevator for the crop year 1933-34.

Motion agreed to.

RIDING MOUNTAIN PARK—SALE OF BEER

Mr. BROWN:

For a copy of all letters or communcations, passing between the Minister of the Interior, or any of his officials, and any member of the Manitoba government or the Manitoba liquor commission, with reference to the granting of a licence for selling beer in the riding of mountain park.

He said: There is evidently an error in the printing of this motion; it should read Riding Mountain park instead of the Riding of Mountain Park.

Motion as amended agreed to.

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) based upon an article which appears in this morning's papers. The article states that it is the intention of the government to make a reference to the supreme court with regard to the jurisdiction of the tariff board in connection with dumping duties on goods imported under the British preference, and I should like to know whether this report is accurate.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): This matter arises out of an appeal taken to the privy council with respect to the matter, the judgment in which has not yet been given.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, on one or two occasions during this session the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has made a partial statement regarding the wheat agreement entered into by Canada at the recent wheat conference. This statement was always made with the understanding that at some other time he would make a more complete and final statement. I wonder if he is prepared to make that statement at this time?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am at present advised and as I indicated the other day to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), the present condition is that it is the intention of the three legislatures to introduce tomorrow bills covering this matter and in the event of that being done, I propose to make a statement with the permission of the house.

DEATH OF LORD ABERDEEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, apparently the observations made in this house with respect to the Marquis of Aberdeen appeared in the British press and I consider it my duty to indicate to the house the following message which was received from the Marchioness of Aberdeen:

Deeply sensible of your tribute to Lord Aberdeen.

Convey grateful thanks to House of Commons.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

BILL TO EXTEND AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the Technical Education Act be amended to provide that any balance of the ten million dollars appropriated under the act, unexpended on the 31st March, 1934, shall remain available during any one or more of the five succeeding fiscal years, but no portion thereof shall be paid to any province after the 31st day of March, 1939.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know just what act is referred to in this resolution. The Technical Education Act was passed in 1919 and was amended in 1929. There was another act, known as the Vocational Education Act, which was passed in 1931, after the present administration came into office. As I understand it, the act of 1931 has never been put into force and I should like to know if it is the act of 1919 that is referred to.

Mr. GORDON: The right hon. gentleman is correct in his statement. The Technical Education Act was passed in 1919 and provided for an appropriation of $10,000,000 to be divided among the provinces as indicated in the act. Six of the provinces have spent their appropriations but three have not. In 1929 the act was amended to extend its provisions until the end of the fiscal year, 1934 and this bill contemplates a further extension until 1939 in order that the moneys unexpended by the three provinces may still be available to them. It has no reference to the Vocational Act which was passed in 1931.

Mr. HEENAN: Have any payments been made out of the 1931 Vocational Act?

Mr. GORDON: No.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HEENAN: I rise at this juncture not to object at all to the extension of this bill, because I think I can say for those on this side of the house that we are thoroughly in accord with the minister and the government in extending the Technical Education Act another five years. But in order that the house may understand what progress has been made in the direction of assisting technical eduction I wish for a moment or two to review what has transpired in this house and this parliament with respect to contributing to the progress of technical education. In 1910 a commission was appointed by the government of the day on the recommendation of the then Minister of Labour who is now leader of the opposition. The commission was formally appointed on June 22, 1910 and finally reported on May 31, 1913. The commission recommended at that time that there should be an appropriation of $3,000,000 per year over a period of approximately ten years, or $30,000,000 altogether. Notwithstanding that fact the government of the day took no action on the recommendation of the report until 1919, and instead of accepting the report of the commission, recommending $3,000,000 a year, the government then appropriated $1,000,000 a year, or $10,000,000 for a ten year period. The agreements under these contracts lapsed in 1929, and I had the honour as Minister of Labour of that day of introducing a bill to extend the act a further five years so as to enable the provinces that had not earned their portion of the grant to do so. At that time there had been, lapsed and unexpended, a total of $2,602,286.51. That would represent amounts to which the various provinces were entitled as follows: Prince Edward Island, $133,000 in round figures; Nova Scotia, $381,000; New Brunswick, $119,000; Quebec, $498,000; Ontario, nil, because Ontario had earned her proportion of the $10,000,000; Manitoba, $537,000; Saskatchewan, $705,000; Alberta, $73,000; and British Columbia, $153,000.

That was the way the matter stood when we introduced the bill to extend assistance to technical education in 1929. I did not catch what the minister said, but it appears that now there is one province that has earned the total amount. Did I understand him rightly?

Mr. GORDON: Three.

Mr. HEENAN: Three have earned the whole amount?

Mr. GORDON: Three of the provinces have not yet expended the moneys voted for them.

Mr. HEENAN: Then six of the provinces have earned their total amount. What I want to point out to the government is this. During the election of 1930 this was one of the specific promises that were made by this government to the electors of the country; they undertook, if elected, to carry on assistance to the provinces in connection with technical education. I can remember well that in my own riding the Conservative candidate promised that there would be technical education in almost every village or hamlet in the district. The government, after the election in 1930, introduced a measure known as 21-22 George V, chap. 59. That act was assented to on August 3, 1931, and now we are informed by the government that not one penny has been paid to the provinces under the act.

I wonder whether the government imagine that they can continue indefinitely this method of deceiving the people in this country. Had the government, after passing this act in 1931, in order to carry out the agreements, made the appropriations that should have been made for three years alone, they would owe the provinces at the present time $2,602,000; but instead of giving them that, instead of carrying out their election promises made in 1930, they are now extending the act another five years in order to give only three more provinces the opportunity of earning their share of the $10,000,000 appropriated in 1919.

That is all I rise to say. I say to the minister and the government that we on this side of the house are in full accord with the extension of this Technical Education Act; but speaking for myself—I do not know what other hon. members will say—I deplore the continued method of deceiving the people as was done by passing an act in 1931 and not giving them one penny under it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apropos of the Vocational Education Act, which is allied to this one, how does the government justify the position of leaving the act on the statutes and not presenting a report to parliament under its provisions, as required by the act itself, or making any payments under the act?

Mr. GORDON: I think the report of the Labour department makes reference to the report required to be tabled under the act; I think it does, but I am not sure. But it is not information to the members of the house to know that no moneys have been voted nor spent under the Vocational Education Act. It is purely a question of finance, and I think there are few members of this house who would not unreservedly say that this is legislation, both the Technical Education Act and the Vocational Education Act, which should receive a considerable measure of support from all members; although I believe that in the past when these measures were before this house certain mild criticism was offered as to the method of devoting federal moneys towards matters that seemed to be strictly provincial in character. For many years I have been interested in technical education and the people in the part of Canada from which I come have taken advantage of the help granted by the province and the dominion in so far as help was granted through the medium of that legislation, to as great an extent as has been done in any other part of Canada. As a result we have there, apart from the universities, three of the finest technical mining schools that there are on this continent.

Again answering the right hon. gentleman, I can admit frankly that the operation of The Vocational Education Act so far as expenditure of money under it is concerned, has been purely a matter of finance and certainly has not been due to any lack of interest on the part of the government.

Before I sit down I should like, for the benefit of members who may be interested, to place upon Hansard the figures. The original amount was $10,000,000. The provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have completely appropriated the money to which they were entitled. The balances due the other provinces as of December 31, 1933, as are follows:

Nova Scotia	$130,561 45
Manitoba	356,312 59
Saskatchewan	166,088 75

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid the minister is not familiar with the report of his department, because if he looks into it he will find that it has no reference to the Vocational Education Act. I took occasion to look at the report very carefully to see whether there was any mention of the act and there being none, I took the opportunity to look at the act itself to see what it said with respect to a report to parliament. The provision in the act was that an annual report should be made to parliament. The act was passed in 1931 and we have had no report to parliament from that time to this, but we now have this particular resolution introduced to make it appear that the government is really continuing to aid technical education. The minister says that this is simply because of the financial difficulties of the time, but he will recall that when the Vocational Education Act was before parliament, we on this side pointed out very strongly that that was not the time to introduce a technical education or vocational education act, which amounts to the same thing, and that the government would be better advised to discover what they had available in the way of finances for assisting the provinces before asking parliament to enact the legislation. I think the protest that was made at that time about proceeding with undue haste in the exactment of that particular measure has been proven to be amply justified. The Vocational Education Act contains the following provision:

> The minister shall make an annual report on or before the thirty-first day of March on the work done under the provisions of this act, containing such information and particulars as the governor in council may prescribe, and such report shall be submitted to both houses of parliament by the minister within fifteen days of the presentation of the report, if parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within fifteen days after the opening of the next session of parliament.

That is section 7 of chapter 59, 21-22 George V, an act for the promotion of vocational education in Canada. The minister has not presented a single report to parliament under that act since it was passed and the reason is that the government has done nothing whatever under the Act. But to-day the government comes forward with this resolution apparently wishing it to appear that it really wants to do something for technical education in Canada. All the government is doing is to renew what remains of a renewal that was made by the late administration in 1929 of an act which was passed in 1919.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What was Manitoba's proportion of the $10,000,000 provided for in the act that was passed in 1919?

Mr. GORDON: The amount paid Manitoba was $363,433.97 and there was a balance due as of December 31, 1933, $356,312.59. The amount would be the total of those two sums.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the total amount for Manitoba under the 1919 act would be around $700,000 and during the last twleve or fifteen years all Manitoba has been able to expend would be about $363,000, leaving a balance of about $356,000. Manitoba was in a far better position to spend the first $363,000 than she will be from now on. That province is entitled to that amount and I think all the provinces are entitled to their proportionate amounts according to population. The majority of the provinces have spent their appropriations. Manitoba—and I am speaking of it because I know it best—finds itself in a position where it is hard to keep its primary schools open and for the next four or five years will not be able to take advantage of the extension of this act. In many districts the primary school situation is rather difficult; taxes are not coming in and yet the young people must get a certain amount of education. Is there no possible way whereby the minister could allow Manitoba to use a proportion or the whole of the amount that is due to help that province to carry on its primary education. Technical education is a very fine thing. I am in favour of technical education, but when you cannot get that kind of education, you certainly should have some primary schooling. Therefore I ask the minister who knows conditions existing to-day in western Canada, whether there is any possibility of allowing Manitoba that has probably the largest amount coming to it under the act of 1919, the privilege of using that money or part of it for primary school education.

Mr. GORDON: Manitoba, like the other provinces, becomes entitled to the money when it conforms to the terms of the act. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat that technical education is rather a comprehensive term, but it is interpreted in the act and if Manitoba can conform to what the act intended, of course there would be no hesitancy, so far as the government is concerned, in making the money available.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If Manitoba and these other provinces have not been able to conform to the provisions of the act which was passed in 1919, amended in 1929 and that will again be amended after the legislation founded on this resolution passes, so as to spend their full allotted amounts, surely the minister must admit that it will be much harder for them under present conditions to conform to the provisions of the act. The point I am trying to make is that when the act of 1919 was passed, I understand the amount allotted to each province was pro rata the population. The other provinces that the minister has mentioned have spent their full amounts. The people of the whole dominion contributed $10,000,000, under this act but certain of the provinces have not been able to spend their allotted proportion in accordance with the provisions of the act, and will not be able to do so. But why should they be deprived of the amount which was allotted to them, and towards which all the people of Canada contributed, when they find themselves in the position to-day that they are unable to keep their primary schools going? I think they are entitled to that money, and that the minister should make some provision whereby they may spend it where it is more needed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I understand it, the present item has to do with the extension of the time during which the provinces may take advantage of the federal arrangements. Speaking as a representative of one of the Manitoba constituencies I feel that we must express our appreciation of the action of the government in taking action along that line. There can be no doubt it is a good move. I could not in this corner catch very clearly the remarks of the leader of the opposition; however I would say that it seems to me that especially at this time of unemployment, some more vigorous policy might be expected from the dominion government with regard to vocational work. Very many of our young people are being forced out of public schools at an early age, a great many of them cannot get beyond the public school, some never get even as far as the high school, and when they go out from school they find no opportunity to secure work. There is the hope that within a year or two there may be some little improvement in that situation, but in the meantime what are we to do with all these young people? I should think that the Labour department might very well put forth some effort to provide for them to secure a better education so that when employment does present itself they will be able to take advantage of the opportunity, and be prepared for a higher grade of employment than they can fit themselves for at present. If these young people are allowed to drift out on the streets in all probability they will contract bad habits, some of them will become criminals, in any case their ability to work will steadily deteriorate. It would seem to me that the relief measures that are in vogue to-day might be supplemented or replaced by a grant for vocational work. I have known in my own city of unemployed boys being gathered together in some of the schools and trained in the evenings in manual work, and during the summer time instructed in managing little garden plots and that kind of thing. This was done by school principals who had the welfare of the boys at heart. Unfortunately the school boards were not in a financial position to give much help, so these efforts have gradually petered out. It would seem to me that it would be wise for the federal government to extend these grants at this time under this act and make it possible for boys to continue in school for another year or two and thus be better equipped when opportunities for work return.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) is absolutely wrong when he says that the province of Saskatchewan and other provinces do not know how to spend this money and cannot spend it. Give us the money and we will spend it. The facts are that this act was passed in 1919. I happened to be in the house at the time. I remember it quite well; we all supported the idea of establishing technical schools throughout Canada. Coming to the province of Saskatchewan however, we found this difficulty, and it happened in other provinces; they held that in a rural community there is no opportunity for a technical school to succeed, and for several years the local government, which was a Liberal government, could not be prevailed upon to take advantage of this act. I know that I, as a member of a collegiate board, was one of a deputation which waited on the premier, and he told us definitely that if we could educate the sons of farmers in farming he would support us. This was several years after we had passed this bill. But we could not prevail upon the government to adopt it then. Subsequently they did adopt it, but we had lost several years, and that was all due to Liberal listlessness, nothing else. Had they accepted the offer of the Union government of that time we would not have been $200,000 behind to-day. I believe they now owe $200,000. I know that in Regina the finest building and the finest institution is what is commonly known as the "Tech." attended now by hundreds of young people; you could not prevail upon Regina to do without the Tech.

As far as we are concerned we want that money. We want it, and we shall spend it according to law. We want our allotment in common with the rest of the dominion. If my hon. friends can prevail upon the house to have the privileges of this act extended it will be the first time I ever have agreed with them. I say without hesitation that we have sent too many of our young men and women into the common labour market through lack of adequate training for more skilled work. Therefore I say that we should get the money, and in particular that Saskatchewan should be given the money that is coming to it, and which will be spent.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think my hon. friend from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) misunderstood me. I cast no reflection upon the province of Saskatchewan. I do not want to get into any controversy with my hon. friend—

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You had better not.

Mr BEAUBIEN: My intention was to help Saskatchewan, not do it harm. What I am trying to urge upon the minister is to permit the provinces to extend technical education in some other form. In the province of Manitoba we have a very fine agricultural college, but it is very hard for the province, with its present population and the subjects taught in that college, to keep up that institution. What I am urging is that Manitoba and the other provinces that have not spent their money under the 1919 act should get their full share and be able to spend it in 1934-35.

Mr. GERSHAW: It has been pointed out here that the primary schools in many cases can hardly get enough support to keep going. We from the west know that that is the situation. A great number of young people at this time, having gone through the schools, find there is no opening for them in useful occupations. Therefore I think we should urge the minister to make some change in the present regulations. Regulations which may have been quite suitable in 1919 do not accord with the situation as it is now. There have been many changes. At that time it may have been quite possible for senior pupils to move from their homes in outlying parts of the province and attend a technical school in some centre, but now such a thing is far beyond the means of many. I would like to inquire of the minister if there is a possibility of so changing the act that those in the more remote parts may be enabled to take advantage of this grant, and that the provinces may have this money to assist them in their educational work.

Mr. GORDON: I shall review the act, particularly with respect to the interpretation of technical education, and get in touch with the authorities of the various provinces which have not spent their moneys, with a view to seeing if these moneys can be applied as the act contemplates.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Did I understand that Alberta has already spent its share under the act?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

[Mr. W. D. Cowan.]

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: How much did that amount to?

Mr. GORDON: $678,524.40.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister just how the government finds it possible to suspend the operation of the act of 1931 from year to year without getting the approval of parliament so to do? The act is there; it is an act of parliament. How does the minister manage to evade carrying out the provisions of the act?

Mr. GORDON: I thought I made it clear a few moments ago, when I told the right hon. gentleman that the reason the moneys have not been provided under the act was purely a matter of finance. We have passed through some rather difficult times since that act was passed, and that is the sole reason why the moneys were not provided.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I quite understand that, but that does not answer my question. As I understand it, under this act the government is not given power to say when the act is to come into operation. According to its provisions the act was to come into operation the moment it was passed. If the funds were found inadequate it seems to me the government would have to repeal the measure, but so long as the statute is there it is the business of the government to carry it out. In other words, the ministry is not superior to parliament in the matter of saying whether or not an act shall be carried out simply because they have not as much in the way of funds as they would like to have.

Mr. GORDON: In answer to my right hon. friend perhaps I had better turn to the act of 1931. Section 3 sets out the amount appropriated and section 4 states:

> The payments to be made to any province shall be conditional upon an agreement being entered into between the minister and the government of the province as to the terms, conditions and purposes on and for which the payments are to be made and applied, and such agreements shall be subject in all cases to the approval of the governor in council.

Then the act goes on to say that the payments shall be in proportion to population, and section 5 outlines the regulations which may be passed by the governor in council defining vocational education and so on. So far as I am aware, and I believe my information is correct, no province has applied to the government under the terms of this act. No agreement has been entered into; nothing has been done. It may easily be that the provinces have recognized the difficulty in which they together with the federal government have found themselves since this act was passed, but at all events, as I said a moment ago, no agreements have been entered into and so far as I am aware no advances have been made by the provinces asking that an agreement be entered into.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says that no province has made application and that no agreement has been entered into and he would lead the house to believe that this was because the provinces were in some way indifferent or were unwilling to enter into an agreement. May I ask the minister if it is not a fact that as soon as the act was passed he or his predecessor in office, whoever was Minister of Labour, directed that a circular should be sent to all the provinces saying the government had decided that they would not enter into any agreements with the provinces under the provisions of the act at the present time? I may say to the minister that I have seen that circular.

Mr. GORDON: I am not aware of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is quite apparent that this is one more matter concerning his department of which the minister is not aware. I want to point out that this circular should have been presented to parliament in a report such as is called for under the provisions of this act. Section 3 states:

> A sum is hereby appropriated from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, for a period of fifteen years, from which payments may be made annually to the government of any province for the purpose of promoting and assisting vocational education.

The last section of the act, which I read a few moments ago, states that the minister shall lay before parliament, within fifteen days after it meets, a report of what has been done under the act. The minister's department sent a circular as soon as the act was passed telling all the provinces that the government had decided that, because there were so many demands on the treasury at that time, they would not enter into any agreements. Now the minister says that no province has applied and no agreement has been entered into, that perhaps the provinces did not think it worth while or realized that times were hard. The fact of the matter is that the present government told the provinces that they would not enter into any agreements under the act. No agreements have been entered into under it, and to conceal their action in the matter the government have made no report whatever to parliament. So they have violated another provision of the act in not presenting such a report.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32 to amend the Technical Education Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Cotnam in the chair.

On section 1—Definition.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When this bill was in the committee certain questions were asked which I was not able to answer at the time, and I promised to obtain the information and have it available when the committee went into committee again. The first question was by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), who inquired if anyone is specially charged with the administration of the marine section in the province of Quebec. I have secured the following information in reply to that question:

The administration of the marine section in the province of Quebec, west of cape Chat, is under the command of the Officer Commanding, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Montreal, who has a commissioned officer at Quebec, P.Q., to carry out his instructions. East of cape Chat, the marine section operating in the province of Quebec is under the command of Assistant Commissioner C. Junget, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Halifax. The land forces of the preventive service who operate in the province of Quebec and who cooperate with the marine section are under the command of the Officer Commanding, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Montreal, and the Officer Commanding, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Fredericton.

My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Mackenzie) asked for information in regard to the increase in the personnel of the force during the last number of years. I have obtained that information for the hon. member, and it is as follows:

	No. of officers and men
1925	977
1926	963
1927	1,004
1928	1,087
1929	1,199
1930	1,245
1931	1,351
1932	2,348
1933	2,515

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with the figures just given, when was it that the dominion took over some of the work of policing the provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We took over Saskatchewan in the year 1928, and the other five provinces in 1932.

There was a further question asked by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in regard to the amount of pension for members of the mounted police who were formerly members of the protective service. The answer to that question is that all members of the Canadian Mounted Police are granted pensions based upon their mounted police pay. As a general rule the pensions for former members of the preventive service will be higher under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act than under the Civil Service Superannuation Act because under the police act the pension is based on both pay and allowances.

Mr. VENIOT: Referring to the province of New Brunswick, under whose jurisdiction are the land forces and the sea forces? I think the sea forces are under Mr. Junget.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The smaller vessels and the land forces in New Brunswick are under Superintendent Salt at Fredericton. The larger vessels and those equipped with wireless which ply the waters adjacent to Nova Scotia are under the control of the officer commanding at Halifax.

Mr. VENIOT: If it is in order, I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the administration of the patrol system under the mounted police in the waters of the Baie des Chaleurs in the province of New Brunswick. I have reason to complain of the manner in which this service is carried on. I do not make this complaint on second-hand information but from first-hand personal observation. The vessels patrolling the Baie des Chaleurs reach Bathurst harbour and remain there idle for sometimes two and three and four days at a time while smuggling is going on in what is called rum row off Miscou island in the Baie des Chaleurs. Upon making inquiries I was informed that the reason why these vessels come into Bathurst harbour and remain tied up at the wharf—I have seen them there two at a time, with their wireless apparatus—is that they are awaiting news from the airplane service in the Baie des Chaleurs. If those vessels are there to prevent smuggling, they should not be tied up at the wharf miles away from where the smuggling is going on. I may say that there has been more smuggling done in the Baie des Chaleurs last year and the year before than at any other time in the history of those waters, and there has been less detection and fewer seizures made by the preventive service than ever before. That is not because there has been less smuggling because, as I said before, there has been more, but because the patrol and protection has been less effective. I should like to see that smuggling stopped in the Baie des Chaleurs because it affects the mentality of our fishing fleet. It places in their way the temptation to visit rum row and bring in smuggled liquor at the end of the week when they are returning from the fishing grounds, and in this way demoralize to a great extent the fishing fleet of the county of Gloucester. No doubt the same is true of other sections of the province lying further to the north.

I make this statement not on second-hand information. I have seen these patrol boats myself, lying idle in Bathurst harbour for two or three days at a time. I have seen them from my own bedroom window when I was ill at home. I draw the minister's attention to this state of affairs and ask him to look into it and see that in future these patrol boats be kept out in the bay instead of sheltering in Bathurst harbour miles and miles away from the scene of the smuggling.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am very much obliged for the information which the hon. member has just given in regard to the situation in the Baie des Chaleurs, but I must say that his information is not quite in accord with the information that has been supplied to me just now.

Mr. VENIOT: I can substantiate what I say.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will be very much obliged if in some instance my hon. friend could give the dates on which the preventive boats were tied up at the wharf as he describes, because each boat has to maintain a log and we could very easily ascertain just where each of them was at any particular time. There is no doubt that in rough weather there are occasions when these boats will be tied up in the harbour. They are small boats and are not too seaworthy. It must also be remembered that these boats have jurisdiction so far as smuggling is concerned only up to what we call the three-mile limit. Any boats other than Canadian boats cannot be interfered with beyond the three-mile limit.

Mr. VENIOT: I know that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Another bit of information which was given to me is that we maintain in the Baie des Chaleurs three boats of the customs preventive service whereas formerly there was only one. According to my information these boats are actively engaged in the prevention of smuggling. In recent years there have been many more seizures than formerly. The records are what I have to go by in making that statement.

Mr. VENIOT: Produce the records.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the mounted police estimates are before the committee I shall be very glad to produce the records and other details. If my hon. friend can give me any further information with regard to the boats which he claims have been laid up at the wharf when they should have been out looking for smugglers, I shall be glad to have it. I can then verify his information with the records of the department and lay the results before the committee when the estimates are up for consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: It would be very difficult to give the dates but I do know that in the month of July last year and in the months of July and August the year before these boats were laid up in Bathurst harbour. There are three boats patrolling Baie des Chaleurs and at one time two of them were laid up in Bathurst harbour. The sailors were parading the streets of Bathurst having a good time while smuggled liquor was landed right at my own back door.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: My property goes down to and into the sea for 250 feet.

An hon. MEMBER: That is worse still.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a landing place and liquor was brought into the harbour and landed on the shore during the night while these vessels were lying at the wharf. These are the facts and I am prepared to substantiate them under oath. I do not care what the log books may show, these boats were laid up during those months and the days I have mentioned. My eyesight is good and I can tell when they are laid up and when they are not. All I need to do is to look out of my bedroom window to see these sailors parading the streets of Bathurst night and day and having a good time while liquor is being smuggled and landed at my own back door.

Mr. GOTT: If, as the hon. member says, these boats are idle I should like to suggest to the minister that one should be put on patrol work in lake Erie to be officered by Royal Canadian Mounted Police men. American fishermen are continuously crossing the line from the beginning to end of the season. Around Pelee island they come over to such an extent that Canadian fishermen fear to go out to lift their own nets. I hope the minister will accept this as a constructive suggestion and if there is no need for these boats down where the hon. member lives, he might transfer one of them to lake Erie.

Mr. EULER: Has the customs cruiser Margaret been disposed of?

Mr. GUTHRIE: She was put out of commission and sold by public competition. She was considered to be too expensive for the purpose.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that there is divided jurisdiction in Quebec in connection with the excise service. Montreal has jurisdiction down to Cap Chat in the county of Gaspe; Halifax takes over jurisdiction at that point and covers the counties of Gaspe and Bonaventure to the centre of Baie des Chaleurs while Fredericton takes over jurisdiction on the other side to the south. Gaspe is a long way from Halifax and I think the jurisdiction over this district should have its headquarters at a point nearer than Halifax.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Fredericton has jurisdiction over Gaspe, over the sea as well as the land forces.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the minister give me some idea as to what is being done in connection with smuggling in the counties of Gaspe and Bonaventure? I agree with what the former minister has said as to this practice demoralizing the fishermen. These boats stay out in the open and exchange liquor with the fishing boats and I know of a number of cases where it has had a most disastrous effect. I should like to know to what extent smuggling is being controlled in these counties. If the minister is not prepared to give this information to-day, perhaps he could let me have it when the other estimates are being considered.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Every reasonable effort is being made to stop the smuggling which undoubtedly has gone on on this coast for a great many years. Perhaps there will always be some smuggling but in recent times more seizures have been made than at any time in the past. Seven seizures have been made in the last few months on that particular coast involving over 500 individuals. Informations have been laid at the city of Quebec in a great many cases, a large number of prosecutions have taken place and many convictions have been obtained. This incident probably involves the largest seizure that the force has been able to make so far. There is no doubt that the ramifications of the smuggling ring are very intricate but it is felt that the backbone of the institution has been broken at last and that it will not be as difficult in the future to control the situation. We are preparing an improved marine service for preventive work. It has been found that the boats previously engaged in the prevention of smuggling have not been large enough or speedy enough to perform satisfactory service. The craft of the bootleggers have been able to out-distance us time and time again but we have under way a program for the construction of a speedier type of vessel. By the opening of spring or at least by midsummer we hope to have boats in these waters which will be quite as speedy as, if not speedier than, the smugglers' craft. In this way it is hoped that we shall be able to control the situation much better in the future than has been the case in the past.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How will these new boats be apportioned between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that the present program is to use all the new boats on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. EULER: Is any use made of the aeroplane service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We cooperate with that service and it has been found to be very valuable. An aeroplane flying over smugglers' row seems to have a very excellent effect but the largest benefit is derived from the information which this service transmits as to the location of the various suspected vessels.

Mr. EULER: Is that a constant service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For eight months in the year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who is in charge of that branch?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Squadron Leader Higgins of the air force.

Mr. EULER: I should like to inquire as to the system of moieties under which officers are rewarded through the payment of a percentage of the value of the seizure. I understand that that system has been changed. What is the present arrangement?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The old system of moieties, with respect to anyone effecting a seizure or giving information resulting in a seizure, has been modified to a very large extent. The individual does not now profit as a result of the fine or of the seizure, but the money which formerly went to the individual is now pooled and goes into a trust fund for the benefit of the force.

Mr. EULER: Including officers of headquarters staff?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Including all members of the force; that is under the authority of an act passed last session.

Mr. MARCIL: The impression of the people in my part of the country is that the way to do away with smuggling is to reduce the duty on liquor, thus making smuggling unprofitable. The United States by the repeal of prohibition have discouraged smuggling, and I would point out to the minister that if smuggling were not profitable it would disappear overnight. I am old enough to remember the time on the Gaspe coast when fishermen would go to St. Pierre-Miquelon and come back with the odd bottle, sometimes a dozen, and no one would bother about it. It was in 1897 under the late William Paterson that steps began to be taken actively against smuggling in the lower St. Lawrence. Now St. Pierre-Miquelon has gone out of business. The distillers and those interested in the trade in Ontario and Quebec have switched off from St. Pierre-Miquelon; they do not go there any more. There would be no smuggling in Gaspe and Bonaventure if it were made unprofitable, so that instead of spending large sums of money to fight smuggling, if the minister would use his influence to have measures adopted to make smuggling unprofitable he would put an end to the practice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no doubt that our high taxes are very conducive to smuggling, and the situation may become aggravated with the low taxes which the United States government has proposed in connection with liquors. It may be that the result of that legislation will be rather to increase smuggling in Canada than to reduce it. There is no doubt that if the suggestion of my hon. friend from Bonaventure were put into effect a large amount of smuggling in liquor might vanish, but on the other hand a large amount of revenue would vanish likewise from the treasury of the dominion.

Mr. HEAPS: Earlier in the discussion the minister gave the number of members of the mounted police force for last year. How many members of the old provincial police force are included in the numbers he gave?

Mr. GUTHRIE: About 90 per cent of the former provincial police forces were taken on the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when the agreements were made with the various provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: What was that number?

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the moment I cannot give the number. This bill does not relate to matters of that kind, but when the estimates come up a few days hence I shall be very glad to have information in detail in regard to all the provinces. Just now I have before me only the totals.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister said that 90 per cent of the provincial forces had been taken on the new force. Are the other ten per cent taken care of largely by pensions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those who were not absorbed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were provided for by the provinces in which they had formerly served. No grant was made from this force.

Mr. EULER: What proportion of the old preventive force, when it was under the direction of the Department of National Revenue, was absorbed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: About 90 per cent were taken on the new force.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Appointment of deputy commissioner, etc.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the alteration in this section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only change is to recognize the rank of detective inspectors, which we never had before, and also two assistant veterinary surgeons, one at Regina and one at Ottawa.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will these assistant detective inspectors be appointed to the preventive force while they remain in the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; they are for general service in the force. They may not be on preventive work.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the non-commissioned officers employed at present in the protective service be entitled to the rank of assistant inspector?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be entitled to it; there is no increase in pay in connection with it.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the situation in the Rimouski district. In charge of that very large and most important district is a non-commissioned officer who, in the exercise of his duties, has succeeded in winning the respect of the local population to such an extent that I should like to pay him the compliment of acknowledging here that he has done his work in a most excellent manner. Unfortunately he is only a non-commissioned officer and for this reason is rather badly handicapped in dealing with local judges, magistrates, the mayor and other important citizens in the district. The very fact that he has not a commission is, I say, rather a handicap, and I strongly commend to the minister the meritorious service of this man. I think his name is Sergeant Brunet. I have heard from his superior officers, from the officer administering the local land force in Quebec, Captain Gagnon, and others who speak extremely highly of him, and I have letters of commendation on his behalf from the local clergy and from the municipal and judicial authorities. I take this opportunity therefore of bringing his case to the attention of the minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am very glad indeed to have my hon. friend's commendation of the work of the force in his district. In regard to Sergeant Brunet, I think my hon. friend is well aware that he has recently been promoted to the rank of sergeant in the force in recognition of the excellent service he has rendered.

Mr. EULER: Is that portion of the mounted police having to do with preventive work under the Department of National Revenue in connection with smuggling segregated from the rest of the force? Do the men in that particular branch always operate in preventive work, or are the various members of the force interchangeable?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The great majority of the former preventive force is retained in that particular work, though some of them have been removed or they are engaged in the general work of the force.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—appointments of constables, trumpeters and buglers, etc.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister decided what the new ranks in the marine section shall be?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The new ranks will be decided by the governor in council and I believe the matter is already before the governor in council for that purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL: The new section reads:

Boys not less than fourteen years of age.

Are any boys engaged in the preventive service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. The minimum for ordinary service in the force is twenty-one years of age; men will not be accepted under that age, but I believe trumpeters are accepted at fourteen. There are no trumpeters in the preventive service.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is there any difference in ranks and ratings between the preventive service and the regular police force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the marine section they will all have naval ranks. In the land section there are the ordinary ranks applicable to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Powers and duties of force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister kindly explain subsection (2) of section 4? There is an exception made for the Yukon territory in regard to duties under or in connection with any municipal bylaws, unless authorized by the governor in council.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the present time we have authority to execute the local laws in the Yukon, but this is not the case in the other territories of Canada and unless authority is specially granted for that purpose we do not propose to undertake that work. If authorized by the governor in council, we may be enabled to perform that service in other parts of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under what conditions would the minister suggest the governor in council could authorize the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to exercise their police power within one of the ordinary municipalities, say in British Columbia?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: In any province in which we have taken over the police work, where the province should request us to operate, for instance, in regard to municipal bylaws.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They will be overriding the ordinary city police force of the municipality.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Only on the request of the local government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only on the request of the attorney general of the province will they interfere?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Offences by others than commissioned officers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That covers offences within the force.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister inform the committee whether officers of the mounted police force are permitted to apply to persons who are confined in prison, what is commonly known as the third degree?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The third degree is not recognized in any way in any court or under any conditions in Canada, so far as I am aware, but nothing in connection with that matter arises in this bill.

Mr. VENIOT: This section defines certain things which it is not considered the duty of members of the force to do and that is the reason I am bringing this up. I know of a case where an officer of the force visited a prison in which there was a prisoner incarcerated for a crime and he put that prisoner through a category of very strict questions and even threats in connection with another crime of which he suspected the prisoner might have some knowledge. That took place lately in the county gaol of the county of Gloucester and it was done by one of the officers of the force. I shall not reveal the name publicly, but if the minister or the commissioner wishes to have it, I am prepared to give it to him at any time. The case is one in which the officer enters a prison cell, with the consent of the sheriff, takes the prisoner to a private room and puts him under a very severe cross examination in connection with another crime with which the prisoner is not charged, but with the intention of obtaining from him evidence against somebody else. This has been done not only on one occasion but on several and under the protest of the lawyer who in the first instance defended the prisoner when he was accused of a crime not connected with that to which I am now referring. I want to know if that sort of thing is to be tolerated under the jurisdiction of the mounted police of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would certainly say that it is not to be tolerated and if my hon. friend will write me a letter making the complaint, I shall have an investigation made into the circumstances. But I may tell the committee I have had many complaints of this nature from many parts of Canada and I have had occasion to read the evidence in very serious cases which have been tried in the criminal courts of the country. I have read the evidence of accused men in regard to the treatment they have been accorded at the hands of the mounted police. One could hardly imagine stories such as have been told in regard to maltreatment, threats, buffeting and assaults which have gone on in the gaol for the purpose of obtaining confessions and the like. But when those matters have been investigated in court during the hearing of a case where judges and juries have passed upon them, they have gone out of their way to commend the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and to state there was no truth whatever in the charges. I know the charges are commonly made, but I doubt very much if they actually exist except perhaps in extremely isolated cases.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is there any regulation to prevent members of the force from marrying?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a regulation against marriage until a constable has served six years or a non-commissioned officer five years in the force.

Mr. VENIOT: There is another point to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister with regard to the administration of the law by the mounted police. Is it not their duty rather to prevent an infraction of the law than to wait until its commission in order to make arrests?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the first principle of police work.

Mr. VENIOT: It might be worth while to look carefully into the method adopted in certain sections of Canada, especially in New Brunswick, in that respect. For instance, let me give a case in point. Here are two young boys of tender years, say ten or twelve, who at a time when smelt-fishing is prohibited, start out with what is commonly known as a dip net for catching smelts out of season. A police officer administering provincial laws —in New Brunswick these laws are now administered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—sees these boys making for a place where they can use this net, and he waits until they are making use of it; he does not reprimand them or point out that it is a violation of the law, but arrests them and incarcerates them in prison. Is it not rather his duty to prevent them going to the spot with the utensil they have for violation of the law; to warn them rather than wait until they have, perhaps innocently, violated the law and then take them and throw them into gaol with ordinary criminals? Yet that has been done to my personal knowledge. I draw attention to this not in the way of criticism of the minister but in order that the department may become cognizant of these things and bring about a better condition of affairs in having the law respected.

Mr. EULER: Might I revert to a question asked by an hon. member on the other side regarding the prohibition of marriage on the part of these officers until they have served for six years? To me that is rather an amazing rule. I am wondering whether the thought is that these men shall become accustomed to obedience before they enter the state of matrimony. But I think there should be some explanation, it seems to me an unfair rule.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The most forcible objection to allowing marriage at will is the cost to the force. As soon as a constable or officer becomes married he is entitled, as a married man, to allowances for his wife, and children as they come. I think in every army there is restraint on marriage for the same reason. Men as a rule join the mounted police at twenty-one or twenty-two years of age, and it is not considered unreasonable that for six years they may not marry without permission, or five years in the case of non-commissioned officers. It used to be twelve years until two or three years ago when we changed it.

Mr. EULER: In other words the country refuses to pay a living wage.

Mr. YOUNG: We pay good wages.

Mr. EULER: It really comes to that, because it seems to me that when a man has attained the age of maturity, twenty-one, he has the right, if he so desires, to take on the duties of citizenship—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, he knows that regulation when he enlists of course.

Mr. EULER: —especially in the province of Quebec. It seems to me there is an injustice there, I do not see why these men should not have the same rights and privileges as other citizens.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: I would point out that there are many who are already married. I know one instance of a lady who was superintendent of a hospital, she left her position and was married to a police officer last year, and two weeks after the marriage he was dismissed from the service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would be for marrying without permission. If they defy the regulations in that way I think we have to discipline them.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that as the regulations are no married man will be taken on, and any man who gets married without permission—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Within six years.

Mr. YOUNG: —will be dismissed. I am told by the officials that a primary reason for that is that a force composed of single men is more mobile.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, that is one important reason.

Mr. YOUNG: That reason would apply more in the old days when the work of the mounted police was chiefly in the wilder parts of the country and a man might be ordered to go a thousand miles into the wilderness; he of course could not take his wife and family with him. But now the work of the force is changing, much of it is done in the cities, and it seems to me it would be the part of wisdom to take married men on the force or allow them to get married when they like, for a married man will be found more reliable than a single man.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask if it is still the custom in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon for trials to be taken before deputy superintendents?

Mr. GUTHRIE: As my hon. friend knows, the officers of the police are by statute justices of the peace. In remote parts where no other officials are available to take informations and the like, they do act, but it is only in isolated cases. Wherever possible the ordinary authorities are applied to for all judicial proceedings.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it is a practice that should be stopped everywhere. In the earlier days, even in the provinces, we had serious complaint about this practice. It does seem unfair that the man who arrests should also try the person he has arrested. It is an objection I have taken before. I assume it is not being done now within any of the provinces, where magistrates are available. But it seems to me that at least in cases where arrest is necessary the prisoner should be kept until some independent party can try him, rather than that the individual who makes the arrest, "runs him down" as we frequently call it in the Northwest Territories, should also try him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The grievance is not a very marked one, because in the last two and a half years there has only been one case where the officer making the arrest has tried a charge, and that was away up in Great Bear lake district.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But Great Bear lake is becoming a very important centre.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is now, but it was not so until recently.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Time served with provincial police force included for pension purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This may not be the place to ask, but there are one or two cases of men who retired from the mounted police in the city of Edmonton, and have since joined the civil service. They are making application that the time served in the police force, for which they received no pension, might be added to their time of service for superannuation purposes in the civil service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At present where an officer has been transferred into the civil service the time served in the police force does not count for superannuation. But the reverse of that is the law now, a man who has served in the civil service and subsequently becomes attached to the police can count on his time for pension the time which he served in the civil service. The other question raised by my hon. friend from West Edmonton is now under consideration; we have had it up on one or two occasions. I do not think there are very many involved.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think about a half dozen now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are a few, and recently a long report was made by the commissioner in regard to that question, but as yet I cannot say what action if any will be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask if negotiations are still proceeding with the government of British Columbia in regard to taking over the provincial police of that province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The negotiations were somewhat indefinite; I think they only consisted of a call by the commissioner on either the premier or the attorney general for the purpose of discussing it. I do not think the matter proceeded very far, but an intimation was given that the provincial government would consider the matter when an opportunity offered.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—pension to widow and allowance to children.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the word "officer" mean any man in the ranks or just those of higher ranks?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the Pension Act the distinction is maintained between officers and other ranks, and the object of these amendments, in order to bring them into conformity with the present provisions of the Pension Act, is to carry out those distinctions as between the two.

Mr. SPENCER: The point I wanted to make was this: If a man in the ranks is killed, irrespective of whether or not he may be only a beginner, will the widow and children be looked after?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, they will be looked after under this bill, but they were not looked after heretofore. Up to the present when a man was killed in the performance of his duty it was necessary to come to parliament and have a special vote included in the estimates; every year there were votes of that kind in the estimates. In order to avoid that necessity and to make the procedure definite and permanent these sections have been prepared, so that the widow and children of any man who loses his life in the performance of his duty will be pensioned.

Mr. HEENAN: In introducing the resolution I think the minister made some reference to twenty years service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not in the case of a man killed.

Mr. HEENAN: Has the minister made an estimate of what one-half the retiring allowance would amount to, on the average?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes; my hon. friend asked that question previously, and I have figures here. I find that in the case of a man with the rank of corporal the widow would receive about $765 per annum, and in addition there would be $60 for each child.

Mr. HEENAN: Up to the age of sixteen?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Sixteen in the case of a girl and eighteen in the case of a boy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What would be the figure in the case of an ordinary constable?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Between $600 and $650.

Mr. HEENAN: I only want to point out to the minister that under the workmen's compensation acts in the different provinces the widows of men killed receive about $40 a month and there is an allowance of $10 a month for each child up to sixteen years of age. Surely if a constable is killed while performing his duties for the state his dependents should receive as much consideration as is shown the dependents of those killed in industry.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think we give a little more consideration.

Mr. HEENAN: Not according to these figures.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, it will be a little more than $480 a year for the widow, but it will be $5 a month instead of $10 for the children.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11, 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—pensions to widows and compassionate allowances to children.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This makes the same provision for the men as is made for the officers.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will this legislation be retroactive?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, because all the widows who have lost their husbands by reason of service already have been pensioned by means of annual grants made by this parliament. This measure will only take effect when the bill is passed.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister mentioned the figure of $760. Is that the retiring allowance of the corporal?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is half the pay and allowances per annum.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT RESPECTING TRACKS AND PREMISES AT SAINT JOHN

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 23, to ratify and confirm the agreement respecting the joint use by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of certain tracks and premises of His Majesty at Saint John, N.B.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement ratified.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this just continuing the provisions of the present agreement or is it a new agreement?

Mr. MANION: So far as I know there are no changes whatsoever. Any agreement that is for a term longer than twenty-one years has to be ratified by this house. This agreement was made in 1927, and the present bill is to change it from a twenty-one year agreement to a ninety-nine year agreement. The agreement is a long and complicated one, and frankly I do not know the details, but it is satisfactory to both railway companies.

Mr. HEENAN: Is there any particular reason why the agreement should be for ninety-nine years?

Mr. MANION: I know of no particular reason except that the railways prefer a longer arrangement to a shorter one. They have done it in connection with these three bills. One bill makes some slight alteration in the present agreement, but frankly I do not know which it is, and only by a study of the agreements could I find out. I did not know that these bills were coming up this afternoon. This bill is merely to continue the agreement which was made in 1927. The agreement under the next bill was made in 1915 and the other agreement in 1912, and so they are all very old agreements.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suppose this is a sort of joint terminal arrangement, is it not?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY AND THE CAMPBELLFORD, LAKE ONTARIO AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to ratify and confirm an agreement between the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement ratified.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) Which are the other railway companies referred in section 1, and what is the necessity for this long lease of 999 years?

Mr. MANION: I am a little curious myself to know why they make it 999 years in these times. I said to my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) when the bill was up before that I thought it was long enough. I will read the memo to the committee giving the details briefly:

This agreement, dated the 1st May, 1912, provides for the joint use of tracks together with the passenger station and passenger facilities of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway, and lands occupied thereby at Belleville, Ontario.

In addition, the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway agreed to sell to the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company certain lands together with lines of railway and telegraph lines constructed thereon.

The lines of railway involved are the old Canadian Northern main line through Belleville and the main line of the Canadian Pacific between Montreal and Toronto.

The term of the agreement is for a period of twenty years from the 1st June, 1914, and, if ratified and confirmed by parliament, is to be effective for nine hundred and ninety-nine (999) years from the 1st June, 1914.

If the committee wants any particular details I shall be glad to give them on the third reading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is not this bill really confirming the purchase of a property?

Mr. MANION: No, it is an agreement. If it were a purchase and were government railway property it would have to be ratified by order in council. This is not a purchase but an agreement for running rights over these lines.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the board of railway commissioners any jurisdiction?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these railways subsidiaries of any other company?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I cannot answer definitely at the moment, but nearly all the railways in that section of the country which used to be independent are now subsidiaries of either the Canadian Northern, now a part of the Canadian National, or the Canadian Pacific. There are probably no independent railways in that section of the country at the present time.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these railways subsidiaries of the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. MANION: The Canadian Northern is now a part of the Canadian National. I cannot answer offhand as to the other railway mentioned in the bill, but I can look it up for my hon. friend. I do not know, however, that it really matters, because it is an agreement made by the two railway companies and has been in effect since 1914.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Chairman, 999 years is an awfully long time.

Mr. MANION: I do not know that my hon. friend or I need worry about the end of that period.

Mr. MUNN: Would the minister in his own business recommend a lease of 999 years? Does he not think it is ridiculous on the face of it?

Mr. MANION: Not necessarily, because it is satisfactory to both railways. They are fixing it practically for all time, making a permanent arrangement.

Mr. MUNN: I would suggest that the term be cut down to a reasonable length. It is ridiculous to make it for 999 years. As a business man you would not do it in your own business.

Mr. MANION: I think that is a fairly reasonable attitude, and if the committee wishes to cut it down to 99 years I have no objection. One term is about as certain for this committee as the other.

Mr. MUNN: But 99 years is not quite so ridiculous as 999 years, in the eyes of the public.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend wants to make a motion to change it to 99 years—

Mr. MUNN: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the term be changed to 99 years from 999 years.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that this is an agreement signed by the various parties interested, and if we vary the agreement that they have signed we may find ourselves in trouble. The term of 999 years is not uncommon particularly in English conveyancing where the titles to English property are often on a 999 year lease. The object of that is to prevent an absolute sale and transfer and to retain the control which the landlord has over the tenant. That is no doubt the object in making this particular lease for 999 years. I do not think we should change it. We might hold up the bill and see if the parties would agree to the change, but to change a signed agreement renders the whole thing nugatory.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It does look ridiculous to make it 999 years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a perpetual agreement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite true, but I see from a cursory glance at the bill that the sum involved is not very large and 99 years would seem to be a reasonable term for an agreement of that kind to run.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the bill had better stand in committee to see if the companies will agree to the change.

Mr. MANION: In view of the legal opinion given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), perhaps this bill could be allowed to stand. I do not think there will be any difficulty in getting the two railways to agree to 99 years instead of 999.

Mr. MUNN: If the minister will recommend that it be made 999 years, I will withdraw my objection. Will he go on record to that effect?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In my opinion the agreement should stand for 999 years.

Amendment (Mr. Munn) withdrawn.

USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC TRACKS AND PREMISES AT QUEBEC

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to ratify and confirm an agreement respecting the joint use by His Majesty and the commissioners of the Transcontinental railway of certain tracks and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement and supplementary agreement ratified.

Mr. MANION: This bill is merely to confirm an arrangement which has been in existence since 1915 between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. The two railways jointly use the terminal and this bill is to carry on the agreement for 99 years.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister have any objection to postponing the consideration of this bill until such time as the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is in his place? I know he has something to say on it and in all probability I shall have some objections to make. I might point out to the minister that I think he was mistaken a few days ago when he said the former agreement was for 999 years.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that; I said that the previous bill, the one with which we have just been dealing, was for 999 years.

Mr. POWER: I took it from Hansard where the minister said that the former agreement was for 999 years. He then made a correction in Hansard to the same effect.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is wrong. We were dealing with the three bills in the same order as we dealt with them to-day. When we came to this bill my hon. friend asked me if it was for 99 years. I said yes, and that the previous one was for 999 years. I said that that should be long enough, but Hansard put it in as 99 years and made the statement appear foolish. I wanted to correct the statement and make it clear that I was referring to the previous bill, not the previous agreement.

Mr. POWER: The original agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Transcontinental Railway was made in 1915. The Transcontinental was represented by the late Hon. Frank Cochrane, but I cannot find out just at present who represented the Canadian Pacific. Considerable discussion took place in Quebec at that time, as it was understood that the Transcontinental would have a passenger terminus of its own. This agreement came rather as a surprise to the people of Quebec. I notice the new agreement was dated January 1, 1930, yet it appears to have been signed at a much later date. One of the signatories is R. J. Manion, who was not Minister of Railways in January, 1930. Apparently this agreement was left on his doorstep, so to speak.

Mr. MANION: I should like my hon. friend to let me know what other lines he would like information upon. Each one of these agreements comprise thirty or more pages and naturally I cannot familiarize myself with all the details. Generally speaking, in dealing with bills of this sort I take the attitude that the two railways have come to a decision satisfactory to both and are merely asking parliament to ratify the agreement because the law says that that must be done. If my hon. friend has any other suggestions to make I should like to hear them and then I can move that the bill stand.

Mr. POWER: Who are the commissioners of the Transcontinental railway at the present time? I see the minister signs as commissioner.

Mr. MANION: I am the commissioner.

Mr. POWER: Are there any others?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. POWER: When the minister entered into this agreement did he do so on the advice of the Canadian National Railways or did he do so as commissioner of the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. MANION: The Canadian National Railways handles the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental railways. As minister, I act as commissioner in place of the old commissioners of the earlier days. I act on the advice of the Canadian National and sign as commissioner of the National Transcontinental.

Mr. POWER: Was this agreement submitted to the officers of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. POWER: And the minister signed on the advice of those officers?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. POWER: The former agreement signed by the Hon. Mr. Cochrane was made on behalf of the crown. At that time the Canadian National Railways was operated directly by the Minister of Railways; if I may express it so, he was acting in a political capacity whereas at the present time he acts merely as a figure head for the railway.

Mr. MANION: That is correct. At the present time the minister acts entirely on the advice of the management of the Canadian National Railways who operate the National Transcontinental on behalf of the government as part of the national system. I am associated with this in no way except merely to act as commissioner on the advice of the management.

Mr. POWER: Pool trains are being run out of Quebec over the Canadian Pacific tracks only. There will be very few if any Canadian National passenger trains running from this station. This agreement was made in 1930, at which time there were at least three Canadian National passenger trains running out of this station and using the facilities, the tracks and so on. I have not had an opportunity of going into the details of the agreement, but it appears to me that perhaps it might be advisable to modify the agreement so that the burden of the Canadian National Railways would not be quite so heavy.

Mr. MANION: Of course the Canadian National had every opportunity to advise me that they wished some modification, but apparently they did not.

Mr. POWER: The pool trains started on March 11.

Mr. MANION: I appreciate that the agreement was made some time ago. In the absence of my hon. friend a few days ago the hon. member for Quebec East asked a question in regard to the pool trains.

Mr. POWER: I was in the house; I heard it.

Mr. MANION: Well, that explains the pooling from the standpoint of the Canadian National Railways. However, in view of my hon. friend's remarks I shall gladly put his side of the question before the Canadian National, because I think, had they desired the changes, they should have advised me inasmuch as these bills, they knew, were still in the preliminary stages. Before the bill comes up again I will place before them the suggestions made by my hon. friend, and I shall be glad if he will tell me of any further suggestions he has to offer.

Mr. POWER: I have none at the moment, but if any occur to me I will inform the minister.

Mr. MANION: I shall be glad to have the information. In the meantime I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Fisheries—building fishways and clearing rivers, $6,000.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Where was this money spent?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): It was spent in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Since the building of the St. Andrews locks on the Red river in Manitoba the people have been unable to catch fish. The Red river runs practically north, in the opposite direction to most of the rivers in that part of the country, and in the early days we were able to catch catfish, goldeyes, pickerel and various other kinds of fish. This meant a good deal to the people living along the Red river, but since the building of the locks the fish do not come up the river to spawn. I would ask the minister to take this matter up with his officials to ascertain whether the fishways are really modern, so as to allow the passage of fish up the river to spawn. I understand that the fish caught in the Red river are lazy; they do not go up these fishways. The minister might find out whether it is possible to improve these fishways to facilitate the passage of the fish up the river.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The fisheries being administered by the provincial authorities in Manitoba, I suggest that the hon. gentleman get in touch with the provincial government, who would in turn communicate with the Department of Railways and Canals, and require from that department the construction of fishways and ladders. Nevertheless I shall be pleased to look into the matter and see what the exact situation is.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would call the attention of the minister to an anomaly that exists in our section of the country. Three large newsprint and sulphite mills are operating on the Abitibi, the Ground Hog and the Metagami rivers, and apparently the chemicals discharged from these mills poison the waters in these rivers. Formerly there was an enormous catch of sturgeon, and there was an excellent market in the United States for caviar from the district, but that is lost because the fish cannot survive in these waters. I do not know whether this is under federal or provincial jurisdiction—

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BRADETTE: Then I will leave it at that. These rivers are partly navigable and I understand that under this item the clearing of rivers can be taken care of. It is a matter of making the water fit for the survival of fish. This is a considerable industry in our section of the country.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If these were tidal waters this matter would be under the jurisdiction of my department.

Mr. BRADETTE: They are partly tidal.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The tidal part will no doubt come under my department. Has the hon. gentleman ever taken the matter up with the provincial authorities? As regards the part that comes within the jurisdiction of my department, I will make inquiries to see whether the situation can be remedied, because it is undesirable that the waters of rivers should be poisoned in that way.

Mr. NEILL: This vote has been cut down by two-thirds, which is a very considerable reduction, greater than in any other item. As there is need for the work, I think the minister should explain the reduction.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is due to the fact that the expenses for such works have been greatly reduced within the last few years. As a matter of fact during this fiscal year, up to December 31 last, we expended only $1,379. Of course these expenditures cannot always be calculated exactly in advance, because sometimes we are called upon to remove obstructions when we did not expect to have to do so, but from the expenditures we made last year, we believe $6,000 will be ample to meet the requirements for next year.

Mr. NEILL: The explanation is contradictory to the announced policy of the department. When I have applied for work to be done in connection with matters of this character such as clearing streams or building fishways, I have been told that the greatest economy had to be practised because the money was not available. It now appears that $18,000 was available and only around $1,000 spent. Parsimony wholly unjustifed has been shown by the department. I have, if not willingly, at least acquiesced when I have been told that no money was available, whereas it now appears that ample money was available but the department neglected the work to which I called attention.

Mr. DUFF: The minister says that expenditures last year amount to $1,300. How many applications did he have for spending money in building new fishways or clearing streams?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have investigated every case reported to the department, but as my hon. friend knows, fishways are built by the owners themselves and not by the department. The department contributes only in certain cases, and as a rule the construction of fishways is done at the expense of the owners themselves. The principal work of the department is to remove obstructions when we are called upon to do so. As a matter of fact we have answered any call that has been made upon us and we have given satisfaction at that little expense.

Mr. NEILL: No, I protest; that is not correct.

Mr. DUFF: I quite agree that the building of new fishways is something which the owner of the dam is supposed to look after, but the minister admits the department can help to build new dams or arrange to tear down old ones. The minister of course has not answered my question. I should like to know how many applications the department had last year for work of this character. The minister says that all they spent was $1,300. The department might have had applications necessitating the expenditure of $1,000,000. I am simply using round figures as I do not know the amount. How many applications had the department and what did it do with them? Did it turn them down flat and spend only $1,300 because it wanted to act against the wishes of the persons applying for work to be done?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My information is that the department investigated every application that was made to it and when it was found advisable to do the work, it was done.

Mr. DUFF: How many applications were made to the department?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the records under my hand. I have a large list covering work we have done in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia.

Mr. DUFF: There cannot have been very much done if the department spent only $1,300.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the hon. member knows, the work of removing obstructions is not very expensive. As will be seen from the amounts expended, it is not very large. On the Tusket river, Yarmouth county, we made an expenditure of $568. On the Clyde river, Shelburne county, we made an expenditure of $25.20; on the Mersey river, Queens county, $46.20 and on the Gaspereau river, Kings county, $89.51. I am informed that we have done what was reasonable. If my hon. friend can supply me with the name of any place where we should have done something which was not done, I shall be pleased to inquire and to do what is reasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid, instead of my writing the minister and suggesting certain work should be done at a certain place, my experience is that the only way to get work done by the department is to protest against it. If I reported that certain work should not be done in a certain river, the minister and his officials would likely have that work done, so while I appreciate the minister's solicitude in regard to my giving him information, I am afraid I cannot take advantage of his generosity. The minister has not yet answered my question. What I asked was this: In addition to the work done at an expenditure of $1,300, how many applications were made and from whom were they received?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have already told my hon. friend that I cannot give the information because I have not all the files with me.

Mr. DUFF: I would suggest then that the item stand until we get the information.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Let the item stand.

Item stands.

To assist in the conservation and development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $85,000.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the meaning of the expression "the demand for fish"? Is that to assist in marketing?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, to increase the demand.

Mr. DUFF: How much was spent last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the present fiscal year prior to December 31, last we spent $46,411 and prior to the end of February we had spent around $50,000.

Mr. VENIOT: To secure better markets, I mean?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, on the whole item.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister divide that and tell us how much was spent for securing better markets?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The expenditure made to increase the demand for fish has not been very large. As my hon. friend knows, we have used the services of Mrs. Spencer, an outstanding specialist in cooking fish. She has been going all over the country the year round and has done a splendid work. In parts of the country where the population was mostly French we had an interpreter working in cooperation with Mrs. Spencer.

Mr. VENIOT: I am prepared to commend the work done by the lady in question, but that is directed to increasing the use of fish at home. Was any of this sum expended for the opening of markets abroad, and if so, how much?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That would pertain to another department, that of Trade and Commerce. All over the country we are trying to improve the quality of our fish so that the fish sent to markets abroad shall be of first class quality. We think that is the best means of increasing our exports of fish.

Mr. DUFF: How is the minister trying to improve the quality of fish for shipment to foreign markets? Would he also give a detailed statement of how the $46,000 was spent last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We seek by educational work and by the enforcement of rigid regulations to ensure that the fish shall be properly packed and canned and sent abroad in first class condition. The fisheries inspectors are being qualified to give instruction in methods, and it has been found necessary to have a thoroughly qualified man devote his whole time to such work, one who can be available to help the fishery officers if needed. We have a special officer known as the promoter of proper fish curing who has done valuable work in that respect.

Mr. DUFF: What is his name?

Mr. DURANLEAU: George Earl, and he has assistants.

Mr. DUFF: I have heard of this gentleman, but I have never come in contact with him. Where is he? What does he do? How does he earn his salary? What is the minister paying him for? What are the officials in Ottawa telling him to do?

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the season of 1933-34 this man worked chiefly in Prince Edward Island, Guysborough and Richmond counties in Nova Scotia, and the Magdalen islands. Six assistants were employed at times to help him. This class of work is proving highly beneficial, and the department is finding it difficult to keep up with the requests for his services from different localities.

Mr. NEILL: Did he ever get out to British Columbia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. DUFF: Who are the assistants, and how are they appointed?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They are all appointed by the civil service commission. Does my hon. friend desire the names? The promoter's name is G. R. Earl, at a salary of $2,520, less ten per cent of course.

Mr. DUFF: That is too bad.

Mr. DURANLEAU: His assistants are P. Mercier, William Mercier, W. H. Casiboom, Earle McRae, A. Wilson and B. Latham, at a salary of $4.50 per day each.

Mr. BRADETTE: In this item is mentioned the development of deep sea fisheries. The minister has just told the committee he spent $46,000 last year for the advertising of fish and so on. I assume under this item some money should have been spent during the last two years in the investigation of fishing possibilities in Hudson bay and James bay, but if my information is correct the department has not made any move in that direction, although the present Minister of Finance, when he was Minister of Marine and fisheries, almost promised the committee to enlarge on the inquiry that was made in the summer of 1930. In our section we are not satisfied with the results of that inquiry. As far as the work done in 1930 is concerned, we believe it was well done but we think it should have been enlarged. Only a few days were spent in the whole Hudson bay area, comprising nearly 700,000 square miles of water, after which the statement was made that there were no salt water fish in all that great expanse. The minister was not very definite, but at any rate he created the impression that further investigation would be made. I am not going to read the report of the investigation made by the 1930 expedition, but I state frankly that that report is not satisfactory to the people interested in that section of the country. We maintain that there are salt water fish in those waters. It is true that in the estuaries of the rivers running into Hudson bay there are fresh water fish, which at certain times of the year migrate into Hudson bay and James bay. Perhaps the minister will say that on such a question they cannot carry the investigation further, but I know from reports received from people familiar with the situation in that area that there are salt water fish in Hudson bay and James bay. To corroborate my statement I will read part of a good report that was made by W. R. Maher, an engineer of the T. & N.O. Railway who knows well that northern part of Ontario and Quebec including James bay and Hudson bay. This report was published in the North Bay Nugget of October 26, 1932. He says:

> From a tourist standpoint the east coast offers adventure, exploration, new fishing grounds and bird life in abundance for gun and camera. Charlton island could be made a desirable base for canoe or motor boat trips along the coast which could be made under the protection of islands. Sea trout are found in such numbers and of such excellence as to alone establish the James bay as one of the leading fishing resorts of the continent.

That statement comes from a man well versed in all that pertains to those northern waters. I believe he is known to the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Railways. Mr. Maher would not have made that report unless he was sure of his statement from personal inquiry on the ground.

A little further on in the report, describing a trip he made in James bay and Hudson bay waters, he says:

> Hundreds of seals were seen swimming and resting on the ice. Gulls, guillemots and terns were evidently feeding, but only jellyfish were seen.

Anyone familiar with salt water fishing knows that there would be no seals unless there were salt water fish. Seals would not come all the way down to James bay to feed on the fresh water fish; they would get most of their feeding on salt water fish. Only a few days ago I was talking with Captain Bernier, who is known in every section of Canada for his voyages of exploration in Canadian Arctic waters. He tells me that every summer quite a number of Scandinavian schooners spend the whole fishing season in the Hudson strait and the Ungava section fishing for cod, although he tells me there are no banks, but on the eastern side of Hudson bay there would be good grounds for cod fishing. Again Mr. Maher says:

On entering the river a school of white whales, several hundred in number, were seen playing about at the end of Manitunuk sound.

That would seem to prove that there must be some salt water fish in that great expanse of water. I do not know how true it is, but in our section it is said that the government do not want to develop our fishing industry because it will provide very keen competition for the fisheries of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We do not want to believe that, but that is what is being said. Geographically speaking, we are in the centre of Canada, and with the extension of the railway to salt water we are in a position to give a thirty-six hour service for fresh and salt water fish to such markets as Toronto and Montreal, and even the United States. We do not want to attribute ulterior motives to other sections of the country, but I am firmly convinced that the government would be well advised to continue the investigation which was started in 1930. I need not refer further to that inquiry, but the fact remains that they only actually fished in the Hudson bay for less than one day, and any man familiar with that expanse of water will readily understand that it was impossible in that time to cover the territory properly. We maintain that a trawler or schooner should remain there for the winter months in order to have a whole season in which to investigate the situation the following year.

I have here a report which was made following investigations into the fisheries of Hudson and James bays and tributary waters in 1914 by C. B. Melvill, A. R. M. Lower and N. A. Comeau. I believe this report will corroborate what I have said with regard to the fisheries of Hudson bay. With reference to codfish, at page 24 the report states:

Cod are known to occur in Hudson bay. A few schooners from St. Johns fish in Hudson straits and Ungava bay every year. There would apparently be, therefore, no reason why these fish should not exist in larger quantities than have yet been found.

The investigation of 1930 was not lengthy enough to cover the fisheries of Hudson bay very thoroughly. Speaking of the different species of fish that have been found on the west coast of Hudson bay, the report goes on to say:

The other species of the west coast are not of a great deal of economic importance; rock-cod occur in the bay and it is said that the true cod does also—

The true cod does exist also, but no investigation of the west coast was made in 1930.

—but there is no record of a single specimen of either of them ever having been found on the west coast.

That would corroborate the statement I made a few moments ago, that the east coast of Hudson bay should have been thoroughly investigated, and I believe the investigation should be continued. The report goes on to say:

Besides the strictly fish wealth, there are other forms of marine life possessed of considerable value; one such as the white whale, another is the seal. The former occurs in great numbers and as he is quite valuable for his oil—of which he yields 100 gallons each, it may be expected that an industry founded on his products will develop as soon as the market is brought near enough to the place of production. The seal is not the fur seal but its hide makes extraordinary waterproof bags, boots, gun covers, and so on.

Further on in this report they touch on the question of the whitefish that exists in the estuaries of these rivers. I need not name the great rivers that pour their waters into Hudson bay; I believe the names are familiar to every member of this house. Everyone is familiar with the wonderful quality of whitefish, and I believe an industry could be built up comparable to the goldeye industry in Manitoba. It is a well known fact that in these estuaries there are unlimited numbers of whitefish during several months of the year, as well as in James bay and Hudson bay. In this report they have this to say with regard to transportation:

When the Hudson bay railway is opened, it will be possible to get the products of the smaller bay out to the cities of the west in the course of a few days, and then we shall expect to see greater use made of them. Such a traffic will require substantial fishing tugs, quite independent of wind and tide, for these latter are the great bugbear of all traffic carried on with the old fashioned craft.

That statement applies even more forcibly at the present time for the very good reason that now the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway has been extended to tidewater at James bay, and we are in a position to give wonderful service in the distribution of fish not only to central Canada but also to the United States.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I have built up a strong case, and I fervently hope the government will find it possible under this item of $85,000, of which only $46,000 is spent in connection with the advertising of fish in this country, to carry on that investigation into the fisheries of Hudson bay and James bay. In our part of the country we are quite willing to go half way at all times; I believe we have shown in the past that we are not critical of advances made in other sections of Canada, but I repeat that we are not satisfied with the investigation that was carried on in 1930. We were satisfied with the work actually accomplished, but we were not satisfied with the small amount of work done. I hope the minister will be in a position to tell the committee that under this item, and not later than the year 1935, his department will find it possible to make a very thorough inquiry that will satisfy our people.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask if the minister is going on with these estimates after eight o'clock?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think so.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Item 154 had been called but had not been disposed of when we took recess.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That item might stand and we will go into the Interior department.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Expenses connected with the Dominion observatory at Ottawa, $38,200.

Mr. MacLEAN: What is the number of employees at the Dominion Observatory at Ottawa, and how many have been let out during the present year?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): At the Dominion Observatory at Ottawa there are now thirty-five employees, and eight at the astrophysical observatory at Victoria. Five employees have been retired from the Dominion Observatory at Ottawa during the past year.

Mr. MacLEAN: Would the minister give the names of those who have been retired, and say if anyone has been appointed in their place?

Mr. MURPHY: The five retirements from the Dominion Observatory at Ottawa were: S. Gold, Dr. F. C. P. Henroteau, W. A. Dier, W. G. Hughson, S. I. Saxby.

Mr. McINTOSH: Who is the head of the observatory at Ottawa?

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. MURPHY: Doctor Meldrum Stewart.

Mr. VENIOT: What were the reasons given for the retirements?

Mr. MURPHY: The retirements were in the interest of economy in the public service.

Mr. VENIOT: Any replacements?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: What is the reason for the decrease in this item and in the next item for the astrophysical observatory?

Mr. MURPHY: The economy at Ottawa was effected solely by the retirements.

Mr. McINTOSH: To complete the record, how was the decrease of $1,300 in the vote for the dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria effected?

Mr. MURPHY: The economy at Victoria was effected by a reduction in the general expenses of the institution.

Item agreed to.

Topographical and Air Survey Bureau—

From topographical and air surveys, compiling, drawing, printing and distributing, geographical base maps for all purposes, issuing technical instructions for air photography and reconnaissance, under supervision of committee on air surveys and base maps; land and mining claim surveys of all remaining Dominion lands (Northwest Territories, Dominion parks, ordnance lands); preparing electoral district maps; maintaining central office for indexing, filing and recording of survey notes and plans, and the distribution of maps, etc., $100,000.

Amount required to pay the fees of the board of examiners for D.L.S., of the secretary and of the sub-examiners and for travelling expenses, stationery, printing, rent of room and furniture, etc. (the fees of Messrs. F. H. Peters, W. M. Tobey, and Harry Parry, members of the board and J. A. Cote, secretary, are to be paid out of this sum), $900.

Mr. McINTOSH: Are these topographical surveys carried on generally throughout northern Canada or are they confined to certain of the northern portions of the dominion?

Mr. MURPHY: The greater part of the work carried on in the last few years has been in the Northwest Territories where there is considerable mining development, but the surveys extend over the whole of Canada. The survey work that is carried on include the general mapping service for the dominion.

Mr. McINTOSH: Just what part of the picture concerns northern Saskatchewan?

Mr. MURPHY: During the past year there was very little survey work carried on in the dominion, either in the older settled parts or in the territories, but we had considerable data in the survey from which maps were being made. The provinces have been co-operating with the topographical survey in furnishing the ground control which enables us to make maps after the aerial photographs have been taken by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. FAFARD: How many employees have been dismissed in the last two years?

Mr. MURPHY: During 1933-34 there were 26 retired.

Mr. McINTOSH: Can the minister tell us how this $100,000 will be distributed?

Mr. MURPHY: In the Northwest Territories, Mackenzie district, $1,300; Northwest Territories, Mackenzie district, $9,500; Northwest Territories, Mackenzie district, $1,300; Nova Scotia, $4,200; Quebec, $600; British Columbia, Vancouver district, $3,800; Northwest Territories, Mackenzie district, $912.

Mr. DONNELLY: How many aeroplanes are engaged in making this survey?

Mr. McINTOSH: We have not had complete details of the distribution of this $100,000; we have had the details of only about $20,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Twenty-one thousand dollars odd will be utilized for surveying in the field and the balance of the vote is for the salaries of the staff.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Is any surveying and topographical work done in northern Manitoba in the God's lake district? This is one of the largest undeveloped and unexplored areas in the world and there is urgent need for maps to assist the prospectors who are going into that country. I refer particularly to the area east of Sipiwesk lake, where large developments are taking place. I would appreciate it if the minister would endeavour to have some of this vote expended in this district.

Mr. MURPHY: Our work is closely connected with the work of the Department of National Defence, which takes the aerial photographs from which the maps are made. I have no item for survey work in the district to which the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) refers, but, as I explained a few moments ago, we work in close cooperation with the provinces which frequently give us the ground control. If the Department of National Defence is able to do the flying work necessary in that district during this season we may be able to complete the sheet map of the area in which the hon. member is interested.

Mr. McINTOSH: What degree of cooperation exists between the dominion and Saskatchewan governments with regard to work of this kind carried on in the northern part of the province?

Mr. MURPHY: The government of Saskatchewan works in close cooperation with us in that regard.

Mr. BRADETTE: Have there been any negotiations between the Ontario government and the Dominion government in connection with the jurisdiction over the islands in Hudson and James bays? I referred to this matter a few years ago as well as last year and believe there has been some activity on the part of the Ontario government through Mr. Finlayson, the Minister of Lands and Forests for Ontario. The provincial government is endeavouring to have some of these islands placed under provincial jurisdiction. I do not think I need elaborate this matter outside of saying that there has been some stoppage of development of natural resources on some of these islands because of the uncertainty of jurisdiction.

Mr. MURPHY: Certain correspondence has passed between the Department of the Interior and the department concerned in Ontario in connection with this matter. The jurisdiction over certain islands can be determined only by surveying and until such a survey is completed we will not be in a position to deal with the matter. Legislation will have to be introduced in the dominion and provincial houses, and until that is done the question of jurisdiction cannot be settled finally.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the minister refer to the Belcher islands?

Mr. MURPHY: There is no question of jurisdiction in connection with those islands. As the hon. member knows, they lie well out in Hudson bay. The islands to which I refer lie in the mouths of the rivers, and it is a matter of surveying to decide whether they fall under provincial or dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. BRADETTE: If I understood the minister rightly, he implied that the islands which really belong geographically to the province would be placed under provincial jurisdiction. Has the province of Ontario asked for full jurisdiction over all the islands in James bay within the boundaries of the province?

Mr. MURPHY: I have no official communication in which the province of Ontario has asked for jurisdiction over such islands as may or may not be now within the jurisdiction of the dominion. I think the hon. member is slightly in error in his understanding of what I said two years ago. If my memory serves me correctly, I said that that part of an island which might lie within an imaginary line drawn from headland to headland at the mouth of a river would come under the jurisdiction of the province concerned, whether Ontario or Quebec, but that an island or the portion of an island which might lie outside that imaginary line would come under the jurisdiction of the dominion.

Mr. DONNELLY: A few moments ago I asked the minister to give me the number of aeroplanes engaged in this survey work.

Mr. MURPHY: As I have explained, that will depend to a certain extent upon the amount of money available for the purpose. We estimate that there will be eight or ten, possibly more.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much of this money is spent outside and how much is spent inside the provinces? As I understand it, most of the provinces have their own natural resources and I would assume that it would be up to them to do their own surveying.

Mr. MURPHY: The surveying done by the department at the present time, outside of the subdivision surveying in the Northwest Territories, is purely for the purpose of map making, which is a dominion function. The only surveying which we do within the provinces is to establish the ground control, that is, the longtitude and latitude, in order that maps may be correctly completed from the aerial photographs.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that something like $4,000 of this vote is to be spent in Nova Scotia; to what part of the province does he refer?

Mr. MURPHY: The district lies to the northeast of Halifax, between Sherbrooke and Truro, and the information is required to make use of aerial photographs which have already been taken of that area.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the reason for taking them in this district?

Mr. MURPHY: These photographs were taken at the request of the provincial government because in that district there are large areas of crown timber lands.

Mr. FAFARD: Many aerial photographs have been taken and the work has been properly done, but maps cannot be drawn without the ground control. I think the government would save money by spending more on ground control to enable the department to use these aerial photographs that have already been taken.

Mr. MURPHY: Not only has the money spent on ground control been curtailed, but there has been a considerable curtailment also in the amount spent on aerial flights and also in the services of the technical officers. With the hon. member, I hope the time will soon come when we shall be able to spend more money on this service, which I consider essential to the well-being of Canada.

Mr. FAFARD: There are already in the department many aerial photographs taken in the last three or four years, and if we do not spend any money on ground control that expenditure becomes futile.

Item agreed to.

Geodetic Survey of Canada—

Primary triangulation, geodetic astronomy, precise levelling and investigation—for the charting of sea coasts, water areas, and forming a basis for the foundation of all engineering projects, and for pursuing investigations of the earth's crust and the determination of the curvature of the surface and eventually of the figure and dimensions of the earth. The above form the basis of operations for federal and provincial departments, municipal authorities and engineering projects over the whole country, $116,500.

To recoup the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway Commission in connection with their claim for injury to John Hedin, $240.

Mr. GIROUARD: This amount is pretty large and I notice that among other things the money is required for the purpose of pursuing investigations of the earth's crust and the determination of the curvature of the surface and eventually of the figure and dimensions of the earth. Does not the minister think that in these times this work could easily be suspended?

Mr. MURPHY: In my humble opinion, the geodetic survey is one of the most important services performed, from the scientific point of view. It is the survey on which all other surveys are or should be based. It determines the actual points of longitude and latitude on which all other surveys should be based, whether hydrographic, topographical or subdivisional surveys. The hon. gentleman is no doubt well aware of the very great importance that attaches to a service of this kind. Indeed, if the economic conditions were as we should like them to be, I think the dominion would be well advised to spend more money on this service.

Mr. McINTOSH: Following that statement, will the minister indicate the major and minor expeditures involved in this large amount, giving the committee an amplified statement showing how the money is spent.

Mr. MURPHY: These are the details: Precise levelling $4,264.50; triangulation, $3,200; general expenses, $6,894.50; salaries, $102,141.

Mr. FAFARD: What is the amount spent in the United States on geodetic survey? I do not think there should be any decrease in these estimates. As the minister has said, this is the most important branch in his department and I do think that the government should do something to keep the men of experience whom they have already in this branch.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member wishes to know the amount spent in the United States on this service. I am informed that during the last year it was about $2,000,000 in round figures, and during the coming year it is something over $6,000,000.

Mr. GERSHAW: I notice that part of this vote is for investigating engineering projects. Is there a staff available for investigating such a question as a possible irrigation system or work of that kind?

Mr. MURPHY: That is a duty of the provincial governments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How many parties does the minister propose dropping from the staff this year?

Mr. MURPHY: We will have three parties in the field.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where will most of the field work be done?

Mr. MURPHY: The greater part of it will be done in Ontario in the vicinity of Bruce peninsula.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the work pretty well completed along the St. Lawrence in Quebec?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that in the gulf of St. Lawrence and along the straits of Belle Isle there is considerable work yet to be done.

Mr. McINTOSH: In what sections of Canada will the money be spent this year?

Mr. MURPHY: I gave the figures a moment ago.

Mr. McINTOSH: My question was as to where this work was done, not what was done. I think the minister misunderstood me.

Mr. MURPHY: In British Columbia, $3,264.50 will be spent in carrying on precise levelling work in the vicinity of Kootenay river; in Alberta, $1,000 will be spent in scientific investigation at Frank, and in Ontario, there will be triangulation work to the amount of $3,200. This party will be operating in the vicinity of Bruce peninsula.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—

Salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the Northwest Territories Act and ordnances, Northwest Game Act and regulations, Eskimo affairs, Wood Buffalo park, reindeer industry, game preserves and sanctuaries, wolf and coyote bounties, exploration, investigation and development of natural resources, fire protection, construction and maintenance of buildings, schools, hospitals and roads, relief to destitute, maintenance and transportation of prisoners and insane patients, equipment and supplies, contingencies, etc., $195,500.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will the minister explain how this decrease has come about?

Mr. MURPHY: As the committee will observe, there is a net decrease of $22,500 which is accounted for by certain increases and certain decreases. I shall give the decreases first, as follows:

	Decreases
Head office administration	$ 1,428
Schools	7,800
District office at Mackenzie	84
Administration of Wood Buffalo park	364
Wolf and coyote bounties	26,000
Vital statistics	100
Fur export tax ordinance	300
Investigator's salary and maintenance	10

Then there are the following increases:

	Increases
Hospitals	$1,500
Medical services	3,798
Reindeer station	1,340
Relief to the destitute	6,948

Mr. BROWN: Is this the appropriation to take care of the movement of reindeer from Alaska over to the Mackenzie?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Could the minister give us a statement of the position of affairs in connection with that movement?

Mr. MURPHY: The herd at the present time is on the western shore of the mouth of the Mackenzie river. We had expected they would cross the delta this winter, but owing to a very severe blizzard which occurred during the season and to glare ice which the deer encountered, they stampeded and returned to about the point from which they had started almost a year ago. Consequently we do not anticipate that they will reach their destination until the lapse of another year.

Mr. BROWN: How many years is it since they started?

Mr. MURPHY: In 1929 from Alaska.

Mr. TOTZKE: Has the number increased or decreased in the journey?

Mr. MURPHY: According to information recently received, the numbers have decreased.

Mr. McINTOSH: How many are there in the herd now?

Mr. MURPHY: It is estimated about 2,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely the minister has not been reducing the wolf bounties?

Mr. MURPHY: They have been discontinued.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the minister think that is good business?

Mr. MURPHY: I may say that the wolf bounty has been discontinued also in the provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not surprised at that.

Mr. MURPHY: But the hon. member is surprised at this.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am surprised at the action of the minister. I am not at all surprised that the provinces should reduce the bounties because they are reducing everything. If the game are to be preserved, something will have to be paid for the extermination of the wolves. The tendency at present is for the wolves to keep southward so that the menace from the wolves that the trappers will not poison and kill in the provinces will not be so great in the north. But I honestly think it is a mistake for the department to discontinue these bounties.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member may be correct; I suppose time will answer that question, but may I say that the provinces took this action first and the hon. member will, I think, be aware of the great temptation there would be to those who were hunting and trapping, say in the northern parts of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, having slain a number of wolves and coyotes, to take them over into the territories and collect the bounty from the Dominion government. Further, as the hon. member is well aware, formerly we paid the bounty and the government retained the fur. The hunters and trappers will now have the sale of their furs, and the prices, I am glad to say, of all furs have advanced considerably. The question of decreasing the numbers will rest now, as it did before, with the individual trapper, and if he can secure for his fur as great an amount as he used to receive in bounty from the Dominion government, I think the objection of the hon. member will be met.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That may be, but the Dominion government under both parties has gone to considerable expense in trying to exterminate wolves. It is a great thing they have been exterminated around Ottawa, but they are a growing menace in the northwest and I am afraid that the minister will find them getting into his parks. If the provinces discontinue the bounty, we shall have the same trouble as we had in the past. The wolf family seems to increase very fast and there is no doubt that they play the very mischief with deer. The result will be that throughout the whole northern section deer will be exterminated. While I agree with the minister that the price of fur has increased, it is rather difficult, as he knows, to trap a wolf. A trapper can make much more money by trapping other kinds of game than by trapping wolves, and the fact that he had the assurance of $20 per pelt was some incentive to him to get busy to try to exterminate them. Therefore I regret that the government have changed their policy in regard to the bounty on wolves, and I may say that I think the provinces have also made a very serious mistake.

Mr. MURPHY: Like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I am well aware of the value of wild life to the dominion, especially that which inhabits our great national parks. Special and very strict instructions were sent out to our wardens during this past year to destroy the predatory animals in the parks, and I receive monthly reports in regard to the numbers killed. I am happy to tell the committee that there are no evidences this year of any great number of predatory animals in our national parks. I feel that the objection of the hon. member is met by the fact that owing to the increase in the price of fur those who formerly received the bounty will now receive as much from the sale of fur as they received from the bounty. As a matter of fact complaints reached us that we were not paying enough by way of bounty—that they could get more out of the sale of the fur.

Mr. BROWN: There is a feature that I think has been overlooked here, as it was in the province of Manitoba. When Manitoba was paying bounty for the destruction of coyotes the Indians would go out in the spring and hunt up the dens and kill the pups, because the young pups brought them as much bounty as the mature animal. I speak with special relation to the sheep industry: I have good reason to know the damage that wolves may do in a flock of sheep; for I think I can say without exaggeration that I lost about $200 worth of lambs last summer from wolves. The fact that the Indians got $2 for destroying the pups was a great incentive to hunt them. We must remember that a wolf may do a tremendous amount of damage between the time it is a pup and the time it is mature enough to be trapped for its fur. I know that in Manitoba the bounty was discontinued, without an understanding of that fact. At our United Farmers' convention we had occasion to bring it to the notice of some of those who had advised the Manitoba government in the matter, and they evidently were not aware of the situation. I know that in my own district, and I presume it is the same wherever there are Indians and wolves, the Indians would hunt the young ones and kill them before they had a chance to do any damage. So the fact that the price of fur has gone up sufficiently to increase the incentive to trap the mature animals does not by any means meet the situation.

Mr. MURPHY: I was dealing with the situation as it exists in the Northwest Territories. The complaint of the hon. member is, I think, well taken, but it applies to the provincial jurisdiction, not to that of the dominion. I was merely replying to the objections raised by the former Minister of the Interior in regard to the situation in the Northwest Territories, where, as I think the hon. member knows, there are no domestic animals.

Mr. BROWN: But the same argument will apply where there are young deer and other game as well as where there are sheep.

Mr. MURPHY: In regard to the taking of the animals when they are young, I agree with the hon. member that such might be the case, but as a matter of fact and of record the bounty was practically all paid on mature animals. The wolves and coyotes were taken at the time of year when the ordinary hunting operations were going on and other fur-bearing animals were taken as well. I am well aware of the very great damage which can be done to a flock of sheep by either wolves, coyotes or the domestic dog, which is just as bad as the wolf when it takes to predatory habits.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is mention in another item of Wood Buffalo park. Will the minister explain where this park is situated, when it was established, its size, the extent of its development, and the use to which it has been put during the last four years?

Mr. MURPHY: While my official is looking up part of the information asked for I shall say that Wood Buffalo park lies partly in the Northwest Territories and partly in Alberta, the greater part being in the province. The main purpose it serves is that of a game sanctuary. To the best of our information, it is inhabited by some thousands of wood buffalo as well as fur bearing animals, beaver and all other fur bearers that are indigenous to the northern part of Alberta and the territories. I have not information at hand as to the year in which it was established, but I may be able to get it in a moment.

Mr. McINTOSH: While that information is being looked up, what is the total Eskimo population of Canada?

Mr. MURPHY: In the Northwest Territories, 4,670. In addition to that there would be a certain number in the northern part of the province of Quebec.

Mr. McINTOSH: Can the minister explain the rate of increase among these people? I am told on this side of the house that they just about hold their own, in other words they have arrived at the stage of what may be termed a natural equilibrium.

Mr. MURPHY: The estimated population in 1930 was 7,103. That included all Canadian Eskimos, but was only an estimate. The latest census, that of 1931, which we feel is quite accurate, showed 4,670, but that does not include those living in the northern part of Quebec.

Mr. McINTOSH: They are about as slow as some political parties we know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope the minister is not reducing the number of wardens patrolling the buffalo park. Has he the same number of men there?

Mr. MURPHY: There are at present ten wardens, which I believe is an increase over the number of a few years ago.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand that a year or two ago there was a herd of buffalo driven up north. Can the minister tell us what became of them?

Mr. MURPHY: No buffalo have been taken north within the last three years.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are those that have been taken up becoming acclimatized?

Mr. MURPHY: Between 1925 and 1928 there were 6,673 of the animals taken from Wainwright to the Wood buffalo park, and at that time there were approximately 1,500 at that point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are experiments being continued in the crossing of buffalo with domestic cattle?

Mr. MURPHY: I believe that experiment was carried on by the Department of Agriculture. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think it is being continued.

Mr. McINTOSH: Has the minister now the information for which I asked?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not the date of the establishment of the park, but if the hon. gentleman will repeat his questions I will give him the rest of the information.

Mr. McINTOSH: My questions were as to the exact location of Wood buffalo park, when it was established, its size, its development and the use to which it has been put during the last four years.

Mr. MURPHY: As I explained a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, the park lies principally within the province of Alberta, with a small portion in the Mackenzie district of the northwest territories. It contains 17,300 square miles, of which 3,625 are in the northwest territories, the remainder being in Alberta. The sole purpose for which it is used is that of a buffalo preserve and a game sanctuary, with the exception that Indians and halfbreeds are allowed, under permit, to carry on hunting and trapping of fur bearing animals in that area.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister has given me all the information with the exception of when the park was established, and perhaps he can bring that down some other time.

Mr. MURPHY: I shall be glad to furnish the information.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. POWER: The minister made some reference to an increase of $6,000 in the amount expended for the relief of the destitute. Would he tell us the total sum spent under that heading last year, and what particular category of destitute were benefited?

Mr. MURPHY: There is an increase of $6,948 in this item this year. I have not the amount that has been actually expended up to the present time during this fiscal year, but the actual amount voted was $23,106. This year we are asking for $30,108, but the increase is more apparent than real. The hon. member will observe that in the item for schools there is a decrease of $7,800, so these two items really balance each other. We are charging to this item the amount formerly charged to schools for the education and care of orphan and destitute children, but taking the two items together it practically amounts to the same thing.

Mr. POWER: Did I understand the minister to say that this $23,000 goes to destitute children?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. POWER: To whom does it go?

Mr. MURPHY: To all the destitute in the northwest territories except the Indians, who are provided for by the Indian department.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister any idea how many families benefit by this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I have not that information with me, but I shall be very glad to get it for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: This is a form of relief, is it not? Are they required to work, or is this for direct relief?

Mr. MURPHY: I can give the items to my hon. friend. Rations for white and halfbreed persons declared destitute by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, $1,000; transportation expenses, clothing and so on—

Mr. POWER: The minister need not bother giving the items; I just wanted to know to whom this money went, and I now understand that it goes to the destitute people living in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Other than Indians?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, other than Indians.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are all the Indian agents in the territories medical men now?

Mr. MURPHY: No, but I hope they will be very shortly.

Mr. BRADETTE: There is just a question I should like to ask; it has to do with the constituency of Pontiac. I do not see the hon. member who represents that riding here, but I am his neighbour and I should like to bring it up. This has to do with some Indians who are in the parish of Timiskaming, on the Quebec side. I believe representations have been made to the minister to the effect that quite a number of Indians occupy a large area of land which is very well suited for agriculture. I have personal knowledge that very few of those Indians are interested in agriculture; in fact only two or three of them cultivate a very small acreage. I am informed that the federal government has to supply those Indians with wood during the summer and winter months, because there is hardly a stick of wood left there. A good many people interested in that section of the country desire to have that land given or sold to the province of Quebec in order that white people may settle there. Let me repeat that these Indians are not interested in agriculture.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me to interrupt. He will realize that we are now dealing with the Department of the Interior; I shall be pleased to take up the matter when the estimates of the Indian department are under consideration.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice some of this money is for the maintenance of hospitals. How many hospitals are there, and how many medical men are maintained?

Mr. MURPHY: There are eight hospitals, one at Fort Smith, one at Fort Resolution, one at Hay River, one at Fort Simpson, two at Aklavik, one at Chesterfield and one at Pangnirtung, which is situated in Baffin Land.

Mr. DONNELLY: With one medical man at each place?

Mr. MURPHY: Paid either entirely by the Department of the Interior or jointly with the Indian Department.

Mr. McINTOSH: I notice that part of this money is to be used for the exploration, investigation and development of natural resources. In view of the mining development that is taking place in Canada, this part of the appropriation will serve a very useful purpose. May I ask approximately what part of this $195,000 is to be used for this purpose?

Mr. MURPHY: There is an item in the estimates of $23,300 which is appropriated for the annual trip of a boat sailing from Montreal or Sydney, Nova Scotia, to the northern latitudes, and carrying supplies for our hospitals and the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police located at various posts in the territories. We endeavour to send on that expedition as many scientific men as we can, and frequently the other departments cooperate with us to that end. It takes the boat about three months to make the trip, calling at various points in Baffin Land and on the shores of the Hudson bay, and at certain islands in the Arctic. In addition to that, valuable exploratory work is carried on by the geological survey of the Mines department. In connection with the maps which we were discussing under the vote for the topographical survey a few moments ago, the aerial photographic work is carried on by the Department of National Defence.

May I digress for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to say that if members of the committee can spare the time for a visit to the topographical survey, they will find an inspection of the aerial photographs and maps of that area in the Northwest Territories in which mineral development has been so great in the last two years well worth their while, and I am sure they will agree that their time was well spent. Immense strides have been made in the last few years in the taking of aerial photographs and, perhaps more important still, in the interpretation of those photographs by men who have made a scientific study of that subject. Again I recommend that the members of the committee visit the photographic library of the topographical survey.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for the information that he has given to the committee. He has spoken of scientists going north once a year. Do those scientists come from different departments of the government, and do the universities cooperate in that work?

Mr. MURPHY: Macdonald College cooperated with the department last year and sent a man. We also secure the services of government scientists when they can be spared from their work in the departments, notably in the Department of Mines, which has worked very closely with the Department of the Interior in our efforts to investigate the resources of that northern country.

Mr. STANLEY: I think this is the proper item, Mr. Chairman, upon which to say a few words with regard to the wild fowl of this country and the possibility of encouraging the establishment of sanctuaries for them in the west. Those who are informed on the question advise me that our wild duck and geese are decreasing at the rate of ten per cent a year. If that is so, these wild fowl will disappear within ten years. This is not a question of importance merely to the sportsman; for these wild fowl are of considerable importance as food to the natives of the far north, who shoot them and have their own refrigerating system for keeping them during the winter until the following spring. Just on the edge of the city of Calgary we have a fairly large bird sanctuary which is maintained by private donations and by the Calgary fish and game association. The expense of maintaining the sanctuary is becoming greater each year, and it has got to the point where private donations will no longer sustain it. We have had the assistance of the minister through his departmental officials in extending the protected area, and very real assistance has been given to the work of the association. However, if the fowl are to be protected by sanctuaries, the encouragement of this means of protection might well be given consideration by the department, with a view to seeing what measure of assistance can be given to those now actually in existence, and what should be done in establishing new sanctuaries.

The question of maintaining the fowl in the northlands during the winter months is one upon which there are decided differences of opinion. I am sorry to say that our provincial authorities are averse to doing anything to keep the wild fowl from going south. But if no international agreement can be made, and we do not seem to be succeeding very well in that direction, the fact remains that if the estimate of a decrease at the rate of ten per cent a year is correct—and I believe these people know what they are talking about—we are facing a serious problem in regard to our wild fowl. The only thing we can do under the circumstances is to establish sanctuaries of our own, and encourage and assist those now in existence so that we may keep our wild fowl in our own land.

In addition to what I have already said, the feed which is used in our sanctuary in Calgary is purchased from the large elevators and contains many weed seeds which have been sent out from the elevators to the farms for purposes of feed for stock, thereby spreading weeds far and wide. So that by using this feed from our grain elevators, our sanctuaries are helping to eradicate one of the great scourges of our western land. I bring this matter before the minister for his consideration because it is one of considerable importance not only to our fish and game association but also to those living in the far north whose welfare is a matter of concern to the department over which the minister presides.

[Mr. Stanley.]

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has opened up a large question, one in which I take a deep personal interest. The matter could, however, be more properly discussed under the item which includes an amount for the administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. I will read the hon. member's remarks in Hansard to-morrow, and when this item is before the committee I shall be pleased to discuss the matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this vote cover the natural resources branch, or is this branch now non-existent.

Mr. MURPHY: This is not the vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any item which covers that branch? It has done splendid work in the past and I should like to know if it has been moved to some other department, or if it is non-existent.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member refers to the national development bureau. This branch has been discontinued as part of the Department of the Interior, but some of the work which it carried on is now being performed by the departments of Mines, Trade and Commerce, and Interior.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the past this branch did much work of great value. It never received the public credit to which it was entitled. It was small, but its contact with the industrial development boards of the various cities resulted in great improvement in many sections of the country. If this branch is not in the minister's department there is no use in my discussing it at this time. I have not been able to find out in just what department the branch is located, but if the minister will tell me when the item comes up I shall be prepared to say something on it.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Annuities Act, $85,000.

Mr. HEENAN: Why the increase in this item?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): This is caused by the increased sale of annuities. The sales this year were the highest in the history of the branch, amounting to $5,039,912. Last year they amounted to $3,580,176.21; in 1923-24 they were only $1,458,818.92.

Mr. IRVINE: Is any advertising done in connection with these annuities?

Mr. GORDON: Not very much. Annuities are sold through the agency of the postmasters throughout Canada. Representatives are appointed in various cities where the postmasters are on salary. I think we should feel gratified that there has been such an increase in the purchase of the annuities. Such an increase was the hope of the government when the act was passed in 1908. It indicates that thousands of people with very small incomes are providing against misadventure in their later years.

Mr. IRVINE: Are notices put up in the post offices?

Mr. GORDON: I believe so, but the amount provided for advertising is very small.

Mr. BROWN: Is this vote for the administration of the act, or for the payment of annuities?

Mr. GORDON: Just for administration.

Mr. BROWN: What amount is being paid out annually?

Mr. GORDON: I have not that information, but it can be readily obtained in the report of the Department of Labour which has been tabled.

Mr. IRVINE: What was the total amount of premiums collected last year?

Mr. GORDON: Last year the receipts on account of annuities purchased amounted to $5,039,900.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total value of the annuities outstanding?

Mr. GORDON: The contracts issued to December 31, 1933, numbered 18,161, and the total receipts to the same date totalled $41,253,950.79.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the annual receipts?

Mr. GORDON: They vary. I have the figures from 1923-24 to 1933-34. In 1923-24 the receipts were $1,458,818.92, and in the first nine months of 1933-34 they were $5,039,912. I have not before me the figures prior to the fiscal year 1923-24.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister tell us the total amount of annuities involved?

Mr. GORDON: That is reflected in the total receipts amounting to $41,253,950.79.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not tell us exactly the value of the annuities.

Mr. GORDON: No, that would not tell it exactly.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister that information?

Mr. GORDON: One would have to go into the tables to determine what the obligation of the government was. I have not those figures before me.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this fund periodically examined on an actuarial basis?

Mr. GORDON: Yes; the fund is audited by the auditor general's department every quarter.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not quite answer the question. I wish to know whether on an actuarial basis the annuities are in a sound condition.

Mr. GORDON: There are conflicting views with regard to the question whether or not one can describe these annuities as being on a sound basis. All governments since the act was passed in 1908 have taken the attitude, and I am inclined to think properly so, that these annuities should be sold on the basis of the government absorbing the cost of administration, because the annuities themselves are limited to $1,200, and the legislation was designed primarily to give an opportunity to those of modest income to take advantage of the annuities during the years when they were able to save something. I have heard the question discussed both ways by actuaries representing the annuities branch and by actuaries of companies as to whether these annuities were sold at a more favourable or a less favourable rate than those sold by private companies. I am not an actuary, but I am inclined to think, after listening to both sides, that they are sold at a slightly more favourable rate than the annuities sold by private companies.

Mr. McINTOSH: How does the cost of writing this business compare with that of the best insurance companies for the same amount of money?

Mr. GORDON: The actuaries of the department contend that the cost is almost in equation. They will not go so far as to say that it is completely in equation with the best annuity companies. I think that both sides rather rely upon their expertness with figures, but I am inclined to the view that these annuities are sold at a lower cost than the annuities sold by some of the better private companies.

Mr. MITCHELL: How is the business collected? Is a commission paid or is it done by the permanent officials of the department?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member means, how are the commissions paid?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, if any.

Mr. GORDON: They are paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and appropriate entries are made into the annuities fund to take care of them from time to time.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the basis of the commissions?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member will forgive me if I am unable to go into details in matters that have to do with higher mathematics, because it is a good many years since I had to struggle with such questions. On an immediate, single payment deferred annuity—that is, one deferred, from one to five years—the commission is one per cent; deferred more than five years, two per cent. The maximum commission payable in respect of an application or applications for the purchase of immediate or single payment deferred annuity or annuities received from any one purchaser shall be $100; that is to say, it is limited to that amount. On deferred annual payment annuities, where payment is to be completed in one year, the commission is one per cent; where payment is to be completed in two years, two per cent for two years; where payment is to be completed in three years, three per cent for two years; where payment is to be completed in four years, four per cent for two years. There is a maximum commission payable in respect of an application for the purchase of a deferred annual payment annuity or annuities received from any one purchaser, of $125, and I am told by the officers of the department—and I believe it to be correct—that there is a higher maximum paid by the best private companies than is paid by the department to its commission agents.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the minister tell us the receipts from 1926 to 1933 inclusive?

Mr. GORDON: The following are the amounts and the years:

Fiscal year—	Amount
1925-26	$1,938,921 17
1926-27	1,894,885 29
1927-28	3,843,087 96
1928-29	4,272,418 87
1929-30	3,156,475 24
1930-31	3,612,233 88
1931-32	4,194,383 81
1932-33	3,580,576 21
1933-34 to Dec. 31	5,039,912 00

Mr. HEENAN: Is any of this money being spent on advertising?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. GORDON: Does the hon. member want the advertising cost for the different years?

Mr. HEENAN: The last few years.

Mr. GORDON: The advertising cost is as follows:

Year—	Advertising cost
1930-31	$27,388 12
1931-32	129 26
1932-33	836 85
1933-34 (Nine months)	1,937 43

Mr. HEENAN: I agree with the minister that the act is one of the best that has been put on the statute books for the benefit of the low wage earners, and I congratulate him on the improvement shown, especially in the last year. But in my opinion the minister is not advertising enough. It is true that the sale of annuities is increasing, but it is doing so only because of moneys that have been spent in previous years in advertising, bringing the matter before the people. If the minister will notice the first figure he gave, I think for 1925, the sale of annuities amounted to a little over $1,000,000 and it has jumped to $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 and now to $5,000,000. That was due to advertising bringing the matter of these annuities to the public notice. I am satisfied that the minister ought to spend more money in advertising than he is doing at present, in order to keep the value of these annuities before the public. Do I understand that part of this $85,000 will be paid for commissions?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the commissions come out of that appropriation.

Mr. HEENAN: Are there any retroactive commissions to be paid, for which we were short of money last year?

Mr. GORDON: In two years it was found that sufficient money was not provided for commissions. In the fiscal year 1928-29 the account was overdrawn $15,000. It will be noted that in that year the sale of annuities was very large, amounting to $4,250,000. In the fiscal year 1933-34 to the end of December the sale of annuities, the largest in the history of the branch, amounted to over $5,000,000, and there is a shortage of about $30,000 which will be the subject of a vote in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. McINTOSH: In the history of Canadian annuities, what is the greatest amount spent on advertising and also the minimum amount and what were the years?

Mr. GORDON: I have before me the figures for advertising only beginning with the fiscal year 1923-24, and in that year $21,915.65 was spent in advertising. Then the amount spent on advertising dropped until in the fiscal year 1925-26, only $60 was spent. The amount spent in advertising gradually increased in 1926-27 to $9,361.00; in 1927-28, $8,529.00; in 1928-29, $5,203.91; and in that year annuities were sold to the amount of $4,272,000, or more than were sold in any year prior to that time. In 1929-30 the amount spent in advertising jumped to $19,359.18, but the sale of annuities fell over a million dollars. In 1930-31, the amount spent in advertising again jumped to $27,388.12, which is the largest sum spent to that date, and the sale of annuities in that year amount to $3,612,000. For the succeeding years the figures are as follows:

Year—	Amount spent in advertising	Sale of annuities
1931-32. . . .	$ 129 26	$4,194,383 81
1932-33. . . .	836 85	3,580,176 21
1933-34. . . . (nine months)	1,937 43	5,039,900 12

The last figure is for nine months. Therefore there is in fact, on a review of the figures, very little relationship between the amount spent on advertising and the amount of annuities sold. But I have no doubt it is desirable and, I believe, necessary to do such advertising as will acquaint people of small means with the security offered by investment in these annuities and I will bear in mind in that regard the observations made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for the information he has given to the committee with regard to the question I asked. I think there is a direct relation between the amount of money, every dollar the department ever spent on advertising, and the amount of annuities sold to the Canadian people. I believe, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has just said, the department is now reaping the benefit of constructive advertising in past years. I am sure we all know the statement in the Good Book: "Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days." That is exactly the situation we have in this case. The hard publicity work was done in past years and the department is reaping the benefit from year to year. If the best work is to be done in the future and the postmasters of Canada are to sell the amount of annuities expected of them, this publicity must be carried on. Might I ask the minister what his policy with regard to this publicity is to be? Has he made up his mind as to what it will be next year?

Mr. GORDON: Yes; the government's policy with respect to advertising is to carry on such well directed advertising as is required to bring before those who may be interested in the small annuities the plain facts and the benefits that will flow from the investment of their money during the time they are capable of earning to take care of them in the misfortunes and misadventures that may come to them in the twilight of their lives. That is the policy.

Mr. GERSHAW: In view of the fact that annuities seem to be sold by the government cheaper than by private companies, does the minister expect to increase the selling price of government annuities?

Mr. GORDON: If my memory serves me correctly, the annuities bill was first introduced in the Senate in 1908 by the late Sir Richard Cartwright and subsequently sponsored in this house by the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding. While I have not had opportunity for many years to read their statements and remarks at that time, I believe that the principle upon which the then government embarked on the sale of annuities was primarily to provide small annuities for people of very modest means, to encourage them in thrift and the adoption of a course calculated to build up for themselves a reserve fund for their later life. Having that in view I believe it was the opinion of those men, with which I do not quarrel, that it was desirable that the government should absorb the cost of administration, which in connection with annuities issued by private companies of course is borne by the annuitant, together with some profit. I think perhaps there is no better activity in which the government can be engaged than that of devoting some money from the consolidated revenue fund to making measurably attractive this sort of investment for people who have not too much of this world's goods and who are earnestly striving in a thrifty way to make provision for their future years.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister spoke of an annuity being a first class investment for a citizen to have in the twilight of life. Can he give the committee the age limit at which an annuity investment is most profitable, considering all circumstances?

Mr. GORDON: Those matters are worked out on a strictly actuarial basis. Any observation I might make would not be helpful; I am not an actuary, and it is entirely beyond me to advise anyone at what age they should start to save for old age. But from my limited experience in finance I would say, start to save money at as early an age as possible.

Mr. McINTOSH: And keep right on at it.

Mr. GORDON: And keep right on at it.

Item agreed to.

Conciliation and Labour Act, $32,000.

Mr. HEENAN: There is a reduction of $3,000 in this item. Does the minister not expect that he will have to increase his activities in connection with conciliation this year?

Mr. GORDON: The estimate is based on the actual expenditures of last year, and I do not anticipate that there will be any necessity—I hope there will not—for greater activity this year than there was last year under this act. The conciliation officers, I think, did very fine work, and in many cases prevented the loss that invariably follows too hasty action on the part of employers or employees.

Mr. HEENAN: How much of that vote was spent last year?

Mr. GORDON: For the nine months to December 31, 1933, the total amount spent was $17,940.60.

Mr. McINTOSH: How many conciliation boards came into existence last year?

Mr. GORDON: No conciliation boards as described in the act have come into existence for many years.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like to raise a question under this item which perhaps has not been raised here for some time. I have no doubt that many hon. members have been amazed and shocked at the revelations brought out by the committee dealing with mass buying and price spreads. The low wages which have been paid in too many industries show that the government ought to attempt, in connection with its contracts, to see that fair wage provisions are properly lived up to. In calling the attention of the minister to this matter I do not want him to feel that I am attempting any personal reflection, but it has come to my knowledge that contracts which have been entered into by the government have been sublet and then sublet again, and the goods manufactured under the worst possible conditions right here in Canada. I realize that when the government let contracts they include some kind of fair wage clause, and if there is not a fair wage clause I suppose they provide for the going rates of pay in the district in which the goods are to be produced. I have in mind one contract let by the government which was subsequently sublet and then sublet again to a third and possibly a fourth party, and the girls working on this contract were earning, I am told by reliable people, $2 or $3 a week—

Mr. GORDON: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I may tell him that purchases made now by this government have included in the contract a clause plainly stipulating that the laws with respect to wages in effect in the province in which the contract is to be carried out must be observed, and the eight hour day. I do not want the hon. member to feel that I am taking an attitude calculated to close off discussion of this most important matter, but I would draw the attention of the chair to the fact that the topic to which the hon. member is addressing himself is now being reviewed by a select committee of this house, of which I believe the hon. gentleman is himself a member. While I confess that my knowledge of the rules is perhaps not as comprehensive as it should be, I believe there is a rule that when a matter is under consideration by such a committee it should not be the subject of argument and review in the house.

Mr. HEAPS: As to the point of order raised by the minister, I am now dealing with a question relating to the enforcement of fair wages by the Department of Labour. I am not attempting to discuss a question that is before the committee, but am trying to find out what action the Department of Labour has taken to see that the fair wage clause in government contracts is properly observed. I do not think there is any relation between the matter referred to by the minister and that which I am now discussing. I do not know whether the minister wants to press his point of order, but I shall not pursue the matter much further because the minister has now given the assurance that the matter is being properly looked after by the Department of Labour. May I ask the minister this question? Supposing it is found that these regulations have been violated by contractors or subcontractors; what action is taken by the department?

Mr. GORDON: If it were shown that a contractor was guilty of a breach of the contract and was not complying with its terms the government would have two courses open to it. One would be to cancel the contract; the other would be to have the conciliation and fair wage officers investigate the situation. If it were found, as in the hypothetical case to which the hon. member has made reference, that fair wages were not being paid, then without hesitation the Department of Labour would notify the other department concerned and ask that the money due that contractor be withheld until the terms of the contract were carried out and fair wages paid.

Mr. HEAPS: The case to which I am referring is not hypothetical by any means; I am quite prepared to give the names and details in full. Supposing a contract is let by the government; the contractor sublets that contract and the subcontractor lets it to a third party. Who is to be held responsible for the enforcement of the contract as it was entered into between the government and the first contractor?

Mr. GORDON: I assume the hon. member means who will be held responsible by the government. In the absence of anything of a special nature to the contrary the legal position would be that the government was dealing only with the first contractor. Obviously there is no obligation on the government to follow it through afterwards, but if it is made to appear that the main contractor, either himself or through the agency of subcontractors, has been guilty of procuring a breach of a contract, the position does not give rise to any very serious difficulty, because the money can be held back upon the facts being made known.

Mr. HEAPS: Then may I just pursue the matter a little further. Where there are no fair wage laws, as in the part of the country I have in mind, the prevailing rates apply, and of course these vary. There are some districts where they are probably all sweatshop rates, or the contract may be let in a small place that has only one factory, which may pay extremely low wages. Those wages may amount to only one half or one quarter of the minimum rate in similar lines of industry elsewhere. I think the government should be a model employer of labour and should insist in the contracts it lets for government supplies that proper rates of wages should be paid. I know that under some contracts it is easy for the contractor to get out of paying fair wages by paying the going rate in the district concerned; that may be only $3, $4 or $5 a week, while if the goods were produced under decent conditions the wages might be from $12 to $15 a week. I hope the government intend to clean up this class of sweatshop, in view of the fact that lately they have come into such prominence, but I think the government should give a lead by seeing that goods produced under government contracts are produced under the best possible conditions.

Mr. BRADETTE: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if my hon. friend would allow the minister to give his viewpoint on the question I have raised.

Mr. GORDON: I can only repeat the point I raised a short time ago, with respect to this whole matter being before a special committee of this house. No one in this chamber knows better than my hon. friend the difficulties that confront the federal government in connection with wages paid in sweat shops and so on. I have told my hon. friend of the attitude taken by this government with respect to contracts that have been let; at least it gives some leadership to the various provinces letting similar government contracts, but of course that does not indicate the full extent of the influence exerted by this government. In this way it indicates, at least, to industry, to manufacturers, wholesale buyers and others, the viewpoint of this government, and I hope the viewpoint of all provincial governments. But again I say that the hon. gentleman should not ask me to anticipate what action this government will or may take when I am sure every hon. member in this chamber, whether or not he is a supporter of the government, would prefer to have the benefit of the conclusions and recommendations arrived at by the committee now sitting, of which the hon. gentleman is a member. Certainly I should like to have them before I make any observations, and I think it would be entirely unfair to that committee and perhaps just as unfair to myself to ask me to make any such statement now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot agree with the minister. We are now discussing the policy of the government and this comes up on the estimates. The prevailing rate of wages in an industry may be only two or three dollars a week, as my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has said. In my judgment the government has a distinct responsibility in connection with the wages paid under contracts let by the government. The minister has said the government has cancelled contracts, but I should like the minister to tell us of any contracts that have been cancelled. Frankly I think the policy of the government is absolutely wrong; it is similar to the policy that has been followed by the minimum wage board in Ontario. They sit back and wait until complaints are made, without taking into consideration the dangers which confront the employees if they make complaints. The function of this department is to go out and insist that the conditions of labour under contracts let by the government should be fair and equitable. It is altogether wrong that a member of this house should be able to give instances of sweatshop conditions existing in industry arising out of contracts let by this government.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the federal government has a direct responsibility, which does not cease when they say the prevailing rate of wages is being paid. They should insist that a living rate of wages be paid, and when I say a living rate I mean a rate in conformity with living conditions as we understand them in Canada. In the past the policy of the Department of Labour has been absolutely negative in connection with the low wages paid under contracts let by the government. They have sat back and waited until complaints were made. Since they have some knowledge of labour conditions in this country, they must know that unless an organization exists it is well nigh impossible for the employees to make any complaint. In connection with the subletting of these contracts the government should insist that when a contractor tenders it should not be possible for him to sublet the work to another contractor and then have that work sublet to still a third man. The responsibility rests with the government to insist that fair rates of wages be paid in the industry which is concerned with the contract. Arising out of the minister's observations I would ask him if he has knowledge of any contract being cancelled during the past year because the rate of wages did not conform with the regulations of his department.

Mr. GORDON: I have no information, Mr. Chairman, with respect to any contracts that have been absolutely cancelled, but there is, however, a long list of contracts wherein the officers of the department have investigated, both after complaints and on their own initiative, situations that have come to their notice which in their judgment and in my judgment required investigation. In some instances it was found that there was nothing to support the complaints that were made. In other instances, and there was quite a number of them, adjustments were made where it was found that the contractor was not paying, for instance, the current rate of wages. Those are matters that are constantly before the officers of the federal department. I can only say to both the hon. members who have just spoken that so far as federal contracts are concerned the federal government will take every possible means to see that in the work carried out for each department of government, living and fair wages are paid. So far as the wage earner is concerned, if he or she is not paid a fair and living wage by manufacturers or by others, wholesalers or anybody else, unless both the employer and the employee happen to be in the same state of financial difficulty at the same time, then I will say that the employer has very little justification for trying to carry on at all.

Mr. HEAPS: We are very glad to have that statement from the minister,

Mr. BRADETTE: A few minutes ago the Minister of Labour, speaking of the decrease in the item, said that he hoped less would be spent this year. I hope that his wish will be fulfilled, because it would mean that we would have less labour trouble in Canada. The minister is well aware that there were two or three bushmen's strikes last fall in northern Ontario, and that there is one on even now.

Mr. GORDON: Not now?

Mr. BRADETTE: There is one at Chapleau at the present moment. As I stated in my remarks in the debate on the address, there might have been objections to some of the leaders but I certainly am not in a position to state that the leaders were radical or bolshevik or anything of that kind. There is this one fact that Canada should be seized of, and that is that there were many anomalies in the conditions under which the bushmen and settlers cutting pulpwood were working in Ontario and Quebec, and both provincial governments have seen fit to devise new labour regulations. Where there is smoke there is often fire. The strikes that took place last fall were to a very large extent warranted. I was among the strikers for a number of weeks and I know the conditions. Not later than last week the province of Quebec passed statutes dealing wholly with bushmen and with men engaged in lumbering operations. I have not yet had time to study that legislation, but I have no doubt that it was designed to remedy some of the anomalies that have existed in the past. What is true of northern Quebec is true of northern Ontario.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that great credit must be given to the strike leaders, because so far as I know the strikers in places like Kapuskasing, Cochrane, Iroquois Falls and Smooth Rock Falls were absolutely well behaved and had the wholehearted support of the citizens in those towns and localities. So after all these leaders must have been good, practical labour men. I know for a positive fact that some of these men belonged to the national and international unions, and in corroboration of what I say let me add that the sulphite and newsprint workers in the big mills at Iroquois Falls and Smooth Rock Falls and Kapuskasing each gave one hour's pay for the upkeep of the strike. If there had been too much radicalism in the leading of the strike it would not have been supported by the national and international labour unions. A great amount of good has come from having the situation thus brought so forcibly before the public. But I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Labour department should take the initiative in a strike of that kind.

Mr. GORDON: I can tell the hon. member that the Labour department, acting in conjunction with the department in Ontario, sent out officers to places like Kapuskasing where it was possible to effect conciliation. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) well knows from his experience how desirable it is that when conciliation officers go into places like that, they should be given the opportunity by those in dispute to bring both parties together. That is the essence of conciliation. Our officers were in places where it was possible to do that. My references the other day were to places in northern Ontario where certain elements were at work which argued and advised and cajoled and did everything possible to keep employer and employee apart, giving no chance to the conciliation officers to operate. The whole basis of efficient conciliation work in industry or anywhere else where there is more than one person concerned, where there are conflcting interests, is to give the opportunity for conciliation to smooth out the difficulties and get everyone as nearly satisfied as humans can be. Our officers were in those places where conciliation was possible, and my reference the other day was to places where, by reason of the activities of certain elements, the efforts of the conciliation officers were rendered impossible.

Mr. BRADETTE: I greatly appreciate the statement which has just been made by the Minister of Labour. I am aware of the fact that officers of the federal Department of Labour were endeavouring to bring about a settlement of the dispute, and I have never criticized the work which they did. But I still maintain that it is the prerogative of the Labour department, whether of the federal or the provincial government, to take the initiative, and if the provincial department fails to take it, the federal department should step in. The initiative was taken in the Kapuskasing strike, and the result was that that strike was settled early. I hope the day will soon come, Mr. Chairman, and I am speaking as a citizen who knows something of labour unions and the situation of labour, when we shall find it possible to have one Labour department for all Canada. I am convinced that the Minister of Labour personally wants to bring about conciliation in these strikes, and last fall I found myself in the same position, though on a smaller scale, that he has just described, because the company and the strikers did not appear willing to accept my services in conciliation, taking the view that the settlement of the strike was primarily a provincial matter.

With reference to the minister's allusions on February 26 to the effect that some of the leaders in the Chapleau strike were radicals, I want to say that even if some of the strikers might be inclined to be radical, a lot of credit is due to their leaders for bringing to the attention of the public the anomalies that existed, and some of which still exist in some of these lumbering camps in northern Ontario. Talk of sweatshops and of people being underpaid! I say, Mr. Chairman, that one of the things that should be investigated by the committee on price spreads is the lumbering industry and operating conditions in that industry throughout Canada. They will find real sweatshop conditions; they will find men working to the utmost of their physical ability and receiving only a few cents remuneration. These conditions do not exist in all sections but they are to be found in most. There were reasons for the strike last fall; the men were smarting under injustices. In many cases the settlers were not receiving justice but through their leaders these men were able to bring their case before the Canadian public and legislation is now being enacted which will secure them better treatment.

I should like to make a few remarks in connection with the statement made by the Minister of Labour on January 26. I have in my hand a letter containing nineteen pages. It is very well written and I do not know but I should read it to the committee.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it as read.

Mr. BRADETTE: Some hon. members may object, but these men have been suffering. They do not know just where to find a solution for their problem. It is stated in this letter that certain camps are absolutely filthy and not fit for human habitation. I know that no hon. member would live in them for even half a day.

Mr. McINTOSH: Were there not conferences with regard to these camps?

Mr. BRADETTE: Conferences were held and it is hoped that the situation will be improved. I believe that this committee should realize the situation. The provincial and federal governments should attempt to remedy these conditions. After all, a lumberman, an axeman or a settler is a human being who is just as much entitled to a good living as any hon. member or other citizen of this country. I hope the minister will make it a point to consider this letter and give it the attention it deserves. The gentleman who writes it was one of the leaders in the Chapleau strike. He is not a red; he was born in Canada. I should like to read one paragraph in which he makes allusion to himself, as follows:

> Personally I am a Canadian citizen of British pioneer stock, born, reared and schooled in Bromley township, Renfrew county till January 1, 1927, when I came to the unorganized districts in the vicinity of Chapleau, where I have made my living since as bushman, track worker, sawmill hand, river driver, trapper and prospector. At present I am a property holder in Sudbury district as holding a number of mining claims in the Swayze gold area near here.

This man claims he has nothing to do with radicalism or communism. It is always easy to attempt to throw a smoke-screen around strike activities and give them a bad name, but the fact remains that some of these men are suffering. They realize that the government can remedy the situation. The legislation passed only a few days ago in the province of Quebec will help to remedy the injustices which have existed in that province. I can speak as a labouring man and as an axeman, and I really believe the situation to-day is not much better than it was twenty years ago. What applies to the province of Quebec applies just as forcibly to the province of Ontario.

Last fall I visited some of these lumbering camps. I found some of them to be all right but others were not. In certain camps a human being should not be allowed to live much less to sleep. There seemed to be no attempt at cleanliness, in fact, filthiness seemed to reign supreme. These camps I refer to are not even in my riding but I make a sincere appeal on behalf of the men. The strikes which occurred in my own riding were settled and I would not like to see a repetition of what happened there. Hon. members in this parliament or members of the provincial legislature should not be willing to see such conditions exist in Canada; they are not worthy of our great country and our great natural resources, and they certainly are not worthy of our provincial and federal governments. I know the minister understands the language I am speaking and I think he wants to improve the situation. As he said a few moments ago, he took the initiative in settling the strikes which occurred in our own section, but conditions are still unsettled around Chapleau. Regardless of what some may say, that strike is not settled. A number of strikers have been kept on direct relief for the last five, six or seven weeks by the provincial and federal governments. These men are Canadians, both natural born and naturalized, and they deserve as much consideration as any other citizens.

I make this appeal to the minister because I know it is within the powers of the government to remedy the present situation. The citizens of Canada should realize the situation which exists in these lumbering camps. I listened to the two previous speakers and I think they realize just as I do that this government should have power to relieve the situation. These lumbermen are worthy citizens; they have helped and will keep on helping to build up the prosperity of Canada.

Mr. McINTOSH: Under item 165 I asked the minister whether any boards had been established, and I think he said that that matter would come under item 168. I understand that this vote is used largely to get the employer and employee together to investigate, discuss, confer and bring about satisfactory labour conditions. In view of the conditions which existed throughout Canada last year, how does the minister explain the decrease in this vote? How could there be a decrease if the amount of conciliation work which ought to have been done was not done?

Mr. GORDON: In my estimation these conciliation officers did very fine work last year. While there were some unfortunate strikes, comparatively speaking they were very few. The conciliation officer now does the work which the conciliation boards were set up to do years ago. There have been no new boards set up, nor have any of the old ones functioned for many years. The conciliation officer tries to settle disputes by conciliation thereby doing away with the necessity of setting up boards under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. If a strike can be settled or a dispute smoothed out, there is no necessity of going further.

Mr. McINTOSH: The adjustment is done by an individual rather than a board?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: I realize the difficulty a federal minister of labour would have in connection with a complaint such as that made by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). Our federal laws hardly cover such a matter, inasmuch as the natural resources come within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Our Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is not framed to deal with matters of the kind. The great difficulty which I believe the minister finds in northern Ontario, as I found when I had the honour of being minister of labour, is the lack of cooperation by the provincial governments, and especially by the Minister of Lands and Forests and the Minister of Labour of the province of Ontario. The Minister of Labour for Ontario had full authority. He had at his command the provincial laws with which to deal with troubles in the lumber camps in northern Ontario; and when the outbreak started, instead of sending in someone to investigate, what did he do? He sent the provincial police in to find out whether any of the lumber workers were violating the laws of the province or of the dominion. I remember well that when one of his own fellow party men, the mayor of Fort William, wired the Minister of Lands and Forests that he ought to make an investigation because the lumber operators claimed that it was the lumbermen and the radicals who were causing the strike—he claimed that the radicals were blaming the lumber operators—his reply to the mayor of Fort William was, "We have already had the matter investigated by the provincial police and we have not found up to the present time anyone violating the law." In other words, a minister of the provincial government, with the authority of the law at his command, started to treat Canadians the way I am sure people would not be treated in that much discussed country, Russia. We find a labour dispute in Ontario, the banner province of this dominion, and a minister of the government of that province sends a wire to the mayor of Fort William, "We have already had the matter investigated by the provincial police and we have not yet found anyone violating the law." That is the method by which the Minister of Lands and Forests undertakes to investigate labour disputes in Ontario, and I can well understand the federal Minister of Labour being handicapped by reason of the fact that he had no authority. And that is evidence that he had no cooperation from the province. I had to make a speech in order to bring to the attention of the Minister of Lands and Forests the fact that he had authority but had not exercised it—authority embodied in legislation passed unanimously by the legislature in 1924, after being amended by the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, then premier. He had that authority to deal with labour disputes in any industries that were using the natural resources. He had the right to investigate whether the men were receiving living wages or not. He had the right to find out whether the operators were paying these living wages, and he had the right to adjust the price of timber, the raw material in the bush, so as to permit these men to obtain a living wage. I wrote him once myself, calling his attention to the fact that he had this authority, and I pointed out to him that there was this resolution. What do you think his answer was? I want to direct the attention of the next premier of Ontario to his answer. He said, "I understood that this was a pious resolution passed by the Ontario legislature." In other words, he was going to take no notice of a resolution passed by the Ontario legislature; he thought it was a pious resolution that meant nothing. Anyhow, he acted upon it, because when the newspaper men went to him and asked him about it he said, "We are still considering it"—that is to say, they were still considering, in 1933, taking action on a resolution passed unanimously by the legislature in 1924. Finally he called in the lumber operators and reduced their dues from $1.80 to $1 a cord. Now, the complaint made by my hon. friend from Timiskaming is this—I have just read his letter—that when Chapleau's timber was reduced from $1.80 to $1 a cord the operator got the full value of the $1.80 and not the men referred to by the hon. gentleman.

That is the sort of treatment we get in northern Ontario, and when anyone complains of injustice the cry goes up, "Radicalism, communism, reds", and a few men are sent to penitentiary and made martyrs. That is what is taking place in northern Ontario. I am not going to refer to the strike in Stratford. I know the Minister of Labour had nothing to do with it: I hope at least he had not. I hope he was not responsible for sending a regiment of soldiers with tanks and machine guns to subdue a few girls on strike in Stratford. But the Ontario government ordered out troops, who went there with machine guns and tanks and paraded up and down the streets. That is the way they practise conciliation in Ontario. I do not think they shot any of these girls. The girls were on strike there because they were being paid two cents a chicken for plucking chickens, and one can imagine young Canadian women being compelled to strike in order to get one cent more per chicken. But when they sought to get a reasonable wage the Ontario government ordered out the troops, respectable troops, men who should command the respect of the people; they were ordered out with their tanks and rifles and machine guns.

Mr. GORDON: But they did it at the request of the mayor of the town, did they not?

Mr. HEENAN: It matters not who requested it. If they had made the request of the Minister of Labour would he have ordered out machine guns to meet these girls just because the mayor or an alderman or one of the ministers of the Ontario government had requested it? The Ontario government were responsible for it, and they will be held responsible. I hope the federal Minister of Labour had nothing to do with it, because he is responsible for enough now. But that is the method adopted in Ontario. I can recall when there was a strike in Kapuskasing in the Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Company. It happened during my term of office. The men were dismissed because they belonged to a union. On a Sunday afternoon the heads of the union were elected, president, secretary, Secretary-treasurer and so on, and at night, about midnight, the foreman went round and touched them in bed and gave them their time check and told them to get out because they belonged to a union. It was Sir Robert Borden who signed the treaty of Versailles which contained section 13 giving the right of freedom of association in this country; yet the present Minister of Mines and Forests, Mr. Finlayson, in the then Ferguson government of Ontario, allowed men to be dismissed who were doing work in connection with the natural resources of that province. I telegraphed the then premier of Ontario, the same as the present Minister of Labour might do, to ask for cooperation from the provincial government. I told him of the situation after I had investigated and ascertained that the men were in the right, found out the truth. What does the committee think was the reply I received? It was that as long as the company was carrying out its agreement with the crown, they had no desire to interfere with its internal affairs. In other words, as long as the company paid the province of Ontario so much for stumpage and so much per horse power for the water it was using, they did not care whether it sacrificed the men, or whether it violated the treaty of Versailles and its provisions or anything else; they had no concern whatever in the matter. The situation was the same this year in northern Ontario—a government sitting in Toronto without any conception of decency for the working men and the working women and girls of the province either in Stratford or in the northern section. I have an affidavit from two men, a young Frenchman and a Scotchman who were sent from Winnipeg to the head of the lakes.

Mr. ROBINSON: Were they communists?

Mr. HEENAN: No, they were just as good citizens as any who are sitting in the house at the present time. There is always somebody over there who wants to get on Hansard and who is afraid to stand up and let us know who he is.

Mr. ROBINSON: I asked that question and I am not afraid to stand up and ask it.

Mr. HEENAN: All right; the hon. gentleman is a manly fellow. These two young men were sent down to work with a lumber company at the head of the lakes. They were teamsters and they worked by the day for twenty-eight days. They were awakened between three and four o'clock in the morning to get their teams ready to go out for a load before breakfast. Then they had to go into the bush for a load after supper. They had to put their teams up at night and it was ten o'clock at night before they got through with their work. At the end of twenty-eight days one had $1 coming to him and the other had $1.15. Their railroad fare and the few things they had purchased in the camp had been deducted out of their pay. The result was that they were left stranded at the head of the lakes about $7.50 short of paying their fare home to Winnipeg. I suppose if they had started to sing the Internationale they would have been arrested as communists. What would you expect of men who had been treated like that in this banner province of Ontario, as our friends opposite so glibly call it? I sympathize with the federal Minister of Labour when he has to be questioned on the floor of the house about the settlement of strikes in northern Ontario or any other section under the jurisdiction of the Ontario government, because I am satisfied, nowithstanding what he may say in regard to the matter, neither was he solicitous of getting nor would he get any cooperation from the present provincial government even if he had solicited it.

Item agreed to.

Administration, Employment Offices Coordination Act, $8,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the reason for the reduction in this vote, and by how much has it been reduced since the present government came into power?

Mr. GORDON: This vote has been pretty well discussed on the two previous items. It covers merely the administration of the offices under the Employment Offices Coordination Act and deals with travelling expenses, telephone, telegraph, printing and stationery, repairs to equipment and sundries. The total amount spent last year to December 31, 1933, was just $3,228.49, so there is really no necessity for voting more money than one has to spend. Of course, if I wanted to spend money I think I could go ahead and do it, but when it is not necessary I do not feel like doing it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I asked that question because if it is the intention of the present government to introduce a scheme of unemployment insurance, it will be necessary that they avail themselves of these employment offices; that is, if they are going to follow the policy adopted by the British government in that regard. Perhaps this might be the time to ask the minister how far the government has gone in the formulation of a policy in connection with unemployment insurance. I would ask the minister that question now.

Mr. GORDON: It will be noted that this vote does not interfere with the one which follows later on, the one which is authorized by the revised statutes of 1927, chapter 57, $150,000, and refers only to the items which I have mentioned.

With respect to unemployment insurance, I am not prepared to-night to outline any course which the government may take. The subject is a very large and baffling one and anyone who hurries into it without being fully equipped with the information and the consequences that might follow from failure, would not be adopting the course of wisdom.

Mr. MITCHELL: From the remarks of the minister am I to understand that it is not the intention of the government at any time during this session to bring before the house a policy in connection with unemployment insurance. I am not unmindful of the acute problems arising out of the adoption of such legislation in this country, or of the declarations made by responsible ministers of the present government in connection with such a scheme. But I think the house and the country, in view of those declarations, have a right to know whether it is the intention of the government this session to make a concrete announcement of policy in regard to the introduction of a scheme of unemployment insurance.

Mr. GORDON: No one knows better than does the hon. member that in matters of government policy such as the one to which he has referred I should not be called upon to indicate nor shall I indicate what course the government may take when it sees fit to adopt one. At the present time I am not in a position to indicate to the members of the committee what course the government may take.

Mr. MITCHELL: I say very frankly that I think that in the course of a depression such as that through which we have been passing, the Department of Labour should be the outstanding department of the government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member's question is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: It may be awkward, but I think it is not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is irrelevant to the subject matter now under debate, which is the question of "Administration, Employment Offices Coordination Act."

Mr. MITCHELL: I would point out, from some knowledge of the procedure in the adoption of unemployment insurance in other countries, that if you look to the British precedent, which this country has largely followed, you will find that unemployment insurance has been largely built up around the establishment of what are known there as employment exchanges, which correspond to the employment offices we have in this country. Under this vote I took the opportunity, which I think is my prerogative, of asking the question I did, in view of the reduction in expenditure in connection with these exchanges, and having in mind that possibly the government were economizing in a direction contrary to the declaration of federal ministers in connection with the adoption of an unemployment insurance scheme. Arising out of that I think it is a perfectly fair observation for me to make at this time that insufficient attention has been paid to the Department of Labour by this government in view of the present depression. I think that department is one of the most important under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I say this in a kindly way; I think the present minister is overburdened. The functions of the Department of Immigration are enough in themselves to occupy fully the time of one minister, in view of the many decisions he has to make in connection with the work of that department. We are confronted, I understand, with an enormous building program in this country, and we have the oft repeated promises that the government are going to bring down an unemployment insurance measure. I think under this vote we have a right to question the intentions of the government in that regard. It would be different if the government in its judgment had led the people to believe that they were opposed to the principle of unemployment insurance.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member is out of order on that point. The question of the advisability of the government's bringing in an unemployment insurance measure is set down for discussion under public bills and orders, and has been already the subject of a debate which is not yet concluded. Further, in my opinion the hon. member has no right to ask the Minister of Labour what the government's policy is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I take issue with you, Mr. Chairman. Under the estimates we are entitled to ask the administration any question about any matter of government policy whatever. I submit that the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) is quite within his rights.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Not in asking as to the future policy of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I beg pardon; this is the only opportunity we have, under the estimates. When we are spending public money it is the well known right of parliament to ask any responsible minister about any feature of government policy. The hon. member for East Hamilton has demonstrated that these employment offices may well come into a scheme of unemployment insurance. I certainly resent any restriction of the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): First may I remind the hon. member that he has no right to lecture the chair.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I say with all due deference that the chair has no right to lecture me.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): In the second place, while hon. members have the right to discuss the actions or the past policy of the government, in my opinion they have no right in committee to ask a minister to forecast the future proposals of the government in regard to any particular matter of policy.

Mr. YOUNG: Where is the rule?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is not raised in the matter before the committee, and it is out of order under the rule which says that where a matter is under debate in the house it cannot be discussed here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask you to quote the rule?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The rule is that the Prime Minister answers for them all.

An hon. MEMBER: His master's voice.

Mr. VALLANCE: Surely if the matter is before the house and not disposed of we may discuss it here?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The subject of unemployment insurance is not before the committee.

Mr. VALLANCE: It has not been disposed of, and as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) points out, it is the prerogative of this committee to discuss any matter of public policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask you to quote the rule?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I am getting it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is about time you got it, I think.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Send for the Prime Minister.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Standing order 41, paragraph 293, section (d) reads:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (a) anticipate discussion on a motion set down for future consideration;

Which is the motion that is on the order paper—

Mr. CASGRAIN: We agree with you, but that is not the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): —and the debate on which has not yet been concluded.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I suggest, then, that the item be allowed to stand, if we cannot discuss the subject because there is something already on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which will never come up again this session.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely before voting money we have the right to discuss the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that the discussion in regard to unemployment insurance is not likely to come up again this session, because next Wednesday is likely to be the last private members' day.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Hon. members cannot get away from the rule by an anticipation of what in their judgment may or may not happen on account of the state of the order paper. Once a matter is down on the order paper for discussion and the discussion has not been concluded, it is not proper for an hon. member to say that because it is in a certain position on the order paper it is not likely to come up.

There is another reason why I think the matter is out of order, namely that unemployment insurance, while it may be a side issue of the particular vote now before the committee, is not really relevant to the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is for us to find out, I think. The vote in question is "Administration, Employment Offices Coordination Act." A question was raised by the hon. member for East Hamilton, who asked the Minister of Labour if it was the intention of himself and the administration to bring in a plan of unemployment insurance this year which might involve expenditure under this item. I suggest that this committee is entitled in all fairness to ask any question of a responsible minister in regard to any matter that arises as a result of the vote under discussion. I suggest that the question of the hon. member is quite in order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I have already ruled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then I am appealing from your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That is a different matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the chairman's ruling is absolutely right, on the ground first that the question of unemployment insurance is already on the order paper. I recall that a preceding government, when Mr. Speaker Lemieux was in the chair, kept a question on the order paper for months for the purpose of preventing discussion. It was held that we could not discuss it, on account of the rule under which hon. members may not anticipate in any discussion a matter that appears on the order paper. That rule should be maintained. I see no objection to the question asked by the hon. member for East Hamilton; that is one thing. But I see a great deal of objection to the discussion upon which he is entering on the subject of unemployment insurance. Let him ask his question and the minister will answer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He did ask it, and the minister did not answer it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But he is not content with that; he has entered on an elaborate discussion of the whole problem of unemployment insurance. I submit he is not entitled to do that.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to point out, as I was the author of the resolution that is being talked about, that it has a different bearing from that now given to it by the hon. Minister of Justice and by you, sir. The motion I proposed reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the most effective way to ensure protection during periods of unemployment, which unemployment insurance should provide, is to make such legislation national in its scope.

That does not necessarily involve the policy of the government with regard to unemployment insurance; I may have spoken of that, but perhaps I was out of order. The actual fact recorded in the resolution is that such protection should be national in its scope, and we might have agreed on that without getting very much closer to the policy of the government with regard to unemployment insurance. There is a distinction here. As long as the hon. member keeps away from the question whether or not unemployment insurance should be national in its scope, it does not appear to me that he would come within the terms of this resolution.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, I cannot see how the item under discussion has any bearing on the question of unemployment insurance. It is a small item that has to do only with travelling expenses, telegrams, telephone messages, printing and stationery and repairs to the equipment in the labour offices here in the city of Ottawa, and under this item last year, up to December 31, we expended only $3,228.49. The question arose as to the reduction from $12,000 to $8,000, and the substance of my answer was that we did not need the balance of this vote. How this vote possibly could have any bearing on the broad question of unemployment insurance is something I am unable to fathom; I cannot see any connection between the two.

Mr. HEENAN: I can easily see where the question is quite relevant to the vote now before the house. This item is for the administration of the Employment Offices Coordination Act, and it shows a reduction of $4,000. The hon. member for East Hamilton asks, and I think rightly, if it is not a fact that if there is going to be such a thing as an unemployment insurance scheme this vote would require to be enlarged. That is where the relevancy comes in, and I think the question is quite proper.

Mr. GORDON: I must take issue with the hon. member. The vote that possibly might be affected would be that under the revised statutes of 1927, chapter 57, organization and coordination of employment offices. That might have to be enlarged, but I cannot link this item up with the question of unemployment insurance.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether I am out of order, of course, but if the minister has made any study of unemployment insurance he must know that the scheme in Great Britain was built around the employment exchanges in that country. The first thing you must have in a scheme of unemployment insurance is the development of labour exchanges from one end of this dominion to the other.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the item under consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Prime Minister says that is not the item, but this item provides for the administration of these employment offices. I wondered whether the government had given up the idea, for this session at least, of introducing a scheme of unemployment insurance, and I merely asked the question because I think the country has a right to know, in view of the recent conference in connection with this matter, whether it is the intention of the government to go forward with a policy of this kind during the present session of parliament.

Mr. GORDON: I thought I answered that question a while ago, when I told the hon. member that the policy of the government with respect to unemployment insurance would be made known when that policy was decided upon, but that policy has not been decided upon by the government as yet.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When is it going to be decided upon?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I think the hon. member would have been quite in order had he asked the minister whether this item contained any provision for unemployment insurance, and he would have been answered in the negative, as he has been answered. I think he was out of order, when he got beyond that and asked the minister to forecast the future legislative program of the government with regard to unemployment insurance.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are merely assuming what is in the back of your mind.

Mr. VALLANCE: When the minister says no, is there no opportunity for us to discuss the possibility of unemployment insurance?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Not under this vote.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then may I direct your attention to the statement made by the minister that the vote which might be affected was authorized under chapter 57 of the revised statutes, 1927. This is authorized by statute, so are we to take it that we must amend the statute in order to consider this question? How are we going to do it?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The question could be considered by the house in a number of ways, but it cannot be considered under this vote when the minister has stated that the government has not decided on its program with regard to unemployment insurance, and that this vote does not contain any provision for it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then may I ask to what extent the government has set the machinery in motion with the idea of bringing in a system of unemployment insurance?

Mr. VALLANCE: Have we to take your word that the government has no policy regarding unemployment insurance? You just made the statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The minister has already given his answer.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not think that is true; you just made the statement as chairman of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I would ask the hon. member to take his seat. The minister has made his statement on that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are not satisfied with the statement.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 13, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand) presented the first report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to amend the Quebec Savings Bank Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: This bill is similar to the one which has been introduced hitherto at the decennial revision of the Bank Act. Its purpose is to extend the charters of the Quebec savings banks, which consist of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank and the Caisse d'Economie de Notre Dame de Quebec of Quebec city.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE ACT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill is similar to the one which I introduced last year at the end of the session but which could not be discussed at that time. Its purpose is to amend the form of the oath of allegiance which all public officials have to take. It is intended to change the word "possessions" to "dominions," to agree with the title which His Majesty has had since the Imperial conference of 1926. It is intended also to strike out the words "dependent on and belonging to the said kingdom," which appear after the words "Dominion of Canada." These words are not true, they are against constitutional law and national dignity.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) in connection with a question asked previously in the session as to the intention of the government to introduce legislation implementing the report of Sir Alexander Gibb on the national harbours.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The matter is still under consideration.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I promised the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) that at an early date I would endeavour to make a statement with respect to the wheat agreement. As the provincial legislation in connection with this matter will be introduced to-day or to-morrow I think it desirable to make a statement at this time. During the last few months the dominion government and the governments of the three prairie provinces have been considering the action which should be taken to make effective the London wheat agreement so far as it relates to Canadian interests. Legislation has been agreed upon by the four governments and will be introduced to-day or to-morrow in the legislatures of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The proposed legislation empowers the lieutenant governor in council in each of the provinces to set up what is termed an emergency wheat control board, with power to licence and restrict within the province sales and deliveries of wheat. Provision is made also that in addition to or in lieu of such board a joint board may be established by the three prairie provinces or by one or more or all of the provinces in conjunction with the dominion. Such a board, if created, will be clothed with all the powers usually vested in what is commonly described as a "wheat board." The provisions dealing with the licensing of sales and deliveries of wheat within the several provinces can, of course, be enacted by the legislature of a province, but legislation of this parliament is required to permit control of sales and deliveries outside the provinces. With respect to a wheat board, parliament will be invited to enact the necessary legislation to enable the government, in the event of the four governments being of the opinion that the necessity for same exists, to cooperate with the provinces in establishing a board, with all the necessary authority and powers to deal with any situation which may arise. It will be observed that the proposal contemplates the enactment of enabling legislation so that problems that may arise by reason of an unexpectedly large crop or from any other circumstance can be effectively dealt with.

The bills introduced to-day or to-morrow—I believe it is possible that they may not all be introduced to-day—into the legislatures of the several provinces will provide that the lieutenant governor in council shall, on and after the date upon which the act founded on the bill is assented to, and prior to the date of the establishment of the board or joint board, as therein provided, have power by order in council to make all such orders, rules and regulations, and do all such acts and things as in the opinion of the lieutenant governor in council may be necessary and requisite to bring the production of wheat in the province concerned in the year 1934 into proper alignment with the estimated current export demand for the crop season 1934-35 and normal domestic requirements in the same period, having regard to the quota applicable to the Dominion of Canada as provided by article 2 of the London wheat agreement.

I may add, for the information of the house, that officials of this government have been in the past few weeks in consultation with the governments of the three prairie provinces. The steps already taken, together with the contemplated action, as provided by the proposed legislation, will, in the opinion of the governments concerned, fully implement the undertakings of the dominion under the London agreement..

Some time ago the hon. member for Weyburn asked a question which I promised I would answer more fully when I had obtained further information which I was then securing. Hon. members will recall that negotiations and consultations among the four overseas wheat exporting countries had been in progress under the auspices of the League of Nations for some time before the London wheat agreement was signed. As a result of those discussions it was possible to allocate among the overseas exporting countries quotas for the crop year 1933-34 within the terms of article 1 of the agreement. At the time of the signing of the agreement, no quota had been agreed upon for the U.S.S.R., nor had a final agreement with respect to such quota yet been concluded but it is expected that at the meeting at Rome next month a satisfactory arrangement will be reached.

The four overseas exporting countries agreed, by article 2 of the London agreement:

> to limit their exports of wheat during the crop year the 1st August, 1934, to the 31st July, 1935, to maximum figures 15 per cent less in the case of each country than the average out-turn on the average acreage sown during the period 1931-33 inclusive after deducting normal domestic requirements.

The determining of the quotas under the provisions of this article is, in the main, a statistical operation. In the case of the four overseas exporting countries, the three years 1931, 1932 and 1933, are used for computing the average acreage, and the yield per acre is determined over a ten-year period.

It is to be borne in mind that the purpose of the agreement is to raise the price of wheat, which can only be done when the surplus carryovers have been removed from the market. In this regard we must distinguish between formal obligations contained in an international agreement and collateral measures of domestic policy which may have to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the agreement. The measures of domestic policy taken by the signatory countries will not be identical. Argentina and Australia have, for instance, stated that they are not in a position to agree to any precise acreage reduction although they are willing to reduce their exports by the accepted figures and to take the necessary action to prevent the accumulation of further surplus stocks. The United States has definitely decided to reduce acreage by 15 per cent and has put into effect a wheat adjustment program for that purpose.

So far as Canada is concerned, having accepted an export quota for the period ending 31st July, 1935, it becomes a matter of national interest that our production in that period should not exceed the domestic requirements plus the export demand. The measures necessary to ensure this have been determined by the appropriate Canadian authorities. It is obvious, of course, that there is no international agreement determining the methods to be adopted by the governments of Canada and the several provinces to give effect to the agreement.

It might be well to refer to a statement made in this house as to the influence of government purchases of wheat in recent years in increasing normal carryovers. The use of the words "government purchases" is, of course, inaccurate, for what the government has done is to guarantee the obligations created by the purchasing agency, namely, the pool agency at Winnipeg. The following table gives the Food Research Institute figures for world carryovers for the past six years, as of August 1, together with the Canadian carryovers on the same dates, and the percentages which the Canadian stocks form of the world totals:

(In millions of bushels)

Year—	World carryover	Canadian carryover	Percentage which Canadian carryover forms of world carryover
1928	705	92	13%
1929	970	127	13.1%
1930	922	127	13.8%
1931	1,007	140	13.9%
1932	996	136	13.7%
1933	1,106	219	19.8%

Owing to the abnormal crop of 1932 the world carryover in 1933 had reached 1,106 million bushels, the Canadian carryover being 219 million bushels or 19·8 per cent of the whole.

Most of the increase in world carryovers of wheat has been due to the inability to absorb the huge wheat crops of 1928 and 1932. The record world crop of 1928, which amounted to 4,712 million bushels or to 3,905 million bushels—ex Russia—caused the major rise of 265 million bushels between August 1, 1928, and August 1, 1929. There was then no great increase in carryovers until the large crop of 1932 caused an increase of 110 million bushels between August 1, 1932, and August 1, 1933. There will be a decrease on August 1, 1934.

Canada was carrying 13 per cent of the world's supply on August 1, 1928. It increased to 13·8 per cent by August, 1930. It remained at the 1930 level throughout 1931 and 1932. From 1928 until 1932 there was only a fractional variation in that five-year period. That ratio was not disturbed until August last, when it reached 19·8 per cent. We need not search far to discover the cause of the increase. The crop of 1932 in this country reached the huge total of 443,000,000 bushels from a record of 27,200,000 acres. Our exports from that crop reached the very large total of 264,000,000 bushels, or 43 per cent of the total export trade of the world for that year, as compared with the ten-year average of 37 per cent. I particularly direct the attention of the house to these figures. There can surely be no complaint when our share of the world available trade reached such large proportions, and yet, in spite of such unusually large exports in that year, there was left from that crop some 80,000,000 bushels to be added to our carryovers from past years, dating back to 1928.

Prices have not been maintained at a fixed level but rather they were supported, particularly during the seasons of the year when farmers were, from necessity, forced sellers of their production in order to meet the demands and needs of their creditors. Export demand, at such times, was utterly inadequate to absorb the farmers' sales, as it always had been throughout past years, and owing to world excessive supplies, speculative as well as investment buyers, who in normal times were purchasers of wheat, were practically non-existent. Under these circumstances, the government has enabled the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, to purchase all grain that was not otherwise sold. Had it not done so, what would have been the position of the wheat market to-day? The farmer would have hauled his grain to the elevator, would have been unable to sell it and there it would have remained and finally would have been backed up on to his farm; and you would have had absolute chaos, which would have been destructive to the whole economic life of Canada. There has been no speculation in wheat, and the wheat that has been bought is now being held and sold as demand offers, not for speculation but for export. It would therefore appear that any criticisms that the action of the government in preventing chaotic marketing conditions has brought about an increased surplus are not founded on facts.

The London agreement sets the world quota of wheat exports in the 1933-34 crop year at 560,000,000 bushels. The following table shows the division of this world quota among the different exporting countries, the export movement from the first of August to the end of February, and the balance of the quotas remaining to cover shipments in the remaining five months of the crop year:

	Export quotas August-July, 1933-34	Export movement August-February	Balance of quotas for export March-July, 1934
	(million bushels)
Argentina	110.0	65.0	45.0
Australia	105.0	54.0	51.0
Canada	200.0	121.0	79.0
Danubian countries	54.0	27.0	27.0
United States	47.0	19.0	28.0
Others, including U.S.S.R.	44.0	26.0	18.0
Totals	560.0	312.0	248.0

The other countries, including the soviet union, had an export quota, as then fixed, of 44,000,000 bushels, although it is subject to final determination at Rome or sooner if an agreement can be reached. As the table shows, 26,000,000 bushels of this had been shipped to the end of February and there remains a balance of 18,000,000 bushels.

The advisory committee set up under the provisions of the London agreement is holding a meeting at Rome on April 5 next, when the matter of increasing the consumption of wheat will be discussed by the countries affected and such measures taken as, in the opinion of those present, will result in the diminution of the surplus carryovers that threaten the wheat prices of the world.

The question of endeavouring to settle the final quota for Russia will also be brought before the advisory committee and, if possible, disposed of.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): The Prime Minister says that Canada's quota under the agreement would be 200,000,000 bushels, but if we figure our quota on the basis suggested by himself, that is a three-year average acreage and a ten-year average yield, our quota would be 292,000,000 bushels. Will he explain the discrepancy?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman was unable to follow me because I was reading rather rapidly. The quota for the year ending July 31, 1935, is to be settled in the manner I have indicated by the statisticians on the three-year average acreage multiplied by the ten-year average yield. The quota of 200,000,000 bushels for the crop year ending July 31, 1934, was settled by agreement on the basis of the figures supplied as to our crop, and the figures I have just given as to the shipments already made and the balances remaining to be made indicate that the quantity was perhaps in excess of any amount that we would be able to ship.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. YOUNG: I am not yet clear as to the meaning of this agreement. If I understood the Prime Minister aright, our quota for the year 1934-35 is to be based upon the ten-year average yield on a three-year average acreage, but article 2 of the agreement says the three-year average yield on a three-year average acreage. That is the difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member will look at the agreement, that is not what it says. I admit that it is open to that construction, but if he will look at it carefully I think he will see that it does not say that. It says 15 per cent less in the case of each country than the average out-turn on the average acreage sown during the period, and the average out-turn is for ten years and not for three.

Mr. YOUNG: The ten-year period is not mentioned at all.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but that is the fact.

Mr. YOUNG: It is not in the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is how the statisticians agreed that the quota should be reached. That is, the average yield was taken over a period of ten years as being fair. I think the figure is 17½ bushels per acre, but it was thought a fair average acreage would be one taken over a three-year period.

Mr. YOUNG: Are all the other countries agreeable to that interpretation?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that was the agreement arrived at, and when the agreement was drafted late at night there was some difficulty about the translation. That was observed, but there was no difference as to the manner in which the computation was to be made. There was difficulty in determining what, under those circumstances, should be the quota for Russia, and I have explained that point. This talk about a supplementary agreement is talk that relates to the quota for Russia, and when that quota has been determined the whole matter will then be reduced to a formal document. In the meantime, as I explained to the hon. gentleman, we agreed to 200,000,000 bushels as the quota for Canada for the year ending July 31, 1934. The manner of the computation for 1934-35 is as I have indicated: a three-year average acreage multiplied by the average yield over a ten-year period.

DELAY IN THE MAIL FOR GENTILLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. DUBOIS (Nicolet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Dupré) a question relating to a telegram I received this morning and which reads as follows:

Gentilly, March 12, 1934.

Mr. Lucien Dubois, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Monday, four o'clock, have not received any mail since Saturday morning. The postmaster has not been notified on what train it will arrive. The "Curé" has received no reply from the deputy minister, since ten days.

A. Moras.

Will the hon. minister inform the house whether he will immediately take whatever steps is necessary?

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Acting Postmaster General) (Translation): In reply to the hon. member, I shall investigate the matter immediately so as to remedy the situation as soon as possible.

BUREAU FOR TRANSLATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I desire to ask a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). Perhaps I should have asked this question in French but as I had no opportunity of communicating the matter to him beforehand, I think I should in order to be fair ask the question in English. I desire to refer the hon. minister to page 1282 of Hansard, about the middle of the page, where he is reported as having said:

> I have received statements from certain gentlemen who have qualifications as translators and who are bilingual by education and experience.

On the next page, on the lefthand side, in answer to a question which I asked, the hon. minister was pleased to answer:

> You will have to seek the information from them.

Now I have before me the file of the daily French paper, La Presse of Montreal, of Friday, March 9, in which the parliamentary correspondent of that paper has placed the following words in the mouth of the hon. minister. In order to do no injustice to the minister I shall not endeavour to translate his speech into current English, but so that there may be no mistake about the accuracy of the translation I shall do it literally:

> The worth of this work having been put in doubt, and not having myself unfortunately that which is necessary to judge of these criticisms. I have addressed myself to two recognized authorities: Pierre Lefort special correspondent of La Presse, and the Chanoine Chartier, vice rector of the university of Montreal.

The two questions which I now desire to direct to the hon. minister are, which of the two reports, that of Hansard or this press report, correctly reports what the hon. minister said at that moment? Did the hon. minister in any manner solicit any opinion from these two experts, as is alleged by Pierre Lefort in this article?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): My answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is that I will look at the article if the hon. gentleman will send me a copy, and I will compare it with what I stated. Regarding the latter question, as to whether I solicited opinions from any person, that is a matter about which the hon. gentleman has no right to ask and I certainly shall not answer it. As a minister of the crown I think that if I wish to know whether a translation made by a translator of this house is correct or not I have a perfect right to ask the opinion of any gentleman I choose.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then I shall summon these people and find out from them.

RECOGNITION OF MANCHUKUO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Timiskaming North): Mr. Speaker, I beg to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government of Canada recognized officially the new state of Manchukuo?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is in the negative.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT RESPECTING TRACKS AND PREMISES AT SAINT JOHN

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved the third reading of Bill No. 23, to ratify and confirm the agreement respecting the joint use by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of certain tracks and premises of His Majesty at Saint John, N.B.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY AND THE CAMPBELLFORD, LAKE ONTARIO AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved the third reading of Bill No. 24, to ratify and confirm an agreement made between the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, an act respecting fruit.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Fisheries—to assist in the conservation and development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $85,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: I think it is in order to ask the minister what I asked yesterday on the same estimate, as to the intention of the government or the department in regard to Hudson bay and James bay.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I listened yesterday with great attention to my hon. friend in regard to the possibilities for the fishing industry in Hudson bay and James bay. I have discussed the matter with my officials and I must state frankly that we cannot contemplate any further investigation in those bays this year. It may be that in the future we can do something, but not this year. I may state to my hon. friend for his information that private interests are extensively concerned in the fishing industry in those waters.

As a matter of fact, we are helping as much as possible all those who desire to enter the fishing industry there. In 1931 we issued three fishing permits; in 1932 four other permits for fishing in those bays, in 1933 we issued four permits, and this year we have issued one permit to the Albany River Fishing Company, Limited. We anticipate that many other companies will start fishing next summer. The department is quite satisfied that surveys have been made, are being made and will be made during the coming season by those private concerns in order to locate the best spots for fishing in those waters.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the minister tell the committee if those private concerns have any direction from the government to make those inquiries? As the minister appreciates, my question relates to an expanse of water of nearly 700,000 square miles, so unless those private concerns go there with definite direction from the government they are not likely to make an investigation for the sake of the government. I appreciate what the minister has said, but will he be a little more explicit as to when we might expect a more thorough inquiry to be made?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The report of the investigation made in 1930 might be of some use to those interested, and I may add that a few days ago I had a request from a certain individual who wants permits for several fishing boats. That gentleman told me that he knew the best spots for fishing in those two bays, and that other people also knew where to go. So at the moment I do not think it would be advisable for the government to incur the expense of a further survey. If in future we have such requests from various parties we will look into the matter and see if we would be justified in making a further survey.

Mr. BRADETTE: I may tell the minister that the request comes from that entire section of the country, and surely the pressure should be as great coming from the people living in that country as it would be coming from people directly interested in the fishing. I believe the government owes it to itself and to our section of the country to take the lead in such an investigation and not leave it to private interests. I think they should take the initiative, and I believe the work should be wholly under the direction of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask my hon. friend if it is not true that in 1930 the then Minister of Fisheries did have an investigation made into the possibilities of commercial fishing in Hudson bay, and that the report was adverse?

Mr. BRADETTE: The report was adverse, but the investigation took only a short time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to ask the minister if he has any report to give the committee with reference to the negotiations that were supposed to be going on between his department and the government of Quebec with regard to increased cooperation between the provincial and federal governments. I remember that a long debate took place in this house two or three years ago, and the then Minister of Fisheries, who is now Minister of Finance, said there would be cooperation as far as this government could bring it about between the federal and provincial governments. I saw in the press some time after that some mention of interviews between the minister who is piloting these estimates to-day and officials of the provincial government with the view of improving conditions in Quebec. I should like to ask the minister if he has any report to give the committee as to the progress that has been made along these lines.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no report to make on the subject as yet. It is true that conferences and interviews took place and that correspondence has been exchanged between the provincial and federal authorities with regard to cooperation having in view the betterment of fisheries in Quebec, but nothing definite has been arrived at as yet. We had planned a French school for fishermen and inspectors on the Gaspe coast, in Gaspe itself. I hope these negotiations will eventually lead to the establishment of such a school, where two or three French teachers will instruct in the curing and canning of fish and so on, but nothing definite has been agreed upon. The provincial government was supposed to supply the building and the federal authorities were to provide the teachers.

Mr. CASGRAIN: During the last few days I have been in receipt of many resolutions from various municipalities in the province of Quebec, who apparently are alarmed because the government has not made the headway that was expected. I have none of the resolutions before me, but I think I received about a half dozen to-day, and they all complain of the situation which exists in the fishing industry in the province of Quebec. Some of them even go so far as to ask that the order in council passed in 1922 giving the administration of fisheries to the provincial government should be repealed, if that is the only way to bring about an improvement in the condition, and I think I even went so far as to advocate such a step during the course of the debate in this house two or three years ago. In view of the difficulties with which we are faced to-day, and in view of the fact that a moment ago the minister said that it was hoped to do something on the coast of Gaspe, though apparently nothing has been done yet, I think this is the proper time to have the minister who is in charge of this very important department make a statement not only as to what is supposed to have been done but as to something tangible that will be done in order to relieve the situation. It is all very well for the minister to come here year after year and tell us that negotiations have been entered into between his government and the provincial government, but nothing has been done, and the people on the north shore are asking that action be taken by this government.

I do not think the minister can get away with that answer to-day. Last year we were told that an institution would be established on the coast of Gaspe to help the fishermen in the province of Quebec. I think at that time the minister said he could not proceed with the project because of the lack of money, that they were not ready to undertake this work. This year I think some steps should be taken in that direction, because if this is not done the fishing industry will go from bad to worse. The people in that part of the country have had a hard time to make both ends meet; they have been barely able to secure a living for their families and themselves, and most of the fishermen in the part of the country which I have the honour to represent are on direct relief. I have no doubt the minister has recevied many requests that these people be assisted. I think we should be given a better statement than the minister has given so far; I do not think it is enough to say that this project could not be proceeded with. Why has nothing been done? Why can they get nothing done for the fishermen of the province of Quebec, when a resolution was adopted by this house two years ago urging this government to cooperate with the government of that province? That resolution was tantamount to an order directing the government to take some steps in that direction. What steps have been taken, and in what way? To-day the minister is mum; he has nothing to say as to what is going to be done, if anything. If we cannot get ministers of the crown more responsive to the people than those we now have sitting on the treasury benches, some day the people will clear out the whole administration. I am surprised that the minister is not able to give me any answer.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a chance.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am going to give him a chance. I ask him to give me the reason why this school has not been started in Gaspe, which was supposed to be the first step. The minister need not tell me there is no money; there is money for some other institutions, some other boards and for other ventures which here and there the government have seen fit to patronize. Surely there ought to be a certain amount of money to put at the disposal of the Department of Fisheries for the help of the fishermen of the province of Quebec.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I add a few words to what has been stated by the hon. member for Charlevoix Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain). It cannot be gainsaid that the situation of fishermen on the Gaspé coast and of those on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river is absolutely intolerable. However, we must take into consideration the fact that in 1922 the Liberal government passed an order in council transferring all its fishery rights to the government of Quebec. Since that date, the fisheries come directly under the administration of the provincial government. It is now requested that the Dominion government collaborate with the Quebec government, and it is contended that if there is no co-operation or if anything goes wrong, the Dominion government will be held responsible; but when all is well the Quebec government gets the credit for it. There is but one remedy and that is to cancel the 1922 order in council.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I suggested and requested it.

Mr. DORION (Translation): What should be done is the return of the control of all the Quebec fisheries to the Dominion government and to put matters as they stood before this order in council was passed. Were we to probe this question, or hold an inquiry in order to find out why the control of the Quebec fisheries was taken away from the Dominion government, it would be shown that it was simply to favour a few persons who wanted to take possession of the salmon fishing in the rivers on the north shore and the Gaspé coast.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Name these persons.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. DORION (Translation): The list would be too long; the hon. member for Laprairie Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) must be aware of this fact because he has had the occasion of visiting Gaspé and the north shore. These persons intended not only to take possession of the salmon rivers of the Gaspé peninsula and the north shore of the St. Lawrence, but to also control the estuaries of these rivers and that was the reason the dominion government was requested, in 1922, to pass an order in council. I think that the only real remedy to the situation, under the circumstances, as I had the occasion of suggesting to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) would be to cancel the order in council of 1922, so that the control of the fisheries of Quebec would be returned to the dominion government as it was previously and as it is the case in all other provinces.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I do not agree with all the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), for instance, when he states: when all is well the government of the province of Quebec takes the credit, and when all goes wrong, the Dominion government is blamed.

All are aware that if depression exists in this country, the dominion government must be held responsible. It is not the provincial government which is at the helm of affairs in Ottawa, but those who sit to your right, sir. The fisheries are federal property and only their administration is the prerogative of the provincial government.

As to the repeal of the order in council of 1922, I suggested it, when I brought up the subject about two years ago and a discussion ensued. I again suggest it, to-day, because the Quebec government has not at its disposal experts like the dominion officials of the Department of Marine. The order in council not having been repealed, we are forced to request the co-operation and good will of the two governments. The hon. minister cannot assert that Quebec refused to cooperate in improving the fisheries of the province. He cannot make such a statement, because it would not be true. The Quebec government is willing to co-operate with the Ottawa government—whether it is a Liberal or Conservative administration—to improve the situation. Negotiations have been carried on to this effect. I should like to know why, after stating, I think, last year, that a biological station would be established on the Gaspé coast as soon as possible, the minister did not implement this promise of establishing that station to help the fisheries of Gaspé and those of the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. Why this delay to open up this biological station? The establishment of this station with the co-operation of the hon. minister and his officials together with that of the Quebec department of Fisheries, would be an embryo, a first help, on the part of both governments, to improve the situation of the fisheries on the Gaspé coast and the north shore of the St. Lawrence river.

We agree on that point: we must endeavour to improve the situation of the fisheries, however to reach this aim, the dominion government and the hon. Minister of Marine must show their good will and put in practise what they advocated. We are informed that the dominion government could not do more because apparently no funds were at their disposal. The government seem to have funds for many enterprises; however, when it is a question of the Quebec fisheries, there seems to be very little funds. I think the government could find the necessary funds to establish this biological station and the Quebec government would certainly contribute its quota.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Is there no reply?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Referring to page 606 of Hansard, I find that the fish exports to the various parts of the British Empire, in 1933, that is, after the Imperial Conference, amounted to $2,116,116 less than in 1930, and to foreign countries, $9,521,337 less; a total decrease, comparing 1933 to 1930, of $11,637,453. Therefore, the Canadian fish exports to the various parts of the British Empire and foreign countries have considerably decreased.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Would the hon. member kindly give the amount in pounds instead of money?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): My reply to the hon. member is that I put the same question to the Bureau of Statistics and I could not obtain the amount in pounds. The answer would have been too long because the quantity of each species of fish would have had to be enumerated. If the hon. member wishes to get the information he may forward his request to the hon. Minister of Marine who, he will find, is always willing, courteous and an example for the hon. member to emulate in the house. As to fish and fishery products, by comparing 1932 to 1930, we note a decrease of $21,847,107. May I ask the Minister of Marine why this decrease in value in the fishery products and how many fishermen were affected by this situation?

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall avail myself of this opportunity—without wishing to interrupt the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil)—to point out an error in Hansard on the same page, in a quotation by the right hon. Prime Minister. In the second column 188 cwts. of fish is mentioned, while it should read 188,000 cwts.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Mr. Chairman, this question of cooperation between the two governments of Ottawa and Quebec in connection with the fisheries, dates away back. I had the privilege, in 1897, of being the Liberal candidate, in Gaspé, against the Hon. Mr. Flynn, then Prime Minister of Quebec, His campaign plank was the fishery question, he maintained that the fisheries should be the prerogative of the Quebec government. He won his election by a majority of one vote—that was rather a small majority. Eleven votes which he gained following a recount, were the result of a cablegram from London, which he received a few days before the voting day, informing him of the Privy Council's decision, that in the future salmon fishing permits would be issued by the Quebec government. So they have been issued for quite a long time. Therefore, if we go back to 1897, almost ancient history, thirty-five years ago, we note that, at that period, there already existed a divergency of views between the two governments.

It gave me much pleasure, to hear from the lips of the minister, on Friday, that he was, at present, negotiating with the Quebec government in order to come to some arrangement in this respect. What interests me most, is the welfare of the people. These poor fishermen, on behalf of whom Mgr. Ross, the eminent bishop of Gaspé, has pleaded, are very downcast, at present, and an "entente" between the two governments is greatly hoped for. I am pleased to hear that the hon. Minister of Fisheries is considering the question, and I have the assurance that the Hon. Mr. Laferte, Minister of Fisheries, in Quebec, is also disposed to do everything possible to arrive at some arrangement. If it is necessary, for the welfare of the fisherman and the success of the Quebec fisheries, that the provincial government should release the control which it has over the fisheries, at present; I feel certain that the Quebec prime minister, who is broadminded and highly esteemed in the province would take such a step. Proofs would have to be given him first—and that is but fair—that the Quebec government is not in a position to look after the fisheries in deep water. On the south shore of the Baie des Chaleurs, the fisheries are owned by the province of New Brunswick. This province allows the Dominion government to administer its fisheries. Such an arrangement might be possible between the Quebec provincial government and the Dominion government.

I was pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Fisheries state, last Friday, that, while on his visits to the Gaspé peninsula he had had a talk with Bishop Ross, and had himself ascertained that Quebec fisheries were, indeed, in a sad plight. I trust that before long some "modus vivendi" will be agreed upon between the two governments and a considerable improvement will be the result.

Meantime, I congratulate the minister on his intention of establishing a biological school at Gaspé or in the best suited locality the commission may find in that county, thus giving these people whose forbears were the first to settle this country, instructors speaking the French language. We too often forget, we, French Canadian members, who constantly speak English in deference to our colleagues, that both languages are official. When the Dominion government places English speaking instructors in New Brunswick, the people of Quebec are likewise entitled to have French speaking instructors. I was, therefore, pleased to hear that the minister intended to place French speaking instructors in this new biological school which will cater not only to the counties of Gaspé, Bonaventure and the Magdalen Islands, but also to the whole gulf of St. Lawrence, including the counties of Saguenay and Chicoutimi; thus putting us on an equal footing with the people of other provinces. We have to contend with our climate and strive against difficulties which exist neither in British Columbia nor in Nova Scotia where the fisheries are opened twelve months in the year. For these reasons, I think the Minister of Fisheries and the Dominion government should see that the people of Gaspé receive the necessary help, even a generous one. Owing to the difficulties encountered in earning a livelihood, the population of my county, I regret to state, has dropped by a few thousands within the last 25 years, due to the lack of encouragement, communication facilities, markets to dispose of their fish and other reasons for which no government in particular is responsible, neither provincial nor federal.

[Mr. Marcil.]

Indeed, this problem must be solved and if the hon. minister can come to some arrangement with the Quebec government in order to settle this question, he will be looked upon as the benefactor of those people.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, first, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr Pouliot) who has noted a decrease in the exportation of the fishery products, I may state, that in no way is this astonishing, if we consider that, owing to the world-wide crisis, which has lasted three or four years, all countries are exporting less products. The lower price obtained is also one of the causes of the decrease in exports.

I can only state to my hon. friend that the Department of Fisheries is doing its utmost to foster the exportation of our sea and river products, by making regulations and seeing that they are enforced, so that our products may be shipped abroad in the best condition possible, endeavouring thereby, to raise the standard of our products on foreign markets. I feel certain that within a few years our fish exports will greatly increase.

I am somewhat amazed to hear the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) criticize so sharply the Quebec provincial administration of fisheries.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I did not criticize it.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): In 1922, however, our Quebec government friends requested the administration of the provincial fisheries—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was not consulted in this respect.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —under the plea that the provincial government was in a better position to put that administration on a more productive basis, and improve the lot of the fishermen of that province.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Especially the salmon fishermen.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I suppose that my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay did not find fault, at the time, with the order in council—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was not consulted concerning the matter.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —and the arrangement which was made between the provincial and Dominion governments.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was not consulted.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): That is astonishing.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was not a member of the government.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): That is astonishing, the hon. member being one of the representatives of the lower St. Lawrence, one of the most important representatives of the northern coast of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): No, pardon. If the hon. minister will allow me, I did not represent, at the time, the Saguenay county, my constituency only extended to the Saguenay river, I did not represent the northern coast.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My hon. friend had his eyes on the whole northern coast then, and must have taken an interest in the welfare of the fishermen.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I was not as well acquainted with the situation of the fishermen as I am to-day.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): It was precisely because he was interested in the welfare of the fishermen of that section of the province that he was called upon later, to represent them.

Mr. DORION (Text): A tout pêcheur miséricorde.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I must state to my hon. friend that opinions vary among members opposite and the people of Quebec as regards measures to be taken to improve the lot of the Quebec fishermen. Some say: "We shall request this French speaking school at Gaspe." Others say: "That is unnecessary, that is not what we want. What is required is some agreement between the two governments to cancel the 1922 order in council and return the administration of the fisheries to Dominion government." Others again contend: "The Quebec government's administration of the fisheries is above reproach." And I think an attempt was made to prove that the provincial government's administration of the fisheries was efficient, if I am to judge by the debate which took place recently in the Quebec Legislative Assembly. Naturally, a request was made for the collaboration of the Dominion government, however, it was stated: "The province had well looked after the fisheries, improved the lot of the fishermen." I am therefore amazed to-day to hear the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay draw such a gloomy description of the situation. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay differ in opinion in this respect. At all events, sir—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Action, is all I request.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): At present, the fisheries are within the purview of the provincial authorities, and I do not think that one is justified in criticizing the Dominion government in this respect. The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay states that he would be willing to request the repeal of the 1922 order in council. Does my hon. friend imagine that we could proceed "ex parte" in this affair? It is an agreement concluded between the Dominion and provincial governments and he knows that it is not by another agreement that we could improve the situation. The Quebec government has never requested us to abrogate what was done in 1922.

Did my hon. friend suggest to the provincial authorities that they should request the Dominion government to resume the administration of all the fisheries which were under its control? As to the Acting Minister of Fisheries, he is as willing as he was last year, he has not altered his stand in this respect, he is ready to cooperate and grant all that was requested by the Hon. Mr. Laferté, namely, instructors speaking the French language—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —in a school of biology which will be located in Gaspe, on premises chosen by the provincial government. These instructors should even be chosen by the provincial authorities. Young men having a fair knowledge of fisheries were to be assigned to the biological school at Halifax, for a year, so as to acquire a more thorough knowledge of fisheries, thus qualifying them to take charge of the Gaspe school, the following year. I am informed that the Quebec government sent a few young men to Europe to qualify as specialists in fisheries and biology and they are probably those who will take charge of the school referred to. My hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay will realize that one cannot accomplish in one day what we, the Dominion government, intend to carry out in conjunction with the provincial department of fisheries.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): May I inquire of the hon. minister whether the Dominion government made a proposal to the provincial government toward reestablishing the situation as it existed previous to 1922?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): There has been no request from the provincial government to that effect.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Has there been a request from the Dominion government to the provincial government to reestablish matters as they were previously?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation) No request of that nature was made to my department by the provincial authorities, likewise none was made by the Dominion government to the provincial government.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I wish to put a question to the hon. minister: What is the yearly catch of fish in each province?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I wish to inform my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) that the Quebec yearly fishery products amounted, in 1928, to $2,976,000; in 1929, to 2,933,000; in 1930, to $2,502,000; in 1931, to $1,952,000, and in 1932, to $1,815,000.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What was the cause of this decrease?

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): The crisis.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Are the fish affected by the crisis?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): In the prices, yes.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Has the minister any statistics in connection with the the consumption of fish in the Dominion and what is the total amount of fish exported yearly?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The whole consumption in Canada is about 95 million pounds of fresh, frozen and mildly cured fish.

Mr. DUPUIS: I want to know what the whole production amounts to—the amount of fish exported and the principal countries importing Canadian fish.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will find in the Fisheries statistics for Canada for 1932, the last volume we have, at page 204 and following pages, the list of all countries importing Canadian fish, the kinds of fish, quantities, price and so on. He will see that our best customer is the United States, then the West Indies; South American countries also import from Canada. There is a large list of countries importing Canadian fish.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. SHORT: How much of this $85,000 is to be used for advertising to promote the consumption of fish in Canada? The item is intended for the conservation and development of deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish. I presume the expression "to assist the demand for fish" means advertising fish to create a demand.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We advertise in various ways in regard to fish. For instance, we have sent to different exhibitions electrical exhibits of all the fish produced by our fisheries. In Toronto at the last exhibition large crowds were attracted by our exhibit, and a few weeks ago a departmental exhibit which did not cost very much was staged in Montreal and proved a great advertisement for our fisheries. I see from the details of this item that we are expending $15,000 to extend the demand for fish.

Mr. SHORT: In what manner will that be expended?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Apart from the exhibitions we have tried to increase the home demand for fish by employing, as I informed the committee yesterday, Mrs. Spencer who is an outstanding expert in the use of fish for meals. She has attracted crowds all over Canada.

Mr. FAFARD: She or the fish?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mrs. Spencer with her way of cooking fish. In Montreal and other centres where the French population is large, we have the services of a bilingual lady who cooperates with Mrs. Spencer. They have visited all the convents in the vicinity and have done splendid work with the educators and pupils in those institutions. At the present time we have about six hundred ladies at each demonstration at Eaton's store in Montreal listening to Mrs. Spencer's lectures on the subject of fish.

Mr. SHORT: We all agree that Mrs. Spencer has rendered excellent service to the fish industry of this country, and I hope the department will retain her in her present position. But I understand strong representations were made to the department by the fishing industry through the Canadian Fisheries Association for an appropriation to be made for the purpose of newspaper and magazine advertising in this country in order to create a greater demand in the Canadian market for the products of the industry. I am a little disappointed that no item appears in the estimate for that purpose. I thought a sufficient amount or part of the $85,000 might be used in that way. I understand only some $46,000 of the $85,000 that was voted last year, was expended. Am I right in that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, prior to Decemmer 31.

Mr. SHORT: Then it is fair to suppose that the same amount will be used this year. Why cannot the balance be used for advertising purposes, because this money could not be expended in any better way? As hon. members know, the fisheries of the maritime provinces are at the present time in bad shape. The fishermen there, owing to the state of the markets for their products, have been unable to make both ends meet in the last three or four years. The foreign markets have been in very bad shape during the last four or five years, and we have had to depend a great deal on our home market. If we can increase the consumption of fish in our own markets this will help our fishermen more than anything else. The only way in which that can be done is to get our people to eat more fish, and the only way to do that is to advertise, to keep the matter of fish before our people all the time. I believe last year the minister appropriated $85,000 and expended $41,000. Perhaps he could see his way clear to use $40,000 for advertising.

Mr. DURANLEAU: During the fiscal year 1932-33 we expended practically the full amount voted, that is, $84,766, but I said just now to my hon. friend that during the present fiscal year, 1933-34, prior to December 31, 1933, on that appropriation of $85,000 we had expended the sum of $46,411. To the last day of February we had expended about $50,000.

Mr. SHORT: Possibly a sufficient amount might be placed in the supplementary estimates for this purpose. I am sure the minister will agree with me that the money could not be spent in a better way. That will create a demand for fish. It will be remembered that two years ago the department spent some $20,000 for advertising, being assisted by the trade which raised about fifty per cent more, making the total amount some $30,000. Splendid results accrued from this advertising. Nothing has been done recently in the way of advertising except by individual firms and they are not at present in a position to spend any money for advertising, because I do not think there is in Nova Scotia a single firm in the fish business that has broken even in the last three or four years. I believe the time is now opportune for the government to step in and give all assistance possible to this industry. I would strongly recommend to the minister that he try to have a sufficient amount placed in the supplementary estimates if he cannot take it from this item of $85,000 which appears in the main estimates. I hope he will give the matter his serious consideration.

Mr. NEILL: As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis has exhibited a very proper interest in this appropriation, it might be as well to put the details on Hansard because they will reveal possibly something more than the particular information for which he was asking. They will reveal the fact that practically the whole of this $84,766.31 has been spent in the maritime provinces. Where does British Columbia come in, which has furnished the greater part of the fish trade of Canada? According to the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1933, the amount expended under the heading "Aids in expanding demands for fish" was $13,706.06. There is an item for Mrs. Spencer, who did not come to the coast last year. An amount of $1,200 is included for broadcasting weather reports. Then there is:

Bait collection service—Canso, $1,278.

Canso, so far as I know, is not in British Columbia.

Bait freezers—Canso: salt and ice, $403.25.

Then:

Marie Joseph, painting, $101.32.

Marie Joseph, whoever he or she was, got $101.32 for painting. Whether Marie painted the freezers or a sea picture in oils I do not know. On educational work, wholly in the maritimes, $10,229 was spent. Exhibitions, Lunenburg—I seem to have heard that name somewhere—cost only $4,182. Then we get the big figures; lobster collection service, subsidy to some company, $21,375. Lobster patrol service, a separate item, $21,340. Then a scallop investigation;—we do not raise scallops in British Columbia,—$5,885. Packet service; I do not know what that is, I will ask the minister to tell us that, a subsidy for the steamship Petite, $1,500. I notice that while this Auditor General's report is for the year ended March 31, 1933, the order in council authorizing that was passed April 4, 1933, after the close of the fiscal year. Apparently it was some unusual and out of the way expenditure or it would not have had to be covered by a special order in council.

Then, grant to assist in the publication and distribution of the Canadian Fisheries Manual, $2,000. I do not think even the members in British Columbia get a copy of that. And there is $2,764 for odd items. As far as I know, unless we shared in that small item of the king's printer, practically the whole of that $84,000 was spent in the maritimes. I do not wonder the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) blushes; he might well do so—

Mr. SHORT: I do not feel myself blushing at all.

Mr. NEILL: But I noticed it. The hon. gentleman is so accustomed to having to blush for this cause that he does not notice it. I want to know where British Columbia comes in on this. British Columbia has some rights. How they are recognized is difficult to see. Surely out of over $84,000, and producing as we do nearly if not half of the total fish production of Canada—which puts us away ahead of the maritimes, because there is a large fishing industry in Manitoba, which is not generally known—surely we are entitled to a look-in on some of these things.

While I am on my feet and, as the hon. member has introduced it, I would like to revive a twice told tale in connection with an item that appears lower down, "voted by statute," as if that made it any better. That is the question of the perennial wrong done to British Columbia in connection with that item of $160,000 called the bounty, also I suppose for the conservation of the fishing industry. Since I brought this matter up last year and the year before and the year before that, further confirmation has come into my posession which shows that this is not a mere annual fad of mine but that it had engaged the very serious attention of the British Columbia and the dominion governments years ago, and I think possibly also the home government. Here is an item from a British Columbia paper, one of those items carried under the heading, Fifty Years Ago To-day:

> The dominion government has received a claim from the government of British Columbia demanding—

I note the word.

> —a share of the Halifax fishery award, on the ground that the presence of American fishermen in their waters has seriously interfered with the privileges of their own fishermen. Nothing can be done in the matter until parliament sits, as no allotment whatever has been made to the provinces, individually, and it is not probable that the claim of British Columbia will be recognized, the proceeds of the award having gone into the consolidated funds of the dominion.

That has a double significance. It shows first that British Columbia at that time made a demand, and secondly, it corroborates my statement that that sum awarded under the Halifax award went into the consolidated fund where it was certainly lost sight of. While I do not propose to burden the committee with the whole brief I might just quote one or two sentences. At that time, 1884, fifty years ago, the question was raised. British Columbia closed its brief to the committee of the privy council thus:

> The committee advise that this minute be approved and that a copy thereof be forwarded to the hon. the Secretary of State for Canada, in order that the claim of this province to share in the annual appropriation of $150,000 may be considered by the dominion government, and in order, also, that due consideration may be given to the uncertain and unsatisfactory position of the fishery interests of British Columbia as regards the future.

There was as I say a brief setting out at great length the claim of British Columbia to share in the award. I am not dealing so much with that aspect except as a basis for my claim that we should share in this $160,000 that is being spent now.

Here is another quotation:

> It remains only to be added, what is well known, namely, that the fisheries of British Columbia . . . are the richest in the world.

And they deal with that and with other conditions, the inshore fishing grounds, the mild winters and so on, and say there would be a big fleet in British Columbia waters if they got a fair share of this amount. They claim that their statement is a fair and temperate exposition. I also would try to make a fair and temperate exposition. They say that any one with any fairness will recognize the justice of the claim, the grievous injury sustained and so on. Then the brief proceeds:

> While highly appreciating the consideration usually given by the government of the dominion to British Columbia matters, so far as they are known to them, yet, as this province is unrepresented in the dominion cabinet . . .

So this province was unrepresented in the dominion cabinet when this deal went through. Then further on:

> The Canadian government attribute their unwillingness, in part, to their opinion as to the intention of the Canadian parliament, evidenced by the discussions therein when the grants were made to other provinces without including British Columbia, but it may be remarked that the claim of this province was not then, and has not since been, submitted to parliament in such a manner as to be fully understood—a fact that must weaken materially any inferential argument from the presumed intention of parliament.

That word "inference" is one beloved by the Minister of Finance and also my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr.

Duff) who always says it was inferred that we should suffer this wrong. Then:

Approved report of the honourable the privy council of Canada, 30th April, 1875.

Which supports this contention, and another one dated December 10, 1879: Then the brief goes on:

Taking a general view of the matter as it now stands, it is not denied that British Columbia has suffered grievous, exceptional injury by the operation of a treaty not submitted for assent to her legislature, and under which Canada has received a very large sum of money. In seeking redress, the question, practically seems to be whether the provincial claim is to be judged simply by a strict legal construction of the terms and wording of a treaty which it is admitted does not embody the requirements of the contracting parties as expressed in the preliminary correspondence and instructions, and by a construction which is one of several different interpretations given by competent authorities, and is at variance with the former opinions.

They quote the two minutes of the privy council that I have mentioned, and they go on to say:

Under these circumstances, if the Canadian government do not see their way to recommend a favourable consideration of the provincial claim to His Excellency the Governor General, the committee advise that they be requested to facilitate a joint reference to the home government . . .

Further:

A very strong feeling exists in the province on this subject, which will be increased by delay in making an adjustment or by the refusal of equitable treatment.

That was in 1884, fifty years ago, so we may judge what the feeling is now in connection with the long delayed justice in this matter:

For this reason, the committee, in again referring to the matter, express the hopes that the dominion government will review the considerations that have been urged to show the grievances of which British Columbia complains, and the justness of her claim to participate in money received from the home government by Canada, under the treaty which has operated so injuriously to British Columbia.

Then again they repeat their demand that, failing justice, they should be allowed to go to the foot of the throne so to speak. I do not know what the outcome was. There seems to have been a hitch there. As far as I know they did not take it to the home government. If they did the matter was ignored. I am only quoting that as a basis for the demand that I now present. I am not asking that we should share in that $4,500,000 or whatever it was, but I cite it as proof that the best men they had in public life in British Columbia at that time were strongly of that opinion, and said that there was a growing, bitter feeling against the injustice. But I noticed in the first quotations I read a reference to the money having disappeared into the consolidated fund and therefore could not be obtained. That bears out what I have argued here again and again. The matter will not down until we get justice for British Columbia. This money was put into the consolidated revenue fund and was never heard of or seen again. It could not be; you might as well put a can of condensed milk into the ocean and then seek to recover it. Once anything goes into the consolidated revenue fund it ceases to be ear-marked. These things are common knowledge to all of us. Then some three or four years later, on the eve of an election, the government suddenly decided to spend $150,000 a year on fisheries bounties, later increasing it to $160,000, by an act which I have quoted in this house in previous years and which I challenge anyone to quote in contradiction of what I have said. That act never mentioned the Halifax award; it never inferred it or hinted at it in any way. The government simply said they were going to spend so many thousand dollars for the development of deep sea fisheries, and they did so; that is all. Every year we are told that something was left out; that technically I am right but that it was intended to be a quid pro quo for the losses sustained under this award, and so on. That is not so, but even if it were, according to the brief from which I have quoted British Columbia had the same rights. But it is not so, there is no reference to it in the act. I was once in court, and I heard a lawyer who was also a member of parliament trying to argue as to the meaning of an act. He said, "My lord, I was present when that act was put through; the understanding to which we all agreed was that it meant so and so." But the judge said, "I am sorry, but unfortunately they neglected to bind you up with the statute, and your recollection as to what took place does not bind me. I am here to administer the law as I find it," and that is all I am here to ask. I forget the number of that act, because it is a year or two since I have referred to it, but it is well known and it states that $160,000 shall be spent yearly to benefit the deep sea fisheries of Canada. If British Columbia is not in Canada it is time we knew it. I have brought up this matter on other occasions, and hon. gentlemen just try to pass it off by saying that technically I am right but that the intention was so and so. I do not know anything about the intention; I know what the act says, and I demand justice for British Columbia.

I am only referring to this item as another illustration of the raw deal British Columbia gets. We are asked to vote $85,000; under this item last year we spent $84,766.31, and I think we got the 31 cents out of it. Is that fair? Can hon. gentlemen expect this sort of thing to promote the harmony and bonne entente we hear so much about? They were able to put through these measures because of their majority; these things took place when British Columbia was not represented in the cabinet and had only two or three members in the house. Times are changing however; even nature is on our side. The population of British Columbia is growing while the population of Nova Scotia is becoming less. At every redistribution we see the representation from Nova Scotia become smaller while the representation from British Columbia increases, so even nature is protesting against the injustice of this thing. The day will come when we will be of greater importance in relation to our numerical strength in this house than is the case today, and then we will get justice. I only hope I will live long enough to see that day.

Before sitting down I should like to ask the minister what this subsidy is in connection with the ss. Petite.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we were all interested in hearing the hon. member for Comox-Alberni dwell upon the beautiful scenery in British Columbia and the reasons why, in his opinion, they do not get as much money as they should get. I have no objection to that, but let us look at the situation. We vote $1,443,000 for the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada. I made some hurried calculations while listening to my hon. friend, and I find that of this total $737,543 is spent in British Columbia.

Now let me go a little further. The hon. gentleman speaks of $62 being spent in Canso, and he goes on to say that he does not know where Canso is. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman study the geography of Canada; he is a member of parliament, and he should be acquainted with all parts of the country. I can tell him where Alberni is; I can even tell him where Comox is. I can even go so far as to tell him where the Queen Charlotte islands are, but my hon friend is selfish, and that is not usual in a Scotsman. I am sorry to see that a Scotsman, with such a name as that borne by my hon. friend, should be selfish in the matter of the expenditure of a few dollars. He wants all the money for his own province; in fact I think my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni would like to see this $1,443,050 spent in his own constituency, but that is not possible.

Let us see what is spent in British Columbia. Here we have an item of $25,000 to provide for an investigation into the life history of the Pacific halibut by an international fisheries commission appointed under the Pacific Halibut treaty of March 2, 1923. That is quite a large amount, and it is all for British Columbia; there is nothing for Ontario, Quebec or the little province of Nova Scotia, which my hon. friend deliberately picked out this afternoon to find fault with because $62 was spent in Canso. Here we have $25,000 devoted to the halibut in British Columbia, and we do not object to that. In fact perhaps I can claim some credit for arranging that this amount should be spent, because it was recommended by the commission of 1922, of which I had the honour to be chairman and of which my hon. friend was a member, that a commission should be set up to protect the halibut industry.

But let me go a little further. Here is an amount of $240,000 for fish culture, and practically the entire amount is spent in the province of British Columbia. If my hon. friend does not get his proportion of that vote it is not my fault. Surely it is not fair for him to rise in his place and try to tell this committee and the public that British Columbia is not getting a fair proportion of the expenditures made by the fisheries department or the government of this country. I hold no brief for this government or for the department; right now I should like to move a resolution that this amount of $1,443,050 be reduced to $1.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): The hon. gentleman is not discussing the correct item; we are discussing item 154, to assist in the conservation and development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $85,000.

Mr. DUFF: I am answering my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman does not even know the name of my constituency. It is Comox, but he is pronouncing it "Comax."

Mr. DUFF: After listening to my hon. friend I knew there was some ox in it. Then my hon. friend interjected into this argument the matter of the Halifax award. Of course this is a hardy annual with him; every year he gets up and tries to impress upon this house the fact that British Columbia should get part of that $160,000, which is the interest on $4,000,000—

Mr. NEILL: Is it? I do not know.

Mr. DUFF: It is not my fault if you do not know; why don't you find out? I say, sir, that the hon. gentleman gets up in this committee every year and tries to make out that the province of British Columbia should get a portion of the $160,000, which is 4 per cent on $4,000,000, that was paid by the government of the United States in return for certain privileges on the Atlantic coast. British Columbia had nothing to do with this, but my hon. friend tries to make out that because in the legislation which was brought down the word "Canada" was used instead of the words "maritime provinces," British Columbia should get some of this money. My hon. friend, being a Scotsman, is trying to take part of this money from the maritime provinces. I say to him that British Columbia has no right at all to this money; it is purely a matter between the government of Canada on behalf of the maritime provinces and the government of the United States. British Columbia has never received one cent of this money, nor will she ever receive a cent of it. My hon. friend had better realize that now, because we will never pay British Columbia one cent of this $160,000 a year.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They have no right to it.

Mr. DUFF: Of course not. Let us get back to the item under consideration. Before doing so may I apologize to you, Mr. Chairman, for having to be called to order. The item now under consideration is to assist in the conservation and development of the deep-sea fisheries, and the demand for fish. To me this seems to be a double barrelled item. First it speaks of assisting in the conservation, which means the curtailment of fishing operations, and then it speaks of a development of the deep-sea fisheries, which means an increase.

Mr. MUNN: My hon. friend seems to have a pick on British Columbia. I would ask him, please, to forget British Columbia and to look after his Atlantic sea coast.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad the hon. member for Vancouver North has made a statement; I can only reply that it was not my fault. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni started this discussion, and that is the reason I have spoken. I am not against British Columbia; my hon. friend should know that in 1922 I went out to that province for ten weeks, at my own expense, in order to try to do something for the fisheries of British Columbia. I should like to know this from the minister: How does he propose to spend this $85,000, which is voted, at least partially, to assist in the conservation of fish? He is going to assist in preventing people from catching fish, just the same as under the wheat agreement, about which the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon, he is to prevent people from growing wheat. It would seem to me that the expression "assist in the conservation" would mean that the fishermen are not to be allowed to catch fish. Then in the second place, the fisheries are to be developed. How can those two operations work together? How does the minister justify this item? I state he cannot justify it, but I should like to know how he proposes to do it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suppose the hon. member knows that the conservation of fishing means the saving of the fishing industry. The aim of the department is to protect as much as possible fisheries in all parts of Canada and, further, to help the industry. We have to protect fisheries by means of regulations, a course which has been followed for years. That is the way we have protected our fisheries. If my hon. friend wishes, I could give the details concerning the proposed expenditure of this $85,000. Does my hon. friend wish that that should be done?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: These are the expenditures:

To aid in extending the demand for fish, $15,000.
Contract for Nova Scotia boats, $30,000.
Supervision of lobster collection service, $400.
Packet service L'Ardoise-Halifax, $1,500.
Aid in educational work, looking to the use of better methods by fishermen, $15,000.
Subsidies to bait collection service, $1,500.
Grants to Canadian fishermen towards cost of New Year's issue, $2,000.
Grant to Canadian Fisheries Association towards cost of annual convention, $250.
Grants to exhibitions, $2,300.
To provide exhibits at various exhibitions and to stimulate demand for fish, $6,000.
Subsidies to bait freezers, $1,000.
Scallop investigations, $6,000.
Destruction of sea lions, $600.
Transhipment of fur seal skins, $2,500.
Miscellaneous, $950—Total, $85,000.

Mr. DUFF: Is the vote for destruction of sea lions to be effective in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: British Columbia.

Mr. DUFF: I thank you very much, indeed.

Mr. REID: I am surprised at the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough rising to attack the province of British Columbia. I just happened to consult the report showing fisheries expenditures, and I find the figures show that since 1867, the year of confederation, approximately $15,000,000 has been spent on the eastern coast and only $13,000,000 on the Pacific.

Mr. VENIOT: We did not attack British Columbia.

Mr. REID: But, looking at the revenues I find that almost $3,000,000 has been returned from British Columbia, and not quite $1,000,000 from the eastern provinces.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Would the hon. member permit a question? How much did this government have to advance to the province of British Columbia during the last three years to keep it from going bankrupt?

Mr. YOUNG: What about the Duncan report?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That has not anything to do with it.

Mr. REID: We are dealing particularly with fisheries, and I believe an answer is not necessary. The answer to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough is that there are probably more crabs raised on the Atlantic coast than there are in British Columbia.

Mr. SHORT: The hon. member is mistaken, there. British Columbia is the coast for crabs, not Nova Scotia.

Mr. REID: However, I do not think we should divide Canada into two parts, the east coast and the west coast. I believe if British Columbia is getting any help she is getting only that which has been long delayed. I am sorry to have to oppose the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. VENIOT: Discussion on this item has gone far afield. May I point out to hon. members from British Columbia that while we from the maritime provinces are defending our rights we are not attacking British Columbia.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni did it.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made the suggestion that we were getting that which did not belong to us. I believe we have a perfect right to point out that such is not the case. So far as I am concerned British Columbia can get all the kudos possible out of the fishing business. Let me point out however that since hon. members have spoken about favours conferred upon different parts of the dominion, under the agreement between New Zealand and Australia and Canada, British Columbia gets a preference on its fish which is not granted to any other part of the dominion. It is a discrimination in favour of sockeye salmon as against what we should get for our canned fish in the maritime provinces. For that reason I do not believe hon. members from British Columbia have any reason to complain if hon. members from the maritime provinces stand up for their rights.

I had intended to put a question to the minister in the French language, but having begun my observations in English I shall endeavour to finish what I have to say in that language. If I understand correctly, the acting Minister of Fisheries has informed us it is the intention of the government in the near future to establish a biological station on the Gaspe coast. The object of this station is to enlighten the younger generation engaged in the fishing business on the conservation, the greater production and the marketing of fish. I understand the station is to be established in the province of Quebec, and that the lessons given will be, no doubt, in the French language. Perhaps I would not be asking too much if I were to suggest to the minister that the benefits to be derived from the biological station on the Gaspe coast should be extended to the south shore of the Baie des Chaleurs to include certain parts of the province of New Brunswick, such as the county of Gloucester and sections of Northumberland, Kent and Restigouche, where a great majority of the fishermen are of French extraction. The large majority of the fishermen are of French extraction and they should receive the benefits of the teaching in French which will be carried on at the Gaspe biological station. I know that at the present time the French boys from Gloucester, Restigouche, Madawaska, Northumberland and Kent have the privilege of attending a short course in fishing which is carried on at Halifax during the winter time. This is all right as far as it goes but it does not meet the situation. It is too far for the boys to go and besides the general course in French at the biological station would prove of more benefit to our French fishing population. I suggest to the minister that he take this matter into consideration with the view of having the facilities of the biological station at Gaspe extended to certain sections of New Brunswick and if necessary to other sections of the maritime provinces.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When discussing the organization of the fisheries experimental station at Gaspe with the provincial authorities of Quebec, I had this particular point in view. I hoped to have the benefits of this school extend not only to the French fishermen of the province of Quebec but also to the French fishermen on the coast of New Brunswick and the Magdalen Islands as well as those of Nova Scotia if they should desire to avail themselves of the facilities afforded by the school.

I realize that what has been said by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) is quite true. Advertising is very important in increasing the home demand for fish. I was visited by a delegation last year and I told them that if it were at all possible this vote would be increased this year. My hon. friend will realize that in these times it is very difficult to have a vote increased. The home market is the best market and advertising offers the best medium of increasing the home demand. If we could increase the per capita consumption of fish in Canada by ten pounds we would remedy the whole situation. I can promise my hon. friend that if it is possible to make a saving in the expenditure of this $85,000 we will apply the difference to advertising purposes. I cannot promise that the committee will be asked to vote a supplementary item, but any saving will be applied for that purpose.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): We are probably wandering a little far afield from the particular item now before the committee, but I think it may be in order at this time to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). There are few hon. members in the house to whom I listen with greater interest and from whom I derive greater benefit than from that hon. member. But he seems to have an obsession on this particular matter of fishing bounties. Year after year he claims that British Columbia should share in this $160,000 and year after year we have to go to the trouble of explaining everything to him. We give him the findings of the Maclean commission and we go over the history from the time of the establishment of the tribunal before which witnesses were called. The whole thing had reference only to the maritime provinces and the province of Quebec. The finding of the tribunal was that $5,500,000 should be paid. I think $1,000,000 went for grants, $500,000 for expenses and $4,000,000 was placed in consolidated revenue. It was understood by everyone at the time that British Columbia had absolutely nothing to do with the matter. That province had no more interest in this than had Manitoba or Ontario. The finding of the tribunal had to do with the advantages which the United States had in our fishing grounds over the fishermen of the maritime provinces and the amount awarded was regarded as recompense. A mistake was made in putting this award into the consolidated revenue fund instead of into a trust fund.

Mr. NEILL: But they did put it in.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Once it was placed in consolidated revenue my hon. friend thinks it is open to anyone from any place in Canada to come in and grab it. Of course, that is something that we cannot tolerate. While we are willing to do anything to assist the fisheries of British Columbia we cannot allow unholy hands to be placed on this $160,000. I do hope that with this explanation we have heard the last of this matter.

Mr. NEILL: No, never.

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has brought up the question of the Halifax award because I wanted to refer to it in another connection. I was a little surprised at hearing him repeat the claims which he had made before as to the injustice which he considers has been done to British Columbia in not sharing in this grant. I feel that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) and those other hon. members who have spoken have done a signal service not only to British Columbia but to Canada generally by placing side by side with the statement of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni the real facts with regard to this particular grant. I do not think he should be allowed to get away with the claim which he so characteristically persists in making. Let us remind him again that the treaty of Washington, referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, provided expressely that American fishermen should be allowed certain fishing privileges in Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, not in British Columbia, and that article 23 of that treaty provided that a tribunal should be set up to award damages to Canada caused by reason of the invasion of our maritime waters by these American fishermen.

Mr. NEILL: To Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: To Canada, certainly.

Mr. NEILL: Not to the maritimes.

Mr. RALSTON: That tribunal was set up and an award was made. Surely the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is not so unfair as to suggest that when the fishermen of the maritime provinces have paid the piper and suffered the damages the whole Dominion of Canada should participate in the award given by the court. I do not believe he is sincere in making that claim. He does make a technical claim because of the fact that this award was placed in consolidated revenue instead of being set aside for the fishermen of the maritime provinces. This difficulty was realized three years later in 1882 at which time a statute was passed providing, first for a grant of $150,000 and then subsequently for one of $160,000 to the fishermen of the maritime provinces. That amount has been paid out ever since in fishing bounties.

Mr. NEILL: There was no reference to the award in that act.

Mr. RALSTON: No, but there was a reference to the award in the debates that took place in the house at the time, showing why this money was being voted. Surely my hon. friend does not suggest that members from the west or from other parts of Canada would sit there and permit money to be voted to the maritime provinces alone unless they were convinced of the justice of it. Because the preamble did not declare, "Whereas this is money of the people of the maritime provinces," that does not alter the fact that it was money belonging to the people of the maritimes, and it was voted to them to compensate them for the damage they sustained in connection with the fisheries. Moreover, you will find it expressly stated in the debates in the house that this was why the $160,000 was to be voted each year to the fishermen of the maritime provinces. Since my hon. friend has gone into the question, let us remind him that there remains to be paid the interest for three years. That was the subject of a claim before the Maclean commission, reference to which has been made by my hon. friend from Cape Breton South, and that claim was recognized by the commission. They said that it was a fair claim, holding that the money should be paid for the benefit of the maritime fisheries. Interest on interest had rolled up until it amounted to millions, but the Maclean commission in their report expressly recommended that, considering the grounds upon which the award was made, the request that the three years' unpaid interest be appropriated by parliament to be applied to useful purposes in connection with the Atlantic fisheries or fishermen appeared to them to be fair and equitable, and they recommended that the amount be so appropriated and applied. I do not think my hon. friend wants to take away that little ewe lamb we have in the maritime provinces in connection with this vote. Surely he would not expect us to be paid for damages suffered by British Columbia fishermen with respect to some arrangement with the United States regarding the fisheries on the Pacific coast. These are facts, and while I am pointing them out to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I want him to understand that we agree with him that the fisheries on the Pacific should receive all the encouragement possible. Apparently however the salmon fishery, so far as exports are concerned, has not done too badly, because this year the increased exports amount to some $800,000 out of a total increase in export trade of $1,300,000. So that while the British Columbia fisheries are in difficulties they are nevertheless showing some measure of progress.

I come back to the item under consideration. I wish to refer the minister to two or three matters in the maritime provinces in connection with the fishing industry. The first thing I want to discuss is the question mentioned by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis, namely, the desirability of increasing demand. One of the objects for which this vote is intended is to promote the demand for fish. Everyone recognizes the good work done by Mrs. Spencer and those engaged teaching the ladies how to cook fish. But after all most of us feel that this does not account for a large proportion of the consumption of what is produced by the industry as a whole. Our export markets have to be taken into consideration. We are all for increasing the home market as much as possible. I am for it as much as anyone else, and I am of the impression that what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis has suggested is a good thing. The minister would be well advised to consider favourably what has been submitted to him in regard to the need for assisting the fishing industry through the medium of advertising. I do not attempt to suggest to him how much money should be voted but I do think that a definite campaign should be undertaken in Canada in the direction of instructing the people in the food value of fish. This is one of the primary industries of the country; it employs a large number of people who use a good deal of gear. A definite campaign along this line would therefore be productive of very desirable results and would increase the national prosperity substantially. I would ask the minister to assist in the marketing of fish by increasing the demand through advertising. The united maritime fishermen met last November and passed a resolution which I suppose the minister has received, urging upon the hon. gentleman the need for extending assistance along that line. I believe it could well engage his attention, and I submit that part of this money should be used for that purpose. The minister will say no doubt, "We have not enough money." Well, I say to him, use part of the money from the Halifax award still remaining unpaid; it has not yet been paid the fishermen in the maritime provinces. There is one object to which it could be devoted. Remember this—and I am not talking east and west—that we have not had any bonus on the production of fish. There was a wheat bonus two years ago, but we have not asked the government to undertake the stabilization of the fishing industry as it undertook to do in connection with wheat in the west. The Prime Minister made an announcement to-day with regard to the stabilization of the wheat market. We have not had anything of that sort, but we do submit that something should be done to extend the market for fish by stimulating the demand for that product, so as to meet a call which is coming generally from the fishing industry for assistance, not by way of the dole, but by helping men to help themselves. That is all they ask.

There is one other matter I wish to mention along lines in which the department might render assistance. I refer to the collection services. The minister has mentioned the collection service for which part of this vote is intended. Everyone naturally thinks of his own constituency, and I have in mind particularly a collection service that could be instituted along the coast between Yarmouth and Shelburne for the purpose of collecting fish —and lobsters by the way—and bringing them to Yarmouth to be shipped by boat to Boston. I would ask the minister to take into consideration the inauguration of services along Clark's Harbour, The Pubnicos, Wedgeport and Yarmouth, for the purpose of assisting in the expeditious marketing of the fish produced in that part of the country.

The next matter I wish to discuss briefly is this. I know that the minister and the department have had reports regarding the very serious effect of the storms of last winter on the fishing industry. I do not think that any industry has been so hard hit as those engaged in fishing. The fishermen have taken a terrific beating; they have lost boats and gear and, most tragic of all, lives. I believe the loss of lives in the fishing industry was something like six.

Mr. SHORT: Seven.

Mr. RALSTON: Seven, in the southern and western part of the province of Nova Scotia. Now, I am not discussing a general policy of loans to fishermen, but I did bring to the attention of the minister the circumstances of one fisherman who, through no fault of his own, lost his boat as a result of the storm. It was a total wreck. He has no capital to get another, and he is a good fisherman. He has done well. I should like to find out whether there is not some way in which he can be assisted. As I say, I am not suggesting a general policy at this stage; I am not going as far as that. I am pointing out however that the extraordinary situation which presented itself along the coast this winter ustifies an extraordinary emergency provis-.on for that type of case

Mr. DURANLEAU: Has my hon. friend any suggestions to offer?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; there is no question as to what can be voted for assistance to the industry and I think my hon. friend should have an investigation made by his officers and lay down some rule whereby, in emergent conditions, where a man has completely lost his capital, the only thing with which he can earn his living, he may be helped by either a loan or a grant.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Can that not be done under the Relief Act?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly, but the minister was asking me for some general principles to lay down in regard to the matter.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That is the general principle which should be laid down.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no doubt that it could be done under the Relief Act. This is an emergency year; the hard winter has created hardships, financial difficulty and distress to the fishermen, and they are asking not for the dole but for an opportunity to help themselves. There again I say that if the minister needs justification for asking his colleagues for more money, it can be found in the Maclean report which points out that the sum of $480,000, without counting interest, is payable still in respect of the Halifax award.

Last year I brought up the matter of the lobster industry. It has been represented to me repeatedly that the department might do well to consider paying the fishermen for the fantail or mother lobster, that is the large one, which although not showing any eggs, is a productive lobster, which may not be very much good for food, but which at the same time substantially increases the production if thrown back into the water. This payment is made, I understand, in other places. The tail of the lobster is punched so that the department will not pay for it twice. The payment does not amount to a great deal, but this is a matter of conservation coming directly under this item. I mentioned it to the minister last session, and I should like him to study it seriously and favourably.

I wish to refer to one other matter in connection with the fishing industry. Has the minister any further report from Washington with regard to the progress or otherwise of a bill, I think it was H.R. 74-19, which was introduced by a congressman to prohibit the importation of fish into the United States?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the last query of my hon. friend I may say that our latest information is that the bill to which he refers has not yet gone to committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to thank the minister for information I received from the department with regard to the lobster code, which was giving some concern to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. As the minister knows, a minimum size limit was introduced which was slightly different from ours, but ours has now been made to conform. A maximum size limit was also proposed to be inserted, but later I understand that was struck out. I am sure the lobster fishermen received that news with considerable satisfaction.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I have not time now to deal with the fishing industry in Nova Scotia, but I intend to do so at a later date. I just want to ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth to tell me, when I subsequently deal with the fishing industry of my province, whether he will join with me as a member of the House of Commons, forgetting politics altogether, in assisting the fishermen by helping to bring about the abolition of beam trawlers in Nova Scotia.

Mr. RALSTON: I was a member of a government which passed an order in council which was held subsequently to be ultra vires, but if I had been in the government when that situation occurred, I would have made that order in council effective by having it validated.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL: All I can say to my hon. friend is that I am very glad to have his cooperation in that matter.

Mr. MacLEAN: Under this vote which mentions conservation and which deals with the regulation of the lobster fishing industry, I should like to ask the minister whether new regulations have been adopted in the county of Prince where there are late and early lobster fishing seasons, and whether, if those regulations have been adopted, they have been properly advertised in the province in order that the fishermen may be made aware of them.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No special regulation was adopted for Prince county, but there was one to limit the number of licences to different districts and this regulation has been advertised as much as possible.

Mr. MacLEAN: I do not think it has been advertised as it should. In all fairness to the fishermen and the packers, if the department makes a change in regulations in connection with any section of the country where lobster fishing is carried on, widespread information to that effect should be given. I do not think it would cost the department very much to insert an advertisement in the papers telling the fishermen that those in a certain section will be allowed to fish only in that section and that only one fishing licence will be issued to each fisherman for the year. The trouble is that I am flooded with letters from fishermen in that locality asking whether this regulation has been put into effect and complaining that they cannot get the information. It should not cost the department very much to insert in the four newspapers in the province a notice telling the fishermen just what has happened. The fishermen migrate from one side of the province to the other. At this season of the year it is often the case, not only in Prince county but in every section, that the lobster packers make advances to the fishermen. This is the season of the year when the fisherman comes in for an advance. He is looking for it in order to equip himself to fish in a certain section. If the packer advances him money to equip himself with gear and so forth and then finds out later that the fisherman is not allowed to fish in a certain section, this is not fair to the packer or to the fisherman. I suggest frankly and in all fairness to the department and the minister that they should advertise in the local papers in that section of the country stating definitely what the regulations are for the coming season, so that the fishermen and the packers may be made aware of the correct situation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That regulation was published in the Canada Gazette, and printed and circulated among the fishermen and canners by our inspectors in that district. But if my hon. friend states that some people have been complaining that they have had no notice of that change, I have no objection to putting a little notice in the local papers. It may be an advisable thing to do so. I quite understand that all interested parties should be posted as to the regulations.

Mr. BRASSET: I wish first to thank the minister for having placed in the Magdalen islands an instructor in the curing of codfish. This instructor, whose name I think is Mercier, has done a lot of good work, and since he has been there the curing of codfish has been improved. But the cod fishing industry has expanded a good deal in the Magdalen islands in the last few years, and I do not think one instructor is enough. In the first place he is sent to the islands too late in the season and is retired too early in the fall. He should come when the fishing begins in the spring and should stay as late as November, whereas I think he has been going there late in June and is obliged to come back by the beginning of October. It would be a good thing if instead of one instructor the minister would send two or three and let them stay there through the season. There are quite a few fishermen in the Magdalen islands and one instructor cannot go to all the fishing localities, consequently the instruction given is not sufficient. I would therefore ask the minister if it is possible to place at least two instructors on the island, and send them there earlier in the spring and keep them there until later in the fall.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I thank my hon. friend for his words of commendation for what we have done. As to the suggestion made by him, he knows that we have had to curtail expenses as much as possible during these years, and we are not prepared at present to increase the expenditure. Nevertheless I can assure my hon. friend that I will look into the matter and see if it is possible to do anything to improve the situation.

Mr. HOWDEN: I see that this vote is for the purpose of increasing the demand for fish. In Manitoba we have a couple of big lakes, lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba, and not so many years ago they were filled with excellent whitefish that I believe brought the highest price on the New York market. In Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg, although perhaps we are not very great fish eaters, the consumption of fish could well be developed. But there is a very decided demand for salt water fish, white-fleshed fish—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but this item refers to deep sea fish, and I imagine the hon. member's remarks would be more in order under the next item.

Mr. HOWDEN: Well, I have just a word to say. Deep sea fish, fish of the white-fleshed variety, are specially desirable from a medical standpoint, being more digestible and less offensive to a delicate organism than red-fleshed and fat fish, such as the whitefish and pickerel and other varieties that we have in Manitoba. So there is a decided demand and a good market for this sea fish. Of course the only way we get it is frozen hard; that cannot be altered, we appreciate that. But we have to pay twenty or twenty-five cents a pound for this frozen fish. I believe that the fishermen on the Atlantic coast get only one or two cents a pound. I have no suggestion as to a cure for that, except that the dominion owns a railway and that railway operates an express service, and it seems to me this railway and these express facilities could be very well put to work transferring this fish in the shortest possible time and with the least expense to the consumer. If some such measures were taken to develop the business, I think a much greater market could be found for deep sea fish in Manitoba.

Mr. VENIOT: Concerning this matter of the conservation and development of our deep sea fisheries, might I, perhaps more for the sake of information than for anything else, draw the attention of the minister to what I understand to be new regulations that are to come into effect in 1935 in connection with the packing of lobsters. At the present time it is not required that all packing establishments be provided with steam for the cleansing of fish and cans and so on. But I understand that in 1935 new regulations to this effect will become effective, applicable to all canneries large or small, and I fear the result will be that a great many small packers will be put out of business. It is not always easy for them to comply with such stringent regulations, which I do not believe are necessary to keep up the quality of our Atlantic coast packed lobsters. I would therefore ask the minister if it would not be possible to consider an extension of time for the coming into force of this act.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have been asked for ameliorations in the canneries from year to year. It is true that the regulations requiring steam retorts in canneries, large or small, will come into force in 1935. Of course it is possible to extend the time, and if after we have heard representations from all the interested parties we think it is advisable so to do, we may extend the time for the coming into force of that regulation.

Mr. VENIOT: If that requirement comes into effect it will mean giving a monopoly of the lobster industry to a small group of larger packers who can avail themselves of those conditions. The small packer who under present conditions cannot afford to comply with such regulation will be driven out, leaving the business entirely in the hands of a few large concerns, many of them American packers having branches on this side. I believe in the proper canning of our lobsters, but I do not believe it is necessary that such a stringent regulation should be enforced in order to maintain the quality of our canned lobsters. The Canadian lobster has won for itself an excellent reputation on the markets of the world, and so far as I know nothing has been shown to indicate that that quality would be greatly improved by the enforcement of the proposed new regulation. That is my reason for referring the matter to the minister.

Item agreed to.

Fish culture, $240,000.

Mr. DUFF: I am opposed to this item, in view of what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had to say with regard to the few dollars spent in Nova Scotia. Most of this money is spent in British Columbia, and consequently I want to oppose the item.

Mr. REID: Would the minister tell us how much of this money will be spent in British Columbia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The estimated expenditure in British Columbia this year is $110,000.

Item agreed to.

Oyster culture, $10,000.

Mr. VENIOT: On this item, Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise the same objection that I laid before the committee last year. I appreciate what the government are doing and what former governments have done in the matter of oyster culture, but I cannot agree that the regulation as to the size of the oyster is just. I understand how difficult it is to have a general regulation which will apply to all sections of the oyster fishing industry in the maritime provinces; I also understand how difficult it is to adopt regulations that may be parochial, so to speak, but there are considerations that should be taken into account. For instance, consider what is known as the Caraquet oyster in the county of Gloucester. This oyster does not reach the full size of three and a half inches or more as rapidly as the round oyster matures in other parts of the province. In the cultivated bays of Buctouche, Shediac and Shemogue we find that the spat is deposited in fresh water at first in order to bring about a more rapid growth, which allows the young oyster to be placed in colder waters sooner than is the case with the Caraquet oysters. In northern New Brunswick there is no cultivation of that kind carried on, and the Caraquet oyster, and St. Simon bay oysters, have to depend entirely upon nature to reach their mature size. It will take the cultivated oyster three or four years to become marketable, whereas in the case of the round oyster in the northern waters it will take a year or two longer. Under the present regulations three and a half inches is the smallest size at which an oyster is allowed to be caught, and this imposes an absolute hardship upon the oyster fishermen of northern New Brunswick.

Last year I asked that this matter be looked into more fully. I do not know whether or not that has been done, but I am sure no harm would be done to marketing of the round oyster from Caraquet bay if the fishermen were permitted to take them at three inches. I would suggest to the minister that he seriously consider reducing the size of the round oyster to three instead of three and a half inches. Very few small oysters are fished in Caraquet bay, because the regulation is very strictly enforced. I think the fishermen obey the law almost to the letter and return any three inch oysters to the waters of Caraquet bay and St. Simon bay. So I would ask the minister to reconsider the decision that has been made, fixing the size of the oyster at three and a half inches instead of three inches, as it was previously.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I see that my hon. friend realizes the difficulty of adopting different regulations for different fishing areas. This subject has been carefully studied by my department, and we are still considering the advisability of reducing the minimum from three and a half to three inches, not only in the northern part of New Brunswick but in the whole fishing industry.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it could be done for the whole province.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We are still considering that reduction.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I could give the minister an example of a similar case. In connection with the lobster fisheries there are parochial regulations, so to speak; in northern New Brunswick, up to a certain imaginary line there is a certain season from the spring on into the summer, while from that point east there is a different season. Perhaps that might help the minister in coming to a conclusion, even if he should decide that the three inch size could not be made uniform all over the province; at least the regulation could be changed in certain sections, following the lines of the regulations in regard to the lobster fisheries.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to ask the minister how much was spent last year and where that money was spent. Was it all spent in Prince Edward Island or was part of it spent in New Brunswick.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amount spent up to December 31, last was $8,803. I have not the exact figures as to the expenses in the different provinces, but I can tell my hon. friend that a large amount was spent in Prince Edward Island, in fact nearly all the vote.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to thank the minister for that information. I should like now to get from him information as to the receipts which have come in from the operation of the oyster industry. As the committee is probably aware, the government has taken over the administration of the oyster areas in Prince Edward Island, especially in the Prince county area. In the administration of those oyster areas certain grants have been made by way of leases to some who are taking out leases for the propagation of oysters on leased grounds. We would like to have from the minister information as to the total amount received from all oysters sold off those public grounds last season.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am afraid some time would be required to give exact information as to the amount of money received from the sale of oysters, but I can tell my hon. friend results from the planting of spat. An area of about one-third of an acre on the Totten bed in the department's reserved area at the head of Bideford river was cleaned by tongers in 1929, and thoroughly mopped for star fish, on which were planted about four hundred bushels of shells, on which set of spat had been obtained by exposing them in wire boxes and in heaps on shallow shores. In August, 1932, 140 barrels of oysters were taken from half of the area. In 1933, an additional 216 barrels were taken, of which about one-half were of the original planted spat, and the remainder younger. In addition there were left on the bed all the oysters smaller than one and a half to two inches, and an estimated quantity of fifty barrels of larger oysters missed by the tongers. About one barrel per man was obtained on the last day. To summarize, in 1929, shells with spat planted amounted to 400 bushels; 1932, oysters fished, largely 1929 spat, 140 barrels; in 1933, oysters fished, 1929 spat, 216 barrels. There were estimated left on bed, in addition to many very small oysters, about 50 barrels, forming a total of 406 barrels. Then, in 1931 there were sold by the department for consumption, 67 barrels; in 1932, there were sold 12 barrels, and in 1933, 327 barrels. I can tell my hon. friend also that for planting purposes 225 barrels were sold in 1931, 233 barrels in 1932 and 153 barrels in 1933.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister tell me whether in the policy adopted by the government in connection with the cultivation of oysters empty shells alone are used, or if they use any other material for adherence of the spat? Do you use clean wood instead of shell for the adherence of spat?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We use different kinds of culch.

Mr. MacLEAN: The minister has stated that about 440 barrels of marketable oysters were sold, and that in the three year period some 611 barrels have been sold to the parties who have taken the areas for planting purposes. I should like to know if the oysters were sold by tender, and if public tenders were invited for the sale of the best quality oysters, namely those fit for shipping. Then, may I ask further at what price they were sold?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We asked for tenders in every case in which we sold oysters. Is the hon. member asking for the price we received?

Mr. MacLEAN: Yes, for best quality.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In 1931, for best quality, we received $8.25; in 1932, we received the same price, and in 1933, we received $8.

Mr. MacLEAN: The complaint has come to me that instead of public tenders being invited, tenders were invited from only a few parties who were interested in the shipping of oysters in the immediate vicinity. Fishermen feel it would have been wise to advertise for tenders in a public way. Then, there is the question of oysters procured for replanting on the beds. Included in those oysters were the 611 barrels which were taken for planting in private beds.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Bell (St. Antoine) in the chair.

Oyster culture, $10,000.

Mr. MacLEAN: When the house rose at six o'clock we were endeavouring to get information from the minister regarding this vote, and I must confess that I was not altogether satisfied with such information as he had been able to give up to that time. I really think that we should have a full statement of receipts and expenditures in connection with this vote. It will be observed that the vote is for $10,000, and the minister told us that $8,800 had been expended. We endeavoured to ascertain from him where that money had been spent and we were unable to find out; all he said was that the largest portion of it was spent in Prince county, Prince Edward Island. It might leave a false impression with the committee simply to be told that $8,000 odd was spent there, and for that reason I should like to have ample information with regard to the item. In addition to that, we tried to get some information regarding the receipts that came in from that area and the minister told us that 327 barrels of oysters had been taken off the public areas in the Bideford section. These were sold at $8 a barrel, making a total of $2,616. Then 153 barrels were sold at $2 per barrel, making in the neighbourhood of $2,922. That amount was taken in as receipts for the oysters picked up around that vicinity. Now, if they were able to pick up about 480 barrels of oysters it would seem that these were fairly good producing areas. We must remember that we are not speaking now of cultivated areas; they are altogether a different matter from the areas off which the 480 barrels were taken. The committee will readily understand that in these hard times of depression the fishermen feel that they should have had the opportunity of fishing these oysters, and even of fishing to a larger extent and selling the product for their benefit, as was always done in former years. But some years ago restrictions were imposed and the areas were closed. Since that time the government and the Department of Fisheries have been handling the industry. Whether they are on the right track or not, I am not prepared to discuss at this time. If the department have decided that they are going to follow that course, I suppose all that the fishermen in that locality could do is to put up with it, but the fisheries have been looked upon as a right and the question has arisen whether even the government of the province or of the dominion can really prohibit the fishermen in that community from fishing for oysters in tidal waters. I understand that a test case has been started and is in the supreme court of Prince Edward Island at the present time, and I believe the fishermen intend to take it to the highest court in the land to see whether they are correct in their understanding of the situation.

What I want to point out at present is that if the sum of $8,000 was spent there, the government must have received in rent and sale of oysters some $3,000 or $4,000. I would ask the minister what was collected in the way of rentals this year. There are the yearly rentals for the areas and the new licences that have been taken out. In all fairness to the people of that community, the government should furnish this information in detail, giving the amount of money received from oysters sold, the amount collected for rentals and new leases issued and all the details in connection with the matter. If the minister can give the committee that information now, I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The number of leases issued last year was forty for Prince county and nine for Queens county, or a total of forty-nine. As regards fees, we are charging one dollar per acre for the first three years, three dollars per acre for the next two years and three dollars and a royalty for the succeeding years. The amount of the royalty has not yet been decided.

Mr. MacLEAN: What is the total amount collected for leases and rentals for 1933?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the exact figure before me. The leases are not all the same; some are for five acres, others for three, and I think the hon. member knows enough about the matter to have an idea what revenue we get from that source.

Mr. MacLEAN: It is pretty hard for me to calculate just what the revenue would be, because, as the minister has stated, the rental varies each year and it is impossible for me to tell the number of acres each of those people has. I do not, however, suppose the point is very material. Last year I presented to the house a petition signed by many hundreds of fishermen asking that the government do not proceed with leasing public areas but allow public fishing to go on as in former years. I am sorry to say that although I presented the petition here in good faith, it was never acknowledged either by the minister or by the department, and no notice was taken of the representations made by the fishermen. As I stated before, the question is a live one in that locality. I am not going to debate the point whether the department is taking the right or the wrong course, but I wish to present the complaints that have been lodged with me against the present system. I have in my hand a memorandum which I would ask the committee to allow me to read because there is no other way of getting it on record on behalf of the people whom I represent.

At a largely attended meeting held at Freeland, lot 11, P.E.I., in September, 1932, a committee was appointed to draw up resolutions against private leasing of oyster areas and to present such resolutions to the federal government, and also to present such resolutions, as in the opinion of said committee, would be of benefit to the fishermen and labouring classes;

The said committee therefore presents the following resolutions:

1. That private leases of oyster areas are detrimental to the common welfare and interests of the ordinary fisherman, as they operate for the benefit of a favoured few and against the interests of the labouring classes.

2. That public opinion requires that private individuals be given no preference or special privileges in respect to the fisheries generally.

3. That the experimental work of the biological station at Bideford, P.E.I., under the direction of Dr. Needler is not of any material benefit to fishermen, nor assisting in the development or conservation of the oyster fishing industry.

I cannot say that I agree with that. Dr. Needler is making a remarkable study, and although the fishermen may not think he is making progress, I believe he is helping out the situation to some extent.

4. That it is beyond the power and authority of either the federal or provincial governments to lease said oyster areas to private individuals.

I see the former Minister of Fisheries is in his seat. I know he will be able to give a legal opinion on that.

5. That section 3, page 2 of the Fisheries Act is ultra vires of the federal government.

6. That a reasonable amount of moneys should be granted annually to the province of Prince Edward Island to help build up the fishing industry and to relieve the distressed fishermen and their dependents until such time as the industry returns to normal conditions.

7. That the fishermen of Prince Edward Island are entitled to such a grant as compensation for non-fulfilment of the terms of confederation.

8. That the development of the oyster industry be under the direction of a non-political committee of experienced fishermen.

9. That all oyster cultivation work be done by manual labour as much as possible, as it can be performed in this way more efficiently as well as more economically, besides giving needed employment to the labouring classes.

All of which resolutions are hereby submitted for the favourable consideration of the government of Canada.

Committee.

That is signed by a committee of five fishermen who were appointed at this public meeting to carry out the wishes of those present and to make their representations to the government.

In addition to that, the same men have asked for a public investigation and the public fishermen of that locality invite some of our good friends from the other counties of Prince Edward Island who are also interested in this question and who took part in the debate last year, to accompany a commission that may be appointed by the Department of Fisheries to look into the whole matter and, before anything further is done, to decide what is in the best interests of the people as a whole. I know the minister wishes to do what is right by the fishermen of the whole of Canada. I may say that a few years ago we had in that locality a wonderful oyster industry worth millions of dollars, but it was wiped out, as we have often pointed out. Now it is showing signs of coming back from natural causes as well as the help which has been afforded by the department. I think it is advisable that the request of the fishermen should be granted in regard to making an investigation of the whole situation before following this policy too far. Should a time come when the people there as a whole demand that these areas be handed back to the public, it would certainly be a difficult situation for the department to handle. Therefore before pursuing a policy of this kind too far it might be wise to have a thorough investigation of the situation to see what is best. I hope the minister has given this matter his personal consideration, because the fisheries of Canada is a very important industry which I regret always seems to have been sidetracked. One day we have a minister of fisheries; the next day we have an acting minister, and for a great many years we had none at all, the fisheries being linked up with the marine department. The fishing industry is of sufficient importance to receive more attention from the government of Canada than it has received. If there is any class of people in this dominion that has been neglected it is the fishermen. I do not think there is any other industry that is capable of such tremendous expansion and that the government could assist with such benefit. I would like to have a statement from the minister.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am prepared to give a statement that I have on the subject, if it is the desire of my hon. friend, but it may be rather long.

Mr. MacLEAN: I think it is as important as any other subject.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can give information about the number of acres under lease. We have about 245 acres under lease at the present time, at $1 per acre. We are pursuing the policy adopted by the former government for the improvement of oyster culture on Prince Edward Island; we have done nothing else.

Mr. MacLEAN: If the minister will permit, I have to take issue with him there, because under the former government there was never any policy of leasing public areas to private individuals.

Mr. RHODES: If my colleague will permit me to say a word, I think perhaps what the acting minister has in mind is that the policy which now obtains was arrived at by agreement between the former government of Prince Edward Island and the present administration. As far as I am aware it has been carried out with full approval of the present administration of Prince Edward Island. May I say to my hon. friend with regard to the petition he read from the group of fishermen, although I sympathize very sincerely with them in their plight, I regretted the views they expressed, as I do not think they are in accord with their own welfare. My hon. friend knows full well the oyster fishery that was wiped out in that area was because of free fishing; every man who could hire or buy or borrow or steal a rake would go out and help himself. The result was that a magnificent fishery, which was a source of great wealth to the countryside, was practically destroyed, to such an extent that they had to attempt to restore it by bringing in seed oysters from the United States. This resulted in ruin because they brought with them a parasite which gave the final coup de grace to the few remaining oysters in that area. It is only now being built up through the policy which has been arrived at by agreement, I am happy to say, between the provincial administration and the federal Department of Fisheries. If opportunity is given there can be developed in that area a fishery which will yield in wealth many times more than the whole of the fisheries of Prince Edward Island ever yielded in the past. I am speaking of just that one area in Malpeque bay alone. It has been estimated by those who have made a study of the matter that soil under the sea suitable for oyster cultivation can be capitalized at $1,000 an acre and yield a profitable return. These very men who signed that petition, if they had their wish, just as soon as these fisheries were built up to a certain stage would go out and tear them to pieces, as happened in the past. What will happen under the present system of private leases, in which preference is given to those who live in the immediate neighbourhood, is that the individual who acquires a lease, having to pay a certain rental to the government for it and operating under government supervision, will endeavour to build up an enterprise which will grow with the years, producing more and more oysters, and in doing so more employment will be afforded for the very men who signed that petition; and instead of their going out for a few months in the year and raking a few oysters, under a proper system of cultivation there will be employment for them twelve months in the year.

I have briefly expressed my view after having given a great deal of study to the matter, because I have always felt that we have never properly utilized and developed the great potential value of our oyster fisheries in Canada. I believe the oysters from that area are the finest in the world. I have always felt great regret, in going to hotels and clubs throughout the country, even at a time when the United States dollar was at a premium as high as fifteen per cent over the Canadian, that we had to eat the American oyster—which I submit is an inferior oyster—because there were not enough Canadian oysters to supply our own demand. Let me say to my hon. friend and to the committee that if they do not subscribe to the point of view that I have just endeavoured to put forward, at least let us give the policy a chance to work out. It will take a few years, and in the meantime no one will suffer. I am convinced that if it is given a chance to operate under the excellent guidance and supervision of the Department of Fisheries—and I mention in this connection especially the work of Dr. Needler, who, I am glad to know, according to my hon. friend, has done most excellent work—this industry will thrive and prosper to the great benefit not only of Prince Edward Island as a whole but particularly that of the fishermen for whom my hon. friend has spoken this evening.

Mr. MacLEAN: I appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), but those of us who have had actual experience all our lives in that area would have to take objection to some of his remarks. In the first place he states that the oyster industry was killed by overfishing. There my hon. friend is absolutely wrong. The oysterfishery is quite different from many other fisheries, for the life of the oyster industry is the annual fishing; the raking of the beds keeps them clean and in condition to catch the spat, and in that way you get your yearly crop. What did kill the industry there was the importation of oysters—

Mr. RHODES: Because it was overfished. They brought these oysters in because the area had been overfished.

Mr. MacLEAN: Well, no. If the government had been wise—it was under the local government then—the season would have been shortened to restrict overfishing, and imports of oysters from outside would not have been allowed. If the oyster industry gets back in the public areas to a position where the fisherman can make a day's pay, and he is not allowed to overfish, there is nothing in the world that would benefit the industry to the same extent. Members of the house must realize that these areas include thousands and thousands of acres, and it is impossible for the government to clean them by boats, by drags or by rakes. The only possible way in which they can be cleaned is by public fishing, provided that the areas come back sufficiently to allow the fishermen to make a decent wage. There are some sections at present where they can make some profit. The very fact that 480 barrels of oysters were picked up right around this area indicates that the public areas are coming back to quite an extent.

My hon. friend says that this policy was adopted by the previous government. May I inform him and those who were not in the house at the time that I took a very great interest in this matter because these fisheries are right in the centre of the county which I have the honour to represent, and, as the Minister of Finance has said, this industry is worth millions of dollars. My aim, and the deputy minister would bear me out if he were allowed to speak, was to bring back those areas for public fishing under the supervision of the Department of Fisheries rather than for private lease. I wish hon. members who represent fishing counties would put themselves in my position; let them realize if they can what it would mean if the banks off the coast of Newfoundland were leased to private individuals. We have seen the fuss they have had in Nova Scotia in connection with trawlers, and that is only a small instance of what happens when the fisheries get out of the hands of the public. We would like to see these areas brought back in the interests of the public fishermen under the direct supervision of the government. I think I have made a reasonable request, and I hope that before anything very drastic is done in the way of leasing large areas the department will go into the whole situation very carefully and see if they are on the right track.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have only a word to say in reply to my hon. friend, and I should like to emphasize what has been said by the Minister of Finance. During the best days of Malpeque bay, in my hon. friend's constituency, they produced over five thousand barrels per year; in 1912, before this policy was adopted, the production had dropped to four hundred barrels per year. The fisheries had practically disappeared through overfishing in that part of the country. May I tell my hon. friend that the views expressed by the Minister of Finance are shared by outstanding citizens, members of the Liberal party, of Prince Edward Island. I should like to put on record the appreciation expressed by an outstanding Liberal of that province, Hon. Walter Lea, leader of the Liberal party in the province of Prince Edward Island. In 1932, Mr. Lea stated:

> I may be treading on very dangerous ground to suggest the approval of any method of protection for our oyster industry, but certainly the cultivation of the beds by the federal department is a very wise move and should have the support of every man in this province regardless of his political affiliations or who was responsible for the change that was made.

I think this expression of opinion should be worth something to my hon. friend.

Mr. MacLEAN: If the minister wants to introduce politics into this question, which is the last thing in the world I want to do—

Mr. CANTLEY: You are down to the bottom of your argument now.

Mr. MacLEAN: Let me tell my hon. friend that if he would play politics in a matter of this kind in Pictou county I would not stoop to that in my county. If I wanted to make political capital out of this I certainly could do so, but that is not my wish. This matter is too important for that, and I am surprised that any hon. gentleman holding the portfolio of fisheries should even make the suggestion. I agree with what Mr. Lea has said; we all want to see those areas brought back, but if anyone should get credit for what has been done it is my humble self. I worked hard to get the government to take over that area, and it was only after getting the provincial government and federal government in line that we were able to get the dominion government to take action and spend some money. If my hon. friend wants to raise political considerations let me tell him that the Conservative government of Prince Edward Island took over those areas and destroyed them, worked them out through careless importation of oysters, without giving any consideration at all to the fisheries. That is the situation, if my hon. friend wants to know it.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to bring politics into this discussion at all. The subject is too important for that; it affects too many people. There are thousands of people in that community who are looking forward to the day when something will be done in their behalf in connection with this industry. It gave them a livelihood for a number of years, and you may be sure that they have had very hard sledding, as the saying is, since this industry was wiped out. So I hope no one will try to inject politics into this matter. Last year I was even accused by some hon. gentleman opposite of arranging those indignation meetings which were held in connection with the leasing of those areas. I want emphatically to deny that statement. I was sorry those meetings were held. I attended them, as did my opponent in the last election, and we did all we could to reconcile the two factions and get them together. That feeling is there, however, and now it is up to my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries to look after this industry. The government have adopted the policy of leasing, which was never contemplated by the Liberal party; I never gave my consent, and never would give it, to this proposal. I am prepared to stand by the public fishermen as against private interests first, last and all the time. So I am going to leave that matter with the Minister of Fisheries, if he wishes to introduce politics.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from Prince is rather ingenious, to say the least; he proceeds to find fault with the acting Minister of Fisheries for introducing politics, and then he immediately says the Conservative party is responsible for annihilating the oyster beds in Malpeque bay. Of course there is nothing political in that remark. As a matter of fact the acting Minister of Fisheries did not bring in politics at all; his reference was made solely with a view to preventing politics being introduced into the discussion. I may say to my hon. friend that, as Minister of Fisheries during the period when this agreement was entered into with the province of Prince Edward Island, as far as I am concerned I am happy to assume my full share of the responsibility. At the same time I want to pay tribute to the statesmanship and breadth of view of Mr. Lea, who was the Liberal premier of Prince Edward Island at that time. He had the capacity to rise above petty political considerations and keep in mind only the welfare of the industry itself and those who were dependent upon it. I hope my hon. friend will not misunderstand me when I say that in the maritime provinces we have ample subjects upon which to engage in political discussions and disputes, if we so choose. It is a most fertile area. In fact, I sometimes think that if we cannot find a subject for political dispute we will invent one. But may we leave any discussion of this industry, one which is fraught with such great possibilities for Prince Edward Island and other sections of the maritime provinces, outside the realm of political discussion. I can assure my hon. friend, and I believe I may speak for the acting Minister of Fisheries, that there is no desire to make political capital out of the matter, either one way or the other, and so far as I am concerned I will do my best to keep my eyes focused on the welfare of the industry. I hope the hon. member for Prince will take my word for it that that is the attitude of the acting minister and myself, and I venture the hope that the hon. member will cooperate with us for the benefit and common welfare of the industry.

Mr. McLURE: Before the item passes I should like to say a few words. On one point, namely that of the importance of this industry to Prince Edward Island, I must agree with the hon. member for Prince. It is so important that I believe hon. members on this side of the house do not wish to make a political football of the oyster business in Prince Edward Island. It is admitted to-day that the leasing and cultivation of oyster areas in that province has been a decided success, and while there has been some criticism of the acting Minister of Fisheries, I want to say that in my constituency, one in which great interest is taken in oyster farming, the people are loud in their praises of the policy pursued by the Department of Fisheries and the success it is having in the cultivation of oysters and the renewing of the industry. To such an extent is interest awakened in the industry that dozens of people are asking for leases in Alexandra bay, Pownall bay, Vernon river, Orwell bay, Orwell river and Rustico bay. A proper survey should be made of these territories. We know they are not barren bottoms, but there are certain areas in those rivers which should be leased for the benefit of the whole industry, because every farmer who takes a lease does some cultivation, and the fishermen fishing on the regular beds get the benefit of it.

As has already been said, the oyster business of Prince Edward Island has reached the point where an excellent article is offered to the trade. Apart from the information the hon. member for Prince has given the committee in connection with some dissatisfaction in regard to leases, I must say that I have never heard any person opposing leases. In fact, the fishermen look upon leasing as a regulation which will save the industry for them, and while there may be an odd one, such as has been described by the hon. member for Prince, who would like to see a cancellation of the leases, I believe the majority of the fishermen know enough about the regulations with respect to lobster fishing and as to what the regulations have done for that industry that they are quite anxious to uphold the Department of Fisheries in what it is doing for the oyster industry. In 1928 the federal government entered into a contract with the provincial government, and the policy inaugurated at that time is the policy being carried into effect to-day by the Department of Fisheries. If we are to give the government in power in 1928 credit for its policy and outlook, we must also give this government and its Department of Fisheries credit for carrying that policy into effect, and for promoting an industry for the fishermen of the province. I should like to impress upon the acting minister that in the county of Queens we would like a further survey of the bottoms of areas which are unproductive, with a view to affording our people an opportunity to take up leases for oyster farming.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask the minister a question regarding two areas in the district of Surrey. In 1930 two areas were set apart for biological purposes, on the Serpentine and Nicomelk rivers, not far from New Westminster. Can the minister say if those reserves for biological purposes still remain in the rivers I have named, and if so what work, if any, was done along those lines last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There was no change in the regulations.

Mr. REID: Was biological work done last year by the department on those rivers?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There was a station at Nanaimo studying the oyster problem of the Pacific coast, but I do not know to what extent they have used the rivers mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to call the attention of the minister to the East river of Pictou. Some years ago a decision was made to dredge the channel of the river. Three tangents were set out, one of which cut through the most important oyster bed of the East river and cut through eighteen feet of oyster shell. This operation destroyed to a very great extent the oyster fisheries on the river. Would the minister be good enough to take whatever steps are necessary to replenish the river from the Malpeque beds, or from some other beds, because this is a matter of importance to us. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, our maritime oyster beds were formerly a great source of revenue, and with attention could be made as great a source of profit in the future. I hope the minister will be good enough to consider my request, and act upon it within a reasonable time.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told that the provincial authorities have in hand the development of the oyster culture in that area. I shall be pleased, however, to look into the matter and see if something can be done by my department.

Mr. DUFF: Before we get away from this matter of oyster culture may I say that while I have listened with great interest to all that has been said I am still at sea as to what it all means. Those who are in favour of the present policy endeavour to tell the committee that the policy was followed in order to conserve the oyster areas and to make oysters more plentiful. They say the reason for giving the leases to private individuals was to protect industry. Well, I believe the minister will agree that the point as to whether a private individual would protect the beds better than the public would protect them, is a moot one. In the first place, I cannot understand how the fishermen are going to benefit through the leasing of these oyster beds to private individuals. If the beds are leased the only persons who are going to benefit are those who have leased them. After all, it is the fishermen who really own the ocean. The minister and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) say that these beds were leased to private individuals in order to make more money for the people of Canada. I cannot understand that. I should like to know how the minister or the department or the government can lease oyster beds outside the low water mark. Anyone can go and fish outside the low water mark and neither the minister, the department nor the government can prevent them. I should like to know from the minister how the interests of the fishermen of Prince Edward Island are being protected by the leasing of these beds to private individuals.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They were leased to private individuals when the hon. member was supporting the King government, yet he made no objections.

Mr. DUFF: That does not make it right. The King government is not on trial, and the fisheries department under that government was not any worse than it is under the present government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Perhaps not.

Mr. DUFF: There were no private leases granted when the King government was in power; these leases have been made since 1931 under this government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Leases were given in 1922 under the King government and the hon. member did not object.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We are building up an industry where practically none existed previously. These lessees are cultivating the areas and are producing where there was no production before.

Mr. DUFF: If the idea was to build up the industry, why did the minister lease these areas to private individuals? Why did not the government keep the thing in their own hands and not lease these areas to private individuals who will be the only ones to have the right to fish? The minister does not mean to tell me that after leasing these areas to private individuals those individuals cannot rake the beds and take off the oysters. If the minister had said that this matter was going to be kept in the hands of the government in an effort to increase production, that no one was to be allowed to take oysters from the areas in question, then I could understand it; but the minister has leased these areas to his own friends who can go on—

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I know what I am talking about. The minister has leased these areas to friends of his party in Prince Edward Island. These private individuals can go on the areas and take off all the oysters they want. Does the minister mean to tell me that these men who have leased these areas are not going to take just as many oysters from the areas, if not more, than if the public were entitled to go there and fish?

Mr. MYERS: I do not know whether the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has done it deliberately, but the fact is that he has conveyed a false impression to the committee. It should be understood quite clearly that the Department of Fisheries has not leased any of the public beds. What it has done is to lease barren bottoms where oysters were never cultivated before. An industry is being built up on bottoms which were never productive before. It should be understood that there are still public beds available to the public just as there have been since the time Adam was a little boy.

Mr. YOUNG: He never was.

Mr. MYERS: For quite a long time. These barren bottoms are being leased to men who live adjacent thereto. The government is saying to them: Here, you go on there and plant your small oysters and then you will have the right to fish them. It is well known that the spat will drift to the public beds and in that way a benefit will accrue to those who fish those beds. There will be a benefit to the fishermen at large.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) stated that he did not seek to interject politics into this discussion. This matter is really too big for that; it is one of the most wonderful industries we have in Prince Edward Island. Yet that does not prevent the hon. member from playing the game of politics. I know of no member in this house who is more expert in twisting and turning everything to his own political advantage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MYERS: If you knew him as well as I do you would say I was well within the mark. I am of the opinion that if the department had taken the opposite course and had refused to lease these barren bottoms in an effort to build up the industry, the hon. member for Prince would have kept his ear quietly to the ground until he heard the reaction in Prince county, and just as soon as he saw the direction in which the wind was blowing he would be right there with the goods. Far be it from me to interject politics into this discussion. I feel quite sure that when I take my seat the hon. member for Prince will tell me that I do not know anything at all about oysters. I think I remember his telling me that last year. However, I can tell him that I know a good deal about oysters, and my sympathies are all with the oyster fishermen. I hope the minister and the department will carry out the suggestion of my colleague, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). I think the department would get a squarer deal if they forsook Prince county altogether and moved their activities into Queens. They would receive the support to which they are justly entitled. I hope the minister will follow up the suggestion of my colleague that a survey be made of the areas in Queens county which we have the honour to represent. If that is done I can assure the minister that we will give our heartiest support to the project and do everything to further the activities of the department along these important lines.

Mr. DUFF: I appreciate what the genial member for Queens (Mr. Myers) has just said, because he backs up my argument. He stated that while the government was not able to help the public beds they were arranging that leases be given to private individuals. I stated that if the government hoped to help this industry in Prince Edward Island, leases should not be given to private individuals.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why not?

Mr. DUFF: The answer is very simple. If leases are given to private individuals, the ordinary fishermen will have no chance to fish for oysters.

Mr. CANTLEY: The ordinary fisherman can get a lease; he is a private individual.

Mr. DUFF: These leases were given to a favoured few. If every fisherman in Prince Edward Island had a chance to get a lease—

Mr. CANTLEY: He has, equally with his Grit or Tory neighbour.

Mr. DUFF: We will find out. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) says that every fisherman in Prince Edward Island has a chance to get a lease of an oyster bed. Will the minister tell me how many leases have been granted during the last three years, and to whom they were granted?

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member says that oyster areas should not be leased to private individuals. May I ask him what a public individual would be.

Mr. DUFF: A public individual is the public, that is, one or more or a dozen or twenty-five or thirty. My hon. friend knows that he is more responsible than anyone else for advising the minister to lease these areas in Prince Edward Island to some of his Conservative friends.

Mr. MYERS: That was done prior to 1930; the agreement was arrived at before 1930. So far as leasing these areas is concerned, let me tell my hon. friend that we hope by that action to make the lessees Conservatives, but they were not Conservatives when they got the leases.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In answer to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, I may inform him that the number of leases issued during the last three years was forty-nine, forty in Prince county and nine in Queens.

Mr. DUFF: How many were issued before that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are sixty-four approved applications in addition to the leases already issued.

Mr. DUFF: Were any issued before August 1930?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think so.

Mr. DUFF: No, exactly. Will the minister give the names of those to whom leases were issued?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall try to get the information. In regard to my hon. friend's charge, that we are leasing to friends of the party in power, may I tell him that we have adopted certain regulations that are followed very closely, and everything is published in the press before the leases are issued. This is the policy we follow. In the event of there being conflicting applications preference is given in the following order: first, to the shore front owner; secondly, to the owner of the shore front opposite a departmental reserve area; thirdly, to a resident of the district, and so on. We are following these regulations strictly, so that there is no question of politics in the granting of the leases. Moreover, we are making the areas so small that almost every fisherman, if he desires, can get a lease.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: A licence of a similar sort has been granted in Nova Scotia for the last fifteen years.

Mr. VENIOT: That is under the local government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No, some of it was under the King government.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. CANTLEY: My friend the admiral makes a mistake in supposing that oyster fishing is carried on beyond the three mile limit.

Mr. DUFF: Low water mark.

Mr. CANTLEY: To-morrow morning we shall see in Hansard what the hon. gentleman said. The fact is that oysters grow only in brackish water, in the estuaries and bays where the fresh water mixes with the salt water.

Mr. VENIOT: Don't they live in fresh water at all?

Mr. CANTLEY: No, clams will.

Mr. VENIOT: They cultivate them in fresh water.

Mr. CANTLEY: Perhaps they do in New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: We have the real thing there.

Mr. CANTLEY: I suppose you think you have. Now the other point I wish to make, in reply to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, is that the man does not get a licence to fish but to cultivate oysters. He is allotted a certain area, and the minister has explained how and why. There is an important difference between establishing an oyster farm, if you call it that, because that is really what it is, and getting a licence to fish oysters. They are two separate and distinct things, and I hope I have educated my friend the admiral and given him some little information of which he was not before in possession.

Mr. DUFF: I am glad my hon. friend from Pictou likes me, but I must say this. While we are living in a very unselfish world, where we have at heart nothing but the interests of the state, I can understand that when we get to heaven the idea of the hon. member for Pictou may be carried out and people will get a licence from the government to cultivate a certain thing or build up a certain industry without reaping any rewards.

An hon. MEMBER: That is predestination.

Mr. DUFF: Yes. But I have been mixed up with Methodists and Baptists and Episcopalians for so many years that I realize that apart from my hon. friend from Pictou and other Presbyterians, people generally expect to reap the reward of their labours; and no one can tell me, and I am sure my hon. friend from Pictou did not mean to suggest, that any man would ask the Minister of Fisheries for a licence to cultivate oysters for someone else to reap the benefit therefrom.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, of course not; no one so suggested.

Mr. DUFF: Absolutely not; my hon. friend did not finish his sentence. What he said was that all that these men get the licence for is to cultivate oysters, but he said nothing about reaping the benefit from that cultivation; he mentions nothing about taking and selling the oysters. Now, no one can tell me that people living in Prince Edward Island, who are the canniest Scotchmen in Canada, would cultivate oysters without expecting to market them. So that my hon. friend knows that from these beds which have been leased to private individuals oysters have been taken for the last three or four years. These Conservative lessees, recommended by the junior and the senior members for Queens, have been cultivating the beds and taking the oysters. My hon. friend from Pictou is so innocent and simple in his Presbyterian doctrine that all he thinks of is building up the country. But I want to say to him that the people in Prince Edward Island are different from those in Pictou; they are a different class of people. These Prince Edward Islanders not only want the leases but they want to make money out them, and that is what they are doing. The innocent acting Minister of Fisheries is placed in a very awkward position when he brings the estimates of the fisheries department to the house; he has to get the hon. gentleman who was minister for a couple of years to help him out. In connection with the oyster question, my hon. friend from Pictou deliberately entered into an argument to assist the acting minister, because he knows that the minister had no right to grant leases to private individuals. The fisheries are public property; they belong to all the people of Canada. What right has the Minister of Fisheries to grant a licence to any private person? This afternoon he told us, when I did not have an opportunity to answer him, that he has even given licences to people to catch fish in Hudson bay. Why should there be any licences? If the hon. gentleman who has just held up his hand, the Bright Fan advocate, wanted to catch fish in Hudson bay, why should he have to have a licence? Imagine people sailing to the middle of Hudson bay, five hundred miles from land, having to apply to the deputy minister or the minister for a licence to catch codfish or haddock. The thing is ridiculous. And the same applies to granting licences to men to cultivate oysters in Prince Edward Island. That is not the idea of this fisheries business. Let all the fishermen of Prince Edward Island go out and cultivate oysters. They are more interested in the matter than is the Minister of Finance or the acting Minister of Fisheries, and they are not going to kill an industry. Why? Because their bread and butter depend upon it.

Mr. CANTLEY: They did practically kill it.

Mr. DUFF: No, they did not kill it. The Lord killed it; the Presbyterian Lord of the hon. member for Pictou killed it; it was not killed by the fishermen. The trouble with the hon. member for Pictou is that he is a Tory; outside that he is a decent gentleman, but unfortunately he has Tory principles and he cannot get away from them. There is too much paternalism in the whole matter of carrying on government in this country; there are too many regulations, too many restrictions. My hon. friend must realize that the fishermen of Pictou county who catch smelts are more interested in the protection of fisheries than is the acting minister of that department. The reason is that it is their livelihood, their bread and butter. Does the hon. member mean to tell me that the fishermen around Pictou who catch thousands of barrels of smelts are interested in killing the industry? Of course not. He knows that better than I do. Is there any fisherman in Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia who wants to see the codfish or mackerel or herring exterminated? Of course not. Yet the acting Minister of Fisheries and his officials—and there are not two in the whole department who know anything about what they are doing—come to the house and make restrictions and regulations and give leases. What for? Just to try to show that they are earning their money. They do not know anything about the industry. Those who know something about the industry are the men on the coast of Nova Scotia who have to get up at four o'clock in the morning, boil a kettle, and go out in the fog, rain or snow to catch smelts in Pictou county or codfish off the Nova Scotia coast, and yet the acting minister and his officials try to tell us to-night that the fishermen do not know enough about what they are doing to protect the industry. Why should my hon. friend try to protect the acting minister who, after all, is only a figurehead? I see the Minister of Finance rather objects to my remark, but I am not saying it in a nasty way. The acting minister knows he is only a figurehead in this matter. The fishermen, whether they are on the British Columbia or the Nova Scotia coast, are more interested in protecting the fisheries than is the acting minister or his officials, and when the latter tell us that they have to give leases of oyster beds to private individuals in order to protect the fisheries, they do not know what they are talking about or they are not telling the truth in regard to the industry in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am glad a new prophet in the person of my hon. friend the member for Antigonish-Guysborough has arisen in Israel. It is quite evident from the latter remarks of the hon. member that he has learned practically nothing in the last half hour. He still confuses giving licences to establish oyster farms with giving licences to fish oysters. There are no licences, so far as I know, issued to fish oysters.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, there are.

Mr. CANTLEY: Perhaps so in his province. The hon. member can have his turn after a little.

Mr. VENIOT: The best time to correct the hon. member is now.

Mr. CANTLEY: The other point on which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was astray was in respect to fisheries outside the three mile limit. There are no oyster beds outside the three mile limit, and so far as I know, never were.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say that.

Mr. CANTLEY: There is no intention of establishing farms outside the three mile limit, for the reason I suggested a little while ago, that oysters live in brackish and not in salt water. After these observations, I hope the admiral will hold his peace for the rest of the evening and allow the business to proceed.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid I cannot do that. In the first place I did not say that oysters developed outside the three mile limit. I asked the minister whether the department had control of oysters outside the low water mark.

Mr. CANTLEY: No; that was not my hon. friends' statement. We shall see to-morrow what the hon. member really did say.

Mr. DUFF: All right. The second point is this: My hon. friend is still astray. What I say is that there is no private individual in Canada who is going to be such a philanthropist as to take a lease from the department to cultivate oyster beds unless, after cultivating those beds, he has the opportunity to reap the reward of his labour.

Mr. CANTLEY: Nobody ever disputed that.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member did.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. CANTLEY: No, I did not.

Mr. DUFF: Then what is the argument all about? That is exactly what I said, that if by giving those areas to private individuals—

Mr. CANTLEY: The hon. member is getting a little mixed now.

Mr. DUFF: No, I am not. I am afraid my hon. friend is trying to support what his Conservative government has done in the way of giving leases and special privileges to certain individuals, by saying that those individuals are philanthropists and are going to cultivate those areas without deriving any benefit therefrom.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They are fishermen and they have a right to that.

Mr. DUFF: No, they are not. What I say is that the government have no right to give those privileges to any particular individuals. If the government wanted to promote the industry, they should have taken charge of those areas themselves and cultivated them, and then when the areas were fit for fishing, they should have thrown them open to the public instead of giving them to private individuals who, the hon. member now says, after cultivating them, are going to reap the benefit. Those areas should have been taken over by the department, and then when they are fit for fishing, they should be thrown open to the public and not given to certain individuals whether friends of the Conservative or of the Liberal party.

Mr. MYERS: I have listened with pleasure to the discussion to-night. I was interested to hear for the first time from the lips of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that the Lord was a Presbyterian. I was just wishing that he had gone a little further and told us what political leanings He had.

Mr. DUFF: Liberal.

Mr. MYERS: I rose to correct the hon. member on one point. He questioned the right of the department to lease beds for the cultivation of oysters below low water mark. Does the hon. member know that an oyster cannot under any condition whatever live inside the low water mark? Does he know that they have to be in water deep enough that the ice does not touch the bottom? The hon. member by that remark showed me very clearly that he does not know the A B C of the oyster industry.

Mr. DUFF: Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise.

Mr. MYERS: That is what I say.

Mr. MacLEAN: The hon. member for Prince started something to-night when he brought up this question of the oyster industry. I am grateful to the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) for being so complimentary to me and extolling my political acumen by saying that I have my ears to the ground and always know the way the wind blows. I accept his compliment with the best of grace—

Mr. DUFF: And with a grain of salt.

Mr. MacLEAN: —and possibly with a grain of salt, and I feel that I can reciprocate in that regard because my hon. friend might apply it to himself. I am not accusing the government of playing favorites in issuing licences, but I want to point out a few matters that the committee do not seem to understand. In the first place, when a man is granted a lease, he is the only one who can get a permit to take oysters off the public areas and put them on his own private area. I want the committee to get that clearly. The public fishermen are not allowed to fish or market oysters, but the moment a man takes out a lease he can go to the Department of Fisheries and get a permit to pick oysters on the public beds. Not only can be get a permit for himself but he can get one for nearly every member of his family, I think every man who owns a plot can get four permits. In that way the people who hold these private areas can scoop up from other areas all the good oysters available and put them on their private ground. That is one of the things that the fishermen object to very strongly. Then the people want to know whether the department has the power to lease these areas to private individuals. If the government has that right, possibly the fishermen will be content, but at the present time they are obsessed with the idea that the department have no more right to lease oyster areas to private individuals than they have to lease the Newfoundland fishing banks to private interests.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Was not the control of fisheries vested in the federal government under the British North America Act in 1867? Who else has a right to control them?

Mr. VENIOT: No, it was not—only the power of regulation.

Mr. MacLEAN: I understand that the power of regulation is vested in the Dominion government, but that the fisheries are vested in the provinces, and Prince Edward Island has signed an agreement turning these areas over to the dominion government for purposes of regulation.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Where do you find that in the act?

Mr. MacLEAN: The fishermen would like to have that question settled definitely and clearly, as to whether in tidal waters the Department of Fisheries can lease areas to any individual.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the power of the federal authority to issue leases to private individuals, I would refer my hon. friend to section 61 of the Fisheries Act, which reads as follows:

> Special licences and leases for any term of years may be granted to any person who wishes to plant or form oyster beds in any of the bays, inlets, harbours, creeks or rivers, or between any of the islands on the coast of Canada; and the holder of any such lease or licence shall have the exclusive right to the oysters produced or found on the beds within the limits of such lease or licence.

Mr. DUFF: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. CANTLEY: Surely the man who plants a farm is entitled to the crop. The same thing is true in regard to oysters. As the minister has pointed out, the only licence a man can get is to fish for oysters to plant on leased ground that he has taken, which up to that time has been barren of oysters.

Mr. MacLEAN: I see clearly that my hon. friend does not understand the situation yet.

Mr. CANTLEY: He is very slow in the uptake.

Mr. MacLEAN: They have to have a licence for fishing oysters even on the public beds; all oyster fishermen have to have a licence, the same as the lobster fishermen. But what they object to is the special privileges given to the private owner. If a man wants to lease an area and to cultivate it and wait until it builds up, possibly he has the right to it. But they do not feel that he has the right to go out and clean up all the oysters off the public areas and put them on his own private area.

Mr. VENIOT: And even sell some of the oysters taken off the public bed.

Item agreed to.

Marine biological board of Canada, $175,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Might I ask for some information in connection with the work of the biological board at St. Andrews? I wish particularly to refer to the part which they may be taking in the investigation that was begun and I understand is not yet finished in connection with the fisheries and the construction of a dam at Passamaquoddy bay.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend knows that the report of that commission has been made and submitted to both governments, but so far nothing has been released by the governments as to the contents of the report.

Mr. VENIOT: I know nothing of any report having been made either to the Dominion or the United States government. I am very anxious to know the purport of that report. Is there any means of my obtaining a copy?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot tell the hon. member now why the governments have not yet made public the report of that commission. There may be some special reason, but I can say that the report is in the hands of both governments at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister look into the matter, and if the report can be released have it laid on the table of the house?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall look into the matter, with pleasure.

Mr. VENIOT: It is very important. One of the biggest branches of our fishing industry in New Brunswick is sardine canning. New Brunswick has at Lepreau the largest sardine canning industry in the world. Some years ago it was proposed to construct a dam for hydro electric power development purposes, which would cross certain sections of Passamaquoddy bay. It was to cross international waters, and the contention was that the construction of the dam would to a very large extent destroy this industry of sardine canning on the Canadian side.

An act was passed by the province of New Brunswick incorporating a company known as the Cooper company for the purpose of constructing such a dam. An act was also passed by the federal government limiting the time within which such work should be constructed, after submission of the plans and specifications to the departments of fisheries, marine and public works for their sanction. They came back to this parliament for an extension of that franchise, which expired, I believe, in 1929, and a committee of this house, after studying the bill, refused to recommend that the extension be granted. Then it was decided that a thorough investigation should be made by the Canadian and United States authorities; although the greatest part of this work was to be in Canadian waters a small section of the dam would be on the American side. A certain amount of money was voted in order to carry on that investigation, and I understand that the members of the commission representing the Canadian side of the question were the present deputy minister of fisheries, the head of the biological station at St. Andrews, and some other gentleman. Several meetings have been held; this matter has been under consideration for three or four years now, and I understand from what the minister has said that a report has been submitted to both governments. Since we in the province of New Brunswick are deeply interested in this enterprise and in the protection of this branch of our fisheries I think we are entitled to know what is contained in that report. I think we should be told whether the joint commission is favourable to the construction of the dam and whether they have discovered that it will not interfere with the fishing or destroy the feeding grounds of these sardines. There is only one place in Canada, in addition to the bay of Fundy, where sardines are found; I think the other place is the estuary of the Saguenay river, where sardines are found in small quantities. I believe that many of the sardines canned on the American side were caught in Canadian waters, and if this dam is constructed almost entirely on the Canadian side, and if it destroys the Canadian sardine fisheries, it will mean great hardship and loss to those living along the shores of the bay of Fundy and Passamaquoddy bay. I would like the minister to look into the matter and, if possible, table that report.

Mr. NEILL: I should like the minister to use some of this money in following up the investigation into the habits of the pilchard on the Pacific coast. As the deputy minister knows, the pilchard run was a total failure this year; after a good deal of time had been wasted some steps were taken to hunt for them, and they were discovered a long way off shore. So far as I am aware no one knows why they act that way. We do not even know where they spawn, and this new industry is in a very bad way just now. So I think some of this money should be spent on an investigation of their habits, where they come from and where they spawn. Very little money was spent in this last year; the work was stopped because there was not enough money.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can tell my hon. friend that this investigation will go on.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have had some complaints from some of the lower paid staff in the biological service, to the effect that their wages are too low. I wonder if the minister has the scale of wages and if he would let me know just what the wages are.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does my hon. friend refer to the Nanaimo station?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can give the salaries paid the different officials at that station. They are as follows:

Director, Doctor Clemmens, $5,400.
Assistant Biologist, Doctor Foerster, $3,900.
Assistant Biologist, Doctor Hart, $3,000.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Pritchard, $2,760.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Elsey, $2,640.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Mottley, $2,280.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Tulley, $1,620.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Tester, $1,500.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Ricker, $1,800.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Denno, $1,500.
Scientific Assistant, Mr. Hayes, $1,200.
Foreman, W. F. Baxter, $1,600.
Foreman, Mr. Stannard, $1,000.
Mechanician, Mr. Crocker, $1,000.
Caretaker, Mr. Russell, $1,260.
Stenographer, $900.
Stenographer and statistical assistant, $960.
Clerk, Miss Robinson, $900.
Master of boat, Mr. Grove, $1,200.
Engineer, Mr. Randall, $1,000.
Deckhand, $500.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the whole staff?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for a grant to the United Maritime Fishermen, $4,050.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if, with fear and trembling, one might ask for some details of this vote.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The fishermen of the maritime provinces and the Magdalen islands have formed themselves into an association known as the United Maritime Fishermen, with the object of enabling them to better their conditions by cooperation and other means. The association is proving to be of assistance in the development of fisheries, and enables the department to consult with officials who represent the fishermen as a body. Through its efforts improvement in handling and the preparing of fish for market can be brought about much more quickly. The association must depend on fees from the members to meet its expenses. Owing to the present depressed condition of the industry, it seems impossible for the association to procure sufficient funds to enable it to function properly. Hence it applied to the department for aid, and $4,500 was provided last year. Only $4,050 was paid to the association, because ten per cent or $450 was retained against the saving of $14,000,000 mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. Provision for that amount only, namely $4,050, is made this year.

Mr. NEILL: How many members are there in the association, and how long have they been receiving this grant? I did not just catch what the minister said as to what they do with it. Do they make any return to the government as to how it is spent, or what does the government receive directly or indirectly in return for the expenditure?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The government does not have a report from the association, because we make only a grant to aid in the association's work.

Mr. NEILL: The minister does not know how many members belong to it. That is a rather extraordinary statement.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I did not say that.

Mr. NEILL: And he does not seem to have a very clear idea as to the return the government receives for its money. I should like to know why the aid is confined to the maritime provinces. Are there no fishermen anywhere else who are hard up in these days? Is there no need for union among fishermen elsewhere—British Columbia, for instance? Some of these days I am going to take a week off so that I may go down to the maritime provinces and see how they—

Mr. SHORT: Why don't your fishermen unionize?

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps because they cannot get a grant. I shall go down and observe in their native fastnesses these strange, weird people with their quaint customs, and with their original ideas, one of the most marked of which seems to be that if there is a loose nickel in the Canadian treasury it belongs to the maritime provinces.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: That is all rot.

Mr. NEILL: I do protest that. We in British Columbia are struggling for cooperation. Someone has said that cooperation is organized desperation. In British Columbia we had an organization which went into the canning business, which was not government supported and which, owing to bad times, met with disastrous results; they were ruined. Probably if they had had a friendly hand to give $4,500, even if ten per cent were deducted, they might have weathered the storm. But they were regarded simply as being in business and they had either to sink or swim. My hon. friend talks about not being organized. May I say to him that in British Columbia there are several organizations, and we can very easily give the numbers who belong to them too. We will not have to say that we do not know how many belong to them. If we can get the guarantee that we in British Columbia, too, will get a share in this grant we will call our association the United British Columbia Fishermen, for the sake of euphony. Would an organization in British Columbia just as good as and for which there is as great necessity as the one now referred to, receive a share of this grant if they make application for it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will tell the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that this government is as keen to help the fishing industry in the west as it is to help that in the east. If any organization of the same kind had applied for a similar grant I should have been pleased to consider inserting an item in the estimates of my department.

Mr. NEILL: That is very gratifying.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We do not know of any similar organization on the western coast which has applied for any such grant.

Mr. NEILL: I think I can undertake to say we will have six organizations applying.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will have all next year to ask for the grant.

Mr. NEILL: To-day is ours; next year is a long time off. We would like a share of this grant. Apart from the remarks I have just made, there is another angle to the matter, namely that of giving some assistance towards organization. The other day I suggested that the fishing industry of British Columbia should get together under some arrangement such as that which the Americans call Nira. That would solve a great many of the problems from which we are suffering. Of course we know that almost the first necessity would be to have the fishermen properly organized. When industries in the United States come under Nira the first action is to encourage workmen to form unions, because that is the most convenient way in which to deal with them, and the workmen can then take their part in negotiating what the code shall be as regards hours, wages and so on. The same could apply to British Columbia. The first essential would be to have some definite form of organization among the fishermen, and a comparatively small grant of a couple of thousand dollars would go a long way towards helping the establishment of an organization along proper lines. Probably as a result of the price investigating committee we may have some form of organization equivalent to the Nira of the United States. The fishing industry might be glad to take advantage of it, and a vote would be useful in getting the fishermen organized in preparation for such an event.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not clear yet as to what kind of organization this is. Is it an organization of working fishermen such as trade union organization? Is it a cooperative organization, or an organization of employers?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is a cooperative organization of fishermen.

Mr. NEILL: Nobody knows.

Mr. SHORT: We all know; we know all about it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The information the department has is that it is an organization of fishermen operating under a provincial statute for the purpose of bettering the conditions of fishermen, in general. It has proved very beneficial to the fishermen of the eastern provinces.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are they employees of some fishing companies?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is an association made up of fishermen.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have no objection to fishermen getting a grant from the government, if they can get away with it, but I do think this is a poor way of doing business, namely to give grants to organizations who ask for it. I believe the better way would be for the government to say they are giving assistance to organizations of this kind, and then in turn organizations wherever they may form, either in the maritimes or on the Pacific coast, would make application for and receive a fair share of the grant, in a businesslike way. I object to an organization of this kind going to the government and receiving a grant without such application being made public, while similar organizations in other parts of the country do not receive the same assistance.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Because they did not apply for it.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the minister is going to give assistance of this kind I can assure him that I will not oppose it, but I am suggesting that he should let it be known on the Pacific coast that such assistance is being given. The people on the Pacific coast are in just as great need of assistance and are just as worthy as those in the maritime provinces.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Why did they not apply for it?

Mr. MICHAUD: I cannot understand the attitude taken by the two hon. members who have just spoken. Apparently they object to the small grant being made to this organization of fishermen in New Brunswick, the Magdalen Islands and Nova Scotia. For many years these men were in a terrible plight due to the disorganization of the industry and they organized cooperatively with the idea of finding out what had caused the depression in the industry and to try to better their conditions. If the fishermen of the Pacific coast do not share in this grant, the fishermen of the maritimes should not be deprived of it. The two hon. gentlemen who have spoken seem to be surprised that this grant is being given to the fishermen of the maritimes. It is about the only grant that is made to the maritime provinces. The western provinces and British Columbia share in many grants made by this government. We would not object if a similar grant were made to the western fishermen or to the fishermen of British Columbia, but I submit that no part of this grant should be taken away from the maritime fishermen. If the fishermen of the Pacfiic coast will ask for a grant I have no doubt that the government will give it, but we cannot subscribe to any sharing of this one. There have been beneficial results from the cooperative work done by this organization; conditions have been bettered and we hope that this grant will be continued. These men are taxpayers and they need even more government assistance. Instead of the grant being shared by organizations in other provinces it should be left intact for this organization.

Mr. NEILL : The minister has said that this organization extends from the maritime provinces to the Magdalen Islands. I should like to know how far those islands are from the mainland of Nova Scotia.

Mr. DURANLEAU: About one hundred miles.

Mr. NEILL: This must be a very loose organization when it is spread across one hundred miles of water, probably often rough water. One must think in rather wide terms of an association which covers areas so remote from each other. The minister cannot tell me how many belong to it, and it seems to me to be rather a loose kind of association.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is a well organized association. It has a board of directors and holds a convention every year at which the welfare of the fishermen is discussed. As the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) has said, this association has proved to be very beneficial to the fishermen in the maritimes.

Mr. NEILL: I am not opposing the vote in itself; I was simply asking for information which I do not seem to be able to get.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Eighty-five per cent of the fishermen in Nova Scotia are in this organization.

Mr. NEILL: In this one organization.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Yes; it is their own organization.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is opposing this vote, and I know I am not. If the government intends to carry out a policy of this kind, it should make an announcement so that organizations in other parts of the dominion can take advantage of these grants just the same as the fishermen in the maritime provinces. For instance, suppose the goat breeders in British Columbia should obtain a grant from the government, would not the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) object if a similar grant was not provided for the goat breeders in New Brunswick?

Mr. MICHAUD: We would be the goat.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are the goat in this case. The best thing the minister could do would be to let us know if other organizations of a similar kind will receive consideration provided they are doing work along the lines of that done by this organization.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I stated in answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that if a similar organization on the western coast will apply for a grant and it is found that it is doing something for the welfare of the fishermen, the government will give the matter consideration. The government is just as keen to help the fishermen in the west as it is to help those in the east. Up to the present no request has been made for a such grant to any western organization.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sure that there are fishermen's organizations on the coast which are doing just as good work, but they did not know of these grants. They were not as close to the government as the maritime fishermen and consequently they have had to carry on without any assistance.

Mr. SPENCER: I appreciate that the fishermen are going through very difficult times, but I should like to know upon what basis these grants are made. Are they made upon the basis of membership, of locality, or of work done?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is the importance and needs of the association.

Item agreed to.

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $6,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: Could the minister tell us in what rivers this vote was expended last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I gave the information yesterday afternoon, and my hon. friend will find it in Hansard.

Mr. REID: When applications are made for the clearing of streams on which salmon are moving does the application come to Ottawa or is it decided upon by the district supervisor? I made two applications last year in connection with streams in my own district and I was informed by the district engineer that there were no funds available. I should like to know definitely whether the applications have to come to Ottawa or whether the district supervisor has the right to decide.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Every application is supposed to come to Ottawa from the inspector.

Mr. REID: I made two applications in connection with two streams in my district; one was the Salmon river and the other the Serpentine. Perhaps the minister will let me have the information privately.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will find out and let the hon. member know.

Mr. DUFF: I asked yesterday for certain information with regard to applications received by the department for the clearing of fishways. Is the minister now in a position to say how many applications were received last year and not acted upon?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not acted upon?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, received and not acted upon.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Last year the department received sixteen applications with regard to obstructions in the maritime provinces, and every one was investigated. I have the report here. It is very long but I could supply the hon. gentleman with a copy of it.

Mr. DUFF: I understood from the minister yesterday that although $18,000 was voted last year only $1,300 was spent, and I inquired how many applications had been received and how many had not been acted upon. If there was $18,000 voted why was not the money spent when there were a number of applications from people interested in having fishways and rivers cleared?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The department acted upon every request for the removal of obstructions, but in some instances the report of the officials after investigating the conditions in the river or the creek was that the work was not necessary.

Mr. VENIOT: Therefore the application was refused.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, that was the report of the officials. Of course, we had to be guided by the report. Let me read the first one by way of illustration. At McLennan's Brook, River Dennis, Inverness county: (a) obstruction reported by guardian; (b) investigated by inspector, who reported that there was a sufficient channel for the passage of fish and that unless a greater accumulation gathered no work would be necessary.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Who was the inspector in that instance, was it Smith?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I suppose it would be Mr. Smith's district. Take McInnis Brook No. 2, lake Ainslie, Inverness county: (a) obstruction of sand bar; (b) reported by supervisor of fisheries work involved opening a channel; (c) channel opened by day labour at a cost of $8.

Mr. NEILL: Out of this vote of $18,000, the minister told us yesterday that only $1,300 was spent. In view of that, I do not think it was correct to tell me in October last that there was practically no money to do anything with. I applied to have some work done and was told that there was very little money available this year to clear obstructions, and even to have an engineer sent to inspect the stream it was first necessary to get permission from Ottawa. There are two first class engineers in the department. I do not know what they do, but they are good men, and they cannot have much to do if the total amount spent was $1,300. We had $18,000 voted and in October I was informed that very little money was available, and even an engineer could not be sent to inspect the obstruction until he had got permission from Ottawa. Isn't that penny wise and pound foolish? At any rate I protest at being told that there is no money when there is $18,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We had to cut down that item by $12,000 in view of the reduction promised by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of last year, when he intimated that the estimates would be cut by $14,000,000.

Mr. NEILL: By 10 per cent.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, by $14,000,000. We had to cut this item $12,000 to comply with that promise.

Mr. NEILL: Still, there is a big difference between $6,000 and $1,300.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $892,000.

Mr. REID: I wish to make a few remarks with respect to a matter I discussed in the house on Tuesday, February 20. I believe it is so important, not only from the point of view of the fishermen but from the standpoint of the conservation of fish, that I am justified in taking up some of the time of the committee to deal with the remarks made by the minister as well as by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) who replied on that occasion. Of course, under the rules of the house I was prohibited at that time from making any statement in reply, but under this item I wish to take the opportunity to reply to some of the statements made then, because I am firmly of the opinion that many of those statements should not pass without criticism. It is true I did not give the minister any warning that I would bring the matter up before the house went into committee of supply, but I noticed that he was well enough prepared for such a move being made because he had on his desk a report from the deputy minister and was able to produce it and therefore give some sort of answer.

As I have said, previously the whole matter affects over two thousand fishermen on the river, and the dispute between the minister and myself on behalf of the fishermen relates to seines in the area at the mouth of the Fraser river. In that connection I am sorry that the map I have before me cannot appear in Hansard for the information of the committee, because hon. members would then see at a glance just what I was endeavouring to show the house, namely, that the area allotted to seines last year practically constituted a trap in the mouth of the Fraser river. The minister read from the report handed to him by his deputy that pink and sockeye salmon deteriorate quickly in fresh water. We are agreed that probably they may deteriorate in fresh water, but the area allotted to the seines is not fresh but brackish water, and we should have that point cleared up. The report from the deputy minister states that the Fraser river follows a well defined channel right across the gulf of Georgia. If his statement is correct, and I say it is, it surely bears out the contention that I have been endeavouring to make, namely that the area allotted to the seine boats last year was right in the brackish water, that is the water of the Fraser river where it mixes with the sea water. He speaks in that report of the comparatively small area north of the boundary line; I shall not go into that because there may be something in his contention that the area just north of the boundary line may be well adapted to seines. But from the map which I hold in my hand—and I am sorry I cannot cross the floor to show it to the minister—I could quickly demonstrate to him that the new line allotted last year went right to the mouth of the Fraser river and with the seines operating there practically constituted a trap. It was not in deep water; it was in water half salt and half fresh. It was in the mouth of the Fraser river and as the deputy minister states in his report, the Fraser follows a well defined course clear across the gulf of Georgia. This line is not across the gulf of Georgia, because the gulf is miles further away.

He said also in that report that there was no demand for Fraser pinks since the canning inspection took place. I have to differ with him there. There was no difficulty experienced last year even with the seines operating, because the fishermen who did catch a few pink salmon had no difficulty except at one period when there was such a glut from the seines that the canneries could not handle the quantity of fish landed there in one day, and one fisherman who was offered one and a half cents apiece for his salmon, took them across the line and received four and a half and five cents for the same fish from the canneries on the other side.

Just at this point might I also criticize the inspectors because they bring in a report to the minister which he read into Hansard. It should be seriously noted that the three inspectors are also brokers. I think it is contrary to all business practice that men who are in the brokerage business and themselves buying fish should be inspectors appointed by the government. I do not think any other business would tolerate such a situation. I am not casting any blame upon the inspectors so far as their integrity is concerned, but it is not a good principle to allow brokers who are in the business of buying to be also the inspectors who go out and inspect the fish they buy and have a right to condemn or to pass as they see fit. Human nature being what it is, this is a wrong principle. If that is going to be done, there should be at least two outside inspectors as well as the three permanent men who are brokers.

In the report made by the deputy I take strong exception to another statement where he says that the gill netters were not hurt by the seiners. I quoted the figures, and I am going to quote them again because I got them authentically from the fishermen themselves. They show that before the seines were allowed to operate the fishermen were getting anything from three hundred to five hundred fish a day, and last fall, after the seines started in the mouth of the gulf, their catches dropped, some getting only five, some ten a day, but not any more than fifty a day were picked up by any of the fishermen in the Fraser river. To substantiate my case further, I have in my hand a report from one of the cannery men who control to a considerable extent gill net fishermen and who have several boats operating from the canneries. The report I received from that cannery is that last year when the seines operated, they were picking up only two hundred to three hundred fish in an area as against seventeen hundred the year previously. The statement made by the deputy minister that the operation of seine boats in the mouth of the Fraser river has not hurt the fishermen, I say is not correct; it is not a statement of fact, because I am quoting the figures as given to me after a careful scrutiny and study of the situation right on the ground last fall.

I should like to ask the minister a question and to have him take serious note of it. Has he any figures showing the number of fish caught after September 14? Whether fish are caught out in the gulf or in the mouth of the Fraser river or up the Fraser, it is well known to us who have made a study of the matter that the fish begin to deteriorate after a certain date, and many of the cannary men refuse to can fish caught after September 17. Even on September 14 it was noticed that the fish had begun to deteriorate a little. I wonder whether the minister has any record regarding fish canned or caught after September 14.

As regards the quantity of fish that was condemned, I do not think it is so alarming, and I am going to dispute the minister's statement that last season, out of 524,000 cases of pink salmon packed in British Columbia, 13,000 cases were classified by the inspection board as second quality. I wonder whether the inspection board really inspected 524,000 cases last year. Did those three inspectors go through all those 524,000 cases of salmon for inspection? But even if that were possible and they did so, the number rated as second quality is only about two per cent of the total and there was a leading letter sent out to the canneries asking them if those fish were caught by gill nets or seines. One cannery man stated to me—and I shall not give his name because it might affect him with the other cannery men—that in his opinion this letter from the department was certainly intended as a leading statement to find out if possible whether they could attribute the poorer quality of the fish to the fact that they had been caught by the gill netters after they had entered the Fraser river.

Regarding the board of inspection, their report says:

> The opening of waters off the Fraser to seining would appear to have led to a much improved quality in respect to a large portion of the pack at Fraser river canneries and canneries in the Vancouver area packing so called Fraser river pinks. The individual experience of each member of the board over a long period of years has been that the great bulk of the Fraser pink pack has been of such a character that under the inspection now in force it would have to be classed as second quality for lack of firmness.

I pointed out just a few minutes ago that it all depends on the time or the period the fish are taken out of the water. After September 16 last year I believe they did begin to deteriorate. The matter is not just one of the area in which the fish are picked up. Very often it depends to a large extent not on the area but on the time they are picked up. The minister has accused me of seeing only one side of the picture. That may be quite true; I see one side standing out all the time. In fact I see two; I see the cannery men who control and own the seine boats making an attempt in British Columbia to drive the gill net fishermen away, because if that could be brought about, the canners then would be virtually in a position to control the whole industry. They would own the seine boats going out; the ships and the payment of the crews would be in their hands and they would not have to take any notice of the gill net fishermen. I can see on the other side over two thousand individual fishermen being driven off the area of the Fraser river and so deprived of their living. I appeal to the minister, because it is a serious matter not only to the fishermen but the point of view of conservation of the fish. It is true that under the regulations opportunity is supposed to be given for the fish to go up the river during the week ends. But if the intent of the department is to conserve the fish why allow these seines like birds of prey to devastate schools of salmon? In some instances they are picking up eight to ten thousand fish at one time. If the purpose of the minister or his officials is to deplete the waters of the Fraser river, certainly they went the right way about it by allowing over sixty seine boats to operate in the mouth of that river last year.

Looking over the annual report of the department I notice that the pack of sockeye salmon, if not of all salmon, has been going down. I wonder if the minister has noted that, and if he can tell the reason why, in spite of the operations of the hatcheries and the fact that thousands of dollars are being spent in the effort to maintain the supply of fish artificially, the catch of sockeye salmon has been decreasing since 1925. This year, with the regulations put into force by order in council, if the seine boats are allowed to operate they will also pick up the late fall run of sockeye salmon. Yet we are told that fish must be conserved, and fishing must cease over the week end to allow a certain number of fish to escape. But there will be no escape if these seines are allowed to operate; with large nets picking up eight or ten thousand fish at a time we will very soon have no fish at all coming into the Fraser river.

Then the minister might tell the committee why the twenty-four hour rule was changed this year. When the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and myself protested last year against this order in council, the acting Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us at considerable length why it was necessary to put that twenty-four hour regulation into effect. But this year without a word they have cut it out. It will be interesting to hear why it has been cut out. It shows that we were right and that the whole matter should have been put before the marine and fisheries committee. I do not know how many changes have been made in the Fisheries Act since it was passed by this house; there must be dozens—

Mr. DUFF: More than that.

Mr. REID: Yet we have the marine and fisheries committee with nothing to do, while everything goes through by order in council, although the lives of hundreds or thousands of fishermen are affected. All these things should have been referred to that committee. I would like to know why they were not, why the committee should not have a chance to deliberate on them. I would remind the minister that this is the only place where the fishermen have an opportunity to air their grievances. They cannot afford, like the canners, to send men to Ottawa to lobby on their behalf; they have to depend on the members of parliament to state their difficulties in the House of Commons. If these matters had been referred to the committee where we could have gone into them and called the officials of the department and asked them the why and wherefore of things and taken the time to see that all interests were being protected, it would have been far better for the industry as a whole.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of the sockeye salmon treaty. I wonder if the minister has any information as to the possibility of that treaty passing in the United States. I was rather surprised that the minister mentioned that, because if my information is correct it is a pity it was not passed when it was first introduced in this house; the opposition which resulted in its delay for a year was, I believe, the cause of the United States not accepting it. In 1929 Mr. Tolmie, then premier of British Columbia, and his cabinet, agreed that the sockeye salmon treaty was one of the best things put forward on behalf of the fishing industry, but it was delayed here for a year. I am not sure whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce objected, but I know many hon. members on that side did, and the fact of the treaty not being passed in the United States was due to the opposition it met with here in 1929 and 1930.

I would also draw the minister's attention to some of the figures that have been quoted by the deputy minister in his report. They do not exactly correspond with the figures in the annual report. I find that for 1929-30 the report speaks of 158,290 cases, but in the inspector's report to the minister the figure is 161.529. In 1931 the inspector's report states that there were 20,000 but the annual report says 21,534. When they are giving figures to the minister they should see that they correspond with the official figures given by the department. I have spent some time looking them up and have endeavoured to quote them as correctly as I can from the information at hand.

I am earnestly appealing to the minister not to allow seines to operate in the mouth of the Fraser river. I appeal to him again to let the matter go before the marine and fisheries committee so that it can be dealt with there and maps and data produced, with the fishermen present. Surely that is not asking too much, especially when, as I have stated, it affects the living of over two thousand fishermen. If the greatest good for the greatest number is the object, then the policy of keeping seines out of the mouth of the Fraser river should be followed. Permit them, if you like, in the small area next to the international boundary, but do not allow them in the waters of the Fraser river or anyway near the entrance to that river. I would like to have the minister answer some of the statements I have made.

Mr. DURANLEAU: With respect to the question of purse seining and gill net fishing, I cannot add anything to what I said to the house some time ago when I put on the record the statement of the officials of the department. As minister I have to rely of course on the reports of our officials. The contention of my hon. friend may be right or it may be wrong, but we have to rely on the reports of our officials. According to the information received from those in the industry in general in the west, they are competent men and their reports as a rule are accurate.

As to the twenty-four hour regulation, my hon. friend says he opposed that regulation last year and wants to know why it was repealed this year. The aim of the department was to prevent fish in bad condition being canned, and as some men were carrying fish a long way before it reached the canneries we tried the regulation with that object in view. It worked pretty well up until last August. I told the house last year that it was only a trial we were making. From August to the end of the fishing season we did not have officials in sufficient number to ensure the proper enforcement of this regulation, and that is the reason it was repealed. Furthermore, it was not necessary at the end of the season.

As to the inspectors my hon. friend was complaining about, he says it is a wrong principle that brokers should be appointed inspectors. I desire to say that these inspectors were recommended by the canners who were interested. We never had any complaints about their work.

In addition my hon. friend very strongly urges that these questions of regulation and so on should be referred to the fisheries committee. I have no objection to that principle, and I can tell my hon. friend that when important questions are raised in this house I am prepared to recommend that such questions be referred to the committee.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. REID: What is more important than the question we are now discussing? A commission was appointed in 1922, composed of members of this house some of whom are still here; they went to British Columbia and investigated conditions, and in their report they recommended that if at all possible seines should be done away with entirely. There is no question more important than the one we are discussing at the moment, so why will the minister not refer the matter to the committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to discuss the matter with my colleagues and I will inform my hon. friend whether or not it is thought advisable to refer this question to the committee.

Mr. DUFF: There is a reduction of $130,000 in this item. If the minister and the government are trying to do something for the fisheries I should like to know how they can afford to reduce this item by that large amount.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend will remember that in his budget speech last year the Minister of Finance promised that a further cut of $14,000,000 would be made in the appropriations. In carrying out that promise this reduction has been made. Last year we carried on with satisfaction, and this year we hope to be able to do the same.

Mr. DUFF: I must object when the minister tries to say that this reduction is made because the Minister of Finance asked him to be economical in his department. The Minister of Finance has troubles enough of his own without having the acting Minister of Fisheries try to blame him for a reduction in this vote which has to do with what I consider to be a natural industry in this country that has the best opportunity for development.

The minister also stated that in spite of this reduction the department had been carrying on satisfactorily. I cannot agree with him in that; in fact if I were not a member of parliament I would put in a bill to the Department of Fisheries for work I performed myself. The minister cannot say that the work of his department in the matter of inspecting fish, for instance, and looking after the fisheries, has been done properly. I am a living example of proof to the contrary, because I had to do the work myself. The minister must know that because of the reduction in this item there were not enough inspectors during 1933 to examine and inspect properly the fish which the fishermen had to market. Before I proceed I should like to know whether or not the minister is aware of that fact.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no doubt that at times we had some difficulty in having the inspections carried out at the proper times, and our inspectors had to work very hard, but we did our best with the money available.

Mr. DUFF: I do not say that the department did not do its best, but the fact remains that the inspection was not carried out properly. I have personal knowledge of the fact that thousands of barrels of pickled fish lay in the fishermen's sheds and on the wharves of the purchasers for days and weeks before the inspectors could get around to inspect them. Let me tell the minister why that was so. A few years ago we had what were known as overseers as well as inspectors. The department wanted to be smart and to show parliament and the country that they were trying to do something, so they amalgamated those branches and made the overseers inspectors. Nine out of ten of those overseers of fisheries did not know a kyack from an alewife, and I doubt whether the minister knows the difference. However, they amalgamated those two branches and deliberately made inspectors of those overseers, who were good men as overseers and who had been in the department for many years. They dismissed the men who had been inspecting fish for years, and the result has been that these overseers did not have the qualifications properly to inspect pickled fish, mackerel and herring. The inspection last year was an absolute farce, and the exporters of fish had to suffer for it. Although the stamp of the department was on the barrels, when the fish reached the West Indies and were opened it was found that they were not up to the standard which was stated on the labels. It was not the department, the minister or the deputy who suffered; it was the man who bought the fish and shipped them to the foreign market, and I want to say to the minister that this policy was wrong. There should be special men to inspect fish, entirely apart from the overseers. The minister should go back to the old policy of having overseers do certain work in connection with the fisheries and properly appointed inspectors in the different districts to look after the inspection of fish.

Let me give an instance. In the county in which I live, a county which last year must have produced twenty thousand barrels of pickled fish, there were only two inspectors. In the middle of the season, when there were ten or fifteen thousand barrels of fish to inspect, one of those inspectors resigned, and what did the department do? They appointed a hotelkeeper, not as an inspector but in order to get around the law. The department would not ask the civil service commission to call for applications for a properly qualified inspector, but the minister appointed a fishery guardian to take the place of the fish inspector. This particular fishery guardian, a personal friend of mine and a hotelkeeper, was appointed in place of a man who should have been the fish inspector. Of course a Tory government was in power, and they have a right to appoint their own friends; I am not complaining about that. I do want to say to the minister, however, that in the middle of the fishing season, when there were fish to be inspected, they allowed the retirement of the regular inspector and instead of calling for applications or appointing a temporary inspector who would know a codfish from a haddock, the minister appointed as fishery guardian a man who had practically never seen a codfish, except on his hotel dining room table. Why was that done?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Does the hon. member refer to Evans?

Mr. DUFF: I am referring to the retirement of Mr. Evans.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am informed he was not an inspector who inspected pickled fish; he was not qualified to do that, and never did qualify.

Mr. DUFF: Surely that is not an answer to my complaint. Mr. Evans was an official of the department for twenty-five years. During that time he certainly inspected fish.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not according to my information; he was an inspector, grade 1, and was not required to inspect fish.

Mr. DUFF: Grade 1 is certainly the highest grade in inspectorship.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is the lowest.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Evans certainly inspected fish, because I have seen him doing it with my own eyes and to my own knowledge. I have been there at the time. Anyone who says Mr. Evans did not inspect fish does not know what he is talking about. But even if he did not inspect fish why did the minister, upon Mr. Evans' retirement, camouflage the situation and instead of appointing a fishery inspector appoint a guardian in order to give one of his friends a job?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was only a temporary appointment; we want a grade 2 inspector, and the civil service commission is at the present time filling the position.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad that at last my protest has received some notice from the minister. If I remember correctly it was last July I wrote the minister about it, after receiving protests against the appointment by fishermen at Blandford and Mill Cove. I wrote the minister, and received a number of letters from him in which he tried to excuse the department and excuse himself for appointing this hotelkeeper not as a fishery inspector but as a guardian. That was a time when the fishery inspector was needed. Why does the minister only now come along and say that he is going to have this position filled, when it should have been filled last year? I am glad to hear the position is to be filled, but surely there was no reason why this man should have been paid $1,000 per year to act as fishery guardian when men could be got to do the work for $75 a year.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS

Mrs. William McDougall, $1,200.

Mr. SPENCER: What was the position of William McDougall?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He was one of the fathers of confederation. This is the only surviving widow of that interesting group.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister give some details of the $215,500 for Ontario and Quebec?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, this information was asked for when the committee rose on a previous occasion. I promised to procure it, and now I have it before me. As it is a two page statement I could either hand it to my hon. friend or to Hansard. The figure of $116,539.45 shows the total expenditure up to February 28, of this year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister before him the details of the dredging to be done in the province of Quebec during the coming summer?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have that information in the form of a detailed statement and I suggest that I adopt the same course as I did with the other.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have no objection.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The following are the places in Ontario and Quebec where work is to be carried on:

Ontario

Abram chutes, Bayfield, Bamford island, Jersey river, Little Current, Picton (Culliver and Huff's wharf), Penetang, Point Edward, Point Edward (Canadian National wharf), Port Elgin, Prescott (government elevator), Sydenham river, Thames river, Wolfe island, Waubaushene, Port Stanley, Port Burwell, Kingsville, Sarnia (Dominion Salt Company's channel), Sarnia (elevator slip).

Quebec

Beauharnois, Boudrias creek, Lac Nominingue (Grand), Lake Temiskaming (College island), Lanoraie (Colonie des Greves), Mattagami (Bourque's rapids), Port au Saumon, River du Prince, River du Chêne, St. Eloi (Pointe a la Loup), Harricana River (lake Blouin), Harricana River (lake De Montigny), Riviere du Loup, Quebec (Napoleon wharf), St. Irenée, St. Jean, I.O., Matane.

The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) inquired as to what proportion of the amount of $215,500 devoted to Ontario and Quebec was to be spent in Ontario, and where the work was contemplated. The latest calculation is that about $93,000 will be spent in Ontario and about $105,000 in Quebec, the balance being still unalloted.

Mr. MICHAUD: Could the minister tell me what amount has been set aside for dredging in Campbellton and Dalhousie?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These allotments have not yet been made and it may be possible that there will be an item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MICHAUD: Has not the amount for Campbellton been decided?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not finally.

Mr. MICHAUD: Is any amount being considered?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The engineers are considering the matter.

Mr. MICHAUD: What amount is being considered?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot tell my hon. friend. This matter may be provided for in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MICHAUD: A newspaper report of the proceedings of the Campbellton board of trade would seem to indicate that definite information has been received from the minister. This report reads:

A letter from Hon. H. A. Stewart, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa, indicated that an appropriation of $32,000 was being considered for dredging on both sides of the deep water wharf pier, this work to provide a depth of 24 feet at low tide in the several berths on the north side of the wharf and to make the inside berths also usuable by ocean going boats.

It is very important that this work should be done early this year. As I have mentioned already, three ocean going steamers were grounded in this harbour and their cargoes had to be jettisoned with almost a complete loss to the shippers. I ask the minister to adhere to this amount of $32,000 which he seems to have in mind, or, if possible, increase it so that the channel at the mouth of the Restigouche may be made safe for ocean going steamers. This port should be in such a condition that large shippers of lumber could feel free to invite foreign ships to come in and load. Otherwise, these people will suffer great loss.

I submit that some work should be done at Dalhousie. There is a large and well organized industry at this port, which is the second winter port in the maritimes. Last year it was open for sea going ships until the last day of December. A small expenditure on this port would make it more easily available to ocean going traffic. Incidentally it will help the Canadian National Railways if these ports are able to take care of large ships. We would be able to get much of the traffic which now goes to northern Maine and which is usually taken up by rail. Greater facilities should be provided in order that our railways can secure this heavy traffic of fertilizer, automobiles and potatoes which can be handled with only a one hundred mile rail haul.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—

Architectural branch—salaries of architects, clerks of works, inspectors, draftsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $63,700.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, clerks, etc. of outside service, $366,000.

For operation and maintenance of inspection boats, $10,000.

Maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, $23,100.

National Gallery of Canada, $25,000.

National monument on Connaught Place, $100,00.

Surveys and inspections, $55,000.

Balance of expenditure for works already authorized provided amount for any one does not exceed $200, $4,500.

Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $3,000 to be expended upon any one work, $50,000—Total, $697,300.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the minister tell us if the national gallery has been enriched this year and what new pictures were purchased, the amounts paid and from whom they were purchased?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 14, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

RACE MEETINGS OF FOURTEEN CONSECUTIVE DAYS INSTEAD OF TWO SEVEN DAY PERIODS

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35 to amend the Criminal Code (Race Meetings).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MORAND: The intention of this amendment is simply to permit the present racing time of fourteen days, under the act as it stands, to be on consecutive days on which racing is permitted, instead of having twenty days intervene between the two seven-day meetings. There is no enlargement in the number of days nor in the number of meetings; as I say, it is simply to have permission for races to be held on fourteen days consecutively on such days as racing is permitted.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

IBERVILLE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. RHEAUME:

1. What is the name of the postmaster at Iberville, Quebec?
2. What is his age?
3. Is he in receipt of a salary or is he paid out of the revenue?
4. In either case, how much salary has he received per month since his appointment?
5. What were the revenues of this office for each year since 1928?
6. Is the appointment at this post office under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission?
7. If so, did the incumbent pass the examinations ordered by the Civil Service Commission?

8. Did the Civil Service Commission make a recommendation as to the appointment to this position?
9. What person did it recommend?
10. If this position does not come under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, on whose recommendation was the present incumbent appointed?
11. Is this appointment: (a) permanent, or (b) temporary?
12. When was the present incumbent appointed?
13. How long will the present incumbent remain in office?
14. Is this appointment in conformity with the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission?
15. If not, why were such recommendations not followed?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. Pierre Ernest Thuot is in temporary charge.
2. Sixty years.
3. Paid out of revenue according to regular scale.
4. From date of appointment, December 5, 1932, to June 30, 1933, $153.30 a month. Since July 1, 1933, $132.97 a month.
5. Fiscal years 1927-28, $3,992.84; 1928-29, $4,091.08; 1929-30, $4,674.08; 1930-31, $4,591.09; 1931-32, $5,028.19; 1932-33, $4,220.94.
6. Permanent appointment rests with Commission.
7. Yes. In connection with permanent appointment.
8. Yes.
9. Wilfrid Denicourt, O.A.S.
10. See answer to question 6.
11. P. E. Thuot is acting as temporary Postmaster only.
12. December 5, 1932.
13. Pending decision as to the respective qualifications of two applicants who are both returned soldiers.
14-15. Temporary transfer was effected before consideration was given to the permanent appointment by the Commission.

COLONEL G. C. MCLEAN

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. Is Colonel G. C. McLean of Norwood, Manitoba, in the employ of the federal government?
2. If so, what is his title?
3. What is his salary?
4. What are his duties?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Yes.
2. Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief for Manitoba.
3. $2,700 per annum, less the statutory deduction of 10 per cent.
4. To act for the federal Department of Labour in all matters pertaining to unemployment relief.

CANADIAN RADIO BROADCASTING COMMISSION

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Has the Radio Commission cancelled the licence of station VE9EK of Montmagny?
2. If so, when and for what reasons?
3. Were there any protests against this action by the commission, and, if so, when and to whom?
4. Is the government aware of the fact that this station is the only means of communication with the main land by the inhabitants of l'Ile aux Grues and other islands situated on the estuary of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1 and 2. On the recommendation of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, whose function it is to determine the number of broadcasting stations in Canada, the Minister of Marine did not renew the licence under which station VE9EK was broadcasting when it expired on the 31st March, 1933.

3. Yes, by a petition dated Montmagny, 19th February, 1934, addressed to the Minister of Marine.

4. Radio communication between the mainland and the Department of Public Works wire telephone system on Ile aux Grues and the adjacent islands is maintained by a radio telephone station at Montmagny which communicates with a similar station on Ile aux Grues. These two stations were established by the Department of Public Works in 1932, and are operated under their jurisdiction.

CONVENTION WITH POLAND

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Has the Canadian government had any communication with the government of Poland, or offers from the government of Poland, in connection with a commercial treaty between Poland and Canada?
2. If so, on what date?
3. What are these communications, or what offers were made by Poland?
4. Will the government inform the house just how this matter stands?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Since the establishment of the republic of Poland at the close of the great war, a number of communications have passed between the Polish and the Canadian governments respecting the question of negotiating a convention of commerce between the two countries. Hitherto it has not been found practical to conclude such a convention. Conversations are at present being carried on between the Polish Consul General in Ottawa and officials of the departments concerned with a view to examining the bases for the conclusion of a convention of commerce between Canada and Poland. No conclusions, however, have yet been reached.

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. YOUNG:

1. What is the total investment of the federal government in post office buildings throughout the dominion?
2. What rent, if any, does the Post Office Department pay for the use of these buildings?
3. What rent is paid by departments, other than the post office, for post office buildings not publicly owned?
4. What amount is paid by the Department of Public Works for fuel, light, water, janitor service, and other expenses (not including rent) on public buildings used for post office purposes?
5. What revenue is lost to the Post Office Department through the carrying of government or franked mail, free?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) approves of this question being dropped from the order paper.

Question dropped.

GOVERNMENT TRANSLATORS

Mr. ARSENAULT:

1. What are the names of the translators employed at the present time by the federal government?
2. What is the salary of each one of them and the place of residence of each one when the house is not in session?
3. What is the date of appointment of each one?

Mr. CAHAN: I think the hon. member will find an almost complete answer to this question in the return which was brought down on February 21 last and tabled on the 2nd day of March as sessional paper 137 A. With respect to the place of residence of each one of these translators when the house is not in session, I understand that the place of residence of departmental translators is Ottawa or vicinity. I have been unable to obtain any knowledge as to the place of residence of those who are employed by the House of Commons and by the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

POST OFFICES

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

1. The number of post offices in each of the following provinces with a revenue of less than $100 per annum: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.
2. The total annual cost of these offices in each province, for (a) salaries and allowances; (b) services.
3. The total annual revenue in each province derived from said offices?

[Mr. Bennett.]

WITCHEKAN AND CHITEK INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. McINTOSH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the Minister of the Interior (Department of Indian Affairs) and any person living in the Spiritwood district or elsewhere during the years 1933 and 1934 till the present time, in connection with the medical attendance given to the Witchekan and Chitek Indian Reserves located in the North Battleford electoral district.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not clear, from a reading of this motion, as to exactly what information the hon. member desires, but I may say that if it refers to correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of the Interior or the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs and others, there is no correspondence. In view of that, I think that the motion might be dropped, and if the hon. member will couch it in some other terms, if there is other information he desires, it might be brought forward again.

Mr. McINTOSH: All I wanted was the information asked for in this resolution, and if the minister says that the superintendent general has none, and there is no other correspondence in the department, that is satisfactory.

Mr. MURPHY: Speaking to the motion, I stated that there was no correspondence with the Minister of the Interior or the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; I did not speak for the department. If the hon. member will look at the motion he will see that it refers to the Minister of the Interior, Department of Indian Affairs, but not to the department, and I said there was no correspondence with the Minister of the Interior or the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. McINTOSH: Very well I will be more specific and amend the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

TITLES, HONOURS AND AWARDS

PROPOSAL THAT PRIME MINISTER REFRAIN FROM RECOMMENDING TITLES FOR CANADIANS

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Prime Minister should refrain from recommending to His Majesty the King, the granting of titles, honours and awards to British subjects resident in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me, as a member of this house, say that I approach this problem, if it may be termed one, in a state of apology, may I say, to the people of Canada. Had this house devoted more of its time to the important matters affecting the welfare of the nation than to the mere granting of titles, conditions confronting at least a million people in this country might be different to-day. It is a kind of coincidence that the resolution following mine on the order paper and moved by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) states:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Egg and Hog Grading Acts should be amended.

This shows the diversity of private members' resolutions as they appear on the order paper. One deals with the grading of agricultural products and the other, might I say, with the grading of human beings in this country. I would ask that this resolution be discussed on its merits and that the patriotic appeal should not be used as a smoke screen to cover up the implications of the policy of the government in this regard, because frankly I do not think any party in the house has a first mortgage on our national life, on the destiny that this country will inevitably reach in the years to come or in its admiration for the link that binds this dominion to the British commonwealth of nations.

At the end of last session, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), I very innocently put on the order paper a resolution, an exact replica of that moved in 1919 by a Mr. Nickle who then represented Kingston in the house. There was no secret about it; it was known by everyone from one end of the dominion to the other, and I think, in fairness to the country and to the house, the Prime Minister might just as well have waited until the representatives of the people had expressed themselves on a policy of that character. I hope even now it is not too late at least to get in respect to this particular policy a crystallization of the viewpoint of the Canadian people from one end of the dominion to the other as expressed by their representatives in this chamber. I am not unmindful of the fact that this is the last day for private members' resolutions, and that this resolution, if it is talked out to-day, will go to the churchyard with all the other private members' resolutions on the order paper, but I would ask that the government give the house an opportunity of reflecting the viewpoint of the Canadian people on this question.

Mr. NEILL: To-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, to-day. It has been said to me that some objection might be made, because of the broad implications of the resolution, to its reference to honours and distinctions. If that stands in the way of the abolition of titles in this country, I am quite ready to have the resolution amended so as to give an expression of the house on the question. Frankly, I think the Prime Minister would have been on much safer ground had he taken the action he did under peace, order and good government, because, after all is said and done, this would have satisfied the hunger of some Canadian people for titles or distinctions from their fellow citizens.

This question has already been discussed from many angles in the house during the present session, but I believe one should look at all sides of the matter. Last summer I visited many countries in Europe and I have been severely criticized because I gave what I thought was the result of my observations, a broad interpretation of what I believed was the best, the worst and the medium in the countries I visited. This afternoon I intend to deal broadly with the question. One side has been given and I intend to give the other. The question of royal prerogative is not open to discussion; it has been clearly enunciated by the Prime Minister from his viewpoint, although I would like to point out that it is not generally understood by the public that the crown, of course with one or two notable exceptions, does not act on its own initiative on questions of this description. I am not going to discuss the legal aspect of the matter, because the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) disagreed entirely with the contention of the Prime Minister, and after all is said and done, legal interpretations in the house are generally decided on votes. If the party putting forward the contention has a majority of the votes, that is the policy that is carried out.

The resolution passed in 1919 was respected by Sir Robert Borden; it was respected by Mr. Arthur Meighen for two years; it was respected by the present leader of the opposition for eight years, and it was respected by the present Prime Minister for three years. In 1919, Sir Thomas White, then Acting Prime Minister, said that the question was in the hands of the members to deal with, and I would like a repetition of that policy to-day. He said:

It is perfectly open to each member here so far as the government is concerned to vote as he may see fit. The same remark applies to members of the government.

In his policy in connection with titles the Prime Minister dispensed with the implication of the resolution that had been in effect for fifteen years. In 1929 that resolution had been in force for ten years and at that time the House of Commons by a majority of 114 to 60 refused even consideration of a motion for the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the question of titles.

I would like to quote some observations of members of the party now in power in connection with this question. The first is the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), I can just imagine my hon. friend with that magnificent voice of his saying in this house on February 14, 1929:

> This question was settled by my party in 1919, and I have heard no person in my county or in the province of Ontario express any desire to return to mediaeval times. This seems to be an innocent matter when we are asked simply to refer the question to a committee for consideration, but there may be leaders of parties who perhaps discern the psychology of the situation. In an old school book there was a verse which read like this:
> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I think the hon. member can at least be given credit for being a prophet; at any rate, in my judgment, he reflected the opinion of the majority of the party to which he belongs.

Then we have the opinion expressed by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in 1918, on May 21:

> Now before I close, let me say that I wanted to make my position clear on this question before the vote is taken. I regret very much that I felt it necessary to put myself right before this house as to why I intend to vote in a certain way when this vote is taken. I wish to say that, generally speaking, I agree absolutely with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) that not only hereditary titles but all knighthoods should be abolished in this country.

There may be some difference of opinion on the legal aspect of this matter, but I do not think there is any disagreement as to the application, at least in the past, of a policy such as has been set in motion by the government. I have always felt that the genius of leadership is not to domineer, the genius of leadership is to crystallize the opinions of your followers. I am frank to admit that this policy in the former democratic countries of Europe has been changed considerably in the last decade, seventeen of which are now under some form of dictatorship. In Warsaw last summer I made this statement; you have lost all the freedom gained since the French revolution, and you will have to fight for it all over again.

There was another member of the party now in power who expressed an opinion on titles. It is true that for some reason unknown to myself he is not a member of this house at the moment. I refer to Mr. Thomas Church, who on February 13, 1929, said:

> It was pointed out by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) who is now one of the leading front benchers in this parliament, that if we wanted to give titles in Canada we should give them to those who served in the trenches for $1.10 a day and to the mothers and widows of those who fought and fell in France and Flanders. Those are the people who should be honoured. How does the government honour those people? Do they get titles? Yes to the poor house.

Now there is something to be said for war decorations—I speak now of course of the three main decorations. They were democratic and there was only one way to get them; that was by going to war. I think it can fairly be said that they could not be bought, as titles have been bought in countries other than this. The recent honours list is predicated upon the fact of class distinction. To substantiate that I will read a statement by Mr. Lloyd George in the House of Commons in Great Britain on July 17, 1922. He stated:

> As I have pointed out, in recent years there has been a new order, upon which a very large number of men have been put of the working and lower middle classes, who certainly could make no contribution to any party funds, but who have rendered service at one time or another to the state, mostly in connection with the war.

I take it the decoration he refers to is the Order of the British Empire. No doubt in England that order was bestowed on many members of the working classes and lower middle classes.

I have no objection to the present list on personal grounds. But there is nothing new in the strategy followed by the Prime Minister; it is as old as history itself. Most people who study history know that it was customary for some of the ancient tribes to put the women in front of the armies—

An hon. MEMBER: Like the C.C.F.!

Mr. MITCHELL: —not so that they should be shot but for the purpose of preventing the enemy shooting at the men behind them.

As to our judges, I have often expressed the opinion to my own people that in this dominion a man appearing before a court of law on a criminal charge gets probably as fair treatment as in any country under the canopy of heaven. I believe that no honour that can be given to a man could be higher than to be appointed to the bench of this country. By granting titles to two of its members I do not believe the Prime Minister has raised the status of the judiciary. Judgeships cannot be purchased as titles have been purchased. It is quite possible that in the appointment of some of the junior judges politics do enter into the question, but on no occasion within my memory has the finger of scorn been pointed at any judge because of the allegation that he was appointed on the basis of payment for his appointment.

It must be obvious to all who read the signs of the times that a revolution in thought is taking place in this country. I think it is fair to say that the direction of that thought is against the creation of class distinctions among the Canadian people. I believe the policy adopted by the Prime Minister fundamentally lends itself to trading and abuse. The revelations as to the sale of honours during the Lloyd George regime in Great Britain clearly indicated how corrupt the granting of honours had become. It made possible the accumulation of a huge campaign fund that the Liberals there, or what is left of them, have fought over ever since. In substantiation of my statement that such a condition existed I quote Lord Carson. Speaking in the House of Lords, he said:

> I have had more than once in my chambers to advise on cases in which I have examined long correspondence which showed that there was a regular brokerage, however conducted, for the purpose of carrying out and obtaining honours.

If that is not sufficient I will quote another man who I believe is a good Conservative, the Duke of Northumberland, of coal fame. He said:

> It has come to his knowledge that there was a considerable number of persons in this country who wrote to other people saying they were authorized to approach them with a view to their obtaining an honour in exchange for a contribution to the party funds. He had several of these letters in his possession and he could produce them if necessary.

I think that clearly indicates one of the main objections of the Canadian people to the granting of titles. Who ever heard of a workingman or a farmer getting a title? Of course it is not done; one need not argue that point because it is so obvious. Then I should like to quote another authority, and this will be appreciated by those who have read the works of the late Lord Bryce. I am going to refer to that profound study of modern democracy, his American Commonwealth, which I think is one of the best analyses of governmental institutions ever written. This is what he says:

> It may seem a paradox to observe that a millionaire has a better and easier social career open to him in England than in America. Nevertheless there is a sense in which this is true. In America, if his private character be bad, if he be mean, or openly immoral, or personally vulgar, or dishonest, the best society may keep its doors closed against him. In England great wealth, skilfully employed, will more readily force these doors to open. For in England great wealth can, by using the appropriate methods, practically buy rank from those who bestow it; or by obliging persons whose position enables them to command fashionable society, can induce them to stand sponsors for the upstart, and force him into society, a thing which no person in America has the power of doing. To effect such a stroke in England the rich man must of course have stopped short of positive frauds, that is, of such frauds as could be proved in court. But he may be still distrusted and disliked by the elite of the commercial world, he may be vulgar and ill-educated, and indeed have nothing to recommend him except his wealth and his willingness to spend it in providing amusement for fashionable people. All this will not prevent him from becoming a baronet, or possibly a peer, and thereby acquiring a position of assured dignity which he can transmit to his offspring. The existence of a system of artificial rank enables a stamp to be given to base metal in Europe which cannot be given in a thoroughly republican country.

In connection with the United States might I say this: The only way an individual in that country can perpetuate his name, if he be a rich man, is by making some contribution to education or by adding to the numerous foundations that exist in that country, which I think all will agree have at least contributed something to the life of the country and to civilization. I might mention the Rockefeller foundation, the Carnegie foundation and the Russell Sage foundation, and I could go on almost indefinitely.

The Prime Minister may have his own opinions and may express them in an elaborate manner, but I should like to read a passage from Toronto Saturday Night of January 27, 1934, contained in a London letter written under the nom de plume of P. O'D.

> Everyone over here—everyone English, that is—seems to be very pleased at the reappearance of Canadian names in the honours list. That is natural enough, for the manufacture of titles is a conspicuous British industry, and, like every other industry, it is keen to extend its export market, and welcomes the removal of embargoes. So a great many complimentary things are being said about the courage of Premier Bennett in coming to this decision, though one is inclined to wonder how much of it is courage, and how much the natural desire of a political leader to reward distinguished henchmen in an easy and inexpensive manner. Even Mr. Mackenzie King, if and when he comes to power again, should find it very useful, in spite of his present opposition. And, anyway, he can hardly reverse the decision. To refuse titles again would smack of absurdity.

As a matter of fact, we Canadians are not nearly so democratic a people as we like to fancy ourselves. There are a lot of us who long for titles—oh, just to please our wives, of course!—and a lot more who enjoy addressing their acquaintances as "Sir William"—

You will remember old Sir William.

—or "Lord Thingumbob," as the case may be. And, as for the "Lady This's" and "Lady That's," they simply revel in it, and so do their friends.

Since that is the case—and how much it is the case anyone can easily judge by watching Canadian society in London,—

I think they would be better back here giving us a hand.

—or anywhere else for that matter—Mr. Bennett possibly did a sensible thing in recognizing the situation and meeting it. But even British newspapers express the hope that a little more care will be exercised in the future distribution of titles to Canadians than was exercised in the past. Now that the market has been opened again, they don't want to see it spoiled.

In my judgment this puts the situation very clearly and reflects a very human point of view. I do not think any power on earth can prevent the abuse of this power of creating artificial class distinctions in this country. Perhaps I might mention a story that runs through my mind and which will be familiar to students of Dickens. At the moment I have forgotten the book in which it appears, but it refers to this very point. There was an old chap who eventually reached his deathbed and who had bragged considerably during his lifetime with regard to his ancestors. He had two maiden daughters who were quite anxious to find out the old chap's antecedents, and as he was drawing near the end they said, "Father, who was your father?" He said, "Lord knows who," and from that time on they claimed that they descended from the aristocracy of Great Britain.

My attention was directed to a remark made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) during the debate on the speech from the throne. He said something about one of the French queens who, when told that her subjects had no bread, said, "Why don't they eat cake?" I think the attitude of the government in regard to this matter is somewhat akin to the attitude of that French queen. What thousands of people in this country want is to retain title to their homes, to get title to a job or an order for their next meal. About the only orders they have been granted since this government have been in power have been the orders given out by the relief officers from one end of the country to the other. I think the time and energy of the government would have been better directed in devising ways and means of providing more and better jobs.

My time is nearly up, but I want to say this in all humility: I was born in England, and I know something about class distinction. Some in this country may boast of their forbears, but I think most of our ancestors came to this great land because they thought it offered better opportunities than the older countries in Europe. I think this might be truthfully said of most of the people who have settled in Canada, and it is nothing to be ashamed of. It takes some courage—and I have passed through it—to pull up stakes in your own land, leave your friends and go to a new country. I do not believe any man or woman should decry their humble origin; I think anyone who does so expresses the height of snobbishness. I think I express the opinion of the Canadian people when I say that they do not desire to be graded. We pride ourselves, as I think anyone who has travelled this world will agree, on our good fellowship and democratic impulses. I want to say this about Great Britain:

Why should Great Britain lag behind Canada and the United States? Hereditary titles are ludicrously out of date in any modern democracy, and the sooner we sweep away all the gimcracks and gewgaws of snobbery the better.

These are the words of that very able old sailor who made possible, from a naval viewpoint, the winning of the last great war. I refer to Lord Fisher, known as Jackie Fisher of the British navy. He goes on to say:

The fount of so-called honour has become a deluge, and the newspapers are hard put to it to find room for even the spray of the deluge. The war has not begotten simplicity and austerity in this respect. On the contrary, it has made what used to be a comedy a screaming farce. There was a time when the birthday honours list could be printed on one day, but it is now a serial novel.

I hope that in this country we are not coming to that.

The first chapter of the latest birthday list was long, but the Times warned us that it was only "the first of a series which already threatens to outlast the week—quite apart from the gigantic Order of the British Empire."

I did not intend to speak so long, but I shall close with that quotation from the words of a very fine old gentleman. I could quote opinions of Conservatives and Liberals, and of newspapers from one end of the dominion to the other. I believe those opinions should represent the crystallization of the viewpoint of the people in their respective communities, which in my opinion is absolutely opposed to the policy which has been set in motion by the Prime Minister. I would ask that hon. members be given an opportunity this afternoon to reflect that which, in my judgment, is the viewpoint of the Canadian people on this particular matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it might be well to direct the attention of this house to the terms of the resolution, after having listened to the speech made this afternoon. It is:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Prime Minister should refrain from recommending to His Majesty the King, the granting of titles, honours and awards to British subjects resident in Canada.

The resolution is that this house should advise the Prime Minister what he should do. The constitutional rule is that this house condemns the Prime Minister for the action he takes. It has never been the custom in this House of Commons, and I trust never will be the custom in this house under our constitution, to endeavour to direct the government of the day as to what it should do—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: —by a vote of the chamber. If the government gives advice which is open to censure, the government disappears. It is defeated on a vote of want of confidence. I pointed out the other day—and since then there seems to be no doubt as to the soundness of my suggestion, at least from a legal viewpoint—that one house of parliament is not competent to deprive the sovereign of his prerogative, and that a resolution passed by one house is not effective for that purpose. I further point out that if it was desired to instruct the Prime Minister as to what he should do, it could be done only by the method that has been followed. I also desire to point out now that a resolution such as the one now before us does not embody the constitutional method usually employed to bring either censure or, shall I say a vote of confidence, upon the action taken by the government of the day. So much for the motion.

The speech to which we have just listened might be divided into two parts. The first was the reading of a series of quotations from those who had themselves accepted honours from the crown. Lord Bryce died a member of the Order of Merit, and a viscount. Lord Fisher was a member of the House of Lords, and also of the highest Order of the Bath. The two quotations, therefore, are not particularly relevant except as indicating that the gentlemen who used them or who made the observations were rather annoyed that the list was becoming swollen by the introduction into it of others less useful than themselves. Let us now proceed to deal with the first point that was made, that the sovereign is the fountain of honour.

In 1922, in consequence of what took place in Great Britain, a committee was set up consisting of Lord Dunedin, the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Denman, Sir Evelyn Cecil, Sir Samuel Hoare, Sir George Croydon Marks and Arthur Henderson, the present foreign minister, to consider these matters. They made a report, to part of which I should like to direct the attention of the house:

Before we go further, we think it is advisable to state clearly the position of the King as to the conferring of honours, a position as to which there can be no controversy, but which is perhaps scarcely appreciated by all who have been interested in the matter.

The King is the fountain of honour, and all grants are made by him, but in the selection of the recipients of these grants, as in other things, he is in practice to act not on his own initiative but on the advice of his ministers. The minister responsible for such advice is the Prime Minister except in certain special cases, e.g., in the cases of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, Naval, Military and Air Force honours, Orders of the Star of India and of the Indian empire, where the minister in charge tenders his advice direct. With these exceptions, and that of the Royal Victorian Order, which is a private order and is bestowed by the King alone and upon his own selection, no grant of honour is ever made by the King except upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister. Even in the case in which the King might wish that an order or a peerage should be given to a member of his own household, the recommendation would appear on the Prime Minister's list.

Then the committee divided the honours into classes.

It will tend to clearness if we make a division into classes of the honours given. There are first, those given on what we may term exceptional occasions which do not often recur; such are Coronation honours and honours in connection with the war. Secondly, there are what may be termed departmental honours, e.g., those given to civil servants in the home government departments. Thirdly, there are honours given in connection with the Foreign office, the fighting services and the India office, and honours given to persons connected with the dominions, colonies of India, as distinguished from persons connected with the United Kingdom. Lastly, there are honours given to members of the general public for service or distinction, and these may be subdivided into honours for distinction in literature, science and art, using those terms in their broadest sense, and honours given for political services.

The motion before the house would preclude the government of the day making any recommendations for recognition by the sovereign of services rendered by the most distinguished servants of the crown in this country. It would also preclude any recommendation being made with respect to those who might achieve great position in literature, art or the sciences. And, as a matter of fact, while it might well be denied by those who do so contend and insist that no such recommendation should be made, I desire to point out, as is indicated in the report, that the conferring of honours upon those who have thus achieved distinction is one of the oldest acts or prerogatives of which we have any record. While it may not be necessary that it should be done, it is a recognition by the state of services rendered to the state or to the world at large.

Now, there are those who say that this is something which should not be done. Why? As great a man as Nelson expressed his view upon it; as great a man as Lord Curzon, in our day, expressed his view upon it; as great a man as Napoleon, whom Gladstone described as the greatest man, with one exception, of whom there was record,—expressed his views when in 1802 he introduced the legion of honour. Just why there should be in connection with the conferring of honours and awards upon subjects of this country the accusation that we are creating class distinctions, I cannot understand. To say that all persons are equal is to say something which everyone knows is untrue. God has not given equal ability to all men and women. They are not all equipped with the same power of thought or with the same intellectual power. That is quite clear. The attainments of all people are not on a uniform level. It therefore follows that if some have rendered great services—and I use the word "great" in its relative sense—there should at least be no harm in a recognition of those services. For instance, turning to the names appearing on the recent list we find that many are the names of distinguished civil servants who have retired from the service. The honour thus conferred, usually, is that of Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. Sometimes if the service has been very long, as it was in the case of Joseph Pope, there has been a recognition by conferring the title of Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. There are other cases which will come readily to the minds of hon. members of this house. These were servants of the crown for fifty years and over; they retired from the service; should the government of the day be precluded from deciding that such a person should have some recognition of a special character accorded to him or her by reason of the service rendered to the state? That is all that is involved. I can readily understand the contention that what are called titles of distinction may be open to a form of criticism or of censure, but that does not apply to honours and awards. I shall say something about these later on. I ask this house whether or not it believes that a man who has served Canada faithfully, honourably and well for fifty years and over, who is retiring, having earned his superannuation, should not be recognized by the conferring upon him of the honour of a C.M.G.

I have no doubt that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was a very proud man when his sovereign honoured him by conferring upon him the C.M.G. He is an entirely different man from myself if he would not be proud of it. He had earned it by distinguished service to the state. He had been Deputy Minister of Labour and had rendered very peculiar service in particular ways. The prime minister of the day recommended to the governor general of the day that he should request the sovereign to honour him with a C.M.G. Did he earn it? Was he entitled to it? Why should he not receive that honour? Why should not the prime minister confer that recognition upon him? I could give the house countless other instances.

Take the case of women. At the end of the war there was available for distribution among the women of Canada a large number of honours and awards, but the resolution moved in this house was acted upon and they were not thus honoured. Many of them have since died. There were men whose names were on the list and who would have been honoured but who have since died without recognition. In the list to which reference has been made appeared the names of women who were upwards of seventy years of age, some of them being between seventy and eighty. For fifty long years they had continued to give leadership in their communities in social activities. They did it without reward or hope of reward. It does not hurt their position in the community to say that they should receive recognition by their sovereign conferring upon them a slight honour, making them a Commander of the Order of the British Empire or a member of the Order of the British Empire. This is a recognition for a lifetime of work for humanity. What is more, I know of not a single one of those who have been named who is not proud of the honour thus conferred. The communities in which they live have been proud that they have been thus honoured. Their fellow-citizens who accorded to them the positions which they held with such public esteem in this democracy are proud that these men and women have had these honours conferred upon them. Was the recognition such that there should be censure of the government of the day? The hon. member for East Hamilton referred to the occasion which arose in Great Britain in connection with alleged abuses in this regard.

Leaving this for the moment, I recall what Kipling has said in one of his stories. The fact that men and women in the public service realize that at the end of a long life of untiring effort and useful service they may have some slight recognition by the head of the state has promoted ambition among men and women in every part of the British world. This has proved a stimulant to effort, particularly in India. Hon. members will recall that Kipling refers to the men and women who are striving to serve the state, hoping that at the end of their service they may be honoured with a C.S.I. or C.I.E. They seek to attain this recognition not because they value the honour as a class distinction but because it means the seal of approval of the head of the state upon the character of the service rendered.

Take literature, for instance. I doubt if there is an hon. member who is not familiar with the story of Lord Tennyson. They will recall that Mr. Gladstone offered him a baronetcy and that he finally agreed to accept it during a long cruise in the Mediterranean. Lord Tennyson gave the reasons why he accepted this recognition.

Most hon. members will remember that distinguished scientist, Mr. Rutherford, at one time professor at McGill. He was honoured by his sovereign for the great contribution he had made to science, and he is now Lord Rutherford. Take art. What hon. member does not recall Lord Leighton, the president of the Royal Academy? They will recall the joy with which the conferring of this peerage was received. Take medicine. Who does not recall the honour conferred upon Lord Dawson of Penn and upon Lord Horder. In these cases the state was giving slight approval for a long lifetime of effort in preventive medicine.

Take our own country. Who is not familiar with the life of Sir George Cartier and the recognition accorded to him and to Macdonald? They will recall the ultimate action taken in conferring a baronetcy. Who does not recall the position taken by men in days gone by with respect to honours conferred in the maritime provinces, in upper Canada, and upon members of the judiciary and of other walks of life? It was felt that they should not accept these honours for the purpose of class distinction but that they should receive recognition from the head of the state for the services they had rendered to the whole state.

For instance, take the knighthood conferred upon the head of the meteorological service in this country by the Duke of Connaught as a farewell honour. Who does not remember the circumstances? Does any hon. member for one moment recall Mr. Stupart as a man of money or as a man who made any pretence to money? He had no claim to fame other than that which came from the contribution he made to the welfare of his fellows through long years of service. He received a knighthood from his sovereign, a recognition of the service rendered by the man to the state.

When I hear laughing in the house, when I hear an hon. member rise in his place and compare this matter to the motion of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) with respect to the grading of hogs, I say it does him no credit and is a reflection and an insult upon the citizenship of this country. It indicates that much midnight oil has been burned in the preparation of a speech that had to be delivered while this motion was still upon the order paper.

It has been said that the government of the day took action at a very inopportune time. If hon. members will take the trouble to peruse that list and consider the service which has been rendered during the last three and a half years of this great depression by those whose names appear thereon, I think perhaps they will modify their judgment. Was there class distinction with respect to any of those names? It is true that one of them was a messenger in the governor general's office, whose faithfulness, loyalty and devotion to duty for nearly half a century—I think, for over thirty years—warranted in my judgment his receiving the approval of the head of the state for services thus rendered.

Take the names of women who in these days of stress, in these terrible days, have been caring for the poor, looking after those who could not care for themselves, going down into the slum sections of cities, looking after babies and mothers, engaging in prenatal work with respect to children, the feeding of them and caring for them—the recognition of such work by the state was intended to be, what in fact it is, the placing of the approval of the head of the state upon unselfish services rendered to humanity. That is what it was; that is what it is, and that is what has been done. I ask this house to name a single instance, in that list of names, in which the service rendered has not been service of which any Canadian would be proud that another Canadian should have rendered.

Why is it that from every part of this country people come together from long distances, as they did the other day, to honour one of our fellow Canadian women, who was recognized very slightly it is true, from the standpoint of values; but people came from great distances, fifty, sixty, one hundred miles to pay tribute to this woman—why? Not because she had received an O.B.E. or an M.B.E., but because they saw, in the recognition by the state, what they had themselves long ago recognized, namely, fitness to lead, the willingness to serve, the understanding mind, the willingness to care for those afflicted or suffering from lack of food, of shelter or of clothing. Go to the city of Montreal, go into this community, and ask yourselves whether or not it is a proper exercise of the prerogative of the crown, on the advice of the responsible minister, that such recognition should be given. That is what I put to this house.

As to the suggestion that this is class distinction, well, I once heard Mr. Bonar Law say that it was difficult to explain why men, shaped and formed in a general way alike, why women, shaped and formed in a general way alike, should be so different in their qualities, so different in their expression, so different in the character of service they could render to their day and generation. And yet it has been so and will be so. Neither you nor I, sir, can change it; it has been so throughout the ages. The vision, the prescience that enabled Rutherford to discover what he did discover was honoured by his sovereign. The vision of Newton, of Davy, of Lister, who received a peerage for his services—all these must flash upon one's mind; and in this country, if we have rendered too tardy recognition to those who have served us, I say that this is the time to realize that in the days of dark depression, when men and women have been willing to go out and devote themselves without thought of self; to toil without thinking of the effect upon their own lives, without thinking of good times, without thinking of leisure or of enjoyment of wealth—if they have been willing to do all this for their fellows, why should this House of Commons say that it should not be done?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Has it come to this, has the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Mitchell) reached the point where he is wholly oblivious to whether or not he receives the recognition of his fellows for his services? Has he reached that altruistic state where he does not care whether he is acclaimed or frowned upon for what he has done? It is so easy to arouse prejudice and class distinctions, yet at the same time for people to put their tongues in their cheeks and say, "How willing we would be to accept these things, only we want to be against them until we do."

Listen to the further charge that has been made, that this is an instance in which women's names have appeared on the list of honours and awards, while the names of men have not, because we desire to follow a practice of old, that women should be shot at rather than that men should be killed. There is in this house a rule, which I am bound to say is sometimes more honoured in the breach than in the observance, against remarks of this kind. Is it the sort of thing that conduces to high citizenship to have such remarks made, to classify your fellow citizens as hogs, to grade them as such? For that is what this does, when it is suggested that the government of the day made a recommendation to the sovereign for the purpose of enabling men to be protected by the destruction of women. That is the story.

I just want to say one word more. To circumscribe or limit the power of a government may be done by the method now suggested, and not for a moment do I say that it cannot be done. If a majority of the house votes that the government of the day is not to do as it has done, then of course obviously the government that does so asks for its own dismissal. But on the other hand that is not the practice. The practice is to censure for actions that are affirmative and not to give negative advice to governments as to what they should do. That has not been the practice of the House of Commons or of governments. I am not going to traverse to-day the ground I have traversed before. That discussion, I think, would serve no useful purpose. The right hon. gentleman, during the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation, passed an order in council conferring the title "Honourable" upon the Lieutenant Governors of the provinces, both those who had been, those who were and those who were to be. That of course was an exercise of the prerogative; it could only be done by it in this dominion. And in the sheets that are issued governing such matters there appear at the top the well known words with regard to titles in Canada. The words used at the head of the list are, "Table of titles to be used in Canada." The conferring of the title Honourable upon the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island instead of "His Honour," as he had theretofore been addressed, was an exercise of the prerogative. Now what is the difference between the exercise of that prerogative, the advice of the Prime Minister that Mr. John Smith shall hereafter be known as the Honourable John Smith for life and the conferring upon any man or woman—except two in the list last put forward on the first of January—of any title that gave no precedence, no place, no position but was merely the recognition by the head of the state, on the advice of the Prime Minister of the day, of services rendered to the state? It is not a question of rich people, not a question of the money they have; if the prerogative is exercised on advice that is not right, on advice that is, shall I say, clearly upon the face of it such as should not be given, then this house has the power at once to censure and destroy the government that does it. But what the House of Commons is asked to do here, in this declaration which is so unfair, is to say to the Prime Minister of the day, "You must not recommend any citizen of Canada in the public service, or any citizen engaged in social service or in any work that is being done for Canada—you must not recommend them for recognition." That is what is asked, and I protest against any such motion being passed. I protest against that power which must lodge in all governments being thus circumscribed and limited.

I go further. We said in 1926 that we were autonomous communities; we repeated this in 1930 and we said that we were united together by common allegiance to the crown. The crown is the symbol of our unity, of the unity of the British Empire, and that crown in every part of the empire exercises, on the advice of its responsible ministers, its prerogative to confer upon its subjects such recognition as the character of their services demands. Shall Canada be the only country whose ministry is precluded from doing that? Shall there be recognition of the services of British subjects in every part of the world except Canada? Shall the Canadian House of Commons say that the Prime Minister shall refrain from making recommendations when prime ministers of the other dominions can make recommendations on behalf of their citizens? Are we to be the only community that is failing to recognize services rendered to the state, to humanity, to the country itself? That is the question.

I do not intend to take up time in further discussing this matter. I intend to leave it, as I think it should be, under the understanding that the hon. gentleman has of procedure, to be determined as he suggests, but I do say this: No Prime Minister who accepts the responsibility of his office and who believes his fellow citizens are worthy of recognition as are citizens in the other parts of the empire, can become a party to a resolution that deprives such citizens of recognition by their sovereign. The common allegiance that we owe to the crown is manifested in many ways and one of the many ways in which it is manifested is that the crown itself, on the advice of the responsible minister, may recognize the services of its subjects, whether men or women, who in time of stress and strain spend themselves and their fortunes for their fellows, who do so unselfishly without reward or hope of reward, or who render high judicial services or great services as public servants. It should not be denied to the prime minister of the day, whoever he may be, to make such recommendations as will enable the head of the state, on the advice of his ministers, in the exercise of the royal prerogative to recognize services thus rendered to the country. I would support that power in the hands of the right hon. gentleman opposite; I would support that power in the hands of any prime minister who must be responsible to this house and the country for the manner in which it is exercised, and I would court the closest criticism, the closest analysis of the manner in which that power has been exercised. It was exercised at that particular time for the special reasons that I have mentioned, namely, that when that service was being given at the time it was most needed, the crown, speaking on the advice given to it by its ministers, itself recognized that service as worthy of the recognition of this country. Upon those grounds this government has made those recommendations and I protest against any limitation being imposed by resolution of this house upon any government thus recognizing services whether they be on the bench or at the bar, whether they be in the world of science or of social effort, whether they be an improvement on slum conditions in which men and women live or the preservation of child life. Whatever or wherever that service be, whether it be in the house or out of it, I protest against any government being deprived of power to recommend that such service to Canada be recognized by the crown which is the sign and symbol of our common allegiance.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the country is interested in listening to a prolonged debate on the merits of the question of the restoration of titles in Canada. What the country wishes to know is what this House of Commons feels on the matter, and what the country will expect of the government is that it will give the House of Commons the right to vote on this question. As no one is better aware than Your Honour, the rules of the house provide that if a debate takes place on a Wednesday afternoon on a resolution by a private member and the debate is not concluded by six o'clock, then the resolution goes to the bottom of the list of private members' resolutions that prior to that time have been discussed and in all probability will not be reached again during the session. That being the case, unless the Prime Minister is prepared to say that he will set apart a day when this resolution will be taken up again and the debate resumed upon it so that a vote may be taken in the house, I think I would ask all hon. members on this side to refrain from further participation in the discussion in order that we may come to a vote at the earliest possible moment.

I myself will follow that course by replying simply in one or two words to what the Prime Minister has said with respect to the matter of procedure. It will be recalled that when my right hon. friend took the step of recommending to His Majesty the restoration of the granting of titles in Canada, he did so on the ground that an address from this house to His Majesty with respect to an important matter such as that of titles was not the proper way to proceed; that such procedure was an indignity to His Majesty. I believe the Prime Minister was wrong in that. I shall give just one quotation to indicate what I believe it was that actuated the House of Commons in 1919 to proceed by a resolution in the form of an address to His Majesty with respect to this matter. The quotation is from Redlich. The Procedure of the House of Commons, 1907, volume 2, page 246, as follows:

> It is, of course, impossible to enumerate all cases in which an address is appropriate. There is no definite sphere of applicability; the common element is a desire on the part of the house, as representing the nation, to record its views on some events in a peculiarly impressive manner. This may be desirable as to events both of domestic and of foreign concern. There seems to be only one direction in which any limitation has been laid down; no address may be presented in relation to any bill depending in either house.

There is no doubt that when hon. members of this house last spoke on this matter, they adopted the form of presenting an address because, as Redlich says, in their opinion that was the most impressive manner of presenting a matter which the house deemed of great concern to the country.

The Prime Minister, as I said, was opposed to that method, took exception to what had been done and proceeded with the restoration of titles on the score that that had not been the proper method for the House of Commons to follow and that a resolution of this kind applied to the parliament that passed it and that he could not be bound by what any previous House of Commons may have been bound by. He was then asked very pointedly by an hon. member on this side, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), what was the proper method of procedure, and I purpose to give, because I think it has governed the action of the hon. member who has introduced the resolution in the form and words in which he has introduced it, the answer which the Prime Minister made to that question. I am reading from Hansard of January 30, 1934, at page 99:

> Mr. Euler: If instead of requesting the sovereign directly not to exercise its prerogative, the House of Commons had expressed its desire that the Prime Minister himself should not make any recommendation, would the Prime Minister in that case feel himself bound?
> Mr. Bennett: The hon. member is coming to the point I was about to make. Rarely have I found an argument adduced against a position I have taken which so completely supported my position as that taken yesterday by the right hon. gentleman. He argued—

That was a reference to my own remarks at the time.

> —that this House of Commons is a body from which I derive authority as leader. That is true. But it was not the house of 1919 from which I derived authority; it was not the House of Commons of 1919 which permitted me to stand in this place in the house.

Now I ask hon. members to follow closely the following sentence:

> This house would be within it constitutional rights if it passed a resolution asking the Prime Minister to make no further recommendations during the life of this parliament for titular distinction of any person domiciled in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeated that a minute ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Having made the statement I have just read, the Prime Minister opened the discussion this afternoon by saying that this is an entirely wrong way of proceeding, that the proper procedure is to censure the government that has done or is doing a wrong thing. Now, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house: What would the Prime Minister have said had the hon. member taken the course which he now suggests should be taken? Had the hon. member asked Your Honour to allow him to drop his resolution so that in going into supply he might move that all the words after "that" be struck out and that in their place should be inserted, "this house is of the opinion that no titles should be granted during the life of the present parliament," or other words declaratory of its opposition against the granting of titles, the Prime Minister would immediately have said, This is not the way to proceed, this is an expression of want of confidence in my government, and I ask the hon. members who are supporting me in this house to reject a motion of that kind as a motion of censure on the administration. He would, in support of that contention, immediately have said: Did I not on the 30th of January point out to the house the correct method of procedure? The Prime Minister would also ask: Did I not say, this house would be within its constitutional rights if it passed a resolution asking the Prime Minister to make no further recommendations during the life of this parliament for titular distinction of any person domiciled in Canada? The purpose of the right hon. gentleman is obvious. He is determined that at all costs this house shall not have an opportunity to express its view on this question, because he knows that as respects the granting of titles the view of this house is similar to the view that is held from one end of this country to the other; it is one of opposition to the bestowal of titles in Canada.

The Prime Minister in the course of his remarks took exception more particularly to the fact of the resolution containing the words "honours and awards." May I answer that in just a sentence? The hon. member who has moved the resolution has said to the house this afternoon, and to the Prime Minister directly, that he is quite prepared to have his resolution amended by striking out the words "honours and awards," that indeed he would prefer to have it so amended.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not hear him say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, he did, and may I say now to the Prime Minister that if it will help to expedite a vote on this matter this afternoon every hon. member on this side will agree to an amendment deleting the words "honours and awards" thereby confining the vote to the question of the granting of titles as generally understood. That is the position in a nutshell. What we believe the country is interested in is preventing the restoration of titles in Canada as that term is commonly understood, titles designated by the prefix "Sir." What may be said with respect to honours and awards is open to debate, and to different points of view, but as far as Canada to-day is concerned I believe the feeling among all classes is entirely opposed to the restoration in this country of titular distinctions of the kind I have mentioned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that every opportunity may be given for this matter to come to a vote this afternoon I shall not detain the house by further remarks but will ask the Prime Minister to grant the house the opportunity for a vote on this question either this afternoon or before the session is over.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. BENNETT: Question.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): I think, Mr. Speaker, considering my silence in this house for some years, that hon. gentlemen on the other side should grant me the privilege of a few remarks. They can see by the clock that it is not possible for me, nor is it my desire, to talk the motion out. But remembering 1929, and knowing as a former school teacher that the child is father to the man, and watching the faces of the leader of the official opposition and the ex-Minister of Justice to-day and in 1929, it would look as though they think they are doing a great stroke of politics in the country. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition leader never fails to say "the country"; what "the country" is thinking. I shall relieve his mind right now, as well as that of the ex-Minister of Justice.

Mr. EULER: You are almost right.

Mr. SPOTTON: Watching the leader of the opposition from day to day, reading his discourses throughout the country in which he reminds everyone that he is the grandson of his grandfather—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPOTTON: —and suggests that, by virtue of having such an illustrious ancestor, destiny has ordained him to be premier of this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: He certainly will be.

Mr. SPOTTON: —in fact he implies that it was only by a momentary mistake of judgment on the part of the people in 1930 that he was given a well-earned rest, I observe with what confidence he turns to his followers to-day and assures this house that he speaks for every one of them in stating that there will be no delay in allowing this matter to come to a vote.

I well remember the by-election in 1927 when he came to my riding and ridiculed the idea of my attempting to gain a seat in the House of Commons, because I had no leader at the moment. I had an estimable house leader, who was an honour to the Conservative party, but the leader of the opposition ridiculed the idea of my attempting to obtain a seat; he asked whether I was going to follow the man from Fort William or from Calgary or Guelph or where; as though a man "born in the image" should not and dare not enter this house unless he had a leader born with an illustrious historical tradition. I want to tell the leader of the opposition that there is no such slavery on this side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPOTTON: My leader is big enough to allow his followers to have convictions on this or any other question, and to vote as they please. I wish to say to the ex-Prime Minister that I made a speech in this house in 1929; it has been largely quoted, it was a short speech, and assure him that I stand to-day just where I stood then.

An hon. MEMBER: You will not after the next election.

Mr. SPOTTON: I have turned no somersault, and I assure him I am no Wobbling Willie. In his address in this house the other day the leader of the opposition told us again where he stood, but when I have finished reading the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman on a previous occasion I will ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to tell me where he stood then. I quote from Hansard, 1929, at page 78:

> Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): Whatever views one may entertain with respect to titles, I think that the form in which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has presented his motion is one which ought to commend itself to the house. The hon. member has asked for a committee to reconsider a resolution which was adopted by the house some time ago. He has pointed out that notwithstanding that the resolution precludes His Majesty from conferring titular distinctions and honours upon his own subjects domiciled in Canada, nevertheless the heads of foreign countries are in a position to confer such honours, and apparently have been conferring them, and that these honours are being worn by British subjects domiciled in this country. That of itself is a matter which is deserving of investigation, and it might be well worth while to have a committee of the house look into that phase as well as others.

Just ponder these words, Mr. Speaker, and tell me the position taken by the right hon. gentleman when he was clothed with all the powers of prime minister:

> If we are to have no titles, titular distinctions or honours in Canada, let us hold to the principle and have none, let us abolish them altogether; but if the sovereigns or heads of other countries are to be permitted to bestow honours on Canadians, for my part I think we owe it to our own sovereign to give him that prerogative before all others.

Now can anyone tell me whether the right hon. gentleman was going or coming?

Mr. YOUNG: How did he vote?

Mr. SPOTTON: He voted to have this matter go to a committee, as my leader did. My leader has been consistent, and I leave to the house the question of the consistency of the right hon. gentleman opposite. Then my right hon, friend went on, and I think this gives a true picture of him:

> The committee might go into all these matters. What I wish to point out at the moment is that there are anomalies in the present situation which have arisen out of the resolution, and without expressing my own view, I at the moment should like to have the matter looked into by a committee of the house. So far as the government is concerned, we are quite prepared to have the resolution adopted.

Several other hon. gentlemen spoke; there was a hurried consultation and then they put up Bonnie Prince Charlie, who said:

> I would not have spoken at this time were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), who endeavoured to put into the mouth of the Prime Minister words which he did not utter, and endeavoured to attribute to the Prime Minister a desire to see titles restored in this country. Not only do the Prime Minister's own words not permit of that construction, but I am in a position to say, knowing every member of the government, that not one member of the government is in favour of restoring titles in Canada, and the Prime Minister least of all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPOTTON: It may be all right to call "question" but I have been in company as fast as this for thirty years, and it will not perturb me a bit. Continuing, Mr. Dunning said:

> My own view is that this committee should not be appointed.

This was after the then Prime Minister whispered to him and there had been a sudden gathering of the clan in and around the curtains. Evidently it was thought that it would be better strategy to oppose the resolution. Mr. Dunning went on:

It is very evident—I am not impugning in any way the motives of my hon. friend for St. Lawrence-St. George—that an effort will be made to convey the impression in the committee, if it is appointed, just as my hon. friend from North Huron did in his address a few moments ago—and so on. I am not going to pursue this matter at length—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPOTTON: I have seen occasions when hon. gentlemen opposite were not so anxious to have questions put, and I have assured hon. gentlemen that I am not atempting to talk out this resolution. My attitude is the same as it was in 1930; I have taken no somersault. I am going to support this resolution, but if I thought for a moment that the opposition considered that there was even a tinge of want of confidence in this government in my so doing I would gladly vote against it. Had this resolution come from the official opposition, instead of from a group in whom I have great confidence and for whom I have great respect—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPOTTON: I hear some hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear"; they seem very happy, but you never know where they are. I heard them in this house say—I think it was last session, in connection with the Sun Life bill—that they did not know a bill was coming up. They held not only one but two caucuses to discuss the matter, and then came here blandly and stated that they were absolutely taken by surprise. The former Prime Minister, while speaking in my county, wabbled as he is wabbling here to-day; I heard him state that he was in favour of the abolition of the Senate, that the appointments he had made were made with strings attached, and that he, like Bunty, could pull the strings whenever he wished. He had a living example on the platform at Exeter, in the person of the late Senator McCoig, who said that was true, that he was appointed in that way. I heard the right hon. gentleman say in 1925 that he had a great deal of beneficent legislation in the back of his head but that he had not a clear majority in parliament. "Give me a clear majority in parliament and I will produce the legislation," he said. He came back with even less of a majority, but he was still imbued with the spirit of the divine right to rule, and he hung on despite the fact that his majority had vanished.

In this matter, Mr. Speaker, I stand where I have always stood. I remember the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), twitting me in those days, in his eminent legal fashion. He said he would be glad to come into my constituency and lay the case before my constituents; he said that doubtless they were highly intellectual, and they are. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

I would go on the platform . . . and point out . . . that the nurse who attends her diphtheria patients, the policeman who risks his life to protect the lives of others, and the boy who jumps from the wharf to save the child who has fallen into the water and is drowning, cannot in Canada receive the recognition and approval of His Majesty for the valiant deed done for the good of humanity.

If I had ever heard of a policeman, a boy or a nurse who received a title I would have been constrained to have supported titular distinctions in Canada. I can only refer my constitutents to my speech which was put in every home in 1929. That is where I stood then, and it is where I stand to-day. Big men have refused to accept titles, and little men should not be given them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, so that I may not too long delay the house I shall take only three or four minutes. In my opinion the doing of a good and unselfish deed is its own reward. Any one, whether a man or a woman, who does a good deed in order that he or she be rewarded by some string of letters after a name, or a group of letters before, is not worthy of recognition. It is true that all "good men and true" have the reward of being respected and admired in their own communities. That, I think, is inevitable. It is a just reward for the good they have done and the kindnesses they have shown to others. The Prime Minister strove—and I think "strove" is the right word in this instance—to show that those who had done great things were rewarded. May I point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that the greatest Man who has lived in all time, now gone from the earth some two thousand years, had the reward only of crucifixion. He was not rewarded by titles; He was not rewarded by letters after his name, but the influence of the philosophy of love which He propounded has reached even to this date. May I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that when the Prime Minister speaking in Toronto referred to the Man of whom I am speaking as the lowly Nazarene, I was shocked.

The people of Canada are opposed to titles; we hear that everywhere in every province, and I am submitting that that is a very good reason why the sovereign should not give titles in Canada. Of course, if I thought that those twenty-three women and seven men in Canada who only lately were given letters or title were so great in fame that the king himself knew of them—well, I should be very glad indeed. My opinion is that it is not the sovereign who gives titles, except in a nominal sense; actually it is the Prime Minister of Canada. The Prime Minister gave the names of titled people whom he thought it had been well to honour. May I give three more names, for the opposite reason. The Prime Minister was very much offended that in this debate about titles hogs should have been referred to, and that calls to my mind at once the name of Sir Joseph Flavelle. And what about Sir Herbert Holt? I am not so sure that Sir Herbert Holt stands very high in the esteem and admiration of his fellows. I think he is about as good an example as I can think of at the moment of an argument against the giving of titles.

Mr. BOURASSA: But not against selling them.

Miss MACPHAIL: I hope if he bought it he paid a good price for it, because he has a lot of money which does not morally belong to him. Then, Lord Atholstan is another Canadian who has been given a title. These three examples have not inclined the people to look more kindly upon the conferring of titles in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Miss MACPHAIL: I have only one more sentence to add. The time for the restoration of titles in Canada by those who wish them could not have been more ill chosen. The Prime Minister has spoken glowingly about people living in comfortable homes and having decent salaries for themselves—although he did not elaborate too greatly on that point—having gone out into the slums having done what they could to relieve the suffering of the people there. I am not so much interested in those people, although I am thankful for their work. I am interested in the people who live in the slums. If we are going to honour any in Canada none is more deserving of it than are the mothers and fathers of families on relief who have striven to uphold the morale within their families, and have tried to keep their children looking towards a much better life.

My reason for opposing titles is that usually the wrong people get them. If the right people receive honours, those honours are given to only a few of them, because it would not be possible nor is it necessary to give titles to all in Canada who are deserving of them. The more deserving they are the more likely they would be to resent the conferring of titles upon them.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I intend to confine my remarks to a statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is just now leaving the chamber. The right hon. gentleman has complained about the restoration of titles in Canada, after the resolution of 1919. May I say to him that when he accepted the highest titular distinction, or at least one of the highest, that can be bestowed by His Majesty on the advice of His Majesty's Privy Council in England, namely the titular distinction of "right honourable," which he accepted in 1922, he was one of the first to restore titles in Canada after 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister knows that the resolution of 1919 distinctly excepted "honourable" and "right honourable."

Mr. CAHAN: If the resolution of 1919 excepted "right honourable" this resolution does not. The resolution now before us does not except even the distinction of "honourable." The title "honourable" which is given to privy councillors of Canada, to lieutenant governors and to others is given by the prerogative right of His Majesty on the advice of the government. If the resolution we are now discussing is passed in its present form, precluding the recommendation of the granting of titles to Canadians, then the titular distinction "honourable," which is a title given to privy councillors and to lieutenant governors, must go. If titles are to go, let us have no doubt as to the meaning and purpose of this resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to take a few minutes of the time of this house hoping that then we may have a vote as quickly as possible. My purpose in rising is, if possible, to clear the air in regard to this resolution. I now understand clearly that with the exception of a few hon. gentlemen on the government side of the house this House of Commons is definitely opposed to the conferring of titles. But the resolution in addition, raises the question of doing away with minor awards and honours. I therefore propose to move:

That the resolution be amended by striking out the words, "honours and awards" in the third line.

While I am on my feet I desire to avail myself of the opportunity to refer to what I regard as a specious and passion creating speech of the Prime Minister. I think it regrettable that he adopted the tone that he did. Why should we not advise the government? As members representing the interests of our constituents is it not our duty in this House of Commons to tell the government and the Prime Minister what the will of our people is in respect of this and of other questions. I think the Prime Minister went much too far when he took the ground that it was not our right to so advise the government in matters of this kind, or to put forward a resolution in the form of the present one.

Then he used the age worn argument that God did not make all men equal. But, neither did the Son of God raise to the peerage any of his humble followers. But upon one he conferred the highest end of man and that one was the thief who repented at the last moment. Since when has the government of the Prime Minister decided to award titles to repentant thieves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As far as the women about whom the Prime Minister waxed so eloquent are concerned, as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has said, in the final analysis it was not the king who awarded the title; it was his prerogative to confer the title or honourable degree upon those to whom the award was recommended by the ministry. The plea was specious throughout. I contend that the granting of titles creates a special and distinctive class, a class of petty aristocrats, a class of a presumably higher quality and type than the rest of the citizens. It is quite possible that the original recipient of the title may be possessed of certain qualities which would bring to him the respect of his fellow citizens, but I do not think it can be said that those qualities continue on to subsequent generations. In this connection I should like to ask this question: If we have hereditary titles for general services, why not hereditary surgeons? Why not hereditary mathematicians? Why not hereditary poets? Why not have these professions honoured when the supposition is that qualities of merit are continued from generation to generation?

Then who is to be the judge of service? If it is to be the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then I would reject his judgment. I ask the Prime Minister who would recommend him for a peerage. Would it be himself? I suppose he knows himself better than the rest of the country, but I should like to know.

I submit that those people in Canada who beyond all others deserve awards have not received them nor would have even if it had been possible to confer them at the time. I ask the Prime Minister what man has contributed more in our own day to the health, the happiness and the very lives of human beings than Doctor Banting, the discoverer of insulin. This discovery created a preventive and even a curative for diabetes, one of the dread afflictions of the human race. Of course upon its discovery insulin was made the property of the race, but has Doctor Banting been honoured in the latest list? He has a pension—incompatible with his social contribution.

An hon. MEMBER: He may be next time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He is the type of man who would least aspire to this sort of thing. His work was not done to receive such awards as these at the hands of the Prime Minister or anyone else. What man has contributed more to the material wealth of Canada than Doctor Saunders? This gentleman receives only a pitiful pension, very little more than a member of parliament receives. Where are his honours and high awards?

Mr. BENNETT: He received the C.M.G.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So it goes all along. There may be a few who are justly deserving of the awards made recently, but I contend that the distribution of honours and awards constitutes a distinction and the setting up of a class. And to this I am opposed. However, since hon. members think that the granting of minor awards will not do any serious damage, I am quite prepared that this be continued rather than that the resolution be defeated. In connection with hereditary titles, I should like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister and my fellow Celts to these words:

Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
"An honest man's the noblest work of God;"
And certes, in fair virtue's heavenly road,
The cottage leaves the palace far behind;
What is a lordling's pomp? a cumbrous load,
Disguising oft the wretch of human kind,
Studied in arts of hell, in wickedness refin'd!

Mr. McINTOSH: Burns knew them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, Burns knew his lords. Like the hon. member who introduced this resolution, I happen to come from a country in which we know much of the evil of lords. Burns knew them quite well when he said:

> The rank is but the guinea's stamp
> The man's the gowd for a' that.

And again:

> Yee see yon birkie ca'd "a lord,"
> Who struts, an' stares, an' a' that;
> Tho hundreds worship at his word,
> He's but a coof for a' that:
> For a' that, an' a' that,
> His ribband, star, an' a' that;
> The man o' independent mind
> He looks an' laughs at a' that.

The people of Canada look and laugh at a' that. If there is anything that will bring down upon the head of this ministry not only ridicule but loud and contemptuous laughter, it is the government's opposition to this resolution. Democracy was introduced into the world on the wings of those glorious words, "Liberty, equality, and fraternity." The government denies the idealistic principles of democracy when it deliberately opposes a resolution of this kind and attempts to press upon the people of Canada titular distinctions which will have the inevitable effect of wiping out fraternity, demolishing equality and making light of liberty.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have only a few moments left, and I cannot give an answer now.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Can you deny—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It was asked of Christ who would be the greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven. He did not answer then but washed the feet of his disciples. Who among the lords would wash the feet of their disciples? Later on Christ said: "He that is greatest among you shall be your servant." In the words of the preacher, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

The government now proposes to reintroduce into Canada through this means a reservoir of campaign funds such as that which caused a stigma and stench in the political life of Great Britain. After all, is it not an attempt of capital to bedeck itself in gaudy baubles and glittering gauds? We are to have knights, lords, dukes and earls thrust upon us. We will have none of it. The people of this great country are not going to go back to the dark ages whence this wretched form of feudalism came.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, although I have great difficulty in appreciating the analogy between the scriptural references of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) I think I could, if I so desired, show how ludicrous are certain of their comparisons.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I understood that the hon. member who preceded the hon. member now speaking moved an amendment, and you have not put it.

An hon. MEMBER: It has not been seconded.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, it was seconded. I have written on the amendment that it is seconded by Mr. Spencer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Garland moves, seconded by Mr. Spencer, that the words "honours and awards" in the third line be deleted from the resolution.

Mr. LAWSON: Continuing from the point at which I was interrupted, I am always averse to treating scriptural references either with facetiousness or with humour; hence I shall not deign to reply to that part of the statement of the hon. member. When the hon. gentleman, apparently in support of the argument which he is making, uses such general terms as "liberty, equality, and fraternity," a mere grouping of words, I cannot help but pause to point out how inapplicable they are. What is liberty? Not the right of licentiousness, not the right to do, each man as he may please, but the right of every man to exercise his own free will within certain well-defined limits prescribed by the state. And so, Mr. Speaker, I am completely at a loss to understand in what way the conferring of titles or honours or awards can have anything on earth to do with the question of liberty; and if it were not that I do not wish to delay the house I should likewise discuss equality and fraternity.

Now I hope that my hon. friends of the official opposition will not interrupt me with their calls for votes, because I assure them that if they do I shall postpone the time of that vote as long as possible, and if they do not I think I can express my views in ten minutes. I must confess that I am beginning to be a little fed up, if I may use the vernacular, with the attitude of some of my hon. friends opposite. When we had a bilingual currency resolution before the house, as soon as a few of us on this side desired to express some views, hon. gentlemen opposite were howling for a vote. When we had an unemployment insurance resolution before the house, a matter in which I and many others on this side of the house are vitally interested, the former Minister of Labour got upon his feet and twitted us on this side with not speaking to the question; but he went ahead and spoke the full forty minutes, which took up until six o'clock and prevented the rest of us from expressing our views.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) takes out of the question honours and awards, and I say without hesitation that I am favourable to the conferring of honours and awards. He still leaves us titles, and then he appeared to discuss the question as though titles meant solely hereditary titles. To my mind a title is anything which gives a man a right to have a prefix to his name other than the ordinarily accepted one of every gentleman, that of Mister, and with the possible exception of degrees conferred by universities signifying scholastic standing or something of that kind. I am one of those who are of the opinion that it is not well to create social distinctions among our people. Human nature of itself will create sufficient social distinctions; those of high education will probably not be fraternizing with those of little education. Those distinctions in social status which human nature creates we cannot avoid, I presume, but I am of the opinion that it is not well artificially to create social distinctions. On the other hand, I have a conviction which far supersedes the opinion I have just expressed. We are part and parcel of the British Empire. I have no hesitation in saying that I am an imperialist. I have always stood, and I trust I always will stand, for the maintenance of this empire. When hon. gentlemen in the past, since I have been sitting in this house, have come back from imperial conferences, and with eloquent words, sometimes with much enthusiastic desk pounding by their supporters, told us of all the increases in status which this dominion had gained, I never felt any great burst of enthusiasm, any lump in my throat, or any thrill running down my spine. If some hon. gentleman, a leader in this house, gets up on his feet and tells me what Canada has done to increase its stature in the British Empire by making, by some practical means, a contribution to the maintenance of this empire, I promise you I shall applaud him most enthusiastically.

Throughout this empire the king has a royal prerogative. He has the prerogative of conferring titles. Ordinarily that prerogative is exercised on the recommendation of the Prime Minister who, I assume, does so after consultation with his council. One of the great difficulties that we are facing in this country and in this house to-day is that so many people stand up and point out that in this, that or the other thing we have had some abuse, and instead of remedying the abuse they say, "Let us throw over the whole system, lock, stock and barrel." So far as I am concerned, if abuse there has been in the conferring of titles, then I say let us take adequate and proper means to remedy the abuse. But so long as this country is to remain part and parcel of the British Empire, so long as there is a tendency to reduce the links that bind us, I for one will not vote to destroy another link, and therefore I shall vote against the resolution and the amendment.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I wish to make just one or two observations on this question. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) in introducing his resolution quoted from a speech which I made in parliament in 1918 when the house sat in the Victoria museum building. I have no criticism to offer with respect to my hon. friend's quotation from my speech on this question delivered at that time. I had very strong opinions sixteen years ago on this subject. Of course, opinions change as time moves, and though I do not intend to express to-day any different opinion from that which I expressed at that time, I do wish to point out that had my hon. friend gone further in the quotation which he read to the house he would have observed that in that speech I also made this point, that in critical times such as those through which we were then passing I did not consider it wise to vote against a government which was attempting to carry on the affairs of the country. Therefore, I voted with the government and I intend to do the same to-day, exactly on the same grounds.

Mr. BENNETT: I have one word to say about the amendment. If the amendment carries, lieutenant governors hereafter appointed are not to be called honourable. If the amendment carries, senators are not to be called honourable. If the amendment carries, members of the privy council are not hereafter to be called honourable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that the amendment itself or the amendment as amended?

Mr. BENNETT: The amendment as it reads strikes out honours and awards. There is no amendment to the amendment; there is only one amendment. The official table issued twenty years ago gives the table of titles to be used in Canada. The table of titles commences with His Excellency and Her Excellency. Every lieutenant governor, who at that time was addressed as His Honour, was thereafter to be called honourable; members of the privy council were to be styled honourable; senators were to be styled honourable, and so forth.

Just one other question that arises out of the amendment. Are we to understand that foreign principalities and powers may confer titles upon Canadians when their own sovereign may not? That is the other issue and it is a real one.

Mr. EULER: It is not a real one.

Mr. BENNETT: That issue is a real one and everything I said with respect to the right of my sovereign to exercise his prerogative on the advice of this government is applicable to what I have just stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to say just a word with reference to what the Prime Minister has said. I cannot agree with him when he says that if the amendment carries, the result will be what he has stated. The resolution states:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the Prime Minister should refrain from recommending to His Majesty the King, the granting of titles, honours and awards to British subjects resident in Canada.

The titles to which my right hon. friend has referred, he, the Prime Minister, does not recommend at all. Those are titles that appertain to an office, that belong to the office as such. What the Prime Minister or the government recommends is the appointment of a person to an office and the title appertaining to it goes with it without any recommendation whatever. The only case in which this resolution as amended would apply is where the Prime Minister might wish to recommend that someone be given a title of knighthood carrying with it the prefix of "sir" before the name of the person receiving the title and carrying with it the right of his wife, if he has one, to assume the title of "lady." That is the meaning of the resolution as it is proposed to amend it, the Prime Minister's words to the contrary notwithstanding.

Amendment (Mr. Garland, Bow River) negatived.

The house divided on the main motion which was negatived on the following division:

Rhodes

Mr. GOTT: I have a general sessional pair with the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, (Mr. Rutherford) and I have refused to break my pair. Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was paired with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. GEARY: I was paired with the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). Had I voted I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister a question before we leave this matter? According to his interpretation of a private member's resolution the resolution applies only for the one parliament; it would not have been effective beyond the present parliament had it carried?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think that might be the construction placed upon it. I have not considered this resolution from that point of view, but a resolution of instructions given to the Prime Minister by this house, I should say, would have no force beyond the life of the parliament in which it was given, although it has been contended by hon. gentlemen opposite that that view is not correct. My view is that it does not extend beyond.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE DEBT

PROPOSAL THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE STEPS TO REDUCE PUBLIC DEBT AND LIMIT EXPANSION OF PRIVATE CREDIT

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Maisonneuve) moved:

Whereas, the steady increase of the public debt and private debts in Canada constitutes one of the most serious obstacles to the economical restoration of the country,

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take immediate steps to reduce the public debt and limit the expansion of private credit.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I have not had an opportunity to look into this, but I think, Mr. Speaker, upon examination you will find that this motion covers a subject which has already been dealt with by way of an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Having been debated once during the session, under the rules the subject may not be debated again.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the hon. gentleman the amendment to which he draws attention?

Mr. RHODES: I am trying to find it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will examine the motion referred to; in the meantime if there is no objection the debate may proceed.

Mr. JEAN (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the aim I have in mind in introducing this resolution is twofold:

1. To respond to the desire often expressed by the public that concrete and forcible measures of economic and social re-establishment be enacted and

2. To contribute, in my humble way, to the research and carrying out of such measures.

Times are hard. Our social structure is battered on all sides. However, the crisis which has been of a very severe character, for over five years, has had the good effect of making people think. In the research of the causes which brought it on and the means to be taken to escape from its blows, the flaws of our economic system and the defects in our social structure, have been revealed to us. Knowing now these defects the people clamour for immediate redress.

Unfortunately the wheels of government do not revolve as rapidly as events. In the mind of our legislators, economic and social solutions are not clearly drawn, consequently, the measures to be taken are not definite.

A number of countries, such as Russia, Italy, Germany and the United States are, at present, separately experimenting on a system which may have practical results in their own field of activities; however, in Canada, we have not reached that stage of evolution. Hitherto, we simply resorted to expedients and urgent remedies most of which proved inefficient. The people realize the powerlessness of the methods followed hitherto, and that is why they clamour, not without cause, for the enforcement of new, and well defined measures, applicable to our national problems.

I do not intend to submit, to-day, a flawless scheme of a nature to entirely satisfy public opinion and redress the whole economic system of this country, were it adopted. I simply wish to, make a psychological and summary analysis of the economic doctrines which prevail throughout Canada; prove that we are, on the whole, following a policy which is contrary to the interests and requirements of the country and suggest some remedies, the future discussion of which will, perhaps, contribute to direct researches towards the realization of a national program of financial redress.

We have in Canada, at present, three well defined schools of thought on economic and social questions.

The first proclaims the efficiency of the capitalist system such as in practice for half a century and whose main objective is concentration of capital aiming at mass production, with a forced and unlimited consumption. It admits the present crisis but seeing that it is world wide, it believes that it was inevitable in Canada. Its motto is optimism and reliance in an improvement of conditions. It believes that, with its vast resources and wealth, our country will be one of the first to readjust itself, as soon as providence thinks proper to check the ills from which the world has been suffering for the last five years.

According to the teachings of this school, we have but to await events, without making any changes or correcting the defects in our social structure, although, at times, resorting to urgent remedies to calm the first symptoms of the crisis.

The second school proclaims the necessity of a radical change in the capitalistic system whose failure has become evident. It places all its hopes of salvation in a fuller intervention of the central authority which should assume all functions and responsibilities.

The means which it suggests consist mainly in the socialization of capital, industry, trade and agriculture. It does not state how all this will work out; however, the hopes of happiness which it visionizes facinates the masses, because with our democratic system, we must make some allowance for the doctrines which flatter these violent impulses of the masses even if they are known to be ill-founded.

Finally a third school contends that that the present capitalist system is not in itself wrong, but that it has become tainted, that the economic conditions have greatly changed owing to the progressive industrialization of the world; that capital abuses of its power and has set aside order by exploiting at will and for its own profit, industry, finance and the entire economic system; that reforms are needed without, however, upsetting the whole social order and that these reforms must aim at protecting the weak and the poor rather than the wealthy classes, which have less need of the public's protection than the other classes of society.

The large majority of the people—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has raised a point of order as to whether or not this resolution, as worded, can be considered by the house. The resolution reads:

> Whereas, the steady increase of the public debt and private debts in Canada constitutes one of the most serious obstacles to the economical restoration of the country,
> Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take immediate steps to reduce the public debt and limit the expansion of private credit.

I find that on February 13 Mr. Woodsworth, seconded by Mr. Gardiner, moved as follows:

> We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's present advisers have not taken such steps as are necessary to deal adequately with unemployment, to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt, and to put the agricultural industry on a basis that will ensure to the farmer a decent standard of living.

A full discussion was had on that resolution, which contains the words "to reduce the burden imposed by the public debt" and, since the hon. gentleman's resolution has this reference to the public debt I cannot find that his resolution is in order. The question has been discussed by this house this session, and I therefore hold that the resolution now offered by the hon. gentleman is not in order and cannot be discussed.

MEDICAL EXAMINATION AND RELIEF

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time this resolution has come before the house, and I see that even now it does not express the exact thought that was in the mind of the mover. I should like to insert the word "free" before the word "periodic" in the third line, so that the resolution will read:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would (a) provide for free periodic medical examination of the Canadian people—and so on. It has often occurred to me that there is need for a medium of approach between the medical profession and a large number of the citizens of this country. The expense of sickness holds no great terror for those who have money, for they are able to pay the costs. Similarly, sir, those who are indigent and simply canot afford to pay the cost of medical services are provided for by the open wards of the hospitals and by the free outdoor clinics, and it has always been a point of honour with medical men generally to see that the needy were provided with attention in times of sickness. But there is a very large class of citizens in Canada—and this matter has been mentioned before—who have been in the habit of meeting their obligations and maintaining their self-respect. These people prefer to employ their own medical men and pay for their services. Upon this class of people, one which embraces the vast majority of Canadian citizenship, the cost of medical services in times of long protracted sickness is a very serious consideration. There was a time when members of the medical profession designed not to name a fee. Possibly at this time doctors were supposed to possess superior intelligence and almost supernatural powers. For their services they received gifts and gratuities. Those were the early days of medicine, at a time when the field of medicine was limited outside of injuries and maternity cases, to fevers, humors and tumors. The therapeutic application consisted largely in blistering, bleeding and purging. Those therapeutic measures have survived to the present day, and are still effectual. However, since that time the medical profession has made very definite and rapid strides until to-day it has become a definite and intricate science. To acquire knowledge of medical learning long years of study are required and to keep abreast of the times, continuous study from day to day is necessary. I would express the belief that very few medical men of to-day could afford to take a chance on earning a livelihood through receipts of gratuities and gifts. On the other hand, it is necessary for them to charge fees, and we understand that medical fees have always been fairly high. Speaking of high medical fees I am not referring to those men who charge $25 or $50 for advice. I consider that, like the lawyer who may charge $1,000 for advice, they are parasites of society and one of the fertile causes of communism and revolution.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they?

Mr. HOWDEN: I have heard of them. At this time, however, I am talking about ordinary medical fees running from $2 to $5 for office consultations, and about $3 for household calls. These are the fees commonly charged. I say to hon. members that in a family, the breadwinner of which earns only $2 a day and who is called upon to pay $3 a day for medical services over a considerable period of time, a hardship exists. For that reason I dare say in a great many instances sickness is, at least to some extent, neglected and is allowed to gain considerable headway before a medical man is called in. That, as hon. members will realize, is a very undesirable state of affairs.

I should like to approach the subject from another angle, namely, that sickness is always with us. Of those of us born into this life unfortunately some are born as imbeciles and morons. At the present time I am not giving special consideration to this class. There is however a class scarcely less fortunate, one born into this world with an inferior constitution and subnormal vital resistance, people who go through life as invalids. Then, we have those people who do not know they are invalids, and who have had very little to cause them to suspect any physical abnormality; I refer to those amongst others affected with tubercular trouble. It is estimated that about 80 per cent of humanity is either actively affected with tuberculosis, or have the disease lying latent in their systems. I fancy it would be safe to say there are many dozens or even hundreds of cases of incipient heart trouble and liver trouble which are not suspected and are not known. The number of people who give positive reaction to the Wassermann test for syphilis is appalling. That is the only word which could properly be used.

With these considerations in mind I was prompted in the year 1931 to bring before this house a resolution along similar lines. Although not in exactly the same wording as the present resolution, it had very much the same meaning, and was as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, a measure of federal state medicine would be in the best interests of the Canadian people.

On that occasion it was my endeavour to point out that the wealth of the world had been gained not by gold but by labour, and that labour could produce only with the aid of sound bodies and sound minds. I indicated that since Canada is a land of stern realities, it required men of sound physical and mental health. It was pointed out that a large share of the population was suffering from illnesses which cost our people many millions of dollars yearly. Through unsuspected illnesses constantly among us the health of many of our numbers was constantly being undermined.

The resolution was discussed at some length by sixteen or seventeen hon. members, most of whom, I believe, seemed favourably impressed with the resolution. On that occasion the Minister of Pensions and National Health said this:

But with respect to the general question, I have sympathy with the idea of medical treatment being provided in some organized way for those who require it. I do not suggest that it come under the dominion government. I am supporting and I am sympathetic with the idea that there should be a system of medical treatment in this country for those who need it. Whether it shall be provided by the provincial government, or by the federal government, or by a combination of the two, is a different matter.

So that even the Minister of Pensions and National Health realized at that time, as I believe he does to-day that it would be desirable if we could get medical treatment for those desiring and requiring it, who are unable to pay for it but who through personal self-respect are prevented from asking for it freely.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) believed that such a condition would come about in time, but that if conditions were left as they then existed we would, in time, reach the desired haven. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), however, took decided exception to the resolution and, if I remember correctly, pointed out that if adopted it would entail the entire disorganization of the medical profession, and that there would be trouble between the provinces and the dominion in connection with the control of medical services. I think possibly the right hon. gentleman thought that the cost would be rather excessive. At the time I was inclined to think, although I may have been wrong, that he believed that many of his supporters were ready to give this measure their favourable consideration. However, he gave directions as to what should be done and the resolution was voted down by the government. The following year the matter came up in a rather different form, the same form as it appears to-day, namely:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease.

On that occasion the resolution came up well on in the evening, and there was only time for the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) to respond. I pause to say that the hon. members for East Calgary and Kingston made very excellent addresses. I think I am right in stating that they both agreed with me in that they felt that the services already given the Canadian people could be correlated under federal control and that if that could be done and the provinces brought together in a common standard, it would be a desirable condition. I must not say that the hon. gentlemen agreed with me further. The position taken by the minister was similar to that taken the year before, except that he pointed out there had not been any great demand for periodic medical examination. He stated that those who could afford such examinations or had them available made little use of them. As I said, the motion came on well in the evening and did not receive very much consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I might say that no direction was given to the party to the right except such as they may have taken from the observations I made.

Mr. HOWDEN: We will leave it at that. I should like to appeal to the Prime Minister to afford if possible an opportunity of completing this discussion. We have not had an opportunity either this year or last year.

Mr. BENNETT: The motion was called once and passed. I can give no further assurance to the hon. gentleman.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 15, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Govenor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

Bessborough.

Government House,
Ottawa, March 15, 1934.

PETITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house petitions from the municipal councils of Ste. Satine and St. Nérée, in the county of Bellechasse, and from the municipal council of St. Jean Chrysostome, located in the county of Levis and the consituency of Bellechasse, requesting the government not to levy a tax on leaf tobacco.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house resolutions from the municipal councils of St. Joachim, St. Henri de Mascouche and the parish of St. Lin, in the county of L'Assomption, strongly protesting against a tax of 20 cents per pound being levied on leaf tobacco.

BIRTHDAY OF MR. R. S. WHITE

On the entry of Mr. R. S. White, this being his seventy-eighth birthday:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Speech.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this is a very great privilege and, I fear, a very great departure from the rules of the house. None the less, if you will permit me, I should like, from the bottom of my heart, to thank my friends in this house who, I am pleased to believe, are almost as numerous on one side as the other, for the compliment they have paid me to-day. While I am a strong party man, I hope I am broad enough in my views to realize that those who differ from me have precisely the same right to their opinions as I have to mine and when not engaged in an election contest, indeed I go so far as to say that when engaged in an election contest, I greet my friends of opposite opinions with the same cordiality as I do when the battle has ceased. I thank you all most gratefully and sincerely.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

EMPLOYMENT OF AGRICULTURAL STUDENTS ON EXPERIMENTAL FARMS

Mr. BOUCHARD:

1. How many agricultural students were employed as students at the different experimental farms, experimental stations and experimental sub-stations of the dominion during the the year 1933?
2. What was the distribution of these students as regards the different provinces where they were employed?
3. How many agricultural students received work at the central experimental farm (Ottawa) during the summers of 1930-31-32-33?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. None.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. 1930, 26; 1931, 39; 1932, 35; 1933, 30.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BUREAU OF STATISTICS STAFF

Mr. ST-PERE:

Referring to the statement tabled by the Hon. Minister of Finance on February 26, containing the statement that 278 employees had been added to the staff of the bureau of statistics during the year ending March 31, 1933.

1. Were those employees appointed by the civil service commission?
2. If so, has the civil service commission followed the list of eligibility according to rank of candidates?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

"CANADA, 1934"

Mr. YOUNG:

1. How many copies of "Canada, 1934" were printed?
2. What was the total distribution?
3. Of this total, how much was in bulk sales and how much in individual distribution?
4. Is the price for bulk sales the same as for individual copies; namely 25 cents each?
5. What does it cost the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to prepare and publish this booklet, and how does this cost compare with receipts?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON BANKING—COST

Mr. BOTHWELL:

1. What was the total cost of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada?
2. What amount was paid as: (a) remuneration; (b) expenses, to the chairman, each commissioner, the secretary, the assistant secretary and the stenographic staff?

3. How many copies of the report were printed, and what was the cost of printing?
4. How many copies were sold and how much realized from the sale?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

SENIOR EGG INSPECTOR, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Did the civil service commission advertise an examination under No. 22855, during the month of September last, for a promotion to the position of assistant senior egg inspector for the province of Quebec?
2. Should this position be filled by a bilingual person?
3. Who are the candidates who made application to take part in this examination?
4. Where and when were the examinations held?
5. Has the civil service commission appointed Mr. A. R. Hedgecoe to fill the position of assistant senior egg inspector for the province of Quebec?
6. If so, on what date?
7. Who recommended Mr. A. R. Hedgecoe?
8. Is Mr. A. R. Hedgecoe bilingual?

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to bring in a measure to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to provide for a dominion marketing board, the remuneration of the members thereof and of assistants and employees, and to authorize payment to the board of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. Gordon moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting relief measures generally similar in terms to the Relief Act, 1933, but which also makes provision for payment of Federal proportion of delayed relief accounts, if any, which may be received subsequent to the date of the expiration of said act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject-matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT AND DATE OF BUDGET

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the Prime Minister if the government has given any consideration to the question of the Easter adjournment? I think some hon. members would like to make their plans at the earliest day possible.

May I also ask if it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to bring down the budget before the Easter recess, or after, if he is in a position to say?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I had intended to speak to the right hon. gentleman this afternoon after the house went into committee concerning the Easter adjournment. If it meets with the general acceptance of the house it is proposed to adjourn either on the Wednesday or the Thursday night preceding Good Friday, and to reassemble on the succeeding Monday week.

The budget will be delivered after the recess.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the action of the United States Senate in respect to the St. Lawrence waterway treaty he has any statement to make to the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a short statement to make to the house with respect to the St. Lawrence Seaway treaty.

Yesterday the Senate of the United States voted against the ratification of the St. Lawrence Seaway treaty made between the United States and Canada and signed on the 18th day of July, 1932. Therefore, the treaty will not come before the parliament of Canada for consideration.

I regret the action of the Senate for many reasons, not the least being that I have looked upon the development of the St. Lawrence seaway as the manifestation of the will and the capacity of two sane and peace-loving countries to join fairly and freely in an enterprise of profit to them both. At this time in the world's affairs, when good neighbourliness is so important a factor in the great international adjustments that are taking place throughout the world, I had felt that the example of mutual trust and confidence set by these two great countries might have proved an impulse and a guide to better international relations on other continents.

I have supported the development of the St. Lawrence seaway as my predecessors in office, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the right hon. leader of the opposition supported it, because I believe that it would be a constructive and forward step. I have supported it also because I believe that it would be a measure from which all classes of the community would profit. I have grown to think of this St. Lawrence seaway as in fact the people's seaway, devised and built to serve them, to bring the west nearer to the east, to make more profitable the work of our agriculturists, and to provide employment in a period of universal depression.

I have no desire to comment on the reasons why the treaty has been defeated in the United States, and there is no purpose now in attacking the interests in our own country who have seen fit to join with similar interests in the United States that have succeeded for the moment at least in defeating this seaway development.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC TRACKS AND PREMISES AT QUEBEC—POOL TRAINS

The house resumed from Monday, March 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 25, to ratify and confirm an agreement respecting the joint use by His Majesty and the commissioners of the transcontinental railway of certain tracks and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Quebec—Mr. Manion—Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement and supplementary agreement ratified.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is absolutely impossible to hear a word in this corner.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if the minister has made inquiry from the officers of the railway regarding the matters that I brought to his attention last week when this bill was introduced?

Mr. MANION: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I inquired, and I find that there is nothing in the agreement that in any way conflicts with the statements I made previously. My hon. friend pointed out, I remember, that the trains now being, as he expressed it, Canadian Pacific trains, the Canadian National trains being taken off, there might be need for some modification in the provisions of the agreement. I overlooked pointing out at that time, as I should have done, that the pool trains of course are not Canadian Pacific trains but pool trains, in other words as much Canadian National as Canadian Pacific, the equipment of both roads being used in them, and of course whatever profits or losses accrue on those trains are divided between the two railways.

My hon. friend also made some suggestion that for the same reason there might now need to be some modification in the terms; but I am informed, though I did not know at that time, that the original agreement was made on a wheelage basis, in other words they pay as they use, so to speak. In addition to that, the Canadian National will operate many trains out of that station; trains to Lake St. John, for example, and along the national transcontinental to Cochrane, besides the one to Charny. There are two or three sets of trains, I think there is another that I have not mentioned, but my hon. friend knows the railway geography of that section better than I do and can doubtless fill in the blank if there is one. At any rate they still utilize the station as they did in the past, and the pool trains are divided between the two railways.

Mr. POWER: I wonder if the minister could give us some further information regarding the trains it is proposed to run from the Canadian Pacific terminals over the Canadian National tracks to Charny in order, as I understood his statement some time ago, that there might be a connection between the passenger trains running down the south shore, the maritime express and the ocean limited, and the city of Quebec. The minister will recall that some time ago, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), he stated that arrangements were being made or had been made to provide for a connection between the Canadian Pacific station in Quebec and the trains running along the south shore to the maritime provinces. Has the minister any further information to give?

Mr. MANION: No, I do not think I have anything further than I gave the house at that time. A connection is being arranged with the maritime express and the ocean limited, which run down the south shore. There is a connection being arranged from Charny station into the Palais station in Quebec so that those who wish to use those trains may make connection either in that way or by the Levis ferry. Other than this I do not think I can add anything to what I said the other day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can give the information to my colleague from Quebec South; I have seen the connection. These three trains which ran between Quebec and Montreal on the Canadian National have been taken off, and the only two trains on the Canadian National which serve Quebec to some extent but do not go to Quebec are the ocean limited and the maritime express, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river. Of course in winter time no one in the city of Quebec would cross the river to take these trains in preference to the Canadian Pacific trains on the north shore. The minister said a connection was being arranged at the Quebec bridge, at Charny station, with one of those trains, the maritime express. That connection is made by a motor car with a Diesel engine; part of the car is occupied by the engine and the other part contains passenger seats. If my hon. friend thinks the travelling public of Quebec city are going to use that motor car to connect with the maritime express on Levis instead of using the Canadian Pacific trains he does not know the population of that city. In addition to that, the maritime express is a slow train which stops at every station and which does not give the service that was given by the trains which have been eliminated, and which is being given by the Canadian Pacific trains.

There is a further consideration. The fast Canadian National train in the afternoon took four hours and a half to go to Montreal, and I have been told by Canadian National railway officials that it could easily cover the distance in four hours. This train has been cut off, and the fastest Canadian Pacific train takes ten minutes more; its time is four hours and forty minutes, so the time is prolonged in comparison with the Canadian National trains.

I should like to direct my hon. friend's attention to one or two other features of this arrangement. How about people from Toronto or Ottawa who want to go to Quebec city? The trains between Quebec and Montreal may be pooled as far as the revenues are concerned, but do you think the people from Toronto will travel by Canadian National from Toronto to Montreal and then change to Canadian Pacific?

Mr. MANION: They cannot do that; they have to travel by pool trains.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the trains are not pooled.

Mr. MANION: All the good trains are pooled.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: They might be coming from other centres; I said Toronto, but we might take Windsor or any other place. They will not travel by Canadian National to Montreal and then change from Bonaventure station to Place Viger station when they can travel Canadian Pacific and spare themselves the necessity of changing at all. Then there is another feature, to which my attention has been directed by a railway official who knows something about railway matters. When people travel by one railway they also send their freight by that railway. When they become accustomed to travelling on one road you will not find them travelling on that road and sending their freight or express by the other road. I think the Canadian National are getting the worst of it and have made a very bad bargain with regard to Quebec city and the surrounding district. The situation is the same with regard to intermediate stations; the people on the south shore cannot travel by the Canadian Pacific on the north shore, and there are all sorts of objections to this arrangement. I must say that I frequently receive letters from the employees of these lines; they are not marked private and confidential, and the writers are quite outspoken, but I would hesitate to make those letters public. On behalf of the people in Quebec city whom I represent I protest against this arrangement.

Mr. MANION: In the first place my hon. friend uses the expression "Canadian Pacific trains" from Montreal to Quebec, but they are not Canadian Pacific trains at all; they are pool trains, and whatever profits or losses may be made on those trains are made by both companies mutually. The arrangement was made by the managements of the two companies without consulting me in any way, and I do not know that I could have been of any assistance if they had done so, because it is a railway matter. The figures I gave the other day in reply to a question dealing with this very matter showed that the Canadian National, far from losing by the deal, claimed that their condition had been improved, and I gave the figures of their earnings for the last two months. These figures showed that the traffic gain by the Canadian National in the past two months has been greater than the traffic gain by the Canadian Pacific. Unfortunately I do not happen to have it with me, but this morning I received from the railways a later report than the one I gave a few days ago showing that the increase in traffic up to a more recent date also showed that the percentage of gain by the Canadian National was greater than the percentage of gain by the Canadian Pacific.

I hope my hon. friend will not think I am attempting to lecture him or anyone else, but I should like to point out to the members of the committee that one of the great problems in our country to-day, as we all know, is the railway problem, which includes the Canadian Pacific as well as the Canadian National. Last year this house, in its wisdom, passed the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific bill, which instructed—and I think rightly so—the two railways to cooperate with the object of effecting economies. If every time something is done by the two railways in an attempt to carry out that instruction the section of the country affected protests, it seems to me it is going to make it very difficult for the railways to economize. My hon. friend is no exception; from every section of the country where an economy is effected by the pooling of trains protests pour in upon me, though I have nothing to do with the arrangements. As a matter of fact two-thirds of the very poolings to which reference has been made took place from six to eight months or a year ago. The only one that was new was the one that affects my hon. friend and his section of the country. The pooling between Ottawa and Toronto and Montreal and Toronto took place some months ago, in fact some months before the present trustees were appointed. That is, the poolings as a matter of fact took place before the legislation of last year. But in view of that legislation and in view of the general opinion expressed everywhere in Canada that there should be cooperation of one kind or another between the two railway companies, in order to avoid duplication, extra expense and losses which are obtaining, I repeat that it is not advisable for all of us, even although our sections may be somewhat affected, to protest against the changes in the trains. I believe everyone in Canada who has taken any interest in the railway situation has, for years, been pointing out these duplications. Ever since I came into this house there has been a succession of protests from hon. members who take an interest in the railway question about the number of trains running between Montreal and Ottawa, Ottawa and Toronto and Montreal and Toronto.

To-day the railways are attempting to correct that duplication, and so far as I am concerned, though their action may occasionally affect some of us unpleasantly, it seems to me that in view of the seriousness of the railway situation we should give some support to the railways in their efforts. My hon. friend points out that under the changed system he cannot travel as rapidly. I understood him to say that by using the C.N.R. trains between Montreal and Quebec a faster trip could be made. I do not know whether he meant that the trip could be made more quickly than it can now be made through the use of a pool train.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes it can.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has stated that that is so. Perhaps it is, although if what the hon. member has stated is the fact I am a little surprised that the arrangement should have been so made. It was pointed out to me, as I explained in the house only a few days ago that the reason the C.P.R. was chosen was that 80 per cent of the passenger traffic between Montreal and Quebec had travelled by C.P.R. I believe that would be natural, because it would not be convenient for people to cross over from Levis on the ferry.

But, to get back to the question of speed. Are we not in this day and generation a little too anxious for speed? My impression is that had there been less speeding on the railways, in automobiles and in other ways the world might be as happy as it was a few years ago, or certainly not less than it is to-day. I believe the matter of getting between two stations in fifteen or twenty minutes less time is not of great importance to my hon. friend or to myself. I say that without any reflection upon him in anyway.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that, if three trains are eliminated at least one should run on the C.N.R. and the two others on the C.P.R., instead of leaving the three trains on the C.P.R. and taking them away from the C.N.R.? Between Ottawa and Montreal and Toronto and Montreal there has been a sharing in the pooling, but between Montreal and Quebec the service is all given to the C.P.R. The minister has said that the revenue would be divided, but does he not believe that it would be fair to leave at least one of the trains running on the C.N.R. and to take one away from the C.P.R.?

Mr. MANION: Quite possibly it would be, but I was not consulted in this arrangement. The arrangement was made by the present trustees and management of the Canadian National railways and the present management of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Until the matter was brought to my attention by my hon. friend I did not know that it was to be put into effect on March 11. I am not a railway man; neither are any of the government members, and we are not consulted any more than was the late government consulted in connection with the running of trains. No government has been consulted in those matters. While my hon. friend may have some justification for the remarks he has just made, at the same time the arrangement was made by the managements of the two railways with the conviction that they were making the wisest arrangement for the two railway companies. They gave proof of their contention the other day in the statement which I gave to the house; they showed that they were going to make considerable economies, if the pooling between Montreal and Quebec were combined with the pooling between Ottawa and Toronto and Montreal and Toronto. They claim that on those three poolings, including the service to Quebec, which is the only recent one, they will make a saving of $500,000 a year, each. I would say that certainly those savings are badly needed. I am sorry if the railway managements have put into effect poolings which inconvenience some hon. members and other people affected, but such cannot help but be the result at least to a certain extent. I do not believe either management would agree to put into effect any pooling arrangement which would seriously affect anybody. That is my feeling about it, and I think the best this House of Commons can do is to accede to those schemes which the two managements consider to be wisest, and which will effect economies for both roads.

Mr. POWER: May I suggest to the minister that he request the management of the Canadian National Railways at least to reconsider this matter. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec East all the so-called C.N.R. trains have been cancelled. I quite understand what the minister has said, and I know he is speaking in good faith when he states that when these trains are pooled the expenses, profits, losses and everything else go into one pot. Nevertheless in the minds of most Quebecers—and Quebec is a small town away down at the end of the line—these trains being operated are C.P.R. trains. They are running at the hours formerly used by C.P.R. trains, and those trains running on the former C.N.R. schedule have been cancelled. The public impression is that there are no more C.N.R. trains, and my submission is that such a condition will prove detrimental to the freight traffic of the Canadian National railways. I suggest that perhaps the two managements did not take that factor into consideration. I understand, of course, that savings will be effected by the pooling of trains, and that probably the managements were perfectly justified. I do not know whether they were or not, but in all seriousness I do submit that in as far as the city of Quebec and the surrounding district is concerned, namely the north shore district, if this pooling system continues, within a period of only two or three years there will be little or no freight traffic going over the Canadian National railways.

Mr. MANION: Of course, this bill has nothing to do with the pooling of trains, but has to do with the terminal in Quebec. However, we are in committee and I have no objection to this discussion. I shall be very happy to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend and draw to the attention of the managements of both roads for their consideration the statements made here this afternoon. That is the best I can do.

Mr. RINFRET: This bill serves to illustrate the difficulties which both railway companies will always encounter so long as they desire to remain in competition and at the same time exert some kind of cooperation. Last year for an obvious reason I did not take part in the debate on the railway bill, but if I had I would have pointed out that it was next to impossible for two large companies at the same time to be in competition and in cooperation. Only a few days ago I pointed out to the Minister of Railways and Canals the situation existing between Ottawa and Montreal. Although this matter is not covered by the legislation now under consideration, I think it might properly be stated. May I add that the railway companies have been very considerate. Both companies sent to my office in Montreal high standing representatives to discuss the matter with me, and the committee may be interested to know that as regards the service between Ottawa and Montreal both companies took exactly opposite views to those they had taken in connection with the service between Montreal and Quebec. They represented to me that both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. had to maintain trains not only to reach Montreal but to serve intermediate stations in the different districts. They pointed out also that it would not be fair to either company if it were asked to withdraw its trains from that service, and leave it altogether to the remaining company. Apparently they did otherwise in regard to Quebec. They took away all the C.N.R. trains, disregarding the intermediate stations, and they maintained two or three C.P.R. trains. I desire to accept the views expressed by the hon. member for Quebec East to the effect that if a service is abandoned or taken off there is likely to be reaction against the other company, not only at that point but in Canada generally. I do not wish to press my views on this bill, but I want to take this occasion to say in a general way that so long as the companies maintain the spirit of competition and at the same time endeavour to arrive at a certain degree of cooperation, there are bound to be these difficulties, and I repeat that the stand of the companies as regards the service between Montreal and Ottawa is directly opposite to that taken in regard to the service between Quebec and Montreal.

Mr. MANION: In reply to that, may I offer this suggestion as it has been put to me? So far as both railway routes are concerned the territory between Ottawa and Montreal is much more densely populated than is the territory through which the Canadian National runs from Montreal to Quebec. It has also been put forward to me that the Canadian Pacific route from Montreal to Quebec does run through a thickly populated section while the Canadian National road does not. But between Ottawa and Montreal both railways run through fairly densely populated sections of the country. I point that out as it has been pointed out to me in explanation of the situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that argument would not apply to fast passenger trains stopping at only a few points.

Mr. RINFRET: I admit that that was the stand taken by the companies, that there should be no pooling of services between Ottawa and Montreal unless a train in addition to the present service was run because they wanted to serve the intermediate stations. They also pointed out to me that it would not be fair to ask either company to pool either the whole or part of its service between the two cities because it would react against that particular company. That is the very situation that is being pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec East, that if the Canadian National is taken off the Quebec service it will react against that company.

I did not rise, Mr. Chairman, so much for the purpose of discussing this bill as of taking this opportunity to make known to the committee what had taken place between the companies and myself as regards the question I raised the other day. But I have no hesitation in stating now that in my humble opinion these efforts to pool and cooperate are bound to fail, and notwithstanding the action that was taken by the house last year I really believe that we shall come to a time when it will be necessary to have a very much stronger tendency to amalgamation than the house showed last year. I say that to-day there is not enough passenger traffic and there is not enough freight traffic in this country for two transcontinental railways. It is all right to arrange to cut off a train between Quebec and Montreal, or something like that, and I agree with the minister that there will be protests at once when a step of that kind is taken, but it is only postponing the day when the two companies will have to come much closer together than they are now and when we shall have to consider much more radical measures for remedying our present railway situation than these local arrangements which do not give satisfaction to anyone.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, if I might have a moment—

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say—

Mr. RINFRET: There will have to be a pooling of speeches over there.

Mr. McGIBBON: If that would do anything towards eliminating the burden of the railways upon the country it would be a good thing. I think, Mr. Chairman, that discussions of this kind are rather dangerous. It seems to me that we must do one of two things in connection with the railways. We must either leave the operation of these railways in the hands of the managements or we must make the minister responsible to the House of Commons and to the people for their operation, which would bring the subject of the railways into this house. That is the method that I prefer, and I said so last year, but the house took a different view. Nearly everyone who spoke at that time thought that the railways should be kept as far away as possible from politics. But this discussion, Mr. Chairman, brings the whole subject right back again into parliament.

I do not wish to speak of particular instances where complaint has arisen. There may be complaints. There are bound to be complaints. I agree with the last speaker that the day is coming when there must be a closer union between these two railways. I spoke last year in favour of cooperation under one company, not amalgamation, and I think I made myself quite clear on that point. It has been estimated by Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we have also the authority for it of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who, if he was correctly reported, said in a speech a little while ago that the late Sir Henry Thornton told him that $75,000,000 a year could be saved by joint operation.

Mr. EULER: Amalgamation.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think myself that they have to be amalgamated to get joint operation.

Mr. EULER: That is what they said.

Mr. McGIBBON: Very well. We shall this year have to vote out of the funds of this country probably $60,000,000 to carry on these railways, and that allows nothing for depreciation or future expansion. When you add a reasonable sum for that, I think I am safe in saying that these railways are costing this country from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year. Can we afford it? In the Duff report the statement is made that 42 per cent of the mileage of these roads is doing less than five per cent of the business of the country. How can the railways be anything else but a failure until that situation is corrected? It means that we have to have elimination of services; there is no question about that. There is not enough business in this country in my opinion ever to support three transcontinental systems within the lifetime of any man now living.

But we have appointed three trustees to administer the railways. I did not like that plan, and I said so in the house last year. I do not like to see such a tremendous organization put into the hands practically of one man, for that is what it really means because the other two trustees are half-time men and are far secondary in influence to the chairman. But having adopted that system, if we are now going to bring the whole subject back into the House of Commons for each one of us to get up and criticize the trustees for what they are doing and have done, then in my opinion our last hope of saving this enterprise is gone. I am not hopeful that we can save it at all. In the last eighteen years this country has been spending on an average over $130 for every $100 it took in, and if you confiscated all the revenues of this country outside of the incomes that were exempt by statute, namely $1,500 and $3,000, we would not have enough money to pay the expenses of governments in Canada. If we took all the field crops of Canada for the last five years and doubled their value we would then only have about sufficient to pay the cost of governments, federal, provincial and municipal in this country to-day. On top of that, we have this railway burden.

I cannot see any light ahead at all. I can see nothing but a deficit of from fifty to seventy-five million dollars a year at least so long as any of us is living. I agree with the last hon. member who spoke (Mr. Rinfret) and with the hon. member for North Waterloo. I think most people in this country who have given this subject any thought believe that these two roads must be brought together in some way, and we must eliminate this mileage of forty-two per cent which is doing less than five per cent of this country's business. We must cut our overhead and curtail expenses because this country cannot, in my opinion, carry the debt it is carrying to-day and expect a return to prosperity.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, to say that I think we are wrong in criticizing the trustees who have been appointed and made responsible for the conduct of this enterprise. If you put responsibility upon them you must give them liberty and freedom to exercise their judgment. Otherwise it is not right to hold them responsible. I regret that the minister has said he would interfere.

Mr. MANION: I did not say I would interfere, I said I would direct the attention of the railway management to the discussion which has taken place to-day.

Mr. McGIBBON: That suits me much better. This problem is so serious that it deserves the earnest consideration of every man, both inside and outside this house, who is seeking a return of prosperity to this country when everyone can earn an honest and decent living and still have something left.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Mr. Chairman, the men of the Canadian National Railways have made a greater sacrifice during this period of stress and strain than any other body of labour in the country. In justice to them I think we should try to find out whether the national railways have stood up during the last three years as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway. These employees have accepted a reduction of over twenty per cent in order to help Canada during a time of need. Instead of listening to Mr. Beatty prating, prattling and foaming at the mouth with his suggestions that the Canadian Pacific should absorb the Canadian National, we should do just the opposite. We should have a real national,—well, a national government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: We have that. There should be a policy whereby these men who have sacrificed themselves under public ownership should be given the right to take over private ownership in certain cases. There is no one who has more sympathy for the worker, there is no one more ready to speak on his behalf than I but the fact remains that there is not a Canadian Pacific worker who has made greater sacrifices than those employed on the Canadian National Railways. I have the record of this system under my hand, and I challenge any man in Canada to contradict the statement that the Canadian National Railways, through the loyalty of its workers, has held up better than the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in the constituency which I have the privilege of representing a large number of employees of the Canadian National Railways look upon as contrary to their interests, the changes carried out following the reorganization of the train service of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways between Quebec and Montreal.

I admit, sir, that the government has had no hand in this reorganization which was carried out by the higher officials of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, however, on behalf of my constituents I wish to request the honourable Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) to intervene, if necessary, in the interest of the employees of the Canadian National who reside in my constituency.

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with regard to the railway situation and the condemnation there has been of the operation of pool trains. While certain economies have been effected by the pooling of passenger trains, we should not lose sight of the fact that the general traffic on the Canadian National Railways, particularly on the lines in the Atlantic region, has greatly increased. The shipments of coal from Nova Scotia, particularly from Cape Breton, during last year and this year up to date have been greater than ever before. The largest bituminous coal mine in America is now being operated in Cape Breton. Canadian National Railways are short of cars with which to handle the traffic coming from Cape Breton. Train crews that have been out of work for the last five years are now back on duty. Every man who had been dropped temporarily from the service is now back at work. A large number of railway shop men who were laid off in Moncton have been taken back but the men employed in the running trades, such as drivers, firemen, conductors, trainmen and roundhouse men, are all back in the service. The traffic in coal, in lumber and in fruit from the Annapolis valley has been enormous. The business of the Canadian National Railways in the maritime provinces is in a flourishing condition. Shipments from our excellent ports of Saint John and Halifax are greater at the present time than they were even during the war when large shipments of munitions and supplies were made to the old country. During the spring of 1933, the business in the northern region showed a great improvement. As a result of the trade treaties entered into by the present administration, large amounts of lumber have been brought up from Maine, as well as from New Brunswick, to be shipped from Campbellton. During that year the port of Campbellton enjoyed such business as it had never enjoyed before. During the fall of 1933, while these large shipments were passing through Campbellton, while twenty-nine large steamers were loading at that port, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) travelled up and down the country preaching depression. There were certain things they did not wish to bring out; they did not mention the flourishing condition of the railways and the port of Campbellton. We now find the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska asking for grants to be placed in the estimates for the dredging of the Restigouche river. I have every sympathy with him in that connection but the fact still remains that at a time when conditions were in a healthy state and when much additional business was being done by the port of Campbellton, the hon. member and his leader insisted on preaching depression.

I should like to give the committee some idea of the amount of business done in the Atlantic region. There was an increase of forty-four per cent in general exports from Saint John up to March 1 this year as compared with last year; actual shipments were up forty-nine per cent; exports to South Africa had increased by forty-two per cent, while exports to India increased by almost four hundred per cent.

With regard to shipments, what has taken place this very year? At the end of February revenue cars loaded and received from connections in the Atlantic region show an increase of 10,791 over the corresponding period of the previous year. Cars loaded and received from such connections prior to February 28 last year totalled 22,234 and this year the number was 33,025, or an increase of 48½ per cent. I think, in all fairness to the Canadian National, it should be stated that with the subventions which are given on coal shipments from Cape Breton into Ontario and Quebec and with the general increase in the lumber trade which has taken place as a result of trade treaties with Great Britain, there is very little to complain of at the present time.

Mr. MANION: Might I say just a word on a point of order? I should like to suggest that perhaps it might be well, for the sake of the business of the house, for all of us to keep a little closer to the bill. In mentioning that, I am not referring to any particular individual.

Mr. MICHAUD: I agree with what the Minister of Railways and Canals has just said. Since, however, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price) was allowed to stray from the straight and narrow path, I think I might be permitted for a minute to refute what that hon. member has just said, that the leader of the opposition and the present member for Restigouche-Madawaska were going through the district represented by that hon. gentleman and preaching depression. I think the house now understands the reason for the outcome of the election, namely, that the hon. gentleman travelled the same territory last fall and made statements just as accurate as those he has been making in this chamber to-day. Therein lies the explanation why the party he supports met such tremendous defeat. My hon. friend has been kind enough to give credit to the depression for my election. I shall be more generous; I shall give him instead of the depression 99 per cent of the credit for my success, because during that election he made statements just about as accurate as those he is making here to-day.

I never contended that there was no increase in business in that district, but to show how inaccurate are the statements that are made to-day, may I point out that my hon. friend mentions that lumber from Maine was carried over the Canadian National to be shipped at the port of Campbellton. It was only lumber from New Brunswick and that part of Quebec adjacent to New Brunswick that was shipped over that line.

I should like to say a word regarding the amalgamation of the two railways since this subject has been treated very elaborately this afternoon. I have no objection to any amalgamation or pooling to save expense and to try to make a better showing, but the pooling should not be made always in favour of the Canadian Pacific. We have a glaring example of this in the fact that wherever there is danger of the Canadian Pacific losing out, the pooling is not looked upon very favourably. In New Brunswick there is a section of road thirty-five miles long where the two railways run parallel within one hundred feet of each other and pooling should be done. If the Canadian National railway line were used, this would eliminate twenty overhead crossings over the trans-Canada highway. Yet the interests do not feel like pooling the running rights over that district because it is claimed it will injuriously affect the future of the Canadian Pacific in that section since, by running over the Canadian National railway, the traffic will eventually remain with that company. When it is in the general interest of the public to abandon one line or the other in a particular district, the whole matter should be viewed fairly and either one line or the other should give in.

Mr. PRICE: If the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska is of opinion that my statements were inaccurate in connection with the shipment of lumber from Maine, I suggest that he consult the Canadian National management and find out the facts, as I believe he is ignorant of conditions respecting the movement of freight traffic. If he will consult the Canadian National management, he will find that my statements are correct. A very large quantity of lumber was brought from Maine and shipped over the Canadian National to the ports of Canada. I think also he will find that the statements I made during the election campaign are borne out by the facts.

Mr. HEENAN: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a statement he made the other day, obviously thinking he was right, because he was quoting Mr. Justice Fullerton, chairman of the board of trustees. This was in answer to a question by the hon. member for Quebec East, who quoted to the minister the number of employees that were being left out or laid off. The minister quoted from a letter by Mr. Justice Fullerton pointing out that ninety-six engineers, conductors, trainmen and firemen were affected by the pooling of those trains, but that they were not laid off, they just went back into other service, freight service, by the exercise of their seniority rights. That is not the correct situation. While it is true that those ninety-six senior passenger men reverted to freight and so on down the line, there were still ninety-six men laid off at the bottom of the list, and the statement made by the minister quoting the chairman of the board of trustees, left the impression, as I noticed in one paper from Winnipeg, that not one of the men lost his position. That is a wrong impression to get out, because ninety-six men were laid off from the bottom of the list.

Mr. MANION: I did not contradict what my hon. friend says now; I simply quoted Mr. Fullerton as saying that the ninety-six men who had been laid off from passenger trains would "bump," as the railway men say, the men below them and probably go on to freight trains. Mr. Fullerton followed that up by saying that, due to increased traffic which has been showing itself to a large extent in the last few months—in fact it began about the middle of last year—most of the men who would be "bumped" would automatically come back to work.

Mr. HEENAN: But there would still be ninety-six men more who would not be employed.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to quarrel with that. I wish to say just two or three sentences in reply to some remarks that have been made. It would be a little unfortunate if the impression as implied in the speeches of some of my hon. friends, were sent out through the country that the Canadian National were getting the worst of these pooling deals, and that in some way the Canadian Pacific was improving its position and the Canadan National injuring its position.

Mr. GIROUARD: The trains are all leaving from the Canadian Pacific station.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is just making a general statement; it is not so. These pooling arrangements will in some cases be as in the case of Montreal and Quebec. In this case it appeared wise to the managements to carry on the service from the Canadian Pacific station and over their lines, but in other parts of the country it will be and has been decided to carry on the service by Canadian National. Pooling must be judged by the general results, not by some individual case. I submit with all respect that without doubt in all these pooling arrangements the Canadian National management is getting a fair deal. I do not think the Canadian Pacific management desire to give the Canadian National an unfair deal nor do I think the Canadian National management desire to give the Canadian Pacific an unfair deal. The aim is to attain economics for both. Unless there is an economy for both one or the other will refuse to go into the pooling arrangement. When both expect to gain by the movement they agree to pool.

I wish to deal briefly with one or two other points. One hon. gentleman said, if I understood aright, that as far as he could see, for years to come there was going to be a deficit on the Canadian National of from fifty to seventy-five million dollars a year. I think those were the figures he used. I am not so pessimistic as that. The Canadian National deficit this year, it is true, has been over $52,000,000, that is including interest charges, and there are some additional payments that the government has to make which will bring the amount paid by the government altogether to something like $60,000,000, not $75,000,000. This is at the very bottom of the depression. Remember that in 1933 the Canadian National took in gross earnings much less than half of what was taken in the peak year, due to the world depression, which has affected every country and all lines of industry and commerce, cutting down international trade for example by sixty per cent of what it was in 1929. Due to that the Canadian National, and the Canadian Pacific as well, have had their earnings reduced to less than half what they were in 1928, the peak year. The gross earnings of the Canadian National for instance for 1933 were less than $150,000,000, whereas in the peak year they were over $300,000,000. In view of that and the fact that without doubt Canada and the rest of the world, or at least the parts with which we are associated closely, are on the upgrade and have been for some months,—certainly this country has, and nothing shows it better than the returns of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific; I say in view of that there is every hope for a much better showing, particularly considering that both railways have made very extensive economies. The Canadian National, as I said the other day, has made special economies amounting to something like $15,000,000 a year on a gross earnings of $200,000,000, so if earnings go back to anything like the peak of $300,000,000 the showing will be very much better. The Canadian Pacific also has made great economies, though I cannot speak of that with as much authority as of the Canadian National. So if the business of the country comes back in the next year or year and a half to anything like normal both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National will get into a vastly better position than they are in to-day. Therefore I submit that there will be no such deficit as fifty or seventy-five million dollars.

I do not wish to delay my bill, hon. members have had a very general discussion and I hope they will now permit the bill to proceed.

Bill reported.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION ACT

BILL TO EXTEND THE AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, to amend the Technical Education Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) if he took into consideration the question whether there are any means whereby the provinces which have not used this money can have it made available for use in agricultural teaching and the advancement of agriculture in the colleges of these provinces?

Mr. GORDON: I have given consideration to what the hon. member suggested when the bill was introduced. Personally I am inclined to the view that the unexpected balance can be devoted to agricultural education, but I propose to submit the question to the Justice department in order that I may get a clear interpretation of the terms used in the act. I am hopeful that the moneys can be applied to agriculture.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was there not provision made some years ago that the province of Prince Edward Island could use that money for agricultural teaching?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, I believe there was an act of parliament passed making the moneys available for Prince Edward Island. However, as I said, I will go further into the matter in the hope that the unexpected balance can be devoted to the purposes suggested.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Militia services; cadet services, $150,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the minister would give us an explanation of this reduction.

[Mr. Manion.]

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend knows, when this item was under discussion last year I said it would be reduced this year, and it has been reduced. The largest reduction is in connection with the number of cadets for whom the allowance is paid; that is, allowances will be paid for only 55,000 cadets throughout Canada, and in addition the staffs have been reduced very generally.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister say where these cadet corps are now located?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have them here by provinces, if that will meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman. They are as follows:

Alberta	34
British Columbia	31
Manitoba	25
New Brunswick	75
Nova Scotia	47
Ontario	205
Prince Edward Island	9
Quebec	320
Saskatchewan	43

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many of these corps are connected with public schools?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Practically all; there may be a few in private schools but I believe nearly all are in connection with public schools.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister has just stated that this year the training of cadets will include only 55,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, that is all that will be paid for.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does the minister mean only 55 in each cadet company?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, we will only pay for 55,000 cadets, at $1 each.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister could explain to the committee what allowances will be paid per unit out of this vote of $150,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is rather difficult to say at the present time; probably they would have to be put on a pro rata basis. A great many corps have been disbanded, and it is possible that the total number trained will not exceed 55,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I suppose the minister realizes that at one stroke of the pen he is destroying an organization that has taken practically twenty years to build up in this country. I do not know whether or not the minister is aware of the difficulties that were encountered in the past in inducing the different provinces to adopt a system of cadet training. I well remember twenty years ago when I had the honour to be delegated by headquarters here in Ottawa to meet the council of education and the lord bishops of Quebec, and I had a pretty hard time convincing them that this cadet training was not a military measure but was simply for the purpose of teaching physical training in the schools. This movement spread like wild fire in Quebec, which I think at present has a larger number of cadet units than any other province in the dominion; practically every college, every school and every normal school has one, two or three units. As a matter of fact I believe this grant for cadet training is the only grant made by the federal government towards education in the provinces, and no doubt the minister is also aware of the fact that last year many of the colleges in Quebec could not undertake cadet training for the very good reason that the grant was so small that they could not pay the instructors. Now I understand that the department have decided to do away with the director of cadet training here at headquarters and that the inspectors in each district who carry on the inspection of these cadet units have been practically eliminated. I am sure the minister realizes that $1 per cadet per unit is a very small grant; I do not think it would be sufficient to induce the schools and colleges to carry on the training of cadets and the teaching of physical training.

I am extremely sorry to see this vote reduced. I think perhaps it would have been better to have saved this $150,000 by taking it from the amount appropriated for the training of the Canadian militia. After all, the training carried on last year as far as the militia units were concerned was only skeleton training, which was carried on at certain camps of concentration. The only real training carried on as far as the militia were concerned was the training of the city units; as far as rural units were concerned, barely skeleton training was carried on. I was hoping that the minister might reconsider this matter and provide for the full amount in the supplementary estimates. This means a great deal to our colleges and normal schools in the province of Quebec. If this reduction is maintained it will deprive those colleges and schools of the physical training that has been carried on; it will deprive them of the money they have been pooling and using to equip the cadet units, to pay for their training and to provide prizes for their scholars in order to encourage competition. Once more I must say that I feel extremely sorry to see this vote reduced, and I hope the minister will be able to induce his colleagues to maintain it at $300,000 when the supplementary estimates are being considered.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I find myself in opposition to the last speaker; I should like to congratulate the minister on the reduction from $300,000 to $150,000, and I could hope that the remaining $150,000 might be wiped out. As the last speaker said, this is the only grant made by the dominion government for education within the provinces. Several years ago, when some of us urged that a grant should be made by this parliament to the provinces for the purpose of promoting peace, we were told that it was impossible under the British North America Act, because this parliament could not possibly interfere in the matter of education within the provinces. To-day it is frankly conceded that this is a grant to educational institutions for educational work, and I believe it to be outside the powers of the dominion government. Let me warn my friends from Quebec that whatever temporary advantage they may gain in a financial way may be more than offset one of these days through the precedent that is thus being established.

Sir EUGENE FISET: We are quite willing to risk it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, that is your business. Further than that, may I point out the inconsistency of the position of the government. If it is correct to make grants for what I regard as essentially military purposes surely it is quite correct for this dominion government to make grants for peace purposes. The government is taking an inconsistent position. More than that, we are told that it was extremely difficult to get the educational authorities in some of the provinces to agree to anything of this kind. Several years ago I pointed out that in my own province the military authorities had, themselves, taken the initiative and pressed this matter upon the central school authorities. They were practically turned down by the provincial authorities and then some of them approached the individual school boards and sought in this way to get in their work with the individual boards. That action is not conducive to the best relations between the dominion and the provinces. However I do not wish to stress jurisdictional matters of that kind, but rather to point out that there is a growing conviction to-day that we are not going to solve our problems by developing a military spirit. Throughout the world to-day we are in danger of having another war developed, and the only possible means by which such catastrophe could be averted is by developing a spirit of peace. In this country, I believe most of our people are in favour of peace. It has been the declared policy of the dominion government to adopt a policy of peace. It does not seem to me that a grant such as we are now discussing is consistent with the declared peace policy of the dominion government. It might conceivably be argued that we have to have some sort of defence force, but surely no one will say that these boys who are being trained in the cadet corps are receiving training which will make them immediately available for war. Further, that is not the professed object of such cadet training. It may be said that they are being given merely physical training, but if that contention is urged it should be brought to the attention of the house once again that if the boys are to be given physical training the girls should have that training too, and further that, as a rule, the men instructing the cadet corps are not the men best fitted to instruct in training in which physical development is the paramount consideration.

Again and again educational experts have pointed out that military training is not the best training for purely physical purposes. The only possible object in developing these cadet corps in our schools then, must be to encourage the boys to take an interest in military matters, and I think any one who has witnessed any of the parades or reviews must come to that conclusion. Once more I want to protest against our adopting or maintaining in Canada any policy which would tend to encourage a military spirit among our youth.

Mr. POULIOT: Just before the vote is carried I should like to say this, that on a day such as this, the fifteenth of March, I should not like to contradict what has been said by my good friend from Rimouski. Last year the vote was for $300,000; this year it is reduced by 50 per cent. The hon. member for Rimouski has said that it should be increased, and, on the other hand, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said that not one cent should be spent. Well, I see that the minister is following the middle course, the Liberal policy, and is reducing the vote by 50 per cent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And pleasing no one.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not say that. When there is a step in the right direction I do not complain. I am ready to give the devil his dues, and on this occasion there is no devil at all. On the other hand may I add that this vote is much more sensible than are some other expenditures—for instance, the large amount of money which is now being spent for the diplomatic training of the Postmaster General in the courts of Europe.

Item agreed to.

Contingencies, $31,500.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask a question regarding the camps in British Columbia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Those camps do not come under the estimates for my department. The hon. member would have an opportunity to discuss camps under the bill of which the Minister of Labour gave notice to-day. In connection with those camps the Department of National Defence is really acting as the agent of the Department of Labour. There is no part of our vote for that purpose. Either the Minister of Labour or myself would be very glad to answer the hon. member's question when the bill is discussed.

Mr. REID: It seems to me rather strange if there is no opportunity under the estimates for the Department of National Defence to discuss these camps.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no item under which the camps could be discussed.

Mr. REID: But they are under the minister's jurisdiction, and I should like to know under what item we may ask those questions. I do not know how many camps there are in British Columbia, but I believe there are over twenty under the jurisdiction of the minister.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. member wishes to discuss the camps may I suggest that the only item even remotely connected would be that concerning the permanent force. I should be happy to answer any questions under that item.

Item agreed to.

Engineer services and works, $297,500.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would the minister explain if there are any new buildings, or what repairs were made in pursuance of last year's vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the hon. member knows, in a general way this vote is for the ordinary repairs and upkeep charges in connection with military buildings, rifle ranges, camps and fortifications.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Have any new ranges been built?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, there have been no new ranges built, but some improvements have been made on the new range at Vancouver.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would aviation fields come under this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, that would come under the aviation vote.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Do not repairs to aviation fields carried on by the department come under this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, that would come under the aviation vote.

Mr. VENIOT: Is there not a new rifle range established in New Brunswick?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, not under the jurisdiction of this department. Of course a small civilian range might be formed in the community.

Mr. VENIOT: I know a camp has been established for the counties of York and Sunbury in New Brunswick.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So far as I am aware there is nothing in the project which has to do with a rifle range.

Mr. VENIOT: The statement given out by the provincial government of New Brunswick and reported in the press is that the camp established is for the purposes of reforestation and the opening up of a new rifle range in the centre of the province.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think that is an error. Ultimately, under the project going through, it will be a training camp, and is brought about as an unemployment relief project, but there is nothing ready at the present time with regard to it.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the establishment of airports come under item 74 for engineer services and works.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, there will be nothing under that.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $667,800.

Sir EUGENE FISET: May I ask the minister if under this item is included the purchase of general stores for the naval section of the department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, Mr. Chairman.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Under what item does that come?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Under the naval service vote.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister give us a classification showing what these stores consist of?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They include telephone, signal and wireless stores, the inspection of stores, clothing and necessaries, medical stores, also the dominion arsenal at Quebec and the arsenal at Lindsay. It includes everything in the clothing line.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Cannot we have a little more detail? How much for each classification? The item is nearly three-quarters of a million dollars.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Public clothing, waterproof clothing, clothing of all kinds, cavalry stables' necessaries, tools of all sorts, oils, paints and chemicals used for cleaning, all kinds of camp equipment, the necessary lumber, furniture and kitchen equipment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Here is an item of $667,800, and I think we should have some idea how much is spent on clothing, how much on camp necessaries, munitions and so on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The items are as follows:

Clothing, $129,000.
Artillery stores, $48,000.
Telephone, signal and wireless stores, $19,000.
Medical stores, $9,000.
Dental stores, $1,000.
Veterinary stores, $1,500.
Inspection of stores and munitions, $52,000.
Dominion arsenal, Quebec, $318,300.
Dominion arsenal, Lindsay, $6,800.

Mr. REID: Do the stores for the camps come out of this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A very considerable amount is set down for inspection. Will that come under the head of salaries?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. All the stores we buy are inspected, and of course the ammunition has to be very carefully inspected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there any revenue in this department? It has been stated that considerable quantities of goods are disposed of from time to time and fall into the hands of secondhand dealers, and are sold by them. Is there any revenue to the department from the sale of clothing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: None whatever. If we had anything that was beyond use to us it would be turned over to the dominion salvage officer. He would dispose of it, and the proceeds would go into consolidated revenue, not to the department at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are these items of stores purchased by tender?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the contracts for clothing and such like, is there a fair wage clause inserted by the department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, there is a fair wage clause in all our contracts.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the inspection go to the point of seeing that the fair wage clause is carried out in the filling of the contracts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, I cannot say that we go beyond a declaration that the fair wage clause has been carried out.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid that the minister is mistaken because the duties of the director of contracts in the department include not only the letting of the contracts but seeing that every clause of the contracts is closely followed. I think he does follow the contract through. He did in the past.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Of course, he inspects the goods carefully, but I do not know that he would go beyond the declaration of the firm that they had lived up to the clause, and make a personal investigation.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think he does.

Mr. MacINNIS: My information is that some of these contracts are sublet, and possibly again sublet several times, and that eventually the wages paid certainly would not meet the requirements of a fair wage clause in any contract. The question I wish to ask is whether the department follows up the contract and sees that the fair wage clause is actually being carried out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, we do the best we can to see that it is followed out.

Mr. MacINNIS: "The best we can" must mean that you are satisfied that the fair wage clause has been lived up to in every contract for the manufacturing of supplies for the department. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There has never been any assertion made to the contrary, and so far as I know the clause has been lived up to in every case. I have never heard of one case in which representations were made to the contrary.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would the minister be so kind as to furnish me with certain details in connection with the item under discussion and which includes travelling expenses? I am putting the question in French to the hon. minister because he speaks that language as well as I do English. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) also understands French. They are the only two English-speaking ministers, who understand French; I must congratulate them. I wish to inquire as to what are the travelling expenses of officers of his department who visit certain military schools in this country.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Travelling expenses would come under civil government contingencies, not under this vote.

Mr. JEAN: But on page 26 there is a paragraph explaining General Stores, and it includes the words, "Travelling expenses and other services generally."

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not the details separated to show the travelling expenses.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): It would be interesting to know the details of that expenditure as I am aware that some extravagant outlays are made in that department. What amazes me most is that the Department of National Defence is the only one whose estimates do not vary since 1930. I notice in the estimates of 1932-33, that over $14,000,000 were expended for national defence and only $8,000,000 for agriculture, namely $3,000,000 less than in the budget of 1930. There is much lamentation; various remedies are proposed, legislation is resorted to; inquiries are held, etc., so as to cut down expenditure. In the Departments of Public Works, Agriculture and many others, economy is practised. while the estimates of the Department of National Defence remain as they were in previous years. I have much esteem for the hon. Minister of National Defence; however, I should like to have some details which will permit me to make further inquiries when other items are considered. There seems to be quite a lot of favouritism in that department because friends are more looked after than economy. The hon. minister states that he has not those details. I have my doubts, however, I shall take his word. At all events, I shall have an opportunity of referring to this matter when other items are considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I regret I have not the information desired in that particular form. The question has never come up before but I shall be glad to obtain the information for the hon. member.

Mr. ROSS: I understand the minister has received one or two requests for the turning over of discarded clothing to welfare associations to be used for returned men instead of it being handed over to the salvage corps.

I do not know whether this clothing would amount to very much but I think the suggestion is a good one. Returned men who are now on relief obtain rent, groceries, fuel and light but except in one or two places nothing is allowed for clothing. I should like to know if any action has been taken in this regard.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Nothing in the way of clothing is turned over to the salvage officer. Discarded vehicles and things of that kind are turned over, but in recent years he has received no clothing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was the point I was raising a moment ago.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A great deal of this clothing was given to the Red Cross but the stocks were finally exhausted. This consisted of boots, underclothing and some overcoats. Anything that could be of any service has been turned over to that organization.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,994,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was the amount voted and the amount expended last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The vote last year was exactly the same but as this year is not completed we have not the total expenditure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could the minister give an estimate as to how nearly the expenditures took up the vote of last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The expenditures to the end of December amounted to $1,342,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the latest report?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. minister would have given better proof of his disposition to practise economy in his department, had he reduced this item by the same ratio as he did that relating to cadet training. The whole country would have been grateful to him had he reduced this budget item under consideration. The financial situation of the country is not so flourishing as it is thought in certain quarters. Under these circumstances, I would welcome a reduction of 50 per cent on this item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was impossible to cut this item to the same extent as the cadet item was cut. In a sense, this is the most important item in our estimates as the non-permanent militia is the backbone of the whole service. The vote has been cut considerably during the last few years. No member of this body of men makes a cent out of what he is doing for the country, in fact practically everyone is out money. I believe the vote has been cut down as much as possible and still allow the organization to be kept intact.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the strength of the ranks in the non-permanent militia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About 52,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: And the number of officers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About 7,000.

Mr. JEAN: The details of this vote are given on page 26, and they include grants to associations. I should like to know what associations benefit from these grants.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are the provincial and dominion rifle associations and the cavalry, artillery, engineers, signallers infantry and machine gun service branches.

Mr. MITCHELL: The minister stated that the strength of the ranks was 52,000 and the number of officers 7,000. Would the officers be included in the first figure?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: On December 31 of last year there were 7,021 officers and 45,504 other ranks, or 52,525 altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL: That would be an officer for every 6½ men.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, but I must elaborate that a little because the hon. gentleman knows well he might leave the wrong impression in that regard. It is much easier and takes a much shorter time to train a man than it does to train an officer. All through the last number of years we have had to fall back on training officers and key men as well as we can, so that should any necessity arise, they would take hold and train the others. That is the explanation.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The hon. minister referred to officers just now. I think that most of them are parade officers. Sometimes newspapers publish an item such as: Lieutenant so and so, captain so and so, colonel so and so. I often wonder how they were promoted to those ranks. I know a few by name, and I really think that these captains, majors or colonels have never known any fire save that in their stove at home. It would be most interesting to find out how many of these parade officers, when the war broke out, in 1914, joined the C.E.F. I knew a number of them in various towns and believe that not one of them went overseas. Some of them, as soon as they heard of war, burned their uniforms.

The hon. minister is an officer, a military man by profession, and a qualified officer at that. He is perhaps the ablest minister of the cabinet, one who knows best his business, because he has found it possible to maintain his budget intact ever since he has had charge of that department.

A military camp was stationed at St. Johns, last year. If I well remember, a number of military men arrived on the 1st, 2nd or 3rd September, stayed over Labour day, the 4th, and performed some training. I would be very curious to learn from the hon. minister, what this 4 days' camp at St. Johns cost, including travelling expenses, rations and other expenses.

These military men passed a day or two at the barracks, their transportation expenses had to be paid from Sherbrooke, Levis, Quebec, Joliette, Montreal or elsewhere. On Sunday they underwent some training and also had a church parade; on Monday, some more training. I wonder what such military men are worth as to their military efficiency, after costing the country $8, $10, $12 or $15, each. They do not even know how to shoulder a rifle when they break up camp.

I would also like to know how much each militia man cost the country, in these so called two weeks camp training. For a number of years past, we have had these camps at St. Johns, and I may state that there are young men who come to these camps that were never born to shoulder a rifle. Would the hon. minister inform the house how much each man costs the country for two weeks' training in such camps, simply for rations and salary, not including travelling expenses? A number of these men, after the camp has broken up do not even know how to handle a rifle.

In a crisis, when all departments retrench, especially Public Works and Agriculture, I do not see why the Department of National Defence should not do likewise. The hon. minister stated that he had reduced by 50 per cent the item relating to cadet training. If I thought I could persuade the minister to do so, I would request him to reduce by 75 per cent the militia budget for 1935.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: With reference to what the hon. member has said about the camps held at St. Johns, those camps are not as they used to be prior to four or five years ago when a good many regiments from that military district would go there full strength and put in probably twelve days of training. We have not had the money to hold those camps and as a consequence a great deal of the training has been done at local headquarters. The various regiments about which the hon. gentleman has spoken have done a lot of training at their own headquarters. Then they would probably go to camp, as the case is there, for four days, one company from one town, another from another, and get together for combined exercises. A good deal of the money that was spent for that would be spent by the regiments themselves. In some cases we gave a grant of the food and paid the railway expenses, but in many cases they put up a great deal of the expense themselves.

As regards what the hon. gentleman said about the officers and the men, I am firmly convinced that the men whom we have in the militia at the present time are just as good a lot of men and officers as those whom we had before the war and who went to the war, and that if ever the necessity arose again, they would acquit themselves just as creditably. The fact that an officer or a man smokes a cigarette or carries a cane or does something of that kind is no sign that he is not a good man, because everyone has to have his moments of relaxation; we cannot all be keyed up to concert pitch all the time. A person who does not take a chance or a day or a night off once in a while would never make a soldier.

Mr. RHEAUME: I do not disagree with that, but there are too many what we call parade officers, because when the war started in 1914 I know some of those parade officers burned their uniforms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That would be a very rare occurrence. Some men who, one might think, were the least likely to be soldiers, when they got overseas and right up against it, were among the best that ever went to the war. You cannot tell from the looks of a man what kind of a soldier he will be when in action.

Mr. RHEAUME: But I know some soldiers who were for many years in St. Johns and when the war started, they quit. When it was time to go to fight, they would not go, although they had been in St. Johns perhaps five or ten years, drawing their pay every month. When they had a chance to make a good showing at fighting, they quit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A certain number of officers and men stayed in Canada not from their own choice, but because there was a great deal of very important work that had to be done in this country in the way of recruiting the different contingents, training them and getting them ready to be sent overseas; that was a very important job. While I do not know of particular cases, and possibly in some cases something might not have been quite all right, in the majority of cases they were doing very important work at home.

Mr. VENIOT: I see that in 1932-33 the amount was $1,882,810 and for 1933-34 it is $1,994,000. How is it that it could be done for so much less in the former year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The reason was that we were cut down very greatly that year, and as a consequence had to do without any artillery training at all practically. Now artillery —and the same applies to machine guns—can only do a very limited amount of effective training at home, because they cannot fire their weapons. We find that if we were going to get results at all we had to take those men to camp.

Mr. LUCAS: May I ask if there are any training camps being held now similar to those held a few years ago, and if so at what points?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not the same as there were several years ago but, as I have explained, there were last year and will be this year camps for machine guns and artillery and engineers. There will be a camp at Petawawa, one at Hughes and one at Sarceé along those lines.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What proportion of this vote was spent last year on city units and what proportion on the rural militia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not got that but I will be glad to get it for the hon. gentleman.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister simply tell me if the city units attained to full strength last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, they took their full strength and in many cases trained many more men than they were paid for.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What kind of training did the rural units undergo last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The procedure is this. The district officer commanding the district makes his plan of what he would like to do. He knows his various units and whether they can train to advantage at their local headquarters or get together it may be at the headquarters of the colonel, or possibly go to a central camp for a few days; he makes his recommendation and if it is approved he carries on that training.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid the minister did not quite get my question. For instance, I would like to know the proportion in numbers of each regiment in the Quebec district that trained at Valcartier last year. Was it only the skeleton formation, of non-commissioned officers and officers, or were the men brought in?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Any particular unit?

Sir EUGENE FISET: I would like to know about the 189th Rimouski regiment, if possible.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The training authorized for that regiment was total training strength, 58, and they were at Valcartier from the 15th until the 24th of August.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does that include officers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, that would be all ranks.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am anxious to ascertain whether if you carry on the same kind of skeleton training next year, the officers selected from each regiment to attend these camps will have the right to qualify from rank to rank instead of attending the ordinary school of instruction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, yes, we are keeping up the schools and they will have every opportunity to do that.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister did not exactly get my question. I am asking whether instead of being compelled to attend the school of instruction for two or three months in order to qualify from rank to rank, opportunity will be given to officers attending these camps next summer to pass their qualifying examination there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, in the junior ranks they would, but it is obvious that in the senior ranks they would have to have more.

Mr. PERRAS: I do not know if my hearing is defective, but in his remarks a few minutes ago the minister mentioned some statistics, which I understood to be for September 31 last year. If I am wrong I want to be corrected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The figures I gave to the hon. gentleman were that his regiment went to camp from the 15th to the 24th of August.

Mr. PERRAS: Then I admit my hearing is defective. I remembered the rhyme about "thirty days hath September." I apologize.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it the intention of the department to pay to regimental units —I speak especially of rural units—the full allowance they are entitled to under the law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes the allowances will be paid.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The hon. Minister might inform me as to what is the salary paid to officers in camps lasting two or three days as we have had in St. Johns, last autumn? I put questions to that effect and the minister was kind enough to reply on Feb. 27, that there had been 215 officers and 1,113 men of other ranks, namely one officer for five privates. The pay of officers amounted to $5,561 while those of other ranks received $3,293. The transportation cost amounted to $503 paid to the C.P.Ry., and $844 to the C.N.Ry. The total expenditure amounted to $24,393. I find rather expensive the fact of spending $25,000 to allow a number of soldiers to pass a few days in St. Johns, doing military training. My case is perhaps similar to that of the hon. member who stated just now, that his ears must have been at fault, because I thought I heard the hon. minister state that some of these officers did not receive any pay. However, according to the report I have just mentioned these officers received $5,561 and other ranks $3,393. Could the hon. minister inform me what amount the officers and other ranks receive per day and whether the officers and men are paid from the day of their departure up to their return to their home?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The figures are as the hon. gentleman stated, but of course it is well known that the pay of an officer is more than the pay of other ranks.

Mr. RHEAUME: Surely, because there are nearly 215 of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes; the pay for regimental officers is as follows:

	Per day
Lieutenant colonel	$5 00
Major	4 00
Captain	3 00
Lieutenant	2 00

Mr. RHEAUME: And expenses?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And expenses.

Mr. RHEAUME: What are the soldiers paid?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The pay is $1 per day.

Mr. HEENAN: Can the minister tell us whether or not the supplies for these camps are obtained by tender and whether or not the contracts contain the fair wage clause?

[Sir Eugène Fiset.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The only separate tenders there would be in connection with the camps would be for food. The men have their clothing, and so on before they go to the camps. In connection with the contracts for food there would be no clause of that kind.

Mr. HEENAN: When the department is purchasing supplies for these men, such as boots, clothing and so on, is that done by tender?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: I see that an order in council was passed under the relief legislation entering into a contract for some 26,000 shirts for the unemployment relief camps. Could the minister give me any idea of the date of the last contract prior to this, which is dated February 9?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What is the date of the last order in council?

Mr. HEENAN: The last order in council I can find passed under the relief legislation is dated February 9, 1934. I wondered if the minister could say when, prior to that, a similar purchase was last made by any branch of his department.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not exact information as to that. Every year we make purchases of that kind, but I have not with me the dates of the different contracts.

Mr. HEENAN: Would the minister be good enough to lay on the table the last two agreements prior to the order in council of February 9?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. HEENAN: This order in council is for the purchase of 26,000 shirts; the drill is to be supplied by the department and the contract is with a manufacturing concern in Quebec. The rate given is 61 cents per shirt, which is in consideration of the material being supplied by the department. This would leave about 21 cents per shirt to cover labour, overhead, sales tax, transportation and so on. I wonder if the minister could tell me whether his department or the Department of Labour have found out what portion of that 21 cents went to labour.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When a contract of that kind is let by order in council we immediately refer it to the Department of Labour with regard to the fair wage clause and so on, so that would come under the Department of Labour, to whom we refer every contract of more than $1,000.

Mr. HEENAN: This seems quite a departure from the Dominion government's fair wage policy. The order in council goes on to say that the minister, on the advice of the deputy minister, recommends the acceptance of the tender of this company at 61 cents per shirt, which is the lowest tender, and which includes the estimated transportation charges for delivery at Winnipeg, provided that the company complies with the minimum and fair wage laws. That does not refer to the fair wage clause of the Dominion government and I do not see how this government can insist that the provincial governments enforce their own laws. When the government let a contract I think they should specify the wages and conditions of labour and should not leave those matters to some provincial law, whether it be in Ontario or in Quebec. In my estimation this is mass buying; there is no doubt about that. I should like to know whether the government are trying to evade their own laws with respect to fair wages; that is the point I want to make. I believe it will be found before long that some of the provinces do not carry out the minimum wage laws they have passed, so I think it is a dangerous procedure for the Dominion government to rely upon a corporation to obey a law upon which it is quite evident the province has not insisted. In other words I am satisfied that when we ferret it out we will find that these shirts have been manufactured under the worst sweatshop conditions.

I do not want to delay the minister's estimates, because he had been very patient, he says he take a night out once in a while and I should not like to keep him in. But I should like to ask the minister a question or two in connection with the work on the air-ports which are being constructed throughout Canada, and with especial reference to the work at Lac Seul. I wonder if the minister would not give instructions to headquarters at that point to purchase their supplies, such as hay, oats, meats and vegetables, in the district in which the work is being carried on. I understood that the principle in connection with these unemployment relief projects was to employ those living in the district in which the work was carried on and to distribute the money spent in that locality as far as possible. I think the minister will find that the supplies for many of these camps, and especially the camp at Lac Seul, have been obtained at centres far removed from the camps. In the case of Lac Seul a large portion of the supplies, as well as of the men working there, have come from Winnipeg. I wish the minister would interest himself in that situation, because I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman would like to see a fair distribution of the little money that is being spent in that way. In that connection I should like to ask another question: Is it the policy of the department to have these jobs filled by patronage, that is, through the defeated candidates in these particular ridings?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, that is not the policy of the government—nothing of the kind. May I say that I am in favour of the plan of purchasing locally which the hon. member has mentioned, and so far as possible we are carrying it out. We are purchasing around Lac Seul camp whatever can be purchased in the way of fodder and things of that nature. However, we must remember that in the smaller centres it is more difficult to purchase meat locally, because one cannot be assured of the regularity of supply. At one time a farmer may be in a position to send in a carcass of beef or pork and at another he may not. We have to be assured of a steady supply. However, when that supply is available we are only too delighted to accept it. I have given orders to buy locally, where possible, and they are being carried out.

Mr. HEENAN: I quite agree with the minister that there are obstacles and difficulties in the way of buying locally, but I do suggest that vegetables and fodder could be purchased in the district concerned. During the three and a half years of construction along the trans-Canada highway we have been trying to get the Ontario legislature to insist upon their contractors giving a square deal to the people who have settled along the highway. Only now, on the eve of an election, have they made a public declaration. And through whom have they made it? Through the new Conservative candidate in the riding. Despite the fact that the minister had promised action on two or three occasions, this candidate insists that he has finally secured an arrangement with the contractors. I do not want to see the Minister of National Defence get into these five cent parochial politics; I should not like to see him follow the example of the Minister of Lands and Forests and his associates in Ontario. I have more respect for the Minister of National Defence than to believe he will follow their example.

While on this subject I should like to refer to the matter of filling positions, if they may be so called. I hope the minister does not refer to them as jobs, because the men are being paid only $5 a month and their board, if they work. I could produce to the minister a letter showing that in Winnipeg, where a man applied for the job of timekeeper, he was referred to the defeated candidate. I am sure the minister does not wish that practice to continue. I can understand, in a general way, what is meant by patronage. In this country it is the defeated candidate, the man whom the people did not wish to represent them, who, in fact, does represent them. But surely when we are dealing with men who are going into the bush to earn a living—because that is all they are getting out of it—they ought not to be forced to go on their bended knees before a man whom the people defeated at the polls and whom, they said, they did not want as their representative. I do not wish to speak to the Minister of National Defence as I spoke to another minister not so long ago, because I feel satisfied all that I have to do is to draw to the attention of the minister the conditions existing and he will see to it that unfortunate people in Canada do not have to appear on bended knees before a defeated candidate or anybody else. They ought to be treated as human beings.

Mr. GOTT: I have no desire to delay the committee, but I hope the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has observed in the press of to-day that the Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario is quite capable of taking care of himself. The night before last he put many hides on the fence, in the Ontario legislature, and had the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River been there his hide would have been on the fence too.

Mr. HEENAN: I would say in reply to the hon. member, who seldom says anything unless an onion is squeezed in the chamber, that any time the Minister of Lands and Forests puts my hide on the fence it will cost the province of Ontario a great many more millions of dollars than it cost at the last election. He spent a good many millions during the last election campaign in an effort to put the hide of the present member for Kenora-Rainy River on the fence, and I can say right now to the hon. member for South Essex—onion Essex—that the Minister of Lands and Forests will not be put on the fence, because Liberals do not act that way. They send them home to rest, where he ought to have been this last five or six years.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister is willing to permit the discussion about camps to proceed on this vote.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would prefer to have the discussion on the next vote.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to revert to a question raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), namely the question of contracts which have been let and are being let by the Department of National Defence. It came to my attention yesterday, through a gentleman whom I met in this city, that there were bitter complaints about contracts being let for clothing for the permanent force. I believe this particular gentleman regards himself as a fair employer of labour. He tells me that the conditions under which uniforms are made are such as would not be tolerated by any government familiar with them. I do not know whether the minister himself is cognizant of the fact, but I may explain that the gentleman in question is a fairly large manufacturer of clothing, operating in the city of Montreal, and observes union rules. I believe he knows what he is talking about, because he helps to make the specifications for the department. He has stated that owing to the intolerable conditions under which clothing is being made it is almost impossible for any employer of labour who deals fairly with his employees to receive a contract. On a former occasion when I raised this question the minister stated that in this connection no individual had made a complaint to the department. I now make that complaint. I do not wish the minister to feel that my complaint is in any degree personal, because I understand the practice has continued for quite a number of years.

The other day I stated, as I have always maintained, that the government ought to be a model employer of labour, yet it lets contracts for uniforms, or clothing, under conditions which bring no credit to the government or to those responsible for letting the contracts. I understand that a great many difficulties stand in the way. One is that of the patronage list from which the government must choose; very often contracts are let to people who themselves do not manufacture the goods and the contracts are sublet. Of course the first party receiving the contract has to have a profit—you may call it a rake-off, if you wish—for taking the contract and subletting it. Once these contracts are let I should like to see some follow-up process adopted to see that the fair wage clauses are properly observed. I believe such action would help to mitigate some of the evils now existing in connection with the letting of contracts.

After all, there is a great deal of competition among manufacturers to obtain government contracts. Sometimes they are fairly large, and the pay is fairly sure. Very often the profits are taken out of the hides—and in this instance the term "hides" is being used in its proper sense—of their employees by paying them miserably low wages, and by undercutting an employer of labour who wishes to pay to his employees a decent wage in accordance with the laws of the particular province affected. If the minister wishes to have evidence about contracts for clothing for the army which have been let in past years, I am prepared to submit to him all the information he may require. All I am asking at the present time is that the minister sees that in future these abuses are eliminated and that provision is made for proper government supervision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I shall be very glad indeed to give that assurance. I am very much in favour of the work that is being done by the committee in this regard, and I hope that its labours will be fruitful. Anything that I can do to assist it, I shall be very glad to do.

Mr. ROSS: I have been trying to estimate from the reports what is taking place, and to supplement my information I would ask the minister what is the number of infantry battalions, the number of regiments of cavalry, and the number of batteries of artillery that are on strength, and how many of these are active, how many non-active, and how many have had training. Only by figures of that kind can we get any idea of what is being done. If the minister has not the information available at the moment perhaps he would get it, as the discussion of his estimates will not be closed before six o'clock. I would also like to know how much has been spent during the past year in the purchase of rifles and machine guns.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I shall be very glad to get that information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ROSS: It would help me in a little estimate I have been trying to make on my own, and I should be very much obliged for those figures.

Mr. RHEAUME: Will the minister inform me who had the contracts for supplying the camps and the military school at St. Johns, Quebec?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman can hardly expect me to have details of all the contracts here, but I shall be glad to get and send to him the information he requires.

Mr. RHEAUME: When does the minister think he will be able to give me that information?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Our contract branch is closed now, but I can give my hon. friend the information to-morrow.

Mr. RHEAUME: Thank you. I should also like to ask why the present government is not calling for tenders from people who used to supply bread, butter, vegetables and fuels to the barracks at St. Johns. A farmer who used to supply the department came to see me last summer and asked me if I could find out when contracts were to be let for the supply of vegetables for the winter. I sent a telegram to the minister five or six days before the contracts were let, asking him to send down blank tenders for vegetables, but I did not receive any answer to it, and this farmer did not receive a tender blank.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think that telegram ever came to my notice. Occasionally I am out of town, and probably what happened was that the telegram was set aside awaiting my return, and inadvertently was never brought to my attention. I have no recollection of having received it, and certainly if I had received it I would have sent what was asked.

Mr. RHEAUME: Can the minister say why the farmers and people who used to supply vegetables to the barracks at St. Johns no longer receive notice of the tenders? I would also ask if the minister has not received complaints against a man who had the contract for supplying vegetables to the barracks at St. Johns.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not remember any particular complaints. Of course from time to time we do get complaints and we endeavour to remedy the trouble. If a person has inadvertently made some error we try to adjust it, and if someone deliberately tries to furnish us with bad stuff, our relations with him are immediately terminated.

Mr. RHEAUME: I am very much surprised that the minister has not received complaints against this contractor. In 1931 when I asked the minister about a contract that had been given by the department for the furnishing of supplies in St. Johns the minister told me that as he had been in office only a few months he was not familiar with all the details of his department. It is very strange, Mr. Chairman, that since 1930 the contract for supplying vegetables to the barracks at St. Johns has gone to a man in Montreal, who, if I am well-informed, is the uncle of the defeated candidate for that district in 1930. I am also surprised that the farmers do not get the chance to submit tenders for the supply of vegetables. We have gardeners and farmers who used to supply the department with fresh vegetables, and they are better able to furnish them, I think, than this gentleman in Montreal. The minister is a very nice gentleman and he has always treated me very well; I wonder if he will be good enough to send me a list of the names of the people who have these contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have been on a committee elsewhere, Mr. Chairman, and I should like permission to ask of the minister under this item two questions in regard to the city of Vancouver. Is he able to give any encouragement in regard to the Seaforth armoury, and secondly in regard to the civilian air force.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not in a position to say anything definite about the Seaforth armoury. Of course that would come under the program that was announced in the speech from the throne with regard to dominion buildings. But that is not yet in shape to make any announcement. My views on that question, however, are exactly the same as I expressed to the house.

With regard to the non-permanent air squadron which has been authorized in Vancouver, it is coming along. Officers are being taken on and we hope to give them some training next year.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I have not been able to be present earlier, having been engaged on a committee. Perhaps the minister has already given the information, but I wanted to ask under this item how many men he expects to be able to train this year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: 29,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Does he expect to have some field camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We will have some camps for the engineers and artillery and for the machine gunners, but not for other branches of the service.

Mr. RALSTON: No field camps at all for the infantry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the artillery camp be at Petawawa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Petawawa, Hughes and Sarcee.

[Mr. Rheaume.]

Mr. RALSTON: And the engineers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Petawawa.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force, $4,910,034.

Mr. RALSTON: What strength is it intended to carry under this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Practically the same as last year. The strength at the end of January was 3,531.

Mr. RALSTON: That is all ranks?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: All ranks.

Mr. RALSTON: How many officers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: 418.

Mr. MITCHELL: How many men?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: 3,114.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I notice that by P.C. 84-G the Department of National Defence is charged with the operation of the relief projects in the various camps. This order in council seems to indicate that the department must not only officer, command and administer these camps but shall purchase supplies and equipment as needed. I should like to know how payments are made in these cases. Is money transferred from the relief fund to the department, or are the bills sent direct to the Department of Labour?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Money is voted to our department by order in council and we pay the bills.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In connection with relief camps, I should like to refer again to a matter which came up under another item. Accidents sometimes occur in these camps and there is no provision for the men being brought under the provincial workmen's compensation acts. As much care as possible may be exercised but accidents occur. Simply because these camps are under the Department of National Defence is no reason why there should not be some arrangement with the provincial governments whereby men injured would receive compensation. I should like to know what action can be taken along these lines.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There have not been very many serious accidents. There was one unfortunate accident at Petawawa a couple of weeks ago where a man was fatally burned. That is the only real serious accident of which I have heard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope that it will not be necessary to have a great many fatalities before a policy is adopted. I have heard of a number of accidents in my part of the country. I assume that some were minor accidents but they were of a character which would be covered by the compensation act. These men are taken out of regular channels of trade and put to work under the direction of the Department of National Defence, and it seems only reasonable that some compensation should be provided for them or their dependents.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The great majority of men in these camps have not been taken out of other vocations; they have not been working at all. If something does happen to them they are given the best of medical care, nursing and hospital treatment until they are ready to go back to work.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How many men are at Valcartier at the present time? Is it the intention of the department to increase the number of men at this camp? I heard the minister state over the radio the other day that many men in these camps are being absorbed into industry and it was expected that the number located there would decrease. However, I was told in Quebec recently that it is the intention to increase the number of men at Valcartier, and I should like to know whether that statement is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are 1,569 men at Valcartier and we would be prepared to take on several hundred more if the need arises.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I understand that men making application to enter one of these camps have been told that there is a fixed establishment and no vacancies exist. I had the applications of two or three men last year who wanted to be taken on at the citadel but I was told there was no vacancy. I asked if any vacancy existed at Valcartier, and I was told there was none. A few days afterwards a vacancy did occur. I should like to know if there is a fixed establishment which cannot be exceeded, and also the procedure to be adopted to have a man received at one of these camps. Should he apply to the officer commanding the district, or to the camp commandant? Are the camp commandants permanent officers, or are they selected by the minister?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We can accommodate only 423 men at the citadel. On February 28 the strength was 420.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is that camp at the citadel for men of Quebec only?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was originally started to take care of men from Quebec city; the men from outside the city would normally be sent to Valcartier. The hon. gentleman inquired as to the mode of procedure. The normal course is for a man to apply to a dominion or provincial labour bureau, or if there is no such bureau in his municipality, to the mayor or the reeve. His application would be sent on and he would be taken into a camp if a vacancy existed.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Would a member of parliament be considered the same as a mayor or reeve for this purpose?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If any hon. gentleman has a case in mind, we would be quite prepared to rely upon his judgment that the case is a proper one, that is, a single, homeless and unemployed man. If any hon. member sends a name along we would not need any further vouching.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

National Defence—Permanent force, $4,910,434.

Mr. REID: The minister was good enough to indicate to the committee that under this item we might discuss some matters in connection with the camps. What I have to say is not so much by way of criticism as by way of suggestion to the minister. Before the camps in British Columbia—and I am speaking of the camps on the lower mainland—were taken over by the Department of National Defence and while they were under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, supplies for them were purchased locally. The purchasing agent would buy locally potatoes, carrots, beans, pork, mutton, in fact all the eatables, and it was of considerable benefit to the farmers in the vicinity of those camps to have the purchases made locally by the purchasing agents. But when the change took place, all that was cut out; supplies then began to come from the city of Vancouver and companies like Swift and Burns began to supply them. In these times the system of purchasing supplies from the local farmers ought to be continued.

I listened to the minister's statement that those supplies were bought locally wherever it was possible, but that it was not always possible to purchase from the farmers. I can assure him that so far as the three camps in my constituency are concerned, the farmers in the vicinity are well able to supply them with all the eatables required, with the exception, of course, of flour and so forth, which has to come from milling companies. But I visited one of those camps last December and I think the minister should be made aware of the situation that while there were some three hundred men in the camps near Whiterock, they were still purchasing from outsiders supplies of wood and having it hauled by a local contractor. It was a matter not just of having the wood hauled but of having it purchased from local contractors. As I say, there were three hundred men there and at times difficulty was experienced in finding work of a profitable or desirable nature, so I think those men should have been put to work at cutting the wood for the camps.

I was in another place near the boundary of Alberta and the supplies for the camp there were coming from Vancouver, but a large quantity of them had come from Edmonton and Calgary, gone right past the camp to the city of Vancouver and then were sent back over the railways to that camp. It is only my duty to draw these matters to the attention of the minister, but particularly I refer to the purchase of supplies from the farmers in the vicinity.

I feel assured—and I would like the minister, if he has the prices, to give them—that his department is paying much more for the supplies bought from the wholesale companies than they could be purchased at from the farmers locally. It would have been of great assistance to the farmers there had the government continued in force the system that prevailed before the minister's department took over the camps. I think some explanation should be given why the supplies are being purchased wholesale, because that angle of the situation should be taken into consideration and the farmers in the vicinity given an opportunity of supplying all the beef, pork, mutton, vegetables, butter and eggs required. As a matter of fact, they were able to supply and were supplying that produce to the camps during a period of at least two and a half years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I realize fully the sound sense in what the hon. gentleman says and so far as possible we are quite willing to buy our supplies locally, but the committee must remember that we must have continuity of supplies when we have, as the hon. gentleman says, three hundred people in that camp. We must be assured of having the supplies come in regularly and that cannot be done if we deal with individual farmers. We have not, in charge of the camps, a man experienced in dealing with produce, neither is he supplied with transportation to go out and get into touch with the farmers. I have given this matter considerable thought and it seems to me that the way to get the full benefit of local buying would be if the farmers had an organization, a farmers' club or a cooperative circle there, so that we could deal with one man. That would make it much easier to guarantee a regular service in the way of supplies and would use up the produce of the locality. We should be glad to do that and we are trying as much as possible to do it.

Mr. REID: I am glad the minister mentioned that, because for his information I might say that we have a farmers' organization such as he has described, comprising over one hundred farmers, growing vegetables of all kinds, and the local manager of that organization could not get a look-in at all, immediately the camps came under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence. Prior to that time there was no trouble in the purchase of supplies. The manager of that corporation interviewed the officials, but they told him that they would not buy their supplies through it. I am meeting all the arguments of the minister, and I believe I am putting up a very good case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think the hon. gentleman, if I remember correctly, ever wrote me to that effect. If his organization is there and prepared to do business and if he will let me have the name, we shall be very glad to give the man an opportunity to tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not know whether the minister gave the information this afternoon—some of us were attending a committee meeting—in regard to the total number of camps in each province for single unemployed homeless men, and also the total number of men in each province in such camps.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The figures are as follows:

Province—	Number of camps	Number of men
Nova Scotia	1	308
New Brunswick	4	635
Quebec	5	2,165

Mr. POWER: Where are the camps located in Quebec?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Megantic, Bishopton, Quebec—that is the citadel—Valcartier and St. Johns at the barracks.

Mr. POWER: What is the number of men at each camp?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Megantic, 64; at Bishopton, 67; at Quebec, the citadel, 420; at Valcartier, 1,569; at St. Johns, 55. In Ontario there are 34 camps with 6,335 men; in Manitoba, 6 camps with 572; in Saskatchewan, 3 camps with 1,152; in Alberta, 8 camps with 1,330 and in British Columbia, 62 camps with 7,390.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the total?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It was 19,887 on the 28th of February.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have the numbers in these camps been increasing or decreasing in the last three or four months?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They are increasing gradually.

Mr. VENIOT: Where are the camps located in New Brunswick?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Blissville, Upper Brockway, the municipal airport at Saint John, and Coulter's Siding.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where are they located in Saskatchewan?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Dundurn, Ladder Lake and White Fox. At Dundurn there are 1,052 men; at Ladder Lake, 54; and at White Fox, 46.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): And where in Manitoba?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Lac du Bonnet, Winnipeg air station, Duck Mountain, the headquarters of military district No. 10, Caddy Lake, and Shilo.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Can the minister give the reason for the tremendous number of camps in British Columbia? Is it because unemployment is worse there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know that it is, but the provincial government had a great number of camps there and we took over all they had.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the minister give the cost of operation for the past year? I understand that the actual administration is done by the department, so that the cost would be exclusive of that.

Mr. PERRAS: Could the minister give particulars as to what proportion would be in the province of Quebec?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Proportion of the money spent? I will try to find that. The expenditure from the inception of the scheme, about October, 1932, up to October 31, 1933, was $3,125,411.

Mr. PERRAS: I would like some further particulars, if the minister would be kind enough to look into the matter and give a fuller statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I assume the hon. gentleman would like me to give a fuller statement on the whole system.

Towards the fall of 1932 it became apparent that there were many young men of a certain class who were not fitting in under the existing systems of relief, notably men moving around from one town to another and having no particular home ties. They were very difficult for the municipalities to deal with, so it was urged upon the government that it was their duty to look after these men because, in many cases, they were not really residents of the towns or cities in which they happened to be. The government accepted that responsibility and asked the Department of National Defence to propose some scheme, because we had a nationwide organization in practically every province, and were able to take it on. The department was very glad to do what it could. The scheme was restricted to single, homeless, unemployed men. As there was at that time a good deal of work that could profitably be done in connection with airports, we first started on that plan, because, as the committee knows, for several years there had been a plan for a transcontinental airway. It had to be dropped for the time being in 1930, but still the engineers were looking forward to its being reestablished, and they had the sites pretty well selected. So it was on the work of clearing those sites that the scheme was first brought into being.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many sites were cleared?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The transcontinental airway was complete as far as the prairie section went. They were night flying there until 1931. The British Columbia section was well planned out although nothing had been done. The worst barrier to the trans-Canada airway was in northern Ontario; we started there putting in these camps about twenty-five miles apart, because while under ordinary circumstances the mail planes will go four or five hundred miles at a jump, they have to have these intermediate landing places in case of trouble or bad weather. The airway follows from Winnipeg along the northern line of the Canadian National to Cochrane, then down to the vicinity of North Bay, thence eastward to Ottawa and Montreal, down through Bishopton and Megantic and across the state of Maine to Moncton and Halifax. The idea is that in the future it will link up with some transatlantic air project, either ship to shore, or, in the more distant future, with direct flights, say, from Ireland to Newfoundland.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have these all been completed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, but a great deal of work has been done on them. The work these young men have been doing, while not one hundred per cent perfect—we did not expect that—has been very good indeed, and in most cases they have been much interested in their work.

Mr. PERRAS: I wish to thank the hon. minister for his explanation.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): According to the report which the hon. minister read to us just now, 55 men were stationed at the camp of St. Johns; out of that number how many reside in St. Johns?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There may be none from St. Johns, because the camps are not necessarily placed in localities where that work is done. For instance, the camp at Petawawa is very largely made up of men from Montreal; the camp at Lac Seul, which is in Ontario, was begun primarily to relieve conditions in the city of Winnipeg, and it is quite possible that there may be none in St. Johns.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I wish to inform the hon. minister that there are in St. Johns veterans who have no relatives, are unemployed and cannot obtain positions at that camp. The hon. minister stated, just now, that they were probably not in good health. Does the department intend to make military men of these young men who are in these camps or is it simply a matter of helping them out of poverty?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is absolutely no question of military training or anything of that kind in connection with any of these camps.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Is a good health necessarily required to be admitted to these camps.

Some of them are in good health but it is said others are not fit to go to these camps.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These projects are primarily for the fit men; there must be some other way of dealing with people who are not fit. It would not do for a man who had heart trouble or some latent tuberculosis to go where undoubtedly there is a certain amount of roughing it. There must be some other scheme for dealing with people of that kind; these camps are for healthy, unemployed young men.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): On whose recommendation were these persons given positions in the camp at St. Johns?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These men go to the camps on the recommendation of the dominion labour office, if there is one at the particular point; if there is not, they are recommended by the provincial labour office or, if there is no such office, by the mayor or the authorities of the municipalities.

Mr. RHEAUME: I know of some young chaps who tried to get placed in these camps and their applications were refused because they had the reputation of being Liberals, and I know other young men who were placed in the camps because they were recommended by the defeated Conservative candidate at the last election. I am surprised at the way they are treating our people in St. Johns; they cannot get to the camps at all. My understanding was that these camps were established for young chaps from the cities who had no homes and were absolutely on the street, but that is not the rule that has been followed in St. Johns. Some young chaps went down and made application, and they were told to go and see Mr. Yvan Sabourin in order to get his recommendation. I know that in some cases they could not get a recommendation, the answer being that there was no place for them because they had the reputation of being Liberals. I do not think that is fair. I know many young chaps in St. Johns who would be glad to go to these camps. Could the minister say what work they did last winter in this particular camp? I do not believe they did very much.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I can assure my hon. friend that there is no politics whatever in the selection of these men. I can hardly conceive that Mr. Sabourin would refuse any such applications, as my hon. friend has said. Of course I would take that gentleman's word if he said a young man had no home and had no work; I would take his word that the young man was a fit subject for one of these camps. Then that man would have to be examined by some doctor, and if he were found to be physically fit he would be eligible to go to a camp. If the hon. gentleman himself has any particular case in mind I am perfectly willing to take his word on those two points, as to the person having no home and being unemployed. Then he would have to undergo a medical examination, after which he could go to a camp.

Mr. POWER: It does seem a sad commentary on the state of the country that it should be a matter of patronage to get a 20 cents a day job, but that is a fact; it is a fact in the city from which I come, at all events. You cannot get into the Quebec citadel and get a job at 20 cents a day unless you go first to the Tory organization. Under this government people have been reduced to such a state that they have to beg for a job at 20 cents a day, and this is not the only case; patronage is rampant all the way through. I doubt very much if there is a loaf of bread, a pound of biscuits or a pound of tea purchased there except under the patronage system. This whole organization has been the playground of patronage mongers ever since it was started.

With reference to the city of Quebec I see there are 420 men employed in that camp, and I think at one time the number reached about 600. They have been remarkably well behaved, and apparently a large number of them are happier in the citadel than they would be outside, but in spite of the assurances given by the minister and I think by the Solicitor General at the time this scheme was introduced, I very much fear that these men are being employed on work which could be performed by married men and others of the civilian population in the city of Quebec. I beileve they are undertaking the repairing of the walls of the city. For the idea of repairing the walls I am very grateful to the government; ever since I have been a member of this house I have been urging on all governments that the historic walls and fortifications of Quebec should be put in some sort of repair. But by employing these men on that work and doing it cheaply the government are depriving stone masons, carpenters and labourers of the city of Quebec of legitimate employment. I think this is wrong; I believe it is a mistake; and in my opinion the government have followed the wrong course in taking this action. I do not believe these men are doing the work they should do. The other day I was going down the street and happened to run across a few of these men, with whom I had a little chat. One of them was sitting down, and I said, "Having a pretty good time?" to which he replied, "Yes." His pal said, "That fellow has not moved from that rock on which he is sitting since he came here at eight o'clock this morning," and the chap sitting down answered, "What the hell do you want me to do for ten cents?" This was before noon, so I do not suppose they did very much work for their ten cents that morning, or very much for their ten cents in the afternoon. I do believe the government are taking away employment from other people in the city.

Then at Valcartier I believe there are some 1,569 men, and if the newspapers were accurate, at one time there were something like 1,700 men there. I understand that at Valcartier they are building an arsenal, though I am subject to correction on that. I am told, however, that they are laying the foundations for an arsenal, and I suggest that an arsenal is not a very useful public work in these days, when the whole world is preaching disarmament. I can readily understand how work could be done in clearing up the camps, and in reforestation, which later might be found useful, but to build an arsenal in Canada at this particular time is, I think, quite unnecessary. I have serious doubts as to the homelessness of a great many of the men in the camps. I speak subject to correction when I say that there are a great many farmers' sons in some of the country camps, and that many of those young men have as good homes as any hon. member in this house. So far as the city of Quebec is concerned I know personally very few of the men in question, but I believe those at the citadel are nearly all citizens of Quebec city, and are men who, to a large extent, have homes. They may have been burdens on their homes, and I do not know that I can blame the government for taking them in and giving them good food. But to say that these men are homeless transients is not giving an accurate picture of the situation. They are not. We would be giving a more accurate picture if we were told that they are taking the work from other men.

I shall give the minister an example in his own department. For the past fifteen or twenty years, or more than that, a number of men were employed by the militia authorities on what were called engineering services and works. The number of men employed ran from thirty to forty, and it was considered they had more or less a permanent job. For many years they were employed every day. Since the inauguration of the camp at the citadel, however, these men worked for something like three days a month. The great majority of them were married, and at least ninety per cent, if not the whole one hundred per cent, were returned soldiers. I know that, because during the time the Union government was in power in Canada I had a great deal to do with making appointments to those positions. And, during the time the Liberal government was in power, when I was not seriously interfered with by my colleague from Quebec East, I had a good deal to do with those appointments.

An hon. MEMBER: Patronage.

Mr. POWER: This was straight patronage, absolutely; these were government jobs, and we do not make any bones about it. But we did not go whining about the country saying that we were relieving the unemployed when, in fact, we were just trying to relieve our own party. There was one stipulation, however, and it was that these men all had to be returned soldiers. Their work was reduced to something like three days a month, and, I understand that more recently, in October, as a result of representations made directly to the Prime Minister, they have been given about four days a week. The fact remains that they were deprived of their jobs which, in some cases, they had enjoyed for ten or fifteen years, and these unemployed were doing their work. That is a situation which should not be allowed to continue. These married men who have been in the habit of getting steady wages should not be deprived of them on account of these men.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would not intervene in this discussion were it not for the unfair picture which the generally fair and good natured member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has presented. I would not like the impression to go out to the country that relief work is done through patronage. There is one camp in my riding and another one a short distance north, and in connection with neither has there ever been any thought of patronage. As a matter of fact the men come in there upon the recommendations of the reeves of the municipalities. I think even my hon. friend will agree with me that the Conservative party cannot monopolize the election of all the reeves in the country.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: If it is under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend I know it will be done fairly and justly. I am not complaining about him; I am complaining about his colleagues in my district.

Mr. McGIBBON: I know that as a matter of fact such a thing has never occurred in the camp in my riding. So far as I know—and I believe I know a little about it—the contracts have all been let by tender. Many Liberals have secured them, in fact more than I would have given had I been in charge—I must be quite frank about that. The camp has done that which I believe it was intended to do; it has relieved the muncipalities of a relief burden which undoubtedly they would have had to carry. I have repeatedly told municipal authorities that if they have men in their municipalities whom they have to feed, they should if possible send them to these camps. Undoubtedly the action of the government in this connection has made it easier for the taxpayers in many municipalities. Moreover, the camp has been a sort of home for that class of people generally known as tramps, men who go wandering through the country and hammer at your door for something to do, or, at night, some place to sleep. When that occurs I direct them to the military camp.

The statement has been made that all are not taken in. That is quite true. I must say, however, that they are not taken in because there have not been sufficient facilities to house and feed them. These camps are generally built on specified bases to accommodate one hundred, one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty people. In my part of the country there might be three hundred applications, and as there are not sufficient facilities of course some applicants cannot get in. To my mind that is not the fault of the undertaking. Probably it was not expected that the facilities would have to be of such great magnitude as circumstances have shown they should have been. I should like to commend the minister on the fairness of the distribution he has made; I wish I could compliment him on paying the men a little more than twenty cents a day. As I said, however, even the twenty cents a day has been a godsend to many of these people, some of whom are young and have no homes, and nearly all of whom would otherwise be on relief. I say it has been a godsend to them, and has relieved the municipalities of a considerable burden which would have been added to the taxpayers' sheet.

These people in my riding are happy. I have visited them, and know they are contented. They have a pretty good time, and they have a right to it. I do not think we should ask them to give one hundred cents' worth of work for twenty cents, but we must remember however that they get their clothes, food, housing and free medical attention, so that to say they receive only twenty cents a day is not a fair statement. They are told repeatedly, and personally I have tried to encourage them, to leave the camp if they can do better elsewhere, but in the last five or six months I have not heard of one who has left. They are not compelled to stay there; the door is open to them, and they can walk out at any hour of the day or night. The camps are fairly well equipped; there are rooms for sports during the winter; as a matter of fact I had the privilege of supplying some of the equipment. They have boxing and wrestling tournaments; they have an orchestra and a radio, and on the whole they are contented and happy. I am sorry that the hon. member for Quebec South, has tried to inject party politics into this discussion. He does not very often do that; as a rule he is fair in his statements, but to-night he seems to have fallen a little from grace.

Mr. DUFF: Are there any of these camps for homeless, single, unemployed young men around Ottawa? I presume the government is entitled to some credit if these camps are taking care of homeless unemployed young men—

Sir EUGENE FISET: Do you want to send members of parliament there?

Mr. DUFF: No, but members of parliament have to put their hands in their pockets every morning—

An hon. MEMBER: And at night.

Mr. DUFF: And at night to help these unfortunate young men. It costs me every day of my life at least one dollar, from the time I leave my home on Daly avenue until I get to the House of Commons, to help these unemployed young men, and while I am attending to my duties here there will be four or five homeless unemployed young men at my apartment asking for help. If the government are taking credit for looking after these people, why should I and other members have to spend at least a dollar a day, perhaps more, to help them to get something to eat or drink?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Of course the department has no power to take anybody off the street and put him into one of these camps, but if a young man is physically fit and goes to the bureau here in Ottawa he would be perfectly eligible to go to a camp and would be received.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask the minister two or three questions with regard to a situation that is not clear in my mind. Would he be good enough to inform me who are the heads at the present time of the naval service, the air force service, and strictly the army service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: General McNaughton is the chief of the general staff. Group Captain Croil is the head of the air force, and Captain Nelles is the head of the naval force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why was Commander Lindsay Gordon, who was in the air force, sent out west to command a military district at Regina, and why was Commodore Hose, who was recently head of the naval forces, retired from the service? Was it on account of age or long service?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Commodore Hose resigned. At his own request he was relieved. I should like to take opportunity on this occasion to pay a tribute to him. He did excellent work for Canada for many years. I never saw a man more interested in his work than Commander Hose was in the navy. He did everything he could. He has the imperial viewpoint. As to Group Captain Gordon, while he was an air force officer, he had also taken a senior course at London in more advanced military work. He is the first air force officer who has been put in charge of a military district. He is a man of splendid administrative ability, and I think if my hon. friend will make inquiry he will find that he is giving every satisfaction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not questioning that at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: He is giving every satisfaction not only to ourselves but to the military men.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who are the two officers respectively who succeed him?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The two officers who are now there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I mean who succeeded Group Captain Lindsay Gordon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Group Captain Croil succeeded Group Captain Gordon here. Commodore Hose is still on leave pending retirement, and Captain Nelles in the meantime is acting director.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To whom do the heads of the air force and of the naval service report? Who is their immediate head? Is it the deputy minister of National Defence? What I want to get clear is the chain of responsibility. Is the chief of the general staff in control of or superior to the heads of the naval forces and of the air forces in Canada, or is the chain of responsibility here, as it is in most other countries, through the minister, the deputy minister and the respective heads of the various forces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The naval forces would report in the ordinary course through the deputy minister to me. The air forces would report to the chief of the general staff. The chief of the general staff and any member of the defence council is at perfect liberty at any time to come to see me or the deputy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the minister quite satisfied that the chain of responsibility is being observed in the service at the present time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have no reason to think anything else.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): In my constituency there is located probably one of the largest camps in western Canada, sheltering at the present time over a thousand single unemployed homeless men. I was surprised tonight to hear the remarks of my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power). In regard to contracts and that sort of thing I can only say that I have had more trouble with my Conservative friends who have been disappointed than with anybody else, because they have not got contracts. By and large these contracts have gone to Liberal supporters of my hon. friend from Quebec South and his friends on the other side of the house.

My hon. friend from Quebec South also made some remarks in regard to men not being able to get into these camps. I do not know how the camps are run in this part of the country, but probably you are so steeped in patronage matters down here that you expect that that is the only way to run these camps. But it is not the way it is done in western Canada at least. These men go to the government employment bureau or to the police, and from there are sent to the doctor for examination, and if found physically fit they are sent to the camps. There are over a thousand men in the camp I speak of, and I can say from personal experience that they are entirely satisfied with their treatment. I have known of only four during this past winter who were turned out of the camp, and they came back to my city and went to the police and wanted to be arrested as vagrants. They did not succeed in that method of getting a bed and breakfast. Then they went somewhere else. I have had delegations call on me regarding these men. They were men with a great social outlook, and I made it my business to try to get them jobs, which I succeeded in doing. They were thrown out of the camp because they were agitators. They belonged to one of the affiliated organizations of the C.C.F., headed by my right honourable friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—the Workers' Unity League.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I trust the hon. gentleman will stick to the facts in his presentation. The Workers' Unity League has no connection whatever with the C.C.F.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I am very sorry if my memory did not serve me correctly, but there are so many of these organizations affiliated with the C.C.F. that it is difficult to remember them all. But I have no doubt that there is some semblance of justification for my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I cannot permit the hon. gentleman to make a false statement and then try to say that that statement had some foundation. There is absolutely no foundation for his statement, and any gentleman would not try to continue that kind of tactics.

Mr. MacMILLAN: It is a strange thing that each time I get upon my feet the hon. gentleman wants to interrupt me.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I interrupt only when false statements are made concerning myself. The hon. gentleman I say cannot make false statements in this house in my presence without being checked up. He tries to get away with it but he cannot do it.

Mr. GOTT: Then why did you not object to the term "right honourable" which he applied to you?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a base hit.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): If I made a mistake in putting this organization in the wrong pigeonhole I am sorry; I did not mean to do it. I was simply stating that these four men belonged to a certain organization, and I may have got the name of the organization wrong. I shall look that up and advise the hon. gentleman whether I am right or wrong. If I am wrong, and the organization is associated with him, I hope he will admit it.

Mr. DUFF: Why did you not get them jobs?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I am coming to that. These four men were thrown out of this camp for being agitators and carrying on propaganda. As I said, they came to Saskatoon and I took it upon myself to try to get them jobs. Through a friend of mine I was able to obtain work for them in the northern part of the province. They were given work in the bush at reasonable wages, the same wages as other men up in that part of the country were receiving. After a week had passed I was informed that they were doing very well, but that state of affairs did not last very long. Within the next few days the mounted police were called in and these men were taken away. They had served terms in gaol at one time, and three of them were sent back to gaol. There were 996 men left in that camp, and I submit that those who seemed to be perturbed about these four men being thrown out would have rendered greater service to the country if they had gone down and patted on the back the man who was running that camp for keeping the other 996 men satisfied. So far as my province is concerned, the department is doing a very excellent work and I congratulate the minister upon the results which have been obtained in the camp in my constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister has given the committee an illuminating description of the airports which are being prepared across Canada. The committee will remember that two years ago several members of the air force were dismissed or let out by the present administration. These men all had wide experience, and I suggest to the minister that as a matter of policy certain senior officers could well be dispensed with and these men taken back into the force. I think we have far too many senior staff officers. Doubtless they have rendered splendid service to the nation, but I think their services could well be dispensed with. If it is necessary to carry out a real defence policy for Canada in the future, I think the air force will play a most prominent part in that policy. The minister should be commended for the preparation of these airports, but I believe it would be a very popular and democratic move to take these men back into the service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know when I have regretted anything as much as having to let these particular men out. As the hon. member has said, they had given good service, but when you cannot get the money there is nothing else to do. As far as senior officers are concerned, the air force is a little different from the infantry, the cavalry or the artillery. In those branches there are a few men coming in and a few going out every year, but in the air force, which really did not get started until after the war, the men have all come up together. Entirely different qualifications are required for a war time pilot and a commercial pilot. The only object of a commercial pilot is to get his passengers and plane safely down to the ground; if he runs into bad weather or anything of that kind he lands, but a war time pilot cannot help but be reckless. Only young men can be used in this service. They have to fly upside down, inside out and every way to fight in their planes. I realize the importance of what the hon. gentleman has said, and this matter will have to be dealt with at some time.

Mr. MITCHELL: I congratulate the minister upon what he has just said, and I should like to quote from an article by Mr. Thomas Wayling entitled The Brass Hat Parade which appeared in the November issue of the Canadian Magazine. It reads:

> Brass hats are on parade in Canada now from coast to coast. There are now permanently employed three major-generals, eleven brigadiers, twelve full colonels, thirty-two lieutenant colonels, sixty-nine majors, ninety captains and seventy-four lieutenants. These figures include forty-eight officers who wear the red tab and gold lace of the staff officer.

An hon. MEMBER: Scandalous.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some one says "scandalous," and I agree with him. This looks like a form of unemployment insurance for army officers who might well be retired. The minister is quite right in saying that this thing should be looked into. The minister told me this afternoon that there are 7,000 officers in the non-permanent forces. In 1913 there were only 4,452 officers, one officer to every six and one-half men. In the permanent forces there were 418 officers to 3,114 men, or one officer to each seven men. In France in 1916 there were 4,452 officers to 104,251 of other ranks. I realize the conditions which existed in those days in France, but I cannot understand why there should be so many officers in Canada at a time when there is a world wide cry for disarmament. We have more officers to-day than there were in 1913. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I think the department should endeavour to make a saving and apply it in the building up of an air force. Twenty-five years from now I believe that most of the people who will have to travel long distances will do so by air. That is inevitable, whether or not we like it. The government should give serious consideration to the matter before deciding to wipe out the air service. If economies are to be effected, they should be effected by reducing the comparatively large number of officers in the militia department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I should like to revert for a moment to these famous camps. Either last year or the year before, the board of trade and the municipal council of Rimouski sent petitions to the department asking that one of these camps be established at the aviation field in that city. They called the attention of the department to the fact that a great deal of work needed to be done on the aviation field, and also that the nearest rest camp was 180 miles from Rimouski. They stated that there was not a rest camp on the lower St. Lawrence and that one was needed very badly. The answer received to this petition was that the matter was under consideration. That is over six months ago. I wonder whether due consideration has been given to the request and what answer they may expect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: So far as its having a bearing in connection with the Trans-Canada route is concerned, the route will not run in that direction. I can understand that there might be a necessity for a camp down there in connection with a service that might at some time be coming up the St. Lawrence from the gulf. My impression was that the landing field there was in fairly good shape and that it has been in use almost constantly in the summer.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I know that, but there is a great deal of levelling to be done. This is gradually being done by day labour during the summer, but what the board of trade and the municipal council of Rimouski and all the surrounding parishes desire is to have one of those rest camps to provide the young men who have no home, first of all with shelter and then with food in connection with the relief work. If we have to send our young men 180 miles to Quebec, that is practically prohibitive. The base field at Rimouski will serve not only Rimouski but also all the surrounding counties. For that reason I think consideration should be given to the request.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I shall be glad to look into the matter. I do not know about it personally.

Mr. COTNAM: I would like to say a word in connection with relief camps, as I happen to know something about the camp at Petawawa, project No. 40. That camp was inaugurated almost at the beginning and at the present time we have in it in the neighbourhood of one thousand to twelve hundred men. I have been through the camp repeatedly and I have heard those camps alluded to in the house as slave camps. The only people who are complaining about those camps are politicians who are anxious to make a little political capital out of the unemployment relief situation.

The camp at Petawawa is a credit to the minister, to General McNaughton and to the officer commanding who is at present in charge of that camp, Colonel Bogart. I have gone around among those young men and they are well dressed, well fed and well housed. I wish to corroborate every statement that has been made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) and also by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) with regard to the camps in their respective constituencies. I have not heard any complaints from the lips of the young men who are employed in those camps and in most instances they are as fine a type of young Canadian manhood as one would care to look upon any place in this country.

With respect to the purchase of supplies for those camps, supplies have all been tendered for and contracts awarded to those submitting the lowest tenders. I am sorry that the hon. member for Quebec South has perhaps spoiled some of his young men in that he says they sit down and do not care very much to work.

Mr. POWER: Not my young men, the Solicitor General's young men. I have not a thing to do with them.

Mr. COTNAM: Well, someone must have gone down there and set them a bad example.

Mr. POWER: Yes, the Solicitor General.

Mr. COTNAM: The young men in camp at Petawawa are doing a fair day's work; in fact some of the farmers there have told me that those young men are doing as good an average day's work as the ordinary labouring man. They have been doing excellent work in that camp; they have been clearing the landing field; they have put up many new buildings that under ordinary circumstances would perhaps not be constructed for years; they are providing artillery practice grounds and constructing roads, and I really think when the roads are a little better for automobiling, hon. members could not spend a more profitable day than in visiting and looking over Camp Petawawa, project No. 40. If they do so and if they do not return to the house and say that those men are as fine a type of young Canadian manhood as one could find anywhere, I shall be very much disappointed.

With respect to the manner in which those men are engaged, there has not been in that locality at any time even the slightest tinge of patronage. As regards every single unemployed homeless young man, and I think I might say some of the unemployed young men who belong to families receiving relief in the town of Pembroke, all they had to do was to go down and make application at the employment bureau. If there was accommodation in the camp, those young chaps were then sent for medical examination and if they were physically fit, there never was any question about their getting into the camp.

With respect to the purchase of supplies, they have been in large measure purchased locally by tender. If I had any fault at all to find with the administration of that camp, it would be only on the one point that when meat supplies were being obtained, the supplies were bought not locally from the farmers in that section of the country but from the Canada Packers organization and shipped from Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER: Are there farmers' sons in that camp?

Mr. COTNAM: Farmers' sons have not been employed in that camp. Everything considered, I would think if the camp in that locality is a fair sample of the camps as they are carried on in other sections of the dominion, they constitute a great factor in creating under present conditions homes for our young men where their morale is maintained and from which, when this depression has passed, they will be ready and willing to take their place in the active occupational life of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In connection with this item we have covered a great deal of ground and I should like to add a few words with regard to the relief camps. I can quite understand that life in those camps may be much superior to that in very cheap lodgings and around the soup kitchens that have been established in many of our cities, but it does not seem to me the proper thing that relief camps should be under the Department of National Defence. I can readily appreciate that the government might wish to make use of machinery which is lying ready to its hand. I can quite understand that those camps might be conducted with a certain degree of efficiency, but I do not like the idea that men who are out of work through no fault of their own should be forced to be under military supervision. It is against the very best traditions of British countries.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They are not forced.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They are in practice forced. I do not mean to say that there is forced labour in the sense in which we have thought of it in some countries, but when a man is hungry and in a bad way, economic necessity forces him. There being no other provision for unmarried homeless men than this they are practically forced, if they want to get anything like a decent subsistence at all, to go into these camps. It is in that sense I used the word. I know the camps are preferable to the very insanitary and uncomfortable conditions prevailing in our cities. It may well be that twenty cents a day is better than nothing, but I cannot conceive that twenty cents a day is sufficient to satisfy anybody who has any ambition.

Mr. COTNAM: Would the hon. member permit me? The men in the camp at Petawawa are not complaining; who are the people complaining about these men? The men themselves are not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman has stated that the only men who are complaining are the politicians. I have talked with many scores of people, not at Petawawa, but located in camps adjacent to my own city, and I find that these young men who have any ambition are not satisfied to go along week after week and month after month getting a bare living at twenty cents a day. It is very generous for the hon. gentleman to suggest that these camps are homes for young men. Of course I can quite understand the accommodation offered is better than sleeping on the streets or in the cheap lodging houses. But I cannot consider that barrack life is in any sense home life.

Mr. COTNAM: I could take the hon. gentleman to the camp and let him see for himself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been through one or two of the camps and seen for myself. Possibly the hon. gentleman might get it through his head that other men come to conclusions different from his, and yet may be equally sincere and observant.

Mr. COTNAM: You might at least be fair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to be fair.

Mr. COTNAM: You are not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman made his speech and gave his observations and conclusions. My conclusions are that although conditions in the camps may be preferable to many that exist in the shelters in the cities, I do not think we can say that this method of handling the relief problem is satisfactory. I would much rather discuss these problems when the estimates of the Department of Labour are before the committee, because that is naturally where such matters should come, but since this branch of the relief service has been taken over by the Department of National Defence the only place for me to criticize is on the estimates of that department.

It seems to me that any relief policy should provide what I might term real work for these men, work of a permanent and abiding character. I know that shelters are being erected that may be of some permanent use; I know there will be a certain amount of clearing and that kind of thing, so that their labours are not altogether lost. But I should like to think of these tens of thousands of young men being given real work, the kind of work for which they are individually fitted, and which they may feel is of value to the country, and at real wages. We talk a good deal about individual initiative and the need of incentive and reward. Yesterday it was titles. We are told that we must have the incentive of high rewards to get the best work. Surely if these things are necessary for people a little higher up in the social scale or a little better fixed financially, they are also desirable for people who are thrown out of work. I should like to think that if skilled mechanics are giving their services, they should be paid somewhat in proportion to the value of the kind of work they are giving. Under a competitive system, if we do not do that it is only a question of time until this situation will be reflected in generally lowered standards of living among the skilled trades. It may be that the food is reasonably good, the clothing fairly suitable, but I suggest that these young men do not live by bread alone; none of us do, or even bread with a few gramophones and athletics thrown in.

Mr. PLUNKETT: They are living by agitation now, some of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman may think he is very smart in implying that I am an agitator. If he likes to call it such I suppose he is free to do so. I am within my rights in this house in pleading for another way of dealing with unemployment.

Mr. COTNAM: Would you commend anything?
