Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that we should be planning how these hundreds of thousands of young people may at the earliest opportunity be given a chance to establish themselves, not in places of this kind but in their own homes.

Mr. YOUNG: To get married!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, get married, because without the opportunities of normal family life a great many are forming habits that they will not be able readily to shake off. I think an opportunity ought to be afforded them of getting steady employment and preparing themselves for their life work. I am not blaming the Department of National Defence for their policy in caring for the unemployed; they may be doing their level best, but I urge that the government ought to be held responsible for dealing with unemployment in some different way.

I do not want to dwell further on that; I will come to the item itself we are considering under National Defence, which amounts to almost $5,000,000. It seems to me that the Department of National Defence differs from almost every other department whose affairs come before this house in that we have never yet been able to get from the officials a clear-cut statement of their policy. Against whom are we preparing to defend ourselves? What is this heavy expenditure of $5,000,000 intended to accomplish? I do not think that is an unfair question to ask.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is what they said a few months before the war broke out.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may have been; I was not in the house at that time. The war did break out and was fought through. After the war was over we were told that we were going to enter upon a period of peace. But the policy of the department did not vary a great deal. Gradually its estimates were cut down. We hardly know what the defence policy of this country is supposed to be. Now it would seem as if we are going to be called upon to join in a race in armaments. Again I am not speaking merely of our own government but I point out that our own government is apparently contemplating something of this kind, and unless some direction is given by the house I do not see how the department can very well avoid travelling in that direction. In a recent issue of the Montreal Gazette, January 31, 1934, I notice an account of an address given by Major-General McNaughton, in which he told of some of the newer and more efficient weapons, and he concluded thus:

> In history, we are not long concerned with nations unable or unwilling to keep pace with armament developments. However notable their civilization, however brave their warriors, and however adept their statesmen in the art of treaty-drafting, they soon pass from the stage before the onward march of those well able to forge and wield the newer weapons.

So to-day apparently the chief of staff is preparing to provide us with more recent and more efficient weapons. I presume that that is his job as chief of staff, but I would say that it is the job of this parliament to say whether that is the way we propose to defend this country.

I noticed the other day a very interesting article in Canadian Business, which is published by the Canadian Chambers of Commerce, from which I will read a few sentences:

> Canadian business men are no strangers to war in the past tense. Too many of those we knew fought and died. All glory to them and credit to those who have returned to carry on. So much for the past. The future is an entirely different matter. Canada doesn't want another war, but if there should be one, Canadian business will have to foot the bills. As our friends "The Extremists" have told us, war is much too expensive, even though it is far from impossible. If you don't believe it, let's look at some costs—then think until it hurts before entering another.
> In the good old days a true sword in the hands of an able man was an excellent and economical military investment. Then along came gunpowder, and with it the customary cost budget: two bullets equalled one fatality. However, as we entered the machine age, warfare became its apt pupil and best customer. Result: it now costs $25,000 to kill a soldier.

That is from the business standpoint. I think we are all beginning to realize the terrific cost of war. We cannot very well look over the world situation to-day, whether in Europe or in Asia, without realizing that another war is quite a possibility. So it seems to me that we, as a nation, have to decide very definitely what action we should be prepared to take, and how we plan to defend ourselves. Are we simply going to enter upon this armament race, as the nations have done again and again in the past, or is it possible for us to devise some other means by which we can contribute alike to the safety of the world and to our own security? I think that is the question which ought to be faced by this house. It ought not to be sufficient for these estimates to be presented and for us to discuss whether or not we want another camp here or a militia unit established somewhere else; those are questions which undoubtedly will have to come before any advisory committee on defence. Rather it is for us to consider the main policies and what is necessary under those policies.

The other day I came across this statement, which very well opens up the whole question:

> I appreciate the seriousness of the statement that I am about to make to this honourable house, but I am giving my considered, definite opinion when I say that I cannot conceive of any developments which would justify this country in sacrificing the blood of one single Canadian on the future battlefields of Europe. Let us look ahead! We must! We generally get into trouble by not taking the long view. Let us act in such a way that we can honourably decline to participate when the hour arrives.

That was said by a prominent Canadian military man in another place, and I believe that statement places the situation squarely before us. Whence are we to look for security? Are we in Canada to adopt an isolationist policy; are we to say that we must prepare to defend ourselves against all comers and that through our own unaided efforts, by means of our military equipment, our great navy and our air force, we are to protect our coasts? Is that to be our policy? In all seriousness I submit that if that is our policy the amounts we are voting in these days are altogether inadequate. I am not urging larger appropriations, but I do say that if we propose to depend upon our own unaided efforts to defend our coasts through military strength, then these sums are insignificant; they are wholly inadequate for such a purpose.

What other policy might we possibly adopt? We live alongside a very powerful neighbour, the United States. Are we to depend upon the United States for defence? I can understand that we may need to do so if trouble should break out between, we will say, the United States and Japan. There is quite a possibility that if the United States were attacked Canada would be attacked also, and what is to be our position in such a contingency? Are we to be prepared to withstand such an attack alone, or shall we have to fall back upon the military strength of the United States?

Again, it may be said that we are members of the British Empire, and that we will have to depend upon the British navy. I am not sure whether under certain circumstances the British navy would be an asset or a liability, or whether the British navy could be counted upon to come to our assistance. And I have enough independence to say that if we are going to take that position I could almost join with those who say we ought to make our contribution to the British navy, a policy in which I do not believe as I hold to another policy altogether. I do admit, however, that those who definitely depend upon the British navy to protect us have a great deal to support them when they advocate that Canada ought to make her contribution to the British navy.

Let me point out that our connection with Great Britain might easily lead us into troubles that we as Canadians otherwise might escape. Great Britain has a far-flung empire; trouble might break out in India, in Hongkong, in the islands of the sea, in the nearer east, in Egypt or in any one of a hundred places where Great Britain has interests. Under those circumstances what is to be our attitude as a Canadian people? Are we prepared to do our share in the defence of the empire, and to come to its defence as we did in 1914? I think those are questions that ought to be pretty clearly stated. If Great Britain should be depending upon Canada coming to her defence again, as she did in 1914, and if this statement which I have read expresses the views of many Canadians, then it seems to me we might be letting Great Britain down pretty badly at a crucial time. If Canada is not in the future to send a single soldier to die on the battlefields of Europe, we should be prepared to make the statement honestly and openly to the public, and let the world and the British Empire know where we stand in that regard. But we have not done that. Are we then, in planning for national defence, taking these matters into consideration? If we take the stand that we will not come to the help of Great Britain if she becomes involved in some European or Asiatic turmoil, now is the time in all honesty, to say so, and if we say so we cannot expect help from Great Britain.

There is one other relationship that I think ought to be recognized. We are a member of the League of Nations. Does that mean anything to us?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Somebody suggests that it does not mean anything; I am not sure whether or not that is an official pronouncement. If it is, I think that official pronouncement ought to be given very wide publicity. The League of Nations means nothing to us; then, I ask, what is the alternative? The League of Nations, at least in ideal, has stood for a collective system of maintaining peace. I have never been enthusiastic over the League of Nations, because at first it was very largely a league of victors, and throughout to a large extent it has been a league of great powers. None of us was willing to grant the league any very great measure of power; too often we have asserted that we would maintain our own sovereignty no matter what happened to the league. Well, the league has done some good pieces of work, but the league has shown itself very weak indeed because the member nations would not give the league support, and to-day the League of Nations is very much discredited. But having said all that I come back to this point: what, then, is the alternative? If we are going to give up the idea of an ordered world, of peace and of agreements as a means of attaining peace; if we are to go back to the bad old way of fighting it out as individual nations, where will the world be within a very short time? If that takes place, war, and a much more serious war than the last, is inevitable, and that in the not distant future. It seems to me that if we were serious about the League of Nations we would spend a great deal more of our energies in trying to work out, through the league, some of these world policies which might bring us peace. Apparently we are not very active in that. And so we are in this House of Commons and in this country flopping backwards and forwards without any definite policy.

I venture to raise this question to-night in the hope that it might stimulate us to do some thinking. Are we prepared to defend ourselves by our own efforts against all comers? Secondly, are we going to ally ourselves with the United States? Thirdly, are we going to maintain our connection with Great Britain, and under what conditions? What obligations are involved in the maintenance of that connection? Then, fourth, are we to emphasize our membership in the League of Nations and either make that league something worth while, or try to develop something which will be worth while to take the place of the league? Roughly, as I see the situation, these are the alternatives which lie before us at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Which is your preference?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was not my purpose to-night to state which is my preference.

Mr. BOYES: Why mention allying with the United States?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am bringing forward certain definite alternatives which seem to me to be possibilities. If it is worth anything to the minister I will state my preference: I believe our hope lies in strengthening the league. That is where our hope lies—in strengthening the league or, if the present machinery of the league is inadequate, in substituting for it some machinery which will do the work better.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We cannot do that by ourselves.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would you be in favour of physical force to back up the league's decisions?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope we will not go into details.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say this, that often one has to choose between two alternatives. If there were an alternative between spending $150,000 for cadets and $300,000 for cadets I would vote for the $150,000, not because I believe in cadets but because I believe it is the lesser of two evils. I can conceive that under certain circumstances some sort of world international police force might be better than our present rival standing armies. It is not that I want to depend upon force, used even by an international police force. The nearest to a practical proposition which has come to my attention is that we should have some sort of international air force, because, undoubtedly, aviation is the latest and perhaps the most efficient arm of our defence service. If, instead of each nation maintaining its own force, and all armed to the teeth, we had some sort of international air police service, we might be taking a very decided step in advance. But, personally, I confess that I have very little confidence in physical force as a means of settling disputes. Within the bounds of the nation we have set up courts and most of us obey fairly well the decisions of the judges in those courts. I think we will not be on a safe basis until we come to some such arrangement in our international affairs, set up our courts and all agree to abide loyally by their decisions. That would be civilization. I do not know whether we can attain that position at one jump, but in the meantime I believe in working as rapidly as possible in that direction.

I do not intend to detain the committee further, but I think I am justified in asking the minister to give to this committee some idea as to the underlying policies of our national defence. I think I have a right to ask that, and I hope we may have some statement from the minister.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman, as usual, and as in every speech I have heard him make in the house, has offered nothing of a constructive nature. In fact, I have never heard him satisfied with anything except the C.C.F., and that party is gradually drifting away,—part of it is thrown out and the other part leaving of its own accord. The hon. gentleman seems to think that we in Canada have been consistently building up more and more armed forces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I did not suggest that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Let me give him some figures. In the year 1930-31 the appropriation for the Department of National Defence was $24,214,795, whereas this year it is $13,737,000, or, to put it another way, in four years the appropriation has been reduced by more than $10,000,000. Let me give him another figure with regard to the per capita expenditures by various countries of the world for purposes of national defence. For the year 1932-33 the per capita expenditure of Canada was $1.35; New Zealand, $2; South Africa, $2.03; Germany, $2.46; Australia, $2.47; and the figures go up until we come to France with the largest per capita expenditure of $11.15.

Let us approach the subject from another angle, namely that of the percentage of the budget appropriation used for purposes of national defence. In Canada the figure is 3·9 per cent; Switzerland, 21·4 per cent; Japan, 34·1 per cent, and France 29·4 per cent. Surely with such figures as these it is most unreasonable and unjust for the hon. gentleman to say that we are building up in this country, for some purpose, a tremendous force.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said nothing of the kind, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member inferred it, from beginning to end.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I "inferred" nothing of the kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I repeat, the hon. member inferred it from beginning to end. If the hon. gentleman did not, his speech meant nothing. I suggest that the government should be commended for the stand it has taken in regard to national defence. Practically every nation in the world believes in defence. The great trouble which has occurred in the past and has come down through the centuries is that some strong and powerful nation has become so refined and over-civilized that it has refused to fight or to support itself and has deputized other people to do its work and fighting, with the result that some other stronger and more virile race has come in and conquered. There is a great tendency for civilization and the desire not to fight getting too far advanced in this country. I do not believe in a nation of nincompoops who will not stand up for themselves. It is only the lowest and most depraved sort of man who will not under certain circumstances defend himself. I believe the same holds true as regards a nation. Canada has to be prepared to defend herself to take her place in a manly and proper way in any world affair which may develop.

The hon. member may pick up any newspaper and read of difficulties throughout the world. We find in practically every paper we read that in Europe, in Asia and in South America there are very serious difficulties. What can we do but be prepared to defend ourselves if the necessity arises, or to take a proper part in the solution of any difficulties?

The hon. member spoke about the League of Nations. During the difficulties which occurred a year ago in Manchuria the great difficulty with the League of Nations was that it did not have a force. If the League of Nations is going to do anything and gain anything I think finally there has to be behind it some measure of force. Canada is a member of the League of Nations, and we must be prepared to carry our share of the load. At the present time we have not a force which is at all out of the way. Our permanent force consists of about 3,500 men, which acts as the nucleus, and then there is the non-permanent militia, a very highly trained and efficient force. It is able to deal with anything that may happen inside the country. Some unpleasantness might arise at any time in any part of the country, and it is the duty of the provinces to keep peace within their borders so that the people may pursue their ordinary vocations unmolested. The first duty of any nation is to maintain law and order, and we have not one man too many to support the provincial police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police when called upon. We were called upon once this year. Fortunately we did not have to do anything in particular when we got there, but the small force that was sent did have a restraining influence. Such an incident might occur at any time, and if we did not have an efficient force sufficient in numbers to support the provincial authorities when called upon to help maintain the civil power, this government would not be doing its duty.

The permanent force also is prepared to train the non-permanent force, which, if the necessity should arise, could be expanded as it was in 1914. I hope just as strongly as does the hon. gentleman that there will never be any occasion to use the force, but if there is I want to see the Canadian militia, permanent and non-permanent, prepared to do its part.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then am I correct in inferring from the minister's reply that our army exists very largely to maintain order within the country and that no provision is being made to defend Canada against external enemies?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: One of the main duties of a government is to maintain order within its borders. At the present time, of course,, our permanent force is not large enough to go overseas; that is not its object, but nobody can foretell exactly what an army is going to be used for. The force is there to be used for some legitimate end should the occasion arise.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the minister on what occasion was the permanent force called out during the last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Stratford.

Miss MACPHAIL: Might I ask the minister if he thinks it was necessary to call out the permanent force to prevent girls from going on strike when they were being paid only three cents for plucking a chicken? Does he think it was necessary to call out the permanent force to prevent men from striking who were working in furniture factories at eight to ten cents an hour, and who went on strike to get something like a living wage?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member is about as logical as she usually is. We were asked by the provincial government to turn out the force, and according to the law of the land it was our duty to do it in aid of the civil power.

Miss MACPHAIL: The minister has not answered my question. I asked if he thought it was necessary to turn out the force.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Trouble might easily have occurred in Stratford, and I fully believe that the Royal Canadian Regiment exerted a restraining influence. Happily they did not have to be used.

Miss MACPHAIL: The strikers won, anyway.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I do not wish to unduly delay the minister's estimates, but I wish to make a few observations arising out of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with respect to camps in which unemployed are used in preparing landing fields for aircraft. With the position taken by the hon. member that the feeding, housing, clothing and payment of these men at twenty cents a day is not a satisfactory solution of unemployment conditions I think no hon. member will take issue, and certainly I shall not, but I do wish to refer to the inference to be drawn from or pointed to by his objection that these camps are being operated under the Department of National Defence. From that the hon. member went into a discussion of war and expenditures of money on war; and he asked if these men were put into the camps under the department for the purpose of having them handy for use—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misinterpret my remarks. I said and implied nothing of the kind.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I accept the explanation of my hon. friend, but I did gather that he objected to these men being used for unemployment purposes under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought the camps ought to be under the Department of Labour.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I know that when these camps were first started it was stated, and published very widely, and the agitation gained considerable force in this country, that these men were in camps under the Department of National Defence and were being subjected to military discipline. I think my hon. friend made reference to that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said nothing whatever to-night about military discipline.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Military supervision, perhaps my hon. friend said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): My hon. friend draws pretty fine distinctions. What is the difference between military supervision and military direction?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure that the hon. gentleman as a former soldier knows that there is a vast difference between the two.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Well, we shall not go into that. So far as these camps being under the Department of National Defence is concerned, and being under military supervision or military direction or military control, there was much propaganda throughout this country to the effect that that was the condition. I took occasion to investigate the matter. I am sure that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre had knowledge of that propaganda. I wonder whether he ever took the trouble to investigate how much military control or military supervision there was.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I tried to.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): And if my hon. friend found the facts to be as I learned them to be, would it not have been just as well, would it not have been fair since he raised the question, to state here to-night what were the facts he found as to these camps? It was commonly stated that these men first had to be attested; secondly, that they were under military direction or military control. It was further stated that it was done by the government, under the guise of giving unemployment relief, actually for the purpose of having at hand and readily available the young manhood of our country to meet any emergency that might arise. The facts are that these men were not attested. They were under no military discipline or control. There are always some facts that can be coloured and distorted to give an appearance of truth in propaganda. The papers that these men were required to sign, the form they filled out, was readily available. Thousands of men were being taken into these camps, and surely the first duty of any man in charge of a camp is to know who are the men in that camp. What are their names? Are they married or single? Whence do they come? All these details were taken, and that is all there was to that. There was no attestation.

As to being under military direction, it is true that the camps come under the Department of National Defence. But the men in charge of the camps were not men in uniform. There were no rifles, no bayonets, no machine guns—nothing of the sort. These camps are similar to the ordinary lumber camps. They are comfortable and modern. Discipline is left to the men themselves and to their foremen, and that is the best kind of discipline you can get. The men are as free to leave as they are to enter. When a men receives word of placement in civil life he is provided with his return railway fare. If he be there a short time and desires to leave without having been placed in civil life, he is free to go. The food conditions, the clothing conditions and the shelter conditions are of the best. These men work for their food, shelter and clothing and in addition receive twenty cents per day and some other articles. I agree that these camps do not offer a satisfactory solution for unemployment, but I do not think there is anything sinister in the fact that they are being operated by the Department of National Defence. The question may be asked: Why by the Department of National Defence and not by the Department of Labour? It happens that the Department of National Defence is the only department which has in its employ engineers who are trained in construction work. These camps are carrying out important public undertakings in the construction of landing fields for aeroplanes and it was necessary that these fields should be prepared in a proper way under the direction of engineers. The engineers of the department could see that the work was properly carried out and an economy was effected in not having to hire other personnel.

From the reference made from time to time to things military, some hon. members would indicate that we should apologize for the estimates of the Department of National Defence. What is behind it all? Is there any reason why Canada should apologize for having a department of national defence? We are not a warlike people. I am one of the most peaceful of persons, but I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that we can ensure peace to the people of Canada by emulating the ostrich, burying our heads in the sand and crying "peace, peace," when there is no peace. I am glad that we have the League of Nations. I believe it has accomplished much more than it is generally given credit for. But back of the League of Nations is the idea that force may be necessary to enforce the treaties of that league. I was a little surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) did not give a straight reply to the question asked by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). He was asked whether or not he was in favour of using force to back up the treaties of the League of Nations. I think we must face the question. We do not want force, but we are not living in "the best of all possible worlds." We have to take things as they are; we must be practical. What purpose is served in this house or in the country by assuming that the estimates of the Department of National Defence should be apologized for? I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) and to all those who cry "peace, peace," when there is no peace: Remember that the history of our race and of every race is that prosperity is only for the free and that freedom is the heritage of those alone who have the courage to defend it.

I wish now to deal briefly with the purpose of the work being carried on in these camps and upon which these young men are being employed. They are preparing aircraft landing fields across Canada. Are these being prepared for purposes of war? No. They are being prepared preeminently for the purposes of peace and the expansion of trade and commerce. We all know what an extra day means commercially in a journey by sea; we all know what a few hours mean in mail transportation and in the delivery of commercial papers such as contracts and that sort of thing. The future of trade and commerce lies in the development of air transportation. The greatest air route in the world lies across Canada. This is envisaged to-day; it will become more obvious as years go by. The path of commerce in the air from Europe to North America and across the Pacific lies across Canada. This path is not south but north of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude. The most direct route westward from Europe to Asia is across Canada north of the St. Lawrence. This government is to be commended for the work which has been already done in laying a foundation for a trans-atlantic and trans-Canada route. Canada's future as one of the great trading nations of the world is bound up in aeronautics. The Americans have investigated this matter and have explored our north country. The recent northern flight of Colonel Lindbergh was not one of idle curiosity. I do not propose to go into that this evening but I should like to do so on some other occasion. Other nations have attempted to obtain vested rights to the air routes across Canada. My best information is that the work on these landing fields was started only after careful study and with the object of laying the foundation for a trans-Canada air service.

These young men who have been taken from the ranks of the unemployed are performing a real national service. In my opinion there has been no work undertaken in Canada in the last decade as important as this establishing of an air route across Canada. I would like to see those men paid more than twenty cents a day and I hope the government, taking note of the better times coming that we hear so much about and which I firmly believe are indeed here, will at the earliest possible moment, which cannot be too soon, on works such as these employ men at a normal wage, because to my mind they are contributing to an undertaking that is transcendentally important in the development of Canada. I think Canada should be able to afford to pay and should pay men employed on work of such national importance a reasonable living wage.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Recently there has come to me from away out on the prairies, from a farming community far from any village or town or city, word that an active canvass is being carried on by people, whether they be C.C.F.'s, communists or socialists, I do not know, but they are all regarded as one and the same thing in that locality, to use the word "revolution" whenever possible in order that our people may become accustomed to the term. Imagine such a thing!

I judge from the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to-night and from the many speeches which he has delivered in the house, that he has evidently come to the conclusion that the proper way for him to bring about war is to talk war, war, war, trouble, trouble, international trouble and every other kind of trouble. There is not a single trouble known to the human race, internationally or in any other way, that the hon. gentleman has not brought up in review in the house in the last three or four years. He is a constant trouble hunter; in fact he is running a trouble factory, and if he wants trouble, he will get it. We in Canada are a peaceable people: we do not want war; we do everything we can to prevent war. If you go to the Chateau Laurier amongst the war veterans in session there, you will not find a single man among them who is not opposed to war, and we on this side are actively opposed to war, but if the hon. gentleman stirs up trouble and is hunting for it, he will get it and he will be very sorry for it.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Macmillan) was talking about the camp in his constituency. I have only one objection to that camp. It is not in my constituency and it is taking hundreds of men from the city of Regina, so that to that extent they are being taken away from us. I would like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to tell me this: If the young men are so dissatisfied; if the camp is so badly run, so abominable as he desires to make out, why is it that dozens of young men, sons of mothers and fathers living in towns and not eligible, are coming to me and asking me to get them into that camp? Does he think they want to get into a dungeon or into filth or into poverty? I do not think so. They want to get into that camp because they know they will be well taken care of and well fed. I have been in those camps and I know something about military life. I do not know whether my hon. friend ever was in military life or not, but I was, and from my observations of those camps they are the best run institutions that can be found anywhere. Certainly there is discipline, but it is in order that the men may be well fed and well looked after. Some of them, as a matter of fact, are too well fed because it is apt to make them think the state is going to continue to keep them when it is not. We are simply carrying them through this condition of depression. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he become a league of nations unto himself and give us some peace in this House of Commons.

Miss MACPHAIL: May I be permitted to answer the question asked by the last speaker? He asks why these young men would go into the camps, why they were coming to him wanting to get in. It is because they had not enough to eat if they did not go in and because it is too cold for them to wander around. I think that is quite a good answer.

I would like to ask the minister whether out of the five dollars a month or twenty cents a day that the men get, they have to provide their own clothes, or are their working clothes provided by the government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: When they go into a camp, the understanding, indeed the fact is, that they are clothed, fed, sheltered, and given an allowance of twenty cents a day. That is in no way a salary, and it is not, as some hon. members have said to-night, with the idea of keeping them there. We do not want to make it a wage. This is not a permanent affair at all; it is merely a transition stage until those young men can get back to work.

Miss MACPHAIL: A few minutes ago the minister accused me of being illogical. I do not think he is illogical, but I think his government is, because if we have 19,000 men who are unemployed, who cannot get work and who are to be used by the government to do work, it is much more logical that this work should be done and the estimates should come up under the Department of Public Works or the Department of Labour or both and not under the Department of National Defence, even though the work that is to be done is in relation to aviation fields. Not that there is anything wrong with the Department of National Defence, but it is the worst, the most illogical place you could put 19,000 unemployed men. If we are going to have a permanent force, and it is permanent force we are voting under item No. 77 on page 25 of the estimates, let it be a permanent force. That is one thing. But camps for the unemployed who are supposed to be doing public work should come under Public Works or under Labour. An hon. member—I think it was the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam)—said to-night that everything that could be needed or greatly desired in the camps was there. If that is true, how is it that this fall in several of the Toronto papers there have appeared signed letters from men in camps, asking people to send literature, old magazines and so forth, and that so many letters appeared and so great was the public interest that a branch of a department of the government of Ontario offered to gather and to transport radios, gramophones, magazines and so forth to those camps? Many hon. members must have read the letters as they appeared in the daily press, and they certainly would not leave the impression that facilities were provided for passing in any sort of profitable way the long winter evenings. I suggest to the minister that there must be something of truth in the letters or a branch of a department of the provincial government would not have taken on the job of meeting the wishes of the men as expressed in their letters.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am telling the hon. member that they were different camps, provincial camps.

Miss MACPHAIL: Possibly they were; at any rate they were run very much the same way—a great many men getting very small pay, five dollars a month or something like that. May I ask the minister how many men, soldiers and officers, come under this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are very few that are directing their whole work to it, though practically all our people here in Ottawa and in the various district headquarters are doing a great deal of work along that line—organization, purchasing, and the like. There are a few in some of the camps devoting their whole time to it. At the Nakina group headquarters there are 6; at Valcartier, 5; at Petawawa and Dundurn, 2; at Lac Seul, 12, and at Coulter's Siding, 4. About thirty, therefore, are devoting their whole time to it.

Miss MACPHAIL: The minister did not understand my question. I mean how many officers and men are covered by this vote? How many are there in the permanent force?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are 3,527.

Miss MACPHAIL: To me $4,910,000 seems a lot of money to support 3,527 men. I am interested now in knowing how the $4,910,000 is divided. Would the minister mind telling me the pay of a private in the permanent force?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The pay of a private is $438 a year.

Miss MACPHAIL: And there are how many privates?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are 3,109 non-commissioned officers and men.

Miss MACPHAIL: What is done with the rest of the money? By far the larger part is still unaccounted for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are a number of items:

Actual pay and allowances, $4,101,701.
Capitation allowances to clergymen, $7,000.
Civilian cooks at barracks and camps, $12,000.
Other civilian employees, $45,000.
Transport and travelling expenses, $48,750.
Stores, equipment and supplies (food), $132,000.
Forage, $45,000.
Fuel and gas, $160,000.
Printing and stationery, $43,000.
Light and power, $43,000.
Telephones, moving refuse, medical service, $46,000.
Courses of instruction in Canada and abroad for permanent force personnel, $74,000.

And a number of smaller items.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not sure of my arithmetic, but if it is sound the 3,100 privates at $438 a year would get about $1,357,000. What is the total amount of money paid to the officers in the permanent force?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: $955,864.

Mr. HOWARD: In regard to the camp nearest the city of Sherbrooke, how many men are in the camp at Bishopton?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At Megantic, 64 men; at Bishopton, 57 men.

Mr. HOWARD: Where are those men from?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not tell exactly. I mentioned this afternoon that there might be some from Montreal, some from Sherbrooke, and some from other towns round about.

Mr. HOWARD: How do they happen to get into these camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The qualification for a man to get into these camps is that he is single, homeless, unemployed and physically fit. Anyone in that category in the city of Sherbrooke would apply to an employment agency, either provincial, or dominion if there is one there; or to the mayor or the relief officer of the city. The district headquarters would be communicated with, and if there was a vacancy at the nearest camp he would be sent there. It is possible that the complement there might be filled, in which case he might be sent on to Valcartier or Petawawa.

Mr. HOWARD: Has the department any plan for some day taking these men out of the camps? How do they intend to rehabilitate them in the ordinary life of the country?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We endeavour in every way possible to encourage the men to get back into civilian work, and with a good deal of success. From the camps in Ontario already 2,069 have left the camps and gone to assured positions. In Quebec 1,366 have gone back to work; in New Brunswick, 211; in Nova Scotia, 337; in Manitoba, 54; in Saskatchewan, 172; in Alberta, 48; and in British Columbia 1,123 have left camps to go to positions.

Mr. HOWARD: I will put the question this way: A lady came to me the other day and asked me if I could intercede to get a certain young man whom I know, of good character, a splendid fellow, into the position of chauffeur to a certain person in one of our cities. He was in a camp, and I asked her: How do you expect to get that young man out of the camp and into the position you mention, having regard to the condition he will be in? Who is going to provide shoes and clothes and shirts and collars and the rest of the things necessary to rehabilitate a man after say two years in one of those camps? What provision or arrangement is being made in that regard?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The man would leave the camp with perfectly good clothes; if the man he was going to work for wanted to get him into a livery, he would have to buy it himself.

Mr. HOWARD: Are they in military clothing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. HOWARD: Can the minister say if any of the men in the camps at Bishopton or Megantic came from the city of Sherbrooke?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I know there are some at one of these camps. The hon. gentleman spoke to me last session, I think, and I took up the matter; I know some of these men went to one or the other of the camps, but I do not know which one.

Mr. MULLINS: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are hearing the annual criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the relief camps. In my constituency I have a camp composed of 1,200 men, and it is very hard to get them out of the camp; I do not know what we are going to do with them. They do not want to go back to farm life; they do not want to go back to work on the land. I have a resolution which was adopted by the United Farmers of Manitoba asking that these camps be abolished so that the farmers can get help. We need these men in the winter time, but they do not want to go back to the farms; they want to crowd back into the cities.

Last year the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) criticized the camp in Riding Mountain park, but evidently he has found the truth in connection with that camp, because I did not hear any such criticism this year. Now, however, he is at it from a military standpoint. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but I should be glad if these camps were under military rule. I lived in Winnipeg in 1919, and after my experience there I should be glad to know that such men were handy, because we needed them in 1919. I stood in front of the hotel in which I was living at the time and a certain element in our city paraded past and told me they were going to take over the hotel for their headquarters. I tell you I felt very unsafe in that city, so I think it might be well if these men were under military rule. I want to say, however, that there is no sign of militarism in any of these camps, particularly in the one located in Riding Mountain park. They have their boxing matches twice a week, their hockey matches and a vaudeville show, and they are living very well. How are you going to get them back to work? As I have said, the farmers are prepared to pay these men more than they are receiving at present if they will take employment on the farms, but they will not do so. I want to see these men go where they belong, on the land, and not crowd into the cities. I do not want them led by agitators. There are agitators going up and down Marquette at the present time trying to lead the people into another political channel. We have ladies speaking in school houses and telling the men what a great mistake they have made in sending certain people to the House of Commons. Well, God forbid that I should sit in this seat one minute if I did not hope to be of service to the men on the land in western Canada, whom I certainly wish to help. I am not here to advocate a gospel in order to get in power. I sat here in 1925 and remember what went on then. I do not want to see a similar condition again. I want to see the present condition continue, with everyone on this side looking to the best interests of the country as a whole.

I have a few good Liberal friends; I am looking at one or two of them now, and I wonder why they do not speak up. They know the situation. I think one of them came back from Toronto once; he was a little scared and said, "Look out for Woodsworth." I am not afraid of Woodsworth or of any other man so long as I do my duty here in this house towards the men on the land, the struggling farmers. I want to see these camps abolished and these men back on the farms where they belong. That is the only solution, and I cannot agree to the waste of money in maintaining them that is going on at the present time.

Mr. MICHAUD: Before we disarm entirely I should like the minister to give me a little information with regard to the camps in New Brunswick. How many are there; when were they established; how many men are in each camp; what is the nature of the work being done and under whose management is each camp?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are four camps in New Brunswick. One is at Blissville. That is a landing field, and the camp has been closed for the winter. There is another landing field at Upper Brockway; there are only six people there at the present time. At the municipal airport at Saint John there are 147. There has been an airport at Saint John for several years, and aircraft have had difficulty in landing in certain winds, so advantage is being taken of this opportunity to improve the field. At Coulter's Siding, which is a forestry project and which will be used for a training area, there are 482 men. These four camps are under the control of the district officer commanding at Saint John.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if the minister could tell me just how much of this money is applicable to the relief camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not a cent.

Mr. RALSTON: But we have been talking about relief camps all evening.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I explained that some of the officers paid under this vote were devoting their time to this work.

Mr. RALSTON: About how much of this amount would be devoted to that work, $3,000 or $5,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are about thirty people concerned, and they would receive a total of about $30 a day from the unemployment vote.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I take it that none of this money is to be used for that purpose?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Some of the officers who are detailed for full time work at the camps are paid by the department.

Mr. RALSTON: Then perhaps $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000 would be the contribution of the department?

Mr. SUTTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister tell me what has become of the item "manufacturing establishments" that we formerly had in this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is now joined up with "general stores"; that was done last year.

Mr. RALSTON: And the item "transport and freight"?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The deputy tells me that is now under "general stores". I do not remember that as a separate item since I have been in the department.

Mr. RALSTON: I mention this because the minister put on record some comparison of the figures for 1930-31 and the present figures. I have just made an analysis of those figures and I should like the committee to see what the analysis shows. I think the minister will agree with me that between 1931 and now there has been practically no reduction in this item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Quite so. In fact, the two items, namely permanent force and non-permanent force, are only very slightly affected.

Mr. RALSTON: The non-permanent is reduced substantially, but the permanent vote is not reduced. Further, I do not think the minister needs to apologize for not having reduced that vote. It seems to me necessary that the permanent force vote should be kept up to the present amount. This is the point at which it has stood since 1930, anyway, and I think before that.

The minister spoke about a difference of $9,000,000. May I say that the real difference between the vote in 1931 and the present vote is that $5,000,000 was voted in 1931 for civil air operations, whereas at the present time there is a vote of only $187,000. In the fiscal year 1930-31, $1,600,000 additional was voted for naval services. Then there is a difference of about $2,000,000 in other items, the chief of which were transport and freight, and manufacturing services, which accounted for nearly $1,000,000, and the votes for non-permanent militia services, cadet services and incidentals. So that the difference of $9,000,000 is made up of $5,000,000 in civil air operations, a vote which at the present time has been reduced to practically nothing. Then there was the extra vote of $1,600,000 for naval services, and $2,000,000 in connection with the non-permanent force particularly, and allied activities.

I shall have a word to say about aviation when the item proper is before the committee. I may add, however, that I am pleased indeed that the minister is undertaking the completion of these landing fields across Canada. I believe he will agree with me, however, when I say that his action is only the continuation of a policy which we have been endeavouring for a good many years to put into effect. It is providing the ground facilities for portions of the country which we could not cover before. As I understand it, these fields are being built, among other places, through Ontario and I presume, to the Manitoba boundary. That is a portion of the territory which before we were not able to cover on Canadian terrain with our aviation services. The service farther west was one which we had already completed and on which the air mail service was running. The lighting of landing fields had been carried out also.

I should like to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) with which I think the minister thoroughly agrees, namely, that our endeavour should be as fast as possible to get the personnel which is now out through the country back into active service so far as civil aviation is concerned. I understand the minister states that there may be a difference between military and civil aviation services, but so far in Canada we have been going farther in connection with civil aviation than we have in connection with military service. We have the personnel and we have the facilities; it is simply a matter of having the money. I am pleased to support any activity which looks forward to an increase in aviation services, because I believe hon. members realize that on the whole, in her national development Canada has perhaps gone farther in aviation than any other country. It is a matter of pride to me that in past years we were able to vote something like $5,000,000 in connection with forestry patrol, geological surveys for mining work, fishery patrols and other services in order to develop our civil aviation. I believe the minister has that in mind, because I understand the other day he delivered an address in Toronto which showed he was familiar not only with the needs but with the possibilities of aviation in Canada.

Mr. HOWARD: How much work has been done at Bishopton and up to date how much money has been expended?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I regret to say I have not before me that information, but I can get it for the hon. member.

Mr. HOWARD: May I put the question in this way: Is the work far enough advanced so that landing would be possible, or has only the preliminary work been done?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot give an accurate answer to that question. About two months ago I saw some pictures of the field, and at that time it certainly did not look as if it could be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In addition to the clearing of sites for airports, what other general work has been carried out by the camps? Is it the intention of the government to keep those camps open during the summer months?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In addition to the airport work, the camps in British Columbia did a good deal of work on the roads. Then, there is the citadel in Quebec and also the one at Halifax which are badly in need of repairs. Those are two historic landmarks in Canada, in connection with which a good deal of work has been done. Then there is some forestry work; for instance, the Lac Seul project is very largely one of forestry. The one we have in New Brunswick at Coulter's Siding is a forestry project, and finally will be used as a camp for that district.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the summer months?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In the summer months, if necessary, we will keep them open. Last year we found that a large number of men went away, particularly in western Canada, and worked in the harvest, or at one thing and another. They will be kept open, but we encourage the men to go out and get other work if they can.

Mr. POWER: What was the cost per day of feeding the men at different camps?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The men are on regular army rations. It costs 29·2 cents per day.

Mr. POWER: That is the figure for the whole of Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, that is the average.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister the figure for the province of Quebec, with particular reference to Valcartier or Quebec citadel, as compared with the costs in British Columbia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not that information before me, because my figures are the averages.

Mr. POWER: But the minister could furnish those figures?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister any idea of how much it costs to clothe a man in the winter season?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It costs for clothing 18·7 cents per day.

Mr. POWER: That figure does not give much information. What does it cost to clothe a man in a winter outfit when he goes in at this season of the year, or some time in December? Would it cost approximately $25 or $30?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It would be difficult for me to answer that question, because I have not the figures in front of me.

Mr. POWER: I imagine there must be a schedule showing the clothing issued to the men.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. POWER: Does it include underwear and that sort of thing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes; they are very well provided with clothing, such as warm mackinaws, underwear, socks and rubber boots. At the present time lumbermen's boots are used.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion which has taken place to-night, and being of a curious turn of mind I cannot help remembering 1930. It is most interesting to see the way in which hon. members opposite come to the rescue of the government in carrying out the policy which they promised in 1930 to put into effect if they were returned to power. I for one am greatly interested in seeing the development of that policy and the defence of it that hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to make. I am sorry the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) found it convenient to leave, also the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) as well as other hon. gentlemen opposite who rushed to the defence of this policy of the government to cure unemployment. How comforting it must be to the people of Canada to realize that now we have the real policy of the Conservative party on unemployment expounded to us by these gentlemen to-night, together with the statement by the minister who is administering the relief camps for the single, homeless unemployed men! How comforting it must be to the electors who voted for these gentlemen! I look at the promises that were made by the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) and by his followers in all parts of Canada not only to cure unemployment but to end it, and yet nineteen thousand young unmarried men are being taken care of by the government of Canada in the various camps to which reference has been made. I have no fault to find with the administration of these camps by the Department of National Defence or with the treatment of the men, but what must the men themselves think? A fair percentage of them voted to put this government in office to end unemployment, and what must they think when they find themselves employed in this manner? Surely the Conservative party ought to be proud of its record. And remember that in every town and village of any size in Canada married men are on direct relief, thirty per cent of which is contributed by this government. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite fly to the rescue of the minister because some criticism is offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and by the lady member of this house (Miss Macphail) over this state of affairs. It is not good enough to say that these conditions are common to every country, because hon. gentlemen opposite said that if they were put into office they would cure unemployment and find work for all. But they did not say it would be at twenty cents a day. They never mentioned twenty cents a day, nor did they say they were going to put the single unemployed men into relief camps and give the dole to those who were married. The hon. member for Long Lake, for instance, tries to ridicule the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for his attitude. It is a sorry spectacle to see hon. gentlemen opposite have to admit after four years of office that this is the best they can do for the unemployed in Canada. What a spectacle!

Mr. McINTOSH: Deplorable!

Mr. GOTT: Let us be serious for a moment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite serious, just as serious as the hon. gentleman's leader was when he was making those promises to the electors in 1930.

Mr. GOTT: My hon. friend is not serious or he would not have said that the hon. member for Saskatoon ridiculed the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when actually he paid him a compliment by addressing him as the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I never said anything of the kind, and if my hon. friend would only sit and listen he would know what I am saying.

Mr. GOTT: You deliberately said that he ridiculed the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the hon. gentleman kindly speak when he gets the opportunity? I do not wish to put on record again, as I had intended to do, the promises made by this government, not only by its leader but by his followers, to cure unemployment in this country. Had they said then that their method of curing it was to be the method that they are defending to-night, they would not be sitting where they are now, in the seats of the mighty.

Mr. BENNETT: What would have happened the country then?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No titles.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What would have happened? If my right hon. friend can suggest anything worse than the present condition I should like to know it. If the right hon. gentleman is proud of the record of his government he is welcome to it.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he certainly is.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then I say to him that I am very glad he makes that statement because the people of Canada are anything but proud of him.

Mr. BENNETT: I would compare popular approval with the approval of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No doubt you will have to give us the opportunity and we will let the public decide. When we have to take our medicine we take it, and you will take yours on the next occasion.

Mr. GOTT: That is your supposition.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it? All right. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that I did not rise to criticize the administration of the relief camps.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He laughs best who laughs last. I did not rise to criticize the administration of the relief camps. I believe they are well administered, but I do say that it is a sorry spectacle for the government of Canada that the relief camps should have to be established at all, and it is not an answer to say, as has been said on former occasions, that it is the result of world conditions, because hon. gentlemen sitting opposite over there are the ones who promised the electors of Canada that if they were put into office they would cure unemployment—and this is the way you have cured it. Are you proud of it?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Proud of the situation that exists to-day? Proud of the number of unemployed? Proud of the steps you have taken to deal inadequately with the situation? Then if you are, you are much more case hardened than I thought you were.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Give us the promises that were made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In Halifax, the right hon. gentleman who now leads this government made a speech on July 4, 1930, in which he said:

> If the Conservative party comes into power on July 28th I propose at the earliest moment to call parliament together so that we may find speedy remedy for this situation and decide on means to provide work for Canadians. Work I said, not doles.

That is plain enough, isn't it? And yet we have in the neighbourhood of one million people—or that was the number—a very large proportion of whom are on doles and nothing else. And this government is not doing what it promised to do, to take care of the situation as a great national emergency, because it is paying only thirty per cent of the dole.

Then at Moncton the leader of the Conservative party said:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt. It is going to call parliament at the earliest possible date after July 28, and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole. . . . Mr. King promises consideration of the problems of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

I have not heard anyone from Moncton or thereabouts get up to-night and speak of the wonderful way in which that promise has been carried out.

Again, speaking at Ottawa, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Mr. King promises you conferences; I promise action.

Is there any government that has outdone this government in calling conferences during the past three years? And what have been the results of them all?

Mr. MANION: Your leader has been complaining that we did not call enough conferences.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What has been the result of it all? Absolutely nothing. We have a wheat agreement by which we reduce our production by over one million bushels. That is the result of one of the conferences.

Then, speaking at Renfrew, the right hon. gentleman said—and I am sorry that the hon. member for Renfrew is not now in his seat, because he must have been present at this meeting, otherwise it could not have taken place:

> I will enact such tariff measures to give Canadians an even chance, or perish in the attempt.

This was a real perishing government before they got into office. He went on:

> At the same time we will protect labour as well as consumers. There will be no exploitation.

We now have the Stevens committee sitting day after day and discovering how labour has been exploited under the very nose of this government.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: The higher the tariff, the lower the wage.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know what steps may be taken to prevent labour from being exploited, but that is what is being found out in another room in this building. Such a thing should make every Canadian blush with shame, but all this was going to be prevented by this government. These are the promises by virtue of which hon. members opposite sit in the seats of the mighty.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us some more of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are too many, and I do not want to clutter up Hansard. Then they wonder why criticism is offered when we have before us estimates to provide relief camps. I marvel at the nerve of the government, and I wonder how they are able to face the people after making such spacious promises. I repeat that it is no use saying to hon. members on this side and to the public generally that it was world conditions that brought all this about. They knew about world conditions in 1930, but they stated that it was the fault of the government of that day that there were 117,000 unemployed in Canada.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, what is the number of this vote? I have lost my place.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps the hon. member will find his place some day. I do not wonder he has lost it, and I am afraid he will lose it a good many times if he attempts to follow the intricacies of this government. We are discussing unemployment and relief camps. Does my hon. friend realize that we are talking about relief and the cure of unemployment?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Twenty cents a day.

Mr. GEARY: I was just wondering.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no particular fault to find with the twenty cents a day, but I say without fear of contradiction that these conditions have been brought about by the policies of this government. If this government said in 1930 that world conditions had nothing to do with the situation then existing, how can they argue to-day that world conditions are causing the unpleasant situation we have in this country? They cannot swallow themselves; that is impossible, although they will try to do it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They blow and swallow at the same time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They do not like this sort of thing. I know it does not go down with them. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) was very laudatory in his statement about these camps. He told us how splendidly they were being conducted. With all of that we agree, as we know that anything undertaken by the Department of National Defence will be well done. But I say again, is it not a sorry spectacle that Canada, having such great undeveloped natural resources, should have to operate unemployment camps in order that men may obtain sustenance and a reasonable amount of clothing? Is it not a sorry spectacle that this is what has to be done under the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite?

Mr. ROBINSON: What will happen under the policies of the Liberal government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When the Liberal government come into office their policies will be enunciated. May I say to my hon. friend that he was in a very happy and comfortable position under Liberal policies. We did not have any relief camps and we had mighty little unemployment.

Mr. GOTT: You would not have given a nickel if you had.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We did not need to give nickels; the government provided employment for all. Even the tobacco growers down in Essex were able to get along without relief, the same men for whom the hon. member is pleading so hard to-day. This government was going to blast its way into the markets of the world, but my hon. friend is to-day asking for relief for those very men who were to benefit from the policies of the government. Are you proud and pleased with your record? Hon. gentlemen on the back benches opposite will rush to the defence of the government. They are ready to advocate relief camps and other forms of unemployment relief, notwithstanding the fact that they declared solemnly to the electors that they would not inaugurate such things. They are welcome to all the comfort they can get. That is all I have to say in connection with this matter.

Mr. PRICE: Would the hon. member kindly tell the committee just what he would do? Has he any constructive suggestion to offer?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Change the government.

Mr. PRICE: Tell the committee so the public will know just how you would deal with unemployment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would deal with it in exactly the same way as the Liberal government dealt with it in 1922. I would bring about the same era of prosperity which was brought about in 1922 by the application of Liberal policies. That is the way I would deal with it, not by trying to blast my way into the markets of the world and shutting the gates to all who wanted to get into Canada. The government's policies have been on trial for four years and each year the conditions have become worse than they were in the previous year. The one man of those who occupy the front benches opposite for whom I am sorry is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). He has to try to raise revenues while the policies inaugurated by the present government are being carried out. He has made a dismal failure of it and is bound to make a dismal failure so long as these policies are followed.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 16, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) presented the third report of select standing committee on banking and commerce and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

First report of special committee to inquire into operations of radio commission under the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932. —Mr. Morand.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING

Bill No. 36, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.—Mr. Fraser (Cariboo).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT ORDERS TO HAVE PRECEDENCE ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, the 21st of March, 1934, and every Wednesday thereafter, until the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other matters except questions by members, introduction of bills, and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF BOARD JURISDICTION

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether, in connection with the reference which I understand is being made to the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the jurisdiction of the tariff board, the government will consider referring the question as to the validity of orders fixing values for duty purposes of commodities covered by the British preference since the statute of 1932 was passed?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As far as I know that question has not been raised. The questions raised were: First, has the board any jurisdiction to settle or determine questions of law; second, was the judgment of the board in connection with the matter of the refund of duty in connection with twine under a valuation fixed by the minister under the authority of an order in council passed prior to the enactment of the statute providing that section 43 did not apply to British Empire countries valid or invalid? The third question, which has just been mentioned by the hon. gentleman, has not arisen so far as I know. It has not been determined that the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada; the law officers are endeavouring to ascertain just what would be the appropriate method, apart altogether from resorting to the rather cumbersome proceeding provided by the Customs Act, to have the matter speedily disposed of. That matter will be settled by to-morrow.

Mr. RALSTON: In that connection might I just remind the Prime Minister that there would seem to be two more questions. One is allied to the second question he mentioned; that is, whether or not orders made by the minister after the passing of the statute of 1932 are valid. The second question is as to whether the privy council have any power to entertain an appeal under section 54 in respect of questions such as were raised in the twine case. I just wanted to ask if the government will consider putting those questions in the reference, if such a reference is proposed.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the government is not in a position to make a reference other than with respect to the matters that were raised on the appeal, and when the appeal was presented it was admitted that, for the purpose of discussion, there was an appeal under the section to which reference has been made.

Mr. RALSTON: The governor in council has power to make a reference of any question.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to a statute.

Mr. RALSTON: This is a statute; it is as to the effect of the 1932 statute.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois): I should like to remind the Prime Minister that yesterday I was given to understand that some papers would be laid on the table to-day.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was going to ask the hon. gentleman if he would be good enough to wait another day. The letter to which I referred is not on file; this subject matter was dealt with in a verbal statement, and I have asked that a letter be sent to show that the moneys received have been used for the purpose of liquidating the obligations mentioned in the order in council. That letter has not arrived as yet, but if the hon. gentleman will accept my word for it I shall be glad to hand the papers to him in the meantime; otherwise they will be filed in the house on Monday. I have telephoned again to have the letter sent. There are no communications between the railway company and the government.

SALE OF FISH IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I should like to direct a question to the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) and also to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), because both departments are involved. My question is in connection with an article which appeared in L'Action Catholique, of Quebec, on Tuesday, March 6, 1934, as follows:

(Translation)

Inedible fish. We have been informed that, recently, fish practically rotten has been sold in Quebec. Is it necessary to condemn such a practice? We trust that the authorities will take the matter up with the owners of cold storage warehouses as soon as they learn the facts.

Then an advertisement:

Eels for sale at the cold storage warehouse of the Quebec commission.

I am informed that the fish referred to are a consignment of eels which are being sold for 3 cents a pound either by or from the Quebec cold storage warehouse. The question I should like to ask the acting Minister of Fisheries is whether he will inquire as to whether or not these inedible fish are being sold from this warehouse, and the question I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health is whether he will take steps to see that fish unfit for food are not sold in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Eels are a great delicacy in Holland.

Mr. POWER: That may be so; I did not want to detain the house at any length, but the house will remember what was contained in the advertisement.

Eels, not graded, at $3 per hundredweight, with a reduction of 10 per cent in quantities of five boxes or more. A box contains from 100 to 150 pounds.

The article I read is to the effect that fish unfit for human consumption are being sold in the city of Quebec. I do not place eels in the category of unfit food, but bad eels or, as it is expressed here, rotten eels certainly are not in the category of food fit for consumption, even in the city of Quebec.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): This is the first time I have heard of these facts. I shall be pleased to inquire into the matter as far as it comes under the jurisdiction of my department, but I think these questions should be addressed to the provincial and municipal authorities.

Mr. POWER: In all probability they should be, but we will start here.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I should be glad if my hon. friend would hand me the statements to which he has referred, and I shall have inquiries made at once in reference thereto.

SEED ACT AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) if it is intended to bring in any amendments to the Seed Act this session.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Not in connection with the administration of the Seed Act, so far as I am aware.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

Militia services: permanent force, $4,910,034.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask the minister a question, though I am not sure whether or not this is the proper item. It is in connection with the sale of the rifle range on Lulu island in British Columbia. Has the range been sold and, if so, was it sold by tender?

Hon. DONALD M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): No, it has not been sold.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have tenders been called for the sale of the range?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Item agreed to.

Naval services—to provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $2,222,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask where the saving of $200,000 has been effected under this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The savings have been effected entirely with regard to supplies. We will not buy as many supplies as heretofore.

Mr. RALSTON: On this item I should like to join with the remarks of the minister last night concerning Commodore Hose. In view of the long connection of that officer with the naval service I believe it is fitting that those of us who knew something about his good qualities should record our appreciation of the service he rendered to this country. I must say that during my term in office I found him to be a most efficient, loyal and capable officer, and one whose services bore out in an extremely fine manner the best traditions of the British naval service.

Would the minister tell me the names of the members of the defence council?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister, of course, is president, and the deputy minister vice-president. Then there is General McNaughton chief of general staff; Brigadier Constantine, adjutant general, and Brigadier Caldwell, quartermaster general. In the meantime the associate members are the acting chief of the naval service, Captain Nelles, and Group Captain Croil of the air force.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister give me the salaries and allowances of these members of the defence council?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I presume you want to know my salary?

Mr. RALSTON: No, we do not want that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The chief of general staff receives $10,000; Brigadier Constantine, $7,500; Brigadier Caldwell, $7,500; Captain Nelles, $7,250 and Group Captain Croil, $5,800.

Mr. RALSTON: Do any of these officers get any other allowances from the public service, in addition to these amounts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No; allowances are included in every case.

Mr. RALSTON: Following the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, may I ask as to whether or not the chief of general staff has any jurisdiction over the acting chief of the naval staff?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: None whatever. Of course I have to amplify that statement a little bit. As the hon. gentleman did, we are endeavouring to correlate activities and to have all people working together. The situation as regards the naval service is exactly the same in every particular as it was when the hon. member was in office.

Mr. RALSTON: While we are on this subject would the minister permit me to ask if his statement holds true with respect to the air force, also?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, it is not exactly the same as obtains in the air force. When the hon. gentleman was in office the civil government air operations reported through the deputy minister. At the present time they report through the general staff. The chief of civil aviation, Mr. Wilson, reports through the deputy minister.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the chief of the Royal Canadian Air Force report direct to the deputy minister?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, he reports through the chief of the general staff.

Mr. RALSTON: How long has the system mentioned by the minister been in operation, first as to the chief of the civil aviation branch reporting to the chief of general staff and secondly the chief of the Royal Canadian Air Force reporting to the chief of general staff?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Formerly there were, more or less, two departments, namely the Royal Canadian Air Force and civil government operations. For some time past they have been run as one. In other times the air force reported through the chief of general staff.

Mr. RALSTON: If the minister carries out what I hope he proposes to do, and what I believe he proposes to do, namely, to increase activities of civil government operations, does he not think it would be better to have civil government operations reporting directly to the deputy minister?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That will have to be considered. I would not be in a position, really, to answer that question.

Mr. RALSTON: When was the change made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the change was made in the estimates two years ago. At that time both operations were in one estimate.

Mr. RALSTON: No, they are still under separate votes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They are at this time; they were brought in in that way for purposes of clarification. But last year and the year before I think the hon. member will find that they appeared as one vote.

Mr. RALSTON: I would hope that the line of communication and the chain of responsibility would follow the votes as indicated in numbers 82 and 83 of the estimates we are now discussing, and that at least civil aviation should report directly to the deputy minister. It seems to me it is a distinct branch.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Civil aviation does that.

Mr. RALSTON: I must have misunderstood the minister. I understood him to say that they reported to the chief of general staff.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No; Mr. Wilson reports directly to the deputy minister.

Mr. RALSTON: I misunderstood the minister. The position is that the chief of the Royal Canadian Air Force reports to the chief of the general staff but the head of the civil aviation branch, Mr. Wilson, reports to the deputy minister?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to have some information in regard to item 79, naval services. This vote is "to provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve." I wonder if the minister would be good enough to tell the committee how many ships there are, and something about them. This is a large vote of over $2,000,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have the Saguenay, which is a destroyer on the eastern coast, and the Skeena, another destroyer on the western coast. These two boats are new, and were bought only recently.

Mr. SANDERSON: At what cost?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About $3,000,000 for the two of them.

Mr. SANDERSON: From whom were they purchased?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They were purchased in England, from Thornycroft's. Then, we have the Champlain and the Vancouver, which although older destroyers are in very good condition. Then there are two mine layers, the Festubert and the Armentieres. The first is at Halifax and the second at Esquimalt.

Mr. GIROUARD: What is the tonnage of those destroyers and their operation costs per day?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The expenses for the year are: Saguenay, $256,000, Champlain, $190,000, Festubert, $41,000, Skeena, $252,000, Vancouver, $183,000, Armentieres, $41,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the total personnel of the naval forces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The total is 864.

Mr. GIROUARD: The figures the minister has just given as the expenses in connection with the boats represent the cost for the year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. GIROUARD: The minister was kind enough to inform me last year that the expenses per day for the Saguenay were $645, and that the Saguenay is in operation all the year around; and that the maintenance and service of the Champlain cost per day $485. I understand that the cost would be approximately the same for the Vancouver and the Skeena. Would the minister state if the amounts I have just mentioned are correct?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If they were the amounts I gave the hon. gentleman last year I have no doubt at all that they are correct.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to inform the committee how many Canadians have attended the lectures at the Empire State college in England?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As the hon. gentleman knows, by agreement we send officers every year to take advanced training courses in naval matters in England. During the present year there will be one officer taking the staff course at Greenwich, two officers taking the technical course on naval matters, and two officers taking another course on technical matters. In addition the young cadets who enter the navy get their training in England. There will be six cadets going over.

Mr. POULIOT: But I am asking how many Canadians have attended the lectures at that college.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Ever since the institution of our navy, following the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Ever since the war.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Does Canada pay their expenses over there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the Empire State college a kind of English West Point? Is it England's equivalent to West Point in the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. West Point, of course, is for the military service only and corresponds more to our Royal Military college. The institution in England to which the hon. gentleman refers, and to which we send cadets, is the training ship Frobisher. That is where our midshipmen go.

Mr. POULIOT: If I understand the minister correctly, it is a naval school.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Besides that are there lectures given on air force matters and airways?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not at that particular school. But there is in the old country what is called the Imperial Defence college to which officers from all over the empire go to discuss and be instructed in the higher elements of military, naval and aerial affairs. The senior officers in Great Britain from all the great services come and address and instruct and give lectures to those who are attending those courses.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to tell the committee the name of that school or college and where it is located?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is called the Imperial Defence college and is located in London.

Mr. POULIOT: How long has it been in existence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is an old-established institution, not a recent thing at all. I am not aware of the exact year in which it was established.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to tell the house for how long Canadians have been attending that school?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am not in a position to say just how long, but I believe they have been attending it for a great many years.

Mr. POULIOT: More than three or four years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, yes, more than that.

Mr. POULIOT: How old are the boys or the men who attend that college?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Of course, the ones who go from Canada are senior officers who have gone as far as they could in this country. There are no boys or junior officers attending that school.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his very valuable information. My own idea is that when a man is a pupil after twenty-five years of age he will remain in infancy all his life. Of course, a man must study all his life, but there is a great difference between a pupil and a man who studies. I do not see why Canadians should go to that pompously named institution in London in order to be taught imperialism. I believe in Canadianism. We have strong ties with the British Empire but we have no lessons to receive in love of our country. All Canadians love their country and they must love it before any other. I admit that our ties with Great Britain are strong and that our king is the king of Great Britain, but on the other hand Canadians should be taught first to be good, real Canadians, and Canadians before anything else. I protest strongly against sending Canadians to be taught imperialism in London or anywhere else. I regret that these peregrinations take place, and I hope that the minister will see to it that if these men go there in order to receive technical training they will be taught nothing else but technical matters about the naval service, the air service and so on. They should not be taught that they must love England before Canada.

Mr. SANDERSON: A few moments ago the minister, replying to a question of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, gave the total personnel of the naval forces as 800 odd. Does that include the personnel of the naval reserve and of the naval volunteer reserve?

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I may have inadvertently misled the committee. That was the number of the permanent force, men on the strength all the time.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the strength of the naval reserve and of the naval volunteer reserve?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The personnel of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve is 1,028. That corresponds in the naval service with our non-permanent militia coming under the militia vote. Then we have 200 in the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister give me the strength of the naval volunteer reserve and where they are trained?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: As I indicated before, this body corresponds to the non-permanent militia. They are situated at Calgary, Charlottetown, Edmonton, Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Prince Rupert, Quebec, Regina, Saint John, Saskatoon, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg.

Mr. SANDERSON: Do they draw pay and allowances?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They draw pay and allowances. From time to time certain complements go to the coast for actual training on board one of the destroyers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the efficiency of the service been affected by the reduction of $200,000 in the vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There has been no reduction in personnel.

Mr. MacNICOL: Any reduction in the service?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No reduction in the service.

Mr. GIROUARD: I wonder if the minister read the dispatch which appeared in the Citizen of Monday. This reads:

> Port of Spain, Trinidad, March 11.—Canada's naval squadron has gained another victory.
> In the famous Chaguaramus bay where fleeing Spaniards fired their fleet and sank their treasure cargoes in 60 fathoms of water to save them from their British pursuers, the four Canadian destroyers put to rout the British cruiser H.M.S. Dragon in mimic warfare.
> The Dragon knifed its way through the water at 30 knots an hour in an effort to evade the deadly markmanship displayed during the Canadian torpedo attack.
> In another manoeuvre when darkness fell across the bay, the Canadian destroyer Vancouver with all lights out, played hide-and-seek with the Saguenay, Skeena and Champlain as the offensive ships. The three destroyers combed the darkness and suddenly "star shells" turned night into day, revealing the Vancouver vainly pretending to be a rocky headland of the wooded island. Crew of the Vancouver were eating supper in darkness when the shells from the other destroyers disclosed their position.

Later the Canadian tars showed their prowess as "excellent" gunners, submerging every floating target with a barrage that reechoed from the mountains and cliffs of the historic Spanish Main.

I read this article simply as a protest against the manner in which public money is being wasted. The minister has told me that it costs this country something like $2,200 per day to keep these four destroyers in operation. In times of prosperity perhaps these games of hide-and-seek might be tolerated but during a time of crisis when the people are suffering hardships I think such games should cease altogether. I am speaking only for myself when I say that I believe the country could be saved a vast amount of money if the department would sell these four destroyers for whatever they would bring. I believe to spend $2,200 per day in order to allow these gentlemen to cruise in the West Indies is a waste of public money which should not be tolerated any further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should like to say a word or two to correct an impression which seems to exist in connection with the cruises in the south during the winter. It would be impossible for these ships to go to sea in our northern waters and it is almost imperative to follow the practice which has been followed for some time and send these ships to warmer waters during the cold months. They are able to take advantage of the fact that the northern Atlantic squadron is there also. They have an opportunity of perfecting themselves in naval manoeuvres and execution. It was decided some time ago that we should have some naval strength in this country and as long as we have that strength, these vessels must carry on training manœuvres.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $1,805,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister tell us if any new aircraft have been purchased?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Are the Siskins still in operation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Is all the training being carried on at Trenton or is there some still being carried on at Camp Borden?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is some at Camp Borden.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister give me the division of activities between the two places?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We are moving from Camp Borden to Trenton as fast as conditions warrant. Last year facilities were provided at Camp Borden for ab initio flying, defence flying, specialized training of the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel and training of civil pilots. Last year at Trenton there was the nucleus of one fighter and one army cooperation squadron. There is no training carried on there except the training of these squadrons.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister explain the increase of $400,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It will be necessary to say a general word about that. I think most hon. members will agree that the air force estimates have been reduced most drastically during the last three or four years since I have been head of the department. Two years ago we had to let out quite a large number of the personnel to make the vote possible. Since then the vote was reduced again and everyone concerned was of the opinion that it would be a very false move to let out any further personnel. Consequently there was not really enough money in the last vote to get the full benefit of the air force as we had it. We had too much personnel for the amount of money—that is, to allow them to fly. As a matter of fact they were grounded too much, as the expression is, and it must be realized that, granted that we are to have an air force, we must have more money for them to operate. There will be some new planes purchased, and everything that goes with them in the way of apparatus and equipment to assist in the training.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the purchase of new equipment, can the minister tell me what he has in mind? Is it something in the way of light training craft?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. The present idea is to buy six aircraft of a type suitable for advanced training, and they will probably be bought in England.

Mr. RALSTON: What type?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am told that it is the type under consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want the minister to give away the order, because I suppose he expects some competition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There cannot really be very much competition in a matter of this kind, because the specifications for one aircraft are different from those of another, but the officials have been going into the matter with the idea of getting an airplane which will be most suitable to our needs from every standpoint for training purposes, bombing, photography, machine gun work and so on, to enable instruction to be given along these lines to the best advantage.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister think he will find any combination which will serve for bombing, photography and fighting as well?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman is probably more expert than I am; I have to depend on the officials, and it is along that line that they are working, to secure a plane which can be put to the most advantageous use.

Mr. RALSTON: Will six be the limit he expects to buy?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is what we have in mind at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the estimate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The amount for the new aircraft item is $80,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister give me a summary of the usable aircraft now on hand in the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are now ninety-nine in active use and in immediate reserve there are thirty-four, in reserve fifty-eight, or one hundred and ninety-one altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister said something about ninety-nine being in active use.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Can he give me some particulars, dividing them into training aircraft and fighting craft, bombers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In what is called the fighter flight there are five Siskins active and two in reserve, and in the cooperation flight there are two active. In No. 4 squadron there are seven active and four in immediate reserve, and in No. 5 squadron there are eight active and one in reserve.

Mr. RALSTON: Are those all cooperation planes?

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Cooperation planes?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the minister referred to them as army cooperation planes?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes; they are in the army cooperation flight.

Mr. RALSTON: As regards the two squadrons the minister has mentioned, do they come within the classification he has just read?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is No. 4 squadron.

Mr. RALSTON: What about the ninety-nine in active use?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At the Royal Canadian Air Force station in Ottawa there are fourteen active and ten in reserve.

Mr. RALSTON: Are there many Fairchilds in that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are one Fairchild 51 and five Fairchilds 71.

Mr. RALSTON. How are the ninety-nine made up?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At the Royal Canadian Air Force station in Winnipeg there are one Fairchild 51; one Moth 60; one Moth 80; two Fairchilds 71 and one in immediate reserve. At Borden there are eleven in active use and three A flight, seven B flight and seven in active reserve.

Mr. RALSTON: What about Trenton?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What I read last refers to what is called the training group; I am told by my officials that it includes Borden and Trenton.

Mr. RALSTON: What make of planes does B flight include?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: B flight includes two Avros, three Fairchilds F.C.W.W.; two Fairchilds 71.

Mr. RALSTON: How old are the Avros?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: None has been bought since I have been in the department.

Mr. RALSTON: They are very old?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The ex-air force men in Toronto have been trying to form a volunteer squadron. Has any progress been made in aiding them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes. There is a squadron authorized and formed now in Toronto. The squadron leader is G. S. O'Brien and we hope this year to be able to give them some training.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation—expenses in connection with the control of civil aviation, airways and airports, government and public airports and grants to airplane clubs, $187,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell us generally how that vote is made up? I notice the airplane clubs still get a grant.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is as follows:

Controllers of civil aviation..	$ 60,851
St. Hubert airdrome..	27,790
Airplane clubs and aviation schools..	24,000
Airways and airports..	74,359
Total..	$ 187,000

Mr. RALSTON: Are there any grants at all from the department for mail services?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, they are altogether under the Post Office Department.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps the minister as a member of council will tell me if they are in the Post Office vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, they are.

Mr. RALSTON: I suppose this is where the minister would hope to make the increase when the time comes to add to civil aviation activities; and here it seems to me is where a lot of useful service might be done. I again urge on the minister, because I think this is the appropriate place, that favourable consideration be given to an increase of activities in connection with civil aviation. I think Canadian citizens generally have shown remarkable interest in aviation matters. Years ago cities and municipalities did a lot towards constructing airports, giving us the nucleus for the chain of landing fields which are now being constructed. As I said last night, we already had a mail service established across the easier part of Canada, that is across the western prairies, and service had been given over the route now being covered by the construction of the air fields through northern Ontario. Aviation has entered largely into the development of our north country. I feel that aviation is still in the experimental stage to a degree that makes it necessary for the government to take considerable interest in civil aviation activities. I presume the minister's policy is the same as that of those who preceded him, that is not to carry on commercial aviation beyond the point of exploration and experimentation in order to furnish information to those engaged in civil aviation, and to provide at least some personnel able to take the initiative and form the nucleus of a group engaged in civil aviation in Canada. I hope that will continue to be the policy; I am not one of those who believe in government going wholesale into civil aviation or other commercial activities, but I want to impress upon the minister and the government the great desirability of encouraging aviation in Canada by increasing as far as possible air mail services and giving contracts directly to the organizations that are in a position to carry out air mail services; also in order to provide employment for civil aviators and to encourage the whole field of aeronautical development. I think the government can do a great deal in that respect, and I would hope that some air mail services which have been abandoned may be reinstated, not only for the purposes of air mail, but for the purpose of developing aviation generally in view of what it means to the future of Canada.

Mr. LUCAS: What air mail services are being carried on at the present time in Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: These are the services: Montreal-Albany; Narrow Lake-Sioux Lookout; Winnipeg-Pembina; McMurray-Aklavik; Bissett-Lac du Bonnet; Peace River-North Vermilion; Big River-Ile à la Crosse; Resolution-Great Bear Lake; Prince Albert-Lac la Ronge; Amos to Siscoe, and summer services: Rimouski-Montreal and Vancouver-Victoria.

Winter services only: Leamington-Pelee island; Quebec-Seven Islands; Seven Islands-Anticosti; Moncton-Charlottetown; Charlottetown-Magdalen islands.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister inform the committee how many air mail routes were cancelled at the time reductions were made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot tell that, because it is not under this department, but under the Post Office Department. The route from Winnipeg to Lethbridge and up to Edmonton and Calgary was the major cancellation.

Mr. COOTE: Are government airplanes used in transporting geological survey parties in the northern part of Canada, when parties are sent out by the department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, they would be our planes.

Mr. COOTE: If the Department of Mines should be persuaded to do some more geological work would the air mail force now existing be quite sufficient for any work of that nature?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The services needing the help of aviation operations have a committee that try to work together and select the services which are the most important and pressing, and we try to do their work.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I understood the minister to say that $74,000 of this vote was devoted to construction of airways and airports. I should like to know how much was spent on work of that kind during the last year, and what the general policy of the government is in regard to the undertaking of construction of airways. The reason I ask is that I have at least half a dozen communications from boards of trade in different parts of my district, which of course covers a very large area, asking for government assistance in connection with the construction of airports at local points. I would like the minister to tell me what his general policy is in regard to assistance of that kind to air ports in different parts of Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The government never has assumed the responsibility of building aerodromes for municipalities. From the beginning we have regarded that as entirely a municipal duty. But we have always been ready to assist with engineering and expert knowledge. If it is an important aerodrome that will probably be used at night we would assist them to a certain extent in the ground lighting facilities.

Mr. VENIOT: A few minutes ago the minister gave a list of air mail services. Are there any government airplanes engaged in those services or are they all under contract with companies?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They would all be under contract with the exception of the Montreal-Rimouski service, which in the last year or so has been flown by our planes.

Mr. VENIOT: In view of further development of air mail services from coast to coast are any negotiations going on between the Department of National Defence and the Post Office Department as to how this scheme should be carried out? Is a policy being considered of having that service carried out by the Department of National Defence or entirely by contract with private companies?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That question has received a great deal of close attention by a committee on which the Post Office Department has been represented. They have gone a long way, in fact as far as they can without some money to spend; they have not made any definite recommendation as to whether the larger services, when inaugurated, should be flown by the government or by a private company. There has been no decision arrived at in that regard.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister tell us the cost of the summer service between Rimouski and Montreal, undertaken by the Department of National Defence? How much per mile?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I doubt very much if I am in a position to tell that, because it was our own machines that were engaged in that service and I do not think it has been figured in that way, so far as I have it here.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister say why the change was made from a private company to the Department of National Defence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The contract was cancelled purely for financial reasons; the Post Office Department did not have the money with which to carry it on. Then on more mature consideration being given, this was regarded as a very important link in the air mail service, bringing the mail from the ships at Rimouski up to Montreal and vice versa, and it was then considered that we had plenty of airplanes and plenty of pilots and that they could do that work.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I congratulate the minister on the action he has taken. The service is carried on better, the pilots are better qualified and the air mail service is better looked after.

Mr. VENIOT: Since I was at the head of the Post Office Department when that service was inaugurated, I think in 1928, I was glad to learn that it is the intention of the government to maintain that service. In the initial stages it was somewhat difficult to give the service that we desired, but as years rolled by and improvements took place in air transportation we were able to give a very efficient service between Rimouski and Montreal by 1930.

I have yet to be convinced that the service can be more efficiently operated by the Department of National Defence than by a private company. As I understood the minister a few moments ago the change to the Department of National Defence was not made on grounds of efficiency but on grounds of economy. When it was initiated the service cost about $1.25 per mile under contract with a private company. No doubt air mail service which in 1928 or 1930 cost all the way from 90 cents to $1.25 a mile according to the district covered could be furnished to-day for a great deal less, and with all the red tape that surrounds matters pertaining to national defence I doubt whether the department can do that work at a lower cost than would be charged by private companies. I regret that the minister is not in a position to give me the cost per mile and the poundage of mail matter carried since the Department of National Defence took over the service from Rimouski to Montreal. I am sure that if those figures could be obtained it would be found that the work could be done more cheaply under private contract than it is being done by the department. I have no fault to find with any of the services being carried on by the department, because I know nothing about them, but I do know something about the mail service.

I must say here, Mr. Chairman, that I very much regret that the government has seen fit to do away with many of the air mail services which were established during my time as Postmaster General. Economy was given as the reason why certain services were abandoned, but I think if care had been taken in the carrying on of those services, with the yearly increases in poundage and in revenue which were then taking place, and especially with the revenue from first class matter increased through an increase in postage from 2 cents to 3 cents per ounce in certain districts and from 5 to 6 cents in others, if those services had been continued, it would have been discovered that they would have been brought up almost to a paying basis. In 1931 the 2 cent air mail service which was given to districts inaccessible by any other means, such as newly developed mining districts, the Mackenzie river district up to Aklavik, the Anticosti island district and the Magdalen island district in winter time, showed a surplus of revenue over expenditure of $169,000. The five cent service from Saint John to Montreal, it is true, was not paying; there was a deficit. The service from Montreal to New York was almost at the point where it was paying expenses. The service from Toronto to certain sections of the United States was bringing in more revenue each year, and there was a clause in the contracts with these private companies providing that on one month's notice the contracts could be changed and new arrangements entered into. It was contemplated that the rate, which varied from 90 cents to $1.20 a mile, could be reduced somewhat due to lower costs of operation, and at that time the department was about to open negotiations looking to better arrangements under these contracts. The total deficit, including that for the services in the western provinces, was in the vicinity of $750,000 annually, less the surplus of $169,000 which I have mentioned. With increased revenues resulting from greater development in the western provinces and with increased revenues on the services between Halifax and Montreal, Montreal and New York and Montreal and Toronto, that deficit would have been reduced by something like $250,000 to $300,000 by 1932.

So I say it is a pity, Mr. Chairman, especially now that there is talk of trans-Atlantic and even trans-Pacific air mail services, that these links which were giving satisfaction and which it was intended to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have been discontinued. Had these been in operation to-day Canada would have been placed in a premier position in connection with air mail transportation, since we would have had a service by means of which mail could be transported from the Atlantic to the Pacific in some eighty to ninety hours instead of taking from five to six days. I regret very much that the government has cut the principal services to such an extent; I do hope that in the negotiations which I understand have been undertaken recently the government will see its way clear to the establishment of a trans-continental service from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that that service will not be combined with the railway service of Canada, and that the air mail service shall be distinct and apart from the Canadian railway system. We have companies in Canada big enough and financially strong enough to undertake that service, without the necessity of combining with the railway services. The railway mail service is costing Canada between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000 yearly, and while it is efficient, I believe the mail service could be made more efficient by the addition of air mail facilities. That addition should not in any respect interfere with the railway mail service operating to-day. I hope that when the government reach the point where they are in a position to decide as to the re-establishment of these routes, they will do so. I am speaking from the viewpoint of encouraging civil air service in Canada. As the ex-Minister of National Defence said a while ago we would not have our present air service in Canada had it not been for the fact that the Post Office Department stepped into the breach in 1927 and 1928 and inaugurated a system of air mails. At that time the air mail service formed the nucleus for commercial air services carried on in Canada.

I hope that in the very near future the government will make up its mind that the day has come when Canada should have an air mail service stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. BOUCHARD: As one who is not air minded may I ask if the minister has any figures to show the ratio of casualties per mile travelled in air, on land and on sea. I refer to the number of casualties through travel by motor car and by sea transportation. Further, has he a comparison of our figures with those of our neighbour, the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am unable to give the hon. member all the information, although I have some with regard to accidents. I am very glad indeed to be able to say that in the air force during the past year we have not had a fatal accident, and not one person has been lost. In civil flying there were twenty-two accidents, involving injuries. Eleven pilots were killed and seven injured; thirteen passengers were killed and six injured.

Mr. VENIOT: Was that in Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has the minister any comparative figures as to casualties in different types of conveyances, because some people are prejudiced against travelling by air. Has the minister any figures to show the number of casualties by air travel as compared with casualties on land, through the use of motor cars and railways and travel by sea.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have not those figures.

Mr. GERSHAW: A great many young men in Canada, who have had experience in mechanical work are anxious to join the aviation service. I should like to ask the minister what openings or opportunities there are at the present time or are likely to be in the near future, and what training is necessary to qualify?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. member has raised a point which is brought home to me very often, due to the fact that there are a great many applications from young men wishing to enter the service either as fliers or as mechanics. At the present time, owing to reduced votes, it has been obviously impossible to take on any new men. However as things open up we hope gradually to be able to take on a few more.

Mr. MacLEAN: If I understand the minister correctly, his department does not contribute anything to the establishment of air ports. For the last few years in the town of Summerside we have been endeavouring to get an air port, and different representations have been made to several departments of government. A field can be procured in a most suitable locality near the town, but the town does not feel it can afford the expense of providing and paying for an air port to be used by the whole of the province, and for interprovincial service. I understand only a very small outlay would be necessary to put the field in splendid condition, and I should like to know from the minister or from hon. members in charge of any other governmental department if any assistance could be given in a matter of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We have considered the proposition outlined by the hon. member. The one he has described is exactly the same as that described only a few moments ago by another hon. member. The government has never followed the policy of providing municipal air ports. If the town would buy the air port we would give every possible assistance,—that is, short of financial assistance —such as engineering help, advice or anything of that nature.

Mr. SPENCER: Do I understand the minister to say that his department keeps a waiting list of trained would-be pilots, and that it is of very little use for any new men to apply because of that waiting list?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Well, to a certain extent that is undoubtedly correct. At the present time we have a large waiting list.

Mr. VENIOT: Has not the government given assistance to air ports under the unemployment relief measures? I understand it is extending the air port at Saint John, New Brunswick, and that it has laid out other air ports or landing ports in that province. I know that only a few years ago two were supposed to have been laid out; I do not know, whether or not those plans have been carried out. It would seem however that the government has given some aid towards the opening of air ports in different parts of Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I believe the ones in the province of New Brunswick to which the hon. member has referred are the intermediate landing fields. Those fields may be situated in the middle of the province. Of course the field at Saint John was supplied by the municipality, and it was only because we could help the unemployed that work was done at that point.

Mr. VENIOT: Would that not apply to Summerside?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, it could not, because the government has never been convinced that there was an unemployment problem at that point which would warrant such action.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to know from the minister if there is any landing field or air port in the Gaspe peninsula?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the air mail service given to the Magdalen islands the same as was given last year and the year before; is it weekly, fortnightly, or how often is it operated?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is a weekly service, given only in the winter.

Mr. MARCIL: Apart from the Anticosti service, what other service is given to the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Seven Islands to Anticosti service is a winter service given semi-monthly. The service from Quebec to Seven Islands is semi-weekly in the winter.

Mr. MARCIL: The service does not go beyond Seven Islands and Blanc Sablon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. MARCIL: There is a mail service there in the winter time which, I understand, is operated by dog sleighs, or some such means. Would it not be better to have an air mail service on the north shore of the St. Lawrence? Has that matter been considered at all?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That would be a matter for the consideration of the Post Office Department. They look after the data necessary for the establishment of a service.

Mr. MARCIL: I suppose the minister is aware of the strategic situation of the Gaspe peninsula? At the outbreak of the war the whole fleet mustered in the Gaspe basin before sailing for the other side. Would it not be desirable to have a landing place where such fine pioneering work was done by Count de Lesseps, the first aviator who came to Canada and who perished on the Gaspe peninsula? I think that immense territory covering ten thousand square miles should have an airport.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That will undoubedly come in time, but at present an airship using floats or a flying boat could easily land in one of the many harbours around that coast.

Mr. MacLEAN: I understand that through the Department of Labour a lot of development work in connection with airports has been done in other parts of Canada. I should like to ask if the sites for these airports in other municipalities and towns throughout the country have been purchased by the municipalities, and whether the Labour department simply expends money on their development in connection with unemployment relief. Are the sites for the air ports purchased by the government or by the municipality?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If a municipality had an airport on which some work could just as well be done, and unemployment was a pressing problem at that place, the work could be done under the unemployment relief scheme. Cases such as the hon. gentleman outlines on the island, of the government buying an airport and proceeding to develop it, are not in existence.

Mr. MacLEAN: In none of these other cases has the government purchased the site?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must make it clear that no city sites at all have been purchased. Along an airway carrying mail the landing fields under ordinary circumstances would be from four to five hundred miles apart, depending on the ship. That certainly would be the case on a transcontinental airway, but every twenty-five miles there would be intermediate aerodromes which could be used in cases of emergency. These aerodromes might be located in a small village or out in a field, with nothing around, which could be developed for the purpose. The government would arrange for the acquisition of a site such as that, but not in a town.

Mr. MacLEAN: The situation with us on Prince Edward Island at the present time is that we have an air mail service, and just to-day I took the matter up with the Post Office Department, with a view to getting a little better service and having the mail picked up at Moncton from both the ocean limited and the maritime express and taken over to the island, but I was told by the Post Office Department that as we had no landing field at Summerside they did not think they could continue the service. At the present time the aeroplane is landing on the ice in the harbour. However, we were able to secure the assurance from the department that they would order the mail to be carried by the plane until such time as the harbour becomes unsafe for landing. I just wanted to know whether it was the practice for the municipality or the government to purchase a site for an airport in a town. I think that the municipality has been assured by the department of substantial assistance from an engineering point of view. It would not take very much to put the field in shape. I just wanted to know whether in other sections of the country towns and cities have been given assistance in the purchase of sites for airports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: None whatever in cases such as my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. MARCIL: This may not be altogether regular, Mr. Chairman, but I might as well put the question and get an answer. There is going to be a big celebration in Gaspe in the month of August to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Canada. I would ask if it is the intention of the department to take any part in that celebration with aeroplanes or an aviation display. France has formed a committee with the president of the republic at its head, and committees have also been formed in Montreal, Toronto, Gaspe and other parts of Canada. I know that the minister as a good Canadian would like to honour the discoverer of this country. Are any plans under study at the present time to participate in that celebration? France, I understand, intends sending over a warship and a delegation of distinguished men to commemorate the landing of Jacques Cartier at Gaspe. Has the minister given this matter any consideration at all?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, it has received some attention, and our district officer commanding at Quebec is acting as one of a committee to find out in what way cooperation is desired and can best be given. I can assure my hon. friend that in any way we possibly can we shall be only too glad to cooperate in the celebration of this great event.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should also like to mention the great celebration that is to take place this year in the city of Toronto, on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of our city. Will there be any aviation or aerial display by the department in connection with that celebration.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No details have been settled yet, but as the hon. gentleman knows the city has made representations respecting a trans-Atlantic flight of British aeroplanes during the celebration. No definite reply has been received as yet, and at the moment I can only say that if there is anything we can do we shall be glad to do it. Of course, our military forces in Toronto will be cooperating to a very large extent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you.

Mr. VENOT: Perhaps this matter does not come under the minister's department, and if so I shall drop the question, but I should like to ask why a change was made in the service between Moncton and Shediac and the Magdalen islands and from there to Charlottetown.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. VENIOT: While I am on my feet, without wishing to take away any of the glory that might come to Gaspe from the discovery by Jacques Cartier of Canada and the celebration that is going to take place this summer, I note that the minister has said that the dominion government may play some part in it, but I should like to point out to the minister and the committee that Jacques Cartier did not first land at Gaspe but at Father Point, at the entrance to Bathurst harbour, and from Bathurst harbour he crossed to Gaspe and placed a cross on the shores of the Gaspe basin. When the government is debating what part they shall play in this celebration, I hope they will give consideration to the fact that there are only a few miles between Gaspe and Bathurst across the Baie des Chaleurs, and I trust that they will not forget to give us a call at Bathurst, where we shall try to receive them as best we can.

Item agreed to.

Radio services—for maintenance and operation of the Northwest Territories radio system, $199,425.

Mr. REID: Many departments have an item for radio service. We passed one last night for $590,000. Would the minister please explain this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This radio service is carried on in the north country from Edmonton right up to the mouth of the Mackenzie river and Herschell island. It has been in use for a number of years and is manned by the Royal Signal Corps.

Mr. MARCIL: How far north does it extend?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Right to the Arctic, to Herschell island at the mouth of the Mackenzie river.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there apparatus up there for sending as well as receiving messages?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, they send and receive messages.

Item agreed to.

Battlefields memorials, $90,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Has this work been completed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The only work remaining to be done is the completion of the memorial at Vimy which it is expected will be completed towards the end of 1935.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the book of remembrance of members of the Canadian forces, and Canadians in the forces of the British Empire who lost their lives in the great war, $7,500.

Mr. REID: Canada is justly proud of the peace memorial which we have here in Ottawa but I do not believe it has received sufficient publicity. I suggest to the minister the getting out of a little booklet giving a full description of the peace tower and the book of remembrance, for which perhaps a small charge could be made. If that were done the people of Canada would know what a fine memorial we have.

Mr. LUCAS: When will this book be completed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We expect in three years. The names are being written in by hand but good progress is being made.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—national defence —militia services, $59,500; naval services, $500.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister tell us when the history of the war will be completed and how much has been completed to date?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The first volume is practically completed, being ready for final proof reading. It will include the history up to the battle of Festubert. There will be a number of appendices in connection with the activities of the Canadian forces before the war. It will deal with the formation and dispatch of the first contingent and the activities of the Canadian forces in the field up to the battle of Ypres.

Mr. MARCIL: Will that be published in French as well as in English?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, arrangements are being made to have it published in French.

Mr. REID: Do these war claims arise out of lost property and so on?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They arise as an aftermath of the war. We might have a case where a soldier was entitled to a separation allowance or gratuity for which he had not claimed. He puts in a claim later on and if he is found to be entitled to it after careful examination, it is paid from this vote.

Mr. REID: An appeal was made to me by a man who claimed to have been torpedoed and mined. He did not put in a claim to the reparations commission and I should like to know if he could put in a claim under this vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. gentleman would let us have the details of the case, we could look it up and give him an answer.

Mr. VENIOT: That would come under the Secretary of State.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Dairying, $234,000.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned on Friday last, I was drawing the attention of hon. members to the supineness of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in connection with the agricultural interests of Ontario and Quebec. I also deplored the large reductions made each year by the hon. minister in the agricultural budget. I was commenting on the item referring to cheese which the committee is at present considering. When the Imperial Economic agreements were discussed and approved in Ottawa in 1932, the government considered that they had made a great advance towards improving the situation of our farmers. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) took the pains in his speech to refer especially to cheese, pointing out the importance he attached to these so-called concessions from the United Kingdom in connection with our cheese exports. On October 12, 1932, he expressed himself in the house as follows:

Canada will enjoy in the British market free entry for three years, with preference margin of 15 per cent which will be maintained during the currency of the agreement.

Not only, sir, did this treaty not attain the object sought, but we note that cheese exports are yearly decreasing and that instead of occupying the first place, Canada has dropped to-day to the fourth place in this respect. That is why the bulletin of the bureau of statistics on October 17, 1933, published the following statement:

Within the last twelve months cheese exports have been much less than those of the previous year.

The Trade Information Bulletin dated February 10, 1934, has the following:

The decrease of Canadian cheese exports and the latest increase in New Zealand products, have been noted with disappointment. Canada which, previously, was the principal cheese supplier of this market has seen its quota drop more than 10,000,000 pounds.

The bulletin issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, dated February 10, 1934, states:

The Canadian Trade Commissioner to the United Kingdom writes as follows: The reduction in the Canadian cheese exports and the further increases in the imports of the commodity from New Zealand are disappointing, to say the least. Canada was, previously, the principal cheese supplier of the United Kingdom, and now, in the course of last year, its cheese exports have decreased 100,000 hundredweight, namely, they have been dropped to 629,000 hundredweight.

Moreover, the bulletin issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, dated March 9, 1934, states:

The following is Canada's relative position among Great Britain's suppliers, in January of the current year: cheese—fourth instead of second, in January, 1933, and first a few years ago.

Another bulletin, dated March 12, 1934, mentions that the production of fermented cream cheese, in Canada, has considerably decreased and that our exports which had reached, a few years ago, 32,000,000 pounds had dwindled down to 940,000 pounds.

The following are our cheese exports to Great Britain, from 1929 to date: In 1929, we exported 1,126,092 cwts.; in 1930, 922,937 cwts.; in 1931, 795,904 cwts.; in 1932, 854,247 cwts., and in 1933, 629,000 cwts. That is, between 1930 and the present day, our cheese exports to Great Britain have decreased by 497,092 cwts., or 49,709,200 pounds.

While we were losing the British market, we were importing, in 1931, 1,685,045 pounds of cheese; in 1932, 1,377,344 pounds and, in 1933, 1,103,395 pounds.

Before proceeding with my remarks on the subject, may I, sir, remind the house of a statement made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. On May 10, 1932, referring to the dairy industry he expressed himself as follows:

So I think if we were to concentrate on dairy products we should concentrate on cheese. . . .

It is unfortunate that the hon. Minister of Agriculture limited his effort to this suggestion. His inertia has caused our exports to considerably decrease and, as I stated a moment ago, instead of occupying the first place on the British market, as a cheese exporting country, we have dropped, to-day, to the fourth place. That is an unfortunate result of the Imperial Economic Conference agreements, at Ottawa, in 1932.

During the last election campaign in the constituency which I have the honour of representing, I well remember that it was difficult, if not impossible, to force the Conservative candidate to discuss any other subject but butter. Although the farmers were obtaining a profitable price for that commodity, from 1922 to 1930, the Conservative candidate promised that should the Conservative party assume power, butter imports would be entirely shut out and predicted very profitable prices.

Previous to quoting figures on butter imports, sir, may I point out that it is very difficult to obtain information in this respect. Ever since the Bureau of Statistics has become a kind of advertising agency for the government's policy—and this, I am quite sure contrary to the wishes of Mr. Coats, who is an expert in this connection—it is difficult to obtain reliable statistics. Those that are at our disposal are incomplete and, at times, contradictory. However, I have done my best to gather statistics which seem to be most reliable and reveal the true situation. From October 1, 1930 to April 30, 1931, the government has permitted the importation of 5,031,-419 pounds of butter; out of this quantity, 2,147,494 pounds were imported from February 1, 1931, to April 30, 1931. In 1932, our butter imports amounted to 879,670 pounds; in 1933, 1,377,137 pounds. I was almost forgetting 1931. It was the year which immediately followed the election, in the course of which my opponent had promised the farmers that butter imports would absolutely cease, that butter would not be allowed to enter Canada, that the government would raise the tariff sufficiently so as to bring about higher prices than those prevailing in August, 1930. Would you be amazed, sir, if I informed you that, for 1931, we imported into this country 16,500,801 pounds of butter? These figures are not included in the statistics which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) or the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) gave to the house; however, I find these figures in the Canada Year Book, 1933, at page 565. The hon. Minister of Agriculture will note that, for the year 1931 alone, we imported 16,500,801 pounds of butter.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The calendar year or fiscal year?

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): The university year!

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The Canada Year Book, 1933, page 565.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): The calendar year?

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): The university year!

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It must be the calendar year. I refer the hon. member to the Canada Year Book, 1933, page 565.

I have no information about our butter imports for the year 1934 up to date; however, I note that in February 1934, we imported from New Zealand alone, 450,000 pounds. Evidently, we also imported from Australia and other countries, as in previous years.

I do not intend to discuss further this subject; however, I wanted to point out that once more the government had not kept its promises to the farmers of the various provinces. In the constituency which I have the privilege of representing the farmers were greatly amazed to note that we are still importing butter from New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain, Syria, the Fiji Islands and other countries. It is true, that the farmers of Drummond Arthabaska place no faith in those promises; however, I wished to point out, on their behalf, the pledges made in my presence and, to protest against the policy, at present, followed by the department of Agriculture which entirely neglects the interests of the Ontario and Quebec farmers.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry I could not follow in detail what the hon. member (Mr. Girouard) said with regard to imports and exports of butter and cheese. There has been a gradual falling-off in our exports of cheese, a continuous decrease over a considerable number of years. The maximum exports of cheese were in the year ending June, 1904. In that year we exported 233,980,716 pounds. In the year ending March, 1908 that had decreased to 189,710,463. Coming down to more recent years, in the year ending March, 1926, our exports of cheese were 148,333,500 pounds, and in the year ending March, 1927, they had dropped to 136,665,400; in the year ending March, 1928, they were 105,212,600; in 1929-30 they were 92,293,700, and in 1930-31 they were down to 79,590,400—that is, in March, at the end of that fiscal year. In other words, from the year ending March, 1926, to the end of the fiscal year in which the government changed, the reduction in exports was some 47 per cent, from 148,000,000 pounds to 79,000,000 pounds. In the year ending March, 1932, the exports of cheese had increased to 85,424,700, or about 8 per cent, and in the year ended March 31, 1933, the last year for which we have information, the exports were 85,711,600 pounds.

With regard to the imports of cheese in the corresponding years, in the year ending March, 1926, the imports into Canada were 6,678,757 pounds, and during the year ending March, 1933, the imports of cheese into Canada had dropped to 1,103,391 pounds. This cheese is practically all of a type that is not made in Canada.

Now for the imports and exports of butter. In 1926-27 the imports of butter were 7,029,084; in 1927-28 they were 15,626,007; in 1928-29 they had increased to 25,609,915; and in 1929-30 the figure was 41,919,372. The hon. member quoted the imports of butter for 1931, but that is really for nine months of the year 1930, because the 1931 figure is from March 31, 1930, to March 31, 1931, when we imported 16,500,801 pounds. In 1931-32 the imports were down to 879,670 pounds and in 1932-33 they were 876,894 pounds. This shows that butter from outside the dominion has not been coming in during the past two years to any very considerable extent to interfere with the market for butter in Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the minister give any reasons why our exports of cheese have diminished to the extent they have, and why to-day we occupy fourth position instead of first? What is the cause?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The large decrease was not under the regime of the present government. I thought that was the criticism.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am not concerned about the regime under which it occurred, but the reason for it, if there is one.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason for this decrease over a large number of years is the increased consumption of milk per capita, which formerly went into cheese and the production of other commodities, particularly of butter, following the establishment of more modern creameries, and to relatively higher prices for butter than for cheese.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Am I to take it that the reason our exports of cheese have diminished in the present year, and that we now occupy fourth place instead of first place, is that we are not making enough cheese?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that we are in second place at the present time. The reason of course is that the cheese is not being made.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This statistical bulletin of March 9, 1934, says that to-day we occupy fourth place in the export of cheese.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In what market?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Total exports of cheese, all markets. Are the Canadian manufacturers of cheese not able to supply the export market, and is that the reason our exports have decreased so that we now occupy fourth place?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information before me is that the Canadian exports to the United Kingdom for 1933 were 70,528,080 pounds; the New Zealand exports, 230,652,016. New Zealand is the only country that stands ahead of Canada in exports of cheese to the United Kingdom. If we had produced more cheese there would no doubt have been more cheese exported, but the reason we have not produced more, in addition to what I have given, I would say is that the market for the greater part of our cheese is the United Kingdom, therefore the price is the world price, and the world price of cheese has been forced down during the past two or three years particularly. When the farmer has the choice of taking, say, nine to eleven cents per pound for his cheese or getting a fair price for his milk converted into butter, the tendency is for the milk or cream to be diverted to the creameries for the manufacture of butter. That has led to a decrease in our production of cheese, which of course leads to the decrease in our exports.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did the minister say 11 cents a pound for cheese?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I took that as an example.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the minister suggest that taking 17½ to 18½ cents for butter rather than 11 cents for cheese is sound business?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To produce an equal return the price of cheese should be 50 per cent of the price of butter or butter fat. But a farmer has to take other considerations into account, not only the price he will get for his cheese in comparison with butter, but in connection with butter the value of the by-product, the skim milk for the feeding of pigs and other uses on the farm.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I happen to know a little about cheese. When I was a boy we used to take milk to the cheese factory, and I found that you could make more money by sending it there with cheese at say 9 cents a pound than by turning it into butter at 20 cents, even taking into consideration the by-products. And the farmer who takes his milk to a cheese factory has by-products, though they are probably not of as much value as if he separated his milk and shipped the cream.

It seems to me that there is confusion about these statistics, whether intentional or not I do not know. The minister says that according to his information we occupy second place in the market of Great Britain in regard to cheese exports. When I said a moment ago that we had fallen from first to fourth place in regard to all countries I made a mistake, this bulletin says:

Relative position of suppliers or exporters of cheese to Great Britain.

That is for January, 1934; it distinctly says that we occupied fourth position. If the minister's information is correct, that we occupy second place, while these bulletins that are circulated to the members almost every day show that we occupy fourth position, there is something wrong. It is confusing. The other day the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) complained about discrepancies in the statistics, and the same thing is very clearly brought out here.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I heard the hon. member correctly, the bulletin which he quotes states that the position of Canada as exporter of cheese to the world market—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, I said that at first, but I corrected it—to the British market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —was fourth. For what period is that? Is it just for the month of January?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This bulletin, dated March 9, 1934, says:

The relative position of Canada among the exporters of cheese to Great Britain in January, 1934. . . .

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no contradiction in the two statements. My statement was based on the yearly exports. In Canada very little cheese is made in the winter in comparison with the summer months.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This bulletin says January, 1934. I suppose the comparison is with January, 1933, or why should they mention January specially?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is a monthly bulletin; that would be the relative position during the month of January.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: So you can take January as a basis. You could take March or any month so far as that is concerned, but you compare a month of 1934 with the same month of 1933, I suppose. Taking the government's own bulletin, our position as exporter of cheese to Great Britain in January, 1934, compared to January, 1933, was fourth place.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the winter months our production of cheese is much less, therefore we would stand in a lower position in regard to exports. In view of cheese being so much more of a summer product, the only fair comparison is on the yearly basis. The point I was making is that the statement there that we were fourth in our exports to the United Kingdom for January is not contradictory in any way to the statement I made as to the yearly exports.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the minister contend, then, that our exports of cheese in January were small because that is an off season? Does the minister contend that cheese is exported the month it is made? My understanding has been different.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A great deal of our cheese is exported when it is very green, to a much greater extent than was the case a number of years ago. We feel that this is one of the criticisms we have to make with regard to the cheese industry at the present time. If it were possible to hold the cheese longer and cure it more it perhaps would go on the old country market in better condition, but to-day cheese is exported to a very great extent when it is green, and the people who purchase it in the United Kingdom cure it there.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How long after a cheese is made is it fit for the export market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the export market, and the same applies to the domestic market. Some people will buy cheese when it is green and when other people might consider not cured at all. An average statement is unsatisfactory, but a great deal of our cheese is exported within one to three months after it is made, depending on the locality and on conditions in the locality.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then with regard to the month of January, the basis of production has nothing to do with the low export at all, if the cheese is exported when it is about three months old. Is that right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One to three months.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the Department of Agriculture any way of ascertaining whether the cheese is properly matured before it is exported? If we are going to keep on in the dairying industry, as I think we will have to because of the prices paid for cereals, has the department any way of inspecting this cheese in order to see that it is in proper condition before it leaves our shores, so that we may be able to hold the market we have to-day and perhaps, in time, regain part of the market we have lost? As the minister knows, dairying is a very hard industry to carry on; it entails a great deal of work and a man is really tied down to the farm.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the time of export my information is that much cheese is exported within one to three months after it is manufactured. There is another element that enters here and that would apply particularly in our winter months; Quebec and Ontario, and particularly eastern Ontario, which are the large cheese producing districts in Canada, rush off all the cheese possible before navigation in the St. Lawrence closes, because of freight rates.

All cheese for export is graded. As a result of criticisms received from the United Kingdom to the effect that some of our cheese arrived there not in the best possible condition because it was shipped too green, we have taken steps to stamp the date on the cheese itself. That action has been taken by regulation. We have no power, however, to interfere with the export of the cheese at any time beyond grading it and having it dated so that those who get it will know how long it has been since the cheese was manufactured.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: With reference to the statement made by the minister a few moments ago as to our position in regard to cheese exports I should like to refer to a paragraph in the commercial bulletin which states that during 1933 New Zealand reaffirmed its position on the export market, when she exported 8,743 tons of a total importation by Great Britain of 9,097 tons. Australia exported 217 tons, Ireland 91 tons, and Canada 46 tons.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What period are those figures for?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: According to the bulletin they are for the entire year of 1933. The paragraph states that New Zealand reaffirmed its position and in fact, as I interpret it, may gain on the export market. New Zealand and Australia certainly have trimmed us to a frazzle in the export of cheese. I am sorry the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is not here; I remember that he and many other hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite shed crocodile tears because of what the King government did to the dairying industry. In fact I remember how the genial Minister of Railways stated, in and out of this house, how the King government was ruining the agricultural industry, how they were reducing the chances of the farmers to make a living on the land. I never saw such a sympathetic bunch in my life as they were during the session of 1930. They had a bureau in a building across Wellington street, with a staff of I do not know how many—

An hon. MEMBER: It worked fine.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It certainly did, but it will not work again. To-day the standing of those people who tried to fool the farmers in those days—I am speaking politically—is not very high. The farmers know they were fooled; that is shown by the figures in these bulletins, and the minister cannot deny it. The farmers have been deceived by this government; they have been induced and in fact almost forced by circumstances to go into the dairying industry. The minister knows that when cereal prices are low and a farmer cannot get enough from the sale of cereals to buy the necessities of life he has to go into the dairying industry even if he only receives a small amount, because he needs ready cash. The minister knows that to-day no farmer can go to a bank and get a penny, and the minister also knows that a farmer must have some cows in order to get a few pennies together with which to buy tea and sugar, even with a two cent excise tax on sugar. There must be some reason for New Zealand and Australia taking the place of Canada in the export of cheese. If one compared the present price of butter with the price of cheese I think he would find that it would be more profitable to take milk to the cheese factory. Either we are not producing enough cheese, we are not producing the quality of cheese, or there is something wrong with our commercial intelligence or trade agencies in Great Britain. I think that these statistics and the information contained in the commercial bulletin of the government certainly need some explanation. I hope the minister will be able to justify the figures and will be able to give us good and sufficient reasons why we are occupying that position to-day. Especially should he do so in view of the fact that the minister must take the responsibility for the Conservative party in regard to the propaganda which during the last election campaign they spread throughout the country. They promised a higher price for butter, they promised a higher price for cheese, they promised the Mafeking cutoff,—they promised everything. These are the results of the promises made by this government and the candidates representing it in 1930.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the statements of the hon. member to the effect that this government misled the farmers, may I say that no one person can speak for every speech made throughout all parts of the country. So far as my own information goes, however, I say that the promise of this party was that we would endeavour, first of all, to give the Canadian market to Canadian farmers, and I maintain that we have carried out that promise. The effect of our action, translated into dollars and cents—a process which is more understandable to the farmer than would be a theoretical statement about markets—is this: The right hon. leader of the party, to which the hon. member who has just spoken gives his allegiance, has made the statement that if he were returned to power the duties would be placed where they were when he left office.

Mr. YOUNG: Hear, hear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member says "hear, hear." In dollars and cents the right hon. gentleman's statement means only this: Had the policies advocated by him been in force in April, 1933, the export value of our butter at that date would have been 10·94 cents per pound. I have figures here for other months, but I do not wish to bore the committee with them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is the figure given by the minister one which he suggests would have obtained had the present right hon. leader of the opposition been in power?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, if our tariff had been put where the right hon. gentleman said he would put it, namely, at the same place it was when he and his party left office. Had that been in effect the value of butter in Montreal would have been 10·94 cents per pound, plus the import duty of one cent.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This must be a dream the minister is having. Can he substantiate what he is saying or the figures he is giving?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, my figures are absolutely correct. This is based on the export market in London. In the same week the premium on our butter, brought about by the action this government did take, and said during the election campaign it would take—not that the price of butter would be raised but that the market would be given to the Canadian farmer—was 18·06 cents per pound higher. That is, the premium over the export market was 18·06 cents per pound, which is an increase of more than 150 per cent over the price which the farmer would have got for his butter had he been selling it, at that particular time, under the arrangement promised by the right hon. gentleman opposite in the event of his being returned to power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is a dream.

Mr. FAFARD: What would have been the price of butter had the C.C.F. been in power?

Mr. YOUNG: Would the minister tell us the duty?

Mr. WEIR Melfort): There is nothing which would give me greater pleasure than to answer all questions at once, but I think the discussion would be of greater value and of more interest to hon. members, and I would be in a better position to give information, if I were allowed to answer one question at a time. With the exception of the months of September and part of the month of October, in the year 1933, a premium existed over the export market during the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July, August, November and December.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell us the duty on New Zealand butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should like to answer the question asked by one hon. member before answering that of another.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will have a whole lot more to ask.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is fine; we welcome the questions. The bulletin to which reference was made appears to contain the information that for the year 1933 Canada was in fourth place, so far as the importation of cheese into the United Kingdom was concerned. I have before me the monthly report of the United Kingdom showing the figures on imports of cheese. The report indicates that in 1933 Canada exported 70,528,080 pounds, New Zealand, 230,652,016 pounds and Australia—and I understood the hon. member to say that Australia had a greater export to the United Kingdom than had Canada—is given the figure of 10,357,000. I do not think there will be very much gained by discussing across the floor of the committee any comparison of statistics the hon. member has in front of him and those I have in front of me unless I am given a copy of his figures and have an opportunity to study them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I shall be very pleased to give the minister a copy when I am through with them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In 1900 the total production of butter in Canada was 30,066,739 pounds; in 1932 the total production of creamery butter was 214,002,127 pounds. At the same time the production of cheese decreased from 220,833,269 pounds in 1900 to 120,524,243 pounds in 1932.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not so, according to the information the minister gave a little while ago.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have three sets of figures now.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One set gives exports, and the other production. In 1929 the production of cheese was 118,746,286 pounds; less than it was in 1932. In 1930, the production was 119,105,203 pounds.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Chairman, I must say I have had dreams similar to the one the minister has been describing to the house when I have dreamed of a comparison between what the farmers would have received had the right hon. leader of the opposition been in power and what they have received since this government has had office. But I must give to the minister and to the committee my reasons for such dreams: I had been out the night before. Let us compare the price of butter between the years 1926 and 1930 with—

Mr. GOBEIL: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member for Compton laughs; why is he not fair? Why is not the minister fair in his comparisons?

Mr. GOBEIL: Compare with the world prices.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister knows he cannot substantiate what he has just said as to prices the farmer would have received had the right hon. leader of the opposition been in power. He knows that better than anybody.

Mr. GOBEIL: London is where we sell our butter.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will you kindly keep quiet? You have said two or three words too many in this house for your own good. The less you say from now on the better for you.

Mr. GOBEIL: That is your point of view.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister has not yet explained to me, and I should like his explanation before this item passes, why Australia and New Zealand occupy the position they do to-day, and not only that but have strengthened their position in the market of Great Britain while Canada has not done so. I will send a copy of this bulletin over to the minister so that he may see the figures for himself. If they are not correct, why are they published?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I ask the hon. member to read from the bulletin the Australian exports to the United Kingdom market for the year to which he refers.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: During 1933?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am going to read it, but it is in French, and I will translate it as I go along, and the translation will be just as good as the translating that will be done under the Secretary of State's new bureau.

Mr. QUINN: Read it in Irish. To-morrow is St. Patrick's day.

Mr. POWER: He would sure be right then.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Here are the exact words:

During 1933 New Zealand reaffirmed its position on the markets when its exportation amounted to 8,743 tons.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the United Kingdom market?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes. It goes on:

Out of a total importation of 9,098 tons Australia contributed 217 tons, Canada 46 tons and the Irish Free State 91 tons.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Forty-six tons for Canada?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And Australia two hundred odd?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is what it says. I will read it again:

During 1933—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is that for the entire year?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It says, "During 1933." That must mean the whole year:

During 1933 New Zealand reaffirmed its position on the markets when its exportation amounted to 8,743 tons. Out of a total importation of 9,098 tons, Australia contributed 217 tons, Canada 46 tons and the Irish Free State 91 tons.

Mr. VENIOT: Even the Irish beat us.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is for one year?

Mr. VENIOT: He has given you what it says.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member at the outset said something about having dreams, and that what I said was not based on fact. What I stated was based first of all on the statement of the right hon. leader of the opposition that if he was returned to power the duty would be lowered or placed where it was when he went out of power. But we do not need to go back. At the present time the price of butter in Montreal is 29½ to 30 cents a pound wholesale. The price of the finest Australian butter in London is 15·7 cents per pound. Now if the duty imposed against importations of butter into this country was one cent a pound, which was the duty at the time the present opposition went out of power, Australia could pay that cent a pound duty and deliver their butter here at 16·7 cents a pound, which would mean a difference from the present price of 12 or 13 cents a pound.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the minister a question right at that point? In view of the figures given by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) a little while ago of the importations of butter from Australia and New Zealand, will the minister tell the committee how much more the Canadian farmer would be receiving for his butter to-day if this government had prevented the importation of that Australian and New Zealand butter? It is just as logical for me to ask that question as for the minister to make the comparison he does.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The butter imported into Canada during each of the past two years, as I read earlier, was less than one million pounds.

Mr. VALLANCE: But suppose it had not been imported, what would have been the difference in the price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If it had not been imported the price certainly would not have been lower. Therefore the figures that I quote are at least safe figures. If that butter had not come in we might naturally expect that there might have been some increase in price, but the amount imported was only two-days' supply of butter for the whole dominion. This butter has been let in up to the quantity that I have stated, and in spite of that our butter is at the price it is, but if it were not for the present duty butter would be coming into this country to-day on the same basis as it enters the United Kingdom at the price stated, plus the duty.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In other words, that means that the importations of butter under the Liberal regime decreased the price of butter to the Canadian farmer, while importations of butter under the Conservative regime increased the price of butter to the Canadian farmer. That is the only conclusion one can draw.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You let in 35,000,000 pounds under the Liberal government, at a cent a pound duty.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The reason why we imported butter from 1926 to 1930, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend is that we wanted our people to have butter on their bread—that and no other reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You let it come in here because you had no weapon to keep it out. Everybody knows that, and that is why the farmers voted against it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Nobody knows better than my hon. friend that any time cereals reach the prices prevailing from 1926 to 1930 the farmers are not going to produce dairy products unless they are crazy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Speak for your farmers.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am speaking for our farmers. You have no farmers in your part of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have better farmers than you ever dared to be.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister knows well that when the farmer can get 60 and 65 cents for his barley, 50 and 60 cents for oats, and $1.25 for wheat, he is not going to milk cows unless he has to. If you compare the prices received for butter in 1926 with those received in 1930 you will find that they were higher then than under this regime.

Mr. VENIOT: Ten cents a pound.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And that in spite of no duty. The minister seeks to interject a political side to this issue when I am quite serious in my efforts to help the farmers. He stated that if the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King had been Prime Minister such and such a thing would have happened while such and such a thing has happened because he and his colleagues are in power. I think he is going beyond the facts and is giving us just a little dream of his own. The minister has not answered my question as to why Australia increased her importations of cheese into the British market while Canada's imports continued to go down. I should like to know why this has happened in the face of the promises made and the glowing pictures painted during the last elections. I want to get this point clear as it is something the farmers want to know.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the matter of political interjection and the hon. member being so serious for the welfare of the farmer, the committee might note that he started his own statement with the words "speaking from a political standpoint."

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That was an answer I gave to some back-bencher who interrupted me.

Mr. QUINN: What are you, a front bencher?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member quoted from the Commercial Intelligence Journal and sought to show that Canada had taken fourth place in the exports of cheese to the United Kingdom. I shall read from this bulletin for the information of the committee.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is that the French copy?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I was reading from the French copy.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The statement which the hon. member read is headed "butter" not "cheese." This reads:

> New Zealand imports of butter into Avonmouth have again moved upward. In 1932 they amounted to 5,908 tons out of a total import of 6,200 tons, and those from Australia amounted to 226 tons compared with 29 tons from Canadian ports.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. minister will notice the portion marked from which the hon. member quoted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was starting at the beginning.

Mr. VALLANCE: Do not mix it up with the cheese.

Mr. QUINN: They do not mix.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is all under the same heading of "butter." It continues:

> During 1933 New Zealand strengthened her hold on the market by increasing to 8,743 tons out of a total import of 9,098 tons, Australia contributing 217 tons, Canada 46 tons, and the Irish Free State 91 tons. Danish and Russian butter is sold in quantity but supplies are not imported direct.

Mr. VALLANCE. Would the minister mind sending that over.

Mr. POULIOT: If the minister mixes butter and cheese it will be a new mixture.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was not mixing them.

Mr. COOTE: There is a good reason why New Zealand and Australia have captured a large share of the market in Great Britain. For the last three years the British pound has been worth a considerable premium in Australia and New Zealand. About a year and a half ago the British pound was worth fifty per cent more to the Australian exporter in his own currency than it was to the Canadian. This is the real reason why Australia and New Zealand have taken the butter and cheese market from the Canadian producer.

Mr. VALLANCE: This all goes to prove that we should have a new translation system. The minister gave me the exports of cheese to Great Britain in 1933, and I should like to have them for 1932.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The exports of cheese for the year ended March 31, 1933, amounted to 85,711,600 pounds; for 1932, 85,424,700 pounds, which is less and for 1931, 79,590,400 pounds, still less.

Mr. VALLANCE: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), the other night when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was trying to get some estimates through it was pointed out that we were not holding the trade in wheat and cereals between Great Britain and Canada. I think the whole thing resolves itself into the difference in exchange. Because of the sound money policy of this government we now find ourselves in this position. The minister compared the position of the farmers of Canada between 1926 and 1930 with their position in later years and tried to make out that that position had been improved. He knows just as well as I that that argument cannot stand and will not be accepted by the farmers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was answering a statement made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien).

Mr. VALLANCE: The farmer of western Canada and of eastern Canada as well has never been in the plight in which he finds himself to-day. I do not wish to go over the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and members of his party during the throes of the last general elections, but in February, 1932, the price of wheat was the lowest it had been in four hundred years. In the face of this fact we have the minister standing up and trying to convince this committee that to-day the farmer is in a more enviable position in connection with butter production than he was from 1926 to 1930.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not state that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Sour grapes; you do not want to see the price of butter go up.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Coote.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

RACE MEETINGS OF FOURTEEN CONSECUTIVE DAYS INSTEAD OF TWO SEVEN DAY PERIODS

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the criminal code (race meetings).

Mr. BROWN: Explain.

Mr. MORAND: The purpose of the bill is simply to remove the present twenty day period that intervenes between two race meetings of seven days each: it has nothing to do with the principle of racing or with increasing the number of days of racing. Under the criminal code as it stands, a period of twenty days must elapse between one race meeting of seven days and the next meeting of seven days. With conditions as they are now, particularly in our city, in view of the fact that the state of Michigan now has racing one hundred and twenty days in the year, it is difficult for those having investments in race tracks in our city to find ways and means of holding two meetings of seven days each, whereas it would be easier to have a meeting of fourteen consecutive days.

Mr. BROWN: This does not increase the total number of days?

Mr. MORAND: No, nor the total number of races.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have no objection to the bill being read the second time, but I would ask that it do not go into committee until we have had an opportunity of communicating with the various provincial governments on the subject. They are entitled to a certain amount of taxation on the pari mutuel system, and I should like to ascertain whether they have any objection to the proposed change.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Dairying, $234,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before the house rose at six o'clock we had discussed this item for about an hour, and it was also under consideration on another occasion. I do not wish to prolong the debate to any extent, but there are a number of things that might be discussed here, particularly some of the statements made this afternoon. Those of us who were here in 1925 will recall that butter became a political issue after the enactment of the Australian treaty in 1925—I think it was then. From that day to this it has been more or less a political issue.

Now, while I do not think that we should spend too much time going over ancient history, nevertheless, in order to make the record right, I wish to make a few references to that occasion. The price of butter in 1925 was high, running between 35 and 40 cents per pound wholesale, basis No. 1 pasteurized in the city of Montreal on January 1. At the election of 1925 and also at the election of 1926 it was attempted by the then leader of the Conservative party, now leader of the Senate, to make more or less of a political issue of this subject; but butter being so high, it was difficult to do that and it did not cut very much ice, if at all, in either election. In 1930, however, the same treaty was still in vogue, although there was in it one anticipated change introduced by the Hon. Mr. Dunning in his last budget on May day 1930, in which he intimated to the house that he had given notice to the Australian government, and I believe to the government of New Zealand as well, that after October the duty on butter from the antipodes would revert to 4 cents—what it had been for the previous quarter of a century. I would point out that it was really 4 cents, and had the Liberals come into power it would have been 4 cents. The minister's calculation is wrong when it is suggested that it would have been only one cent had the Liberals come into power again in 1930.

We come now to the present day, and before going any further I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that while the Australian treaty was the occasion of a political issue, for four successive years after the enactment of that treaty, butter averaged 40 cents per pound in Montreal on January 1, basis No. 1 pasteurized. It can readily be appreciated therefore that in view of that high price not much of an issue could be made of butter, notwithstanding the fact that the duty had been reduced to one cent a pound; and one of the reasons why we reduced it to one cent per pound was simply that this was in accordance with the general policy of making treaties with any empire or other government on the basis of lower and not of higher tariffs. That might have been a political mistake but it was not an economic mistake; it was not a mistake so far as the interests of the consumers were concerned, and when the high price to the producers was what it was then. Why, farmers would think they were in clover to-day if butter in Montreal were 40 cents a pound. Last fall it was less than half that amount. During 1929 and particularly during 1930, butter, naturally with other commodities, went down and it was then that the terrific onslaught was made on the Australian treaty, with appreciable results, in the province of Quebec at all events. Probably most of the seats lost to the Liberal party in that province were attributed to the Australian treaty; the treaty was blamed for it. There are a number of other reasons I will not discuss; it is past history. The question is, what are we to do now? What are the causes of present butter prices?

Last fall, I remember, some of us were in Mackenzie riding doing some big game hunting, and butter fat in the month of October was exactly 14 cents per pound, just half what it is to-day. I have word from my home to-day that the last can of cream we sold fetched 28 cents, on the basis of butter fat for table cream, twice what it was last October. You cannot credit that to the by-election in Mackenzie; there are a number of causes to which it can be attributed. One cause however is that butter is scarcer now, and no doubt scarcer all over the world. I do not know what stocks there are throughout the world or in cold storage here, but this condition cannot be attributed either to the by-election in Mackenzie or to the Ottawa pacts because that was a year and a half ago, and the downward tendency persisted after that. It cannot be attributed to the present duty on Australian butter because that was on last fall also. We shall have therefore to leave it to the minister to explain why the price was only 14 cents last fall whereas to-day it is exactly twice as much. It is difficult to find reasons for this, because we can argue about anything from statistics. You know what is said about statistics—of course I will not repeat it here, but there is more or less truth in it. We are statistically cured now. We are getting such a dose of them we may be spoiled if we get overdosed.

But I am concerned about another matter. I find that according to a bulletin I have here, issued jointly by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce, there is some danger of our being asked to restrict still further our exports to the old country. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) referred this afternoon to the reduction in exports of cheese. The reports indicate that almost every month these export British quotas are going on for various Canadian commodities; first on wheat, then on cattle, oats and eggs, and now we are told there is going to be a quota on dairy products from the antipodes, and very likely we may be asked to apply it to dairy products from Canada. Before going any further I would like the minister to give us some assurance regarding quotas on our dairy products. These gentleman's agreements with the motherland are very nice, but there is an Empire bargain, and while there was not much in it at any time for us in the matter of dairy products there will be still less if a quota is put on our cheese, still further restricting our exports. I would like to know what the situation is, if there is anything pending as far as the minister knows as to a quota being put on dairy products from Canada, or from the antipodes either, by Great Britain.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Answering the last question first, as far as my information goes there is nothing to lead us to believe at present that a quota would be put on against our dairy products. I believe that matter has been under discussion between the Australian and the New Zealand and the United Kingdom officials.

Going back to the statement made by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) before the committee rose, I do not think anyone could justly give the interpretation he did to anything I said as to the comparative condition of farmers in Canada in 1929 or 1930 and the present time.

Mr. YOUNG: There is no comparison.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I realize that the condition of agriculture in Canada is not what we would like in many respects. The condition of farmers in practically all countries has become very much worse since the beginning of what is called the great depression. The only comparison that could fairly be made would be between normal conditions in various countries and the conditions as they exist at the present time.

With reference to the price of butter fat being 14 cents a pound in the fall and 28 cents at the present time, when butter fat was at 14 cents we had accumulated in Canada a stock of butter greater than was required for our own consumption. The butter in storage in September was about 42,000,000 pounds, which I believe proved a surprise to most of the trade, and when they realized, upon the report coming out, that storage stocks had reached that amount they became alarmed, seeing that the price they had been paying averaged some four cents per pound more than would have been warranted had they realized that we were going on an export basis. That forced them to export some butter, and therefore the price fell to that of the export market. At that time we called a conference and were able to have some of the different holders of butter—and some who were not holders, as they felt it would be healthy for the trade—export some butter from Canada even at a loss. Therefore the reason for the price of butter being what it was then was that we were forced on the world market. At the present time we are very near a balance of production and consumption. That is why the market is what it is at present.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that explanation is quite logical. Canada was aiming not to be obliged to export any butter, just to meet our own requirements, so that we might artificially, by means of a tariff get more than the export price. Whether that is an attainable and ambitious object I leave to the committee to decide. Since then some export has taken place, relieving the pressure on the market, and prices have responded.

My hon. friend indicated that he did not think there was any danger of a quota being imposed on our butter, although there had been some discussion with regard to the antipodes. That is all the information that I have as to the antipodes. But we have here a bulletin called "The Agricultural Situation," and, a significant thing, it is put out by two ministers, so it ought to be doubly right. There are not going to be any mistakes about this bulletin; two ministers will stand behind its accuracy. It states that it is—

> Published by authority of the Hon. R. Weir, Minister of Agriculture, and the Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I wonder if this is significant in connection with what we hear every day, that these two departments are going to merge, with the Department of Trade and Commerce on the outside. The minister perhaps can give me some particulars about that also. Anyway this is a nicely gotten up bulletin. Here is what it says about the dairy products quota question, on page 28:

> The large and increasing volume of butter and cheese imported into the United Kingdom has caused the British government to enter into discussions with New Zealand and Australia with a view to the voluntary restriction of exports of these products to the United Kingdom. If any such agreements are concluded between the United Kingdom and New Zealand and Australia, Canada may be asked to take similar action;

That brings up the whole question of how far Canada is to go to meet Great Britain in the matter of these quotas, and how long it is going to take for us to be squeezed out of the British market with a lot of our farm commodities. That is what we are heading for, as far as I can see. On the next page it says:

The possibility of restrictions on imports of dairy products into the United Kingdom would suggest that it would be advisable for Canadian producers to develop home consumption as much as possible.

I hope that advice will not be given to us in regard to wheat, that we will have to eat all we produce, because that is more than we can do, and feel comfortable. But our butter quality has improved and has been improving for years. Our consumption per capita I think is the highest in the world, and the home market in Canada is a great factor, because even this year we have been coming pretty close to eating all we produce. But if that is to be our aim in all farm products we will be known as a tail-end country, just dragging along. Canada has been known as a great agricultural country, better known for that than possibly anything else; are we to aim to supply only our own requirements in such products as butter, bacon and eggs and other such farm products.

Reverting to this bulletin, I am afraid there is more in this merger proposition than may appear. I can recall that at one time copyrights and patents which now come under the Trade and Commerce, were under the Department of Agriculture. Grain never was under the Department of Agriculture; in the last century it was under the Department of Inland Revenue, among the tobaccos and whiskies, and from there is was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce. In the past these various services have been in the habit of gravitating from agriculture to trade and commerce to help make that a better and more important department, and I am afraid if the minister is not on his guard they will be swiping something more from agriculture when he is not looking. He had a very excellent official representing the Department of Agriculture in London when this government came into power, but it was not long before the Minister of Trade and Commerce had that most capable gentleman in his own department, bag, boots and body, and I know he got hold of a good man.

Now we have this joint bulletin which I hold in my hand. Is this another step in the direction of absorption of Agriculture by Trade and Commerce? I want to tell the minister that if anything like that is going on he can depend upon at least one individual to back him up in resisting it; I will do all I can in that way. As a matter of fact, if there is to be any swiping or changing it should be in the direction of having agriculture all under one minister, and logically that should be the Minister of Agriculture. I know of no country in the world that has agriculture under two ministers; it only results in more confusion and more mistakes, and I question if either department will be any better off by this sort of interlocking of departments. It is all right to have a companionate marriage which can be dissolved as quickly as possible after disillusionment, but I should not like this merger proposal to go any further. The farmers do not want to be running after two ministers. In connection with the proposed marketing act the general report on the street is that it will be under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Our farmers want to go to the Minister of Agriculture when they want anything; they do not want to be trotting after two ministers, and I repeat the logical, proper and sympathetic place for them to go is to the Minister of Agriculture. I think perhaps if the minister would give us some assurance on that point we would not need to talk any more about this matter. A word from him would be sufficient, and I hope he does not mind the candour with which I have discussed the question. Those are the facts, and we have the evidence here in this merger bulletin.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place my information is that the per capita consumption of butter in Canada is 30½ pounds, while in New Zealand and Australia it is 35 pounds. If our consumption were to increase to that extent we would wipe out the exports of all dairy products.

With reference to the bulletin, it is the outcome to a large extent of a series of conferences between the various provincial departments of agriculture, those connected with agricultural colleges and with provincial and federal institutions, which culminated in a conference in Toronto in 1932 at which it was agreed that by getting together and discussing the problems of agriculture and the possible means of solving those difficulties a good deal of duplication and wastage would be eliminated. It was felt that in publications alone there was a great deal of wastage and duplication, and sometimes disagreement, so it was decided to set up a committee representative of these organizations interested in agriculture. The committee named was composed of one member from the federal department, Doctor Booth; Doctor Grindley of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and Professor Lattimer of Macdonald College. Their first publication, I believe, was the Agricultural Situation, which I think hon. gentlemen interested in agriculture will agree was a commendable contribution for a beginning, and which served the purpose of assembling the combined thought of the various interested organizations. This bulletin is sponsored by that committee. I do not think I should be asked to make any prophecy as to what will take place in the future; I do not think I could do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is quite apparent that the minister is not greatly enamoured of this proposed absorption at all events; I am glad he is not, and I need not discuss it further.

Now I wonder if I dare refer to a matter which has been rather controversial on this side of the house, as well as on the ministerial side. It seems to me that dairying is too closely associated with the national life and national health of Canada to be discriminated against as is the case at present. I am referring to the grant which formerly was made to the National Dairy Council. Two or three members on this side of the house took some objection to the activities of the council prior to the last election; I always said that even if they were indiscreet they were not half as much so as the gentlemen who composed the horticultural council. I do not think either organization should be tied down in connection with public questions; that is my own personal view. That is the ground I have taken, though possibly other hon. gentlemen will differ with me on that point. I do not think they will differ, however, as to the principle that either these grants should remain in all these branches of agriculture or they should be eliminated from all branches. I think that is a fair proposition. I am not suggesting that they should be eliminated in any branch, but I realize how much dairying means not only to the east but also to the west where it is becoming more important all the time, and it does seem too bad that this one branch of agriculture, founded on that old standby the dairy cow, which never fails no matter how much prices may vary, should be discriminated against. The old cow keeps on freshening and producing her milk from which come the many dairy products into which milk is processed. They go on year after year, no matter what happens; they never fail. Yet there is no government grant for her. When I turn to the estimates of two or three years ago I find a grant of $5,000 for the National Dairy Council. I was not responsible for it; I do not feel sensitive about that grant disappearing because I did not initiate it. It was done before my time, though it is true that on my recommendation the grant was increased. Does not the hon. gentleman think that the National Dairy Council, which is composed of excellent men, has been disciplined enough and without cause through the elimination of the grant for two years? Does he not think the grant should be restored so that all these organizations will be on a parity? Is that not a fair proposal? I am sure the minister would feel inclined that way. I do not think there would be much fuss over here if that were done, and even if there were the minister only has to look at the noses he can count over there in his rear guard. You can do what you like in any case, but if this grant is restored I shall not be tempted to make an issue of the matter in the next election. There are enough public issues without bothering with this matter important as it is. I should like to see this discrimination remedied if possible.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The position with reference to the grant to the National Dairy Council is this: They stated specifically that they did not desire a grant, and after due consideration they felt that they would like to be free and not subject to the criticism which had been made in the past that their policy was in any way coloured by the acceptance of a grant. They stated they would rather not have it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Would that apply to the other two organizations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have not yet notified us that they do not want it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am afraid these gentlemen made this statement after their heads were chopped off, and they made a virtue of necessity by making the best of it that they could. I shall draw the attention of the minister to one or two facts concerning that useful body of live stock men known as the livestock pool, just nicely started to export cattle to the old country. They were struck twice, once by adverse exchange and the other time when the minister withdrew the federal grants from them. Between the two misfortunes, they were just about doubled up and put out of business. I am afraid that this body, the National Dairy Council, like everybody in these times, whether it be connected with church or state, have found great difficulty in financing, and I am afraid that the same fate will befall the National Dairy Council that befell the live stock marketing association. It is not the loss of the $5,000 alone that would do it, Mr. Chairman. It is tantamount to saying that the government's countenance, as well as its cash, is withheld from the dairy council and the dairy industry, and that the prestige of the organization has been impaired. This is the body, more than any other body, which is responsible for abolishing both the manufacturing of and the importation into Canada of oleomargarine. I think my hon. friend would not require to press a grant upon them, because the old dynasty has gone—the old president has resigned, and the old secretary has gone hence. I think the minister would find no difficulty in putting them on a parity with the other two organizations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place, I did not understand the hon. member to refer to the Canadian Live Stock Cooperative Association. They did get into some difficulties through a misunderstanding they had with the cooperative in the United Kingdom—although they felt that they had been misunderstood—and with the drop in exchange—they were placed in a very embarrassing position.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Their new president came to see me in connection with the matter, and although there was no commitment whatever on our part, and although it was aside from any grant which had been made to them, it was felt not only because of the excellent work that they had done but of the possibility of work which they might continue to do, we could give them a special grant from a special vote, sufficient—and this was their request as a matter of fact—to let them out of their difficulty. I think the amount was about $10,000. That was their request, and we gave them that amount.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That would be only doing the same for them as the Minister of Finance did for the cattle shippers last year. For about forty days he was good enough to pay the exchange on thirteen commodities, one of which was cattle. I say that was a proper procedure towards the live stock pool, and I appreciate it. In that regard they were being treated the same before the stabilization fund came down as others were treated afterwards.

Mr. VALLANCE: In dealing with the Canadian quota into the British market, the hon. member for Melfort suggested a question to my mind which I should like to direct to the minister. I should like him to correct me if I am wrong. Is the importation of Canadian cattle into the British market the same for the first three months of this year as it was last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is more this year.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is, it is extended now to six months, do I understand?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the minister any reason to give us as to why the British government has seen fit to take this action?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The action was taken because of a number of circumstances. In the first place, when it was forecast that a very severe embargo was to be imposed against Irish cattle going into the United Kingdom, old country buyers before the imposition of this regulation bought all the cattle from Ireland, that they had money to buy with, or that they could borrow with which to buy, I believe. The result was that they had more cattle on hand than they had feed with which to properly look after them. Some of those cattle in the spring of 1933 were being forced on the market in a more or less unfinished condition and in quantities which had a depressing effect upon the market. Then, to accentuate that condition, in July and August of last year, a drought which had been unprecedented for years in the old land reduced pasturage to the point where they were forced to put on the market still more cattle than those people who were in the best position to forecast had thought possible. These cattle, too, were not finished as well as they should have been. Because of this drought, the root crop in the old country was very much below normal. Those hon. members who are acquainted with methods of feeding obtaining in the old country will understand that the basic food is supplied by the root crop. Especially is that so, I believe, in Scotland. This shortage continued the process of forcing cattle on the market in an unfinished condition, and in greater quantities. The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries in the old land, hoping to improve the price of cattle, followed the same line he had followed with reference to bacon, and placed an embargo of fifty per cent against the importation of Irish cattle. That is, they could export to the United Kingdom only fifty per cent of the cattle they had exported during the same period ir previous years. The Irish Free State, not to be outdone, and to show that they did not have to do what the United Kingdom said they should do, decided they would take matters in their own hands and would not export as many cattle, even, as Great Britain had stipulated they would be allowed. That is the rather incongruous position now obtaining. At the same time the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries asked that we cooperate with them to hold off the market as many cattle as possible to see if the price would not go up. At first they asked that for three months we would not ship any more. They did not ask for a cut in our shipments, but simply that we would not ship any more in the first three months of 1934 than we had in the first three of 1933. That was felt to be not entirely satisfactory, because our first shipment in 1933 did not begin, to any extent, until late in January, and after negotiations had taken place the period was extended to six months. We feel that there is a probability—and I would not like to put it any stronger than that—that with any improvement of conditions, before the expiration of six months, if we can show it will be a hardship on us, there may be a further extension.

Mr. VALLANCE: Following up the reasons given by the minister, may I offer some others which were produced on the floor of the British House of Commons. I find that the Marquess of Titchfield asked the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries whether, having regard to the fact that imports of cattle from Canada since January 1 had been greater than in the corresponding period of last year and to the stabilization arrangement announced by him on December 20 last, he had any statement to make on the subject. The reply of Mr. Elliott was as follows:

> His Majesty's government in Canada have not found it possible to regulate imports on the basis of one-quarter only. They have, however, agreed that the period of stabilization should be extended to the first six months of this year. Under the revised arrangement, total arrivals of Canadian cattle during the months January to June, 1934, will be limited to the aggregate figure for the corresponding period of 1933.

So it appears that we are not going to be permitted to ship any more cattle from the first of January, 1934, to the end of June, 1934, than we did during the corresponding period in 1933. But the quota in 1933 was applicable only to the first three months. I should like to ask the minister this question: Does this new order of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries in the British House of Commons apply also to oats and eggs?

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that it does not apply to eggs. I am not in a position to say whether or not it applies to oats. My own impression is that it is not really effective so far as shutting out any of our oats at the present time is concerned, that there has been no hardship and no restriction has been necessary on the export of our oats. I thought I covered the point when I was on my feet before with reference to this being a hard and fast agreement for the first six months. We feel that if we can show cause, consideration will be given, just as they showed consideration in the extension of the first three months, because they do appreciate that we have tried in every way to cooperate with them. The number will be in the neighbourhood of 20,000 cattle on the basis of 1933. It was thought some two or three weeks ago, with the improvement of the situation in the old country, that there would be no necessity for restriction at all, but since then due to the conditions I have outlined the price has been depressed still further and things have not improved the way they had hoped.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the machinery, if any, that the department uses to see that that quota is offered, and what is done with the number of head above the quota that can be exported?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There have been no steps taken so far to restrict the shipment of cattle from this country. If it is found necessary to make restrictions provision will be made to give the government sufficient authority, I understand.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Before six o'clock when I was questioning the minister I inadvertently made an error. I was reading from a publication of the government, the Bulletin des Renseignements Commerciaux, and quoting from an article headed "Les Importations de fromage et de beurre de l'ouest de l'Angleterre en 1933. D. S. Cole, Commissaire du Commerce." The article is in French and I translated it into English. I will now read it in French:

> Au cours de 1933, la Nouvelle-Zélande a raffermi sa position sur le marché en portant ses envois à 8,743 tonnes sur une importation totale de 9,098, et l'Australie en a contribué 217, le Canada 46, et l'Etat Libre d'Irlande 91.

I will now translate the heading into English:

> Provision Trade of the West of England in 1933
> D. S. Cole, Canadian Trade Commissioner
> Cheese

When I was translating the paragraph into English in the house I did not notice the word "butter" in small print. I made this error inadvertently, and I apologize to the minister and to hon. gentlemen. I hope that this explanation will prevent any wrong impression which might otherwise have been created. But after making this explanation I still maintain, Mr. Chairman, that Canada in its export of cheese to Great Britain occupies fourth position only, and in substantiation of my statement I refer to the bulletin issued by the statistics branch on March 9, which distinctly states that Canada occupies the fourth position in its export of cheese. I trust that the minister will accept in good grace this explanation which I am making to remove any impression that may have been created that I was trying to give a false statement to the house.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the statement of the bulletin that we occupy fourth place, I think hon. members will feel that that is not a fair statement considering the conditions under which the cheese industry in this country operates and the desire to get all manufactured cheese out of the country if possible before navigation closes. January is not therefore a fair month to take for comparison. So far as the hon. gentleman's statement with reference to the mistake he made before six o'clock is concerned, I do not think anyone listening to the discussion and appreciating the seriousness with which the hon. member was making his quotations had any idea whatever that he was trying to misrepresent anything, and everyone will gladly admit and realize that it was a mistake that anyone might have made.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister tell us how much Canadian butter is in storage in Canada at the present time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On March 1, 1934, Canadian storage stocks of creamery butter amounted to 7,056,695 pounds.

Mr. VENIOT: Has the minister any record of a shipment of New Zealand butter landing in Halifax since the first of March or a week or ten days previous to that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A number of shipments have arrived. Referring to a direct shipment from New Zealand I quote a telegram from Halifax, Nova Scotia, dated March 16, and addressed to Mr. J. F. Singleton, dairy and cold storage branch, Ottawa:

> Yesterday's price current make only. To-day's price the same. Canadian Scottish discharging Monday, Canadian Victor tomorrow.

That is a shipment direct from New Zealand.

Mr. VENIOT: An item has appeared in the press that 12,000 boxes of New Zealand butter were landed at Halifax and that the shipment was held up for a number of days, after which 5,000 boxes were released. Can the minister tell us whether that is so or not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This, of course, comes under the Department of National Revenue. A number of shipments of butter did arrive in Halifax. There was some doubt whether a certain shipment was from New Zealand to Halifax via the United Kingdom and not directly from the United Kingdom. If the shipment came from New Zealand billed to Halifax, routed through the United Kingdom, it would come under the New Zealand treaty, under clause 4 of which the shipment may be held in bond for thirty days. That is why that shipment was at first held until an investigation could be made. In the meantime the Department of National Revenue got in touch with the various importers and very satisfactory arrangements have been made by which this butter will be released in quantities which it is felt cannot unduly depress the price of butter. We have given a good deal of study to the butter situation in the maritimes as a result of these shipments, and the latest information we have from the dairy commissioner in Nova Scotia is to the effect that at first he thought it was the increased production in Prince Edward Island that was coming into Nova Scotia, but the latest information is that none of this butter so far has been released for sale in Nova Scotia. The situation is rather delicate.

Mr. VENIOT: Where is it released for sale?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Montreal, Toronto and various points in the east. At the present time the storage stocks of butter are perhaps the closest to consumption needs that they have been for many years.

Mr. VENIOT: 7,000,000 pounds.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is just a little over a week's supply. That 7,000,000 pounds is in storage in different parts of Canada. As I say, a delicate situation exists at different points in the dominion in the obtaining of supplies as soon as required. An effort is being made to embarrass no person and to keep prices at the present level. It is felt that during the winter months butter cannot be produced, even by the most efficient farmers, at any lower price.

Mr. VENIOT: I take it that special protection was given to the producers of butter in Nova Scotia because none of this butter was released for sale in that province. Why give special protection to Nova Scotia and not to New Brunswick?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You need a lot of butter.

Mr. VENIOT: It is quite true that a lot of hon. gentlemen slid in on butter in 1930 but they may slide out on the same article in 1934 or 1935. I cannot understand why butter from New Zealand should be released for sale in Montreal where the consumer obtains a benefit not available to the consumer in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. It would appear that the present demand for butter is greater than the supply and, therefore, New Zealand butter is being released. This same situation existed in 1930 when Canada produced 280,000,000 pounds as against a demand for 310,000,000 pounds. The importation of 30,000,000 pounds or thereabouts was permitted in order to meet the demand. I protest against the release of New Zealand butter which has been landed at Halifax for sale in Montreal and elsewhere, as this benefits only Nova Scotia. The benefit should be made applicable throughout Canada. My information is that in the vicinity of 12,000,000 pounds were landed at Halifax.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not 12,000,000 pounds.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I may be mistaken. There were 7,500 boxes, and I do not know what each box contained.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Fifty-six pounds.

Mr. VENIOT: That would be in the vicinity of 6,000,000 pounds.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Seven thousand boxes at fifty-six pounds would be in the neighbourhood of 400,000 pounds, less than half a million. I do not think the objection of the hon. member to the release of this butter outside of Nova Scotia is well taken. The storage of butter in that province this year was greater than the year before and I do not think this release gave any more protection to the farmers of Nova Scotia than to those in any other part of the dominion.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. VENIOT: It is a queer thing that they could not find a market in Montreal for the home butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The butter was released in the larger centres where there was a greater immediate necessity. We felt that by doing this there would be less effect upon the price of butter. The brokers stated that they had difficulty in obtaining an immediate supply. I believe the arrangement has proven satisfactory to the trade and to the producers and it is also fair to the consumers.

Mr. VENIOT: How much butter was in storage last fall in New Brunswick?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The three maritime provinces are given together. The stocks of creamery butter in the maritime provinces on March 1, 1933, were 446,021 pounds, and on March 1, 1934, 651,548 pounds.

Mr. BOWMAN: Will the minister give comparative prices for the better grades of butter in New York, Montreal and London?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yesterday's prices on the basis of our own exchange were 29½ cents to 30 cents in Montreal, 29¼ to 29½ cents in Toronto, 24½ cents in New York, 26 cents in Halifax, and 15 7/10 cents in London. The London price is for the finest Australian butter, which is comparable to ours.

Mr. VALLANCE: So the export market has nothing to do with our price.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is because we protect ourselves against the export prices.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister stated there were 7,000,000 pounds of butter in storage; is that all Canadian?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Canadian butter.

Mr. VALLANCE: How much butter is there in bond to-day?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The latest information we have is 4,315 boxes of fifty-six pounds each, and some of that may have been released since.

Mr. VALLANCE: What are the regulations, if any, which permit bonding of butter in Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Clause four of the New Zealand agreement.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that applicable only to New Zealand?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): New Zealand or Australia.

Mr. VALLANCE: Suppose butter was shipped in bond from some other country, what rules or regulations would apply?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not sure that I understand the hon. member's question. My information is that any importer can bring butter in bond, and it would remain in bond until he wished to release it. He is saved the paying of duty until it is released.

Mr. YOUNG: What are the conditions for getting it out of bond?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In a case like that he would pay the duty.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the duty on butter from New Zealand?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Five cents per pound on direct shipments unless clause four is invoked, when it is about eight cents per pound.

Mr. YOUNG: What is clause four?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not give it offhand.

Mr. YOUNG: Give us the substance of it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If we feel that butter is being imported into Canada to an extent to injure the dairy industry, we can protest and place the butter in bond for a period of one month.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the British minister of agriculture rely on that clause to control his market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a clause in the agreement between New Zealand and Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does the same clause appear in all the agreements?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a different clause in the agreement with Australia.

Mr. YOUNG: It is placed in bond for a month, then what happens?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If no satisfactory arrangement can be arrived at the butter will be released on payment of duty under the British preference.

An hon. MEMBER: A duty of 5 cents per pound.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, 8 cents. That lifts it out of the treaty.

Mr. BERTRAND: Before six o'clock the minister spoke of the very advantageous price of butter we were enjoying in Canada, and during the dinner hour I looked up some of the prices that had been paid. I consulted my good friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to see whether he had anything in his file in connection with this question, showing the prices paid for butter throughout the season by the different boards. The prices at the board to which I am going to refer now were those paid in 1933, and if hon. members will follow me they will see what the figures actually were.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At what point?

Mr. BERTRAND: This is the Temiscouata board. On May 8 the price was 19¾ cents.

Mr. GOBEIL: How many boxes?

Mr. BERTRAND: This was sold to Hodgson Rowson Company Limited of Montreal. There were 53 boxes sold on that day, and if they bought any more they did not pay higher prices at other points. Perhaps, I had better give a list of the prices:

The season was over for that board, and the figures I have quoted will indicate that the prices paid there and the return to the farmer were less 3 cents per pound for the cost of manufacturing. We have therefore an idea of exactly what the net price to the farmers was. This however is not the point I wish to make. The important point is that these prices were paid to the producer duing the season of production and, as the minister explained a moment ago, during the summer we came to have an overproduction in Canada and we were afraid of what would happen to the 42,000,000 pounds that we had—I am taking the minister's figures. We were therefore on an export basis. The minister was trying to credit the tariff with the high price of butter in Canada, but I would point out that when we are on an export basis the tariff will never benefit the producer. I will give further proof of that statement. During that period we exported butter: we exported to Great Britain for example, in the months of August, September, October and November, and a few pounds in December. This was probably on the good advice of the Minister of Agriculture, after there had occurred the discussion to which he made reference, that the amount of butter on hand should be reduced to assure better prices. But what happened is that during the season of production in Canada butter was low, and the intermediary, or whoever buys butter—like Hodgson Rowson, A. A. Ayer and other firms that have bought butter at different boards—and put it in warehouses. When the season was over the tariff still existed, and that is where the difference comes in. While we were on the export basis the producer was producing, so that he did not get the high price for his butter; but as soon as we were off the export basis we were all consumers. This is where the tariff plays the trick, because the consumer pays the high price. So that when it is said that we are now enjoying a price of 30 cents for butter, the fact is that the intermediary gets the benefit; the producer did receive from 13 to 15 cents per pound during the producing season, and the consumer is paying the difference. The fact is that in the non-producing season it is the consumer who pays. The minister said that we were selling butter at 29 cents as compared with 24 cents in New York and 15 cents in London, but I would point out to him that the producers have not benefited at all. That is the extent to which the tariff helps the farmer.

Mr. BOYES: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BERTRAND: Not just now, I am sorry; I wish to follow the argument through.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): If I may inquire, what remedy do you suggest?

Mr. BERTRAND: I regret that I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to interrupt me, although he is one of my compatriots and I sympathize with him. I want to be fair to everyone. To proceed, I would point out that the tariff has worked to the advantage of the intermediary, who gets the benefit of the prices which London may be fixing, plus transportation charges, plus tariff, which enables him to boost butter prices in Canada, so that the consumer, as I have said, has to pay the difference. This is the only benefit which agriculture is deriving from the tariff in Canada. So much for butter for the present.

With regard to cheese, I listened with a good deal of attention to the argument of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. Beaubien). Hon. members opposite discovered that he had made a mistake and they were getting a good deal of comfort from that fact, but I was pleased to hear the minister admit that anyone is apt to make a mistake occasionally. I would refer the committee to the bulletin prepared by the Commercial Intelligence Journal, dated March 17, 1934. We are not reassured at all by this bulletin in regard to the prospects for cheese exports in the future. You will observe that I have taken the precaution not to discuss butter in connection with this bulletin; I am speaking of cheese just now. Mr. D. S. Cole, Canadian Trade Commissioner, writing from Bristol, makes this statement:

> Bristol, February 17, 1934.—New Zealand and Canada are the chief direct suppliers of cheese to the west of England, . . .

I emphasize that. Apparently in some parts of England at least we shall have trouble in the future as far as our exports of cheese are concerned.

> Imports of Canadian cheese have fallen off heavily during the past year, and it is understood that while the chief consideration is the difference in price between Canadian and New Zealand, this is not the only reason. Prominent cheese importers state that in the past Canadian cheese has been brought direct to Bristol and then matured for several months before marketing. This was owing to the popular demand for a matured cheese. The public taste is now changing somewhat to a milder cheese which can be met by New Zealand, and has the advantage of cheapness owing to the premium which is paid for the Canadian product.

And here are figures as to the importations of Great Britain from the different countries:

Importations into Bristol for the past four years:

From	1930	1931	1932	1933
		(Tons)
Canadian ports. . .	3,239	3,008	4,215	2,500
New Zealand.	4,524	4,977	5,216	6,183

Consequently there is an increase in the importations of New Zealand cheese to that part of Great Britain of 1,600 tons, while the figures as to Canada show a decrease of over 700 tons. So even if the hon. member for Provencher did make an error in presenting his point he was not very far from the facts. The Canadian people should be warned of the danger of losing markets abroad. I think the Minister of Agriculture might very well explain to the committee and to the Canadian people how they are to face this situation. While this bulletin says that New Zealand cheese is selling cheaper than Canadian cheese on the British market, it is of interest to follow the matter further and compare the prices of Canadian and New Zealand cheese respectively when translated into the money of New Zealand and the money of Canada. What we find is that the New Zealand producer receives more in New Zealand currency for his cheese than the Canadian producer gets in Canadian money for his. Although the competition is keener for our producers, the New Zealand producer gets more for his product than we are getting in Canada for ours. I hope the minister will explain how we are going to face this situation and what is being done to meet it, so that our exports will increase instead of decrease.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) who in business life is engaged in merchandising, will I am sure appreciate more fully than some other hon. members the facts that I hope to place before him, and that they are not altogether in accord with the statement and the interpretation he has given with regard to the price of our butter. The prices quoted were paid by the Temiscouata board. In the first place they might not be representative of the prices paid generally in the dominion.

Mr. BERTRAND: Would the hon. minister then quote the different prevailing prices on a market like Montreal, to indicate how much difference there would be week by week throughout the summer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to do that if it is felt necessary.

Mr. BERTRAND: Well it is, Mr. Chairman. The minister has indicated that my quotations are not exact. In justice to himself if he can repudiate my statement he should give the necessary information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not say that the statements of the hon. member for Prescott were not correct; the quotations the hon. member gave I did not dispute. The prices of butter quoted by the hon. member, 19½, 17 1/16, 16½, 18 and 17 cents, were the prices paid during the summer months of 1933, according to the information put on Hansard. If it had not been for the protection given to our dairy producers during that time the dairy farmers in that locality would have met with this competition; the world price of butter in the United Kingdom during that time was 12.05 cents per pound. It can be laid down in Montreal at practically the same price. It costs something to get the butter from Temiscouata to Montreal; so if they resolve the price of say 12.5 at Montreal back to Temiscouata it will be at least somewhat lower. The price of butter fat being closely related to the price of butter, I think hon. members will admit that it would come to at least 4 or 5 cents a pound less for butter fat than they actually got. I am sure the hon. member realizes that, and if he will discuss seriously with any creamery man in Canada, as I have done, because of the steps we felt it necessary to take to have some butter exported, they will confirm what I say; that is that the average price of butter fat paid to farmers from one end of Canada to the other during the summer of 1933 was 4 to 5 cents a pound higher than it would have been had there not been this protection, had they been paid on the basis of the export price. That is what concerned the holders of butter in the fall, the creameries, the cooperative creameries in particular in different parts of Canada. They had paid more for their holdings than they should have paid, if they were to be in the position of having to export in the fall on account of this surplus they had in stock. That was not realized until the statistics of butter in storage came out on the first of September. Immediately they decided that to protect themselves they would have to drop the price of butter fat. They did that; the cooperative concerns had already done it in parts of the dominion. It was with this in mind that we called into consultation the holders of butter and the big distributors. In fairness to these men I must say that some of them held no greater quantities of butter than they could reasonably expect they would have been able to dispose of. Yet to assist in the situation that had arisen they agreed to take the loss themselves of lifting this surplus off the market, in the hope, of course, because that was the argument we used, that it would be to their gain to do so, giving a healthier tone to the market.

Mr. BOUCHARD: They are making up for this to-day.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The effect of that was that immediately the price paid for butter fat increased right across the country and the farmers got the benefit. As to the undue profits that it has been suggested these people made in holding butter, let us have the picture fairly before us. The hon. member for Prescott knows that you cannot hold butter from June until February or March except at a considerable cost for storage, which is in the neighbourhood of a half cent per pound per month.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that per month?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BERTRAND: Not a half cent per pound per month.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have been informed, not only by officials of my own department but also by cooperative concerns that are truly representative of farmers, that storage charges, interest, insurance and other items that enter into the cost of holding butter total from three-eighths to one-half cent per pound per month.

There is another point in that connection which I should like to mention to the committee; it is this, that in September the full significance of the effect of the shortage of feed was not realized in connection with the production of butter; the reduced production that took place was not expected. If normal conditions had obtained and the early winter had not set in throughout the country and particularly in the west, resulting in production being cut down and thus creating a scarcity where otherwise there might have been a surplus, conditions would have been different. At that time these men did not expect to be able to sell their butter for more than 21 or 22 cents a pound, in which case their profit would have been made on a very narrow margin indeed. Actually, however, when they lifted these few million pounds off the market the price of butter immediately went up all through the country, and the price of butter fat went up almost in direct proportion. During the period when the price was increased the production of butter in Canada amounted to from 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 pounds a month, so the increased price paid for the butter fat due to the protection the industry has been given, amounts to a very considerable sum. Of course the difference in the cost of production as between the winter and the summer is taken into consideration, but that difference would have obtained even if there had been no increase in the price of butter, so that increased price was reflected back to the farmer, and the increased price of butter fat on the basis of 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 pounds of butter a month shows that this increase benefited the farmers very much more than it did the private concerns that held this butter and took the risk of being able to get rid of it. If everything had not broken the one way, with poorer crops and the early winter which resulted in a lower production of butter, many of the people holding butter, unless they advanced the price for butter fat for the current make, would have stood to lose very materially.

Mr. BERTRAND: Following that may I ask the minister when the butter was lifted off the market? I think that was the expression he used.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The figures are as follows: September, 1,719,900 pounds; October, 1,763,800 pounds and November, 533,000 pounds.

Mr. BERTRAND: Those are the amounts that were exported?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BERTRAND: I just wanted to refer to this point, Mr. Chairman. During the time we had a surplus of butter we were also exporting. The bureau of statistics has supplied me with the figures just given by the minister, so we can take it that during September, October and November we were on an export basis. What was the price then paid to the producer of butter? The minister has said that if we had not had the advantage of the tariff the producers of butter would have suffered a considerable loss, but just let us see what weight can be attached to that argument. It was then known that the butter had to be lifted off the market; the press broadcast the fact that we had 42,000,000 pounds of butter, and everyone wondered what we were going to do about it. Let us compare the figures; it may be that my figures are not exactly correct, but they are in line with butter prices throughout the country, and if they are not correct let the minister give me the statistics for which I asked. During the first week of June the price was 17 cents and we were not on an export basis. During the first week of September, when we were on an export basis, the price was also 17 cents. How did the tariff help the situation; what did the tariff do for the farmers in June? According to the minister we were on an export basis in September; how does he explain the following figures? In the second week in June and September the prices were 18 and 18⅛ cents. Is the advantage with the June period? No, the advantage is with the September period; of course it is. As we follow the weekly prices for June and September figures we find a variation one way or the other of from one-eighth to one-quarter of a cent a pound.

Let us be fair and frank and call it even; what exactly is the situation that remains? While we were on an export basis we were getting the world price, consequently the tariff did not help us at all. During the period when we had the local market, the sheltered market about which we heard so much, according to our friends opposite we should have received four or five cents more per pound, but that was not so; we received less than when we were on an export basis. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that my statement that the tariff did not protect farm products still stands.

The minister advanced another argument that I almost overlooked; he said that in September so many pounds of butter were released and from 7,000,000 to 8,000,000 pounds of butter were manufactured, and that as a consequence the price of cream advanced. The only variation that I find during the period mentioned, when the minister says the farmers enjoyed a better price for their butter, amounts to very little. The price ranged from 17 to 17¼ cents, one occasion touching 18⅝ cents. The minister has said that the farmers have enjoyed an advantage during the period he mentioned, but I do not see how he can substantiate that argument. The farmer did not receive a greater price during the period in question. As I have said, the intermediaries or the jobbers have secured the whole production of butter at a price of from 17 to 18 cents per pound during the producing season, and are now selling it at 29 cents a pound. Unless the minister can suggest some further argument I will not accept his statement that the farmers have benefited by the increased price, and that the intermediary is not receiving the full benefit.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I understand the hon. member correctly, I gather he is urging that if we had no protection in Canada for the dairy industry butter would not be selling for any less than 29 cents a pound. Is that correct?

Mr. BERTRAND: If the minister wishes to know my opinion I shall tell him that if we had no tariff, the consumer would enjoy lower prices at periods when the farmers are not producing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is making the admission that if we did not have a tariff the consumers would pay less and the farmers would get more, and that the production is 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 pounds per month.

Mr. YOUNG: No he did not say that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question of the price paid for butter in the month of June and in the following months would be based, as the hon. member knows, on the estimate that the trade would make—I refer to the cooperative creameries and so on—as to the price that they would have to pay for their requirements in the winter months. The only butter on which they would realize any considerable profit—and that when distributed over the country would mean very little—would be the surplus, which is only a small proportion of the whole amount of butter; that is, there would be 42,000,000 pounds less 4,000,000 pounds. These brokers or holders of butter sold it and lifted it off the market in the months of September and October, not at the export price but at a loss to themselves.

Mr. BERTRAND: That being so, I should be quite willing to release 4,000,000 out of 42,000,000 pounds at a slight loss of a few cents per pound, if I were to make a big profit on the remaining 38,000,000 pounds. I should be quite willing to do that, and it would be good business on my part. Let us be frank and clear as to my argument that if there were no tariff the consumer would enjoy lower prices when the farmers are not producing. During the summer the farmers were producing and we attained the position where we had to face world competition. There is no better proof of this fact than that in the months of August, September, October and November we were on the world market, and we had to accept world prices. Consequently the farmers could not enjoy a sheltered market. Probably the suggestion will be made that my argument does not hold for all the months in question. Then, let us consider these four months I have named. During the months of August, September, October and November we were on the export basis, and consequently, as I have said, the farmers could not benefit by a sheltered market. We had to face the competition of the world, and the prices in Canada were at that time as good as they were in the months of June and July when we did not have to face world competition. This is the condition that the farmers and the producers have to face, and this has always been the case. I am very happy to be speaking to a good cause at the present time, and to make an effort to show that the tariff does not help the farmer, due to the fact that he sells on the open market. He sells in competition with the world and buys on a sheltered market; consequently he operates at a disadvantage. There can be no doubt about that. In the four months I have mentioned, we were on the open market and had to face world competition. At the present time we are not on the export basis; we are on the import basis, because we are importing butter. Consequently the sheltered interests are receiving benefit from the tariff, putting up the price of butter, and the consumer is paying for it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret to have to take further time of the committee, but the hon. member has completely evaded the point at issue, namely that butter is now selling at 29½ to 30 cents a pound. He states that if there were no tariff it would be selling at a low price, which means that the farmer would be getting less than he is at the present time.

Mr. BERTRAND: He is not producing it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The farmer is producing to the extent of 8,000,000 pounds a month, and that is on a basis of the highest cost, which makes it much more beneficial to him. The statement is made that in August, September and October we were on an export basis, and that the price paid for our butter was as high as or higher than it was in June—

Mr. BERTRAND: Just the same.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason for that, of course, must be evident to the hon. gentleman, because in June the world price or the export price of butter was much lower than it was in August, September or October. And had it not been for the protection afforded at that time, butter would have come into Montreal and to the west coast at a price in the neighbourhood of 15 or 16 cents a pound at the outside. It is a mere mathematical calculation to follow the cost back to the prairie or to the inland districts of eastern Canada. That is, butter could be laid down in Vancouver, according to the figures the hon. member has given, for at least three cents a pound less than the farmer was getting for butter at inland points in Canada. And if that butter which was then being made was in direct competition with the Vancouver butter—that is the outlet for the Alberta butter and in a similar degree it holds in the east—the price that the farmers got for their butter offered at that time would have been, as I said before, considerably less than what it actually was.

Mr. YOUNG: As I understand the minister's explanation, it is something like this: that during the producing season last summer the creameries paid to the farmers more than their cream was worth because they did not understand the true situation. If they had understood the true situation they would not have paid it. Then, in September, they realized that they had a surplus on hand of 42,000,000 pounds of butter. They were afraid they would have to export this surplus and so force the price down to the export level. Then the government stepped in and appealed to the holders of butter to sacrifice some of their holdings on the world's market, in order to lift that load off the Canadian market. In connection with that there is a story. It is said that the only man who loses in a gentleman's agreement is the gentleman. Some of those appealed to did unload their butter on the world's market at sacrifice prices; others did not. Those who did, later on found that they had to replenish their depleted stocks from those who did not in order to supply their trade and at higher prices. But before very many million pounds were unloaded, the winter set in. It set in much earlier than had been expected; the farmers found themselves without feed, and immediately we had a shortage of butter instead of a surplus. It seems to me that the best thing the government could have done would have been to stay out of the market altogether. If they had stayed out, it would not have been necessary to ask anybody to unload. The natural course of events would be to force the price up, as the minister explained, because there was a shortage created through the shortage of feed in the early winter. Now he tells us that the price of butter in Montreal is 29½ cents a pound and in London 15·7 cents a pound. There is a difference of 13·8 cents a pound between the Montreal and the London price. He also tells us that we have large quantities of New Zealand butter in storage here, which under certain conditions might be released by paying a duty of four cents, and under other conditions by paying a duty of eight cents. Suppose it pays the highest possible rate of duty, eight cents; that would still leave it 5·8 cents cheaper than the Montreal price. I ask the minister how he accounts for that spread of 5·8 cents between the Montreal price and the price of New Zealand butter in storage here even with the highest duty he can put upon it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Dealing with the hon. gentleman's first statement, that more was paid for butter than it was worth—or perhaps it would be a fairer way to put it that more was paid than they would have paid if they had realized the situation—I think the best proof of what the effect of this whole thing meant is the messages that we received, and I am sorry that I do not have them with me, from the cooperative organizations and creameries in different parts of the country.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not disputing the minister's statement. I accept it. I am quite willing to believe that they paid that price not knowing what the actual price would be.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman also wanted an explanation of why the butter price in Canada, when we are importing butter, is higher than the London price plus the highest duty we can put on it. I think the hon. member himself is sufficient of a business man to realize the situation. When a man starts to ship butter from New Zealand it is very much of a guessing competition what the price will be six or eight weeks later when that butter arrives in Halifax. Had they thought that the price of butter would have stayed at the price it is now, I have no doubt that a much larger quantity of butter would have come forward.

Mr. YOUNG: Then why don't they sell what they have here?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Because we have made an arrangement with them which we feel is satisfactory to everyone, that the butter will be released gradually. The greater part, almost the whole of it, has been released already without any appreciable effect on the market.

Mr. YOUNG: That is to say they could release it now by paying the highest duty of eight cents, and still make a profit of 5·8 cents a pound. If they are not doing that it is because they are holding the butter in anticipation of a higher price. I think the minister's policy is encouraging the speculator in butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are not holding the butter as speculators in the ordinary sense, but an arrangement has been made with them under which the butter will be released. So far as the legality of the thing is concerned they could release the butter when they paid the duty, but they have been fair enough to listen to our representations and they feel that it is more in the interests of everyone to release it gradually. The butter has been released except four thousand boxes of 56 pounds to the box, which is a very small amount of butter which no one would think of holding for purposes of speculation.

Mr. GOLDING: I have been listening very quietly to this argument, and I should now like to ask the minister two questions. First, can he give any estimate to what extent, in dollars and cents, agriculture has been benefited by the tariff, and secondly, what has protection of all the other industries cost agriculture in the past year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sure the hon. member is not serious in expecting an answer offhand, but if there is any information he desires in that direction I shall be glad to get it for him so far as I can. It is a fairly simple matter to make a rough estimate of what protection means to the farmer. Some of the values of protection to the farmer I put on record on a previous occasion, in the debate on the address. Using the figures I used this afternoon, protection netted to our farmers in one week in April, 18·06 cents a pound more for every pound of butter produced than it would have netted had there been no protection of that industry.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Eighteen cents? With a duty of four cents?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the difference between the export price and our price.

Mr. GOLDING: I quite appreciate that my question is a difficult one to answer offhand, but I take it for granted that the minister has the interests of agriculture at heart and is anxious to see that industry properly protected. I am quite satisfied to wait any length of time if I can find out what protection of all the other industries in this country has cost agriculture during the past year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman must remember that under the past government there was no protection, so to speak, given to agriculture in Canada. This is the first time I believe in the history of the Canadian government that any government has attempted to protect agriculture and to treat the farmers of Canada on as nearly as possible the same basis as all governments in the past have treated the so-called private or special interests.

Mr. GOLDING: I do not give a snap of my finger for what has been done in the past. The question I am asking is what has actually taken place in the past year. I am not concerned about previous governments.

Mr. BOYES: I am quite interested in the discussion which is taking place in regard to butter and cheese. I think hon. gentlemen opposite feel that the protection which has been afforded to agriculture by this government has been of considerable benefit to the farmers, and yet they don't like to admit it.

An hon. MEMBER: They are just playing politics.

Mr. BOYES: Possibly they are playing politics to a certain extent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You never do it over there, do you?

Mr. BOYES: A short time ago the Minister of Agriculture explained why there was not as much cheese being exported from Canada as there had been in the years past, and he named a number of ways in which milk is now being used which was formerly used in the manufacture of cheese. But there was one thing he forgot to mention, and that was that a lot of milk is being manufactured, especially in Ontario at the present time, into condensed milk and powdered milk. There are quite a large number of factories in Ontario, especially in the western part of the province, which are now manufacturing milk into condensed and powdered milk. That milk was formerly used in the manufacture of cheese. Another reason why I think there is not as much cheese exported now as formerly is that this government is affording protection to the farmer by not allowing cheese to enter this country free as it formerly did. We are still manufacturing cheese in Ontario and Quebec to quite an extent but in the western provinces, especially British Columbia, practically no cheese is being manufactured. In former days the cheese which came into these provinces was imported, whereas to-day considerable of the cheese manufactured, especially in western Ontario, is shipped to the western provinces.

I feel that our producers are receiving considerable benefit from the protection afforded on butter. If it were not for the protection enjoyed to-day I am quite sure we would not be reeciving much more than 16 or 17 cents per pound. Some hon. members on the opposite side have said that the farmers are not producing milk at this time of year, but I think they are in error. In the western part of Ontario the creameries run the year round and produce large quantities of butter. Our producers are receiving benefits which they would not have received had the previous government continued in power. The farmers in my community are appreciative of the fact that this government is in power, and that they have a protection which is making money for them to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member stated that the reason why the production of cheese has fallen is because more concentrated milk is being manufactured; is that right?

Mr. BOYES: Yes.

[Mr. Boyes.]

Mr. POULIOT: On page 558 of Hansard will be found certain statistics with respect to the exports of concentrated milk. The 1933 exports of concentrated milk to the British Empire were $380,103 more than the exports in 1930, but the exports to foreign countries were $1,231,196 less. There is a loss there of $851,093. The home consumption of concentrated milk for 1932-33 as compared with 1930-31 showed a loss of 48,990,807 pounds. What is the use of making more concentrated milk when we are consuming over 48,000,000 pounds less and our exports are down $851,000? I cannot understand the soundness of that proposition. My hon. friend cannot be well informed or else he is dreaming. Perhaps he is dreaming about the millions the Ottawa agreements were to bring to the farmers of this country. These are statistics which have been given in the house and which have not been contradicted by the Minister of Agriculture or any other minister. I defy them to contradict them. The Prime Minister dots the i's and crosses the t's of the typewritten text of my speeches but he does not dare to contradict one single figure which I have given. He pays me a great honour by doing that but he cannot contradict my statistics because they were obtained from the bureau of statistics. As far as concentrated milk is concerned, the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Boyes) knows nothing. That is the first point. Let us see about cheese. What have been the benefits of the Ottawa agreements in this regard?

An hon. MEMBER: We cannot hear you.

Mr. POULIOT: There are none so deaf as those that will not hear. If my hon. friend does not understand me, perhaps I had better speak in French.

Mr. SPROULE: Then they will hear you at home.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps if my hon. friend crossed the aisle and sat beside me he could understand what I say. I am doing my utmost to be agreeable and pleasant to him. But I shall not quote only statistics, I shall quote the words of the prophet, the almighty, the human almighty or the semi-god almighty in connection with cheese. Sometimes he talks about profane matters which are of great interest to the farmer but let us see what this human almighty, whose absence we deplore so much at this time, said about cheese two years ago. Here are his words which appear on page 127 of Hansard of 1932-33:

—and the entire quantity of the type of cheese produced in Canada the direct effect of this preference is not so important.

According to this prophet, cheese is a negligible matter. There has been considerable discussion this afternoon and this evening about this commodity and I congratulate the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) upon the logical argument he put forward. I sympathize with the minister in his embarrassment, but it is easy to understand why he is embarrassed. What about cheese? Cheese is good. It is good to eat but the trouble is the farmer does not receive any benefit from our eating it. The Prime Minister was so busy with the possibilities and the potentialities of hogs when he spoke on that memorable October 12, 1932, that he paid no attention to cheese. The result is that the exports of cheese to the British Empire in 1933 were down $4,688,904 as compared with 1930, and the exports to foreign countries were down $441,497, a total decrease of $5,130,401. Apparently there has not been the great success which the hon. member for East Middlesex claims has been achieved. The imperial conference has not proven to be such a great benefit to the farmer in connection with the exports of cheese. The home consumption in 1932-33 was down 7,548,392 pounds as compared with 1930-31. Our exports, the major part of which are to the British Empire, were down by over $5,000,000, while home consumption had decreased by over 7,500,000 pounds. It is not a very successful policy. And why was the home consumption of cheese less? It is because the people have no money to buy cheese. They eat bread without butter or cheese, just plain bread. They have no money to buy cheese. If the people had more money they would buy cheese and the farmers would be more prosperous; they would be happier.

Let us see about butter. There is more butter produced—admitted. Let us take one year before the imperial conference of 1931, the year after the butter victory. On May 26, 1931, I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question, as reported at page 2006 of Hansard:

> Mr. Pouliot: So long as the production of butter in this country is less than the consumption, is it necessary, in order to supply the trade and the public in general, to import butter?
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): Do I understand the hon. member's question to be this: If the production of butter in Canada is less than the consumption, should we allow the importation of butter?
> Mr. Pouliot: No; is it necessary to import butter from outside?
> Mr. Weir (Melfort): Yes.

In winter we produce less butter. In 1931 we imported 344,000 pounds; in 1932, 50,972 pounds, and in 1933, 1,199,000 pounds from New Zealand. If it was bad to import New Zealand butter in those years, is it better to import it now? I put that question to the committee. I remember well that in the last general election, in every small parish or town, the Conservative speakers were saying it was a crime to import butter from New Zealand. We still import butter from New Zealand. Is it a crime or is it a virtue to import from New Zealand? I do not express any personal opinion; I am merely reminding the house of what was said at the time by the very friends of my hon. friends opposite and by themselves. And now the present government is doing much better! Thanks to them, we are importing, not candied fruit but butter from Syria, from Asia Minor, from all corners of the globe. We imported 2,264,000 pounds in 1931 from Australia and in 1932 160,000 pounds from that country. We are importing butter from those beautiful islands of the Pacific, the Fiji islands, 9,408 pounds.

An hon. MEMBER: Cocoa butter.

Mr. POULIOT: It may be called cocoa butter but it is plain butter just the same. From Newfoundland, we are importing 300 pounds; from Syria, 160 pounds; from the United Kingdom, 181,000 pounds. According to the evidence given by the Minister of Agriculture, butter is very fond of travelling. Butter was going across to England and coming back to Canada. The butter was shipped to England and returned to Canada. That has never happened before, but this government is doing marvels. We have a kind of travelling butter, butter which goes across and comes back, like a boomerang—boomerang butter. It is marvellous. This was in 1931, and in the last year also we imported 75 pounds of butter from Syria, probably to make the balance good, and some more butter from the United Kingdom. We are on an export basis. We export butter to the United Kingdom and we import butter from the United Kingdom. It is a kind of peddling butter. It is a most extraordinary thing; the butter goes to and fro, crossing the ocean like Lindbergh and coming back.

An hon. MEMBER: It must be cheese.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is butter. Perhaps the hon. member would like to follow the course of the butter.

Mr. SPROULE: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. SPROULE: Will he sit down and see if we can get along a little faster?

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is a farmer and I am not, but I know the farmers and I work for them, and I am showing the absurdity of the policy of this government with regard to agriculture. I might go to his constituency and have a joint meeting with him, in any place in his constituency, and discuss agricultural matters with him, and I would not be afraid to do so, just as I have done in other parts of Ontario, and I am sure his electorate would listen to me and say: "That man from Quebec is fair, because he takes the trouble to listen to the grievances and miseries of the farmers; he wants to adjust these matters so that there will be fair dealing in the House of Commons of Canada". I have never been bullied by anyone, Mr. Chairman, and I have never been impressed by anything of that kind, and I suggest to the hon. gentleman that instead of making jokes about my stand and what I say about butter he should appreciate the fact that a man who is not a technician in agricultural matters takes the trouble to study them in order to give a little help to the farmer, who is so much neglected by this government.

Now that that matter has been settled, Mr. Chairman, let me remind the Minister of Agriculture that the matter of rock bottom prices of butter came up in the house in 1931, and this is what was said. I am quoting from Hansard, page 2091, of May 28, 1931.

Mr. Pouliot: Would the minister be kind enough to give me the information referred to yesterday afternoon about the rock bottom price reached by butter when the Australian butter was released?

Hon. Robert Weir (Minister of Agriculture): The date when it was mutually agreed to release the Australian butter was April 21. The price of butter on that date was 22 cents a pound.

On May 28, 1931, the Minister of Agriculture stated in the committee that he thought he had good reason to believe that the rock bottom price of butter was 22 cents a pound. He knew nothing about the future. This evening, my hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) has read figures which have been published in the St. Laurent Weekly of Riviere du Loup, my home town; he gave those figures and I will not repeat what he has said. Those were the prices paid for butter in Temiscouata during last summer. The farmers were complaining that they were making no money out of the dairy business. What do we see now? One can argue and split hairs for hours and days and months, but what is the direct result of that so-called agricultural policy of the government? Here is a paper which explains it, le Bulletin des Agriculteurs. Here is a book of 300 pages, the Quebec Official Gazette. I will not read it so you may be reassured, sir, but I know the information contained in it. Le Bulletin des Agriculteurs is published by Mr. Donat C. Noiseux. It is a Conservative paper published in Montreal; my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) knows that paper, and knows that it never has a good word for the Liberal party. In the issue of February 8, 1934, it states that 2,554 farmers in the province of Quebec will have their land sold for taxes. Here I have the issue of January 27, 1934, of the Quebec Official Gazette, which contains pages of names of farmers whose land was to be sold because they could not pay their taxes. Why could they not pay their taxes? Because they got no benefit from farming. They got no benefit from the sale of butter; they got no benefit from the sale of cheese; they got no benefit from the sale of concentrated milk or cream. The result will be that those people will join the ranks of the unemployed and come on direct relief because the government did not have a sound policy with regard to agriculture. Now my hon. friends opposite are afraid of the results; they cannot explain what has happened, so they say times are bad everywhere, that there is a world crisis. That is not what was said by the leader of that party during the last election. He told the electors that he would see that the farmers would get a fair price for their butter, their cheese, and all their products—I do not mention them all because I wish to remain within the item which is now being discussed. But the promise was general; everyone was to be made happy; everyone was to learn from him the recipe to become a millionaire. But what has happened? It is very sad. The farmers are not millionaires. In my own province of Quebec 2,544 farmers will have their land sold for taxes, and here is the Quebec Official Gazette, which is bilingual because in the province of Quebec all official papers are bilingual; I can show it to any hon. member and he will see the names of these farmers. Those who said to the farmers: "Come to us; vote for us; we will make you rich and happy; we will make you prosperous," have been unable to fulfil their promises, but they have not the courage of a member from our side who, having made a slight error in quoting figures this afternoon, admitted it. They put the blame on the provincial governments. Is it the fault of the Quebec government that the farmers cannot market their products outside of Canada and in all the provinces of Canada? The Minister of Agriculture is too prudent to say that, but we see it in newspapers such as this, which say that the provincial government is to blame because the farmers cannot market their products and their lands are sold for taxes.

To conclude this, sir, I will quote again a paper which I preserve as a precious thing and which I quote on great occasions. I used it in May, 1931; I used it not long ago when we were discussing the empire bureaux item. It is now an old yellow page of the unrevised Hansard of April 8, 1926, page 2341:

Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw): You contend that if the tariff is taken off the prices immediately rise?

Mr. Meighen: We contend it and we know it, because we see the facts.

This was said by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who is now the leader of the government in the Senate. Remove the tariff and prices will rise. Mr. Meighen was not the only one who said that; he was supported by our very genial friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who said in about the same words: "If you take off the tariff you raise the prices of goods." The reverse must be equally true; therefore by imposing a high tariff you lower the prices of goods. This has been quoted in the house very often; I keep it as a treasure. I had the opportunity to read it in Ontario as well as in the province of Quebec and in the House of Commons; everywhere it has been listened to with great interest, and most people who hear this quotation ask me the same question as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Weir) did a moment ago, on what page of Hansard do we find it. Let us take it seriously, hoping that as the government tried to take the first step with regard to international matters like the League of Nations, peace, and such matters, they should also take the first step with regard to lowering tariffs. Last year we heard the Minister of Railways say in the house that he had no objection to lowering tariffs provided it was done by mutual agreement of several nations. But some nation must start it, and I hope that this time Canada will give a good example to the other nations of the world, and that will help us to forgive the government for many wrongs they have done in the past.

Mr. PARENT: Mr. Chairman, I am rather late in rising to say a word on this item dealing with the dairy industry, but I shall not be long. There is one point in connection with which I should like some information from the minister. This item provides for $234,000 while last year the vote was for $246,300, so we have a reduction this year of $12,300. It is interesting to look over the statistics and follow the evolution of agriculture and particularly of the dairy industry. It is particularly interesting to look at the gross value of the production of the dairy industry in Canada for the last six years. These figures are as follows: In 1927 the gross value was $295,000,000, in round figures; in 1928 it was $293,000,000 and in 1929 it amounted to $292,000,000. In 1930 there was a slight drop, to $270,000,000. I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that up to 1930, under Liberal administration and a low tariff policy, the production was rather high. In 1931 there was a sudden drop, after tariffs had been put up, to $161,000,000, and in 1932 the gross value was only $132,000,000. Having these figures in view I wonder what justification the minister can suggest for reducing the amounts spent on agriculture, and particularly the amount spent in connection with the dairying industry.

Then on page 75 of Canada, 1934, published by the Department of Trade and Commerce, I find the following:

Dairying has long held an important place among Canadian industries. Cattle were introduced by the first settlers and there naturally followed the making of home made butter and cheese, at first purely for home consumption but later for export. The export market grew. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1926, Canada exported 1,483,000 hundredweight of cheese, valued at nearly $34,000,000.

At that rate the cheese would yield about 22¾ cents per pound to the producer. It is also stated that 233,000 hundredweight of butter valued at nearly $9,000,000 were exported, which would yield 39$\frac{1}{10}$ cents per pound to the producer. Then it is said that in 1931-32 we exported 85,424,700 pounds of cheese, which yielded 12·4 cents per pound and 10,917,300 pounds of butter yielding 21·8 cents per pound. This was under the new government, after the tariff had been raised. In the following year it was still worse. We exported 85,711,600 pounds of cheese yielding 10·2 cents per pound and 3,206,000 pounds of butter yielding 18·3 cents per pound. If we go a little further we find that it gets worse. In the first nine months of 1933 we exported 38,474,600 pounds of cheese, yielding 10·9 cents per pound and 2,062,100 pounds of butter, yielding 18·5 cents per pound. From these figures, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that in the last few years the dairy industry has been declining.

I should like to add a few more figures of interest. Much has been said about the Ottawa agreements; the Canadian people, and especially those interested in trade and manufacturing, expected that with the advent of the present government a market would be provided for the products of all lines of business. What do we find in connection with the dairy industry? Last February the Financial Post published figures to show that Canada has not benefited at all, so far as the dairy industry is concerned, by the Ottawa agreements. The country that really has benefited in regard to dairying is Australia, and here are the figures. I will give only the gross figures: In 1928 Australia exported to Great Britain 45,000 tons of butter; in 1929, 48,000 tons; in 1930-31; 73,000 tons; immediately after the Ottawa agreements, in 1931-32, 91,000 tons, and in 1932-33, 100,000 tons. Let us see what butter Canada has exported since the Ottawa agreements. We find in bulletin 569 published by the Department of Trade and Commerce that the insignificant quantity of 1,034 tons of butter was exported from Canada to the United Kingdom for nine months in 1933.

This afternoon I heard the Minister of Agriculture saying that the United Kingdom was Canada's best market for dairy products. I should be delighted if he would deny the figures I have given and state that I am wrong. I wish I were wrong.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Did the hon. member say I stated this afternoon that the United Kingdom was the best market for our dairy products?

Mr. PARENT: I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not say it.

Mr. PARENT: I accept the minister's statement.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore the Ottawa agreements are of no use.

Mr. PARENT: Not more than half an hour ago the statement was made that the very best protection had been given to the farmers of Canada, and particularly to the dairy producers. Protection? What protection? Where is it? There is no protection whatsoever. So far as Canada is concerned, the market for dairy products has been lost, absolutely lost. It is a complete ruin. Can that ruin be traced to the tariff? Well, I shall not discuss that matter at this point. I am asking the Minister of Agriculture this question: What will the farmers of Canada think when they find that $12,000 has been deducted from the vote to help dairy producers? I am one who would be very happy to see, not a decrease of $12,000, but an increase of that amount to help the farmers and the dairy industry.

[Mr. Parent.]

Mr. REID: One question, Mr. Chairman, before this item passes. The question of quotas has not been cleared up. I find in the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire an answer given in the British House of Commons by Mr. Elliot wherein he stated:

> The provisions of the Ottawa agreements securing free entry into the United Kingdom of butter and cheese from Australia and New Zealand are due to expire on August 19, 1935, while the undertaking that no restriction will be placed on imports of meat from those dominions is due to terminate on June 30, 1934.

My question is this: Is there some such provision regarding the importation of butter and cheese from Canada? It is very important that this matter should be cleared up, because it would seem to me that if there is it should be known, and if not I think it hardly likely that Great Britain would allow Canada to export butter and cheese freely, and restrict New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will read the agreements he will find the answer.

Mr. REID: I did not hear the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is provided in the agreements. It was a three year agreement with respect to dairy products, not only for New Zealand and Australia, but also for Canada. The hon. member will find that in the documents. With respect to the other items, there was a special provision for Australia and New Zealand in connection with meat, which expires in 1934. There was no such arrangement with respect to meats in connection with Canada. But in 1937 all of the agreements fall in, so far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have been greatly interested in the discussion on the dairy industry in Canada, which has taken place this afternoon and this evening. To my mind some very interesting developments have been announced by the minister and by other hon. members opposite. I have been curious about some of the statements which have been made, and should like first to read a statement made by the Prime Minister at Winnipeg on June 9, 1930. Upon it I shall base the remarks I propose to make this evening. He is reported as follows:

> We pledge ourselves to foster and develop agriculture, and the live stock and dairy industries, now so sadly neglected. . . . Listen, you agriculturists from the west and all the other parts of Canada, you have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? Tell me, when did free trade fight for you?

He emphasizes this interrogation, and then continues:

You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

The Minister of Agriculture has intimated that conditions have been exceedingly bad for the producers of dairy products throughout Canada during a very considerable period of the past three years. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) seemed to be very uneasy while this discussion was taking place, particularly when he learned from the lips of the minister that a considerable quantity of butter landed at Halifax had not been sold in the maritime provinces but had been shipped to the markets of Montreal and Toronto. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recall that the Liberal party was condemned in season and out of season, particularly during the campaign of 1930, when the price of butter was much higher than it is to-day, for permitting the landing of New Zealand and Australian butter in Montreal. What has happened to-day? One of my tenants told me that in 1932 he gave his cows away to his neighbours because they did not pay him for the wear and tear on his overalls brought about by milking them. Despite the fact that feed conditions are bad and that we are passing through a very severe winter, when of necessity the cost of production must be higher, what are we told to-night when there is a prospect for producers getting something in return for their labour? Under these conditions this government permits the importation of New Zealand butter. That is the statement we get to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman know that it pays a duty of eight cents a pound?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I know and appreciate that fact. I must say, however that it does not pay eight cents; it pays five.

Mr. BENNETT: It is coming into Halifax and paying eight cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Under the contract it is paying eight cents, but this is butter which is coming in under a special provision of five cents. I trust my right hon. friend will remember that, because I have been told it repeatedly to-night by the minister himself. What I am saying is this—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. gentleman say that butter coming from the United Kingdom to Halifax is admitted at five cents a pound duty?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I so understood the minister to say.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I never said that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did not the minister state that to the committee to-night?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Coming direct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then I did not get the purport of the minister's remarks. He said that it was eight cents, but that if coming direct it was permitted to enter at five cents a pound. The minister confirms that statement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Might I make a correction? If permitted to enter by invoking clause 4 it pays very close to eight cents a pound duty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course, it is difficult for anyone to grasp all the intricacies of the complicated tariff duties under the administration of this government upon any commodity entering Canada. But whether it comes in under a duty of eight cents or five cents a pound is not the point. The point I make is this, that the promise which the Prime Minister and the Conservative party made in 1930 to the agriculturists of Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: Has been substantially kept.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, in some instances it has. The promises affecting manufacturing have been more than kept.

Mr. BENNETT: And with respect to butter too.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But I say to my hon. friend that the moment the farmer gets a chance to make a few extra cents, then butter is at once admitted and allowed to come into competition with the home product, and that must of necessity keep the price down.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not kept the price down, to start with.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I take issue with my hon. friend on that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: All you have to do is to read the figures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then for what reason does it come in? My hon. friend will say because it is required. But every pound that comes in has a depressing effect on the price in Canada. That is exactly the argument my hon. friend uses himself, in reverse, and that he used when he was pleading for the support of the electorate in this country in 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman knows, if he looks at the figures, that the importations of butter into this country prior to 1930 and in 1930 were enormous. The trifling importations during the last few months have been to meet a demand that Canadian producers could not meet and the prices are not lower.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a specious argument.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a fact.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is coming in when our price is two cents higher than the London and New York price, as quoted by the minister himself.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not two cents, more than two cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So much the better. Hon. gentlemen opposite were complaining in 1930 of the importations of butter into Canada when the price was very much higher than it has been ever since this government came into office.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was also higher in New York at that time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to hon. gentleman opposite that if they are going to make the tariff fight for the farmer, then for heaven's sake let the farmer have his own market and let the price go where it would go without these importations. You cannot argue in one breath that the importations do not depress the price, and in the next breath that importations are necessary because we have a shortage of butter. The minister himself admitted that owing to a fairly large surplus piling up last fall, we shipped butter to the old country at a loss to the brokers engaged in the business. And now when the farmer has a chance to make a little money, lo and behold we allow the importation of Australian and New Zealand butter. It is mighty amusing to sit here and watch the performance of this government trying to justify their measures from day to day in the light of what they promised to do for the people if returned to power. If anyone can name any manufactured article that is allowed to enter this country in competition with the goods manufactured in this country and that does not pay a very heavy duty, plus dumping duty, sales tax and everything else, I should like to hear what it is.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. gentleman allow me to name such an item—men's boots and shoes from Northampton.

Mr. YOUNG: With a duty of 40 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not paying 40 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: What are they paying?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing like 40 per cent, and the factories in my town are suffering from this English competition.

Mr. BENNETT: And rubber goods from Singapore.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Just a few words in connection with the dairy industry. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Parent) in his speech compared the dairy industry of Canada with the dairy industry of Australia, New Zealand and other countries, and gave figures to show that there had been an increased export of butter and dairy products from New Zealand and Australia and a decreased export from Canada, and on that, and on that alone, he based his argument that the dairy industry of Australia and New Zealand was showing greater progress than the dairy industry of Canada. The fact of the matter is that dairy production in Canada has not decreased as he would have led us to believe by quoting exports, but has increased, and increased very considerably in the past two or three years. Not only that, but this increased production, together with the normal production, has brought a price 14 cents a pound higher in Canada at the present time than the price obtained for the Australian product on the world market, and I maintain that that difference of 14 cents a pound on the total production of butter in Canada is due solely to the action of this government in carrying out its promise that it would make the tariffs fight for the dairy industry of Canada and for the farmer.

Mr. YOUNG: A little while ago the minister explained that the high price was due to an early winter and a shortage of feed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman knows that the price of butter in this country went up because of a certain degree of scarcity due to the conditions he has mentioned, but that would have been of no advantage to the dairy farmers if it had not been for the protection they had been given.

Mr. VALLANCE: There are two statements which the minister made which I should like him to explain. First he made the statement that the Canadian price is 14 cents a pound higher than the price for the Australian product on the world market. Secondly, he stated that there was a difference of 18 cents a pound between the export market and the Canadian market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right, in April, 1933.

Mr. VALLANCE: The highest duty on butter entering this country is eight cents a pound. In view of the higher price, why do the importations not come in? Are there any other orders or regulations that prohibit the importation of butter into Canada outside of the tariff regulations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The explanation is very simple. The production of butter increases very much in Canada in April, and those interested in the butter trade could not have foreseen that the normal increase would not take place at that time, and therefore they would not take the chance of shipping butter three or six weeks ahead to arrive in Canada at a time when there was normally an increased production of butter in this country and when the price would naturally be expected to go down. Butter fat at the same time made almost the same increase in price as butter. If butter could have been landed here by aeroplane in twenty-four hours it would have come in, but due to the fact that the people in the butter trade could not foresee the condition that arose they were not in time to take advantage of it.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suppose there was no butter in bond in Canada at that time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If there was butter in bond in Canada at the time and it was not released, that was all to the advantage of the dairy farmer in this country.

Mr. VALLANCE: It does not take six weeks to land butter in Canada from Great Britain. What were the regulations that prevented those importations? Very large consignments of Australian and New Zealand butter have been shipped into this country from Great Britain, as well as large consignments of merchandise. Britain is always prepared to ship butter or any other commodity into the best possible market on short notice. The minister has not yet convinced me as to the 14 to 18 cents difference in the price of butter, although I must take his word for it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the price differential; it is the price actually paid on the market.

Mr. POULIOT: If the 1930 promises with regard to butter have been substantially kept, there is little substance in the adverb.

Item agreed to.

Cold storage warehouses, $32,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Complaints were made this afternoon that the farmer receives very little for his butter, the principal benefit going to the middleman. Why does not the government increase the vote for cold storage warehouses so that the farmer may put his butter into cold storage and not be under the control of the wholesalers in Montreal, Toronto and other large cities? The farmers are like slaves, and I should like to see them independent on a cooperative basis. The government should assist them to have their own cold storage plants in order that they may obtain better prices in the winter time. The farmers have been exploited and at the present time an investigation is being carried on in this building in this connection. This vote has been cut down from $140,000 to $32,000 when it should be five or ten times as large. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion when the supplementary estimates are being prepared.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We believe that there is sufficient cold storage to take care of the butter requiring to be stored. With the exception of a recent request, every request has been for fruit cold storage facilities. This vote is sufficient to take care of all commitments which have been made.

Mr. BOTHWELL: How does the reduction arise?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been a decrease in the demand for grants.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This vote has been cut seventy-five per cent, yet the minister has stated that there is sufficient to meet commitments. I assume that means that the people are so hard up that they cannot afford to pay their share of the construction of these buildings.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would not say that. My understanding is that there is sufficient accommodation. In cooperation with the various provinces a survey has been made as to storage requirements. Ontario gives practically the same proportion as we do, and the other provinces make grants, so there is not a very heavy load on any organization which wishes such facilities.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Am I to understand that there have been no applications for storage facilities?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have received some since this item was prepared and they will be taken care of in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What was expended last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): $115,872.35.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Have there been any new cold storage plants erected in the last two or three years?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. One was erected for the Berwick Fruit Company, Berwick, Nova Scotia; one for the Thedford Cold Storage Company, Thedford, Ontario; and plants at Forest and Woodstock, Ontario.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the matter of reductions was up before, the minister took the ground that they had been made possible this year and the year before by certain reorganization but that no impairment of service had occurred. I expressed some doubt that that could be done, and I should like to know if there has been any reorganization in connection with this item.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has been no reorganization in this case. There has been a reduction in office rentals, and travelling expenses have been less. There has been less demand for iced car service through the increased use of trucks.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Have there been some services eliminated?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The grant to the National Dairy Council was eliminated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At their request.

Item agreed to.

Fruit, including grant of $4,500 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $425,053.

Mr. YOUNG: This is a large item and perhaps it should stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 19, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING $60,000,000 LOAN GUARANTEE BY GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table the correspondence between the government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian banks with respect to the guarantee by the government in regard to the loan of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. At the same time I offer my apology to the hon. gentleman for the delay in presenting these papers, which was due to certain papers being mislaid.

RADIO BROADCASTING COMMITTEE

Hon. RAYMOND D. MORAND (East Essex) moved that the first report of the special committee to inquire into operations of the radio commission under the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act, 1932, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1933-34

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1934, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37 to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes two amendments to the Bills of Exchange Act. The first substitutes the name Remembrance Day for Armistice Day, in conformity with the legislation that was passed in 1931. The second amendment proposes to authorize the closing of branches when civic holidays are declared.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38 to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

He said: There are two principal changes to be made in the act. One is a change in the definitions to keep the act more in line with modern practices and the other is an extension of the act at the request of a number of the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECT AND PEST ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39 to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

He said: There is a very slight change to be made in this act. The proposed amendment, which is regarded as an interpretive section, does not affect the intent of the present section but is necessary in order to enable the various provinces to deal with the control of pests in their respective territories, and is being made at their request.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

QUOTA ON CANADIAN CATTLE

*Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. What were the conditions of the original cattle quota imposed on Canadian cattle by the British government?
2. What are the adjusted cattle quota terms and conditions at present in vogue?
3. Is there anything definite yet as to the cattle quota that will prevail during the last half of the year 1934?
4. Does the British government under the terms of the Anglo-Canadian Ottawa agreement impose such cattle quotas without the consent of the government of Canada?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be said with respect to this question that the matter is under consideration. The quota as fixed was arranged by the High Commissioner for Canada with the British Government, and negotiations are now pending for the purpose of determining what the future action shall be. But the quota as it stands is that we should ship the same number of cattle as we shipped in the first six months of 1933—and there the matter stands at the moment.

GOLD PREMIUMS

Mr. RAYMOND:

How much has the government paid in premiums on gold since it has prohibited exportation?

Mr. RHODES: Since October 19, 1931, the marketing of non-monetary gold, including the current production of the Canadian mines, has been done through the medium of the government which has distributed to the mines and owners of such gold the net proceeds of the sale abroad.

Such sales to February 28, 1934, have realized $32,069,743 in excess of the standard value established by the Currency Act, after deducting all costs incidental to the export and sale.

ONION LAKE, SASK., MEDICAL DOCTOR

Mr. McINTOSH:

1. When was Dr. J. T. Hill appointed medical doctor at Onion lake, Saskatchewan, Indian agency?
2. What has been his salary since appointment to date?
3. When was Dr. J. T. Hill appointed Indian agent at Onion lake?
4. What has been his salary as agent since appointment to date?
5. What are the names and present salary of other members of staff at this agency?
6. Are any salaries herein subject to discount?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. April 2, 1923.
2. Salary on appointment $2,000 plus house, fuel, light and rations. Increased to $2,120 April 1, 1927.
3. July 1, 1932.
4. $1,600.
5. D. H. Cameron, clerk, Indian agency, $1,200 plus house, fuel, light and rations; R. C. Hamer, Indian farming instructor, $960 plus house, fuel, light and rations; F. M. Warne, Indian farming instructor, $1,200 plus house, fuel, light and rations; G. M. Malloch, Indian farming instructor, $960 plus house, fuel, light and rations; D. Vanasse, Indian interpreter, $900 plus house, fuel, light and rations; A. E. Peterson, dispenser, $120.
6. All salaries shown above and value of allowances are subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Salary Deduction Act of 1932.

*RADIO BROADCASTING—CANADIAN BROADCAST

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. How many broadcasting stations in Canada are using the programs of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission?
2. How many broadcasting stations in Canada are being paid for this service?
3. What amount of money was paid to each station since the inauguration of the service up to the end of January, 1934?
4. Are any broadcasting stations in Canada using the programs of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission and giving the same service as the other stations, but, not paid for said service; if so, how many?
5. Are all stations that have a broadcasting licence compelled to use the programs of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission whether they are paid for this service or not?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member that that question be dropped. The select committee set up for the purpose of dealing with problems arising out of the administration of the Broadcasting Act will deal with just such matters as this one, and to discuss in this house a question which may be raised there is not conducive to the best interests of the service which the hon. member doubtless wishes to assist. I suggest, therefore, that the question be dropped, and that he deal with the matter through the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is dropped.

IMPORTATIONS OF BUTTER FROM NEW ZEALAND

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. What quantity of butter from New Zealand entered Canada each year for 1928-1929-1930?

2. What quantity of butter entered Canada each year for 1928-1929-1930 coming from Australia or any other country?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. The quantity of butter imported (entered for consumption) into Canada from New Zealand for the calendar years 1928, 1929, and 1930, was:

Calendar years	Pounds
1929	33,764,462
1930	37,012,400

2. The quantity of butter imported (entered for consumption) into Canada from Australia, or any other country, for the calendar years 1928, 1929, and 1930, was:

	Calendar years
	1928	1929	1930
Imports from	pounds	pounds	pounds
Australia	629,944	274,400	1,422,512

NEW RICHMOND, QUE., WHARF

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Minister of Public Works been informed that the departmental wharf at New Richmond, Bonaventure county, is badly in need of repairs and until it is put in condition, pulpwood has to be carried to Maria or Carleton for shipment?

2. If so, will any action be taken shortly in this respect?

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. It is reported to the department that the public wharf at New Richmond is in need of extensive repairs, and that to enable pulpwood or lumber to be shipped over it extensive dredging would be required in addition to the cost of the repairs.

2. Matter under consideration.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—ST. BENOIT JOSEPH LABRE D'AMQUI

Mr. LaRUE:

1. Has the federal government received from the government of the province of Quebec a request for the carrying out of additional relief works in the village and parish of St-Benoit Joseph Labre d'Amqui?

2. If so, on what date and what was the amount involved?

3. Has the federal government complied with that request?

4. If so, on what date, and on what date was the government of the province of Quebec advised of such compliance?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Yes.

2. February 19th, 1934, $6,000.

3. Yes.

4. The schedule of works referred to was approved on behalf of the dominion by order in council P.C. 468 dated March 5th, 1934, and the province so advised on March 8th.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS OPERATING REVENUES

Mr. McINTOSH:

What are the gross and net operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for each year since date of organization: (a) for its lines east of Port Arthur and Armstrong; (b) for its lines west of Port Arthur and Armstrong; (c) for its subsidiary lines west of Detroit and Port Huron; (d) for its subsidiary lines in the New England States?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, we have not that information in our department, but the whole information which we received is in the annual report which is to be tabled shortly. If the hon. member will look at the annual report, and if he does not get the information he desires he may write me a letter which I could pass on to the railway management.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—OUTSTANDING BONDS

*Mr. REID:

1. What are the amounts at par value of bonds outstanding on the Canadian National Railways system?
2. What is the total interest payable annually on these bonds?
3. What is the amount of the bonds held by private individuals?
4. What amount of these bonds are held: (a) in Canada; (b) in the United States; (c) in other countries?
5. Are any bonds held by railway corporations in the United States?
6. If so, what amounts are so held?
7. What are the names of the bodies corporate in Canada holding these bonds, and what amount is held by each?

Mr. MANION: The annual report, which I shall table in a very few days, will contain most of this information. If the hon. gentleman will, after looking it over, tell me of any information that he does not find, I shall pass on to the Canadian National Railways such requests as he may make.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—EXPENDITURES DURING A FIVE YEAR PERIOD

Mr. COTNAM:

How much money has been spent by the Dominion of Canada under the Unemployment Relief Act for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934?

Mr. GORDON:

The report of the Dominion Commissioner of Unemployment Relief setting out the federal assistance rendered to provinces and municipalities in their relief efforts, is now in the course of preparation and will be laid as hitherto on the table of the house in conformity with the provisions of the statute as soon as possible after the end of the fiscal year.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—PEMBROKE, ONT.

Mr. COTNAM:

What amount of money was expended in the town of Pembroke, under the Unemployment Relief Act, for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, respectively: (a) by the federal government; (b) by the provincial government of Ontario; (c) by the municipality?

Mr. GORDON:

The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930—(a) $16,248.38; (b) $16,248.36; (c) $32,496.74.

The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and Continuance Act, 1932—(a) $17,877.77; (b) $17,877.75; (c) $32,877.77.

The Relief Act, 1932—(a) $14,669.45; (b) $14,669.42; (c) $10,784.14.

The Relief Act, 1933—(a) $17,591.54; (b) $21,989.39; (c) $13,193.67.

The figures shown under (b) and (c) represent expenditures to which the dominion contributed and are not necessarily the total relief expenditures of the province and municipality.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—EXPENDITURES IN TOWNSHIPS

Mr. COTNAM:

What amount of money was expended under the Unemployment Relief Act in the townships of Sabine, Lyell, Airy, Murchison, and Dickens, for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934, respectively: (a) by the federal government; (b) by the provincial government of Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: No accounts have at this date been received from the province with respect to unemployment relief expenditures in the townships of Sabine, Lyell, Airy, Murchison and Dickens.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, PEMBROKE-MATTAWA

Mr. COTNAM:

1. What is the total amount of money expended under the Unemployment Relief Act for the construction of the trans-Canada highway, from Pembroke to Mattawa, for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, respectively: (a) by the federal government; (b) by the provincial government of Ontario?
2. What was the total amount contributed by the federal government under the Unemployment Relief Act, to the federal constituency of North Renfrew for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, respectively?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Accounts received from the province covering expenditures on the trans-Canada highway do not set forth the expenditures by sections.
2. The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, $16,248.38; the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and Continuance Act, 1932, $17,952.87; The Relief Act, 1932, $15,062.07; The Relief Act, 1933, $17,817.08.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How much grain has No. 2 elevator received and shipped during its operation by the Vancouver Harbour Commission for season 1933-34, until February 15, 1934?
2. What was the total cost of operating No. 2 elevator from September 30, 1933, to February 15, 1934?

3. What was the amount for the following items: (a) payroll; (b) interest on investment; (c) sinking fund; (d) amount chargeable to superintendency and all overhead?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This question stands as an order for return, and I shall table any information I may receive from the harbour commission.

ASBESTOS EXPORTATIONS

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. What was the grand total of asbestos exportations, year by year, since 1928 to date?
2. What were the annual exportations of this mineral product since that date?
3. To which countries were these exportations made?
4. What was the average annual cost of these exportations?

Mr. STEVENS: Return tabled herewith.

TRADE COMMISSIONERS

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia):

1. In what countries does Canada maintain trade commissioners and/or agents?
2. What was the total trade of Canada with each of these countries in 1933?
3. What is the cost to Canada in maintaining each of these commissioners and agents in: (a) salaries; (b) other expenses?

Mr. STEVENS: Return tabled herewith.

LOANS ON LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Mr. COOTE:

1. In the case of life insurance companies reporting to the Dominion Government Department of Insurance, what was the total amount of loans on policies in Canada on December 31 in each of the last ten years?
2. What was the total amount of policies lapsed in each of these years?
3. What was the total amount paid to policy holders and beneficiaries in each of these years?
4. What was the total amount of premiums paid by policy holders during each of these years?
5. What was the number and value of ordinary life insurance policies in force in Canada at the end of 1932, or nearest available date, in each of the following classifications: (a) under $1,001; (b) $1,001 to $2,000; (c) $2,001 to $3,000; (d) $3,001 to $4,000; (e) $4,001 to $5,000; (f) $5,001 to $10,000; (g) $10,001 to $20,000; (h) $20,001 to $30,000; (i) $30,001 to $40,000; (j) $40,001 to $50,000; (k) $50,001 to $100,000; (l) $100,001 to $500,000; (m) $500,001 to $1,000,000; (n) over $1,000,000?

GRAIN ELEVATOR TARIFFS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What are the grain elevator tariffs in effect for the crop year 1933-34 at: (a) Montreal; (b) Vancouver; (c) Saint John; (d) Halifax; (e) Quebec; (f) Port Arthur; (1) for handling grain from cars or boats; (2) for shipping it out in cars or boats?
2. Were any reductions on the grain elevator tariffs put in effect for handling grain via any of the above ports during the crop year 1933-34?
3. At which of the above grain handling points are there government grain elevators operated by the government or by a board under the government?
4. At which of the ports mentioned in question No. 1 are grain elevators which have been constructed by the government?
5. What is the full capital cost including grain galleries, and all grain loading equipment appearing on the books of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, chargeable to: (a) No. 1 harbour board elevator; (b) No. 2 harbour board elevator; (c) No. 3 harbour board elevator?
6. Are any Vancouver harbour board grain elevators leased to private grain firms?
7. If so, to whom are they leased, and what are the rentals per year?
8. Do Vancouver harbour board elevators leased to private firms pay civic taxes on the same basis as property used for a like purpose and privately owned?
9. Are the grain elevator tariffs covering Canadian ports approved by the Board of Grain Commissioners?
10. Has the government or any governmental body paid any civic taxes or any equivalent thereto on the dominion government grain elevator located at Port Arthur, Ontario?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

STE-ADELAIDE DE PABOS, GASPE COUNTY, BREAKWATER

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all pay lists in connection with work done on the breakwater at Ste-Adélaide de Pabos, Gaspé county, during the year 1933-34, and also copy of all letters, exchanged between the Department of Public Works and any other person in connection with this said work.

SPIRITWOOD DISTRICT MEDICAL ATTENDANCE

Mr. McINTOSH:

For a copy of all documents or accounts in the Department of Indian Affairs between the department and any person living in the Spiritwood district or elsewhere during the years 1933 and 1934 till the present time, in connection with the medical attendance given to the Witchekan and Chitek Indian reserves, located in the North Battleford electoral district.

SALMON EXPORTS TO UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. NEILL:

For a statement showing the export from Canada to the United Kingdom, both in weights and in money value of: (a) fresh salmon; (b) frozen salmon; (c) canned salmon, each shown separately, for the years 1929 to 1933 inclusive, each year shown separately, and showing whether exported from the Atlantic coast or from the Pacific. If the unit of cwts. is used, indicate the pounds content, and use the same standard throughout.

MR. AVILA BLOUIN

Mr. GAGNON:

For a copy of all documents, letters, reports of inquiry, orders in council, if any, reports to the federal government or to members thereof, reports to different departments, with respect to the case of Mr. Avila Blouin, of the city of Quebec, who was wounded during the war.

CHANDLER STATION, GASPE, POSTMASTER

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents in the possession of the government, dated from August, 1930, to date, respecting the resignation of Georges Molloy as postmaster of Chandler station, county of Gaspé, and the appointment of his successor.

TARDIF CHANNEL RETAINING WALL

Mr. BOUCHER:

For a copy of all contracts, letters and correspondence between the Minister of Public Works, the deputy minister, the engineers and officials of his department and all other persons, from 1930 to date, respecting the retaining wall along Tardif channel, at Notre-Dame de Pierreville, county of Yamaska.

COAL INQUIRY CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Hon. W. A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, and the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, concerning the inquiry held during the years 1932-1933 by Fred McGregor, registrar under the Combines Investigation Act, regarding the importation and prices of English coal.

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat a question which I addressed to the government last Monday based upon a report in the Ottawa Press which stated that the government had decided to refer to the Supreme Court the question of the right of the tariff board to make rulings in points of law and with regard to the validity of the fixing of values on goods imported under the British preference. I asked then whether the report was accurate, and I received from the Prime Minister a rather non-committal reply. In this morning's paper the report is repeated, stating that the government has so decided to refer such matters to the courts, and I should like again to-day to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he can give a more definite reply in the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The questions to which the hon. gentleman refers are obviously questions of great difficulty. As a result of the appeal that was taken before the privy council, and which the privy council heard and reserved judgment, the formal conclusion that will be arrived at by the privy council will be communicated to those concerned, to the public and to this house immediately they have been finally settled. There have been many very difficult matters to be considered, and while in a broad way a conclusion has been arrived at I have no conclusion to communicate to the house at this moment, but I trust that some day during the present week I may be able to do so.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, about three weeks ago I directed a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). The question was this: Is it the intention of the government this session to bring down any amendment or amendments to the Pensions Act. The reply of the minister at that time was that the matter was under consideration. Has he any further information to give to the house.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The answer is in the negative.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it would be possible to have the legislation amending the Dominion Elections Act introduced some little time before the end of the session, and if possible before the Easter recess.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It will not be possible to introduce the legislation before the Easter recess, but as soon as reasonably may be thereafter it will be submitted. At one time I thought it might be desirable to introduce a skeleton bill and have it referred to the committee on privileges and elections, but in view of the fact that so many members of the house are busily engaged on other committees I thought it more desirable that we should prepare the legislation, and it will be submitted to the house as early as possible after the Easter recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it be asking too much if I asked the Prime Minister, if without going into any detail he could indicate the lines of the proposed legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman himself would say that that is a rather unusual request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is, yes.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC TRACKS AND PREMISES AT QUEBEC

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 25, to ratify and confirm an agreement respecting the joint use by His Majesty and the commissioners of the transcontinental railway of certain tracks and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Quebec.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I add my protest to that of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and other hon. members who have spoken on this matter. The bill at first renewed the agreement for a period of 999 years, thirty years more than the age of Methuselah. It is a binding contract for a long period of years, and if I remember well the Minister of Railways himself suggested in reply to one hon. member from British Columbia that he was ready to accept an amendment making the term 99 years.

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is mistaken as to the bill. It was another bill that ratified an agreement for 999 years, and that bill has already received its third reading.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very glad that the minister has rejuvenated the contracts that existed between the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. But may I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the mail contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway represents a much larger amount than the contract with the Canadian National.

There is another matter which I wish to draw to the attention of the house. During the campaign the right hon. the Prime Minister, referring to the two main railways in this country, very often used the phrase "Amalgamation never—competition ever." Those words we have not forgotten. We trust that there will not be an amalgamation of both these railways because competition is essential. I am not going to repeat what has already been said on that subject except to say that I regret that legislation. I believe it is wrong, and as I have already said, I add my protest to those that have already been made in this house on the matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—PUBLIC AND PRIVATE DEBT

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I desire to take the opportunity which this occasion affords to bring to the special attention of the house the matter of the heavy burden of debt, both public and private, which perhaps will never be paid either in this or in any other country, and I desire also to make suggestions in regard to possible ways of dealing with that heavy burden of debt. I shall deal with the question particularly from the point of view that the load of private debt as it now rests upon the people of Canada will greatly retard recovery from the present depression, and so long as that burden exists not only will recovery from the depression be difficult but no permanent prosperity is possible. I realize, of course, that it is only by the will of the government that any action can be taken in this house—

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will not mind my interrupting him for one moment. This matter was discussed by this house, Mr. Speaker, on an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I have no desire to limit the observations which I always listen to with pleasure of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, but I do not think the time of the house should be taken up twice discussing the same matter at the same session.

Mr. IRVINE: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling, I would like to draw attention to the ruling you yourself made on March 31, 1931. That ruling I think will very clearly show that I have the right on the motion for supply to raise a discussion of the question I am now bringing to the attention of the house. The ruling to which I refer was made in connection with a motion which was put forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). He attempted in the first instance to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a certain matter, and he moved a resolution, but the right hon. the Prime Minister rising to a point of order pointed out that the subject matter of the resolution had already been dealt with by the house. But on that same day, when the motion for supply was made a little later on, the hon. member then brought the same matter up and again the objection was raised, but he was allowed to proceed with his discussion on the ground that he was not making any particular motion but was discussing a grievance before going into supply, and not only did he discuss the question but a very prolonged discussion took place.

I submit, sir, that we have a parallel case before you to-day, and it is inconceivable to me how the ruling you made on the date referred to could be altered on this occasion. Furthermore, let me say that I am not moving any motion to-day. I am simply taking advantage, as I said at the outset, of the opportunity which I understood was afforded to every member of this house before going into supply to present a grievance of the people I represent in regard to one of the most difficult problems they have to encounter to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can proceed in the meantime and I will give a ruling later.

Mr. IRVINE: When the right hon. the Prime Minister raised the point of order I was about to say that I realized it is only by the will of government that any action can be taken in this house with respect to either the question I have suggested or any other. It is not my purpose to-day to make an appeal exclusively to the government for I realize that the question of debt reduction implies the principle of contractual obligations and that is almost sacred to the economic system under which we now live. Before any action as drastic as that which would be necessary to be taken in respect to debt can be taken I imagine that we would have to have the almost unanimous support of every party and group in this house. I propose to make several suggestions as to how the burden of private debt may be dealt with and also indicate the principle upon which I desire to make my plea. I shall not move any amendment with respect to the matter because, as every hon. member knows, an amendment to the motion to go into supply is always regarded as a motion of want of confidence. Were I to move an amendment I would be defeating the object which I have in view rather than promoting it. If my intent in this matter were purely political, no doubt that is what I would do, but it is not. While the present government along with all other previous governments must share the responsibility for not having changed the debt creating system, it cannot be charged with originating that system nor can we hold the present government responsible for debts which were contracted before it came into office. For these reasons, and also because the burden of debt is so heavy and so universal in its blight and its removal so fundamental to the recovery of this country from the great depression, I consider that this question should be dealt with without any blame being placed upon or favour granted to any party or group in this house.

The farming and labouring classes have suffered more than any other class during the present depression, chiefly because their incomes have dropped more drastically. While I mention these classes particularly I do not wish it to be understood that I am asking for legislation which would apply only to them. I mention them because I understand their position better and because it is my particular duty to represent them in this house. Our professional and business men are also overburdened with debt and their positions should also be taken into consideration. My proposal is that debt be reduced so that it may bear the same relation to the prive level which it did when contracted and that interest should be wiped out completely from the time the price level dropped precipitately until it again reaches the point where the major portion of the debt was incurred. Moral principles are very seldom applied, either nationally or internationally, except in rare cases when it is necessary to bolster up obviously immoral practices, nevertheless I do not propose to leave it out of consideration.

Mr. MORAND: Would the hon. gentleman be prepared to reinstate the debts when prices come up again?

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend will wait a moment, he will find that I shall answer his question in my speech.

I should like to examine the principle upon which the suggestions I am about to make should be considered. A contraction of a debt surely presupposes the stability of the income with which it is to be paid. If a man contracts a debt when his income is at a certain figure, surely it is understood that his income, whether from salary, from wages or from prices received for goods produced by him for sale, shall be fairly stable. It is absurd to expect a man to repay a debt when the basis upon which it has been contracted has been changed. The income with which a debt is to be paid is just as sacred as the contract to pay the debt. For if the income has been reduced or destroyed it is absolutely impossible to fulfil the contractual obligation. To create a debt and endow it with reproductive powers and then deflate and destroy the income of the debtor so that his property goes to the creditor is one of the greatest crimes which ever received the endorsation of the wise and the good. Where a debtor's income has been reduced by his own will, by his own carelessness, by his own inefficiency or even by misfortune, it may be both equitable and legal to hold him to his contractual obligations, but where his income has been reduced drastically or destroyed completely by a universal economic condition which he was personally unable to alter, then I suggest that it is only fair and reasonable that the contract should be reconsidered and readjusted to the new circumstances. Such debt adjustments should be made, particularly when the creditor stands to benefit from a calamity which has become not only national but as wide as civilization itself. Such adjustments become increasingly important when the creditor class has had a great deal to do, perhaps unwittingly, with bringing about the stoppage of the economic machine which has plunged the debtor deeper and still deeper into debt.

It is common knowledge that the farming and labouring people are almost in a state of bankruptcy at the present time. For example, let us consider the case of a mechanic working in the railway shops. Six years ago he put his savings into a home, costing about $4,000. After fifteen years of work he had managed to save $2,000. In order to purchase his home he had to borrow $2,000 at eight per cent interest. Assuming that he was able to save at the same rate for the next fifteen years, he would be able to save another $2,000 but he would have to pay $160 annually as interest on the $2,000 he had borrowed. His average savings for the first fifteen years had been only $133 per year so that the only way he could carry on is to save something from what he used to pay for rent in order to offset the extra interest he must pay. He starts out on that proposition but pretty soon he finds that his taxes are increased. Bye and bye he is put on short time and his income is reduced by one-half although the interest and taxes are still going up and being added to the bill he has to pay. Soon afterwards he is discharged from his position and has no income at all. After six years he finds that instead of owing $2.000, he owes $3,000, but he has no work and little chance of getting any. It must not be forgotten that he is six years older and even though work were plentiful, it is altogether likely that a younger man would take his place. Such a man stands to lose everything and something should be done by this parliament at this session to assist our people in that position.

Let me turn to the farmer's position. Everyone realizes, surely, that farmers to-day cannot pay the debts which they contracted from fifteen to four years ago, from the prices which they are now receiving for the products they have to place on the market. Not only are the farmers not able to pay, it is impossible for them to pay. Those of my colleagues who may follow me in this discussion will place before the house comparative figures showing the drop in the capital values of agriculture as a result of the drop in the prices of agricultural commodities. Such figures will also show the impossibility of carrying on with things as they are, and will indicate the extent to which debts should be reduced.

I am reasonably certain that the majority of the members of this house expect the return of prosperity, and in such a hope they rest content, that when it does come back both farmers and labour people and others as well will be able to pay their debts as usual. I do not desire to enter into any argument at this time as to the possible return of the elusive nymph prosperity. For the sake of this discussion I am going to assume that she does come back. What then? She will come back to discover that the debtor's debt is larger than it was when she left; she will discover that the debtor is very much older and less fitted to meet the great struggle which he must enter if he is to survive; and we must all realize that the visit of the nymph the next time may be of much shorter duration than the last.

But there are other factors. For instance, it will take the added income of several years of prosperity to bring the farmer's stock and equipment to that point of efficiency at which it stood when the depression started, without paying anything at all on debts. Let me point out, before I pass on, one other consideration in respect to the farmer's position, and that is that the prospects of marketing for the farmers of Canada are less hopeful at this moment than at any other time in the history of the dominion. The capacity of human beings to consume certain commodities may be without limit, but their capacity to consume foodstuffs must be limited by the capacity of the human stomach.

There is undoubtedly an oversupply at this moment of farm produce; not only so, but we have both the potential and the actual capacity to increase very much more that oversupply. So much is this so that steps are being taken to reduce production. And let it not be forgotten that from now henceforth the economic burden of agriculture will be all that it can bear, without assuming the pyramided debts of several decades on top of present obligations.

Let me turn then for a moment to the common justice of the situation. Is it too much to ask that mortgage companies, bondholders and banks should assume their fair and equitable share of the economic losses which the people of Canada have sustained since the depression began? Is it fair that the income of people who receive wages, or of farmers who receive prices for their commodities should be less stable than the income of those who are paid interest on interest-bearing securities? Not only is the farmer's and labourer's income very much less secure, but the drastic fall in price levels, which paralyzed agriculture and increased unemployment and almost destroyed the purchasing power of the great masses of the people, increased correspondingly the incomes of those who receive fixed payments in the form of interest charges, because their income could buy very many more goods when the price level was low than could be bought with the same income previously. Surely therefore it is not unreasonable to ask that we reduce debts to the debtors of Canada to-day by as much as the creditors have gained through deflation, or by as much as the farmers and labour people have lost through the drop in wages and in the prices of agricultural products.

There may be some who will argue that debts will adjust themselves by the old favourite route of bankruptcy. Let me suggest that that course, no doubt inevitable in many cases if things go on as they are, is too haphazard, too unfair, too slow, too tragic, too disastrous. The situation is so serious in respect to debt at this moment that it demands a courageous, firm and immediate national policy. Apart altogether from the purely human factor of the matter and of common justice, recovery under the present debt pressure will be very much delayed if indeed not entirely prevented; for if farmers and labourers were to earn sufficient, under growing recovery, to escape foreclosure, which is all that they can expect even if prosperity does return, their money should not be allowed to flow into that stagnant pool, because money that is paid for debt in times of depression is not reinvested, there being few opportunities sufficiently attractive to entice the investor. Therefore all debts paid during a depression shorten further the purchasing power of the people and result in further deepening the depression.

President Roosevelt, with his NRA and central bank, has so far failed to tap that stagnant pool and make it flow into the channels leading to consumption. I say therefore that even if we think that prosperity will come back and that debts will be paid it is essential that reductions should be made, because if we allow debts to be paid at the present juncture it will further swell the amounts of money which the bankers say they have and cannot lend because there is no safe demand for such loans. I suggest that if it were not for the anxiety of our creditors to protect their old investments we should very soon see a quickening in the economic and business life of the dominion.

Now there are various methods by which debts might be reduced, and I intend to mention some of them. Some of my colleagues will follow with examples from other countries indicating the extent to which such countries have reduced debts, and the methods they have adopted in doing so. To begin with, I propose that we wipe out interest entirely for the period of the depression, beginning at the date when the price level slumped precipitately and continuing from that period, until our price levels rise to bear the same relation to our debts that they had when the debts were contracted. The power to do that rests of course entirely with this parliament. There may be some constitutional doubts as to whether the power to reduce debts remains with the provinces or with this house. From my experience in listening to debates on the constitutional question in this parliament, it appears to me that the only way we can settle the constitutional doubt is to act and then allow the courts to decide the matter at leisure. Whatever course may be taken, let it not be said that both provincial and dominion governments did nothing and simply allowed the people to suffer because they could not decide among themselves which of the two had power to act. If it be clear which has power to act, let that be stated unequivocally so that the responsibility may fall where it properly belongs. If it be not clear, then let this parliament act and let the courts subsequently decide. Meanwhile the people will get relief and in due time the responsibility and the task will be placed upon the body to which they properly belong.

But in matters of interest I suggest that there seems to be no doubt that the power rests in this parliament. When prices of farm produce dropped, then there was nothing left for the farmer to live on, let alone for him to pay interest on his capital. Is it fair that capital should have the first charge as against the farmer himself? Let us take as an example a farmer who has invested in part his own capital and borrowed the rest. There is no reason that the capital which the farmer risked on his own behalf should be treated differently from that which he borrowed from somebody else. But that is the situation. Surely hon. members will agree that the rights of capital should not be placed before those of the man himself. Let them stand on a basis of equality, if you will, although I think that is unfair. I believe the man should come first, but certainly let not debts come first. The claims of debt surely should not be taken before that of the individual who is struggling to make a living for himself and his family. I regard it as a rrime to compel a man who is unable to provide for his family, to pay interest to bondholders who have been reaping benefits from the depression. I propose, in order that that may be prevented, that all interest should be cancelled for the period mentioned.

With regard to debts which have piled up not only by the adding of interest compounded, but by the great drop in price levels, there are other methods of dealing with that. May I suggest as one method, that a moratorium be placed by this parliament on all past debts and to be removed when the price level warrants. I think it will be agreed that for obvious reasons it is inadvisable for a province to pass such an act, but the federal parliament did pass a moratorium during the war, and it apparently worked fairly successfully. There is more need for a moratorium to-day than during the war. While I am not arguing for this as the method that should be adopted, I mention it as a possible course to be taken and one for which there are ample precedents.

Another method which might be adopted is reflation of currency and credit. This is the most painless way of bringing about the desired result because people understand so little about money that if they get back the same number of dollars they put into the bank they seem to be satisfied regardless of the purchasing power. When the farmers' debts were increased by deflation twice as much as they originally were, the farmers did not know anything about the matter. It was only later they learned that it took two or three times as much wheat to pay the same amount of debt. When a banker gets a dollar, he does not care whether it buys one or two bushels of wheat. What he is concerned with is how long he will have his hands on it and how much interest he will be able to charge for its use. The time has come when the people will insist that the important thing about a dollar is the amount of goods it can buy and I insist that the Canadian dollar in 1934 should pay the debt which a Canadian dollar contracted in 1918. That I claim is common justice and we dare not do other than that.

May I point out that reflation is not to be confused with inflation? The former is increasing the purchasing power until the price level reaches a desired point previously held, whereas inflation is increasing purchasing power beyond the value of goods upon the market, and if that is continued without any control, disaster is inevitable. While I believe a properly controlled reflation would be of great benefit to the debtor class in Canada to-day, I do not now advocate nor have I ever advocated uncontrolled inflation.

Another method by which debts might be reduced is by statute law to cut all debts by a fixed percentage. This I believe to be the honest, courageous, most direct and easiest way to meet the difficulty. I know a government will think very seriously before taking action so drastic and unusual, but the economic conditions of Canada to-day are so drastic and unusual that they must be met with drastic and unusual acts. I do not suggest that the government should assume all the responsibility. Every party in the house should indicate its willingness to take action of that sort in the interest of all the people of Canada. My hon. friends may disagree with the suggestions which I have made and I am prepared to hear the old argument about impracticability. These proposals may be impracticable, although I do not think they are. I shall not argue their merits now, beyond saying that not one of the things I have proposed is nearly as impracticable as it is for us to try to carry on without making a reduction in the personal debts of the Canadian people. Further, the suggestions that I have made have not been offered as cures or rather as solutions of the national problem. They have been offered rather as a remedy for a very sick patient. There is no true remedy for these debt conditions except the introduction of a new financial system on a non debt-creating basis. But I am not married to the suggestions I have made. If hon. members can make better ones, let them make them and gladly shall I accept them.

Let me draw attention particularly to what is to be done. We must bring debts within the limits of the debtor's income. We must compel those who obtain their income from interest-bearing securities to assume their share of the economic loss caused by the great depression. This is the bare minimum of justice and I care not how the government or parliament may decide to do it as long as it is done. It would be easy for me to demand that the government at this moment state its policy with respect to this question. It would be even easier for the government to declare that its policy was one of having nothing to do with altering contractual obligations. But knowing how difficult it is to arrive at a proper policy on a question of this sort and how dangerous it is to have no policy at all, I in all humility and sincerity suggest that if the government has not already decided what it is going to do in this case, it should appoint a special committee of the house representative of all parties, to canvass the whole situation in respect to debt reduction, as to the practicability of reducing it, as to the amount by which it should be reduced and as to the method which should be adopted to do so, and that such committee should report in good time so that action may be taken during this session of parliament. That proposal, I suggest, is reasonable and just.

The situation with which we are now confronted is impossible if debts are not reduced. If debts are reduced not only will it not harm the creditors; it will really assist them, for with their power of controlling money they can make more in a year under prosperity than they are going to lose by the cut in debts which will have to be made. Above all we would give hope to a hopeless people if we took action of this sort. Let the farmers and the debt burdened people of this country realize that the whole nation is going to bear its share of the economic losses that have been sustained and that they are going to have an opportunity of emerging from their present condition; then hope will be revived and recovery speeded up very greatly.

I leave the matter to the wisdom of parliament, repeating only the substance of one thought which I expressed earlier in the course of my remarks. This question of debt, with its urgency and its vital effect upon the nation, is above all partisanship, and I fully believe that every hon. member will so regard it. I conclude by making reference to a remarkable speech delivered in this house a few weeks ago by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the fine spirit and appeal of which were felt and responded to readily by all who heard him. He said:

> I submit that neither party would endanger its chances of victory by making some concessions, by trying to create an operating understanding among all parties with regard to a few questions, because thereby they would enhance the confidence of the people in the sincerity of each group, and also do something to restore, what is badly needed, the faith of our people in our parliamentary institutions and in our parliamentary governments.

I regard this matter of debt reduction as one of the matters upon which it might be possible for us to arrive at an operating understanding. If we can do so I believe we will enhance the opinion of the people as to this parliament, because of the good that will be done in a general way to all the people of this country.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like for a few moments to support the request made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) that the government deal with this most difficult problem of debts and interest. About a year ago one of the most prominent statesmen and thinkers on this continent, Senator W. E. Borah, made the statement that industry and business were being strangled by fear, by debts, by high interest rates and by the high taxes being raised in an attempt to carry those debts. About the same time Professor Irving Fisher, an outstanding economist of Yale university, said the United States was suffering from the debt disease, coupled with what he termed a dollar disease, or a bloated dollar. Debts in the United States are said to have increased from $115,000,000,000 to $234,000,000,000 during the period from 1920 to 1929. We have no reliable figures for Canada, but I suppose we might safely estimate the total debts in Canada at about $15,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 in 1929.

It should be noted that the years during which we had the greatest prosperity in Canada were the years in which we were piling up this immense debt. We had apparent prosperity because we were making use of abundant credit, and under the present system credit is just another name for interest bearing debt. By this time we should have learned also that it is not the size of the debt that matters so much as it is the rate of interest on the debt, together with the price level of goods produced and the level of wages and salaries being paid to the people. So far as wage earners and salaried people are concerned, the interest on their obligations can only be paid if the salary or wage leaves a margin over their living costs, and I may refer to this a little later when I speak of the ability of the wage earner to pay his debts.

In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, interest is paid out of production. When prices fall below production costs the payment of interest by producers becomes impossible. That is why for so many years we have advocated in this house a money policy managed so as to maintain stable price levels and stability of employment, as well as of wages and salaries. In the years 1929-30 there occurred an absolute collapse of prices, and in 1931 we in this corner urged the abandonment of the gold standard and the lowering of the value of our dollar in gold countries so as to raise price levels in Canada particularly of export commodities; in other words we urged that we should hold up the price level and in fact restore it to the point at which it stood in 1926. Had this been done at that time I do not think it would be necessary to-day for us to urge the government to take some action looking to the reduction of the debt and interest burden.

Since that time we have not ceased to urge that policy, but so far the government has turned a deaf ear to such proposals. The financial policy of Canada has been one of consistent deflation, with consequent low price levels. This is well illustrated by the fact that in the fall of 1932, wheat was at the lowest point it ever reached since it has been grown in western Canada. Taking 100 as the index figure for 1926, the index figure for field products reached a low of 35 in January, 1933. The index figure for all farm products reached 43 in that month while the index figure for all commodities, or in other words the wholesale price index figure, stood at 63. I think it would be fair to say that the consistent policy of the government has been to maintain our dollar at a high level in New York. The reason given for this policy was to make it easier for governments and others owing money in New York to purchase the foreign exchange with which to meet their liabilities; in other words it was considered to be in the public interest to keep our exchange rate down. This resulted in low prices in terms of Canadian currency for all our exportable products, and these low prices have been the cause of the tremendous volume of unpaid debts, interest and taxes which exists to-day. Surely this is ample justification for us to ask now for national action to reduce interest rates and to deal with this burden of accumulated interest and taxes. We are only asking for justice.

I think at this point it would be quite worth while to quote the Prime Minister himself, speaking at the imperial conference in Ottawa two years ago. I quote from page 116 of the proceedings:

> While nearly all other types of prices have been declining more or less rapidly, we have seen a significant rise in taxes—federal, provincial and municipal—and in interest rates or the cost of capital. The Canadian indicator of the yield on high grade, long term bonds has risen from 93·9 in December, 1930, to 113·2 in May, 1932. In January of this year a high of 119·8 was reached.
> Interest charges represent the most important of the fixed or semi-rigid elements in our cost structure. If prices remain on their present level, such charges will constitute an intolerable or almost intolerable burden in many cases. Even if it can be borne, the fortuitous gain to the credit of 40 to 48 per cent in general purchasing power above what he contracted for appears to be a grave injustice.

If we are to give justice to-day I am sure the interest burden should be adjusted to existing price levels. Had we taken the proper action in 1930 to raise prices through our monetary policy; had we allowed the value of our dollar to fall in outside countries it might not be necessary to-day to reduce debts and interest. But failing that action at any time during the past three years it is evident that now we must reduce interest rates and perhaps in some cases write down the debt or reduce the accrued interest.

I should like to make it clear that it is failure to maintain stability of price levels in Canada that makes this action necessary. The currency of Australia was depreciated and interest rates were reduced under what was called the premier's plan. As a result of this, in the fall of 1932, due to the higher price levels caused by depreciation of their currency, and due also to the reduction in interest rates to which I have referred it took only 100 bushels of wheat to pay the interest on a $1,000 mortgage for one year drawn at eight per cent, while in Canada in the same month it took 200 bushels of wheat to pay the interest on $1,000 mortgage drawn at eight per cent.

There is another very good reason for asking for action to reduce debts and interest. It would be good business for Canada to do it. It is universally admitted that a writing down of international debts is absolutely necessary if we are to restore world trade. By the same line of reasoning, if we are to restore business here action should be taken to adjust this internal debt situation. There can be no prosperity until some adjustment is made. I think that in the interests of the creditors themselves some action should be taken. It should be taken in the interest of widows and orphans where, in many cases, their income has been stopped, due to the inability of the debtor to pay his interest. Some action should be taken in this connection. I have had several cases brought to my attention of widows, who were dependent upon the interest from real estate mortgages and the rentals from farms, who have been left without incomes during the last two years.

There is also a third reason. I think it is necessary from a national or public standpoint, as well as from a private point of view. Our revenues, which in the years 1928 and 1929 were very buoyant and reached the figure of $455,000,000 have shrunk to $306,000,000 for the year 1932-33, leaving us with a budget deficit of $150,000,000 for last year. Had our revenue remained at the 1928 level our budget would have been balanced in the past year. But since the government refused to adopt a money policy which would restore price levels to the point at which they stood in 1926 or 1928, or anything like it, our budget can be balanced only if there is a large reduction in the burden of interest on the public debt. Interest on the gross debt and guaranteed obligations represents nearly fifty per cent of our budget. The budgets of our various governments throughout Canada, provincial, federal and municipal, reflect the financial position of the taxpayer. In the last four years their ability to pay has been more than cut in two, and in many cases it has absolutely disappeared. Relief for the taxpayers has become imperative, and this can be given only if we are prepared to take action to reduce interest rates.

I wish now to deal with the question of the ability of our people to pay taxes and interest. After all, if this interest is going to be paid it has to come from the great mass of taxpayers. I wish first to deal with the ability of the wage earners and salaried people to pay, and as an example I shall turn to our own Canadian National Railways. In 1929 these railways gave employment to 111,000 people, and in 1932 to only 77,000. In the meantime 34,000 had become unemployed and had lost all ability to pay. In 1929 the wages paid amounted to $177,000,000 and in 1932 they were only $106,000,000, so that there is a reduction in wages in this one institution alone of over $70,000,000. On the other hand during those three years the interest paid by this country on the railway bonds increased from $45,000,000 to $57,000,000. That is an increase of $12,000,000. If hon. members will compare the figures of the year 1923 with those of last year they will find the increase is very striking. In those years the increase in the interest bill amounts to $22,000,000, while in the same years wages declined by $52,000,000. This is probably a very good illustration of what happened in regard to the wages and salaries received by the people in Canada generally.

I want next to deal with the paying power of agriculture, and in this connection I should like to remind the house that during the war the federal debt increased approximately seven times. Clearly, the larger part of our direct federal debt consists of war loans. Sir Thomas White, Finance minister at the time of the war, is reported to have said in connection with the flotation of one of the last victory loans that if these loans were ever to be repaid it would be from the top six inches of Canada's soil. Sir Thomas quite evidently realized that interest is paid out of production. Agriculture is our greatest industry, and I wonder just how much interest agriculture can pay to-day. What contribution can agriculture make to the interest charge on the national debt?

I have before me a few figures which will serve very well to illustrate the situation. The total of the gross debt of Canada and loans guaranteed by us as to principal or interest is as follows: In 1913, the figure is $483,000,000; in 1928, $3,361,000,000; and in 1933, $4,020,000,000. That is an increase from 1913 to 1933 of about $3,500,000,000. In those three years the net debt stood as follows: In 1913, it was $314,000,000; in 1928, $2,296,000,000 and in 1933, $2,651,000,000. The interest on the direct debt for those three years is as follows: In 1913, $12,000,000; in 1928, $124,000,000 and in 1933, $134,000,000.

Last year, in addition to that $134,000,000, we paid $53,000,000 as a deficit on the Canadian National Railways, all of which went for interest. I should like hon. members to compare the interest charges paid by the federal government of Canada in the years 1913 and 1933 with the gross agricultural revenue of Canada. The interest increased eleven times between the years 1913 and 1933, not counting the Canadian National Railways deficits, and the gross agricultural revenue of Canada was less in 1933 than it was in 1913. I ask hon. gentlemen how we are going to continue to pay existing rates of interest on the debt. May I give now the total value of field crops produced on the farms in Canada for the three years I have mentioned. They are as follows: In 1913 the total value was $552,000,000; in 1928, it was $1,125,000,000 and in 1933, it fell to $422,000,000. The net agricultural revenue from all farms in Canada in 1932 is given by the bureau of statistics as $428,000,000. The value of our wheat crop in 1913 was $156,000,000; the average value in all the years from 1921 to 1929 was $377,000,000, and in 1933 it is down to $122,000,000. The value per acre of wheat production, which after all may be the best test, was in 1913 at the figure of $13.62 per acre. The average value from 1921 to 1929, which included three deflation years from 1921 to 1923 inclusive was $16.10, and last year it was only $4.37. The gross agricultural revenue of Canada was estimated in 1913 at $800,000,000. The average value between the years 1921 and 1929 was $1,602,000,000, and last year it was down to $775,000,000.

I shall just give a few more figures, because I do not wish to tire the house with them. Between the years 1928 and 1933 the estimated value of the total wheat crop of Canada fell by seventy-three per cent. In these years the total value of all field crops in Canada fell sixty-three per cent. The gross agricultural revenue in Canada in that period fell fifty-seven per cent, the gross agricultural revenue of the prairie provinces fell sixty-five per cent, the gross value of field crops in the prairie provinces fell seventy-three per cent, and the value per acre of wheat production fell by 76 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I feel that these figures which I have just put on Hansard of the national debt and of the value of our agricultural production indicate an impossible situation. We must either reduce the interest burden or we must reduce the bloated dollar. We could remedy the situation if we were prepared to revalue our dollar. It was recommended by one member of this house a few weeks ago that it be devalued to fifty per cent of the American dollar. I think that that is the best method. It would be fairest to everyone. At present our money is so sound that it has rendered almost all kinds of commodities and real property unsound. Money to-day is so sound that it requires four times as many bushels of wheat to pay off a one thousand dollar dominion government bond issued during the war as it took in 1919 or 1920, or to put it in another way, 1,250 million bushels would have paid off two billion dollars of war debt in 1919 while to-day it would take over 4,000 million bushels to pay off that same amount of debt. Our federal gross debt plus our guaranteed debts could have been paid off in 1920 with 2,250 million bushels of wheat but in 1933 it would have taken over 8,000 million bushels.

[Mr. Coote.]

The net agricultural revenue last year was about 35 per cent of what it averaged in the years 1918, 1919 and 1920, but the federal debt during the intervening years, including guaranteed debts, increased by $500,000,000. If interest is to come out of the soil we must raise agricultural prices, and in addition we must reduce interest rates. On several occasions the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has stated frankly and fearlessly in this house that farmers, merchants and producers generally could not continue to pay the existing rates of interest, but no action has been taken. In to-day's paper I see that the minister is quoted as saying in a speech on Saturday:

> Farmers' interest rates were too high at seven and eight per cent, and there would have to be a readjustment downward.

We have been saying that for three years, Mr. Speaker, but we cannot get any action. A few weeks ago the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) made a splendid speech in this house in which he advocated cutting down the interest rates on all existing obligations by one-third, I think he said, of the stated rate. These are very fine suggestions and I hope that the government will agree to refer this matter to the committee. There I am sure these suggestions would be taken up because both have come from the government side of the house.

I should like to go a little further into the farmers' case and point out that his ability to pay interest depends on the cash profit on his operations. There is no use our saying that because the farmers' income has been cut in two, he would be able to pay if we should cut interest rates in two. It does not necessarily follow that he could pay any interest rate, because he may not have any profit at all at present prices for farm produce. During the last three years prices of most farm products have been below the cost of production. Where has the interest come from which the farmer has paid? It may have come out of his capital and savings, and in many cases out of an insurance policy which he has cashed in. It has come out of reduced standards of living. He and his family have gone without services which they should have had. If the farmer has no reserves to draw upon, he cannot pay, he cannot live and pay interest out of production. For the last four years the index figure of farm prices has been away below the figure of pre-war days, and retail prices have been above the pre-war figure. For the whole of Canada in 1932, the net agricultural revenue, as given by the bureau of statistics, was $428,000,000, and the number of people on farms was 4,804,728. This leaves a revenue of less than $90 per person for all those living on the farm, or less than $600 per farm. Out of that $600 per farm there has to be paid interest, taxes, insurance premiums, machinery repairs and all the other things necessary, and on the average 6·6 persons must live on the balance. As I said before, it amounts to only $90 per capita before you deduct any of these expenses. The whole of the net agricultural revenue in 1932 is only equal to seven per cent of the gross agricultural wealth of the dominion, as estimated by the bureau of statistics in 1931, and yet farmers are compelled to pay interest on farm mortgages at the rate of eight per cent.

I have received lately communications from several farmers indicating action on the part of some of the mortgage companies and insurance companies who have loaned money on mortgage which I think is very unfair. I have here a crop share lease, which is sent out by the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, for those who are in arrears for interest, and they are demanding that one-half of the crop should be delivered free of all expenses to the company to apply on the interest on the mortgage. In this particular case the interest rate of eight per cent was paid in full to the end of 1932; the taxes were paid up to that date, but the mortgage was in arrears for one year. The crop was frozen in the year 1933, and of course these people were unable to pay interest on the mortgage that year. The Manufacturers Life is demanding that these people sign and return this crop share lease which would guarantee the delivery of one-half of the crop to the company to be applied on the interest due on the mortgage. The company is very insistent about it because I notice that they say in one letter:

> We are enclosing a half-share crop lease. Please sign both copies. . . . Then return both copies to us by first mail. It is absolutely necessary that we get this security in order to cover the arrears.

It must be done by first mail. This letter was followed by a second letter, from which I quote.

> We want this right away, and if it is not forthcoming we will have to put the matter in the hands of the debt adjuster to get it completed, and this will only add further costs to your account, which is already badly in arrears.

There is no possibility of a crop even in southern Alberta where we have such a salubrious climate, until next September, and yet this company says that they must have this crop share lease signed and returned to them right away. I do not see why they are in such a hurry to get it right away. It would not make their security any better. But it just shows how they are endeavouring to get people to sign these leases.

May I point out to this house that our producers, particularly of field crops but also of live stock, have been in a very difficult position during the last three or four years. Prices for the bulk of their commodities are on an export basis. When we export we come into competition with Australia, New Zealand, the Argentine and Denmark, as well as other countries, but those are our four main competitors, and in every case our competitors have an exchange advantage to-day varying from 20 to 25 per cent. During the last three years they have had an exchange advantage over us of sometimes as high as 60 per cent.

Money policy is the chief factor in fixing prices to-day for export commodities. This government has control of money and of interest rates, and as their money policy has been responsible for continuing these very low price levels, I think we are only asking for justice and asking for it in the right place when we ask this government to take some action to reduce this interest burden.

I have here an article taken from the Toronto Saturday Night about two years ago, containing a report of a speech made at that time by Senator Laird of Regina. The article says:

> More radical and arresting was an address by Hon. Harry W. Laird of Regina, on remedies for the prairie farmer. Senator Laird is not a noisy agrarian of the type which blames every misfortune on eastern capital and the older political parties; but a conservative business man, who has lived in Saskatchewan for 30 years. He plainly told his hearers that something must be done to ease bankrupt farmers of their burdens. "What does it avail a lending company," he asked, "to carry on its books enormous sums of past due interest and questionable equities, when it is is a certainty that they never can or will be paid? . . . Far better to relieve the farmer from the incubus now, and have it over with, and thus enable him to start afresh with a portion of his shackles removed."

That seems to be good sense. Surely we are not asking for anything but justice in view of the figures which I have given. I believe they indicate a net annual income of not more than $70 per capita for the farm population. Under such conditions, agriculture cannot pay existing rates of interest.

I should like to ask hon. members and the government: Is it our job to-day to keep up the wages of money at these high levels, so far above the level of the wages received by the farming and labouring people? Should not our job be to bring about an equality between the wages of money and the wages of the people? We are revering interest rates and disregarding human rights. Mr Cromie, the editor of the Vancouver Sun, is reported to have said recently:

"When we from Canada and the United States," he said, "visit India and see that poor starving country feeding about 10,000,000 sacred cows, sacred crows and sacred monkeys, we wonder how humans can be no ignorant and stupid. But when from the shores of India we look back at our own North American continent, we see in perspective how foolish we are with our sacred cows of overcapitalized debts, high interest rates and outlived social attitudes which cause some of our people to go without work and some to starve and to be without hope of the future."

I implore the government to regard debts as being a little less and our people as being a little more sacred. I entreat the government to take some action in this connection. If it has no definite proposal to make in this regard it should follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and appoint a small select committee to consider this most difficult problem.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, because of the great importance of the subject brought before the house by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) I feel myself under an obligation to support him. He pointed out the relationship between debt and the earning power of the farming and labouring classes while others have gone further and dealt with the relationship of debt to industries. Even if other classes were not affected particularly, they would be affected indirectly because of the heavy burden upon the two classes to which I have referred. The purchasing power of the people should be in the hands of a majority of the people. Once wages and salaries are driven down to zero all business is bound to suffer. In some respects this debate may be of less interest to certain members than the debate on titles, but it is important because people are more interested in obtaining titles to their homes, to their farms and to their right to live than in having some title tacked on to their names. This subject hits at the root of all our problems. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin has stated that the reduction of debt is absolutely essential to the economic life of this country. As he said, a moratorium was put in operation in 1914 and this could be repeated if the government saw fit. In his usual able way, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) followed up the argument. In the course of his remarks he referred to the statement of Sir Thomas White that most taxation had to be taken out of the first six inches of the soil. He said also that interest on federal funded debt had increased eleven times between 1913 and 1933 while total revenues had actually decreased.

I should like to give the house a few figures to show the general debt situation in this country. According to the blue books and the figures given last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in presenting his budget, the national debt of this country was no less than $2,649,000,000. Last year we paid $138,000,000 as interest on this principal. We have guaranteed bonds to a total of $996,000,000. The total debts of the provinces have been given to us as $1,363,000,000 while the debts of the municipalities are even higher, totalling $1,584,000,000. I might mention that these figures were brought out during the investigation in 1933 into debts and interest rates. The debts of corporations registered with the bureau of statistics amount to $1,178,000,000. Total farm mortgages outstanding are given as $677,000,000, although I think this figure is rather low, while urban mortgages amount to $765,000,000. We have been given to understand that these and similar debts, apart from the huge total of private debts, amount to no less than $10,500,000,000. Last year the Minister of Finance informed the house that out of a total expenditure of $445,000,000, $313,000,000 was uncontrollable. He said that taxation had been slow in coming in and only $287,000,000 had been collected. He stated that even though the houses of parliament were closed, every civil servant let out and every public work stopped, we would still be behind by no less than $26,000,000.

Many people will say that this state of affairs has been brought about by the expenses incurred during the last great war. I agree that the war had a lot to do in hastening the situation but I contend that even had the war not occurred the situation which we have to-day would have been brought about in a few years. The system contains the seed of its own destruction and a serious world debt situation would have developed eventually. The war certainly increased the seriousness of the situation, and I should like to give a few figures in this regard. According to statistics which I have before me, the cost of the war to the British Empire, France, Italy, Russia, the United States and the central European powers, amounted to a grand total of $232,000,000,000. The national debts of the active belligerents in the great war, including the British Empire, Belgium, France, Italy, Rou-mania, the United States and others, amounted to $178,225,000,000; the debt of Germany was $1,984,475,000,000, or a total of $2,162,700,000,000. We all recognize that Germany's internal debt was wiped out as a matter of self preservation on her part, injuring a certain number of people very badly indeed. But on her part it was a matter of self-preservation. We also recognize that large slashes have been made in other national debts for the same reason. France out of desperation in 1932, with original securities carrying 5, 6 and 7 per cent, transferred them into a new issue of 4½ per cent, converting nearly 81,000,000,000, francs out of 85,000,000,000 francs. Italy, under an agreement of June 27, 1926, provided for the satisfaction of a debt of £610,840,000 to Great Britain by sixty-two annuities amounting to £276,750,000. principal and interest, cutting it down nearly one-third. Australia, in July and August, 1931, brought about a reduction of 22½ per cent in the rate of interest by conversion of internal government debt, saving on interest by conversion £6,500,000, or over $30,000,000. In other words, the internal interest burden will be reduced to that extent.

I admit that Canada has brought about a conversion and saved a little, but nothing like the saving that has been effected by other countries I have just mentioned. But while Canada has done a little, not as much as we might have done with regard to the cutting down of rates of interest and saving in taxation thereby, I fail to see what we have done as regards making it possible to cut down private debts and enable debtors to pay. In the last four or five years we have refused consistently to allow our money to depreciate, although we knew quite well that our chief competitors, such as New Zealand, Australia, the Argentine and Denmark had done so. And as the hon. member for Macleod has already told the house, the exchange over Canada to-day is between 20 and 25 per cent.

I fully admit that inflation and deflation in the extreme are both bad, but if one is a greater evil than the other it seems to me that deflation is distinctly worse, because it hurts a great many more people and brings on much more tragedy and suffering. I advocate neither, but I do advocate a scientific control of the money system, which has not been attempted in this country up to the present time. The other day a customer of a bank sent me a note showing that on quite a large amount no less than 9 per cent was being charged. The figures that have been given this afternoon show that farming is not paying 2 per cent and in many instances not 1 per cent. How is it possible then to pay 8 and 9 per cent under these conditions?

It has been pointed out this afternoon that the control of interest comes under federal jurisdiction, and therefore it is within the power of this parliament to pass whatever legislation it sees fit with regard to interest rates. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin dealt very fully with the inequality of what I might term commodity wealth and financial wealth, showing how under the present deflation those holding financial wealth have been favoured at the expense of those holding commodity wealth. The debt situation so far as agriculture is affected was covered very largely by the hon. member for Macleod and I will not take up much time discussing it in detail. However, I wish to say a few words about it.

At one of the special committees of the house the other day particulars were given with regard to debts owing by the rural population in Alberta alone to the retailers of that province. The figure given was I believe as high as $46,000,000. Now, if the amount owed to the retailers of one province of the dominion, and one of the smaller provinces from the point of view of population, amounts to that sum, what is the aggregate of all that is owed if we add to what is already owed the retailers the various sums owed to the lumber yards of the province, the machine agents, the sums owed in taxation to municipalities and to the provincial government, and those owed to mortgage companies and to the banks.

This debt situation as we find it, together with the shortage of purchasing power which is felt so acutely at the present time, affects everyone, of course; I suppose that 85 or 90 per cent of the people are affected by this serious condition to-day in regard to debts. I am dealing for the moment however with those who happen to live in the rural sections. The farmer finds his reserves—and some had reserves up to a few years ago—entirely depleted. It is impossible for the farmers to carry out repairs to machinery or buildings, and the one person who is probably busiest on the prairies to-day than ever before is the blacksmith, because he is called upon to such an extent to repair all sorts of machinery, something that was not thought of before. Previously it was not the practice to have machinery repaired in this rough and ready way, but to-day repairs are extremely expensive. Moreover, the standard of living is lower, and I cannot see how it can be reduced much further, with our present standard. The hon. member for Macleod gave some extraordinarily low figures with regard to the average revenue received by the farmers to-day. I find that hope is disappearing, because the young people coming out of high school and college to-day who are lucky enough to find work are few and far between. They have no means whereby to set up for themselves and they cannot borrow from the banking institutions. I find that others who have gone through the common schools cannot go to high school or university because their parents simply cannot afford to send them. This sort of thing cannot go on without affecting business, and business generally recognizes it to-day. That is why it is felt that until agriculture is again on a paying basis no general uplift of business can be brought about. If agriculture is allowed to remain in its present precarious condition or to become any worse, it is going to be an evil day indeed for general business throughout the country.

Anyone who has studied the subject of interest must appreciate the tremendous liability it is to those who are so unfortunate as to be unable to meet their payments. I have in my hand a statement taken from Mr. J. M. Keynes' book Monetary Reform in which he says, referring to debts, that if they are allowed to grow without mitigation for many generations, half the population would be no better than slaves to the other half.

The ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Snowden, referring to the huge amounts Great Britain has to raise every year by taxation to meet interest on war bonds, said one day to the British House of Commons that the British government to-day was practically a huge tax-collector collecting from all the people huge sums to turn over to a few who happened to hold war bonds.

Let me go back further in history to a statement made by Napoleon Bonaparte who in his time was a great student of these questions. In that very well known book by McNair Wilson, Monarchy or Money Power, Napoleon is referred to as fighting the monetary interests right until the time he was shut up in Elba. At the time he escaped, when he had to get some money quickly, he sought the international moneyed people and borrowed from the city of London five million pounds with which he equipped himself to fight the battle of Waterloo. He is reported to have said in looking at a table of compound interest:

> I wonder if this monster has not devoured the whole human race.

Were it not for the fact that from time to time we have bankruptcies galore and a writing down of interest every now and again, there is not the slightest doubt that the control of properties in general would come into the hands of a very few people.

A year ago the house sent to the banking and commerce committee a resolution introduced by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) asking for an investigation into debts and interest. Some valuable work was done in that committee and a great deal of important information obtained by it. Time, however, did not allow it to go into the question as thoroughly as it desired, and so, in submitting its report to the house, it recommended that the work should be continued. I trust, therefore, the government will accede to the request of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin who has brought up this subject this afternoon, and will appoint a special committee to go into the whole question of debt and interest and to see whether something cannot be done, as I am sure it can, to help to salvage business from the extraordinary position in which it finds itself, to enable this country again to step on to the highway of success, and to get away from the very low standard of living and the debt and worry through which most of the people are passing to-day, to a much higher level or improved standard of living to which we can look forward with a great deal of hope and pleasure.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations in support of what has already been said on this very important question of debt. I believe there is no question in Canada to-day that is causing so much worry and so many sleepless nights as the tremendous burden of debt that is weighing so heavily upon the Canadian people. May I say here that if this session of parliament did nothing more than deal adequately with the debt problem, it would have done something really worth while.

Speaking a little over a year ago, Mr. Stanley Baldwin made the following remark:

> These days constitute a challenge to our genius, industry and loyalty. The world stands upon the precipice of bankruptcy while in possession of the secret of plenty.

I am sure that one will not be considered an extremist in quoting any remarks made by the Right Hon. Mr. Baldwin. Last year the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) introduced a resolution dealing with the question of debt, and this resolution was later referred to a committee of the house. I find at page 623 of the Journals of the House, 1933, that that committee reported giving the dominion, provincial, municipal and corporation debt as $8,855,596,829 and the total interest for the year, figured at an average of 4·77 per cent, as $421,965,896. When we find that the total amounts realized from the field crops of the whole dominion amounted last year to only $422,148,000, we realize that this is practically all taken up in meeting interest on our dominion, provincial, municipal and corporation debts. On top of those figures farm mortgages were estimated at $677,564,100. Might I say that there was some difference of opinion in regard to those figures because they were computed only from mortgages given by those who owned land, whereas we from the west know that a large proportion of our land is sold on crop payments and agreements of sale and as the holders of these agreements are not really the registered owners of the land, the amounts owing on those properties would not show. Then urban mortgages were estimated at $765,000,000, if we combine farm and urban mortgages, we have a total of $1,442,564,100. If we add this to the dominion, provincial, municipal and corporation debts, we get a total of $10,298,160,929. But no estimate was made of the private debts of Canada and while a number of estimates have been given, I would simply add as private debts, $1,700,000,000 to this figure, bringing the total to approximately $12,000,000,000. The hon. member for Red Deer in a very careful compilation in his speech of last year estimated the total debt at $12,000,000,000, but there are those who place the figure very much higher. If, however, we take $12,000,000,000 as the total debt of Canada, at an average interest rate of 6 per cent this would give us a total of $720,000,000 a year in interest charges. Dividing this by 12 it means that our interest rate per month amounts to $60,000,000, or that we are paying $2,000,000 each day of the year in interest charges. When one considers these figures one realizes why we are in the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. One must remember that these debts were largely contracted when prices were at a very much higher level than they are at present, and I think it would be safe to say that at present price levels one could at least double the figures I have already given. The paradox of the whole thing, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that never were we so wealthy as a nation, yet never were we so hard up. I should like to quote Doctor Victor Dalmage, chairman of the British Columbia Mining Institute, from the Canadian Mining and Metallurgical Bulletin of January, 1931. He said:

> The economists define wealth as "the fruits of labour" such as, for example, wheat, copper, cotton, lumber, fish, etc. According to this definition, the world is at present flooded with wealth and yet, at the same time, awful poverty is everywhere in the land; people are hungry, ill clad, and ill housed even on this, the richest of continents, and in this young and vigorous country of ours.

Just stop for a moment and remember that if every dollar in the world disappeared to-morrow morning not a bit of this wealth which is essential to the well being of mankind would disappear with it, yet because of the present man-made money system we find ourselves in this terrible condition. I think we might as well admit that we are bankrupt so far as our ability to pay our present debts is concerned; not only that, but it would appear that to-day all governments are bankrupt of ideas as to how to meet the situation. When the provincial premiers met in Ottawa in January, just before the session opened, I found the following statement in the press:

> "No matter what avenue we explore in taking up the agenda items, we always bring up against that stone wall—financial stringency," said one provincial premier on leaving the conference last night.

When one considers the wonderful resources of our country and our tremendous ability to produce, one is forced to the conclusion that the only barrier standing between the ability to produce and the desire to consume is a financial one. In a short article in the Business Week of New York, I find the following statement:

> In the course of time we shall understand that this depression had its origin and will have its end in other, more fundamental factors than the management of individual industrial and commercial enterprises. Of these, our monetary and credit system and our governmental machinery are the most important. Both are a century or more behind business in their development. Management can do only so much and no more to offset their deficiencies, and the stable progress of business is limited by them.

Reading the press to-day one is struck with the statements that are made as to the inevitability of another war. I am sure that if a plebiscite of the people of the world could be taken no private individual would vote for war, yet because of the debt-ridden condition of the people and the economic situation in which they find themselves they are gradually being forced against their will into another war. I think every hon. member realizes just what another war will mean to civilization. In his Inversion of Science, Professor Soddy has this to say, at page 15:

> Anticipating somewhat the conclusions to be arrived at, we may define here the cause of war more precisely as due to an accumulation of mutual international indebtednesses without any possible method of repayment. Strong nations at once get the weaker into their debt and prefer to extort from them a permanent annual tribute of wealth by way of interest, rather than to allow them to repay the principal and go free. War cannot be abolished till that is rectified.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that under our present debt-creating system this problem cannot be dealt with. As I said a few days ago when speaking of another matter, just as the industrial revolution which occurred a little over one hundred years ago changed the whole outlook and condition of mankind, so to-day I am convinced that nothing but a financial revolution will meet our present needs. It seems so absurd, when we find ourselves surrounded with plenty on all sides, and when we have the ability and willingness to produce, that we should find ourselves in our present condition. We have everything but the ability to provide the tickets of exchange; the one obstacle is a matter of finance, and until we are prepared to use our social credit for the benefit of the people instead of allowing private interests to use it as they are now doing, I see nothing but trouble and chaos for the future.

I wish to add my voice to those who have requested that this matter be sent to a committee and given very careful consideration. I hope this session will not end before at least something has been done in regard to the debt question.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything on this question until I heard a certain statement made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that it was quite noticeable that in times of economic prosperity debts increased faster than in times of depression. The point I am going to make is very important, and I hope hon. members will take some note of it. I do not ask that they agree but I do ask that they give the matter consideration, and if they do so I am quite satisfied that they will come to the conclusion that debt is inseparable from the present system. As a matter of fact capitalism itself is debt. It was reported some time ago that an eminent European statesman said that empire was debt; I say that capitalism is debt.

Now let us see why it is that in times of prosperity debt increases faster than in times of depression. I do not know, but I presume that when the hon. member for Macleod referred to times of prosperity he was referring to the years immediately preceding the depression which began in 1929 or 1930. If we go a little farther back to some years preceding that, at a time when there was a still greater industrial development and industrial activity—I refer to the years of the world war—we find that debts increased not only at the same rate as they increased in 1929-30, but considerably faster. The reason is this: There was more wealth produced, although it was destroyed as fast as produced, during the war years. There is only one way in which a certain amount of the wealth produced under capitalism can be disposed of, and that is by creating a debt equal to the value of that part of the wealth produced.

Production is disposed of in two ways. It is shared between the owners of the capital concerned in its production and the workers in that particular industry. Through wages the workers receive a certain amount of the value they produce, but they do not receive sufficient to buy back the total volume they have produced. The employing or owning class are not able to consume the surplus that the workers have produced and cannot buy. There is no way then, in which that surplus can be disposed of, except by creating a debt. If we go back, as I said, to the years immediately preceding the war, when the United States was lending enormous sums to the allied nations, we will find that the workers in the United States, in fact all the people in that country, were living on a higher standard than they had ever lived on before. That condition meant one thing only, that they were producing enough to feed, clothe, and shelter themselves better than they had been fed, clothed or sheltered before, and yet they were creating a huge surplus of commodities to send overseas. All of that was creating a debt.

Some little time ago I saw an article in World Wide, which was copied from the New Republic. The article was intitled "A War Debt Catechism," and reads in part as follows:

Q. What are the war debts?
A. Debts owed to the United States government by our allies in the world war, for loans made to them during and after the war.
Q. How much were the total loans?
A. $10,350,000,000.
Q. How much was loaned before the armistice?
A. $7,000,000,000.
Q. How was the money sent to Europe?
A. The money was not sent to Europe. It was paid to American manufacturers, farmers and other business men by a committee of the American War Industries Board.
Q. What for?
A. Munitions of war, food, cotton and other supplies sent to our allies; transportation, shipping, interest.
Q. How much was loaned after the armistice?
A. $2,500,000,000, plus $740,000,000 in relief supplies.

Q. How was this after-the-armistice money sent to Europe?

A. It was not sent to Europe. It was practically all spent in the United States for the purchase of war supplies, cereals and cotton sent to our allies.

Q. Why were these loans made to the allied powers after the armistice?

A. The principal reason given by the secretary of the treasury was that these loans would enable American business men to complete their war-time contracts with the allied powers. If these contracts were suddenly cancelled, he said, it would have an injurious effect upon American business.

All these debts have been created by the exchange of material things, the exchange of goods, and they can never be paid unless those who hold the debts will take goods in exchange. That is the condition with which this country is confronted, and the process I have explained is one which those who owe debts cannot possibly follow. The creditors cannot accept the millions of bushels of wheat offered by the prairie farmers; they cannot accept the beef or pork or mutton, or any of those commodities which we can produce in such abundance; they cannot accept the services of those people who are willing to work. Consequently because these debts cannot be paid we have in Canada to-day 20,000 able bodied men who could be our greatest producers of wealth, but who are in idleness in slave camps. I do not wish to say any more on the subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): More than that; the hon. member has not taken the national parks into consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to say anything further in connection with this matter. I hope the government will send the matter to a committee and, as I said before, if that committee will give it careful consideration it will come to the conclusion that the world's debts and Canada's share of those debts cannot be paid. Possibly then we will get down to business and use some of the wealth which we have and which we are so eminently fitted to produce.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) is one of the best suggestions which has been made during this session of parliament. I believe every hon. member will agree that the debt situation in Canada—and it is this country in which after all we are particularly interested—is an enormous burden, and is one too great for our people to carry. Listening to the figures offered by previous speakers one could not help but feel staggered by the facts as to the debt situation in Canada. I agree with hon. members when they say that it is doubtful if the debts of Canada will ever be paid. While someone might ask, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" I want particularly, without answering the question at the moment about debts, to deal with the question which is troubling most of us, namely that of interest.

I do not intend to cover the ground already touched upon by previous speakers, nor do I intend to place upon Hansard again the many figures concerning the debts of Canada. The matter is so serious however that I do not believe it should pass this chamber until a greater number of speakers have taken part in the discussion and have given expression to their views concerning the acute situation facing us in Canada. Not only are thousands of our people faced with the burden of debts, with the loss of their homes, and so on, but they are faced with the loss of insurance policies and, in fact, everything that they own. Those who were fortunate enough to invest their money in bonds have been protected all the way along. But the farmer, or those other individuals who have placed their money and their all in homes or in farms are seeing all they possess wiped out. I believe it is safe for me to say that thousands of people have already lost not only their homes but their other possessions.

I should like at this time to deal particularly with the staggering debt facing the province of British Columbia. May I at the outset say that I am not blaming any particular government for the situation in that province, but when one considers that in a province of about 700,000 people we are faced with a debt of almost $167,000,000, is it any wonder that many of our people are wondering whether we will ever emerge, or whether it would be better to default now and to begin all over again. I have jotted down some figures in connection with the province of British Columbia and to say the least, they are startling. They borrowed $42,000,000 to cover deficits alone. Out of a total expected revenue of $19,492,791 this year, the interest charges amount to almost $8,000,000, and sinking fund amounts to another $3,758,701, making a total of $11,663,086, which has to be taken from that expected revenue of just over $19,000,000. That leaves somewhat less than $8,000,000 with which to carry on the whole affairs of the province, such as education, health, hospitals, charities, old age pensions, mothers' pensions and aid to the municipalities, public works and all other public services. Taking into account the costs I have mentioned, it leaves less than $1,000,000 with which to carry on all the other affairs of the province.

I think some measure of condemnation is due this government for not meeting the wishes of the province of British Columbia and endeavouring to help them refinance or refund their loans. I understand that the province has approached this government and asked to be allowed to go to the London market, but that the request has been refused. The province has now indicated that it is not its desire to default on the carrying charges, but the enormous load of debt has become so burdensome and has reached such a crisis that the province has now intimated that it will refund at a much lower rate of interest. According to figures submitted by the provincial Minister of Finance, if the province can refund its present debt at something like three per cent, as it expects to do, it will mean a saving in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000 a year in interest charges to the people of that province.

For the benefit of the house I would like to put on Hansard a few figures as given by the president of the North American Life in regard to the debt of this country. It shows the saving that could be effected were the interest rates reduced on the debt of this country. First they give the total debt of the various provinces last year, aggregating $1,142,666,557. They say that if the interest rate were reduced to only 3½ per cent it would mean a saving of over $15,000,000 on that total debt. When one considers that almost every other country in the world has had a refinancing and a refunding of its debt, some countries refunding as low as 2½ per cent, one cannot help wondering what is keeping this country back and why no steps have been taken here to refund the public debt at a much lower rate of interest.

I know that the government endeavoured to take a great deal of credit, and perhaps some credit was due, for the first refunding loan which they floated in London, but I would point out that that loan was floated at 4 per cent. On the other hand, Australia, whose currency has been depreciated and whose financial position has often been quoted in this house, this last year floated in the London market loans amounting to $500,000,000, some as low as 2½ per cent and the average at 3¼ per cent. If that can be done by a country like Australia, with a depreciated currency, what can be done by Canada which has stood these last three years on what is termed by the Prime Minister a sound money policy? Surely if that can be done by these other countries with depreciated currencies, Canada can and should do just as well.

Many suggestions have been made, and I am going to make a suggestion now which I feel is pertinent, although perhaps it might more properly be brought up at some other time, and that is regarding the turning over of all our gold to the central bank. I think it would be a mistake if the gold was turned over to the central bank without this country first of all getting the profit, because otherwise, with gold at $20.67 an ounce, we would lose in the neighbourhood of $90,000,000. The gold in the banks at the present time amounts to well over $40,000,000, and the treasury, under the Finance department, has over $70,000,000. If you add those two together they amount to 60,000,000 ounces of gold, which, at $15 an ounce, representing the difference between the price of $20 and the new price of $35, means a profit of $90,000,000. I hope the government will not transfer all that gold to the central bank without first crediting that profit to themselves, and holding it either to reduce the interest on our public debt or to institute a program of public works. It would be a grave mistake in my opinion to turn over that amount of gold to a central bank without using the profit on behalf of the people. That is at least one suggestion that I have to make.

I think some statement should also be made by the government as to why the provinces are not allowed to go to the London market if they see fit to float their loans. I believe that it would be a mistake for one province to compete with another in the financial markets, especially as conditions are to-day. But we might well copy what has been done in Australia by coordinating, if I may use the word, the provinces, perhaps through a committee that might be set up, which would find out the exact financial position of all the provinces and work out a refinancing scheme that would be equitable throughout the length and breadth of this dominion. But if one province is allowed to go into the market to compete with all the other provinces, no one can tell what might happen. It would not be good business, and the situation created might be so serious that I think the government would de well to take precautions against that happening.

The province of British Columbia has intimated that it is not its wish to default, but if no relief is provided in the money market, it feels that it cannot carry on any longer, and it is hardly necessary to point out the seriousness of allowing one province, especially British Columbia, to default. That province is carrying perhaps a heavier burden than most of the other provinces in connection with unemployment. The municipalities of British Columbia, generally speaking, and the cities, have gone as far as they can in carrying that burden. Besides 100,000 on relief they are caring for ten thousand extra persons who have drifted into the province and are costing considerable money not only to the province itself but to the municipalities who are endeavouring to help carry them.

As I pointed out, British Columbia has borrowed over $41,000,000 to cover her deficits. She will have to borrow this year $3,000,000 for unemployment alone. She owes the Dominion government I believe close to $8,000,000, and with a debt of almost $170,000,000 it is high time we put through a new deal with regard to refinancing and at least make a start towards cutting down our debt and getting a lower rate of interest. We cannot carry on very much longer, and it is a question in my mind just how long we can carry on with a total debt in Canada of over $9,000,000,000 and an interest charge of well over $400,000,000. Here we are sitting back year after year and seeing every other country go to the money market and refinance at 2½ and 3 per cent, while the average rate in Canada on our loans is almost 5 per cent.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I join with hon. members who have previously spoken in urging the government to accept the suggestion that has been made for the appointment of a committee where all these matters can be gone into fully before it is too late.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the only member outside of the group in this corner who has spoken on the subject before the chair is the last speaker (Mr. Reid). I congratulate him upon the part he has taken in the debate and I hope other hon. members of both political parties will indicate their interest in this subject of such transcendent importance. Doctor Henry Clay, professor of social economy at the university of Manchester, said not long ago:

> —in most agricultural countries I see little hope of preventing collapse unless there is a drastic writing down of debts.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) added to his reputation when he gave what I consider to be one of the finest analysis of debt creating capitalism which I have heard in this house. It must be apparent to students of this subject that national and international debts can not be paid under the present economic system. There is no use blinking at the facts or trying to smooth them over; these debts in the aggregate never have been paid and they never can be paid. In spite of this fact we continue to carry this ghastly burden of interest on unpayable debts, evidently for the purpose of sustaining a system which in itself contains the seed of damnation and destitution for the peoples within the system. If any hon. member doubts this conclusion, I suggest that he study the financial sheet of any borough in England, any state in the union to the south, any province of Canada or, in fact, any nation of the world. Let him study the balance sheets of one hundred years ago, fifty years ago, twenty-five, ten, five, three, two years ago, and those of to-day. He will find recorded upon those balance sheets only one story, a story of steadily increasing debts and constantly growing fixed interest charges, which themselves now amount to sums far in excess of debts which were regarded as extreme thirty or forty years ago.

As far as Canada is concerned, I think it is only right to say that every class in the country, with one exception, has borne some fair share of the liabilities of the recent depression. As has been shown already to-day, the farmer has had to face enormous reductions in income as a result of the decline in the price levels. In the brief period from 1928 to 1932 one which by no means tells the whole story, the decline in the value of field crops alone amounted to $637,231,000, or sixty per cent. There was a drop of 65 per cent, or $127,669,000, in the value of live stock during the same period. There was a drop of 48 per cent, or $52,163,000, in poultry and egg production. Even that class which draws their income from investments in Canada suffered a loss, although a minor one, amounting to $19,000,000, or a decline of ten per cent. But there is one class which has taken no apparent loss and sustained no fair share of the depression. Not only have they borne no adequate share of the burden of the depression, but there has been a constant increase in the face value of the returns which they received. In addition to an increase of twenty per cent in the face value, they have received a fortuitous increase for which they have performed no service and for which they have made no compensating productive effort. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has referred to the increase of 48 per cent which has taken place in the unearned increment of this class. I refer to the bondholders, who received $65,000,000 more in 1932 than in 1928. The continued concentration of wealth is well told by these figures and must challenge the attention if not the understanding of all citizens of this country.

An interesting study of the wage earner was made by Professor Jackson and Professor Cassidy, who found that by 1932—they did not deal with subsequent drops, which have been gigantic—the reduction suffered by the workers amounted to approximately $1,000,000,000. As I have shown already in part, during the same period the farmer took a cut of easily $1,250,000,000 in annual income. I have made every allowance for any duplication which would occur in the processing of certain primary products of agriculture into secondary products.

Let us turn now to the general condition in Canada, which has been told in part already. I have secured the most exhaustive figures on this subject, and as we are pressing the house for the appointment of a committee to examine all these circumstances, I feel it is entitled to as many facts as it is possible to give. I find that on January 1 of this year the funded debt of Canada was $2,725,704,000. In March, 1930, it amounted to $2,544,586,411. Hon. members will notice the marked increase which has occurred in this short period. In addition to the debt as of March 31, 1932, it will be found that certain securities have been guaranteed by the dominion. This principle of guaranteeing has not been mitigated by the government since that time; in fact it has been materially increased. The railways have been guaranteed as to principal and interest to the extent of $779,944,710, and as to interest only, $216,207,142. Guarantees under the relief acts amount to $28,272,301. Guarantees to Canadian National Steamships amount to $9,400,000, and to harbour commissions, $21,835,118. That is a total in guarantees alone of $1,055,659,271. It is interesting to note that the guarantees as to principal and interest, have risen from $237,878,762 in 1923. I have been unable to obtain figures as to guarantees of interest any farther back than 1923, but the figures for that year are identical with those for 1932. Although there has been no increase, not a single dollar has been paid in principal. The net debt per capita on March 31, 1932, was $226.14. The increase in debt from 1929 to 1934 amounted to $500,200,000. The interest upon this debt amounts to $135,000,000, or a per capita charge of $13.23. The principal burden imposed upon the Canadian people is the payment of the annual interest charges upon this debt. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has just stated, the average rate of interest is approximately five per cent. As a matter of fact it is 4·923 per cent, so the hon. member was just correct.

I shall now take the record of the provincial governments. The total ordinary expenditure for 1931 of the nine provincial governments was $190,754,202, whereas in 1916 it was only $53,826,219. There has been an increase in total ordinary expenditures in the provinces of Canada in that period of 254 per cent. The aggregate interest payments of the provincial governments in 1931 was $36,748,000. In 1916 they paid only $7,817,000. This shows an increase in aggregate interest payments of 370 per cent.

In Ontario the gross debt in 1934 was $639,967,301, an increase in six years of $216,000,000. The aggregate taxes imposed by the municipalities of Ontario in 1931 amounted to $128,657,684, whereas in 1913 they were only $34,231,214, or an increase in municipal taxes, of 275 per cent in that period.

In the province of Quebec the direct liabilities for the fiscal year 1932 amounted to $108,188,709. The aggregate taxes imposed by municipalities in 1930 amounted to $63,637,000, whereas in 1914 they were only $20,771,000. Here we find an increase of 206 per cent.

In Manitoba the direct liabilities for the fiscal year 1932 amounted to $124,558,810. The aggregate taxes imposed by the municipalities in 1930 were $19,322,697, but in 1912 they were $9,922,537. This shows an increase of 94 per cent.

By the way, it is interesting to note that the fixed interest charges by municipalities have increased enormously out of proportion in central provinces as compared with the west, as will be seen by subsequent figures, and this is as effective a way of rebuking the critics of financing in the western provinces as I could conceive—critics who have been so noisy of late.

In Saskatchewan the direct liabilities for the fiscal year 1932 were $134,068,943. The aggregate taxes of the municipalities in 1930 amounted to $29,609,893, whereas in 1914 they were only $13,358,627. This shows an increase of 121 per cent. The gross debt of that province at January 31, 1934 was $145,623,698.

In Alberta the direct liabilities in the fiscal year 1932 were $149,601,000. The aggregate taxes, municipal, in 1930 were $14,887,676, as compared with a total in 1914 of $10,022,246. This shows an increase of 48 per cent.

In British Columbia the direct liabilities in the fiscal year were $140,949,520. The aggregate taxes, municipal, in 1931 were $18,260,430, and in 1914 the total was $8,698,820, or an increase of 110 per cent.

In Nova Scotia the direct liabilities in the fiscal year 1932 were $64,161,747. The aggregate taxes, municipal, in 1931 were $6,605,580, and in 1919 they were $3,443,681, or an increase of 92 per cent.

The seven provinces covered by these statistics contained in 1931 approximately ninety-five per cent of the population of the dominion. The total liabilities of the provinces in 1932 amounted to $1,363,382,464. In fairness, I think I should make this comment on the figures: I think it will be clear from what I have already shown that the province of Alberta, with an increase of only 48 per cent, compares extremely favourably with the enormous increase in almost every other province with the exception of Manitoba. Manitoba is next to ours with an increase of 94 per cent.

In addition to the direct liabilities there are also certain indirect liabilities amounting in 1931 to $210,668,231; so that the total liabilities of the provinces in 1932 were considerably in excess of $1,500,000,000.

The total bonded indebtedness of all classes of municipalities I will give next. These figures are taken from the Financial Post business year book 1934, so that they are up to date:

Prince Edward Island	$ 1,959,672
Nova Scotia	31,386,025
New Brunswick	21,477,521
Quebec	428,018,439
Ontario	499,022,074
Manitoba	91,615,195
Saskatchewan	59,146,704
Alberta	78,679,571
British Columbia	129,913,890
Total	$ 1,341,219,091

That figure represents the total bonded indebtedness of all classes of municipalities in the areas stated. At December 31, 1932, according to the Financial Post year book, 1934, the city of Montreal showed liabilities, including public utility debt, of $322,089,000; Toronto, $291,229,000; Winnipeg, $128,698,000, and Vancouver, $80,130,000.

I come now to the indebtedness of corporations, as taken from the Financial Post year book, 1934, page 131. The amount given is $2,234,213,000. To make the figures as exact as possible I have taken the trouble to ascertain the debts of the public to the banks for the year 1932, as shown in the Canada Year Book 1933:

Call and short loans	$ 117,224,745
Current loans and discounts in Canada	1,032,081,481
Loans to provincial governments	34,386,119
Loans to cities, municipalities, etc.	130,567,792
Overdue debts	12,317,980
Total	$ 1,326,578,117

Approximately ninety per cent of the total assets of the chartered banks consist of money belonging to the public. On the question of farm mortgages, there have already been given in this debate some figures that are exceedingly interesting and that must have alarmed the house. But I repeat, for the purpose of pointing out one oversight, that, according to reliable census figures last available, the total mortgage indebtedness outstanding on the part of one-third of the farms in Canada is approximately $700,000,000—to be exact, $671,776,500. But let it be noted that these figures are only in respect of farms that are so-called "owned"; they do not include the enormous burden of debt on agriculture impending as the result of purchase of land under agreement of sale. I have in mind the debtors of that great land company, the Canadian Pacific Railway, as well as the Hudson's Bay Company and numerous other concerns including our governments themselves who have sold school lands on agreements of sale. If the total indebtedness of agriculture with respect to land alone were known it would be found to be far in excess of the figure I have given and would probably approximate one and a quarter billions. As I have indicated, roughly only one-third of the farmers reported, the number of farms reporting mortgage debt being 242,850 out of 782,000. In the period between the census of 1921 and that of 1931, we find a terrific shrinkage in the value of farm property, a shrinkage running into the figure of $1,025,000,000. The average value of farm land in 1931 was estimated at $30.99 per acre, but let it be noted that the average amount of mortgage debts on owned land alone amounts to an aggregate of $12.66 over every acre of the farm land of Canada.

Urban mortgages have been estimated by some authorities at $765,000,000. I now recapitulate, so that the matter may be clear:

Dominion liabilities as of January, 1934	$ 2,725,704,000
Securities guaranteed by Dominion government	1,053,804,000
Provincial liabilities	1,428,597,000
Municipal liabilities	1,315,523,000
Corporation liabilities	2,234,213,000
Bank loans as of 1932	1,326,578,000
Farm mortgages, 1931	671,776,000
Urban mortgages	765,000,000
Total	$ 11,521,195,000

This leaves out of consideration altogether the incalculable and unprocurable burden of individual debts as between individuals and storekeepers, as between storekeepers and wholesalers, and so forth. The per capita statistics of the Financial Post year book show the per capita debt as follows:

Dominion	$ 226 14
Provincial	139 59
Urban	196 50
Total	$ 562 23

Or, as a result of the insanity of the debt creating financial system with which we are cursed, a grand total of per capita debt in the dominion of Canada at this moment of $562.23.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does that vary according to provinces?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, this is the aggregate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is more than that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, if you take into consideration personal obligations and other matters like that. This is from the Financial Post year book of 1934. I cannot give later figures than that, nor do I think they are procurable.

The average per capita current revenues and expenditures of the provinces are as follows:

Current revenues	$17 40
Current expenditures	20 48

So we see the picture there clearly. Just as the hon. member for Vancouver South has said, under the present system the only manner in which we can, as we call it, progress, is by going into debt. You cannot progress without credit, without purchasing power, and to secure either credit or purchasing power under the present system, somebody must go into debt for it somewhere, either to the bondholding class, the big financial houses, international and national, or the commercial banks themselves. So we have a system that is piling up these debts until a stage has been reached where the people of all nations, including ours, are being crushed and ground into dust under the load.

The gross debt and public utility debt of cities is a very interesting study. The figures are as follows:

City—	Gross and public utility debt per capita
Montreal	$393 48
Toronto	463 12
Winnipeg	588 89
Vancouver	323 68

I regret that time did not permit me to make a complete examination of financial failures in Canada nor of the amount of money involved since 1929. I propose to do that and to produce it on some other occasion, and I am certain the figures will be startling. Commercial failures, however, for 1933, according to the bureau of statistics, were 2,044, with estimated liabilities amounting to $32,953,858.

In January, 1934, the funded debt of Canada stood at the figure of $8,757,840,000; that is the funded debt of the dominion, and the guaranteed securities and the funded debt of provinces, municipalities and corporations. At an average rate of five per cent, that would show an average interest charge of $437,000,000, or $1,200,000 a day. Obviously in the present circumstances it is not possible to pay anything like that sum or any portion of it. As a matter of fact, the reverse is true; Canada in no sense and no class is to-day even meeting interest out of revenue; we are borrowing all along the line to pay interest only, without being able to meet any part of the capital obligation. Even should the time arrive when the feat of paying this debt might become possible and we started to pay it at the rate of $50,000,000 a year in addition to interest, it would take us more than a hundred and fifty years to liquidate the present funded debt of the Canadian people provided that we did not go one more dollar into debt in the intervening period. This would necessitate a complete cessation of all borrowing, I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) who is in his seat, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), or any other hon. member whether they can contemplate continuing the ordinary services of Canada without borrowing. I ask the same question with regard to any provincial government or any municipality anywhere. Of course this cannot be done, so we have to keep on piling up these beautiful debts under this highly intelligent financial system that we have accepted from somewhere else and made our own. Not only have we made it our own, but we have exalted it in a rapturous affection which causes its supporters to shy away in horror from any suggestion that might in any way modify its burdens.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow-River): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just shown that the bonded debt of the Dominion of Canada, the provinces, municipalities and corporations would require, in addition to interest, an annual payment of about $50,000,000 if we attempted to pay off our present obligations in a little more than a hundred and fifty years. Of course, as I said at the time, this would also necessitate a complete abandonment of all borrowing, a condition that it is impossible to contemplate. Therefore I submit, considering the fact that last year the dominion alone showed an increase in the net debt of over $220,000,000, that we must either reconcile ourselves to remain in debt in perpetuity or insist upon an entire and drastic reorganization of our complete financial set-up.

In connection with the statistics presented to the house this afternoon I showed that the obligations of the people of the country to the banks alone were almost $1,250,000,000. The annual interest payments on that sum approximate $80,000,000 a year. These bank loans deserve special mention, because if we are to believe the bankers, the Prime Minister and some other hon. gentlemen who have the orthodox, reactionary and quite inaccurate view of the action of the banks, these loans in their opinion are supposed to represent the savings of the people placed with the banks for safe keeping. For our purpose let us assume that their words can be taken at face value. We then find that the banks are paying 2½ per cent interest on the deposits of the people, so that the net payments on the part of the people of the country to the banks are about $55,000,000, for the use of the credit of the people. And incidentally I might direct the attention of the house to the fact that bank savings have declined by over $130,000,000 since 1929.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as many of the hon. members of this house come from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec I propose, in the few moments left to me, to touch very briefly the financial situation of those two provinces. I find that in Ontario at the time of the armistice the total obligation by way of provincial debt was $250,000,000. That provincial debt of $250,000,000, has grown until now it is over $600,000,000 and the bond obligations alone that have to be met annually out of the taxes of the people amount to $20,000,000. One can cite similar conditions in almost every municipality and every city in Ontario.

The recent financial crisis in the city of Montreal deserves consideration also when discussing this question of debt. The situation had become so terrible that a delegation recently went to interview the premier of that province, Mr. Taschereau, to ask him for guidance and suggestions. The guidance he gave them was so characteristic. so delightfully typical of the stupidity and madness of the present system, that I should like to give it to hon. members of this house. His suggestion was, "If you want to meet your obligations, why not tax the tenants in your city?" Tax the poor devils who are trying to get by, by the skin of their teeth. Well, considering the views of Mr. Taschereau, Mr. Bennett and those of like mind, one is not surprised at the advice; they do not seem to know or to care what is happening to the people of this country. I find that the revenue deficit in the city of Montreal for the current year is set at $6,731,291, with only $4,375,653 available for running expenses.

On this very point in connection with the city of Montreal one should note that the total funded debt, which stood at $119,312,169 in 1921 now has risen to $251,120,694 as of October last, with the result, of course, that the fixed charges have increased so much that for the third year in succession in the annual budget it has become necessary drastically to increase taxation. The budget totals of the city of Montreal have risen from a little under $30,000,000 in 1928 to over $40,300,000 in 1934-35. So large have become the provisions for interest and sinking fund charges that the amount actually available for carrying on the services of the city of Montreal have dropped from $8,839,000 to $4,375,653. To-day the city of Montreal has only half the amount of money required to maintain adequately the services of the city, with the result, of course, that road clearance and other road services have been decreased altogether out of proportion to the requirements of the city, and neither the police department nor the fire department is adequate to meet the demands that may be imposed upon them. The situation in the city of Montreal is immensely dangerous to the stability of the whole of the Dominion of Canada. In that city there are already some fifteen thousand vacant homes.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my word of support to the proposals made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who introduced this question this afternoon. As a result of my studies of the problem it is my opinion that not only can the debts of this country, individual and public, not be paid, but that it is essential, in the interests of the economic stability of the country, that immediately there should be a drastic reduction in capital obligations. We would not be originating the principle; it has, in part or in whole, already been adopted by at least three principal countries of which I have knowledge. It was done in Germany two years ago, when all capital obligations in the country were reduced by a flat ten per cent. I submit that even a ten per cent reduction in Canada will be inadequate under present conditions. In both Australia and New Zealand there have been definite reductions, principally in interest charges; in one country there was a reduction of 27½ per cent.

I therefore submit to this government that the time has come for the serious consideration by the government of a definite, drastic legislative reduction in capital obligation, particularly the fixed mortgages being carried by the farmer and the unfortunate worker who is trying to pay for his home. Recently in the city of Toronto I ascertained that during the previous week there had been no less than 125 forced sales because people lacked the ability to pay taxes; and the houses were sold over the heads of the unfortunate occupants.

There is one further point, Mr. Speaker. I am in favour of completely wiping out all interest and compound interest from the time this depression commenced until the time the price level will have been restored to the point at which it stood when the greater part of the national obligations were incurred. Anything less than that is just playing with the situation. I make these two proposals because I cannot yet see any intention on the part of this administration of taking the only other step by which it will be possible for the people of the country to do what they honestly want to do, that is, pay their debts. So far as I know there are only four ways in which debts can be paid. Debts can be paid on a rising price level, and by the way interest also can only be paid in the aggregate on a rising price level. The moment the price level becomes static or begins to decline, from that moment on the payment of interest in the aggregate becomes impossible. Any student of the subject can verify that fact. So I say debts can be paid, first, on a rising price level. In the second place debts can be paid by a process which we resent and reject; we do not want it and we do not like it. I refer to repudiation. In the third place debts can be liquidated by bankruptcy, which happens to be the common method. That is the chief method to-day; you have industries, institutions and individuals being steadily and constantly liquidated as this infernal process of financial oppression continues.

The last method by which debts can be paid is by reflation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when this government, if it never did before—and I doubt if it ever did—should take into serious consideration the possibility of assisting the masses of the people, particularly the farmers and the workers, to stabilize their position and to pay some portion of their debts by reflationary policies. But whilst reflation may raise the price levels, the wholesale and even the retail levels; whilst it may raise the price level of primary products, at the same time it would be perpetuating a tremendous injustice on the working class if provision were not made through dominion legislation for the maintenance of an adequate rising wage level to keep step with the increase in the price level. If the government of this country does not understake to adjust things on a scientific, economic basis, then there is no use talking about the restoration of prosperity. There is no use attempting to befool the public with a 47 per cent increase in production in a few industries accompanied by only a 16 per cent increase in wages as anything justifying optimism.

On the question of interest, I submit in support of my contention that it should be completely eliminated from the beginning of the depression until the price levels approximate those obtaining when debts were incurred. I submit that in the middle ages the principle of interest was severely condemned by law, and that the principle of interest as a legal instrument is of comparative recent origin. Secondly, interest to-day leaves less than four dollars out of every five dollars produced by the application of labour to resources to be divided among wages, profits and rent. Thirdly, interest is not paid a person for being actively productive or even because he has refrained from consuming his wealth, but because he has been unable to consume his wealth. And fourthly, some people—quite a few in this country and in the country to the south of us—have so much wealth that even if they wished they could not consume anything like a reasonable proportion of their incomes. And it is this very type of person who, by drawing further interest on his accumulated surplus, is able definitely to ensure the effective enslavement of most of the people of Canada, both farmers and workers. We can reduce or minimize the effect of this principle to some degree, but only to some degree, so long as the present frame of mind of, I submit, both the larger parties in this house continues. We could reduce the waste of wealth, for example, by refusal to participate in international conflicts. We could declare definitely that, once and for all, Canada is out of everything in the nature of international war, and never again will participate in or be a party to an international war or the accumulation of ghastly death and debt in connection therewith. We could by taxation and, if the government were so inclined, by other means, redistribute national income on a far more equitable basis than obtains to-day. We could, of course, enforce to a much greater degree our usury laws, thereby preventing the appalling overcharges of interest of which some financial houses are to-day guilty.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I therefore add my word of endorsation to the proposals of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, and with all sincerity I urge upon this government the appointment of a special committee immediately, for the purpose of considering further the resolution of this immensely important question.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the house before proceeding to the consideration of the estimates. As a matter of fact, although finding myself very largely in sympathy with the suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) I can scarcely understand why this debate about the public debt has taken place on the general motion to go into supply, when that debate was not followed by a specific resolution, except possibly, sir, that a specific resolution would have rendered the discussion out of order.

I see that the committee on estimates has still to consider item No. 1, the interest on the public debt of the Dominion of Canada, and with all due respect to my hon. friends to my left I suggest that that would have been the proper place for a debate on the public debt of Canada. In the second place I am somewhat confused by the attitude adopted by my hon. friends in the far corner of the house. They are this evening, and I believe very properly so, advocating the immediate consideration of the national public debt. My memory goes back over the last two or three years; my knowledge of transactions in this house goes back fifteen years, and I know that on every single item which has come up concerning expenditures of money, and very often rash expenditures of public money, the wholehearted endorsation of my hon. friends who are now members of the C.C.F. was given.

Again, I find another peculiar situation: One of the unfortunate situations in Canada to-day is that our Canadian taxpayer is not able to meet his obligations. I humbly suggest to my hon. friends sitting to my left that one of the greatest causative factors of the present impasse in Canada has been the exorbitant tariffs imposed by the right hon. gentleman opposite. And all this has been done with the support of practically all the members of the C.C.F. In that statement I must exclude the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). May I suggest, further, that on a former occasion during this session the leader of the C.C.F. said, "I see in this house only thirty members, and only two reporters in the gallery." I wish to recall to the memory of these hon. gentlemen who make eloquent and well prepared speeches and then, leaving the house to its own deliberations, hie themselves to their rooms on the upper floor, that on the first day of March of this session the committee was considering an item which is to be found at page 57 of the estimates for the current year, an item involving an expenditure of $9,559,698. And at a quarter to eleven that evening when this house was considering the item, and discussing whether or not it was just, reasonable and fair, not a single member of the C.C.F. was in his seat.

In regard to the tariff increases which have taken place in the last three years, what do I find? I find that when my right hon. friend opposite raised the tariff on September 19, 1930, many hon. gentlemen in the corner refrained from voting. When on the third reading of the bill the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) moved a six months' hoist, how did the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, who made the suggestion this afternoon, vote? Mr. Speaker, he voted for an increase of tariff on two hundred items affecting the taxpaying power of every citizen of Canada. And with him there voted at that time Mr. Milton Campbell, now one of the ornaments of the tariff board of the Dominion of Canada; Mr. Lucas, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Kennedy of Peace River, Mr. Luchkovich, and Mr. Speakman. Again I must exempt the hon. member for Bow River from that absolutely unpardonable list of 1930.

Then, again in 1931 the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth moved an amendment to the budget, again seeking lower tariffs, and again the C.C.F.—if it still exists in Canada under that name—took a stand for higher tariff. On that occasion there were Mr. Campbell, the same ornament of the same brilliant tariff board; Mr. Irvine, the same spontaneous gentleman who has made his brilliant presentation to the house to-day, but who on that occasion voted for greater burdens upon the taxpayers—and there were Mr. Kennedy of Peace River, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Luchkovich and Mr. Speakman. Again I have pleasure in exempting the hon. member for Bow River from that unpardonable list of 1931!

This evening we have the anachronism of my hon. friends in the corner of the chamber who in the last three years have supported every resolution and every measure to increase taxation, increase expenditures and increase the public debt in the Dominion of Canada—because tariff increases are nothing but increased taxation—we find them now at the eleventh hour advocating decreases in the public debt. I cannot find any possible consistency, Mr. Speaker, in their attitude. Again I should except the hon. member for Bow River.

I regret that I did not know this debate was to take place this afternoon. Hon. members in the corner kept this wonderful secret to themselves, even from hon. members opposite, including the Minister of Finance—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He knew about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then the hon. gentleman and his cohorts extended to the Tory government a much greater degree of courtesy than they extended to us, despite the fact that the hon. member for Bow River and his colleagues—I would not call them conspirators—knew for three years that this was one of the subjects upon which some of us on this side of the house had expressed ourselves repeatedly and with great conviction. It smacks of collusion!

I have not had the opportunity of perusing the figures given to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Bow River, but I wish without any qualification whatever to congratulate him upon the wonderful mass of material with which he supported his general thesis. I, too, in a humble way, have been seeking after truth and digging up a few figures from the financial ruins of the policies of this government, and may I very briefly place on Hansard two or three salient figures. I wish to approach this problem entirely in a national way.

In the first place I find from figures taken from official sources that on March 31, 1933, the dominion net debt was $2,596,480,826. The dominion guaranteed debt as at March 31, 1933, was $1,024,424,154. The aggregate provincial bonded debt at the end of the various provincial fiscal years ending in 1932 was $1,369,703,667. The indirect liabilities of the provinces at the end of the various provincial fiscal years ending in 1932 was $209,977,397. In regard to the debt of public corporations an approximate figure as of 1932 is $2,097,000,000. Adding those up—I think my hon. friend from Bow River included other considerations—I find that the total debt of this dominion is $8,911,685,036. That, Mr. Speaker, is the problem of our public debt at the present time.

Now I come to the second problem, that of interest, and I find that it is a startling problem. If you take the years from the armistice in 1918 to 1933, the total interest paid by the federal authority directly upon its own obligations was $1,881,944,088. The amount of interest paid by the federal authority on its guaranteed obligations from 1923 to 1932 inclusive was $221,325,715. The figures before 1923 are not available. The interest on guaranteed obligations cannot with any definiteness be ascertained. It seems impossible to find out the figures in this regard for municipalities, but I suggest that when we add up the various figures of interest payments on provincial debt for the thirteen years from 1918 to 1932, the total is $453,528,134, and that the total interest payments for the thirteen years were $571,702,846. Thus we find a total for interest for the provinces and the dominion for those thirteen years of $3,128,500,783, or nearly three and a half billion dollars paid in interest by the federal authority directly, and in connection with guaranteed obligations; by the provincial authority, direct and guaranteed; and by municipalities, and without including the sums which have been paid to our banks.

I wish also to consider very briefly the question of our tax free bonds. I find that on August 1, 1935, there will mature $874,000 of Canadian tax free bonds at five per cent payable in New York and Montreal; on March 1, 1937, $90,166,900 of Canadian tax free five per cent bonds payable in Canada and New York; on December 1, 1937, $236,299,800 of five and a half per cent Canadian tax free bonds payable in Canada. So that our tax free bond situation will have been solved in 1937. But I desire to say here what I said from this same seat two years ago. I do not see any legal, moral or equitable obligation against taxing these tax free bonds at the present time, considering how they have been gathered into the hands of a very few people, some very eminent gentlemen in Canada occupying high positions, and who in my humble judgment are evading their just and due obligations to the state.

I might traverse the situation as to where the various debts of the dominion are payable. Take first of all the debt of the Dominion, $2,715,989,854. Of that amount practically eighty-five per cent is payable in the dominion, which drives home to me this conclusion, that there are no great difficulties in the way of a conversion loan in the Dominion of Canada. Then $91,040,900 is payable in Canada and New York, $300,000,000 payable in New York, and $311,668,136 payable in London.

I have the figures, but I shall not weary the house by giving them in regard to the countries in which the provincial debts are payable.

I come now to the rates of interest payable on our debt. On November 1 of this year there will be maturing I believe in this dominion, $222,000,000 of five and a half per cent victory bonds, which could easily be converted without the slightest difficulty at four per cent. I am suggesting to-day the voluntary conversion of all our internal obligations in this dominion by cooperation and coordination with the provincial authorities, at a rate not exceeding three per cent all over the dominion. I remember having described in detail two years ago in this house what happened in Australia, and I shall not repeat my remarks this evening, but I have here official documents of the commonwealth of Australia in regard to the premiers' plan, and I have also an article which appeared last week in the last letter of the Royal bank. I do not like to quote even from eminent economists, as my friends to my left are so fond of doing, but may I quote a short paragraph from the last letter from the Royal Bank of Canda by Doctor Marvin, the economist of that bank, in regard to what has happened in Australia:

> In the past few months the surplus of government revenues has proved larger than was anticipated, so that the government has been able to give a fresh stimulus to industrial activity by reduction in taxes and tariffs and by actual refunds of substantial amounts paid in taxes. In the budget for 1933-34 these refunds amounted to 7,490,000 pounds.

Again, and this is the last quotation I intend to give:

> Throughout the depression there was no prolonged period of disequilibrium and disorganization in Australian industry. Productivity, wealth creation, buying power were maintained. The decline in buying power which is brought about in most countries in a depression is the result of the interruption of the creation of wealth—it is not primarily a result of over-production. Those who continue to create have products which can be exchanged within the country and with other countries. In the world depression it was the monetary system which gave way. The history of the monetary policy of Australia will constitute a precedent of vast importance when the next decline in prices creates disequilibrium in world affairs.

So we have, in the first place, the problem of our debt, which to my mind is by far the greatest problem in the Dominion of Canada to-day. In the second place, we have the challenging problem of our interest rates with nearly three and a half billion dollars being paid in worshipping the god of usury in this nation since 1918. In the third place, we have the example of Australia which had a surplus in its recent budget, and I suggest that this government should take immediate action, not to nibble by refunding here and there in small amounts, but to meet the problem boldly; and later on in the session I intend to discuss the question how we can meet the problem of our external obligations so far as our debt is concerned. I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, although I do not believe that a committee of this house will do much good. In the past we have had this question referred to the most able committee of this house, the banking and commerce committee, and where did we get? We got a great mass of bewildering figures, and no concrete results.

There is only one way in which we can solve this problem, and that is for the government of the Dominion of Canada to take action. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister knows as well as I do the direful situation existing to-day among the provinces of our Canadian west and among our municipalities. He cannot tell me, as he did two years ago, that the remedy applied in Australia cannot be applied in Canada. I do not believe it, because Doctor Marvin in his article proves to my mind the very opposite to be the case. I suggest to the Prime Minister that instead of thwarting the provinces of the west, which are to-day endeavouring to refund their obligations in London, there should be one great cooperative and coordinated policy followed in this dominion, not for the purpose of thwarting the efforts of the provinces which are to-day on the edge of the morass of bankruptcy but of coordinating the policies of this government with the struggling policies of the provinces in western Canada and thereby have a wholehearted and generous policy of voluntary conversion, or compulsory conversion, if you will, in the Dominion of Canada. We should press with resolution, with determination, with courage and with vision towards the solution of what is in my opinion the greatest problem now facing the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house but a very few moments.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): In order that my hon. friend may not feel disturbed, may I say that I do not intend to make a speech to-night. Perhaps he will agree with part of what I have to say, although he has never been particularly fond of agreeing with anything.

I do not intend to cover any of the ground already covered by previous speakers as I do not believe I could throw any new light upon the subject. The public debt of this country, federal, provincial, municipal, and private, is a stupendous burden and one to which I know the government is giving very serious consideration. We may not agree as to policy but any government in the position of the government of to-day cannot help but realize that this is a most serious problem. Some of us believed that inflation would have proved to be helpful at the time it was proposed, but that suggestion was rejected by the government. I see no harm in supporting the suggestion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) that a committee be appointed to make a study of this matter. I agree with the last speaker (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) who said that perhaps this committee will not get very far—I do not believe the Stevens committee will get very far or will prove anything that will be worth while—but the people of the country should know that we are thinking about these matters. I am bound to say that they scarcely believe that at the present time.

It is the favorite pastime of the hon. gentlemen to my left to say that both parties are quite indifferent to this serious situation, but I do not agree with them. Both parties have to think about it. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) who stated that these same hon. gentlemen have changed their front very frequently. I know they have done so during the thirteen years I have been here.

An hon. MEMBER: So have you.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Not so very much.

So far as I am concerned, I believe that we were right thirteen years ago. Until something is done about tariffs and freedom of trade we will not get very far with the readjustment of our financial system. I believe that this is the root of our troubles; I have always thought so and I shall always continue to think so. I have spent some years in public life and I must object when an hon. member stands up in his place and states that governments have spent money recklessly. I could make the same charge against certain hon. gentlemen in western Canada who have been in public life just as long as I. These gentlemen are colleagues of my hon. friends, and it may be that they have been even more reckless in this regard than the federal government. The truth is that the public demands these expenditures. Pay day has arrived and apparently we are unable to pay. I do not know whether it is going to become necessary to repudiate our debts, but I do know that at the present time we cannot continue to carry the heavy interest burden. I do not intend to enter into a discussion of this matter to-night, although I may do so on a future and more appropriate occasion. There cannot be too much study of this question; there cannot be too much light thrown upon it, and for these reasons I am in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine).

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the most amazing things are said when a discussion such as this is precipitated without a motion of any kind. We had a similar discussion on an amendment to the motion that the house thank His Excellency for his speech. Much of this ground was traversed at that time, and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) proposes to move an amendment to-morrow to the motion to go into supply, at which time there will be still further discussion. From three o'clock to six o'clock this afternoon and from eight o'clock up to the present the house has been discussing no motion; it has just been uttering words which have already been uttered this session at least three times. These are the cold facts and we may as well recognize them now as at any other time.

The last two speakers, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), have stated that there can be no salvation until this country repents of its tariff policies, until the barriers are removed and the sun shines and all is well in Israel. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre commenced his speech with the most urgent request that we copy Australia, a country which has the highest tariffs of any country in the world; thereby, salvation would be brought about. That country not only has the highest tariffs of any country in the world but it has a great many embargoes and other forms of taxation allied to the so-called tariff taxation. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre must have known that. He must have known that the way in which they worked out their economic salvation was through tariffs—they lessened imports, expanded exports, and reduced adverse balances.

Mr. YOUNG: They tightened their belts.

Mr. BENNETT: They tightened their belts, something which the hon. gentleman apparently does not know how to do. I observe with great satisfaction that he shows evidence of increasing weight. In these days of drought he has been flourishing even as the green bay tree by the water side. But this is always desirable.

I mention these things as an indication of how difficult it is to apply a fixed rule and say that it should be made applicable to all countries. Australia has adopted a method which we are asked to follow, but when we follow it, we are condemned.

I should like to know what hon. gentleman in this house has given as much attention to the debt question as those who sit on the treasury benches. We have been responsible for the effort which has been made to maintain the financial integrity of Canada. I have heard jeers that we should care more for our people than for our credit, but I wonder if there is an hon. member familiar with business who does not know that the salvation of the people depends upon the credit which is maintained for them. How are we to secure the very things which we need in this new country if we destroy our character? Our character is our credit and our credit is our character.

I have listened so often to the observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite and in the far corner, especially the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), whose principal avocation seems to be the endeavour to induce people to be prejudiced one against the other. If any one has five cents, that five cents belongs to someone other than the person who owns it. That is his theory in life, to incur debts but not to pay them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The right hon. gentleman is quite wrong; I made it quite clear that I desired to pay the debts.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just saying that his public and private utterances are to incur debts and never pay them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is incorrect. The right hon. gentleman has no right to say such things of me and he knows it.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that what I am saying is correct.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He knows that is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: To incur debts and not pay them, that is his policy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: To incur them privately and publicly and not pay them. What is more, to-night we have listened in this house to the doctrine that it is all right to repudiate, to take compulsory action in connection with the payment of debts.

Now, sir, I put this to the house: Who is more apt to think seriously of this problem? Those who have the tremendous responsibility of endeavouring to deal with it, or those who have not—those who have the responsibility of endeavouring to see that this country does not default, or those who have not? Who has the most serious part of it? Who has the obligation? Who is thinking of it most constantly, not in terms of political advancement, but in terms of responsibility to the country he serves?

We found here, as hon. members know, two and a half billions of debt, most of it incurred in a great war, carrying rates of interest as high as 5½ per cent; and one of the first things we did was to endeavour to convert part of the debt. I was told it could not be done; I was told by high authorities that it could not be done, and yet we appealed to the country to convert 5½'s to 4½'s. I personnally should like to have gone lower, but I was told it could not be done. However, we converted it into 4½'s to the extent of $640,000,000 odd, since which time we have made further conversions, so that over $800,000,000 of debt has been converted into a lower rate of interest.

Now one of the problems with which this government is dealing, I think I can say every day of its life, is the problem of how this interest burden can be lessened. Last week I spent three hours with the representatives of all the mortgage lending associations in Canada—an hour and a half in the morning and an hour and a half in the afternoon. I find, for instance, that one of them has borrowed $30,000,000 from various investors throughout the world and has issued certificates or receipts which carry a rate of interest of 5 per cent per annum. I may say I was greatly surprised that the rate was so high. In another instance it was some $29,000,000, in which almost the same figure is applicable. That money comes to Canada and is loaned to farmers, to merchants, to owners of property on first mortgages, and the rate received is 6, 7 and in some instances 8 per cent. I found to my surprise that one of the insurance companies lending in western Canada, after having written off substantial sums of money, had received as an average on its investments in the west 4.87 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Net?

Mr. BENNETT: That was net payment, yes—4.87 per cent. I found that that rate was much lower than many of the loan and trust companies were paying for the funds which they were lending.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Rural and urban?

Mr. BENNETT: All their investments in western Canada, yes. I was amazed to find the extent to which moneys had to be written off. I was amazed to ascertain the extent to which foreclosure proceedings were not being resorted to because there was no desire to take possession of property and then have it operated either on a crop payment basis or on any other basis that might be arranged between owner and tenant.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite are associated with life insurance companies as directors and they know perfectly well that life insurance would not last over the evening if there were no such thing as interest. I have heard to-night in this chamber a denunciation of interest. But the whole theory of life insurance is predicated upon interest being paid, and the ability of all our life insurance companies is predicated upon the ability to lend certain sums of money, taken as premiums, at interest, so that the value of the fund thus accumulated will, at the expiration of a date which is determined by the mortality tables, at a rate of interest not less than 3½ per cent produce sufficient to pay the contract under the policy. Now that is a factor that we must keep in mind in connection with all our conversion plans.

Where are our securities? The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) said they were payable at certain points. If they were lodged or domiciled where they are payable the situation would be simple; but they are scattered over every part of the world. I fancy there is hardly a state in the American union that has not at the present moment citizens who hold Canadian securities, either municipal, provincial or federal. Some of them are payable in Montreal and Toronto and in other cities of Canada; some are payable in New York as well as in Canada; and some are payable in London, in New York and in Canada. That complicates tremendously the task which faces us. In Great Britain their debt was converted into perpetual 2½ per cent consolidated fund debentures—consols so-called. They are perpetual. At present they are selling at £79 for £100. Now, I have been convinced, as the result of my inquiries and of my knowledge of debts of this country, that it is quite impossible to consolidate municipal, provincial and federal debts into one obligation. That would seem to be impossible. It would seem to be impossible to consolidate provincial and federal debts unless the provinces are prepared to make concessions with respect to the incurring of future obligations to an extent which thus far they have indicated they are not prepared to do. Therefore we are faced with a situation in which, if we consolidate the debts of the provinces and the dominion into a perpetual 3 per cent security, as has been thought of, or a perpetual 3½ per cent security, provincial debts being guaranteed by the federal government for the purpose of making one consolidated issue, we shall be confronted with grave difficulties. There was a governor general of this dominion who urged that the constitution should be amended so that the provinces would have no power to create the form of legislation that has been suggested here, namely, retroactive or repudiating legislation. Leaving that for the moment, whether it could or could not be done, whether the province should or should not repudiate its obligations, whether or not it is desirable that the provinces and the dominion should unite to create one form of consolidated security, as has been done in some countries, I only point out that to do so is a matter of tremendous difficulty, first because British Columbia, for instance, has a very large proportion of its debt payable in London, and it has a very substantial sinking fund, the largest of any province in the dominion. The province of Alberta has a very substantial part of its debt payable in the United States and part of it in Great Britain. The province of Saskatchewan is exactly in the same position, as are the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario. Quebec has a lesser part of its debt payable in the United States, a larger part payable in Great Britain and Canada, and the two provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have debts which are payable at home and in Great Britain, with some small sums payable in the United States; while the small debt of Prince Edward Island need not be considered. To consolidate the debts of the provinces would involve either consent on the part of all who hold the securities in Great Britain, the United States, Canada, and other parts of the world, or the repudiation by the provincial legislatures of the obligations created. Can we contemplate the latter, and can we enforce the former?

Second, with respect to the dominion, it will be recalled that Mr. Goschen made the great conversion of British obligations under circumstances that involved freedom of choice on the part of the holders of the securities in the first instance, even as Mr. Chamberlain did with respect to his two and a half per cent loan. But in Mr. Goschen's plan there was a provision that compelled the holders to convert after a certain given length of time had elapsed. It will also be recalled by those who are students of history that Mr. Gladstone at first supported this view and later, because of its involving repudiation of a contract, he departed from his support to Mr. Goschen and took another view. I put to the house this simple proposition: Can this Dominion of Canada, a young country seeking capital, on the threshold of greater development than it has hitherto had, maintain its position among the nations of the world if we now either default or repudiate? Those are the alternatives and we might as well face the situation frankly. To default would be something that would cause every man, woman and child in this country capable of thinking, great food for thought. Canada has not been built up by men and women who are anxious to repudiate the obligations created by themselves or their fathers.

As to the second point, repudiation, we have, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) said a moment ago, in the United States of America a large debt, that is the debt of the railway companies which is guaranteed by the dominion and the provinces. With respect to that part of our debt guaranteed by the provinces, the dominion has assumed responsibility for payment of the interest. For instance, in Nova Scotia, there is the Halifax and Southwestern; in Ontario, the Canadian Northern Ontario. In Manitoba the lines are so numerous I shall not take time to mention them. There are the Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern lines in Saskatchewan; the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern lines in Alberta, and the Canadian Northern British Columbia line in British Columbia. With respect to all those the dominion is paying the obligation not because of any agreement, but by reason of the consolidation of those roads into what is known as the Canadian National system. Those securities, as I said a moment ago, are held almost everywhere. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre seems to have some idea of the magnitude of the task in connection with these matters because he mentioned that there might be difficulties with respect to them. But the difficulties are quite the same whether they be direct obligations or indirect obligations of the country. The securities are held beyond the reach of our parliamentary arm.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the point I made.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But we could do this: We could say that we shall not pay more than three per cent upon any of those securities. What would that mean to the world? I just put it to the house: What does it mean to any of us? What does it mean if, with my note at the bank bearing interest at six per cent: I walk into the bank and say that I am going to pay three per cent. Do hon. members think I would borrow money there readily again? Someone suggests that the banks might be glad to get it. They might, if I had nothing but three per cent, but if I had anything more than three per cent with which to pay, they would probably endeavour to collect it.

With respect to a nation the position is somewhat different. You cannot sue a nation. You could not sue the Dominion of Canada. Who are the holders of these securities? They are primarily the insurance companies, primarily those who, for the purpose of meeting contracts maturing in the future, have invested in these securities on the basis of their yielding somewhat a higher rate than three and a half per cent to take care of contingent losses that may arise by reason of fortuitous circumstances. Every hon. member, if he will think for just a moment, will realize, will understand that. Second, there are the estates in trust, trusts that have been created by, say a great foundation, for caring for the sick, the afflicted, or for scientific research. Hon. members know where, for instance, two or three of the large foundations have made their investments. Third, you come to the private trusts, cases in which families have provided for their children and grand-children and have invested their trust funds in the securities of the country on the assumption that they would pay the rate of interest which they had promised to pay. Lastly, there are those private investments which have been made by individuals for their old age.

Let me give the house just one illustration of the other side of the picture. The other day I had a letter from a gentleman who said: "I am an old man." He gave his age; I cannot quite remember, but I think it was in the vicinity of seventy. He said: "During my life I have saved so many dollars which I have invested in Dominion of Canada bonds, and I hope, Mr. Bennett, they are not going to reduce the rate of interest, for if they do I cannot live." That is the last class I put before the house, and I have gone over them all. There seems to be an idea in the minds at least of some people, that the rich hold all those securities. As a matter of fact the rule generally is that the rich vary their investments, because it is an essential rule of the Anglo-Saxon people in connection with investments that they should be varied and that too much should not be invested in any one security. The result is that the Anglo-Saxon, shall I say, contemplates the possibility of there not being a loss in everything, so his investments are scattered over a wide field. Nothing will convince hon. members so clearly upon that as to look, some time when they may have an opportunity, upon the inventory of the estate of a deceased Englishman of some wealth, who has died in England and whose will may have come here for probate. It will be found that he has varied his investments; he has very seldom any large sum in any one security, but he scatters his investments over everything in which he can invest. I have given the list of those with whom we have to deal.

Now let us go back. First of all we come to the small man and we tell him that we are not going to pay any more than three per cent on his investment. I have indicated to the house how he feels about the matter. I go to the trusts and it may mean the difference between just an existence and inability to keep their heads above water on the part of those who are dependent upon funds from a trust. I go to the next, the public foundations, and there I find an immediate curtailment of revenue. Who has not looked at the list of securities held by the universities and observed the curtailment of revenue that has taken place during the last few years? Who has not looked upon the investments of great foundations and observed the result? Then I come to the insurance companies which have to publish a list of their investments, and hon. members who are interested in these matters and have followed them will realize the extent to which this action of repudiation on the part of our country would affect that business. I thought the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), who said we do not often agree, was perfectly fair when he said these considerations are present in my mind every day of my life; so long as I am in this position that will continue to be so. There is no other single problem about which I have thought so much, to which I have given more attention or in which I have sought information from as many sources, there is no field of information that I have not explored from the standpoint of securing the views of those who might be able to assist us.

I am not unmindful of what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre with respect to our tax exempt securities. I have analyzed that matter too. I may say that I did not favour tax exempt securities, but that does not prove a single thing in the world except that my opinion at that time was one thing and other people who had the responsibility which I did not have held a different opinion. But I just put this to this house: despite what has been suggested to the contrary these tax exempt securities are held largely by estates. I happen to know of two or three cases; the first thing they did, when they came into funds, was to pay a premium and avail themselves of the opportunity of investing in tax exempt bonds, because they felt there might be such an increase in the income tax that the revenue which was looked to for certainty would thus become uncertain and unstable, whereas with a tax exempt bond, even bought at a high premium, there was absolute stability and security as to the revenue that would be derived from the trust. It will amaze hon. members of this house, on investigation, to learn the extent to which these securities have been issued in bearer form, and in that form they have been scattered over almost every country in the world. The coupons come in,

I should not say from every country in the world but from an amazing number of countries. They have been a favourite form of presentation, shall I say, for trust purposes. A godfather desires to give a child a present; he selects a thousand dollar bearer bond of the Dominion of Canada, tax exempt, bearing interest at 5½ per cent. A small trust fund of a few thousand dollars is to be set up; this is a favourite method to be followed. A larger trust fund, perhaps a foundation, desiring to have a certain revenue to a fixed date, 1937, may also follow this method. While my mind is always open to conviction and my opinions change with enlightenment and knowledge, I can only say that I have formed the opinion that no effective conversion of this country's obligations, nationally, can be carried out in any proper form as long as those tax exempt securities are outstanding, and that means 1937, three years hence.

I merely give this to the house as my view at the present moment, not that it might not change, and I may say that this is nothing new as far as I am concerned. If hon. gentlemen are interested they will find that when I sat where the hon. member for West Edmonton now sits, or in the seat beside him, I urged this house and the then Minister of Finance to enact legislation that would compel the insurance companies to invest their reserves in a consolidated debenture of the Dominion of Canada carrying interest at 4 per cent. Financial papers denounced that as confiscation, and nothing came of the suggestion. During the war, however, we did insist that the insurance companies should invest their reserves in our bonds, and they did so. I am happy to say that as a result of the action that has been taken by the administration during the last few months and years there has been an increasing investment by the insurance companies in Canadian securities. Those of you who are interested will find, from a perusal of the reports made by the insurance companies, the extent to which that is so. Only last week, for instance, a financial gentleman here from New York told me that one of the greatest private investment houses in the world suggested the buying of Canadian securities. In a world of suspicion, of doubt and unrest; in a world where values have been so changed by legislative action and experiment, where the standard of values has been changed from week to week and month to month, whatever else may be said, at the moment this country enjoys the reputation of having met its obligations in the terms of its contracts. I have been laughed at for making those observations; I do not mind that. We have the reputation of having maintained our financial integrity during all the stress and strain through which we have passed. It might be of interest to some of those who attack what we have been doing to read the observations made in that regard in the Senate of the United States and in some continental parliaments.

We have been governed by two considerations, Mr. Speaker. One has been that if we desire to convert, as we do, we can do so only by maintaining our integrity to the last dot, in order that conversion will have about it some evidence to ensure that we will pay what we undertake to pay. The second consideration has been that in making a readjustment and conversion in this country, with our geographical position and with the richest country in the world immediately to our south, and with our obligations scattered throughout the world and payable in three countries, Great Britain, Canada and the United States, we must hesitate before we endeavour by legislative action to repudiate the contractual obligations we have incurred with those who have loaned us their money. Those considerations have guided your government in endeavouring to deal with these problems. We have a clear sense of the necessity of reducing interest charges and we have reduced them by $9,000,000, but that has been almost made up by the additional borrowings we have had to make in order to meet the situation.

There is one other point we must keep in mind, sir, before we can talk about conversion at all, according to the advice given me by what I conceive to be the soundest financial men in the world, whether they be in Great Britain or in the United States. We must deal with our railway problem, for there can be no conversion of our national obligations as long as we have to provide a million and a quarter dollars per week for the railway deficit. To-day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) tabled the supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1934, this year, and you will observe that the sum for which we are now asking is $52,263,819.65, plus certain additional sums with respect to the maritime freight rates, which have already cost us $6,600,000, and with respect to the West Indies service, to which we are obligated by treaty. Sir, the entire obligations of the Canadian National for last year necessitate the taxpayers of this country finding $68,000,000, or something over a million and a quarter a week. Of course it is easy for hon. members opposite to say we cannot do this thing. The answer, sir, is that we have done it and we must do it or lose our reputation. There is no half-way house. There can be no caring for the poor, no caring for our population unless our reputation is maintained so that we may secure additional funds for the development of this country. And it is for the purpose of enabling us to deal with our own people and deal with the problems of the future that we have been so much concerned about the maintenance of our credit. So long as that million and a quarter a week stands as an obligation for the Canadian people to meet, I believe, sir, that the problem of conversion is almost, if not wholly, insuperable. That is the reason we asked this house and the Canadian people to give the greatest possible opportunity to the trustees to enable them to demonstrate the extent to which it may be possible to restrict losses, to restrict expenditures and to maintain some service on our railways for the Canadian people. That is the reason. And of course you cannot have palace cars running into remote communities; you cannot have daily service; you cannot have two trains running where one will do the business, if we are to accomplish anything.

If I knew of any other way than the one this board of trustees is endeavouring to follow, I would gladly suggest it to this house and ask parliament to accept it. For, might I say to hon. members, as Canadians, that there are matters in connection with which party considerations never cross one's mind. With respect to raising the revenues to meet the tremendous obligations of our country I do not think even our bitterest enemies could suggest that considerations other than those of necessity have governed the action which we have taken and must continue to take.

It is all right, Mr. Speaker, for our friends to criticize; it is all right to condemn—but for the moment the responsibility is ours. The obligation to maintain the credit of Canada rests with us, not with them. And despite the weaknesses of frail humanity, we strive day and night, to the extent of our physical strength and our intellectual power to devise ways and means that this country may not repudiate its obligations, lose its financial reputation and bring disaster and ruin upon our people. In that task we have succeeded, and with that task we will engage ourselves so long as we occupy the position we are now occupying. Whether or not any good purpose can be served by the production of masses of figures to show that men cannot pay the debts which they promised to pay is open to question. The other day I dealt with a group of mortgage organizations, showing them that the farmer would have to produce two bushels of wheat to pay the debt which he was able to meet with one bushel when he incurred it, but all that is not a reason why we should repudiate our debts. It is a reason why we should endeavour to place the farmer in a position where he will get sufficient money to be back where he was when he incurred his debt.

That is the difficulty with all debts payable within a term longer than a year. Any debt payable within a term longer than a day is based upon the possibility of there being great changes. No man knows when he promises to pay $1,000 three years hence with interest at five per cent per annum that commodity prices which would enable him to discharge his obligation with X bushels of wheat or X bushels of potatoes shall have so changed that he will have to pay X-plus in every instance. In some days it has been X-minus. I recall debts in western Canada which were paid off with three dollar wheat. I recall debts in western Canada paid off with two-dollar wheat—debts which were incurred on the basis of $1.25 or $1.40 wheat. I recall these things, because for thirty-seven years I lived in western Canada, and I am not unmindful of the fact that debts incurred on the basis of commodity prices being X have been paid when commodity prices were X-plus; and the "plus" was so great that it could hardly be recognized, with respect to the X to which it was added.. These are facts as old as time itself, as old as the world. I suppose it is the reason why every fifty years they had a jubilee and the debts of the ancient regime were forgiven. That is probably the reason, because interest is no new thing. It is not anything which has been discovered in the twentieth, the nineteenth, or the fifteenth century. It is as old as the very foundations of our civilization, that when a man borrowed money from another he paid for the use of it, and by and by this began to be called interest. Whether or not it has been a wise practice is not for me, with my limited knowledge, to say. This I do know, however, that this magnificent structure of life insurance which we have built up, this magnificent structure of insurance which has dominated the whole of our civilization is predicated upon the fact that money will earn something by way of interest in order that contracts contained in policies may be paid.

I have spoken longer than I had intended. I only desire once more to say that everything connected with this problem, to the extent that we may be able to investigate it, and with our limited power of understanding it—everything that can be done is being done, having in mind the necessity for converting the debt of this country to a lower rate of interest than that which now obtains.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I rise to a question of privilege. In his speech the right hon. Prime Minister stated that the hon. member for Bow River stood for the incurring of debts and then not paying them, I have never made any such statement either publicly or privately, nor do I hold such views. If the right hon. gentleman had only—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The right hon. gentleman was perfectly in order in drawing the inference he did. He may have misunderstood the hon. member for Bow River, but that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I now definitely and unqualifiedly deny any such contention.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has taken part in the debate in this house, and he will have the opportunity to do so again. Shall the motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

National health—
The administration of the acts respecting food and drugs, opium and narcotic drugs and proprietary or patent medicines, including the laboratory of hygiene, $130,000.
Public health engineering, $15,880.
Marine hospitals, including burial expenses of destitute deceased mariners and grants to institutions assisting sailors, $163,500.
The administration of the acts respecting quarantine and leprosy, $150,000.
Immigration medical service, $126,920—Total, $10,334,500.

Mr. HOWDEN: Would the minister explain the reduction of $10,000 in the first item?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The amount actually expended last year was $126,818, and it is proposed to vote $130,000 this year. It will be noted that there is a reduction in nearly all of the items in this vote, which is due to the general policy of economy.

Mr. REID: Would the minister explain the reduction in the item for immigration medical service?

Mr. MacLAREN: The appropriation of $126,920 is to cover the cost of medical examination of prospective immigrants prior to embarkation and on arrival at Canadian ocean ports in accordance with section 3 of the Immigration Act, which stipulates that persons who belong to the prohibited classes on account of physical or mental defects shall not be permitted to settle in Canada except as provided in the act. It also covers the operation of immigration hospitals at ocean ports for the observation, care and medical treatment of immigrants needing the same; also the hospitalization of passengers and crews suffering from minor infectious diseases; also the medical examination, care and certification of deportees.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is the inspection service still being maintained in Europe for these cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes. We have one medical officer at Paris and one each at the following ports: Hamburg, Antwerp, Belfast, Glasgow, Liverpool; and two in London.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is a considerable reduction in the number of these doctors?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, very considerable. It is less than half the number of immigration officers employed some few years ago. There is close cooperation between this department and the Department of Immigration, and it is on the advice of the Immigration department that these medical officers are placed in the cities I have mentioned, also as to the number employed. Then there are the roster doctors in Great Britain in addition to the regular immigration medical officers.

Mr. VENIOT: With respect to the item of $150,000 for the administration of the acts respecting quarantine and leprosy, would the minister explain the reduction of $12,000?

Mr. MacLAREN: The expenditure last year for the administration of those acts was $145,456.90.

Mr. VENIOT: And the vote this year is based on last year's expenditure?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, plus a small margin of about $4,500.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask if there is any idea of amending the act with regard to leprosy?—the Leprosy Act, I think it is called. For the benefit of the minister I may say that there is a rumour prevalent in the county of Gloucester, which I have the honour to represent, that it is the intention of the department to amend that act, and I should like to know if it is intended to amend the act this year.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is no such intention whatsoever. There has been no such proposal and no consideration of the question from that standpoint. Some eight or nine years ago under a previous administration the question of moving the lazaretto from Tracadie to some other place was under consideration by the department, but nothing was done. That is the only basis I can suggest for the rumour my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad to learn that there is no intention of amending the act this session. Has a permanent appointment yet been made of medical superintendent for the lazaretto at Tracadie?

Mr. MacLAREN: The appointment of Doctor Ryan was temporary, but he is filling a position which is considered permanent.

Mr. VENIOT: Could the minister state when that appointment will be made permanent? I do not object to the temporary appointee because I think the official is a good one.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot say. Most of the appointments now being made are temporary.

Mr. HOWDEN: Are the medical inspectors stationed at the various European centres on a salary basis or do they receive fees?

Mr. MacLAREN: The eight medical officers which were mentioned are on a salary basis, but roster doctors receive fees for their examination of immigrants from the immigrants.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like the minister to be a little more explicit in connection with the permanent appointment of a medical superintendent at the Tracadie lazaretto. If I understand the situation aright, this gentleman has been occupying the position for six or more months. He has moved his family there and the usual time of probation for a temporary appointment has passed. I feel that if the department would recommend to the civil service commission that a permanent appointment be made, it would be made.

While I am on my feet I should like to try to arrive at a better understanding between the minister and myself with reference to the question of appointments to the lazaretto brought up on March 17, 1933. At that time I asked the minister why the temporary appointment had not been made permanent, and the minister replied that the then appointee had been replaced by Doctor Peloquin, I understand from the department. The minister stated that the civil service commission was being requested to make another appointment. I expressed some surprise that the temporary appointee had been dismissed or laid off, and the minister replied that he could not give any reason for this action. The minister is reported on page 3114 of Hansard of 1932-33 as follows:

> I have stated to the committee that his temporary appointment was not confirmed by the civil service commission.

Later on I asked for all the correspondence between the department and the civil service commission, and when I received the file I found that it did not bear out the statement made by the minister. I do not wish to suggest that the minister knowingly gave the wrong information, but I have the file before me and I find that the commission informed the department that they were ready to issue a certificate for a permanent appointment to be effective November 21, 1932. This statement was made in response to a letter from Doctor Heagerty asking the commission if they were prepared to make a permanent appointment. The commission stated that the permanent appointment would be made effective November 21, 1932, provided that certificates of birth, health and character were submitted. According to the file, these certificates were submitted but there was some delay in making the permanent appointment due to the fact that the temporary medical superintendent was also port doctor for Caraquet and Shippigan. It was necessary that he should resign from these positions as he could not continue to hold them and remain medical superintendent of the lazaretto. It was stated that when these resignations had been sent in, the permanent appointment would be made. I find from the file that the temporary appointment was continued by the issuing of monthly certificates by the civil service commission up to and including January, 1933, at which time a certificate was issued for January and February. At page 21 of the file there is a letter from Doctor Heagerty to the civil service commission dated January 25, 1933, in which he notifies the commission that the services of the temporary superintendent would be no longer required because he had not given satisfaction to the department. That being the case, the commission did not issue further certificates. He was not dismissed because the commission refused to issue certificates. It is quite true that the commission did not issue further temporary or permanent certificates, but they did not refuse to do so; they simply accepted the statement of the department that the medical superintendent was not giving satisfaction and, therefore, a certificate should not issue. I find further from the record that the department asked the civil service commission to appoint another temporary superintendent from the supposed eligible list and to notify the then temporary superintendent that his services were no longer required. The civil service commission replied that they had nothing at all to do with the giving of notice to the temporary superintendent, that that was the duty of the Department of Pensions and National Health. The notice was then sent by the department. The commission notified the department that they could not make another appointment to replace the then medical superintendent because there was no eligible list. The doctors who had applied in the first instance had not qualified, with the exception of Doctor Hache. The commission stated that if the department desired to make another appointment, the vacancy would have to be advertised again. That was done. The minister informed me last session that the civil service commission did not issue the certificate, that it was their business, and that he had nothing further to do with it. According to the record I have here, sessional paper No. 337 that is not so. Now I am not criticizing the minister; I am merely stating facts, not in the way of criticism, but in order to have the record correct, and I say that either the minister was wrong in the information he gave me, or sessional paper No. 337 is wrong. I think the error was made when the minister stated that the commission had refused. The commission did not refuse, but they acted on the advice of the department, and in this regard I simply wish to have the record correct.

Mr. MacLAREN: I fail to see any difficulty or obscurity in the matter. I do not think Hansard will show that I stated that the civil service commission refused to appoint him.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say that. I read what the minister stated:

I have stated to the committee that his temporary appointment was not confirmed by the civil service commission.

That left the inference that the civil service commission had refused to issue the certificate, whereas it was the department that had refused to recommend the permanent appointment.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to know where that extract is from.

Mr. VENIOT: It will be found at page 3114 of Hansard, volume III, 1932-33.

Mr. MacLAREN: What are the exact words?

Mr. VENIOT: I have just read them:

I have stated to the committee that his temporary appointment was not confirmed by the civil service commission.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is quite right; I do not see any objection whatever to that.

Mr. VENIOT: The objection I have is that it left the inference that the commission had refused to give its ratification at the time.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is not the inference I draw from it.

Mr. VENIOT: There cannot be any other inference.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, I think there is another inference; and in any case it is not a question of inference but of the record—what I stated. There was a temporary appointment. That requires a certain number of months to be confirmed. Prior to the period of confirmation having been arrived at, the official of the department wrote to say that the appointment would not be satisfactory, or would be unsuitable, or words to that effect, and he asked that the advisory committee be reconvened. That is the action so far as the department is concerned.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not different from what I stated.

Mr. MacLAREN: Then the civil service commission took action and reconvened the committee, and the committee continued to carry out whatever it decided upon doing. That was not the action of the department; it was the action of the civil service commission and of its advisory committee.

Mr. VENIOT: That is exactly what I said, but there is no question about the inference having been left by the statement made by the minister on March 17, 1933, that the civil service commission had refused or refrained from issuing any further certificate to Doctor Hache on their own initiative. I contend that they did not do it on their own initiative but on the initiative of the following letter dated January 25, 1933, signed by J. J. Heagerty, M.D., chief executive assistant and addressed to Hon. W. J. Roche, chairman of the civil service commission, Ottawa:

Dear Mr. Roche,

As the department is of the opinion that Dr. Joseph E. H. Hache, who is occupying the position of physician to the lazaretto at Tracadie, N.B., in a temporary capacity, and who, as a result of a competition held by the civil service commission led the eligible list—

I may add that he is the only one that passed; the others all failed.

—for permanent appointment is unsatisfactory, I would request that you kindly arrange to reconvene the board to again consider the matter.

If you will have the kindness to notify Dr. Hache at the earliest moment that his services are unsatisfactory, I shall be obliged.

In response to that letter the civil service commission informed the department that it was not their duty to notify Doctor Hache, as he was a temporary appointee, but that it was withing the province of the department to dismiss him and their duty to notify him to that effect, which the department did.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is a pretty fine point, and I am not prepared to admit it. It may be right, but that is not the question that arose particularly, because it is necessary, as I understand, after a certain period for the commission to confirm the appointment or otherwise.

Mr. VENIOT: You asked the commission not to confirm it. That is what you did by this letter.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like the hon. member to use the exact words, because they are important in this connection.

Mr. VENIOT: I have read Dr. Heagerty's letter.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is true the commission was informed that the appointment was not satisfactory. Then it rests with the civil service commission to complete the act. I remember the discussion that took place at the time, and I recall the hon. gentleman asking why the department had asked for the position to be readvertised.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I asked that question.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not remember at all what answer I gave, but I do know this, that the department never asked for it to be readvertised.

Mr. VENIOT: No; the department asked that the civil service commission make another appointment, a temporary appointment, from what was supposed to be the eligible list.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, excuse me—

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, they did.

Mr. MacLAREN: But I say no.

Mr. VENIOT: But the record shows it.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. MacLAREN: The department wrote a letter to the civil service commission saying that the appointment was not satisfactory and asking them to reconvene the committee. I think the hon. member will find that in the letter.

Mr. HURTUBISE: In answer to a question a little while ago the minister said that the reason for the decrease in this estimate was that it was following the general policy of the government to practise economy, and then he mentioned eight regular medical officers in the different cities who are paid a fixed salary, and the roster doctors. Why could not the department practise economy by doing away with the regular doctors, leaving the work to the roster doctors only? Many thousands of dollars could be saved by putting the examinations under the roster doctors. Economy could be practised in that way.

Mr. MacLAREN: So far as the cost of the present number, I think eight, is concerned, that is a small number for our Canadian medical immigration officers to have in the whole of Europe. It is necessary for us to have two medical men in London so as to keep in touch and consultation with the immigration officials. It is also necessary in the large centres such as Liverpool, Glasgow, Belfast, to have our own men who are responsible to us and who, if they are not qualified to carry out a very important duty, would require to be replaced by other efficient examiners. There is this very great difficulty of having immigrants found, on their arrival in this country, to be unsuitable owing to their physical conditions and therefore having to be retained until they are sent back to their homes. These are people who come out here, who have sold their property, their chattels and furniture and who have made all preparations to take up a new home in a new country, and I do not think it would be wise to depend entirely on roster doctors who are living on the other side and over whom we could not have the same authority and supervision.

About six years ago we had twenty-eight medical officers in Europe. We now have eight. I think my hon. friend will admit that economy is being practised and that the numbers are being brought down to the irreducible minimum.

Mr. HURTUBISE: What are those regular doctors paid? Are they paid a fixed salary?

Mr. MacLAREN: The senior medical officer in London is paid $4,620; the next in London receives $3,720. In London there is an office with a clerk at a salary of $1,860, a second clerk at $1,800, a stenographer at $1,380 and another clerk at $840. As regards the other cities, there is a medical officer at Liverpool at a salary of $3,360; one at Glasgow at $3,480 with a stenographer at $1,380; at Belfast a medical officer at $3,480; at Paris one at $3,480; at Antwerp one at $3,480 and at Hamburg one at $3,480.

Mr. HURTUBISE: What is the fee for the roster doctors for examinations?

Mr. MacLAREN: Ten shillings, I understand. Formerly the roster doctors were paid by the dominion and British governments, each paying half. At the present time they are paid ten shillings, but not by the Canadian government.

Mr. HURTUBISE: My reason for asking these questions is this: The minister has just told us that the number of doctors has been reduced from twenty-eight to eight. We have been told many times in the last three or four years that the doors were closed to immigration. If so, I do not think we should have a reduction from twenty-eight to eight, but we should have a reduction from twenty-eight to nothing, leaving to the roster doctors the work that is left.

Mr. HEAPS: How many examinations did those doctors hold last year?

Mr. MacLAREN: Let me answer my hon. friend immediately opposite (Mr. Hurtubise) first. It is true that the doors are said to be closed to immigration, but that is to some extent a poetic phrase; it is only comparatively the case. I recall that last year the discussion was as to why we should have a medical officer in Paris; that surely he could not have very much to do there. As a matter of fact more medical examinations are made by our medical officer in Paris than by any of our other officers in the large cities. In Paris last year 1,173 examinations were made by the medical officer. That is the largest number made in any of the communities. The next largest was in Antwerp, 951; Hamburg, 784. It is true that the immigration is very small.

Mr. HOWDEN: Has the minister been able to trace false passes or examinations to the roster doctors? He mentioned a few moments ago that it had been necessary to turn back at Canadian ports some immigrants who had been allowed to embark and he set this forward as a reason why a regular staff of examining doctors should be retained in European centres. Have applicants who have been passed by roster doctors been found to be less suitable than those who have been passed by the regularly employed staff of physicians?

Mr. MacLAREN: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I did not say that this had actually occurred. I say that there is more likelihood of such immigrants being passed by roster doctors than by our own. Why? Our own medical men over there are immigration medical officers and that only. They are trained in that work; it is their daily task. That is a different matter from picking up a country practitioner in any part of England. I do not say that I can actually make a comparison; but I say they are better qualified, their opportunities are much greater and they are much more likely to make a careful and accurate examination than are the ordinary men scattered throughout the country. I do not wish to discredit the roster doctors because they are a useful part of the organization and a convenience to the people in their homes. If they find any difficulty they can always refer to our own men.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was just going to ask if the majority of these examinations were not actually made by the roster doctors in the various parts of the country.

Mr. MacLAREN: Last year the roster doctors made 1,263 examinations.

Mr. HURTUBISE: With regard to Canadian doctors who have been appointed to posts in different European countries, I should like to know if their travelling expenses to their posts and back to Canada are paid by the government.

Mr. MacLAREN: Their expenses are paid when they go but I think the practice has varied with regard to their expenses back; some have been paid and some have not. Some of them have asked to remain where they were sent, and naturally their return expenses were not paid. I do not wish to make a definite statement; I know their expenses are paid when they leave here, and on returning I think they are made an allowance for travelling expenses that is considered fair and reasonable.

Mr. HURTUBISE: Is it understood that when they retire or are dismissed their return expenses are paid?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are paid when they are sent over.

Mr. HURTUBISE: But what about their return expenses?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am not quite sure; I will have to look that up. I believe in most of the cases some allowance has been made.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like the minister to give the committee, if he has the information, the number of examinations made by Canadian government doctors of persons emigrating to this country. I think the minister did give one or two ports, and I should like to have the total.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have the figures here of the immigrants arriving at Canadian ocean ports.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not want the number of immigrants arriving at Canadian ports; I want the number of emigrants examined by Canadian government doctors at the various points in Europe where they are stationed.

Mr. MacLAREN: There were 824 examinations in London, 321 in Liverpool, 475 in Glasgow and 230 in Belfast, or a total of 1,850.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister the information with regard to the other ports?

Mr. MacLAREN: There were 1,263 examinations by British roster doctors and 2,908 examinations by Canadian medical officers on the continent.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice that at some points there are only eight or ten examinations a week. Are we paying those medical officers $3,400 a year to make those examinations?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are paid that salary, which includes their living expenses and rent, and which in the case of married men supports their families.

Mr. HEAPS: If about 400 examinations are made at a cost of $3,400 a year, does the minister not think that is rather expensive as far as the government is concerned?

Mr. MacLAREN: These men are qualified medical practitioners and the positions cannot be filled except by those who have acquired a medical education. I believe these men are worth their cost which in any case is not large. What was my hon. friend's calculation as to the number of examinations?

Mr. HEAPS: In Belfast there were only 230 examinations a year.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am taking the total, which is 6,021. If that is divided among the eight medical men it means something like 752 examinations by each man per year.

Mr. HEAPS: That is just a little over two a day, is it not?

Mr. MacLAREN: It must not be assumed that this is the only work they do. They have charge not only of the seaport at which they are located but of a large area in addition, and they supervise and check up the roster doctors. I do not say it is a very laborious position, but the work is necessary and important. I think the exclusion of unhealthy people is an important matter, and I do not know of any other system by which you could carry on this work at the same low cost.

Mr. LUCAS: I notice that the vote for the administration of the acts respecting quarantine and leprosy has been reduced by $12,000. Has there been a reduction in the number of lepers in Canada. Where are lepers housed at the present time, and is scientific medicine making any progress in curing the disease?

Mr. MacLAREN: At the present time there are fifteen cases of leprosy in the two lazarettos, one at Tracadie in Gloucester county, with which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) is familiar, and the other at William Head in British Columbia. The cases at the William Head lazaretto are confined to Chinese, there being five of them. Of the ten at Tracadie only four are Acadian. The history of leprosy goes back about ninety years in that area of the country. I can recall visiting Tracadie lazaretto about thirty years ago, at which time there were between twenty and thirty cases, all from the surrounding district. To-day out of a total of ten there are only four cases which have come from the sea coast area, or are connected with Northumberland and Gloucester. It is interesting to note that the last case from the surrounding country was in the year 1919. In other words, there have been no new cases of leprosy drawn to the attention of the authorities for fifteen years. That, I suggest, is a hopeful outlook, and I believe we may look forward with confidence to the disappearance, within a reasonable number of years, of the affliction. In most cases the illness is long, and ten years is not long in its history.

Then, I believe I was asked the results of treatment. My reply is that more especially in recent years, good results have been obtained. Occasionally the case becomes quiescent or inactive, and I believe this development is becoming more prevalent.

Mr. LUCAS: Have any cases been cured?

Mr. MacLAREN: I would rather put it this way: Have any cases been arrested? If I asked my hon. friend how many cases of tuberculosis were cured he would not answer me. He would say, "Well, they have been arrested, or apparently cured." To say that an ailment is cured is making a very strong statement, especially when we are referring to tuberculosis or anything of that nature. I say that the progress of the application has, in some cases, been arrested and, in a few, apparently cures have been made. I do not like to say definitely however that a cure has been made.

Mr. LUCAS: Have they been arrested sufficiently to leave the hospital?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, several of them. I am reminded that one patient is leaving Tracadie to-day because of the fact that the condition of the patient has become arrested. Sometimes patients are examined for a year or longer to make sure that the bacillus of leprosy is not present.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I must come back to the appointment of a medical officer at Tracadie, because I feel it is of great importance that a permanent appointment should be made immediately. In order to back up my statement I wish to place on record a certificate signed by J. J. Heagerty, chief executive assistant, Department of National Health. On the same certificate are the words "I concur" over the signature of "Mr. MacLaren, Minister of Pensions and National Health." The certificate is as follows:

Certified that the position of medical officer, grade 1, Tracadie, New Brunswick (H-Q-95), will become vacant on November 23, 1932, in consequence of the retirement of Doctor J. A. Langis.

I am now referring to a permanent appointment.

This position is that of medical officer in charge of the leper station at Tracadie and it is considered that the public interest will suffer if the position is not filled.

Then, the following is a letter dated September 15, 1932, from J. J. Heagerty, M.D., chief executive assistant, addressed to the secretary of the civil service commission:

Your File H-Q-95

Dear Sir:

With reference to your communication of the eighteenth August, regarding the position of medical officer, grade 1, at the lazaretto, Tracadie, N.B.

I am now forwarding requisition for permanent appointment in this case. It is essential that this position be filled by a permanent appointee and I am attaching a certificate signed by the hon. the minister to this effect.

As Dr. J. E. Hache has been declared the successful candidate, it is requested that a certificate of permanent appointment be issued in his case, with effect from the 23rd November, 1932.

This position is included in the recommendation to the treasury board, as called for in the minute of that board dated July 18, 1932, and provision for salary has been made in the vote concerned for the present fiscal year.

I have another letter on the file, dated Ottawa, September 30, 1932, and addressed to J. A. Amyot, deputy minister of Pensions and National Health, and signed by W. Foran, secretary of the civil service commission. It reads as follws:

Dear Sir,—

Re permanent filling of a position of medical officer, grade 1, Tracadie, N.B.

With reference to the question of the filling of the above position in connection with which you forwarded a requisition for permanent appointment, 6-275-B of the 15th instant, I am directed to ask you to advise as to the grounds on which you consider it necessary to make a permanent instead of a temporary appointment to this position.

The reply to that from Doctor Heagerty, addressed to the civil service commission, is as follows:

Ottawa, October 5, 1932.

Your File H-Q-95

Dear Sir,—

I have your letter of the 30th September, on the subject of the application made by this department for the permanent filling of the position of medical officer, grade 1, Tracadie, N.B.

The appointee to this position is responsible for the custody and treatment of lepers detained at the lazaretto. This calls for his full-time services, and he is not allowed to engage in private practice.

As the lazaretto is more or less isolated, during the winter months especially so, the medical officer in charge is called upon for a certain amount of self-sacrifice in the appointment of his duties.

One essential point is that the patients should have full confidence in the physician who is in daily contact with them as the medical treatment given is one of long duration and, very often, difficult to administer.

For the reasons given above it is considered advisable that only when absolutely necessary should a change be made in the appointment of the medical officer in charge of the lazaretto, and this vacancy therefore should be filled by a permanent appointment.

That was on October 5, 1932. I maintain, sir, that this position has been filled by temporary appointments since, I think, the month of September 1932, and I claim that now owing to the importance of the position, and basing my argument especially on the reasons given by the minister himself and by his officials as to the importance of a permanent appointment being made, no longer should there be a temporary appointee in charge of the lazaretto, but a permanent appointment should be made forthwith. I understand that the doctor in charge is quite capable, and I have no criticism to make of him. I suggest that he should receive the permanent appointment not only to carry out the wish expressed by the minister himself in 1932 but also to satisfy the needs of that institution.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am pleased to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am most willing that the medical officer there should be appointed permanently. He has been satisfactory, and has been well received by the people of the community. My understanding is that at the present time he is holding a permanent position temporarily, if I may say so. It has been the practice of council in the past year or more to make no permanent appointments, and that is the only reason that this official has not been appointed absolutely permanently. I shall, however, make another effort to have this appointment confirmed permanently. I am quite satisfied with the incumbent, and I am simply pointing out that the practice has been very general in the last year or two that appointments to the civil service have been temporary and not permanent.

Mr. VENIOT: With further reference to this appointment at Tracadie and to temporary appointments, in order to set out the position correctly I wish to place on Hansard some of the communications which I find on this file in connection with the first temporary appointment. At page 28 of the file I find a letter signed by Doctor J. J. Heagerty, M.D., chief executive assistant, addressed to the secretary of the civil service commission, Ottawa, and reading as follows:

Ottawa, November 21, 1932.

Dear Sir,—

With reference to your letter of the 30th September and my reply thereto of the 5th October, regarding the permanent filling of the position of medical officer, grade 1, Tracadie, N.B., rendered vacant through the retirement of Dr. J. A. Langis:

I should be glad to know if a certificate will be issued in the case of Dr. J. E. Hache. I would point out that at the present time Dr. Hache is occupying the position under temporary certificate which expires on the 30th instant, and this department, therefore, has no authority to pay his salary beyond that date.

I wish to put on record another letter signed by W. Foran, secretary of the civil service commission, addressed to Doctor Heagerty, and dated November 23, 1932:

Dear Sir,—

With reference to your communication of the 21st instant, file No. 6-275-B, and previous correspondence recommending the permanent appointment of Dr. Joseph Edmond Hache as medical officer, grade 1, in the quarantine branch of Tracadie, N.B., I am directed by the commissioners to inform you that in view of the particular nature of the work which this employee is performing they have agreed to his permanent appointment, effective the 23rd November, 1932.

A certificate of permanent appointment will be issued in his favour when the necessary evidence regarding his age, health and character is on file, in which connection Dr. Hache will be communicated with direct.

At page 26 of this sessional paper there is a letter signed by Doctor J. J. Heagerty, chief executive assistant, and addressed to J. E. Hache, leprosy lazaretto, Tracadie, N.B., and dated Ottawa, November 28, 1932:

I am informed by the civil service commission that a permanent certificate covering your appointment as medical officer in charge of the Tracadie lazaretto will be issued when the necessary evidence regarding your age, health and character has been furnished to the commission.

In order to prevent any delay, would you please have that information sent to the commission as soon as possible.

Another letter dated Ottawa, December 28, 1932, signed by Doctor Heagerty, and addressed to the secretary of the civil service commission, reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—

With reference to your letter of the 23rd November regarding the permanent appointment of Dr. J. E. Hache, as medical officer, grade 1, at Tracadie, N.B., I should be glad to know if you are yet in a position to issue the necessary certificate.

Which all goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that the department was anxious to have a permanent appointment made, and all the more reason now that that permanent appointment should be made without any further delay.

The next letter appears on page 22 of the file. It is dated January 17, 1933, and is from Doctor J. J. Heagerty to the secretary of the civil service commission. It reads:

Pending the settlement of the permanent appointment of Dr. J. E. Hache, medical officer, grade 1, at Tracadie, N.B., it is requested that the temporary certificate issued in his case be extended for a period of two months from the 1st January, 1933, in order that this department may be in possession of authority for the payment of salary due.

The next letter is found on page 21. It is dated January 25, 1933, and is from Doctor J. J. Heagerty to the Honourable Doctor W. J. Roche, chairman of the civil service commission. It reads:

As the department is of the opinion that Dr. Joseph E. H. Hache, who is occupying the position of physician to the lazaretto at Tracadie, N.B., in a temporary capacity and who, as a result of a competition held by the civil service commission lead the eligible list for permanent appointment, is unsatisfactory, I would request that you kindly arrange to reconvene the board to again consider the matter.

If you will have the kindness to notify Dr. Hache at the earliest moment that his services are unsatisfactory, I shall be obliged. May I have a copy of the letter you send to Dr. Hache.

There then follows a letter from Doctor Heagerty to Mr. Foran of the civil service commission. This is dated January 27, and reads:

Re: Position of physician to leper lazaretto, Tracadie, N.B.
Competition No. 22,160

Dear Sir,—

I am informed that Dr. Bourgeois, Tracadie, N.B., was one of the applicants for the position of physician to the leper lazaretto at Tracadie, but that his application arrived too late for consideration by the board.

As the services of Dr. J. E. Hache, who was temporarily appointed, have not been satisfactory, I have requested that the board be reconvened. Meanwhile, if it is permissible to do so, I should be obliged if you would let me have, confidentially, particulars regarding the qualifications of Dr. Bourgeois and the recommendations submitted in his case.

The commission replied that they had no record of Doctor Bourgeois having made an application in the first instance, and, therefore, the commission could not make any recommendation or give any details in that regard. The department had expressed in one of the letters the desire to have a temporary appointment made from the eligible list but then asked for recommendations from the commission with respect to Doctor Bourgeois and not with respect to the other applicants who were on record in the department. My main object in placing these letters on record is not so much criticism of the action taken by the department as to emphasize the necessity of having this appointment immediately made permanent. I desire to thank the minister for having stated that he will endeavour to have this done right away.

Mr. ROSS: There is one item covering public health engineering service, and I should like to know just what that includes.

Mr. MacLAREN: This appropriation is for the administration of the Public Works Health Act. It covers supervision as regards public health on railways, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation, and includes the enforcement of the regulations concerning water for drinking on vessels navigating the great lakes and the inland waters and on common carriers engaged in international and interprovincial traffic. It covers the supervision of the federal public buildings with a view to promoting the health of civil servants and other government employees. It includes the enforcement of the rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission pursuant to the treaty between the United States of America and Canada in connection with boundary waters. It deals with questions of public health which arise between these two countries. Perhaps the most important work carried on under this vote is the controlling and checking up of the proper supplies of drinking water on the great lakes and the rivers. I think there is evidence that this supervision has been effective in the diminution of typhoid fever among those travelling on these boats.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is a grant to be made to the Canadian Council of Social Hygiene?

Mr. MacLAREN: Not this year.

Mr. HOWDEN: I assume that most hon. members are familiar with the work being done by the Canadian Council of Social Hygiene. The movement originated in Toronto some years ago when a number of influential people formed themselves into a group, having realized the appalling inroads which venereal disease was making among the Canadian people and the people of the world at large. Through various forms of propaganda, such as the issuing of pamphlets and the showing of moving pictures, they managed to make a decided advance in the control and betterment of conditions. Among other activities, with the aid of the provincial and federal governments they established depots for the prevention and cure of venereal disease. The government has rightly taken control of leprosy and has provided the means to isolate and treat those who suffer from this disease but I repeat what I said in this house on another occasion, that I am perfectly safe in saying that for every case of leprosy in Canada there are probably a thousand cases of venereal disease. This disease is an even more serious menace to the Canadian people than leprosy. I appeal to the minister to reconsider his action in withholding this grant from the Canadian Council of Social Hygiene. I think better and more extensive results could be obtained by a grant to provide for venereal depots than will be obtained from a grant to lepers.

Mr. MacLAREN: I suppose the hon. member knows why the cases of leprosy are dealt with by the Dominion government. Naturally the department would like to assist in the amelioration of any serious condition, but the fact is that so far as leprosy is concerned there is no option, because it is laid down in the British North America Act; it must be. Therefore that question has never arisen. It has always been the case, and we are bound by it. The lepers were here in the country and that was the reason for carrying it on. So that you cannot compare the expense towards the treatment of venereal disease with the expense in connection with leprosy. The British North America Act says that we are to do it and it is done, and I am glad to say that I think it is quite well done. But the treatment of venereal disease is a different matter. I know that my hon. friend from Manitoba is greatly interested, as he should be, in public health matters and would like to see adequate measures taken to treat disease, but I do not think he faces this question: Is it to be done by the Dominion government or by the provincial governments? That is the question, and we know that at the present time, with few exceptions—as regards leprosy and looking after quarantine—disease in the different provinces is cared for by the provinces themselves. All that the federal government has done, and it has done a good deal in every way, has been to give a vote by way of encouragement and assistance to these different organizations; that is all. I wonder whether my hon. friend has ever suggested that it be advocated in the legislature of Manitoba? That I venture to think is the place in which it should be started. That is where the responsibility rests; the responsibility is with the provinces. I agree with my hon. friend regarding the importance and the desirability of treatment, and I look with satisfaction at what has been done by the Dominion government in many directions. It has given large contributions to the treatment of venereal disease, $200,000 at one time, I believe, for a certain number of years, and then the amount was reduced to $150,000 and $100,000 until it was discontinued. That was by way of helping to put the movement on its feet. The position is that the care of those diseases is provincial, much of it being for general education, and to enlist our sympathy and support. But after all it comes back to the provinces.

Mr. HOWDEN: The minister has just said that the grant towards the assistance of the provinces was for the purpose of putting the movement on its feet, but unfortunately the grant was withdrawn before the movement was sufficiently well established, and I question very much whether the provinces are in a position to carry on the work alone. In fact, it has been proved definitely, so far as Manitoba is concerned, that the work has had to be dropped. It certainly is a matter of national health, and a matter of very serious national health, that this work should be maintained, not provincially but nationally, and I daresay that all the provinces in the country that can afford to maintain it will continue to do so. But there are a large number of provinces that are not able to carry on venereal work alone, and if the federal government is concerned at all about the national health, certainly here is a place it could very well expend a little money; because I do not need to suggest to the minister the very appalling inroads which this disease was making among the Canadian people and the improvement that followed the establishment of these depots. The federal government can find sources of revenue through forms of taxation which are not open to the provinces, and now that it has withdrawn its support the work has had to be dropped in several provinces, and we can almost notice, from the time the work was held up, a deterioration in the health of the people.

Mr. ROSS: To return to the question of public health, does the department assume responsibility for the purity of water or food such as milk carried on the boats on the great lakes? Is there any international method by which the purity of water is controlled on boats going from one province to another or from the American to the Canadian side and vice versa?

Mr. MacLAREN: The engineering inspectors examine the water, taking samples of it which they send to the laboratories to be tested. They satisfy themselves, as far as it is possible for them to do so in such a large field, that the water is good and that the tanks on the steamers are sanitary. They also have supervision in connection with the water supply on ocean steamers, satisfying themselves that the water supplied to steamers is wholesome. They perform a very useful work and I cannot help feeling that we should be better off with more of them.

Mr. ROSS: Would they be restricted to supervision over certain water supplies, in ports, for example?

Mr. MacLAREN: Their services extend to international waters, to the large lakes, the river St. Lawrence and the seaports. I do not think they are restricted to any great extent. They have supervision over the sanitary arrangements on trains travelling from one province to another.

Mr. McGIBBON: I submit that either the minister should make this department worth something or it should be wiped out. It is almost useless to-day, a useless expenditure of money, and it should be one of the most important portfolios in the government. The health of the people is the greatest problem before the country. The loss from sickness, death, hospitalization and disability claims represents an enormous total, yet that colossal loss has not been dealt with by any parliament since I have had a seat in this house. I would like to impress upon the minister the importance of the job he has, and also to observe in connection with that, that the job has never been done nor attempted to be done.

The saving that could come to the people of Canada through an up to date health policy properly supported, would, to my mind, be greater than could be effected by anything else they could do. It would go a long way towards decreasing the interest on our national debt. Some years ago I figured this out and made a speech in regard to the matter, and I think the saving ran between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000 a year. The loss, however, is still going on and we in this parliament hide or protect ourselves behind the British North America Act. If we go into the provincial field, they tell us that they have not any money. Consequently the task had been carried out for years and years by the medical profession of this country. I think everybody realizes that owing to the depression this task cannot be carried out any longer by the medical profession. Hundreds of medical men are working daily and yet are on relief themselves. The task is not being and cannot be done in the way it had been in past years, yet it is one of the greatest problems we have. We vote a few dollars for purifying water, a task which is not carried out and which does not have to be carried out because the water in the different ports is looked after by the municipal authorities, and as regards the Department of National Health looking after sanitary conditions on trains, that is a joke. But I would like to impress upon the committee that in the Department of National Health there is a greater field for saving than in any other department of the government, and this task has never even been attempted. I would like to ask the minister if he cannot give that some thought and get some assistance in regard to hospitalization, premature deaths and disabilities that occur. Speaking from memory of some years back, I think about three per cent of the population are totally disabled. As regards the deaths, forty-two per cent are of external origin and consequently could be prevented, and twenty-five per cent of our people are inefficient to the extent of twenty-five per cent practically all the time. These are matters that could be cured or prevented. Could the minister not give some attention to that aspect of the question?

Mr. MacLAREN: I would like first of all to point out that as regards these engineers, because it is about them that we are speaking more particularly, their work cannot be dismissed with a wave of the hand. They are doing very good work. We know water is a very fertile source of spreading disease and these men are going a long way towards preventing that.

I am asked if I will do something to enlarge the scope of the Department of National Health. What does that mean? If it means that the federal government will, from a public health standpoint, care for the whole country, I should like all hon. members to appreciate the enormous contract that would be taken on by the dominion authorities. Whether a department carries out its work well or not depends upon what it sets out to do. The department is not attempting all these things; it is not its job. I do not say that the department would do it better, but I say that in the department a great deal of public health work goes on that is uncommonly well done. There is no department that says less about its work than the Department of National Health and the officials I happen to have with me. I do not suppose it is known by many hon. members that the officials of the health department advise over the radio as far as the arctic circle and that they are appealed to from all the outlying districts as to what should be done in case of disease and so forth.

I come back to the question. If we are going to discuss it, let us be frank. It means: Will the federal government take over the public health of this country? I think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) must mean that, and if that is what is proposed, it is an enormous proposition. I suppose I should not be expected to answer that in a hurried way without due consideration, but at the present moment I would say that the federal government will not take over the work. Every portion of the country must share its own responsibility.

Progress reported.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF COMMITTEE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): May I get the consent of the house to revert to motions to take up a matter that was overlooked when that order was called this afternoon?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent, the house will revert to motions.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved:

That the name of Mr. Fraser (Cariboo) be substituted for that of Mr. Stevens on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 20, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Second report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Senn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUBMISSION OF ANNUAL REPORT AND ESTIMATES TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). I believe he stated yesterday that the annual report of the Canadian National Railways would be tabled very soon. I would like to ask whether or not the government has decided on the establishment of the usual committee on the Canadian National Railways, and whether in that event both the report and the estimate which has just been submitted will be referred to that committee.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): On the day I table the report I intend definitely to answer that question, though I think there is no reason to believe that we would object in any way to the establishment of the committee, if the house desires. Apparently the house does, so we will probably establish it, and submit both the report and the estimate to that committee.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

SHIPS CLEARANCE PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) where navigators may obtain permits in French, when leaving various Canadian ports; and also, guide books relating to marine charts and tidal records. I received complaints from navigators, who, last year, endeavoured unsuccessfully to obtain these documents in French.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Name them.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): The question of the hon. member will serve as notice; I shall inquire and report.

MR. EDGAR BOUTET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, is the government aware that Edgar Boutet, employed as secretary to the executive of the Post Office Department at a salary of $2,100 per year, from December 1, 1933, was present in the Press Gallery during the sitting of the house, at various times, since the beginning of the session? Is the government also aware that said Edgar Boutet is still the correspondent of the newspapers "L'Illustration" of Montreal, and the "Journal" of Quebec, in which he writes false and unfounded articles about the members of this house? I should like the government to furnish me with full information relating to these two questions; moreover, whether the said Edgar Boutet is still in the employ of the Post Office Department; if not, when was he retired?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the private secretaries and chief executive clerks to ministers are, of course, political appointees, and in the main they discharge political duties. If it is thought desirable that one of the secretaries to a minister should attend in the press gallery for the purpose of giving information to his minister, it has been the custom to do so, and always will be, so long as the offices of secretary and assistant secretary obtain. I have no knowledge of this particular case, but I merely mention that is so with respect to these matters in general. Whether or not Mr. Boutet is engaged in supplying information to journals favourable to his chief I cannot at the moment say, but if he is I may say he is following a custom which has been pursued by men in his position since the position came into being, and will continue long after he has ceased to occupy his present post.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): This gives him no right to lie.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). The question was one I had asked previously, namely, on February 6, last. When the minister replied yesterday I was unable to hear him. The answer I saw in Hansard this morning is ambiguous, and does not convey anything. I shall put the question to him again. Is it the intention of the government this session to bring down any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My answer is very similar to the one I gave yesterday: The government has not considered the subject. Yesterday the hon. member asked whether it was the intention of the government to bring down legislation, and I said the answer was in the negative. In other words, the government has not considered the subject.

Mr. SANDERSON: If I may be permitted to say so, when I put the question to the minister on February 6, his answer was that the matter was under consideration.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall have to look into the matter and see what the circumstances were. Probably the circumstances at that time were different from those obtaining to-day.

SUPPLY

AMENDMENT PROPOSING COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO THE STATE OF THE NATION

Hon. EDGAR N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate on the address I stated that in my opinion "strong measures" would have to be taken to remedy the evils under which Canada is suffering. I further suggested that the most important of these measures could not be enacted into law or practice unless there was some degree of cooperation between federal and provincial authorities, and likewise between the various parties and factions in this house.

Some of those measures I propose to expound to-day, realizing of course that they are not all of equal value and importance, and further, that they could not all be put into execution at once. But I sincerely believe that most, if not all, of them are worthy of being considered without bias by every member of this house. I propose to offer them, so far as my temperament permits, in the most lenient and conciliatory manner. If, at times, my words sound harsh in the ears of some of my fellow-members, I pray them in all sincerity to disregard the sound and to consider the intention, which, I assure them, is altogether friendly and conciliatory.

In order to cover the ground, and as well to remain within the rules of this house, I think it proper to resort to a time honoured procedure of the British House of Commons, "that grand inquest of the nation," as it has been called for centuries; and therefore at the end of my remarks I shall move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), in amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply:

> That the house, while prepared to grant to His Majesty all necessary supply to carry on the administration of the country, is of the opinion that a special committee of the house should be appointed to inquire into the state of the nation and suggest prompt and effective measures of economic and social reform.

With regard to financial matters proper, I propose to be as short and concise as possible; first, because I have not the slightest pretension to being an expert in such matters, and secondly, because they have been and are daily being discussed in this house in various forms. May I say to the Prime Minister that I quite sympathize with him, in this regard? I read with pleasure and sympathy the remarks he made last night about the same questions coming up over and over again. Of course that is unavoidable; and my only purpose in referring to some of these questions is simply to cover the ground and indicate the action on finance, taxation, trade, and social reform, which I think is imperatively needed.

First—I will not say first in importance, but it is the most obvious factor in the situation—is the debt, federal, provincial, municipal, corporative, individual. Undoubtedly Canada, more perhaps than any other country, is overburdened with debt. Undoubtedly, again, it ought to be the main concern of every government, and I use the word government in the broadest sense to include not only political governments but industrial governments as well, to search unceasingly for some practical means of reducing that burden. Many have been suggested. My friends to the left, on various occasions in years past, and this year again, have suggested what they call the inflation or reflation of money, in order to increase the purchasing power of the masses of the people, and also to enable debtors to pay their debts with less money than they received. I have read much on inflation in theory, and also as applied in various countries of the world. Is it because of the infirmity of my mind, or perhaps because of what my good friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) termed once my infernal French logic? but I have not yet been able quite to agree with my friends to the left, as to the beneficial results of inflation.

When they speak of controlled inflation, well and good; but the experience of the world in the last ten or fifteen years—I might say centuries, because inflation is nothing new: Philip the Fair of France, in the fourteenth century, resorted to inflation in his own way; the French Convention, also, when it created the assignats; that was inflation with a vengeance—long experience and contemporary history teach us that controlled inflation soon becomes uncontrollable inflation.

But what makes me more doubtful still is the obvious fact frequently pointed out by the Prime Minister—and it ought to be obvious to all—that you cannot compare the situation of Canada with that of many other countries which have resorted to inflation. No system of economics can operate in exactly the same way in two or more countries situated in different circumstances. Canada has enormous natural resources to be developed in the future; but, at present, Canada owes not only to her own nationals, as does France for example, apart from her war debts, but we owe also to various countries, and more especially to the United States and England. How would a policy of inflation result in a settlement of our debt to England, on the one hand, and to the United States on the other? Of course, if you could get the British and American governments to maintain equilibrium between their currencies and ours, if you could get our British and American creditors, holders of our bonds, federal, provincial, municipal and railway bonds, to accept payment in terms of our own currency, well and good. But will they?

One of the main reasons given by our friends to the left was that a controlled inflation resulting, it was said last year, in bringing the Canadian dollar on a par with sterling, would have a tremendously stimulating effect upon the sale of our wheat, for example. If I remember aright, the pound sterling, as compared with our dollar, stood then around $3.50. It has been quoted for some weeks now at $5.10 of our currency; but I have yet to learn, either from the press or from any information given to this house, that the price of our wheat has risen in proportion to the downfall of our dollar. That is what it is; it is not the pound sterling which has gone up, it is our dollar which has gone down. Where is the benefit to the seller of wheat or of any other commodity in an inflation such as we have had?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Was that not the cause of the rise in the price of wheat last year?

Mr. BOURASSA: Perhaps it was. I am not conversant with those matters, I am simply suggesting that it has not had all the effects which it was expected it would have.

In discussing these questions of currency, inflation and deflation, and later on, taxation, my main concern is for that class of people which is not represented by any party in this house. The lower middle class do not belong to any labour organization, to any farmers' organization, to any manufacturers' association or to any organization of business men or social workers, in the broad sense of the word. They receive very little consideration at the hands of municipal, provincial and federal governments. In this country as in every other country, this class is the mainstay of social order; it is the cement which maintains a certain degree of harmony and conciliation between the various classes of the community. Inflation would ruin most of these people in Canada, as it has done in Germany, in France, in Italy. It seems to me that inflation is simply a policy of ruining Peter in order to enrich Paul, and Paul is not enriched in the long run. If you raise the prices of those things which you produce, you also raise the prices of things you need. The farmer, the labourer and everyone else is in turn producer and consumer. I am afraid it will take a much bigger brain than that possessed by any hon. member of this house to work out a sound policy on those lines; and we must have longer experience in order to be sure that the results will be permanent. I pass on.

Many words have been uttered with regard to a direct reduction of our debts. This matter was before the house last evening. I was only in the chamber a very short time and I had not the privilege of following the debate; but before coming down this afternoon I read carefully the speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). If one considers only the money question and the reflex action of brutal repudiation, in whole or in part, upon our credit abroad or our credit at home, the arguments propounded last evening by the Prime Minister are unanswerable. But I repeat, credit is not the only thing and the maintenance of the money power should not be our main consideration. I admit that the problem is baffling; but all efforts should be made to find a means of reducing our debts. So far as I am concerned, I think a partial repudiation, backed up by statements showing what we owe, what we earn, what our people can pay and what they cannot pay, would be more honest and less hypocritical than the so-called inflation policies which have been pursued by all governments in Europe, even by the British government when it went off the gold standard. We must prepare our creditors, both foreign and national, to accept from us, should the crisis last, a fair compensation. They will have to, in any event, in a few years. That is the only honest way in which a debtor nation can liberate itself; this should be the action taken by Canada to liberate the present and all generations to come. But if we are to present a statement of our financial situation to our creditors we must be prepared to place a levy upon the wealth of this country. This must be done to show our goodwill in meeting our creditors. Later on, when I speak of taxation, I shall have more to say of this.

As the Prime Minister said last evening, we cannot think of our indebtedness without considering the situation with which we are confronted in our railway systems. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), with whom I agree more often since he is no longer a minister of the crown, has courageously and openly suggested amalgamation. The genial and clever Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), whom curiously enough I like better since he has become a minister than I did when he was in opposition—as we say in French, he is a minister born although an Irishman—has intimated also that we must prepare for amalgamation. I am no expert; but as an old student of history I should like to express the view that it is always risky to adopt any measure of a permanent character in an effort to solve a great problem during a time of panic and crisis.

Mr. MANION: I do not like to interrupt, but if the hon. gentleman will permit me?

Mr. BOURASSA: Certainly; I have ample time to-day.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to have to correct my hon. friend but I have never intimated that we should prepare for amalgamation.

Mr. BOURASSA: Perhaps that is my French logic again; but I thought I could read that in the excellent speech which the minister delivered, I think on the second reading of Bill No. 25. But it does not matter, and I accept the minister's correction.

Instead of deciding immediately that there shall be no amalgamation or that there shall be immediate amalgamation, why not continue to utilize and extend, as an experiment, the provisions of the act passed last year and continued in Bill No. 25 passed at this session? I mean by this, to strengthen the control of the body created to harmonize our two systems, subject always to the supreme authority of the state. The state may be represented by this cabinet to-day, perhaps by that cabinet to-morrow or perhaps by the cabinet over here the day after.

An hon. MEMBER: Never!

Mr. BOURASSA: It does not matter; it does not make much difference. Napoleon the third, who finished his reign in folly, but who was a good conspirator and, like some of my friends in the three parties, a shrewd politician, once said to one of his ministers, "Never say never in politics."

Mr. BENNETT: Balfour said the same thing.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh yes, of course; it is obvious. It is very prudent.

I was going to say that whatever party is in power, it has not the right, in the fulfilment of its trusteeship to parliament and to the people of Canada, to abandon its supreme control over any body created by parliament for carrying out any of the powers of administration delegated by parliament to the government. But with that reservation of principle, I say that the body charged with the management of our railways should have much greater powers over what I call capital issues. It should receive—always with the same reservation—the power to suppress useless lines and to sell some of those costly hotels, ships and other works of luxury built up during our years of folly and extravagance. And, in conjunction with the state, it should devise means of reducing or contracting the debt of the two railways, both its capital stock and its debenture stock. Above all—and this I suppose is on the way towards accomplishment; at least I hope so—there should be an end to foolish capital expenditures; there should be stringent economy in operation, compatible with effective service.

In the Duff report a good deal has been made of the competition to which the railways are subject, thanks to the development of the truck and autocar service. May I repeat what I have stated more than once in this parliament, in the old days as well as in more recent times? Why do our great services, why do our governments never go outside the British Empire or the United States to look for examples? On this very question of automobile competition, had they gone to France, they would have found that the great railway companies in France, and more especially the Paris-Lyon-Méditerranée —the P.L.M.—instead of waiting until competition had become disastrous, instead of bewailing the condition, and asking for special legislation to maintain their monopoly, took hold of the road traffic and put into operation the most splendid automobile service that exists in any of the countries I know of; so that an Englishman can land at Boulogne or Calais, and traverse the whole of France, stopping at any place he likes, putting up at the best hotels or in more modest places, reaching the coast of Italy by way of that beautiful country, the upper Seine valley, the Rhone valley, the Côte d'Azur, right through, by means of autocars owned and operated by that great railway system. Why did not our chiefs of railways take a short trip to France to study that system before asking the provincial governments or the federal government to take steps to do away with the competition against them?

Mr. EULER: They were watching each other too closely.

Mr. BOURASSA: Just one word more with regard to railways. It has been frequently stated in this house that we are handicapped by the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is an independent company. Well, I cannot agree with that. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a creation of parliament. It was nourished by parliament, of course at the expense of the country. I do not say, unduly. I have the greatest admiration for the pioneers of that great system; and while I do not approve of every detail connected with it, generally I quite approve of the help given to the Canadian Pacific Railway by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald. But now, where are we? Where is the company and where is the country? Without discussing the manner in which it has been administered in the last ten or twenty years, without entering into details, I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway is now indebted to this country to a sufficient degree to force the government morally to interfere in its management; and I will say why. We have guaranteed a loan by the banks to that company of $60,000,000. The Prime Minister has said that that loan is amply covered by a block of shares deposited with the banks. In case of default, will those shares belong to the government or to the banks? If they belong to the banks, it is wrong. My experience in private life and my fairly long experience in public life has taught me that he who guarantees pays, directly or indirectly. Now, whether in order to see that the guarantee given remains good —what we call in French legal parlance "le gage du prêt"—or whether in anticipation of the day when the government will have to pay this $60,000,000 or a part thereof to the banks, it is the duty of the government to keep a close hand upon the administration of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to see that its finance is managed in such a way that not only will it maintain its own credit for the benefit of its shareholders, but also for the sake of our own treasury and for the sake of the people of Canada. I will put it in a short way, one which I am sure will appeal to my good friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid): He who pays the piper calls the tune. I might add that if I had anything to do with the payment of this piper I would sometimes call different tunes.

This brings me to government expenses. Again I lay down the general proposition that in the circumstances through which this country is passing, a complete stop should be put to every luxury expense, if I may call it so. In this respect I am sorry to differ from the Prime Minister. When I read in the newspapers that the American Senate had, for once in a century and a half, done Canada a great service by rejecting the St. Lawrence treaty, for the first time in my life I sang within myself, Hail Columbia! I do not say, mind you, that the time will never come when that great scheme, that great plan, cannot and ought not to be carried on. But I repeat the old Latin proverb: Est modus in rebus. We should never forget that.

An hon. MEMBER: What does that mean?

Mr. BOURASSA: There ought to be a mode and a time in doing things.

An hon. MEMBER: Chaque chose à son temps.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes. I lay down the same general proposition with regard to public works generally, but that I reserve for the chapter devoted to unemployment.

I come now to ordinary administrative expenditures, and I am beginning to enter ground upon which I am afraid I shall find myself in disagreement with most of my colleagues. I believe there should be a stiff reduction in several of the public services. Take the rural mail. I state frankly before the house what I have said in my own constituency: As representing a rural constituency I have always been opposed to rural mail delivery.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not say that.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is my opinion. I am expressing my own opinion with which my hon. friends may disagree. All I ask of them is to bear with me in patience as I have done for many days and nights when I have listened to them. I believe rural mail delivery has been of no real benefit to the farmers; it has helped to destroy rural life; connected with the postal delivery of the large departmental stores, it has helped to kill local trade, to destroy local activities, with the other consequences that I shall point out when I come to the social problems proper.

Again I am going to speak of a matter which probably will raise still more objection and protest. I refer to war pensions. In order to shelter myself, so to speak—although I am used to storm and bad weather—I shall quote two or three paragraphs of an article which appeared in a journal published in Ottawa, one never known to be a mouthpiece of rebellion or of extreme pacifism or of antipathy toward the returned soldiers. In an article published in the Ottawa Journal on October 13 last I read this:

In 1918, the number of those—returned soldiers—

—receiving pensions was 25,000. Five years later, 1923, the number had grown to 63,000. To-day it is over 90,000. Where in 1918, when the war closed, the cost of pensions in the treasury—

I suppose that means "to" the treasury.

—was a little over $7,000,000, it has grown in 1933 to over $40,000,000. More than 240,000 people in Canada—soldiers and dependents of soldiers—are helped by these pensions.

Then, as a comment, the newspaper says:

Canada has passed through three years of financial crisis. With hundreds of thousands of people unemployed, and purchasing power destroyed, and the crushed taxpayer unable to meet the treasury's demand for money to meet calls for debt and relief, the situation has been a desperately difficult one. Yet through these three years, notwithstanding a fierce need for retrenchment, the country has gone on paying war pensions, has added steadily and heavily to the pensions roll.

This is something which veterans, fair minded and responsible, should surely bear in mind. They must realize something of the country's position; of its declining revenues; of the obligations it has had to face; of the calls that have been made upon it and upon the country's financial resources.

I shall not insist any more upon that point to-day.

Now, over and above war pensions, we have a frightful increase in the payment of doles to the unemployed, with a threat of a permanent financial burden, placed upon the country, on account of an unemployment which will last until we adopt stringent measures to re-establish the balance between city dwellers and rural population. What is the result? First, as regards finance applied to social needs, the war pensions and the dole system are, and will remain for years to come, an insurmountable obstacle to the adoption of a set plan of social insurance for the benefit of all classes in Canada. Without reopening old sores, without discussing whether we were right in participating in the war, in enlisting, first voluntarily, then under pressure, and thirdly by conscription, the youth of Canada to go and wage a war foreign to America, may I put this question to any fairminded man in the house? Not only to my pacifist friends, but equally to the brave men who have shown their sincerity in going to war on their own account and have not contented themselves with preaching war to others and remaining at home to enrich themselves, as so many warmongers and patriots did from 1914 to 1918, I put this question: Is it really a moral obligation on the part of Canada to maintain a body of men with their wives and children, men who were induced to fight for four years out of Canada, to destroy life and property, in a just war if you like—I am not discussing that? If it is, what do hon. members think of our moral obligation to thousands of good men and women who have worked all their life in Canada, for Canada, to give children to Canada and money to the exchequer of Canada? Are we going to make them lose, after fifty years of hard life, all that they have saved, and then die in misery, in order, first, to pay our creditors 100 cents on the dollar, and, second, to keep up two privileged classes, the war pensioners and the dole receivers?

So far as ordinary government expenditure is concerned, I have only one word to say.

Let us not forget petty economies. It is the great defect of new countries, as of newly-rich people, of parvenus generally, to disdain small sources of revenue and petty economies. May I point out to the Prime Minister and to my good friend the Minister of Finance the example of a man who has left the reputation of not being a small man, of having some little knowledge of economics, who was, whatever may be said of his policies generally, considered one of the best finance ministers of England? I refer to Gladstone. When Gladstone was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer the first time, what did he do? Before launching his great program of financial reform he began by finding out how much money was wasted in each department in the purchase, or rather the stealing, of pencils and pens and paper and ink and that sort of thing. Of course he was derided; his first budget was called the pen and pencil budget; but the year following he was able to point out that on that single item some £40,000 had been saved to the country. Now, sir, in the days that we are traversing, it ought to be the concern of every spending body or individual, from the federal government down to the humblest farmer and the poorest labourer, to look to small things, to small economies and small sources of revenue. At the beginning of the great war I was struck with an observation made by an American travelling in France. You know, these Yankees, when they stop for a moment boasting they are the biggest country on earth, that they do all the big things and that all the other nations are effete and tardy, can be very clever and very acute observers. Do you know what that traveller said, I think it was in October or November, 1914? He said: One of my reasons for believing that France will win out in the long run is because of the science and practice of domestic economy by the women of France. Let us remember that. I ask my excellent friend, the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) to devote some of her energy to teaching domestic economy to her women followers.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not intend to.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have now to deal with a still more disagreeable subject, that is taxation. But we have to face it. We do not want to repudiate our debts—I accept the word of the Prime Minister. We have not yet found a means of restricting them. There remain only two things—curtailment, stringent curtailment of expenditure, and increase of taxation.

In that connection I want to point out the reasons for a capital levy. At first sight such a proposal is distasteful; all taxation is distasteful. Unfortunately this suggestion has been presented, not only in Canada but in most countries, by socialists, by would-be revolutionists, under the name of conscription of wealth. I might ask, as has been asked frequently: If it was right to conscript men to destroy, is it wrong to conscript wealth to reconstruct? But I will leave that aside. If the men of wealth, if the great corporations of this country understood the situation as it is, there would be no need to conscript wealth; they would themselves enlist freely, voluntarily, and help in reducing the debt. For my part may I say that after forty years of assiduous labour I have been able to put aside, out of the money I earned from year to year, about $25,000. I suppose my friends to the left will not consider me as a wicked capitalist. I had a little inheritance which, as I felt in duty bound to do, I have transmitted intact to my children. What I received from my parents I reserved for my children; and as soon as they come of age I give them their share according to what I consider their merits. The other is what I have saved. Now I tell you quite frankly that I would be mighty glad to give, out of that $25,000, $1,000 to the government to help reduce the debt. But it should be on three conditions: first, that every Canadian should pay his share in the same proportion; second, that the whole of that contribution should go to the reduction of debt; and third, that by courageous measures of economy and taxation, budgets should be balanced hereafter. By doing so I would consider my $1,000 well placed.

The difficulty is that big business men, with their genius and perhaps also their greed, will not pay their share voluntarily; but I think the time has come for governments, starting with the federal government, to educate public opinion, and particularly the opinion of those who possess, that such a form of taxation, far from being a measure of confiscation, would be the safest measure of conservation. Once they have been taxed in order to alleviate the burden of public debts, once the economic situation generally has been bettered by such a diminution of debt, then their affairs will grow, and what they keep of their wealth will be better preserved by having paid some of it to maintain or rather to restore the finances of the country, than by trying to enjoy it unduly until the crash comes.

But there is more than that, sir. Of course I admit that I am an old-timer and have queer ideas. At times I seem to be the representative duly appointed, morally speaking, of all the cranks in Canada from Sydney to Prince Rupert; from some of the letters I receive I think I can claim that title fairly. But I also receive communications from people of fair minds and right thought belonging to all parties. The thought which I am going to express is that which I think is in the minds, and even more in the heart and conscience, of a large number of Canadians. This generation, to which we belong, responsible as it is—not all the individuals but the whole community under the law of solidarity—this generation which is responsible for the follies which preceded the war, railway follies and others, which is responsible for the follies of the war, which is responsible for the perhaps greater follies which followed the war, has not the right to leave to the next generation, to your children and mine, the full burden of the payment for our follies. What would you think of a prodigal father who, having piled up debt after debt in debauchery and extravagance, would say to his creditors: My children will pay you? That would be worse than the cruelty described by Christ as being almost impossible: "Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" That is what we are doing.

I am now coming near to the day when I will have to render account to my God for what I have done in private and public life, and I do not want to leave this world without having protested against the injustice that will be perpetrated if we leave future generations to pay the whole of the debts that have been piled up thanks to our lack of foresight, to say no more.

Now, coming to ordinary taxation—I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is not here but perhaps his attention will be called to just one instance I am going to give.

I am in favour of maintaining and perhaps of increasing, with care, the income tax. But I point out here publicly that which I have shown to various ministers who have succeeded to office, either in the treasury or in the Department of National Revenue, since I came back to parliament. Since last year, taxation is imposed on government annuities over $1,200 and on ordinary revenues over $1,000. I must say that owing to a judgment rendered in 1858 by a good English judge who had more knowledge of law than of economics, or even of simple mathematics, an annuity is considered as being total income, which is of course absurd and nonsensical. Then, in our devotion to everything British, a judge—I was going to say an equally stupid judge, but I shall not say that—a judge in Canada copied the judgment delivered in England, and gave the same decision.

I do not wish to carry the argument to greater length, but shall simply give some figures. Suppose a man of sixty years decided to invest a sum of $25,000 in government bonds. Under the last issue he could get $25,000 worth of bonds for $23,362.50. In twenty years time—and I am referring to a twenty-year issue—he would receive $20,000 in interest. That is, he would receive interest for twenty years at the rate of $1,000 a year, and would not pay a single cent of income tax. Suppose another man, the same age, had taken an equal sum of $23,362.50 and purchased from the same government a life annuity. He would receive annually $2,247.47. Of course, everybody knows that that includes a revenue of only four per cent on the $23,362.50. The rest is capital reduction. He would receive in interest, during these twenty years, $18,690. But during that same period, under the present rate, he would pay $638 of income tax. Is that just? That is a capital levy. I have just said that I have no objection to a capital levy, but let it be a levy on all capital. Why pick out a class of people who have been invited to purchase annuities? I have before me circulars sent by government agents inviting such purchases. Of course those purchases are very advantageous to the government, because the capital is never totally paid back. It is paid by instalments, according to tables of mortality which are very well calculated. This procedure is much more advantageous to the state than would be the selling of bonds. Nevertheless, you let go scot free the man who purchases a bond, and who will receive your interest of four and a half per cent; and then you tax a man who is only drawing an annuity. If he dies within twenty years you inherit the portion of his capital he has not received, and besides, you have collected taxation. That shows how all matters of taxation have to be scrutinized, and I believe this statement applies to almost every form of it.

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. member quite certain that moneys received under the annuities system are taxable?

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, under the amendment of last year there is a margin of $1,200. I have deducted the $1,200 from the $2,247 which he received, and state that he is taxed for the difference.

Mr. EULER: He can get only $1,200.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is the margin.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend. At the moment I think only $1,200 can be paid in annuities, and that is not taxable.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, now. And this also is a mistaken policy, because if there is one form of investment which any government should invite, it would be those annuities. But at the request, or rather, under pressure from the life insurance companies, the government limited the amount. They have thereby lost millions of dollars upon which they would have paid only four per cent, while they have launched debentures giving four and a half per cent, plus commissions to brokers.

I am not going to dwell longer with the subject of taxation, because there may be an opportunity in the debate on the budget. I shall not mention the sales tax, excise taxes and so on, but shall simply lay down three principles which I hope the government, and the Minister of Finance in particular, will consider.

First, if we want to have some degree of financial balance and social justice, there must be an understanding between federal and provincial authorities, including of course municipal authorities, as to the manner or the mode in which they levy taxation upon the various communities in this country. In some provinces we have double income tax, while in others there is but one. A consideration of this matter should be the main object of the next conference between federal and provincial authorities.

Second, in every form of taxation, either direct or indirect, I urge upon the government the necessity of caring for the small trader, the small industrialist, the small proprietor, even the small capitalist or what they call in France "l'épargniste" or even "le rentier." I know that at times those people are called social parasites. I suppose in Europe, where estates have been transmitted from generation to generation in certain families, some might be called social parasites, unless they render to the state and to the nation some other services. But in this country those parasites do not exist. Practically all of those small proprietors living on their revenues in their old age, are retired workers or retired employees. For years and years they have been meritorious contributors to the general welfare of the community, municipal, provincial and federal. So far they have been the best supporters of moral and social order, the cement of the social structure. They are by nature, by instinct and by interest, essentially conservative, in the best sense of the word. But if ruined by taxation or otherwise they may become the most desperate revolutionists, because there can be no hope for them in beginning a new life. If hon. members have followed, as I have, the trend of events in Europe since the war, they must know that it is this class, this small middle class, ruined and oppressed, which on the one hand has supplied the forces of communism and on the other hand the counter forces of fascism. Do we want that in Canada? We want neither the one nor the other. My friends to the left do not want it any more than the Liberals or the Conservatives, but that is what we are preparing.

Finally, in all matters of taxation, remember first, last and above all the rights of the family. Here and there we hear of the necessity of having a larger population to help us in paying our debts and lifting the burden of taxation. Agreed. But what do we want? Do we want more foreigners to come in, or shall we give the preference to the children of Canadian families? By Canadian families I mean good Canadian citizens of whatever race they may be, whether born in Canada or outside. But of that more towards the close of my remarks.

Before I leave the question of social and economic reform I want to say a word about the life insurance companies. The Prime Minister referred to them last night, and quite rightly so. In a sense the life insurance companies, from the social viewpoint, are more important than the banks. In a new country, and more especially in the United States and Canada, the life insurance companies have become the financial mainstay of the family. Quite a number of individuals belonging to the professions, to trade or industry, and who have allowed themselves and their families to live what I call an extravagant life, have nevertheless devoted a large portion of what they earned to purchasing insurance policies. Take, again, the small tradesman or the farmer who puts aside a few dollars each year to purchase a policy of $1,000 for his widow and family. All that money goes into the coffers of insurance companies. We often hear about the trusteeship of the banks with regard to the funds entrusted to them; but the amount of private funds in the hands of the banks, as was so ably demonstrated by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in a speech delivered in Toronto a few days before the opening of the session, and which by the way was one of the best I ever read from him or anyone else, is only four per cent of the so-called money or of the apparent volume of the transactions which the banks carry on between debtors and creditors of the banks. That is what a bank plays with. On the other hand, the funds in the hands of insurance companies are composed of real money entrusted to the company by policyholders, and most of it for the benefit of their families. Is it not the primary duty of the state to see that that money is properly invested and kept as safe as it possibly can be? But how has that duty been done? I know that we are now face to face with the decision of the privy council, that the control of insurance companies rests with the provincial governments; but surely this question ought to be dealt with, first by conference, and then by concurrent legislation, so that, whatever governmental authority is exercised over insurance companies, the funds entrusted to their hands and upon which the bread and lives of so many hundreds of thousands of Canadians depend will be kept safe. Is that done at the present time?

I want to avoid as much as possible personal issues, and I do not want to be unduly harsh upon the directors of the large companies, but after all we are here to say the truth—at least we ought to be here for that.

Take the case of the Sun Life Assurance Company, by far the largest concern in Canada. I have taken these figures from its last report, dated December 31, 1932. Their total assets amount to $611,436,152.70. Of that amount real estate represents $26,546,571.26; and in this last figure is included the cost price of that tower of Babel in Montreal, the head office of the company, amounting to $21,392,282.36. It is quite illustrative of the follies of the last ten years. That tower of Babel stands beside that immense hole, empty of earth and of everything else, which is the future Canadian National Railway station in Montreal—an abyss on the one hand, a pyramid of extravagance on the other. How many millions would that tower fetch at prices prevailing to-day?

Take the item of bonds, debentures, and debenture stocks. In the books of the company they are carried at $117,393,222.98; but that has been scaled down by the superintendent of insurance here to $107,861,810.99, a reduction of about ten million dollars.

Take the item of stocks. Preferred stocks are carried on the books of the company at $23,244,147.07, and that has been scaled down to $19,576,944.04. Common stocks are carried at $298,954,632.81, and that figure has been brought down to $292,472,334.11. Other assets, $164,978,492.30.

In other words that so-called trust fund of the Sun Life Assurance Company is composed, up to 48 per cent, of the common stocks of all sorts of concerns in America, north and south. Those great believers in the national creed of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) are great believers in the Canadian people following that creed; but they do not believe in it so far as the company itself is concerned, because they invest all the money they can outside of Canada.

The liabilities of the company are shown as $603,438,205.87, of which $586,007,260.37 is due to policyholders, most of it due to women and children in Canada. Other liabilities are shown as $17,430,945.50. So, to guarantee this $586,007,260.37 due to the policy holders there is a surplus altogether of $5,997,946.89, exclusive of the capital stock, $2,000,000.

Now what are all those stocks worth? Nobody knows. Without betraying any confidence I might say that four or five years ago, when that company came before parliament to secure the right of issuing more capital shares, I had given some study to the situation of insurance companies, especially the Sun Life, and I went to see one of the most authoritative men in this country on this subject. I said to him, "On the face of their report are they not bankrupt?"—That was the year they raised the dividend to their shareholders from 50 to 75 per cent. He replied, "Of course, but what is the use of saying it? It would create a panic."

Without insisting too much, I might say that some years previously, when the Canadian Northern Company came before this parliament for assistance, and when the present Prime Minister fought against it, what was the reason given in and out of parliament for giving that assistance? It was said: If we do not rescue the Canadian Northern and Mackenzie and Mann at the expense of the country, it means the bankruptcy of the Bank of Commerce and the Canada Life Insurance Company.

Now I ask, is it fair that the public should be blackmailed and the public treasury tapped because the powers that be, federal or provincial, have not exercised beforehand their duty and found out what was the real situation in these great companies before they came to ask for assistance?

I could give three or four more examples, but it would take too long. It all amounts to this: If a small trader or industrialist, a small banker or capitalist, operates for some time at the expense of the public and goes to the wall, he is put in bankruptcy; and if he has been crooked he is put in jail. But if you steal millions you are safe, because if you are denounced it will shake the confidence of the public. I should like to relate a story, one which I think is true, to show how such things react in various countries, but I shall resist the temptation of giving names. Not long ago, a meeting of shareholders or debenture holders of one of those large concerns, organized by one of our largest banks and supported, operated and mal-administered by several of our kings and captains of finance, was held in Montreal. A Scotchman was present, representing the creditors of Great Britain. He asked if Mr. So-and-So was there, and he was told he was. He said, "I want to tell you that man is the greatest scoundrel in Canada." "Oh, no, pardon me; Sir So-and-So is a greater scoundrel than the other." That is the impression left upon our foreign creditors by some of our great financial operations. Such a thing may endanger the credit of Canada just as much as the bringing to account of these perpetrators of frauds and exploitations. At least, that is my old way of looking at things.

This brings me to another matter, the control of stock exchanges. I brought this matter up, I think thirty-one years ago, in the old parliament. I do not mean to boast, but I have had no personal experience with these organizations. I would not go to a stockbroker's office or to a stock exchange any more than I would go to a house of prostitution. I do not like them. To me, stock gambling is to legitimate financial operations what prostitution is to marriage. I am not referring to the regular sale and purchase of stocks and debentures, but this is only a small percentage of the business carried on by these organizations. The legitimate purchase and sale of securities is, I am told, not more than one per cent of the total business transacted. Most of it is gambling, playing on ups and downs. It might be said, so much the worse for those who lose. If they were the only ones concerned, then I would agree. It is a different thing when a man goes to a gambling house and loses money at cards, or bets on the wrong horse at a race track. Stock gambling brought about the crash of 1929. It means the shaking of the financial structure of the country; it means damage to the credit of corporations, honestly administered; it means damage to the credit of the country; it means damage to the economic life of the whole nation. It is the duty of the government to stop this. When I brought up this matter before, I think in the session of 1903, I received all sorts of compliments from people on all sides. I received letters from people in Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere, stating that at last the truth was out and hoping that the government would act. Of course, the Liberal government of that day did not act; the Conservative government which followed did not act, nor did any other government. Why? Do hon. members know what people are saying? They say: You will never get reform in that way because too many members of parliament are interested in the game. I do not believe that, but that is the impression abroad.

I was told last week by one of the safest, one of the keenest bankers in Canada, one who enjoys the confidence of the whole financial and commercial public, the confidence of all parties and all governments, that three years ago all the stock exchange brokers in Montreal, with the exception of perhaps two or three, were absolutely bankrupt. They had to be carried by the banks because the banks were afraid of the reactions which might follow. Are we going to allow such things to continue? I have reminded the house already of a very remarkable reform brought about in Italy, not by Mussolini, but by the Liberal government of Giolitti, the safest man who has been at the head of affairs of that country during the last half century. He was frightened at the speculative spirit that had developed in his country. The Germans were coming in and investing millions, and Italians with their instinctive gambling spirit—they have had their mora and their lotteries for centuries—began playing with hundreds of thousands of lire. This gambling was injuring the credit of the country; and many families were ruined. Giolitti decided that there must be a stop. He put through a very simple law which rendered null and void the sale or purchase of any bond or share unless it was paid for one hundred per cent and registered in the name of the purchaser. Of course there were protests: Restriction of trade! Encroachment upon individual liberty! But he let them cry. Later on, he was told by practically two-thirds of the business men of Italy, some of whom had criticized him most severely, that he had saved Italy. I repeat, why should not we go outside the countries under the British flag or under the star spangled banner for guidance in some matters? Intelligence, especially economic intelligence, is to be found elsewhere. Take France, for instance. I have friends in the various parties in that country. I do not like their politics, either national or international. However, economically speaking, France has the best record of any occidental country in the world.

Why this is so I shall reserve for a future occasion; but at this time I would remind the house that in that country, the government has preserved a fairly equal balance between utter neglect of its duties and undue interference. I think the time has come for us to act in a similar manner.

I shall not refer to the control of prices, an extremely important matter, as this is the subject matter of the study of a committee of this house. I shall not do more than say to the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) that I concur entirely with the views he expressed some time ago in connection with the fuel situation in Montreal. Do hon. members realize the social and moral danger arising from such a situation? As we say in French: Put yourself in the shoes of the average individual in Montreal. I suppose there are in Montreal at the present time some three or four hundred thousand people either poverty stricken or on the verge of poverty. Just imagine these people having to pay three times what they should pay for their coal during a winter like this. An inquiry was started, but imagine their feelings when they read that after Senator Webster had given his testimony he started on a cruise around the world in one of our palatial boats. No doubt when he was going through the strait of Gibraltar and was contemplating that magnificent rock, no doubt when he was nearing the Red sea, and glanced at the pyramids and perhaps put a question to the sphinx; no doubt when he reached the Straits Settlements, having been in contact with all races and nations of the world, he forgot all about the coal situation in Montreal. But I ask again, what are the feelings of the people who had to pay four times as much for the coal as it was worth—the coal controlled by the monopoly organized by Senator Webster? Do you think they have much regard for our leading classes, for the Senate of which that hon. gentleman is an ornament, or the House of Commons which is supposed to stand in defence of the rights of poor people, or the governments—because this refers to Quebec as well as Ottawa—which are supposed to care so much for the masses during an election? Of course, we all love the people when an election comes on; we are prepared to give them everything they want. But after the election is over, we allow them to be fleeced by our friends, party contributors and pillars of church and state and social order.

I pass now to control of credit, which is perhaps the most important question. I will not speak of rural credit, but I would invite those who take an interest in this subject to study how an Italian Jew, Luzzatti, solved the problem in Italy before he became Minister of Finance, in the same cabinet with Giolitti. He started, in characteristic Italian fashion, in a very small way, organizing a few individuals in this village, in that part of the country, and elsewhere, and so on, until, within a few years, not only did the small rural banks save agriculture, the culture of vines, but when Italy was on the verge of bankruptcy, thanks to the megalomania of Crispi, who launched Italy into the arms of the triple alliance, it was these small banks that saved Italy. The big banks had invested so much money in armaments, in big industries and other large concerns that they had no more money to lend the government. It was the farmers, the vine growers of Italy, through their banks, who saved the situation and put Italy once more on the safe path.

Here and now I predict that if the countries of Europe, Italy especially, are spared war or revolution within the next ten years, they will pass through this crisis much more quickly than we shall and will emerge in a far better condition, because they have not lost their senses to the extent that we have; they have not abused credit as much as we have, both for public and private enterprises.

I will not refer to our banks except to state quite candidly that my attitude towards these institutions, in matters of credit, is the opposite of the general attitude in Canada. My reproach to the banks is not that they have refused credit but that they have given it too freely in times of extravagance. It is all very well to say that the banks do not lend money on land, on mines or on stocks; but when money was abundant, when business was supposed to be prosperous—business as a matter of fact was ill; it was suffering from a fever of folly in the years which preceded the crash,—any ten individuals in Montreal could borrow money on notes signed by one another—what for? To put into trade? No, sir; to speculate, to gamble in lands and mines and stocks. They did it either directly or through their stockholders. It would be interesting to know the amount of credit which was once given to one single stock-broking agency in Montreal—why not name it?—Holt, Gundy & Co., by the Royal Bank, the head of which is Sir Herbert Holt, associated with the same Holt, Gundy. It would be interesting to find that out.

Now there is another form of credit in which I take a good deal of interest, from the point of view of the family, of small people, and that is the sale of goods on terms or on instalments. That has done a good deal to ruin small trade; it has ruined families, not only financially but morally.

Dishonesty in business has increased in the city of Montreal during the last ten years to astounding proportions, and that owing largely to the system of sales on instalments, protected as it is by a law passed some years ago in Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: Does that apply only to Montreal?

Mr. BOURASSA: No, but Montreal is a large city. There are many people whose dwellings are filled with goods unpaid for, over which the landlord has no claim and which the legal owners, the original sellers, do not care to take back inasmuch as they have received very often enough money on such goods. They leave them there with the result that the tenant who has purchased the goods is in debt, does not pay his rent, and the landlord suffers, the city suffers and everyone suffers. In the long run the seller himself suffers because he has too much out on credit.

We should put a stop to this as well as to the growth of the system of coupons and premiums and "drawing cards." I was amazed at a memorandum given me last fall by one of the most important tobacco firms in Montreal, showing the amount of money which they are forced to disburse in order to cope with the competition of other firms who resort to this sort of thing. That is not only an imposition on competing firms and factories, but it is also unfair to the trade; because the so-called premiums which they give fill up certain stores with goods purchased at much less than cost price and therefore sold in unfair competition against the ordinary trader.

Now to sum up this chapter, I say that the main concern of parliament and of the government should be to revive local life, to revive local trade half ruined by the large departmental stores, aided by the state through postal distribution and rural mail delivery. We should do all we can to revive local industry and husbandry, destroyed by trusts and combines protected by tariffs and defective companies acts, both federal and provincial. Village life is undermined, rural communities are depleted, cities and towns are congested, with all the economic, political and social consequences that follow, a far greater menace than bolshevism in Russia, because that is the hotbed of bolshevism in Canada.

My friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), on a subject akin to this, said, "Oh, but we cannot turn back the hands of the clock." I beg to differ from him on that. It all depends on the clock. I have known clocks, well made, the hands of which could be turned backwards or forwards. I will not say the same for cheap clocks—and our economics, though they have cost us much money, are cheap in quality. But surely if the clock runs amuck it can be stopped; the pendulum can be adjusted, the wheels cleaned and set in order so that the clock will keep correct time and mark the right hour all day long. Is that not the real thing we should have in view? I contend that it is. I contend that what we need, from government down to the poorest individual in the land, is a return to normal life. What we need is to bring back, not only to the farm, as has been mentioned frequently in the house, but to the village as well, a large number of people who have been lured, by the war and by the false industries started during the war, to the large cities.

May I recommend to the attention of all the marvellous work done in a modest way by a modest employee of the Canadian National Railways in Montreal, Mr. J. E. Laforce? Not only by lectures over the radio, but also by his own active work, he brings to the Abitibi and various other districts, once or twice a month, sometimes ten, sometimes twenty families whom he places where it is most likely they will succeed. He does not organize things in a spectacular way, with big trains filled up with men, women and children who are thrown into the desert, the forest or the marsh without any prospect of success. No; he knows the place; he knows the people; he knows their needs; and what money he gets from governments he knows will not be misplaced. If those humble efforts of a single modest French Canadian employee had been, I shall not say helped, because he has been helped sufficiently, but followed up; if his example were followed now and repeated in every large centre of Canada, that would be a far greater contribution to social readjustment than many great schemes.

We must also look to a reduction in the cost of living and labour. Here again I am afraid that I shall not be in accord with most people. The general opinion seems to be that we should keep everything up. I say that we should bring everything down—not down into the abyss, but down to the level on which most human beings were accustomed to live prior to the war, where we shall find rest, not in the clouds, not on the tops of mountains, not in the depth of abysses and marshes, but on good solid level ground.

We must also encourage thrift and honest production. Some years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce launched a creed urging all consumers in Canada to purchase Canadian made goods. An appeal should be made to all producers in Canada, from manufacturers down to labourers and farmers, to give us honest products. Since the war, the quality of many of our products has deteriorated owing to lack of conscience on the part not only of managers but of labourers as well. The main concern of most people, to-day, among those at the head of affairs, is to make as much money as possible, and of those at the foot to get rid of their work with the least possible effort of intelligence and of the hand. A sense of duty is lacking in all classes.

It is said: But you will thereby lower the standard of living. Here again I am afraid that I shall find myself more in isolation than ever. What is meant by a high standard of living? Of course, if cost is meant, I admit that more money is spent by the average Canadian or American than by the average European. But if by standard of living is meant a certain balance in human activities, a certain degree of satisfaction to the mind and to the heart, and comfort to the body, I have no hesitation in saying this: I have travelled and lived in eight or ten countries in Europe. From the view point of either moral, intellectual, artistic or even material life, the standard of life of the French, the Italian, the Swiss, the Belgian, the Dutch, the German, not to speak of the Britisher, is higher than that of Canadians and Americans. One of the closest students of things British, a great admirer of Great Britain and the British mind, a Frenchman who knows all parts of the British Empire and, by the way, a Protestant by religion, Mr. André Siegfried, whom I knew thirty-five years ago, who is still a close student of all matters pertaining to England and her empire, and to the United States republic as well, published three or four years ago, at the inception of this crisis, a most illuminating book on the situation in England. He then predicted, with evidence at the back of his opinion, that England would never recover her supremacy in matters of trade and industry until her people renounced their false ideas with regard to standard of life, because the continental European, more modest, more economical and at the same time more concerned about giving a little time of his life to thought, study and art, contenting himself with more modest foods and humbler garments, but at the same time having more satisfaction in life, gave better work than did the Englishman. If we had to compare continental Europe with America, I am afraid the comparison would be still more disastrous.

That brings me to the question of unemployment. I shall be very brief on this question because it has been so frequently discussed. I immediately express the view that we must as soon as possible suppress the dole and also the concentration camps. Let us give work, yes, but here I want to say what I think about work. Give big works, spectacular work? No. That again shows the spirit of the parvenu. Trans-Canadian highways, big buildings? No. That means that half the money goes to contractors and in payment of machinery. Further, it means simply the transportation of thousands of men from one part of the country to another, thereby training in a wandering and homeless life hundreds of thousands of Canadians. I say, on the contrary, that we should have numerous small works, useful works, everywhere. As regards the constituency that I represent, I pointed out to the permanent official who had to deal with relief funds, that this government alone had spent in my constituency some $6,000 or $7,000 that could have been spared because they were spent on useless work. Of course he said that that was due, and I suppose rightly so, to the fact that the expenditure had been approved by the Quebec government. I said: "When you give money to Quebec, surely you should know what is done with it." It is useless building public halls, roads to enable club men in Montreal to go more comfortably at the time of trout fishing or deer hunting from that city to the midst of my constituency. Build useful works, works that will result in permanent benefit to the people of the locality, scattering men here and there, in villages, so that they cannot be a threat to any place where they are and still less a threat to the community. In other words, a great problem in this respect is what some people might call conscription of labour. Call it that if you like. As I said about conscription of wealth, labour having been conscripted to kill and destroy, surely it is as legitimate to conscript labour to reconstruct and give life. But it is not necessary to call it by that odious name. The problem is, a better distribution of work and labour with a view to reestablishing a balance between rural and urban population and sending back some of the blood now concentrated in the centres through the arteries to all parts of the country.

That brings me to a much discussed question, that of the maintenance of public order. Here again I am sorry but I cannot quite agree with my hon. friends to the left. The main function of the state is to maintain public order for the benefit of all.

Miss MACPHAIL: Who said it was not?

Mr. BOURASSA: But the state cannot exercise that power with moral authority unless the repression of disorder takes place everywhere, from top to bottom. Torture has been reestablished in Canada, to secure avowals from people not even declared guilty by courts of law. Scourging is now being inflicted on burglars; perhaps it is necessary, but my sense of justice and that of many other Canadians is not satisfied. If we are going to reestablish forms of punishment which were discarded two hundred years ago as barbarous, and inflict them on the small criminal, then I suggest that the pillory should be reestablished in the Place d'Armes in Montreal, and men responsible for the present economic and social unrest be put in the stocks, so that the good people from town and country will have the right to go and throw cabbages at them, as was done in London and Paris and elsewhere, when there was some kind of social justice. I would not kill them, but I would give them a good lesson.

Something must be done to alleviate the "hard, cruel, relentless" burden now weighing upon the shoulders of the masses. I borrow those words from the encyclical of Pope Pius XI. Men of wealth who abuse their power, keeping the poor, keeping us all, in various degrees, in subjection, must be brought to their senses or severely punished. This is not revolution. Go back in history. I will give only two instances. Find out in what manner Louis XIV dealt with Fouquet, in what manner Napoleon dealt with Ouvrard; and you will see how, under monarchical government in one case, dictatorial in the second, but with the consent of the people, millionaire financiers who had abused their power were dealt with under the law.

But having said so much, I also say it is the duty of the government to suppress, and better still to prevent riots; not so much punishing the rioters, most of whom are poor, misguided fools, but by punishing, first, those who, by their injustice to the poor and the oppressed, cause such a state of suffering that they lose their head and follow the first demagogue who appeals to them. Secondly, I go further than the Minister of Justice went last year; rather than punishing the rioter when the riot has taken place, I say boldly: Gag the demagogue.

I know my hon. friend near me is concerned about liberty of speech, and I know he is sincere. Before I answer him on this point, however, I give for a second time a friendly warning to my Quebec friends, right or left: cease charging the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with communistic views. You know it is untrue, you know it is a slander, you know it is unfair to a man with whose ideas you may differ, but whose sincerity no one can question. I repeat, a day may come, and come sooner than you think, when people who now denounce the leader of the C.C.F. will regard him as a bulwark against demagogy and communism. Everyone who reads what is taking place knows that he has no bitterer enemies in Canada than the communists; he has been denounced by them from the beginning. But I repeat, I cannot share his view that liberty of speech must be untrammelled. Liberty of speech, like every other kind of liberty, ceases to be legitimate when it endangers social order and interferes with the liberty of others.

Much has been said about those trials for blasphemy in Quebec. Some have said it is a return to mediaevalism. May I repeat what I stated during the debate on the address? Try to understand the feelings of all. For forty years I have endeavoured to understand the viewpoint of the westerner, for example, and on many occasions I have been able to make my fellow citizens in Quebec understand some of the problems of the west. Likewise, try to understand us. Realize this, I say it from the bottom of my heart, that an insult to our God, an insult to our church, is more hurtful to our sense of human dignity than an insult to father or mother. Shall we then, those of us who have authority, let the first demagogue on the street throw mud at the name we revere and at the institution in which we were born and in which we wish to die? Is it not interfering with the liberty of those poor bleeding people who have no other consolation but in praying to God, in remaining from birth to death in the arms of their church, to have it insulted without any protection being given to them? We do not ask anybody to believe as we believe, but we ask not to be insulted. As I said to one of those demagogues: How much bread will it give to the poor, or what good will it do them, that you throw mud at the name of God, or throw insults at men and women who, for forty or fifty years, have lived a life of sacrifice to feed the poor, clean the unclean, give some kind of moral life where there was only dirt, corruption and degradation? Respect us as we respect others.

But, it is said, we must save democracy. I must confess that to me democracy is very much a catch word. During the war I was once bold enough to state before an audience in the United States something, that the moment I said it, I thought would bring thunder on my head. You remember President Wilson's famous saying, "We fight to make the world safe for democracy." After I had seen the turn of things, the passions, the greed, the ambitions of all nations as revealed in the peace negotiations, I said to that audience: Ladies and gentlemen, I am afraid we must slightly correct President Wilson's saying, and admit that we have fought to make the world safe for hypocrisy. The famous definition: "Government of the people, for the people and by the people," is at once a truth and a falsity. "Of the people"—of course, it is obvious; every government is a government of the people. "For the people"—that is what it ought to be, but unfortunately very few governments are for the people governed. They are first for the people who exercise government. "By the people"—that has never been and will never be. Under a democracy the people, once in a while, delegate to certain legislative or governing bodies individuals who are supposed to represent their views. But which of us can claim that upon any question coming before the house, he is voicing the views or the aspirations of the people he represents? Of course not.

Socialism is sounder—I am not afraid to say this—than either democracy or liberalism. As a reaction against individualism, it has been a godsend to the world; but in practice it is evincing itself as a mere entrance either to communism or to fascism, two forms of tyranny.

It may be asked: Why not stick to the good old conservatism? Well, at the risk of appearing very critical, I say that conservatism is an impossibility. In its strict sense and usual practice, it means the conservation of everything which exists—of the bad as well as of the good. It means the conservation of the bad germs which bring about revolution. If you wish to preserve or restore what is good in society, you must boldly destroy what is wrong.

On one point, however, there must be agreement. Whether we like it or not, a new social order has to arise. May I make a slight correction and suggest that what we need is not a new social order but a restoration of the old one, a reconstruction, which would mean making use of all that was true, good, enduring and fruitful in the old society, and giving a new construction adaptable to present needs. Under such a restored order there ought to be a just balance between authority and liberty, between individual right and social duty.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, may I crave the indulgence of the house, for the remainder of this speech which is already too long, to resort to my notes? It is the first, and probably the last time in thirty-eight years, I have done so. However, as these are very delicate subjects, I have preferred to put down in writing what I have to say.

Under the law of nature spiritualized by Christianity, social order rests on three bases, of unequal importance: property, family, religion; the material, the social, the spiritual.

Property is theft, said Proud'hon—"La propriété c'est le vol." That proposition raised a cry of horror and reprobation, especially from the ranks of property owners. But the greatest Catholic social leader of Germany, I might say of Europe, Ketteler, Bishop of Mayence—he whom Pope Leo XIII since called his "predecessor" in the work of social reform—Ketteler had the courage to acknowledge that Proud'hon's paradox "contains both a huge lie and a fertile truth." Of course I am quoting the translation. "We must first destroy what is true therein to make it a complete falsehood—It is the false right of property which gave birth to the false theory of communism." That is, the false right of property under modern legislation. In other words, the right of property is real; but in the concrete, much property is acquired by theft and held unjustly, with the complicity of man-made laws.

According to Catholic teaching, from Christ to Pius XI, through Paul, Thomas Aquinas, Bossuet, and thousands of others, no man has an absolute right of property on any thing. God is the creator and sole owner of all earthly goods. In his munificence he puts at the disposal of mankind, of all men, women and children, for their sustenance, all that the earth contains and produces. No individual has the right to possess himself of anything to the detriment of his fellow beings. All that any individual can claim is the right to enjoy the fruits of his labour, to capitalize them—I do not like that word; I would rather say to stabilize—and freely dispose of them, by testament or otherwise, but never to the detriment of other individuals and of the community at large. Whenever any individual, or group of individuals, violates that law of social justice and order, it is the right, nay, the pre-eminent duty of the state, representing the community, and bound to protect the poor, the oppressed—as the kings of France, when Christianity prevailed over Roman law, swore to, in their coronation oath—it is the duty of the state to intervene and check greed, accumulation of wealth, combines, and all the devices by which the kings of finance oppress the poor and deprive them of their natural right to acquire their modest share of temporal goods.

Property, private or corporate, to be legitimate, must be honestly acquired, properly administered and used for righteous purposes. To be useful to society it ought to be fairly distributed amongst the largest possible number of individuals in the community.

Now—and on this point I call the special attention of my French speaking and Catholic colleagues on both sides of the house—this form of property, the small property, the most legitimate, the most useful to society, is being destroyed in Canada, in Quebec, in the city of Montreal especially, by capitalism, by taxation, by false economics and a foolish standard of life, as rapidly and effectively as in Russia by communism and bolshevistic rule or misrule.

The situation is still graver when you relate property to family. According to Pope Leo XIII, the right of man to private property—limited as aforesaid—is strengthened by the "extension" of man into the "domestic society," the family.

Family is the essential cell of society. To Canadians, this obvious truth need not be demonstrated, although it would be easy to point out the disintegrating influence exercised on the family, in Quebec, by French jacobinism as expressed in our Quebec civil code, and all through Canada by the no less destructive individualism transfused to us by the Manchester school of thought.

All I wish to say now, as a warning to our leaders, in church and state, is this: Family, like private property, is at present being threatened, nay, demoralized and destroyed, in Canada, in Quebec, in the city of Montreal more perhaps than anywhere else, by capitalism, materialism, taxation and extravagance, as surely, if less ruthlessly, as in Russia, under the yoke of Lenin and his disciples. In Montreal and other large centres, it is almost impossible to-day, for thousands of good, honest men and women, to maintain a home and a family, and for thousands of young folks to found one. Hence a rapid spread of anti-conceptional practices among married people, a frightful increase of immorality in the young people of both sexes, a marked degradation of faith and morals among all. I am referring now to Catholics and French-Canadians alone. Not that I think they are any worse than others, but I am more concerned about them. These signs of moral disintegration are forerunners of revolution. Remember France, ten years, five years before the storm which carried away church and monarchy. Think of Spain, a few years ago.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

These portents, I confess, give me more concern, as a father, a Canadian, a Catholic, than the crimes and follies perpetrated in Moscow, or the greater or lesser degree of orthodoxy, heterodoxy or a-doxy in the program of any political party in Canada. In a country like Canada, facts, sentiments and tendencies count much more than theories and doctrines.

This brings me to the third and, by far, the most important basis of social order.

Was it Karl Marx or Lasalle who said that religion is the opium of the people? Like Proud'hon's paradox on property, this also contains a truth and a falsehood. False religion, or religion misinterpreted and misapplied, may, like opium, stupefy and poison an ailing community. But, like opium again, when properly administered, it alleviates sufferings, makes possible an otherwise killing operation, gives sleep and rest, and finally enables the body, individual or social, to recover health and strength.

Religion is not much in vogue these days, —not even among our church-going population in Canada—I mean true religion. Statesmen ignore it, at least officially. Most of the scientists disdain it. Materialists deride it. Nevertheless, it was, it is, it shall remain the only permanent foundation of social order. Without belief in God, in divine justice and mercy, there can be no peace on earth—no lasting peace between nations, no set order within nations. The brotherhood of man cannot be without the fatherhood of God. No human power has the right to govern men and nations, to command obedience, unless it rests on a God-ordained basis of authority.

Why obey Moses or Caesar, Louis XIV or Henry VIII, Hitler or Mussolini, R. B. Bennett or Mackenzie King, George Henry or Alexandre Taschereau—Heaven knows it is hard at times to obey any one of them!—why, I repeat, obey them unless one believes that all powers, faulty as may be the men in authority, are to them delegated by God through the explicit or tacit consent of the people? Why should I sacrifice some or any of my whims or caprices, still less of my needs, to help any other man unless I believe that all men are the children of the same Father in heaven, redeemed by the One Saviour, Son of God and brother of man?

The essence of religion is the love of God and of one another, and that love must express itself by deeds, individual, social, political, national and international.

Religion cannot maintain its sway on human minds, direct human activities, still less check human greed and all human passions, unless it is taught to man, from childhood to death, unless it penetrates everywhere—not only in places of worship, but in the home, the school and the shop, in parliaments and in courts of law—everywhere men converse, study, work, govern, legislate and judge. And the teaching of religion, to be effective and enduring, must be given by the duly constituted authority of the church, or under its direction. This is what makes the ever-perplexing problem of church and state relations so difficult to solve in countries like Canada, where several churches are recognized by law and claim, each of them in varying degrees, the right to teach religion in their own way.

On this delicate point, may I be permitted for the first, and probably the last time in this parliament, to confess my faith without equivocation? Born in the Catholic fold, I was reared in a family circle comprising Catholics, Protestants and agnostics. I was exposed to those various currents of thought. Fifty years of study, of travel, of contact with some of the leading minds of our time—and, through reading, of the past as well—have entrenched me in the belief that the Catholic church is the church divinely instituted and divinely inspired to lead men to their eternal salvation along the path of truth and justice, individual and social. Woe to us, bad or tepid Catholics, whose conduct in private and public life stands in testimony against the teaching of the church, a stumbling block to the weak, the unbeliever, the agnostic or the separated brother!

Heaven knows, I wish all Canadians, all men on earth, were true Catholics, better Catholics than I am! But under no circumstance do I believe in conversion by force, or in a state-ordained religion, such as Philip of Spain, Henry VIII in England, Louis XIV or Napoleon in France, Josephus in Austria or Peter the Great in Russia, tried to impose upon their peoples, to the detriment of both church and state.

In our days, all that the church can and does claim in fact is the right to teach, in the home and the school, as freely as in places of worship, the duty of all men to God and to their fellow beings, the respect of legitimate authority, of true liberty also, the practice of justice and charity to all, poor and rich alike. Now, that duty is incumbent upon all churches. Without any sacrifice of principle, dogmatic or ethical, all churches can and should work, either in conjunction or on parallel lines, to help the government and guide the people on their way to social and economic salvation. On the other hand, it is the duty of the state to second the spiritual power in its mission, but never, never to try and make use of religion for political or party ends.

Mutual help, toleration and forbearance between churches, classes and races, between provinces, cities, towns and rural communities, and also between political parties and factions, are today more essential than ever in Canada, and elsewhere. Without that moral accord, no law, no measure, no plan of financial or social reform, can succeed and save society.

At this point, may I open a short parenthesis and deplore the wave of anti-semitism now passing in the province of Quebec? Launched by a handful of irresponsible individuals, may it soon die out!. It is so unchristian, so contrary to the best traditions of Quebec! —the first part of the British Empire in which the Jews received at the hands of a French-speaking and Catholic majority, twenty-six years ahead of England, the full recognition of their civil, political and religious liberties. Should any French Canadian of sense and understanding be tempted to encourage that propaganda of hatred, let him remember that an attack upon any minority is a threat to all minorities. Jews are in the minority in Quebec, but Catholics and French Canadians are in the minority in eight provinces out of nine. Beware of reactions.

In conclusion may I express the fervent hope that all forces in the land, moral, intellectual and material, will coalesce on a ground of mutual understanding and cooperation to face the present critical situation with fortitude and self denial. Let each and all make his sacrifice to save the nation from the greed and selfishness of too many possessors of wealth and power, and thereby avoid the fast coming revenge of the poor and dispossessed. Let the spiritual overcome the material. Let us all, French or English-speaking Canadians, Catholics, Protestants, Jews and Gentiles, raise our souls to heaven and pray the Father of all men and all nations to inspire our leaders in church and state so that they may lead us in the path of salvation. But to accomplish this, they, the leaders, must give to the people who are crying for moral and material nourishment, not the stone of brute force and soulless laws, not empty words of nugatory advice, but the divine bread of justice and the material means to live and let live.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, if no other hon. member desires to speak I should like to say a few words before the question is put. The previous speaker (Mr. Bourassa) has introduced a few matters which have been brought to the attention of this house on numerous occasions. He spoke of unemployment, of interest and of other matters. Hon. members in this corner of the house have introduced resolutions dealing with these fundamentals but every time they have been introduced, they have been turned down by the government. Just recently the principle of titles was accepted by the government, and in this connection I have a little plan which may or may not help to solve the present depression. Why not hold the government down to something tangible? It is not the use of titles but the abuse of titles to which this section of the house is opposed.

While the hon. member was speaking I figured out that there were at least seven kinds of titles which could be given to people in this country. A man could be made a duke, a marquis, an earl, a viscount, a baron, a baronet or a knight. I have figured that in Canada there are about ten thousand persons with a hankering for titles. I figure that there must be at least 1,600 with a hankering for the title of duke. If each of these were to pay $50,000 into the coffers of the state it would add to the treasury of Canada about $80,000,000. There are about 1,500 men who would like the title of marquis. At $25,000 apiece, this would add $35,500,000 to the coffers of Canada. About 1,400 would like the title of earl; at $15,000 a head this would make $21,000,000. Thirteen hundred men would like the title of viscount; at $10,000 each this would provide $13,000,000. There are 1,200 who would like to be barons; at $9,000 each this would provide $10,800,000. Eleven hundred would like to be baronets; at $8,000 each, this would provide $8,800,000. There are perhaps 1,000 of the common run of men in this country who would like to have the title of knight; at $7,000, this would provide $7,000,000. Assuming that there are 900 men who would be satisfied with any title; at $6,000 each they would provide $5,400,000. We would thus have the magnificent sum of $183,500,000 to help to balance the budget and solve the question of unemployment and other pressing problems.

I thought that this issue had died away back in 1919; I thought that it had been interred with all the good or bad that there might have been therein, but evidently it has been resuscitated. The Prime Minister has given it a shining badge of honour. I am reminded of a dead fish which has been thrown up by the ocean to rot upon a sandy beach and then taken back again. The whole thing looks to me like a dead mackerel. I see no reason for reintroducing the question of titles. If anyone wants a title, let him pay for it and provide the magnificent sum of $183,500,000 for the benefit of this country. I cannot express myself in any other words than to say it is like a dead mackerel in the moonlight—the whole thing shines and stinks.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have listened this afternoon to a very able discussion of the affairs of Canada considered on broad and general lines. I am sorry that many members of the government have been otherwise engaged in some of the committees and were unable to remain to hear the greater part of the address of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He has covered so much ground in his survey of conditions in Canada that it is hard at the moment to express an opinion either favourable or unfavourable in connection with certain of the propositions which he has laid down with his usual force and ability. However, I am satisfied that the house and the country will profit from the clear exposition which he has given of national affairs as considered from his own point of view. I have no doubt that in launching his motion on this occasion it was his intention to place his views fully and forcibly before the house and the country and, the hon. gentleman having achieved that object, I am wondering whether he would now be willing to withdraw his motion or whether he desires the matter to be carried to a conclusion.

Mr. BOURASSA: As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, naturally in framing the resolution I had not in view the adoption of any particular form; I simply wanted, as he says, to open the way to a broad discussion of all aspects of the problem. So far as I am concerned therefore I have no objection to withdrawing the motion with the consent of the house.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Rowe in the chair.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Pay of force and allowances: (including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere island district, at $2.25 per diem to assure department against loss through death, arms and ammunition, barrack buildings, repairs and renewals and furnishings, clothing and equipment, communication services, court and legal expenses, criminal investigation branch, enforcement of federal statutes, fuel and light, transport horses and dogs, transport mechanical, dental, medical and hospital, miscellaneous, special services Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, printing and stationery, transport railway, rations, rents, travelling expenses, transport water), $5,603,595.75.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister give the house some particulars as to the size of the force at the present time?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): When the mounted police bill was before the house and in committee I gave the figures and they appear on Hansard. My recollection at the moment is that the force at the present time all told is 2,512.

Mr. LUCAS: Provision is made in this item for two constables in Ellesmere island district. What are their duties?

Mr. GUTHRIE: One of their principal duties is to hold the island formally in the name of the crown. There are some contentious claims in regard to the ownership of it, and I believe that at the present time there is prospect of an expedition under Mr. Shackleton, son of the great explorer, who will go to Ellesmere island within the next few months on a voyage of exploration. The one main object in a few of these very northerly districts is to occupy them formally in possession of the crown.

Mr. GRAY: Is it the policy of the force to use spotters in connection with the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; it is not the policy of the force to use spotters.

Mr. GRAY: I am glad to hear the minister say that. I had not intended bringing this matter before the house at this time, but I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that spotters are being used and have been used in the past along the border of the constituency which I represent. I condemn this practice as heartily as the minister does. In connection with narcotics I can appreciate the contention that there may be some reason for it, although even there it is to be deplored. I have personal knowledge however, that spotters have been used, and in the particular instance I have in mind the spotter employed was a boy of twenty, a chap named Campbell from the city of Windsor, who was used to go in and if possible get someone to commit a crime, and the evidence he gave at the police court in connection with the matter was that he was paid some fifty dollars for the information he would obtain if convictions followed. I stated at that time in the court that I would call the matter to the attention of the minister and I do so now, convinced that I shall have the assurance of the hon. gentleman that the subject matter will be investigated. I have not my file before me at the present moment but I am quite prepared to lay all the facts before the minister and I hope I shall receive his assurance that the matter will be investigated and the practice stopped.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend will write me a letter giving the particulars I will undertake to have an investigation made at once. The term spotter may not perhaps be understood in the same way by my hon. friend and myself.

Mr. GRAY: I think so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have a secret service in the force, as is well known—

Mr. GRAY: He was not in any way a member of the force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —but we do not employ men to induce others to commit crimes. That is a reprehensible practice and is not permitted in the force, and if the facts are given I will have them investigated at once.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it the policy of the department to employ any detectives from private detective firms?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. Any in the secret service belong to the police force itself and not to private firms.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to these detectives who belong to the force itself, are their instructions in any way to provoke people to make speeches that might be considered to be defamatory or libelous or seditious?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can answer that without a moment's hesitation: no; they have no such instructions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are there in the force to-day people who are carrying on such tactics as were carried on some years ago by Corporal Zanith and more recently by Sergeant Leopold?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Sergeant Leopold was a member of the secret service of the force.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are tactics carried on by other members of the force similar to those carried on by Sergeant Leopold?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know nothing in regard to the conduct of Sergeant Leopold for which he should be reprimanded at all. He was carrying out his duty.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may say that it is commonly believed in a great many labour circles that at ordinary meetings of trade unions and at other gatherings of labour people there are present detectives who are there to work their way into the trade union organizations and on occasion to advise action which would be anything but desirable in the public interest. It seems to me that it is going very far for a government department to have men doing such work as was done some years ago by Sergeant Leopold and as, I presume, is being done to-day. He became an official of an ordinary trade union. As such he undoubtedly had access to the books and he participated in the discussions of that trade union. A trade union is a quite legitimate organization. In talking before labour groups I have again and again been cautioned against listening to certain people who were regarded by the members of the trade unions as spies. Do not, they said, let them lead you to say anything which might in any way give them a tag. I remember meeting Sergeant Leopold ten or fifteen years ago when he was an official of a trade union in Regina. I remember his asking me to come to his home, an invitation which I could not accept. I thought it was given in all good faith but my time did not permit me to accept it. I think it is an outrageous situation when legitimate trade unions may be invaded by government spies and when we never know whether the discussions that are going on are absolutely in good faith or whether they are being participated in by people who have ulterior motives to serve. Only the other day I was in a group in Toronto where there had been a good deal of disturbance right within the organization itself and when it was suggested to me that in all probablity one of the men who had provoked the disturbance was an agent of the government. I am in no position to say whether or not that statement was true.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the statement should not be made here. It is a nasty insinuation against a very good force.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I say, I am in no position to say whether that statement was true.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. ROBINSON: Has the hon. member then any right to insinuate that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I have because I know the work carried on by Sergeant Leopold and I know the work carried on some years ago by Sergeant Zanith. The latter, it was shown in court, was selling books which he knew to be banned. If instructions were given to those officials to go, if it were possible to do so, into a meeting of the directors of, say the Royal Bank or the Sun Life or the Webster coal combine and secure secrets there, I do not know that I would have very much to say against such action. But when legitimate trade unions are liable to be invaded in this way, I wish to make a decided protest against that kind of thing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I give a distinct denial to the insinuation which has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He says that government secret agents or spies have invaded meetings of legitimate trade associations or unions and I give him an absolute denial to that statement. I think his insinuation is unworthy of him. He listens to rumours, rumours coming to him I think in many cases on very questionable authority and his grievance against this particular man Leopold is that he is the one who gave evidence when the eight communists were convicted in Toronto. That is the grievance of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in that instance. I do not know what meetings he attends; I do not know why he has to be warned at those meetings of the presence of spies, but I can assure him that in legitimate meetings of labour unions or associations there are no government agents or spies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would be glad to accept that statement of the minister, but I can hardly do so when it was revealed in the statements of Sergeant Leopold that he had been a member of a trade union in Regina.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say that he was not a member; I said that at that time it was a communist union he was secretary of and at that time he was doing secret service work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All I can say is that I remember meeting him in the regular trade union meetings in the city of Regina.

Mr. MITCHELL: Sergeant Leopold was financial secretary or secretary of the local union of the international brotherhood of paper hangers and painters in Regina and this in my judgment substantiates the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Whether he may have been placed there to spy on the communists, I have no knowledge, but I know at that time he was an officer of a regularly constituted union in this country. He sat in the Regina convention of the trades and labour congress and if I remember aright, he was some years ago a delegate there at that congress and at the same time, of course, a member of the secret service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item looks to me as though it were a consolidation of several items as they formerly appeared in the estimates. It covers practically all the estimates of the mounted police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is the same item as that which appeared last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But it is somewhat different from the estimates of the mounted police for years prior to last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there were only two items formerly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the minister tell us what it means and could he, say after the six o'clock recess, give us the amounts for the different services represented? As I read the item it does not make much sense:

> Pay of force and allowances: (including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere island district at $2.25 per diem to assure department against loss through death, arms and ammunition—

That is the first sentence. Can the minister tell us just what it means? I think this is a badly compiled arrangement and what would help us in the committee to understand how the total expenditure is made up is to get some details as to the different services that are indicated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the item is exactly the same as it was last year, but in former years I believe there were two items instead of one. I suppose it was consolidated for the sake of convenience more than for any other reason. I asked the commissioner to be here at eight o'clock; I did not anticipate that the item would be called until then, but I shall have all the details in the evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps we might take up the next item and pass it, allowing this one to stand.

Mr. ROSS: Before we pass to the next item, I should like to ask the minister whether these policemen in performance of their duty collect fines. For instance, in the enforcement of a federal statute, are the police entitled to go out and say what the fine will be in a particular case and to collect the cash? Have they authority to do that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have no authority to collect any fines, but in those cases certain allowances are made under the revenue acts of Canada. I think similar allowances are also made to certain customs officers. These do not go to the men; they go to a trust fund belonging to the force. The individual as such gets nothing of the fine. Formerly a certain amount was paid to the man who gave the information and conducted the prosecution.

Mr. ROSS: I think the minister misunderstood, I am not charging them with collecting the fines in their own interests. I am one of those who support the enforcement of law and order, who will not charge them with anything wrong, but I do think that this excellent body is gradually establishing a custom and system which is bringing discredit on the force and raising a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country. It may be the desire to make this one large, grand dominion body; at any rate I know that there are places and operations in which local police, provincial police, and the mounted police are all acting, and the result is productive of public opinion not favourable to good order. Along the front certain regulations and statutes are applicable. For instance there is the law, probably directed against rum running and smuggling, that requires a motorboat visiting the Canadian or the American side to register there, and then immediately return to and register at the nearest customs port. But that has caused a great deal of unnecessary trouble and the imposition of fines upon people along the border. For instance there are two islands in the St. Lawrence, one on the Canadian side and the other on the American. If people pass from one to the other for a game of bridge the boat has to report that it has been over to the other side. That requirement has led to the imposition of fines. Let me tell of one case that I know will gain the sympathy of the minister and of the committee. Two Americans, a man and a woman, were summering on Wolfe island. They received a notice in the night that their son was in some trouble and that they had to get home immediately. They got a motorboat to take them to Clayton. The man who took them over, a good Canadian citizen resident on Wolfe island, failed to go to Kingston or Gananoque on his return and report that he had been across. One of these policemen went to Clayton, found that this boat had registered there, and that there was no registry of its return to the Canadian side. The result was a fine of $50, with possible seizure of the boat. Now that is inflicting unnecessary trouble and suffering on a man who had done a charitable act. Fortunately we were able to get a certain amount of the fine refunded.

Then there are these house to house searches made on a blanket warrant. There is a long island one mile from the American shore. People there are perhaps eighteen miles from any place on the Canadian side where they might deal. People will not go that distance. A high school boy in Kingston who earns a little money in the summer by rowing Americans, getting the use of a boat from one family and another, was found with a little flashlight that he had purchased on the American side for fifty or sixty cents. He was fined $28, taking perhaps all his summer's earnings. Another was found with an old pair of overalls, and he was fined $28 or $29. I grant you it is the enforcement of a statute, but it seems to me small pettifogging interference. These people are not smugglers. I support with all my strength the repression of smuggling and rum running but I protest against the police entering citizen's houses with a blanket warrant and with no object in view but the chance of finding small things like that. I say to the minister and to the committee that one of the officials of the Department of National Revenue, Mr. Sim, who has been promoted, said it was rather a raw piece of work. It is not the sort of work that a great body should do.

Let me tell of another case on this island. Two Americans, brothers, had been coming for over twenty years to a certain summer place, not only while it belonged to its present owner, but in the time of his father before him. They had a lot of tackle, a shotgun, a rifle, and other things that had been in their possession for years, ever since they had first gone there. The police came and demanded of the owner of the house that they be allowed to look around. Remember they were not dealing with highly educated people, and this man did not know what answer to make. They found certain things, one being a paint brush that had been there for twenty years. When he was asked about these articles he was honest enough to tell what had come over from the other side; and having to decide quickly he replied: "They are mine; they were given to me." If he said they belonged to the Americans he knew they would be seized. For that he was fined $238. We got a little of it back, but I say to the minister that these things are regarded along the front as petty and unnecessary interference. I do not believe the police should have a blanket warrant to go into the homes of peaceful citizens, not smugglers, not rum runners, and make search from house to house.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill No. 29, respecting the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company—Mr. Kennedy (Winnipeg).

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 36, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.—Mr. Fraser (Cariboo).

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo) moved:

That the order for the second reading of Bill No. 36, an act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

SUPPLY

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Pay of force and allowances: (including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere island district at $2.25 per diem to assure department against loss through death, arms and ammunition, barrack buildings, repairs and renewals and furnishings, clothing and equipment, communication services, court and legal expenses, criminal investigation branch, enforcement of federal statutes, fuel and light, transport horses and dogs, transport mechanical, dental, medical and hospital, miscellaneous, special services Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, printing and stationery, transport railway, rations, rents, travelling expenses, transport water), $5,603,595.75.

Mr. ROSS: Before six o'clock I had enumerated a number of cases in the vicinity of the constituency I represent in connection with which I considered there had been unnecessary interference on part of the police. Perhaps I have not stated clearly that near the islands I have mentioned there are farmers who, in some cases, are quite close to the American border, even within a stone's throw, and who, perhaps for weeks cannot reach the Canadian market. Owing to winds, ice conditions in spring and fall and road conditions in winter they are practically separated from the Canadian market. While in some cases I must admit the law has been broken, perhaps the circumstances warranted the action taken. But I do think that the infractions were so small that the police did not have the right to go in and search private houses either on slight or no suspicion, and with very little justification. It may be that there are laws which would make the action of the police legal, but if we have such laws they are causing a great deal of dissatisfaction among people who are living under conditions with which probably most of us are not acquainted. It may have been that some of the officers were inexperienced and new to their work. The time has come however when advice could be given quietly so that the officers would proceed properly. I quite admit that perhaps they should not be instructed to let infractions of the law pass; I would not stand for that. But I do think that they should not have the right to enter a private citizen's house and conduct a search with no authority other than a blanket search warrant, and to state to people who may be quite uneducated that they are operating under a proper warrant.

In about ninety per cent of the houses about which I was speaking the police found absolutely nothing, a point which to me shows that they were dealing with good, law abiding people. In another instance they were dealing with two American brothers who had been in the place in question for over twenty years, both during the father's and the son's ownerships, and who had accumulated quite a number of articles. The son who was in the house at the time of the search and who was approached quickly, inadvertently admitted that the goods belonged to him. He felt that if he said they belonged to the two Americans they would be seized and he would lose two good tourists. For that reason he was fined and the fine was collected. I am asking the minister if the officers had authority so to act and to collect fines which reached about $250. I am not going to excuse infringements of the law. I must explain however that the other cases I described were of only a very minor nature, one being that of a little schoolboy who had a flashlight worth about fifty cents, and the other being that of a boy who had a pair of overalls.

I believe the minister is sympathetic enough to know that there is dissatisfaction among these people who fear that their homes can be entered by a federal policeman, even though he does not show a proper cause. This condition is raising a great deal of dissatisfaction, and there is a misunderstanding of the conditions under which the people in question are living. As I say, they are twenty miles from Kingston, twenty-two miles from Gananoque and about fifteen or eighteen miles from the nearest store. I have enumerated all that was found in the search. I believe it is necessary only to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that the authorities must not drive the people too far. In these days we are living under peculiar conditions, and just a little bit of what might be termed autocracy among these people will produce a very great deal of dissatisfaction. As I have stated I do not condone any infraction of the law, nor do I excuse smuggling. I am quite agreeable to supporting the law in every way; if the officers know that smuggling is being carried on they should go armed with a proper search warrant. But unless they have a search warrant I say they are not justified in taking action, and the people resent very much the fact that officers can enter private homes and appear to be at perfect liberty to search as they wish. People feel that their homes are their private possessions, and that while in them they cannot be imposed upon. I am aware of the fact that there may be some who may not be in sympathy with what I say, but I know these people and the conditions under which they live, and I do know that there is dissatisfaction amongst them because of this interference for petty reasons. I think it is only necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and those in charge to have a remedy provided. If the law is there, an unjust law, we should be able to amend it. If the law does work an injustice, people should be given some consideration for what has been necessarily imposed upon them by the forces of nature.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to say a word or two along the same line as that taken by the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross). Those of us who live close to the boundary line have had brought to our attention again and again cases where for some trifling offence the officers have taken action against people who might perhaps be guilty of some infraction of the law, if strictly interpreted, but who yet were innocent of any real intent to break the law, and they have in consequence been subjected to a good deal of hardship and inconvenience. Not only in the community to which the hon. member for Kingston refers, but from the head of the lakes to the Rocky mountains there is a long stretch of territory in which people live very close to the boundary, in many cases a long distance away from a custom house on either side of the boundary, and it is frequently a matter of great inconvenience to them to comply with the terms and conditions of the law. I think in offences of this kind the police not only should be allowed to exercise a great deal of discretion but should be positively instructed to exercise their discretion in petty cases.

I am not going to advocate any relaxation of the general law against smuggling. There may be and undoubtedly there are those who make a practice of bringing goods across the boundary for commercial purposes; they can be easily recognized. But since I have been here a great many cases have been brought to my attention of offences that were so petty that they were not worth considering.

I recall that at one time I was crossing the boundary from Buffalo, and when the officers came on the train they found two working girls from Toronto who had been spending the week-end in Buffalo. The officers searched their baggage and found a little bit of a dress —women's dresses are not very big these days —and this poor girl said that she had bought the dress at Eaton's the week before. She did not have the sales slip with her for the dress, and she said that the officer surely did not expect a girl would visit Buffalo and not take some of her best clothes with her. She insisted that she had bought the dress at Eaton's, but the officer would not take her word. He took the dress and went off with it, and what happened afterward I did not know. It seemed to me at the time that the offence, if indeed offence there was, was so petty that it was not worth while for the officer to pay any attention to it.

On another occasion I remember crossing the line at Windsor and an American came on the train bound for the north country on some business. He had with him a large carton of cigarettes, and the officer allowed that to pass. So we see how inequitably the law is administered at times.

A case was brought to my notice last fall of a man who was supposed to have been harbouring cattle against the law. He was perfectly innocent of any intent to break the law, and if the officer had done his duty he would have tried to prevent any action being taken, but it really looked as if he was anxious to incite the person who felt himself aggrieved to take action in order, I suppose, that a little more might be collected in fees. A word from the officer would have settled the difficulty, but action was taken and the man was fined $15 although he was not guilty of any offence whatever. In cases of that kind I think the officers should not only be allowed to exercise some discretion but should be instructed to exercise discretion in these petty cases. They should not administer the law with all the rigour that is intended for real criminals.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I make a protest to the minister along the same line? My county borders the states of Minnesota and Dakota, and there is a lot of bush in that district. I wish to say at the outset publicly that the officers in my district are about as fine a lot of men as you would want to find anywhere, human and experienced. I do not blame the police. I blame our laws more than anything else. In that bush district, especially during the winter time, a man has to go over to the United States to get his horses shod because he cannot get them shod on this side without going a tremendous distance. So he gets them shod on the other side of the line so that he can haul wood, and suppose he does bring back a few little commodities worth perhaps two or three dollars from the United States. I do not say that he should not have to pay duty on those goods, excise or sales tax, or whatever may be due, but I do say, whether the fault lies with the statutes or not, that the penalty imposed, particularly for a first offence of a petty nature, is too severe, and most of the people living in the district are not in a position to pay the penalty that is imposed. They are not making that kind of money, especially if they are cutting cordwood. Those who have been cutting pulpwood in that district have had a very hard time to make both ends meet. Most of them are French Canadians or Norwegians, with large families. They have been receiving a very small price for their cordwood, and there had been practically no sale of pulpwood for the last two or three years until last fall. I would ask the minister to give this matter his serious consideration. A first offender should not be penalized to the extent he is to-day for committing some petty offence. If a man makes a business of smuggling and is caught at it two or three times the penalty should be imposed, but in these petty offences, particularly a first offence, some discretion should be used by the officers because the present penalty imposes a burden on these people. They may be bringing in two or three dollars' worth of goods without any intention at all of defrauding the Canadian treasury. I trust the minister will give this matter his consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the representations which the hon. members for Kingston City (Mr. Ross), Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) have made with regard to the particular districts which they represent in this house. These hon. members fully understand, I would gather from their remarks, that in each of the instances they have related, offences were committed against the customs or excise laws of Canada. As head of the Department of Justice for the time being and as the minister in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police it would ill become me to advise any member of that force to disregard the law. I have to take the other course; I have to give instructions that the laws as they appear upon the statute books must be enforced. If there is anything unreasonable in our customs and excise laws, if there is anything unjust, if there is anything which should be altered or amended, why not bring in a bill to make the necessary alterations? As the laws stand upon our statute books I have but one duty to perform, and that is to see that they are strictly enforced. There is no discretion permitted to me or to the members of the force in this respect.

I realize the inconvenience and annoyance suffered by people as described by the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross). These people reside close to the border and probably do not think it a very serious matter to break the customs or excise laws of the country in trivial instances. For the information of the hon. member for Kingston I would say that many complaints have been made to the mounted police from business men in Brockville, Belleville and Kingston in connection with the traffic across the river. Because of those complaints, a little greater diligence has been exercised in recent months. One complaint was in connection with the smuggling of motor car radios. Upon investigation it was found that a considerable traffic was going on in these radio sets along lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river. The former members of the preventive service who have since been transferred to the mounted police have been instructed to see that there is a strict enforcement of the customs and excise laws. These annoying search warrants, or writs of assistance, of which the hon. member for Kingston complains, have been provided for in the Customs Act for generations. They allow considerable latitude, in connection with the collecting of revenues. They give practically the right of free search of any suspected premises. I realize that in many instances considerable annoyance has been caused, particularly when no evidence of smuggling has been found. I sympathize with these people, but all I can do is to direct the attention of the Minister of National Revenue to the remarks which have been made. Personally, I cannot turn to the right or to the left; I must instruct the police to enforce the laws.

No doubt the hon. member for Lisgar has given his own views in connection with the incident he related. In all probability he knows the parties and he states that, in his opinion, no offence was committed. However, I gather from his remarks that the man was tried before a magistrate of the province of Manitoba and that a fine was imposed for some breach of the law.

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understood my hon. friend to say that he was fined $15.

Mr. BROWN: Under a misapprehension he pleaded guilty to having the cattle.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A magistrate of the province of Manitoba, over whom I have no jurisdiction, heard the case. The parties appeared before him and a plea of guilty was entered, and I assume the magistrate, in imposing the fine, performed his duty. There was a breach of the law and there was a conviction. I cannot believe that my hon. friend would expect me to ask the members of the force to close their eyes at an incident of that kind. If the mounted police hew to the line and perform their duties and endeavour honestly to carry out the laws of the country, I do not think they should be open to criticism. They should be commended. If there is anything wrong with the law, then this parliament should alter it but so long as the laws remain upon the statute book, it is the duty of the mounted police to enforce them.

Mr. ROSS: Mr. Chairman, we all admit that the minister is perfectly correct, but we contend that the use of a general warrant of that kind constitutes a misdemeanour. Why should a man who has never been under any suspicion and is known to the whole community as an honest and reliable man have his house searched simply because someone has passed up and down in a boat? Honest people who have had their houses searched and nothing has been found certainly have a grievance. If there is reason to believe that a certain house contains anything, a warrant could be gotten out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They do not require to get a warrant; they have a writ of assistance.

Mr. ROSS: I know they have.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is issued under the Customs Act.

Mr. ROSS: I know just what the criticism would be regarding what I am going to say. The time has long since arrived when people should have some defence against the law. There are too many laws which permit entry into a man's home for the purpose of collecting a tax.

The minister mentioned automobile radios. Police officers went in to collect this tax and valued these sets at $60 each. This set may have been smuggled, but they should have dealt with that matter and not gone back five or six times to close up the man's shop and nearly put him out of business. He had been convicted and had paid a fine and he should have been left alone. This radio set should not have been valued at $60. All along that front you can get one for $23 or $24. These people have every reason to kick against the law. I do not hold the minister responsible but I contend that the home of a man who is above reproach should not be open to inspection at any time the police might come along. All I am asking is that discretion should be used in these cases.

Evasions of the law should be punished, but it is going beyond that when a boy is taxed $28 because of a flashlight. In another case a boy was taxed $28 or $29 for an old pair of overalls. As I said at the beginning, I am not attempting to condone law breaking but I submit that in these cases the law has been too severe. A man who is above reproach in his community should not have his house entered at the whim of the police. If the minister were in my place I know that he would make a similar complaint. I am simply doing my duty and appealing on behalf of a large number of people who feel that an injustice has been done. I do not defend a man who has brought in a radio illegally but, as an hon. member across the way has said, I do think that the penalty imposed in certain cases has been too severe. I submit that a man above reproach should not suffer an injustice such as I have described. We all have admiration for British fair play, and we resent anything of this sort. Any man in this house would resent it if a policeman came along, without suspicion, and said, "I am going to search your house." That is all I complain of, and I hope that as a result of bringing the matter forward a little more reason will be exercised. I am quite in accord with what the minister said, that he cannot stand up and say, "Don't do that." I do say however that some exposure, the bringing forward of what is an injustice to some people, will probably result in a rearrangement and some further consideration so that there will be no injustice against good citizens.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The penalties are provided by a statute passed by this house, and I have no doubt that in the case cited by my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) the magistrate took all the circumstances into consideration. I am inclined to think he imposed the minimum penalty.

Mr. ROSS: These matters never came before the magistrate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They might have come before him if the person accused had so desired.

Mr. ROSS: The police simply came in and collected the fees.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is power in the officer himself to assess the fine, but that does not prevent the man from going to the magistrate to have it assessed if he desired to do so. I do think that the fines in trivial cases are rather severe under the Customs Act, and I said so last session. There has been a notable modification in the excise penalties. Now, both these acts will be before the house this year, and if hon. gentlemen feel interested in the subject why do they not move amendments when the acts are under consideration, in respect of penalties or of writs of assistance? So long however as these clauses remain in the act the penalties imposed by that act must be paid.

Mr. GRAY: Before recess my right hon. leader raised a question with the minister as to this vote, which amounts to $5,603,000 odd. It was pointed out that, if not last year, certainly in 1930 this vote was broken up—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Into two pieces.

Mr. GRAY: Not only two pieces but several pieces. Before the minister gives the information he has in connection with this item, I would point out to him that this item as it stands, which the minister said before recess was constituted exactly in the same way last year, though that does not make it any better, is simply a conglomeration of powers and expenditures included in one bracket, as I shall show. Item 177, the item under discussion, reads:

Pay of forces and allowances: (including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere island district, at $2.25 per diem, to assure department against loss through death, arms and ammunition, barrack buildings, repairs—

And so on. As I say, this is the greatest conglomeration of powers and expenditures that one can possibly find embraced within a single pair of brackets. It is true that in 1930 this vote amounted to only $3,000,000 odd, and I grant that since that time we have taken over the preventive service, certain provincial forces, and that warrants no doubt the vote asked for to-night. But in 1930 the item was split up into several subdivisions. We have: Pay of force, including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere island district, at $2.25 per diem, to ensure department against loss through death, $1,279,772.75. Maintenance, including billeting, travelling expenses, forage, fuel and light, clothing, repairs and renewals, etc., $1,625,452.50. To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received whilst in the performance of duty, $10,000. To assist in enforcement of federal statutes—Expenditure chargeable to this vote shall be in connection with such federal police duties as may be defined by the governor in council upon recommendation of the Minister of Justice—$75,000. To provide for special services in connection with the enforcement of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, $50,000. To compensate William Pinsky for medical attendance on his child, who was fatally wounded by police dogs, at Fort Resolution, $500.

That last item was no doubt for that year alone, but in any event we find that this item in 1930 was split up into five subdivisions. What I think the leader of the opposition objects to, as we all do, is that we have built up a huge machine with very wide powers. I have protested in the past, not perhaps in the house but in public, against the building up of this huge police force with such powers as we gave them last year under the Migratory Birds Act for example, by which they became ex officio game officers, with powers under the Indian Act whereby they act as what I might term truant officers, and with other powers. We have so encumbered this force with positions, with offices and with powers that, as the hon. member for Kingston has rightly said, we have brought the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force into disrepute—a force which we of the older generation were taught in our schools to regard as the greatest institution in the dominion. That institution, I say, has been brought into disrepute by reason of the fact that this government, under the minister, or at any rate with his consent, has allowed other departments to delegate to the force duties that should be discharged by themselves. The vote carries a total of $5,600,000 odd, and we are putting into the hands of the superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the power to distribute this vast sum of money as he sees fit. Formerly the amount allotted to the enforcement of federal statutes was $75,000, a sum which apparently was considered sufficient at that time. Now we are leaving in the hands of one man the power to juggle the figures as he sees fit. I think that the minister should reconsider the item. I protested at the time against the added powers delegated to the force and I submit that the minister should now give the committee an assurance that he will recast this vote, not merely from his deputy's books, but with a view to ensuring that one official will not be simply handed a blank cheque to dispose of as he thinks fit. I am asking him to reconstruct the vote so that when we ask him next year how much has been spent in the enforcement of federal statutes he will be able to tell us, or how much has been devoted to this or that specific purpose, and so on down the line. In short, I protest giving a blank cheque to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the way here proposed.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Disrepute nothing. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) says that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has fallen into disrepute. This is the first time I have heard such language used in regard to that force. I have lived for fifty years in the west right alongside them at their headquarters.

Mr. GRAY: The hon. member did not hear what his colleague the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) said about them.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I do not care where he comes from. I heard what my hon. friend said and I want to tell him that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police does not require him or me or anybody else to come to their defence. They have a record of fifty years and it stands good. It is the best record of any police force in the world; I defy the hon. gentleman to go throughout the world and find a police force that has a record equal to that of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He says that they should enforce the law with discretion. I have never known them to do anything else. I have been many a time in their detachments; I have associated with them in many ways; I have known them as intimately as anyone can and when any hon. member says that they have fallen into disrepute, I want to tell him right now that he and I are at loggerheads.

Mr. GRAY: We always have been.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): My hon. friend talks about the boundary. What are we going to do with it? Are we to let United States bootleggers and everybody else in, to commit whatever depredations they please? They did not do it in days gone by and they are not going to do it now.

Mr. GRAY: Will my hon. friend pardon me?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Yes, he needs pardon, a thousand of them.

Mr. GRAY: While I live on the boundary, I never even mentioned it. The hon. member is again confusing the speech of his colleague the hon. member for Kingston City with mine. Why do they not get together?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): My hon. friend was talking about boundaries and everything else.

Mr. ROSS: May I draw attention to the fact that I never mentioned the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I never said that the hon. member did. My hon. friend across the floor did so. Let me give an illustration. On one occasion I was going home on a street car in the city of Regina and I was hanging on to the strap as I had to do. A man came up beside me and said, "Hello Doc." I looked at him; I did not know him from Adam. I said, "I have not seen you for a long time." I was fishing. He said, "I have just got home." I said, "Where have you been?" He said, "I have been home for three years." I said, "Where is your home?" He said, "It is in the States. Thank God, I am back in Canada. This is the country to live in, as I tell the people down there every day. I tell them that if they want good government, law enforcement, they have to go to Canada to get it."

Mr. VENIOT: That was in 1929.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): It has always been the case. For a time in the west we had the provincial police, but now the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are back again and there cannot be found a finer body of men anywhere; they are the very best. Hon. members do not need to be afraid of the mounted police not enforcing the law properly. If there is anything wrong, the law may be wrong, but that is not their fault; that is the fault of my hon. friend and myself. Let us change the law, but so far as the administration of it is concerned, let us leave it to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and it will be properly carried out.

Mr. GRAY: Before I ask the minister to reply to what I have suggested, may I simply say to the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) that I had and still have the highest regard for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and if this government or whichever one it was had left the Royal Northwest Mounted Police as such, we would not be debating any such question in this chamber. I hesitate to recall to the hon. gentleman's attention that there is not now any Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I am sorry that that force has been done away with, having been merged in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the estimate for which is now before us and that this force now includes preventive officers, Migratory Birds Act officers and Indian truant officers. That is my complaint, and it is not the subject matter which the hon. member has just mentioned. I am sorry if he does not know the Royal Northwest Mounted Police no longer exists. If he does not, then it is time he consulted the minister whose estimates are now before us.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Why did the hon. member say that the force was in disrepute?

Mr. GRAY: I am merely discussing the item that is now before the committee, not what may have happened in the past.

Mr. McLURE: What is the difference between the two forces?

Mr. GRAY: Simply that there is no Royal Northwest Mounted Police force.

Mr. McLURE: What is the difference between the new force and the old?

Mr. HOWDEN: There is a very big difference.

Mr. McLURE: What is it?

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member need only consider the men to whom we were accustomed, the big policemen we had in western Canada. They are now a thing of the past.

Mr. GRAY: I think the minister understood the point I tried to make as regards the splitting up of the vote so that we might have the details. He has always been fair in connection with the matter. Perhaps I am wrong and if I am I shall be glad to be convinced. I have expressed my view and I would appreciate hearing his.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no objection to giving the details for which my hon. friend has asked, but I emphatically disagree with him when he says that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have fallen into disrepute. It is a more efficient force to-day than it ever was in the history of the country. It is a better recruited force. The same physical standards are maintained now as have been in effect since the force was first established. There has been no change in that respect. As the years go by, it will no doubt increase in efficiency; experience leads to efficiency in those respects, but in every sense it is a better force to-day than ever it was before. It remains the finest police force in the world. The fact that some new duties have been cast upon it, not with the idea merely of increasing its duties but with the idea of saving a great deal of money to the people of Canada—

Mr. GRAY: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the reason the migratory birds convention and the customs preventive service were placed under the mounted police. The arrangements for this last transfer were made by the former government, as the Minister of National Revenue would state were he in his seat now.

The vote itself is in the same form this year as it was last, but the leader of the opposition wanted some details. In former years there were two or three subdivisions of the vote. I may state roughly it is estimated that the mounted police force costs about $2,000 a man or a little more, but the whole of this vote is not lost to the treasury of Canada. About $1,500,000, or perhaps a little better, comes back into the treasury, not into the hands of the department or of the mounted police force, but into the consolidated revenue fund. So the net cost would be in the neighbourhood of $4,000,000 and not the $5,600,000 which we ask for in the estimates.

The largest item is that of pay and allowances, which was set out as a separate item in the year referred to by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) the amount for pay and allowances this year is $3,549,159.49. The next item is that of maintenance, which amounts to $2,054,436.26. Those two items make up the whole amount of the appropriation for which we ask. As regards pay and allowances, I suppose I do not need to describe this item in greater detail; it represents just what it says, the pay of the force and allowances to the force. The maintenance includes a great number of miscellaneous items. The main items I will give, in round figures:

Rentals throughout Canada	$ 201,000
Rations for the force	110,000
Uniforms and equipment	227,000
Transport	818,000

The amount for transport is made up of four items, as follows:

Water transport, which includes the operation of the marine, that is the customs service	$ 315,000
Railway transport	175,000
Mechanical transport	275,000
Horses and dog transport	53,000
Total	$ 818,000

Mechanical transport includes the cost of motor cars; we have about 400 cars and trucks. Formerly this was a mounted force, but it is not so to-day in the former sense. In the early days they had 600 or 700 horses, but now I think there are just 240 horses. Experience has demonstrated that horses are not fast enough for modern police work. The modern criminal, the hold-up man, is equipped with a fast motor car, and if he is to be overtaken and arrested the policeman must be equipped with a car capable of equal speed. Therefore in trucks and cars we have about 400 all told. These cars average about three years in service. After they have gone from 35,000 to 45,000 miles and break down we turn them in and get an allowance on them on a new car. Of course the cost prices of the new cars are standard prices; the competition is as to who will give the largest allowance on the old cars.

The other items are:

Hospitalization	$ 60,000
Civil service salaries	160,000
Headquarters civil service	32,000
Criminal investigation department	61,000
Printing and stationery	100,000

We have a considerable staff of civil servants throughout the dominion. Then in addition there is a long list of minor items which you might call sundries or contingencies.

After submitting the matter to the treasury board and after consultation with the comptroller of the treasury it was decided to put this whole vote in one item. It was formerly in one item, but it was subdivided into five sections as stated by my hon. friend. One of those items, that for compassionate allowances, will not appear in the future because the amendment to the act passed last week will provide for that. The Narcotic Drug Act is now under the heading of criminal investigation, amounting to $61,000, formerly $75,000.

Mr. GRAY: A separate vote?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is included in this item; it is all one vote. The Narcotic Drug Act vote is wiped out altogether and is now under the general vote for maintenance; there is no special allocation for the drug act enforcement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is but another example of the usurpation of power by this government, although perhaps this is the most aggravated case. It is no use for the minister to tell us that this one vote contains all those items. I am disturbed when he tells us that the comptroller of the treasury, in consultation, I presume with the commissioner of police and himself, has agreed to a sum of $5,615,000 being lumped in one vote. Parliament does not know of and can have no control over the disposition of those moneys. The minister tells us that certain allocations are made; that is true as far as departmental allocation goes, but if there is a deficit on any one of these allocations then it is very convenient for the minister or his commissioner to take money from some other item; parliament has no control. The hon. minister knows perfectly well the reason these votes were subdivided; it was that parliament could have control over the particular vote. Under the former administration there was no possibility of taking a sum from another vote and using it for any vote that was short. But here the government and the commissioner may use their discretion in regard to the whole $5,615,000; they may switch these votes in any way they like.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps the comptroller of the treasury has something to do about it, but parliament has nothing to do with it, and formerly parliament did have that control.

Mr. GRAY: An awful difference in view!

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should say there is. This is not the only instance, but it is the most aggravating one. It is going on in practically every department of the government. Take the Northwest Territories vote, or take the one with which I am most familiar, the Mines Department; they have all been lumped since this government came into office. For the purpose of getting the estimates through the house I will admit it is a good system as far as the government is concerned, but a bad one from the point of view of parliamentary control. When parliament passes them item by item the government as the servant of parliament cannot spend more than the amount allocated under each item, but when the whole sum is lumped the department has a free hand, subject only to the comptroller of the treasury. I have not examined that act very carefully, but I wonder if the comptroller of the treasury will not allow the commissioner and the minister to spend this $5,615,000 for the various items set out without reference at all to whether or not they are keeping within the items given to parliament as making up the amount. If they are voted as separate items, then neither the minister nor any one else can spend any more than the amount allocated unless they secure a warrant for the purpose, which they have to have voted when parliament is convened. The complaint I make is that in all these votes as they have been lumped during the three years this government has been in office, control over the expenditure of public moneys is taken away from parliament. My complaint is not about the administration of the mounted police force; I do not know anything about it; I presume it is being efficiently managed. But not only in this particular vote but in half a dozen other votes the same thing has been done. In the Indian department you see nothing allocated for the maritime provinces, for Ontario, for Quebec—no; it is all lumped in one sum, and the minister and the department can spend that sum without reference to the allocation that formerly existed under specific votes. The government takes a much wider power than parliament ever intended the minister to have. I register now my protest against this system that is gradually taking from parliament the power to control expenditures by votes in the House of Commons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can say only this, that the system has been in vogue for a long time, even under the government of which the hon. member formed a part.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all. Let us for example, consider the administration of the Narcotic Drug Act. Does the minister mean to tell me that that was in this vote?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall point out a few.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Take the administration of the Customs Act: Does my hon. friend mean to say it was lumped in this sum? All these services have been grouped under this one vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And that was the way the railway estimates went through this house for seven or eight years under the government of which my hon. friend was a member. That is precisely the way the aviation vote always went through. That is the way it went through last year, and the way it passed this committee only a few nights ago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not say it did not go through in that way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall read the vote appearing in this year's estimates under the heading "aviation":

Royal Canadian Air Force—expenses in connection with the general maintenance and training of the permanent and non-permanent active air force, and provision of facilities therefor, $1,805,000.

Then, there is a vote of $187,000 for civil aviation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I understand that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the fact.

Mr. VENIOT: It was divided in 1933.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am reading from the estimates which passed this committee only a few days ago.

Mr. VENIOT: In the estimates for the fiscal year 1933-34 the item was divided into two sums of $3,549,159.49 and $2,054,436.26.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Civil aviation in one and military in the other.

Mr. VENIOT: I am talking about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I understand that.

Mr. VENIOT: It is now all lumped in one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And other departments were treated in the same way. The item for railway expenditures as presented this year and last contains only a single vote. Item 253 in this year's estimates provides for a vote of $2,400,000, and no details are given. That is the principle upon which these estimates have been prepared.

Mr. GRAY: Will the estimates which the minister has given with respect to the various details, namely fuel and light, air services and the other services he has outlined, be maintained, and will no vote or any part of it be transferred to another department? Will the minister give that undertaking to the house?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I give that undertaking as far as I am able to do so. These figures are all appropriated, have all been examined by the treasury board, and been included in one item.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But that is not my complaint. The minister is too old a parliamentarian not to know that he has full authority over the $5,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have given the undertaking, and if I am still in office I shall carry it out.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not questioning the minister's good faith, but I am saying to him that votes which formerly were under separate headings and voted for specific purposes are now lumped in one sum. I am not saying that this is the only example. We could turn to the Department of Indian Affairs and find items in one lump sum. I am merely pointing out to the minister and to the committee that there has been a continual usurpation of the powers of parliament, and a tendency to give to the minister the right to spend willy nilly money which formerly had been allocated to separate votes which could not be exceeded. That is my complaint.

Mr. BRADETTE: Under this item I should like to ask three questions. A few moments ago the minister spoke about the high standard of recruited men. I should like to know how recruits are chosen, because in the eight years I have attended parliamentary sessions not a single young man from my section of the country has been able to get into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, although there have been many applications. I know that at the present time when there are so many men out of employment it would be a difficult matter for a new recruit to find his way into that wonderful police force, but I should like to learn from the minister as to what recruits are chosen, or what their qualifications must be. I do not know the exact number of police on the force, but there must be hundreds of them, and if appointments were divided among the 245 constituencies some young men would be chosen from every section of the country. I believe the applicants from my section are typical of our fine young Canadianism, and I should like the minister to enlighten me on this subject.

The second question I wish to ask is this: Is it true, as is currently stated in northern Ontario, that there is no direct communication between the headquarters of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Ottawa and the officers of that body in the arctic zone, and that the only direct communication is through American channels? I pointed out only a few days ago to the acting Minister of Fisheries that if such an anomaly existed it should be remedied at once.

In the third place, I should like to compliment the government for their innovation of two years ago when they gave to the guards around the parliament buildings the big fur coats to be used during the winter months. I believe those coats are made from buffalo pelts, and I should like the minister to tell the committee if the supply is to be extended to all members of the force. I repeat that it was a worthy act. To have those men standing throughout cold nights in the winter months, practically freezing to death, was most unfair, and I should be in favour of issuing the coats to every member of the force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In regard to the last point taken may I say that we are endeavouring to supply all members with these fur coats made from Canadian buffalo hides. I believe in a very short time we will have accomplished the full issue.

In regard to the question about recruiting, may I say that the force is at the present time a trifle over-recruited. There is a wastage in all forces of this kind, and every few months some vacancies occur. The allotment throughout Canada is made by provinces, having regard to the number of men operating in each province. We try to keep our proportions constant, and it is quite possible that when the applicants to which the hon. member referred filed their applications there were no vacancies in the Ontario contingent. When application is made a very critical examination, as to natural intelligence, education and physical development, is given. Any man who passes the examination is then placed on the waiting list, and as vacancies occur they are filled from that list. I may tell my hon. friend that I do not myself see the application lists; that is a matter with which I am not in any way personally concerned. When, on occasions, applications come to me from hon. members, I refer them at once to the commissioner who, in turn, with his subordinates, deals with them without reference to or consultation with me in any respect. I do not know about the applicants to which the hon. member referred, but if he will let me have their names I shall make inquiries and make a report as to how they stand.

As to communications, may I say that we have direct communication by radio through Canada with all the important Arctic stations, but in two or three of the minor and more remote stations we are able to obtain communications only through American stations in Alaska. That condition we hope to remedy some time in the near future. I may say however that we have direct communication now with all important points.

Mr. VENIOT: What is the practice in renting quarters for the mounted police? For instance, let us consider the town of Bathurst in which there is a property under rental for the police. What is the practice and how is it worked out?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have a great many rented quarters throughout Canada. The practice is to look over the particular locality where we desire quarters and to ask the district officer commanding in the neighbourhood to make inquiries as to suitable quarters and as to rentals. When he has done so he makes a report to the head in that particular province, and that report comes forward to the commissioner at Ottawa. After an inquiry as full as we can make it, we select the quarters.

Mr. VENIOT: The reason I ask the question is this. The police headquarters in Gloucester county are in the town of Bathurst. They were very suitable quarters close to the business centre of the town and to the post office. Considerable expense was incurred on those quarters, I do not know whether by the proprietor of the property or by the police department. The property was rented from one named Lee Palmer, and the police continued to occupy those quarters during a period of a year or perhaps two. But all at once word came for a change in the location and the police were moved to almost a back part of the town. It has caused considerable talk and all kinds of rumours as to why the change was made. I would like to have the reason why the property rented from one Lee Palmer was discontinued as police headquarters in favour of the property now occupied. The minister may not be in a position to give that information offhand, but if he will have it looked up I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I shall see that it is looked up as speedily as possible, and I will write my hon. friend giving him the information.

Mr. HOWDEN: Although I quite appreciate what the minister has said, I was rather surprised when he stated a few moments ago that the physical standards of the mounted police had not been changed since the force was first established. Probably no force in the entire service of His Majesty the King enjoyed the reputation of the northwest mounted police. When the queen's jubilee was held in 1897 the finest body of men that attended that celebration from any part of the empire was the detachment from the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and at any gathering of British military units since the mounted police have maintained the same high place. It requires no praise from me to uphold their fame and their reputation for efficiency in this Canadian country. They established a record in western Canada before this country was opened up which certainly has never been surpassed at any time or place. But what I rose particularly to say, and it is not by way of criticism at all, is that when I was a much younger man than I am now I spent a number of years on the western prairies and frequently came in contact with these men, and the surprise that I got to-night was to hear the minister say that the physical standards have not been changed for admission to the force, because at that time the force was composed of big men. I do not ever remember seeing in those days a man in the northwest mounted police who was not able to look down on the top of my head without any difficulty at all. They were splendidly built, manly fellows. I have met many of them in western Canada whose parents had sent them out all the way from India to join the force just for the excellent training they would receive, but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many men in the force to-day who are not tall enough to look down on the top of my head.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Five feet eight inches is the minimum.

Mr. HOWDEN: That lets me out, then. I do not propose to criticize the present standard at all because I believe it is recognized in police circles the world over that the smaller man is the more active and more efficient.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOWDEN: I merely wish to make that observation. While I am on my feet I should like to say that it has been stated a number of times by the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) that the members of the mounted police are authorized to collect penalties for infractions of the law.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just the customs law.

Mr. HOWDEN: It may be that in the wisdom of the department that is the correct thing to do, but it seems to me that if there are not actual openings for abuses in that regard, certainly the people who are guilty of the infractions are not getting the fairest show in the world. If they were brought before a magistrate all the circumstances of the case would be considered and the fine adjusted to fit the crime, so to speak; but if there is a specified penalty for every infraction of the customs law I presume the mounted police must exact it, and, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston to-night, there are a great many cases in which the penalty fixed is entirely too severe.

Mr. ROSS: There is not a specified fine, but the officer is supposed to ascertain the value of the smuggled article, and as I pointed out in the case of an automobile radio that is not by any means the end of it because in that case they took three times the value of the article. There is no specified fine, but there is a principle to be observed. The officer I suppose has to go back to the customs and get the value of the article. That is the principle on which they told me they had acted. I may be wrong and if so I should like to be corrected.

Mr. VENIOT: They must have applied the dump.

Mr. ROSS: Yes, and after they have ascertained the value, there is a fine of twice that amount.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like the minister to state whether he thinks it is a reasonable and proper state of affairs that these constables should be permitted to collect the fine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not want to express any opinion in regard to the Customs Act, the administration of which is not in my department. If I were to give my own opinion I think the penalties under the Customs and Excise Acts are too severe; but they are there, and until they are altered I do not know that I can do anything but enforce them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I want to protest again, as I have done on former occasions, against the constable who lays the complaint having the right to impose the fine.

That did prevail in the old territorial days, but now that magistrates are much more conveniently located and easy of access it does seem to me that the constable who makes the arrest and files the complaint should not have the right to impose the fine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I just want to explain that. It is an erroneous impression that the constable who makes the arrest can try the case or impose the fine. He cannot do it in any part of the country. Under the Customs Act the man who makes a seizure has the power to impose a penalty. I agree with what the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has said with regard to a constable making an arrest and then imposing a penalty. I will go further and say that I have always been of the opinion that the magistrate who issues an information should not try the case concerned. He hears one side of the story when he issues the information and his mind is apt to be made up before he tries the case. In many remote districts this would not be possible, but in general it should be the practice followed.

Mr. VENIOT: I was in the revenue department for a number of years and on many occasions I have made use of the writ of assistance. In my opinion it is very seldom that an officer using this writ will do what is not right. There are cases where this happens, but such cases are the exception. An officer, like every other human being, is liable to err in judgment, but my experience has been that the responsiblity for any injustice done, especially in connection with the fines imposed, lies upon the shoulders of the magistrates. We sometimes see a magistrate imposing different fines for the same offence. He will try a case one day and impose a fine of $200; a similar case will come up the next day and a fine of only $100 will be imposed. How is this done? The magistrate consents to the charge being brought under another section of the act where a lesser fine can be imposed. In that way favouritism is shown and the police officer is blamed instead of the magistrate.

I agree with the minister that a magistrate who takes a complaint should not try the case. When he receives the case his mind is liable to be made up from the story given by the complainant. When he tries the case the next morning he may hear a different story but his mind has been set by the story he heard the day before. The same magistrate should not try the case except in special instances when there should be two magistrates.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart

Mr. CANTLEY: Reference has been made by hon. members on both sides to the high standard of our mounted police force, but there seems to be some change of sentiment in this regard. I suggest to the minister that the hiring out of large numbers of the force to different provinces has not been conducive to the maintenance of the high standard of this organization. This force has rightly had a high reputation in the northwest. The minister will remember the matter in connection with which we had a conversation a few days ago. When this force was formed it was never the intention that it should be hired out to provincial governments and I am convinced that such procedure is not in the best interests of the force.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous expenditure, including remuneration to members of the mounted police force (to be expended under order in council, and not to exceed $1,450 for period from 1st October, 1933 to 31st March, 1935) for assistance in the remission service of the Department of Justice, $15,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister come to any conclusion with respect to pension allowances to members of the mounted police who are in the civil service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A report has been made to council and a decision is pending. I understand there are more involved than the number mentioned by the hon. member, although it is not a large number.

Item agreed to.

Yukon territory—miscellaneous expenditure, including salaries and allowances of court officers, et cetera, $9,500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there a judge located in the Yukon?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes; the same judge has been there for twenty years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thought he was retired.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL HEALTH

The administration of the acts, respecting food and drugs, opium and narcotic drugs and proprietary or patent medicines, including the laboratory of hygiene, $130,000.

Public health engineering, $15,880.

Marine hospitals, including burial expenses of destitute deceased mariners and grants to institutions assisting sailors, $163,500.

The administration of the acts respecting quarantine and leprosy, $150,000.

Immigration medical service, $126,920—Total, $10,334,500.

Mr. TOTZKE: In connection with the first item in this vote, which includes the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, has the decrease anything to do with the administration of that law?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is based on the expenditure of last year. It is found that $130,000 is sufficient for the purpose of administering the acts under the item. The expenditure last year was $126,818.42.

Mr. TOTZKE: What is the position in connection with the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act? Is any headway being made in the mitigation of the opium and narcotic evil?

Mr. MacLAREN: The provisions of the act, as regards the suppression of the habit, are being carefully followed out with the assistance of the mounted police. There were 340 prosecutions last year for various infractions. I am asked whether there is any amelioration. I do not think it is very pronounced. There is a certain improvement, but not very considerable, though the indications are rather favourable. There is still much room for improvement in this respect.

Mr. TOTZKE: Have many actions been taken against the legitimate trade, pharmacists and medical men, in connection with the opium and narcotic drug traffic?

Mr. MacLAREN: Last year one medical man was prosecuted. There are a number of instances in which they are warned and counselled, so that the one prosecution does not indicate the full activity; but in view of the peculiar conditions that exist they proceed with discretion, and the medical men who are on the doubtful list are carefully observed and supervised. As regards the pharmacists, there were no prosecutions during the year.

An hon. MEMBER: They are all good.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, I do not say that exactly, but they are supervised. Their books are inspected at regular intervals to see that they conform to the law and that their sales are recorded in the proper way.

Mr. REID: Has the minister considered what took place in British Columbia last year in regard to the growing of poppies? Out there the growing of poppies has become rather extensive and there were some prosecutions of Hindus and others who had been taking the heads of poppies, drying them and using them in some form or other. It is of particular interest to us in that province to know what the attitude of the government is, whether the department has examined the poppy heads to ascertain how much opium they contain and, in view of the fact that they do contain a little opium, whether restrictions will be placed on the growing of poppies.

Mr. MacLAREN: The matter is receiving consideration. I cannot make a definite statement at the moment but my memory is that the question of suppressing the cultivation of the poppy in this country is now being considered.

Mr. HOWDEN: Speaking of opium and narcotic drugs, it used to be the practice of the authorities in Canada a few years ago—and I know what I am talking about—to send around certain men, whether you call them spotters or stool pigeons or by any other name, to the medical men. Not infrequently it happened that a hard looking individual would turn up at the office of a medical man—an individual who very evidently was an opium addict, who very evidently was suffering and badly in need of relief; and with a great deal of persuasion, occasionally the medical man would be prevailed upon to give him, not a prescription for a narcotic, but some temporary relief. Fortunately I was never one of those medical men, and I am not speaking for myself, but I thought at the time that the practice was contemptible, because shortly afterwards the medical man concerned would be taken to task if not actually fined for what he had done. I rise merely to express the hope that it is no longer the practice of the department to carry on that form of campaign. I should like the minister to make a statement.

Mr. MacLAREN: The practice of using these men as decoys—

Mr. HOWDEN: Decoys, precisely.

Mr. MacLAREN: —is not made use of by the department. I believe it was formerly, although I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. HOWDEN: It certainly was.

Mr. MacLAREN: At any rate, others in connection with the department before my time, as well as myself, have disapproved of instigating infractions of the law and then proceeding to punish the persons concerned. That procedure does not exist to-day.

Mr. HOWDEN: In a current issue of a magazine called Health, I read in an article these two short paragraphs:

> Those interested in the health movement in Canada have felt that it is most important that the principle of dominion leadership in health matters be maintained if we are to ultimately develop a coordinated health program for the dominion and that the most important unit in such a program should be the dominion Department of Health. Any weakening of this department would appear to be a serious matter.

Therefore the announcement of a few weeks ago that the division of child welfare which had rendered admirable service for more than ten years under the distinguished direction of Doctor Helen MacMurchy had been dissolved and its functions turned over to one of the voluntary associations, came as a distinct shock to everyone interested in the progress of public health in Canada.

Evidently the division of child welfare, which most certainly had been doing excellent work in this country and for the federal government, has been discontinued. Might I inquire of the minister what led up to the discontinuance of this really excellent branch? It is a well known fact that Doctor MacMurchy was one of the most able physicians in the entire dominion.

Mr. MacLAREN: The work as carried on by the division of child welfare within the department has been transferred to an organization called the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is a voluntary organization, is it not?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes. Far from there having come to my notice anything in the way of criticism, a very large number of letters have been sent to me personally commending and approving this change. It has been remarkable how from all parts of the country there have been expressions of approval of the change. All the former objectives of the division of child welfare are now being carried out and, I believe, more effectively and efficiently by the organization to which this work has been transferred. As the change has occurred within only a comparatively few months, one is not justified in speaking of actual results and experience on the basis of a few months' operation. On the other hand, so far as the work has gone under the new organization, the result is promising. If the change does not prove a success, it can be altered again, but the change was not made on the basis of there being any doubt of its being a success. There is, however, still the alternative that should the new method not be satisfactory, the former procedure can easily be restored, but that is not what I am looking for as the result. The name of the secretary of this voluntary organization under which the work is now being carried on is, I think, familiar to all hon. members, especially to those who are interested in social welfare, Miss Charlotte Whitton, who is very active and efficient and who is familiar with conditions throughout the country. In the arrangement which we have made with this organization there is a special provision that its committee shall have on its board two medical men in Ottawa, one who is a specialist in obstetrics, and the other a specialist in connection with children's ailments and diseases. They are there as advisers to the council. In addition, Doctor Heagerty, director of the medical health branch of this department, is also a member of the council and in cases where advice is required or sought, it is given by this committee of an obstetrician, a pediatrician and the head of our own health service who has the diploma of public health. One advantage of the change is that those who are engaged in the work come into closer contact with the people than was the case with our division of child welfare previously. The Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare has branches throughout the country and therefore is able to come into intimate contact with all centres. Nothing but good will come from its work and the principles of social welfare and health and the care of maternity cases and children will be brought to the people more widely and in a more intimate way than has been the case in the past.

As regards publications, the Department of Health issued from time to time suitable pamphlets for the instruction of mothers and families. This is not being discontinued, but it will continue to be carried on by the organization which I have mentioned and there will be the advantage of the articles being reviewed and approved by the specialists of whom I have spoken and who are now engaged by the year for their advice and instruction.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is the government making a grant to this Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare?

Mr. MacLAREN: The previous grant was $10,000; with the ten per cent cut it may have been $9,000. We are now paying about $12,600 to the council. There is considerably less expense under the change than there was previously.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is this the only voluntary association of this type that is receiving a grant from the government?

Mr. MacLAREN: I see that last year we gave this organization, the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, $9,000; previously it had been $10,000. Then there is a grant to the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene.

Mr. HOWDEN: This year?

Mr. MacLAREN: This year. These are the most akin. There is a grant of $18,000 to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind; a grant of $22,500 to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association; a grant of $9,000 to the Victorian Order of Nurses; one to the St. John Ambulance Association, and one to the Red Cross.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the minister think it is good business to delegate to a social organization the functions formerly performed by the department in connection with child welfare? The Department of National Health is a comparatively new department under this government, and I understood at its inception, that its purpose was to give leadership to the social agencies all through Canada that were doing health work. It is true there are departments of health in the different provinces, but I understood that this department was to lead and coordinate the efforts of all the health organizations. To me as a layman this change seems a step in a backward direction. I know from my experience in the Department of Immigration that when we delegated the functions of the department to organizations for the purpose of bringing immigrants into the country it only led us into difficulties. I protest against this move; I do not believe it is good business to delegate to a society, headed by Charlotte Whitton or anybody else, the functions formerly performed by the Department of National Health. I think the minister will find that as time passes too much power will be usurped by an organization of this sort. It is all very well to say that the chief health officer of the department sits in as a member of the board, but he will be entirely overshadowed. Moreover, constant requests will come from this organization for further assistance. It seems to me that the national health is important enough to require that this department should retain the powers with which it was clothed, in regard to child welfare as well as other activities. I take it that child welfare is one of the most important functions of the department. I do not know much about this council, it may have great merit, but I assume it is much the same as other organizations of the kind, and to hand over to it the powers and authorities formerly held by the department to my mind is a step in the wrong direction. I regret that the minister has taken it, and I protest against such a policy.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think perhaps the hon. member was not in the chamber when I gave the reasons for what is being done, because I believe that if he had heard what I said he would not be so strong in his opposition. However, I recognize the right of different people to hold different views. I believe it is a step in advance; he believes it is retrograde. Within a year or so we shall see who is right. I ask the members of the committee to bear it in mind and see which prophecy proves nearer to the truth.

My hon. friend says that the director of the health division will be overshadowed; I think he does not know him. From my experience I do not believe he will be overshadowed; either the whole affair will proceed satisfactorily and in the interests of the country, or it will not be continued. It is well safeguarded by the two specialists I have spoken of, who are here and available every day to advise the association. The work instead of being curtailed will be considerably enlarged and extended.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will be if you pay for it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Excuse me; that is not borne out by the facts. There is a saving in expenditure rather than an increase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon friend will allow me, if he lives long enough—

Mr. MacLAREN: May I continue, Mr. Chairman? I shall be glad to give my hon. friend an opportunity in a moment. At the present time there is an economy as far as expenditure goes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There always is at the start.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend is entitled to hold a different view. But I think there is a very great deal to lead us to believe that by this change there will be a gain in efficiency in looking after maternity cases and children and social conditions.

Mr. SPENCER: I wish to support the criticism of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) regarding what we might call this division of labour by the Department of National Health. I cannot understand why the care of child welfare was taken from the department. I am sorry that having to be away from here at a committee meeting to-night I did not hear what the minister said earlier in the evening, but it seems to me we are not making nearly enough of our federal health department. I admit that there is a health department under each provincial government, but in my opinion a great deal of work could usefully be done in coordinating the activities of the different provinces through the central agency. It seems to me that we may as well do away with the department entirely, if it is not going to be any more aggressive than it has been in the last three or four years. Without spending a great deal more money but with much more activity we could help the provinces. At the present time one hardly ever hears of anything being done by the federal department, and as the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has said, I feel that in turning child welfare over to a private institution a mistake has been made.

Mr. HOWDEN: A few moments ago the minister mentioned the name of Miss Charlotte Whitton. I was going to ask him if it was due to this lady's influence that the change had been made so that the federal department of health had discontinued activity in child welfare and had transferred the work to this voluntary organization known as the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare. I understand Miss Whitton is secretary of this institution, and it is reasonable to ask if her influence had anything to do with the change.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would not like to suggest anything of the kind with regard to a distinguished lady such as the one in question. Perhaps the question was not asked seriously; I hope not. I know that those who are connected with the federal council were willing, the department was willing, and arrangements were therefore made.

Mr. HOWDEN: A short time ago the minister told us that the federal government was making grants to institutions connected with mental hygiene, the blind, child welfare, tuberculosis, the Victorian Order of Nurses, the Red Cross and the St. John Ambulance Association. One very beneficial organization, the Canadian Social Hygiene Council, has not been considered in this grant. True, its activities deal only with venereal disease, but that disease is one of the greatest menaces to the health of our people. It seems strange that all the organizations named should be honoured with assistance from the federal government but that no assistance should be given to the very active organization I have named. Further than that, the federal government have withdrawn the $200,000 grant from the provinces, and there is probably no other medical organization throughout the length and breadth of the land that means so much to the welfare of our people as does the movement to exterminate venereal disease. May I suggest to the minister, in view of the fact that so many organizations are receiving assistance, that the grant should be extended to this very laudable movement, and that they may be empowered to proceed with a work which in many parts of the country has been temporarily discontinued.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), and I admit that if it were possible to give assistance to this organization it would be quite proper. Indeed, other organizations might be included in the list, which I do not regard as by any means exhaustive. The organizations were included through selection more than anything else. I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the operations of the Canadian Social Hygiene Council are not entirely restricted to venereal disease. They deal with all forms of disease.

Mr. HOWDEN: But chiefly with venereal troubles.

Mr. MacLAREN: That may be, but the fact is that the council deals with all forms of public health measures; I have learned that from the officials. Some years ago $200,000 was voted, and later reductions were made, first to $150,000 and then to $100,000. I wish to point out however that the vote was not given to the social hygiene council.

Mr. HOWDEN: It was given to the provinces; I understand that.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, the vote to the provinces has been discontinued.

Mr. HOWDEN: Quite so.

Mr. MacLAREN: While I do not wish to advise the association as to what it should do, because that is a matter which must be left to their own judgment, I have said to their officials that it would be better for them to restrict their work to venereal disease. I believe there is advantage to be gained in concentrating on something of an important and definite nature. I must admit that the Canadian Social Hygiene Council is not on the list I have named; I should be pleased if it were. I should not like to encourage the idea of applications for grants from other sources. The object of giving the $200,000 originally was to give a start to the movement throughout the provinces, also with the hope that once it was operating and was seen to be an effective measure the provinces would be able to carry on. It may be that the work is being carried on to a lesser degree, but good work is still being done.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister realizes that by the very fact of cancelling the grant of $50,000 to the provinces, he is destroying the only connecting link that existed between the federal government and the departments of health in the various provinces. Two years ago when we discussed this question and begged the minister to reestablish that grant, he stated that he would take the matter under consideration. I wonder if he would not take under consideration this year the desirability of providing in the supplementary estimates the sum of $50,000 for this purpose. I know that the departments of health in the various provinces, more especially in the province of Quebec, were depending absolutely on the portion they were receiving of that grant of $50,000 to carry on their special services, on venereal disease, for instances, as mentioned by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden).

There is another question which I would ask the minister to consider. He stated a moment ago that he had transferred certain duties to a special body in Ottawa which seemed, so far as I could judge by the minister's statement, to act in the main locally in Ottawa, and perhaps in Ontario. I wonder if the minister has taken the trouble to inquire what has been done in the province of Quebec.

Last year I called the minister's attention to the fact that the province of Quebec had adopted a different system from any other province so far as child welfare was concerned. Ten years ago what they call sanitary units were organized under the direction of one who is now the superintendent of health in the province of Quebec, Doctor A. Lessard. The movement was started in the county of Beauce, and the results there, so far as child welfare was concerned, were so marvellous, that it spread until at the present time we have in the province fifty-five sanitary units, each with a medical officer paid by the provincial government, and in the unit, when it embraces more than one county there are two or three nurses who are also paid by the local government. They are given an allowance to enable them to operate all through the summer, and they visit not only the principal centres in each county, but even the most remote sections. They give lectures on hygiene and prevention. They visit every family in each community. They advise mothers and instruct them in the precautions to be taken in case of isolation, and so forth. They teach them what precautions to take against infectious diseases, and give instruction on all other subjects relating to hygiene. These units have been operated by the province, and the only contribution which the province receives in support thereof is $12,000, which is subscribed by the county itself, the remainder being paid by the government.

So far as venereal diseases are concerned, if the minister will take the trouble to read the last report on public health issued by the province of Quebec, he will discover that we are practically depending entirely on the grant received from the federal government to carry on the campaign against venereal diseases.

As to tuberculosis, we have adopted in the province of Quebec, over and above the care of the people affected with tuberculosis, the system prevailing in France called the Granger system. It has also been adopted in England and in parts of Scotland. It consists of segregating from contaminated families in the big centres the children of families who are not affected by the disease. They are placed in the country under the supervision of the parish priest, and are visited daily by the officers of the health unit. Of course the system is expensive. It costs nearly $20 per month to maintain each child, and the whole of that expense is borne by the provincial government. What surprises me is that in view of all these new methods that are being adopted all over Canada, the federal department of health has never taken the trouble to ascertain through the college of surgeons of the different provinces what method could be adopted to coordinate the work done in the provinces with that which is being done by the federal department of health. It seems to me that the federal department should take the lead in this matter, and that it should first of all ascertain through the different medical colleges what could be done to improve the situation. Then reports can be received from the provinces, and if you had a conference with the provinces on public health it seems to me that you would arrive at much better and more material results than you have to-day, under the haphazard method that is now being followed of transferring over to famous ladies or others the duties of the department in regard to public health.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have listened with great pleasure to the views put forward by my hon. friend from Rimouski, who has advocated with much vigour several very excellent things. It is particularly gratifying to me that he has done so because he has advocated the cooperation that has been carried on by the department for a number of years. We recognize that the health units have prospered and done very excellent work in the province of Quebec, and we are pleased that that is so. It is to their credit; but it is also their duty. That is the idea of the whole health organization in this country, that the provinces should do this work, and I think that it can be said that the province of Quebec has led in the matter of health units. Why? Outside of the characteristics of the people of the province of Quebec—

Sir EUGENE FISET: Because they had a good minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And a good government.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think one of the main reasons is that their clergy have supported that movement and encouraged their people to have confidence in it, and so the health units have been conspicuously successful in the province of Quebec.

My hon. friend from Rimouski said that the provincial government had been the basis and support of that work. He does not recall perhaps that the Rockefeller Foundation, if my memory serves me, gave a substantial grant for a certain number of years to support the initiation of these health units. That grant may have ceased; I rather think the time has elapsed.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No, they are still subscribing.

Mr. MacLAREN: They still are. Well, I think it would be fair to mention that to the members of the house.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have no objection whatever. I praise the movement.

Mr. MacLAREN: The Rockefeller Foundation has been a rather generous benefactor. I am delighted that my hon. friend from Rimouski has advocated another thing that we are doing. Please do not forget that we have a very useful coordinating and cooperating organization called the Dominion Council of Health, which meets twice a year in Ottawa. I believe the next meeting will be in June, and I ask all those who are interested in health matters to attend the meetings and see what it is all about. The council is composed of a health representative from every province, a representative of the agriculturists, a representative of Labour, and two from the women's organizations. A specialist from the Toronto university also attends, in addition to one of our own officials. At these meetings, which last two or three days, an effort is made to coordinate the work of health officials throughout the dominion. Notes are compared and when considered advantageous, there is a standardization of records and statistics relating to the treatment of infectious diseases and all such matters. Matters of interest and value to health officials are discussed. The dominion tries to take the lead in health matters, and, speaking in a very modest way, I think we have taken that lead. This organization is called together at the expense of the federal government and papers are read and discussed. I do not think there is anything which could prove more useful and valuable. A small pamphlet on health is published and distributed to the medical men throughout Canada. Many of them write in and say they are delighted to have it. This is another method of coordinating public health matters in this country. In any consideration of these matters I do not think we should omit mentioning the Dominion Council of Health.

Mr. MITCHELL: After listening to this discussion I have come to the conclusion that if we go much further the only thing we will have left is the name. In my opinion, the minister has not yet given a reason for the abolition of the child's welfare department and the delegation of certain powers to an outside organization. I have not been convinced that this change was necessary and I should like to know why it was made.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have gone over this matter twice already, but apparently the hon. member was not in the chamber.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was present.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be pleased to go over it once more. We believe that there has been a gain in efficiency and an increase in activities by reason of this change.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand from that that the department was inefficient prior to the change being made?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, but there are degrees of efficiency and I believe we have added to the efficiency. In any case a change would have been necessary because the director of child welfare had exceeded the limits of the requirements by two years. Even apart from that reason, I believe this change will be in the interests of the people of Canada. As far as child and mothers' welfare matters were concerned, the department could not come in actual contact with the people, but this condition is now being corrected. The new organization is not divorced entirely from the department. The senior officer of our health division is a member of the council and a member of the committee, and with him are two others, one an obstetrician and the other a specialist in child diseases. These gentlemen advise the council and supervise its work here in Ottawa. The publications which were formerly published by the department will still be published by the new organization in an improved form.

As I said before, this new method may be discontinued at any time. Hon. members need have no apprehension that we are bound to carry it on forever, but I do not anticipate that there will be any request for a change back to the old method. Our object is to pursue this matter in the best way possible and that could not be done under the old arrangement. The department could not reach the people to the same extent as this council will be able to do. They have branches from one end of Canada to the other and will be more closely in touch with the homes of our people. If our aim is to educate and help the people, I believe this organization offers the best method of doing so.

Mr. MITCHELL: How much was saved by this change?

Mr. MacLAREN: The expenditure last year for salaries, travelling expenses, printing —we did a good deal of printing in the way of pamphlets—and stationery, amounted to $19,217.99. For this year we estimate the salaries at $6,165; travelling expenses at $358.85; stationery and printing at $1,818.51, making a total of $8,342.36. That is the estimate I have here but I do not think it is quite accurate; I believe the expenses will be about $9,500.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do I understand there will be a saving of about $10,000?

Mr. MacLAREN: The saving will not be anything like that. I gave the figure for last year, $19,000 or a little over. Under the new arrangement, allowing for the grant, and some additional expenses, I would put it at $13,500 as my estimate.

Mr. HOWDEN: It might be as well for us as a committee actually to realize and to understand what an important change such as this will mean, and the only way we can do so is to have it indicated by the minister what the activities of the former child welfare department of the federal health department were, and what activities are contemplated by the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare.

Mr. MacLAREN: The activities are the same. The advantage I believe is that they will be carried out in a broader and more extensive way.

Mr. HOWDEN: The minister has said on several occasions to-night that the federal department of child welfare did not come in contact with the public.

Mr. MacLAREN: No, I did not say that; I said, not to the same extent. I say so many things that are changed just a little bit, not intentionally, but they are changed. I did not say that they did not come in contact with the public; that is impossible. I said that they did not come in contact, nor could they come in contact, to nearly the same extent as they will under the new organization.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have one question to ask with reference to item 194, which deals with the important matter of national health. In regard to the administration of the acts respecting opium and narcotic drugs, may I ask the minister whether the jurisidction of the department has been confined to the enforcement of these acts in Canada or whether extraterritorial jurisdiction has been exercised by the department outside the dominion?

Mr. MacLAREN: As far as the actual work goes, being instrumental in taking steps to suppress the traffic, the efforts are entirely within Canada; prosecutions naturally are within Canada. But our sphere does extend beyond Canada, to this extent, that we send our special narcotic official to Geneva, generally once a year, to take part in the deliberations there and to assist in the drawing up of regulations regarding the restrictions and suppression of narcotics.

Mr. McINTOSH: That means, then, that there is international cooperation with respect to these acts?

Mr. MacLAREN: Oh yes, quite so.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister has called attention to the fact that the department has saved about $10,000 in making the change, taking the work of child welfare away from his department and turning it over to a private association. He informed the committee that better work is being done and that more people are being helped through this change. I would ask, therefore, where was money wasted in the earlier arrangement?

Mr. MacLAREN: First of all, I did not say $10,000. I think the figures will show about five thousand five hundred.

Mr. SPENCER: I think the saving is between $5,000 and $6,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend asks where money was wasted. I am pointing out where the saving will be.

Mr. SPENCER: But where did we waste money before?

Mr. MacLAREN: In the department there was a medical director besides four stenographers. That expense was maintained and is now eliminated, because the organization is now being carried on by the council on child and family welfare.

Mr. SPENCER: Did four stenographers make up the difference of between $5,000 and $6,000? At that rate they are paid more than most stenographers.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not the exact figures; they have not been finally adjusted. I say however that there is a saving because there will be a lesser expenditure of several thousand dollars, I presume, about five. But I do not wish to make an exact statement. There will be less expenditure of some thousands of dollars under the new arrangement.

Mr. SPENCER: I would ask a question with regard to the taking away of the grant from the Canadian Social Hygiene Council. The minister admits that some excellent work has been done by this association. Personally I do not know of any health association in Canada that has done more and better work across this dominion. It has probably been a very important link connecting up the work of the health department in the various provinces. Up to a few years ago they were getting a grant of $100,000. The minister himself admits the value of this association and the good work they have done. I understand that the grant has been entirely discontinued for two years. Why was it discontinued?

Mr. MacLAREN: They never had a grant of $100,000.

Mr. SPENCER: How much was it?

Mr. MacLAREN: That grant went to the provinces, not to the social hygiene council.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister give the exact amount that did go to the social hygiene council?

Mr. MacLAREN: The last grant given a few years ago was $10,000, although it had been larger than that. There is naturally a little confusion about the grant that has been going to the provinces and administered by them, but the last grant to the social hygiene council was $10,000.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. SPENCER: Considering the excellent work that association has done, will the minister inform the committee why the grant was taken away?

Mr. MacLAREN: I know nothing about these terms; I did not use the word excellent. I said it was a good organization.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the difference?

Mr. MacLAREN: I said that there was a selection of them and all the organizations unfortunately are not receiving grants. Further, I would like again to point out that social hygiene does not restrict itself to venereal diseases and I presume that were there a grant to-day, it would again go to the provinces where it is concentrated in dealing with that disease. The social hygiene council, so far as I am aware, deals with all conditions of ill health.

Mr. HOWDEN: The minister has stated once or twice in the course of the debate that the federal department of health was coordinating the health services of the provinces through the medium of the Canadian health council, and I think he said that this body met once or twice a year—

Mr. MacLAREN: Twice.

Mr. HOWDEN: —to discuss matters and that through their deliberations and activities, the activities of the various provinces in health matters were coordinated. Some years ago I had the pleasure of attending one of the meetings of that body, and if I remember well, it discussed a wide variety of subjects, all no doubt pertaining to the health of the Canadian people, but, as I understand the situation, at that time those papers were merely read and discussed and possibly some recommendations were passed on to the federal health department. I was not able to see from their activities that they would have any possible influence on the health services of the provinces. If we are going to give the citizens of Canada a uniform, standardized policy of health, we require a statutory control exercised by the federal government through its health department. We must have a standardized control with the nature and degree specified of the activities of the provinces with regard to health services to their citizens. In order to get that, I am of the opinion that the federal government will have to contribute to the expense of such a program, because undoubtedly it will entail considerable expense. I do not think we shall ever have an entirely satisfactory health program in Canada until we have such a coordination of the services of the provinces, and we can have a definite coordination only through statutory control exercised by the federal government. So far as the Canadian health council is concerned, although, as I stated before, I have attended one of its meetings, I cannot see that it can have very much influence on the health services of the provinces.

Mr. MacLAREN: There again we do not hold the same view. My opinion very clearly is that it exerts a valuable measure of cooperation, bringing together the health officers in the different provinces and others interested in that work. The result is just the same as one would have in a conference —the benefit of an opportunity to discuss matters with one's fellow health officers. There is no question that it is of much value.

I should like to make this statement on the subject generally; those who have been speaking have been pointing out matters to be criticized and suggesting improvements. One might gather from that that public health in Canada is not advancing. That is an incorrect impression. I have not heard one member either to-day or yesterday referring to the marked advance being made in Canada every year. I can speak for my own province that had the first minister of health in Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: The first in the world.

Mr. MacLAREN: Perhaps in the world. This gentleman was formerly, I think, a minister in the cabinet of the hon. member for Gloucester. I refer to Doctor Roberts, who was, I certainly was under the impression, the first minister of health in Canada and I daresay, as the hon. member for Gloucester says, the first minister of health in the world.

Let us consider for a moment the case of New Brunswick, because I think we can learn a good deal from that little province. Public health there has advanced steadily; it has kept pace with the progress of similar systems anywhere else. Let me now refer to Ontario. Without making undue comparisons, I think Ontario stands at the top, so far as public health in Canada is concerned. Is there no improvement there? Why, it is striking. All I ask is that we do not have the impression and that the impression does not go out to the public that we are not gaining ground steadily. The same thing applies to the other provinces; Quebec and the others are doing excellent work. I have no doubt the degree of improvement has varied in different provinces according to their means and perhaps for other reasons, but the fact is that public health is from year to year gaining substantial ground in Canada, notwithstanding the objections advanced with regard to leadership and organization.

Mr. MYERS: I would like to draw the attention of the minister, the committee and especially the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) to the fact that the little province of Prince Edward Island has had a minister of health since 1927.

Mr. VENIOT: I might state for the information of the hon. member that New Brunswick was the first province to have a separate department and minister of health and that department was established in 1918.

Mr. MYERS: I bow to the superior wisdom of the hon. member.

Mr. SPENCER: We have had remarkable figures given for the province of Quebec with regard to the work being done under the full time health units. It is well recognized that the establishment of these health units was made possible through the generosity of the Rockefeller Foundation. I understand that foundation gives grants, probably one-third of the cost, for the first three years and then withdraws its support. A number of provinces have hesitated to develop that sort of health care because of the fear that when the Rockefeller Foundation stops its grants, the provinces and the municipalities could not afford to continue the work. I should like to congratulate most heartily those who have been carrying on the work in Quebec, because it has been productive of splendid results. I believe British Columbia comes next in the number of full time health units. Alberta has two experimental units. Recognizing the fact that the Rockefeller grant is for only three years, I would ask the minister whether he has given thought to the matter of asking the government through his department to continue the grant when the support of the Rockefeller Foundation is withdrawn?

Mr. MacLAREN: Unfortunately the hon. member was not in his seat when we were discussing the Rockefeller grants and these health units of Quebec that had done so well. As to the hon. member's question, I do not wish to indicate any expectation that it will be carried on this year.

Mr. SPENCER: Has the minister given sufficient thought to the matter to cause him to advocate that the federal government take the responsibility of carrying on where the Rockefeller Foundation leaves off? If that is done I am sure other full time health units would be established throughout Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: I quite understand that it would have to apply to all parts of the country; it could not be restricted to one province. All I can say is that we will make a note of the matter and look into it and consider it further. But I do not wish to give any assurance in that regard. Anything done would have to apply to all the provinces.

Item agreed to.

Pensions payable to men on active service, Northwest rebellion 1885, and general pensions, and civil flying, $22,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister explain the reduction of $4,000 in this item?

Mr. MacLAREN: The amount is based on what was expended last year. It chiefly concerns those who were in the Northwest rebellion, and that was a good many years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the number of these pensioners left now?

Mr. MacLAREN: The amount expended last year was $21,510.78; slightly less than the vote for this year. There are 49 disability pensioners and 6 dependent pensioners, a total of 55. For the Northwest rebellion these are the items: 23 privates, 1 corporal, 1 sergeant, 1 warrant officer and 1 lieutenant, a total of 27; and 1 dependent. Then there are a few others, for instance one under civil flying. When members of the civil service fly on duty—which is quite seldom, I understand—they would come under this. There is one such case.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, PETAWAWA PROJECT

Mr. COTNAM:

1. How many men have been employed on relief project No. 40 at Petawawa?
2. How many men are employed there at the present time?
3. What amount of money has been spent on the said project?
4. What amount of money has been spent on material and supplies?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. 2,597 up to February 28, 1934.
2. 1,008 on March 15, 1934.
3. $272,710 up to February 28, 1934.
4. $168,610 up to February 28, 1934.

Mr. COTNAM:

What amount of money was spent on the surfacing of roads at the Petawawa military camp under the emergency legislation of 1930?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

No money was spent on the surfacing of roads at the Petawawa military camp under the emergency legislation of 1930; but $25,868 was spent on this account out of the appropriation of the Department of National Defence during the fiscal year 1930-31.

GREEN RIVER, N.B., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Who has the contract for carrying His Majesty's mail from post office, Green River, to railway station?
2. When was contract awarded?
3. At what price?
4. When does such contract expire?
5. Has there been a change in the contract?
6. Has the preesnt contractor been notified that the contract will be abrogated or cancelled in the near future?
7. If so, for what cause or reason, if any?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. Martha Theriault.
2. July 1, 1926.
3. $132 per annum.
4. June 30, 1934.
5. No.

6 and 7. The contract will expire on the 30th June, 1934 and a new contract was authorized with Mr. Camille Azzard from July 1, 1934.

PARENT, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. What is the name of the postmaster at Parent, Madawaska, New Brunswick?
2. What is his age?

3. When was he appointed?
4. Has there been any complaint against him regarding the way he discharged his duty?
5. Has any recommendation been made for his removal?
6. If so, by whom, and for what cause?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. Michel Lebel.
2. About 87 years.
3. August 1, 1880.
4. Not recently.
5 and 6. See answer to question 4.

THREE RIVERS POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Does one of the government members of this house occupy an office in the post office building at Three Rivers?
2. If so, how many rooms does he occupy, and are such room or rooms furnished?
3. If so, where and from whom were the furnishings purchased, on what date, by whom, and what price was paid for same?
4. Is the said building the property of the dominion government?
5. Does the occupant pay rent; if so, how much?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Office space in the public building at Three Rivers, which was vacant and not required for public purposes, is temporarily occupied by the member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice for the transaction of public business only and for the convenience of the public.
2. (a) Two; (b) yes.
3. No new furniture purchased. That supplied was surplus used furniture on hand.
4. Yes.
5. (a) No; (b) answered by (a).

COUTURIER, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is Mr. Edmond Levesque still postmaster at Couturier, county of Témiscouata?
2. If not, when did he cease holding such position, why and upon whose request?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. No.
2. (a) February 7, 1934; (b) on account of unsatisfactory location; (c) C. E. Dubé.

DES ETROITS, QUE., POSTMISTRESS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is Miss Aurore Boisvert still postmistress at des Etroits, county of Témiscouata?
2. If not, on what date did she cease occupying such a position, and why?
3. By whom was she replaced?
4. Upon whose request was the new postmaster appointed?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. No.
2. (a) December 6, 1933; (b) following her marriage she tendered her resignation in accordance with the terms of order in council P.C. 517, dated March 12, 1921.
3. Achille Ratté.
4. Recommended by C. E. Dubé.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What amount of insurance was carried on crown property under the control of the Vancouver board of harbour commissioners for the year 1933?
2. What was the total premium paid on said insurance?
3. With what companies was the said insurance placed, and who were the agents of the companies with whom said insurance was placed?

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, CONTRIBUTIONS BY PROVINCES

Mr. COTNAM:

What amount of money was contributed by each province under the Unemployment Relief Act for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934, respectively?

POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP INQUIRIES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Were inquiries regarding political partisanship held since 1930, respecting the following postmasters, Johnny April, of Gironde; N. Ouellet, of Lamy South; J. Michaud, of La Richardiere; M. Saint-Pierre, of Le Petit Bois Franc; D. Lebel, of Montagne Ronde; Antoine Landry, of Notre-Dame du Lac; C. Saint-Pierre, of Pied du Lac; Andre Beaulieu, of Raudot; Joseph Viel, of Squatteck, and J. B. Plourde, of Sully?
2. If so, were they dismissed following such inquiries?
3. Upon whose request was each of such inquiries granted?

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Were inquiries regarding political partisanship held since 1930, respecting the following postmasters, Edmond Levesque, of Couturier; Thomas Dube, of Denonville; Joseph Michaud, of Lamy; Alcide Beaulieu, of Packington; Omer Sirois, of Riou; Edmond Rioux, of St-Arsene; Charles Bosse, of St-Eusebe?
2. Is each of the above-named postmasters still discharging duties of such office?
3. If not, upon whose request and on what date was each such postmaster dismissed?

VALIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow on the following proposed resolution:

That the orders in council which have been published in the Canada Gazette between the 9th day of September, 1932, and the 31st day of December, 1933, in accordance with the provisions of section 75 of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 113, R.S., 1927, and which were laid on the table on the 26th day of January, 1934, be approved.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Explain.

Mr. MURPHY: This is more or less of a formal motion which has passed in similar form at each session of parliament, and is in accordance with the provisions of section 75 of the Dominion Lands Act. As the resolution states, the act provides that all regulations passed during the year shall be approved by resolution. The orders in council referred to were tabled in the house on January 26, 1934.

SUPPLY

NICKEL—PROPOSED CONTROL OF PRIVATE ARMAMENT MANUFACTURE AND OF EXCHANGE OF RAW MATERIALS FOR WAR PURPOSES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to discuss the control of nickel, and I beg leave to move the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted:

Whereas, nickel is an important material in the manufacture of armaments;

Whereas, Canada furnishes ninety per cent of the world's nickel;

Whereas, according to the League of Nations' reports the activities of the armament manufacturing concerns have been a considerable factor in causing unrest between nations;

And whereas, the League of Nations has set up cooperative machinery for the control of the production and distribution of narcotics;

Therefore be it resolved, that, the Dominion government be requested to forbid the export of nickel to be used for war purposes, and also that the Dominion government request the League of Nations council to set up the necessary machinery for controlling the manufacture of armaments by private companies, and the exchange of raw materials used in the manufacture of armaments.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I had hoped to be able to introduce this matter in the regular way as a private member's motion, but since private members' days have been taken away I find myself compelled to introduce it under this order. I do this with no desire to move a vote of want of confidence in the government, but rather to present what seems to me to be a very important question.

At the beginning of this year, in conjunction with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I signed an appeal to Canadians to study and work for peace. This was called Canada and World Peace, and I quote from it as follows:

The aim of Canadian foreign policy—

Perhaps this should more properly have read: The declared aim of Canadian foreign policy —is peace and that aim expresses the desire of every Canadian. But peace cannot be maintained without knowledge and a conscious effort on the part of democratic peoples. For this reason we believe all Canadians should study the position of our country in the world and the contribution Canada may make towards strengthening the agencies designed to ensure world peace and economic stability.

And again:

Without doubt world peace is menaced today as at no time since the close of the great war. Canadians did their part nobly in that war and know only too well its horror and its cost in blood and treasure. Another such conflict might imperil western civilization.

The people of this country worked together in war. We ask them now to work together in the nobler task of helping to substitute for the use of violence and force in international relations, the principles of law and justice upon which a world society as well as a national society must rest.

It is with the desire of implementing this appeal by something concrete and to make it more than a pious wish that I place before the house the amendment which I have moved. It is well that we should remember the warning given a few months ago by Sir Norman Angell. Speaking in Winnipeg in November he said:

Canada is as important as any other country when it comes to hostilities. You will have to play your part, you people here. You control about 95 per cent of an element of munitions, without which no nation can go to war. If you people in Canada decide that there shall be no future wars, you will be a mighty factor in insuring that there are none. There is nothing inevitable about war, but if things are allowed to drift the inevitable, as a result of such a policy, will happen.

I recognize quite clearly that to many this question may seem to be rather remote, but I would point out that the same was true of the troubles which were occurring in Europe a few months before the world war broke out. To-day nothing in the world is remote from us. There are two questions which I think will occur immediately to every hon. member of the house. The first is: Can we be sure that any large proportion of the nickel produced in Canada is going into armaments? The second is: Is there any feasible method of control? I propose to attempt to answer these questions.

It may be said that as Canada is such a small nation numerically, she by herself can do very little in world affairs, but the possession of nickel gives us a strategic importance. Through her virtual monopoly of nickel Canada may speak with a voice that may be heard around the world. Canada might make a gesture offering to cooperate with the league in the control of nickel, which might at this critical juncture produce the most far-reaching effects.

I need hardly pause to remind the house of the serious conditions that prevail to-day in the world at large. In the far east Japan and China have been fighting an undeclared war. More recently we have had the threat of war between Japan and Russia. In South America we have had war between Bolivia and Paraguay over the Gran Chaco dispute. We have had war between Peru and Colombia over the Leticia dispute. In Europe the League of Nations has been practically set at defiance; the disarmament conference has virtually broken down. In Germany we have had tremendous upheavals and unbelievable atrocities. In France even there have been riots. The Balkans, always a dangerous spot, have been in recent months showing signs of again breaking into fire. In Austria we have had what might almost be termed a civil war. Arising from the unsettled world conditions it would seem as if we are in for a new race in armaments. In England Vickers-Armstrong are increasing their staffs and their shares are soaring. In France the Hotchkiss Armament Works and the Schneider plant at Le Creusot; in Czechoslovakia, the Skoda works at Pilsen and the state arsenal at Brunn have all been working as they have never done before. In Holland there is a boom in Dutch munitions. In Finland they have been buying bombing planes. In Germany there are daily reports of secret rearmament. In Japan, buyers for Mitsubishi are in Germany purchasing nitrogen for explosives. In the United States they are launching the greatest shipbuilding program in the history of that country. Fifty-two battle ships are to be built at a cost of $258,000,000, twenty-two of these ordered from private firms.

Arms and munitions are intended in part for home consumption, but to a considerable degree they are being prepared for export, chiefly to the far east, to South America and to southern European countries. The British government's gesture to restrict shipments of arms during the far eastern conflict fell through, causing only very temporary inconvenience to the armament manufacturers. Not only because sales of British arms overseas are good for trade and prestige but also because a high armament export trade enables the firms to keep up to date by working at greater capacity than would be possible if they relied only on the purchasing power of their own governments, the plants are kept ready to meet the sudden demands of war. In this connection I might quote from Sir Herbert Lawrence, chairman of Vickers Limited, in his annual speech recorded in the Financial Times, April 4, 1933. He said:

> It is true that Vickers-Armstrongs Limited relies largely on armament orders for its existence. On the other hand, the safety of the empire, in the event of aggression by some other power, also depends on the capacity of the country to increase the production of armaments at short notice.

The question may naturally arise—Do the manufacturers of armaments consciously foster war? I think we have an answer to this in the report of the first subcommittee of the temporary mixed commission of the League of Nations after investigation of the private production of war equipment. That was back in 1921. The report reads in part as follows:

> Whereas the League of Nations has definitely declared in the league covenant that private production of war equipment is open to grave objection. . . .

Then they state:

> 1. That armament firms have been active in fomenting war scares, and in persuading their own countries to adopt warlike policies and to increase their armament.
> 2. That armament firms have attempted to bribe government officials both at home and abroad.
> 3. That armament firms have disseminated false reports concerning the military and naval programs of various countries in order to stimulate armament expenditure.
> 4. That armament firms have sought to influence public opinion through the control of newspapers in their own and foreign countries.

5. That armament firms have organized international armament rings, through which the armament race has been accentuated by playing off one country against another.

6. That armament firms have organized international armament trusts that have increased the price of armaments to the governments.

Thirteen years have substantiated these unanswered charges, and big business manages, as someone has suggested, to maintain a nice balance between commercial ambition and national patriotism. Mr. Sopwith, chairman and joint managing director of Hawker Engineering Company Limited and Hawker Aircraft Limited, in the Daily Express of London of November 12, 1932, said:

The government is interested in disarmament while still wishing to keep some standard of aircraft production alive in this country. How can that standard be kept alive unless our manufacturers sell to the foreigner? If trading in armaments were illegal, like trading in drugs,—

I hope the house will mark that sentence.

If trading in armaments were illegal, like trading in drugs, there would be a question of moral responsibility. As it is, there is only a question of open competition. . . .

We believe our machines and engines are the best, since all countries, except France, Italy and America, buy from the British manufacturer. But Great Britain runs a grave danger in being thus outnumbered. Not a country but looks to the air for its defence.

I think such a statement as that undoubtedly justifies the rather cynical remark in Aeroplane, the unofficial voice of the British air ministry, on March 15, 1933:

The manufacturers of both aeroplanes and engines may hope for increased turnover and profits a year or so hence when the disarmament conference has faded out and the program of expansion is allowed to proceed.

Unfortunately, it would seem that this has been something of a prophecy, for the disarmament conference has still further faded away and the race in air equipment is proceeding at an accelerated pace.

Now, having referred to these general matters, I should like to come particularly to the question of nickel, which seems to be an essential raw material in the manufacture of armaments. There are two propositions which I think may be regarded as generally true: first, that nickel is indispensable, and second, that Canada has a virtual monopoly of it. This was an important question during the great world war. In 1926 the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) urged control on the ground that nickel was used for armaments. I refer the house to Hansard of January 29, 1926, at page 550. The hon. member for Labelle was criticized on technical grounds by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). The latter hon. member argued that steel alloy suitable for armament purposes can be made with manganese, chromium, tungsten, vanadium and molybdenum, all of which are available in Canada. He concluded his remarks by saying:

—were the Germans entirely deprived of nickel they could still put ships in the battle line and confront our armies with all types of artillery. Nickel is of much more importance in industry than it is in war, and it really seems silly to get excited over its distribution either to the Germans or to anyone else.

Mr. CANTLEY: Quite true.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Pictou believes that to be still true, but I would point out that the government metallurgists, while admitting that nickel is not the sole suitable alloy, say it is the only practicable one. This, of course, is a technical question, and I should like to hear that point answered by the hon. member for Pictou, but that I have on very good authority. First of all, nickel is cheap and, second, it is found in large quantities, whereas the other metals are largely prohibitive in price.

Is there any connection between the boom in the armament industry and the rise in nickel exports? That, of course, is a question that is fundamental to our argument. Nickel industry executives, though they admitted it earlier, now say that there is no connection whatever. We have the following statement by the Mond Nickel Company, a partner in the International Nickel Company, as given in the Daily Express of October 31, 1933:

It has no reason to think that the increased nickel consumption in Europe is due, to any substantial extent, for armament purposes. Stainless steels, automobiles, radio, cast iron and coinage—all these are improving fields for the use of nickel.

Mr. J. Ireland of London, English executive of the International Nickel Company, according to a Canadian Press dispatch from Victoria, British Columbia, of November 7, 1933, had this to say when he was en route from the orient to England:

If Canada placed a ban on the export of nickel intended for the manufacture of armaments, such action would lead only to stimulate development of other deposits which as a substitute might prove equal if not superior to nickel for the toughening of steel.

Of course, such a statement coming from an interested party is not, I submit, altogether convincing. I believe it is agreed on all sides that the major use of nickel in armaments is for armour plate, for which purpose its value depends on the fact that it greatly increases the strength, toughness, hardness, and impact resistance of steel without a corresponding decrease in ductility. It also increases the heat treatment range. According to Sir William Berry, director of naval construction of the British Admiralty, the average composition of armour plate is:

	Per cent
Nickel	3.5 to 4
Chromium	1.5 to 2.5
Manganese	0.4
Silicon	0.15
Carbon	0.35 to 0.5

When used fourteen inches thick, it constitutes good protection against twelve-inch, 700-pound armour-piercing shells travelling at a speed of 2,000 feet per second. The same authority states that no important developments in armour plate took place during or since the war.

My point is this, in answer to the contentions advanced some years ago by the hon. member for Pictou: If there is no practicable substitute for nickel, what are we going to do about armour plate? It would seem as if my hon. friend's German ships, unless supplied at almost prohibitive prices with tungsten, molybdenum and so forth, would be shot through like cardboard. According to the authorities, nickel would seem to be essential. I quite freely admit that only a small quantity, some four to six per cent, is required to make a good alloy, but even at that, an immense quantity would be required even in a single battleship.

Let me go back for a few moments to the Canadian history of nickel. There was a great increase in the Canadian production in 1905 and immediately preceding and during the war, partly due to increased industrial activity, but no doubt mainly on account of the demands for war purposes. After that there was a drop in production in 1921 and 1922 to less than one-fourth of the previous maximum. Of course one cannot prove that curves are always obedient to one set of factors, but when one sees a great productivity during the war and an immediate drop after the war, it is at least very significant. The fact is that the Washington conference for the limitation of naval armaments wiped out the major demand for nickel. I want to be fair in this matter and I would say when the bottom dropped out of nickel at the end of the war, the companies operating the mines in Canada immediately began to intensify research to discover any new uses for nickel and any new applications of uses already known. The success of their combined effort is shown in the almost vertical rise in the curve of production from 1922 to 1929. It is remarkable that during each of the years 1928 to 1930 production exceeded the maximum of the war period. To-day the uses for nickel in the industrial field are innumerable. A partial list includes structural steel, monel metal, nickel silver for automobiles, heat-resistant alloys, iron and steel castings, coinage, storage batteries, catalysts in the chemical industries, lead-in wires for electric light bulbs.

Summing up the period between 1922 and the depression, I think it is safe to say that by far the larger proportion of all nickel went into industry. In this connection an interesting statement was made in 1928 by the late J. L. Agnew, then president of the International Nickel Company. Referring to the great war he said:

> Prior to hostility and throughout the duration of that conflict sixty per cent of the nickel went into war materials; now only about three per cent is so used.

That was true at the time. Does it still hold good? The depression hit the nickel industry badly. The demand fell steadily until in 1930 we find the following situation—I shall give the totals for several years:

Year—	Total pounds
1929	110,275,912
1930	103,768,857
1931	65,666,320
1932	30,327,968
1933 (excluding December)	74,319,198

These figures indicate that the sudden rise following the decrease subsequent to 1929 began in June of last year. It is a striking fact that since then the production has been maintained on a scale higher than the peak of 1929. Shares which undoubtedly had dropped to very low prices began to rise. I have a statement given by the Canadian Press on March 12, in connection with the report of the International Nickel Company of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1932, which shows a net profit of $9,662,583.64, after all charges, including the provision of $3,551,653.32 for depreciation and mine depletion. Recently there has been an announcement of a new smelter to be built at Copper Cliff at a cost of somewhere under $1,000,000. It would seem as if we are justified in concluding that there is some new demand that has led to this very great increase in the production of nickel.

Where is the nickel going? Some statistics in this connection were furnished at the request of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) for the years 1932 and 1933.

The return was given on February 5, 1934. The countries to which nickel was being consigned were as follows:

Country—	1932	1933
	(Hundredweight)
United Kingdom	68,530	262,978
United States	165,344	419,023
Belgium		2,781
Germany	2,136	5,535
Japan	3,705	6,363
Norway	58,376	91,963

Other countries on the list are Australia, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Newfoundland and Spain.

The increased exports, particularly in the case of the United Kingdom, the United States and Norway, are striking. It was said at the time that this settled the whole matter, that undoubtedly all this nickel is going to four countries that were formerly allied countries. But I think we forget that nickel so imported may be reexported. Before coming to that may I point out that the total amounts exported to the twelve countries with which Canada did business during those two years are: in 1932, 320,719 hundredweight, and in 1933, 880,821; or, valued in dollars, $7,283,964 in 1932 and $22,795,968 in 1933.

The United Kingdom, the United States and Norway all reexported large quantities of nickel. Of the three only Norway produced any. In December last year the Hon. Mr. Runciman, chairman of the British board of trade, gave the following official figures for the reexport of nickel during the first ten months of last year. The reference will be found in British Hansard of December 5, 1933, pages 1462-3:

	Tons
Total imports	1,073
Domestic exports	3,955
Tonnage consigned to Germany—
Germany	1,131
Japan	802
Soviet Union	523

And lesser amounts to France, Switzerland, Italy, Sweden, and other countries. Export figures for the United States and Norway are not available, but we learn that there were very large exports from both these countries.

If anything further were needed in regard to the very sudden increase in the production of nickel I do not think I could do better than give the most recent report published by the Canadian Press on March 19, the preliminary report of Ontario's mineral production, released by the Department of Mines:

> In 1932 only 30,327,968 pounds of nickel with a value of $7,179,862 was produced, but last year that total jumped to 82,264,658 pounds valued at $20,129,480 and it is indicated that practically all the nickel produced was exported.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

In the Canadian figures and more particularly the United Kingdom reexport figures it will be seen that in the last few months Germany has been importing very considerable quantities of nickel. This is extremely interesting in view of the rumours floating all over Europe to the effect that Germany is secretly rearming. I have no wish whatever to create anything like anti-German sentiment or war hysteria, but if indeed Germany is rearming, we in Canada will have to take our share of the responsibility for making it possible. A comparison of German nickel imports from the United States during the years 1910 to 1914 with the present upward trend is revealing. Statistics furnished by the United States foreign commerce and navigation department show a rise of from 348,509 pounds in 1910 to 2,346,325 pounds in 1913. It is quite possible that all this was going into nickel coins or bathroom fixtures, but most of us will very much doubt whether that is a true explanation. In the year of the war imports of nickel into Germany jumped to 11,084,366 pounds. A similar trend is shown in the tables for manganese ore, tin, brass, sulphur, mica, graphite and crude asbestos.

Only last October considerable stir was created in newspapers across Canada by reports that a representative of one of the great German dye and chemical corporations was in Canada on his way to Sudbury to negotiate the immediate purchase of 10,000 tons of nickel matte. This huge order by a single company was almost equivalent to the entire Canadian export of nickel to Germany in 1933. When questioned by reporters the German representative of course ridiculed the suggestion that his proposed purchase might be connected with the rearming of Germany, a reply that seems to have been taken with a grain of salt by a great many of the newspapers, and, I think I may add, by the Canadian public generally.

But my purpose to-day is not to go into the probabilities of such shipments being used for war purposes. I content myself here with simply pointing out that if Canadians are in any way opposed to German rearmament or are in any way interested in the disarmament problem as a whole they may very well have an important voice in the matter. My resolution reads:

> Canada furnishes over ninety per cent of the world's nickel—

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Too high.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone says that is too high. In the resolution I had on the order paper for several weeks I had placed the proportion at eighty-two per cent—

Mr. STITT (Nelson): That is better.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —because I had taken the figures of the year book. But later figures furnished by the bureau of statistics show that it is almost precisely ninety per cent, so I have put the figure at ninety per cent in the resolution as it stands. My point is that Canada has a virtual monopoly. In 1929 she produced 49,320 tons of the total world production of 55,000 long tons, or almost ninety per cent. These figures can be secured from the bureau of statistics. There are other deposits in New Caledonia, India, Norway and Greece, and recently some discoveries have been made in Russia, but all these are insignificant in comparison with the enormous ore deposits in the Sudbury district, the total reserves of which have been officially estimated at 200,000,000 tons, or some 4,000,000 tons of metallic ore. This, it was stated in April of last year by R. C. Stanley, president of the International Nickel Company, would enable the industry to carry on production at its peak level for the next hundred years.

I realize very clearly that this is a big industry and that it would be a very serious matter to interfere in any way with the growth of such a Canadian industry. I recognize, too, that we have at the head of this industry certain directors who have very great influence in Canada. We also have shareholders who have certain rights, but I submit that in a national emergency the interests of private concerns or even of shareholders must be given a subordinate place to the welfare of the country at large. The shareholders may have certain rights; the Canadian public have greater rights and I cannot imagine even the shareholders, if they really believed that this nickel was going into the making of armaments which might be used to shoot down their own children, willing to take dividends so acquired. It would be blood money.

The practical question, however, is one of control. I would point out that control of nickel in Canada is not new. At the outbreak of the war Canada cooperated with the British government in controlling the export of the metal. By December, 1914, with the assistance of the nickel producers, a system had been worked out which was regarded as perfect. It is quite true that there were persistent rumours that it was not perfect, and we also have the undeniable fact that from some source or other large quantities of nickel did reach Germany, but the point is that in that emergency Canada did act and did attempt to set up control. Several times since the war the question has been raised. In February of last year, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister stated that although all nickel was mined in provinces that had control of their resources it might be possible for the federal government to pass an export act. He did not go into the matter at all, and the question was dropped. That will be found in Hansard for February 22, 1933. More recently we had the visit to this country of two noted British publicists, Sir Norman Angell and Professor Alfred Zimmern. Both advanced the idea that the control of nickel was a necessary and thoroughly practical step, and both drew attention to the similarity of the problem with that of narcotic drugs.

The question, of course, is tied up with that of sanctions, and as to the efficacy of sanctions may I quote E. N. Hurley, the former president of the United States shipping board, at the meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce in 1930. He said:

> —any modern nation could be paralyzed by the refusal of business organizations in other countries to sell it the ten or twelve essential raw materials, such as iron ore, rubber, manganese, nickel, aluminum, newsprint pulp, copper, oils, tungsten, chronium and mercury.

Various concrete suggestions have been offered as to how these raw materials might be controlled. During the armistice Great Britain suggested the continuation of the control of raw materials supplied to the central powers, and recently this has been revived in a modified form. Sir Thomas Holland, in his presidential address to the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1929, proposed that each country should add a rider to its Kellogg treaty with the United States giving its government the power, if and when necessary, to prohibit the export of mineral products to any country that breaks the peace with any other member of the pact. The very existence of any such power in itself would be sufficient automatically to enforce the submission of the matters in dispute to the international court of justice.

A detailed report showing the analogies between the narcotic drugs traffic and the trade in the manufacture of armaments has been drawn up by the secretariat of the League of Nations. At the seventy-fourth meeting of the general commission of the disarmament conference in June of last year a concrete proposal to limit the manufacture of arms and the trade in war material along these lines was made by Senor de Madariaga, the Spanish delegate. He said, first, that everything connected with the manufacture of and trade in arms should be the sole responsibility of the state and, secondly, in exactly the same way as narcotics are controlled, that a national licensing system with supervision centralized at Geneva is necessary. It does seem to me that these suggestions by Senor de Madariaga, who for so many years has had such an influence at Geneva, who knows so intimately the workings of the league and who is so thoroughly conversant with international arrangements generally, should be taken very seriously. I think they are eminently practical. The general details of the plan drawn up by the secretariat and subscribed to by Senor de Madariaga will be found at pages 598 and 599 of volume 11 of the conference reports. Referring to this plan, the delegate said it would be seen that the problem had been studied and solved, and there was no reason why the commission should continue to waste its time and read voluminous reports. The only thing remaining to be done was to draft some comparatively short texts, sign them, ratify them and inaugurate the system. Mr. Norman Davis, United States delegate, stated that he was in substantial agreement with Senor de Madariaga's views and Doctor Riddell, who as everyone knows is Canada's official representative at Geneva, took the same view. His speech, as reported at page 602 of the conference reports, included these words:

> The conference for the limitation of the manufacture of narcotic drugs, 1931, at which Mr. Riddell had been one of the representatives of his country, had had a task somewhat similar to the one with which the general commission was at present confronted. Irrespective of whether it was under state or private control the conference set out to limit the manufacture of narcotic drugs to the world's needs.

I quote further:

> Once a limit had been fixed, in the draft disarmament convention, to the quantities of munitions and armaments which a country might possess, there would seem to be no insuperable difficulty in the way of applying certain of the principles laid down in the 1931 narcotic drugs convention to the trade in and manufacture of arms and munitions. The proposal to apply these principles to that problem, which had already received support from the Spanish and United States delegations, should, in the opinion of the Canadian delegation, be thoroughly explored, with the least possible delay.

I am glad that in bringing forward this motion to-day I am acting, I think, entirely in harmony with the suggestion of our representative at Geneva.

The question is as to what extent there should be control. I would not suggest the immediate cessation of all production or all export of nickel. That is quite unnecessary, and undoubtedly it would be highly disastrous to the industry. I think we may all admit that large quantities of nickel are used in ordinary industry and that under a system of quotas and licensing, shipments for industrial purposes could continue to be made. There is no doubt of that. I would point out that because of the very wide demand in the industrial field at the present time for nickel, unless war is actually declared and in progress a large proportion of all nickel imports into any country will continue to be used in industry. I am seeking to limit only that destined for the manufacture of war munitions. Undoubtedly we will continue to produce and continue to export. The nickel firms themselves assert that most of our nickel is to-day going into industry. Well then, if they are correct—and in this instance I should like to think that they are correct—a resolution such as the one I have proposed to-day would not affect them. Any control over nickel for purely armament purposes would not affect the ordinary trade. But if any large proportion of the nickel now being produced and exported from this country is ultimately finding its way into the making of munitions it seems to me that surely we have reached a stage in civilization when Canada ought to have some voice in the matter.

It is very doubtful whether it is possible to allow production of nickel to continue on the present unprecedented scale without a full inquiry into the whole situation. Surely if we in Canada do not find it possible to trace the ultimate destination of our nickel we, by calling in the assistance of the League of Nations and the various member nations of the league, would find it quite practicable to trace this nickel to its ultimate destination. In the past the Canadian government has given very considerable support to the mining industry and especially to the production of nickel. I need not go over the history of that. Surely if the Canadian government has done so much to assist this industry in the days of its earlier development it has the same right now, in a time of international emergency, to ensure that its control will come under an appropriate international body.

I know that there are a good many arguments which may be advanced against the proposal. I feel however that I may leave it largely to others to make those arguments. It may be said, in brief, that the league is very ineffective. May I point out that in this, as in other matters, the league can be effective only as it is given power. If the nations of the world hand over to it the power to control the raw material in armaments that body would be as effective in the control of armaments as they have proved themselves to be in the control of the drug traffic. I know that even in connection with drugs the control has not been one hundred per cent perfect, but I think it has had most beneficial effects. In my view the same would be true if we would give authority to the league in regard to the raw material which goes into munitions. In the past Canada has played a leading and worthy role in the league. Now it seems to me that Canada has an unparalleled opportunity which might prove to be of very great significance. There is no use of us sending representatives to the league—as the country sent the Minister of Railways over last year—and our representatives adhering in a general way to the principle of peace, unless we are prepared, as a country, to implement our professions by some very definite and practical arrangements.

It may be said that the control of the nickel industry in the interests of the limitation of arms is unpractical at this late date, as already Germany and other nations have piled up their supplies. Well, I would point out that if that is so Germany and those other countries would not be seeking such large fresh stocks. Evidently they have not yet enough. The control of nickel too may be difficult, because there are other allied metals which should also be controlled. But I do not see that it would be impossible for a commission charged with power to work out the practical details involved. The control of nickel would go far at least to hamper the activities of huge and threatening war industries which seem to be on the way to driving the world to international suicide.

In conclusion may I urge that the vast majority of the Canadian people would agree that lethal weapons should not be manufactured and distributed without some sort of public control. We have already reached that point in our thinking, and we are very careful indeed as to who shall own arms within our own country. Surely the manufacture of war munitions and the raw material which goes into the manufacture of such munitions should be under state control. I think that as a country we have urged the public control of the actual making of munitions; why can we not go one step farther and urge that the raw material which is absolutely essential to the manufacture of munitions be placed under similar control. It is all very well for us to urge peace, but if world peace is to be maintained there must be some sort of international control over the instruments of warfare.

I know it is hard for the nations of the world to get over the earlier ideals of sovereignty. I know that even Canada, through her representatives, has said that we want to retain exclusive control over our raw materials. I do not think that such a position can finally be justified, and especially when it comes to materials essential to the manufacture of war munitions. It seems to me that sooner or later we shall have to adopt a larger view.

I am not bringing this motion before the house to-day with the idea that nickel is the one and only matter of importance in connection with the disarmament question. But I do think that because of our possession of nickel we have a right and a duty to act. I think we are placed in a position of strategic importance. Further, I frankly confess there are other factors which lead to war which are more important than munitions; I quite frankly concede that. In this war—if I may use the phrase—in this great war against war we must fight on a dozen different fronts; we must try where we can to correct glaring economic injustices; we must endeavour to promote a better understanding between the peoples of the various nations, but I urge that we must not neglect to do that which lies right at our hands, namely, to prevent the extension of private interests in the making of munitions which will ultimately be used for the destruction of human life. Let me repeat that it is not sufficient to say that we stand for peace; we must adopt those constructive policies that make for peace. The proposal advanced in my resolution may not be the most important matter, but it is one which lies within our powers to act upon. I should dearly like to think that in this matter Canada would take the lead. We are glad to think of Canada leading in a great many other things; we are glad to think of the large exports of all commodities which are made from this country; we are glad to think of the history of this country, but if Canada could do anything to give a lead to the nations of the world at a time when war threatens everywhere, it would seem to me to be our most glorious achievement.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, this is the second outbreak of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in connection with this question. In the early part of this session he stated:

Undoubtedly a large proportion of the nickel mined in this country is destined ultimately for the manufacture of war munitions; I do not think anyone can seriously question that.

Well, I do. At that time the hon. member urged the government to take over the control of the export of nickel or, in the alternative, to make nickel mining a government monopoly. This misapprehension as to the importance of nickel in warfare was first voiced in this house in 1926 by that veteran, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). As the hon. member has said, it was dealt with by me during the following year. Error dies hard and ignorance of the material facts in connection with the properties and uses of nickel persists. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre now takes up the hunt on a cold trail long since abandoned by the more experienced and practical member for Labelle.

May I again be permitted to set before the house certain facts with perhaps the vain hope of correcting the cherished delusions of the hon. member in the north-east corner of the house as to the value and use of nickel in the manufacture of munitions and the engines of war. It is surely a matter of regret that an hon. member of this house who is the leader of a party and who aspires to lead this dominion into a wider, safer, fairer and more prosperous existence, should not be better informed. May I suggest that he should refrain from such exhibitions of fundamental ignorance as were evidenced in this house a few weeks ago and again to-day.

But Mr. Speaker, it may be asked: Why the increase in the exports of nickel? This increase has been due to the revival of world trade and to the fact that the research work of the metallurgical experts of the nickel corporations has demonstrated that ordinary cupola or common gray iron castings can be toughened and strengthened greatly by the addition of from one to one and a half per cent of nickel. This discovery is largely, although not wholly responsible for the recent increased use of Canadian nickel. It should be noted that this increased use is not for war materials; it is being used in the arts of peace, in the construction of structural materials, machine parts, engine construction and a thousand other things which require the use of moulded gray iron castings and steel forgings. I would remind the hon. member and the house that the International Nickel Company is a great Canadian industry whose products reach the whole industrial world. Ninety-eight per cent of those products are used in the arts and materials of commerce and not of war. The hon. member has stated that six per cent is used for munitions, battleships and other agencies of war, but I venture to say that the correct figure is under two per cent.

Zeal without knowledge is perhaps the outstanding characteristic of the leader of the Canadian Commonwealth Federation. He seems to be obsessed with the idea that nickel is essential to war operations, but may I tell him that copper is many times more important. Germany's experience during the late war gives ample proof of this fact. During that war the Germans stripped the copper roofs from every church cathedral and other building in Germany, and Belgium, and everywhere else where they could get at them. They melted down their church bells and they hunted up door and lock knobs and every other piece of copper available. Why did they do this? Simply because copper was at that time fifty times more important than nickel. The driving bands of their shells of every calibre were made of copper as long as that commodity was available, but when during the latter two years of the war they finally had to turn to the use of soft iron, the result was that a gun which would ordinarily fire three hundred rounds with one rifling was worn out after twenty or thirty shots had been fired. The importance of nickel, so far as munitions were concerned, was a mere bagatelle compared with copper. So much as to the military value of nickel.

In the matter of rayon production, nickel enters the picture because caustic soda used in rayon manufacture is too corrosive to be handled in any of the usual metal containers. These are now being constructed of nickel clad steel. Then if we turn to telephone communication we find that here nickel iron alloys which are highly magnetic fulfil a special function, particularly in connection with long distance transmission.

We find that the present growing standard practice for the construction of railway equipment calls for nickel alloyed steel boiler plates, locomotive frames, side frames, side rods and other component parts of the modern locomotive. The construction of modern passenger equipment also now calls for a certain proportion of nickel. In the automotive field, the average amount of nickel in a car produced five years ago was 1.6 pounds, but during the last three years the amount of nickel so used has doubled and now amounts to more than 8,000,000 pounds, or more than double the amount used ten years ago. The nickel used in 1933 in manufacturing the products of the rolling mills of England, Scotland and West Virginia, and the foundries of Bayonne, New Jersey, amounted to 13,003,474 pounds. This is roughly 6,500 tons, an increase of thirty-five per cent over the previous year, 1932.

The post war developments which have taken place in the nickel industry have proved to be of invaluable help not only to railway operations but to practically all the mechanical arts. The demand for nickel for arms and armaments is but a mere bagatelle when compared to the demands of industry generally. Notwithstanding these facts, I am afraid that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and perhaps some of his disciples will still maintain that the chief use of nickel is in the production of armaments.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the hon. gentleman will admit that I said that.

Mr. CANTLEY: I regret that I cannot hear the hon. gentleman distinctly, but I do not know that it makes much difference.

I would point out that in the calendar year 1913 Canada exported 253,056 tons of nickel. Let us see where this nickel went. The United Kingdom took 14,721 tons; the United States took 23,465 tons; the Netherlands took 4,995 tons; Norway, 5,150 tons; Japan, now supposed to be a very warlike nation took only 356 tons; Germany took 320 tons; Belgium took 156 tons; Italy took 139 tons; France took 26 tons, for armaments, if you please; Australia took 3 tons and Newfoundland 330 pounds.

Canada is not the only country in the world producing nickel. Up to thirty or forty years ago New Caledonia supplied the great bulk of the nickel used in the world, and that was supplemented by a certain quantity from Norway, where the only refining of nickel in the world was carried on at that time. Referring again to the figures I quoted in regard to the importation of nickel last year by the countries mentioned, it will there be noted that the so-called militaristic countries, France and Germany, are among the smallest importers and users of the eleven indicated. But that fact will doubtless have no tendency in any way to dispel the hallucinations of the hon. member who has just spoken. These are the simple facts in regard to nickel. I ask this house, Mr. Speaker, why the government should take any action to lessen the export of nickel to any country in view of the undoubted facts I have already submitted, facts which cannot be controverted by the hon. gentleman or anyone else; for facts are chiels which will na ding. I thank the house for the kindly attention given me.

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): I fully concur in what has been said in reference to this question by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). I listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who has quoted so many large figures in regard to the production and export of nickel. The hon. member advises the control of the export of nickel from Canada, but after all he has said I fail to see how we could control the exportation of nickel in so far as armaments are concerned. According to the figures I have, it is evident that nickel production had been very high until the depression came. At the time of the depression it took a slump and then came up again owing to the demand, not for armaments, but for the various industries in the different countries. When the depression came the International Nickel Company considered it a good time, after having made necessary experiments, to search for new fields for the employment of nickel. They exhibited to the different nations the results of the tests they had made with nickel and started to develop the product, so that soon after the depression had come on we saw in the various countries an increasing demand for the use of nickel in the industrial field.

The hon. member for Pictou has mentioned many of the uses of nickel and the comparatively small amount used for armaments. I think he is quite correct and I fully concur in what he says.

In his speech at the close of the fiscal year 1932, Mr. Robert C. Stanley, president of the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited, referring to the search for new uses for nickel, made this statement:

> In this search for better products, nickel in combination with iron and steel and with nonferrous metals as well, has come to be a common denominator of the move towards alloys. Thus a metal which once was dependent on armaments for its market and which later won a great market in the post-war expansion of automobile production, now is enjoying increasingly diversified commercial applications throughout world industry . . . an important reason for the improvement has been the increased industrial activity stimulated by the NRA in the United States which consumes more than half of Canada's production of nickel. . . .

In 1929 the world consumption of nickel was 112,481,600 pounds; in 1932 it was 49,500,000 pounds, and in 1933 it was 77,609,280 pounds. In 1932, when there was a world consumption of 49,000,000 pounds, more than half of the nickel was exported to the United States where we find the greatest industrial centres.

As the hon. member for Pictou has said, the greatest use for nickel is as an alloy in the different industries. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred laughingly to the amount of nickel used in hotels, restaurants and breweries; he did not use these words, but I believe he was referring to consumption of nickel along these lines. Perhaps I might point out some of the uses to which the metal is put. For instance, to-day it is used almost exclusively in breweries as in many other industries because it is rustless; it is not as easily corroded as other metals. It is therefore used in filter streams, pump rods, coolers and other equipment. Again, it finds to-day an almost exclusive use in hotels and restaurants. It is used in the dairy industry and in connection with farm implements and household furniture, as well as in sinks, kitchen cabinets, gas and electric stoves, storage tanks, boilers and pans of various descriptions. The automotive industry is using it in considerable quantities as an alloy. It is used, too, in the marine field, and in airplanes. It might be worth noting that nickel is also used in twenty-seven countries for coinage, some three billion pieces of nickel weighing fourteen thousand tons having been produced. These figures would appear to be small in comparison with the total production. But if we consider the great development of industry to-day and the quantity mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as the total consumption, there is very little left for armaments. When he expresses fear as to the exportation of nickel being for the purposes of armaments I think, as was mentioned, it is only a nightmare. The International Nickel Company have men intelligent enough to see that their production of nickel is not going for armaments, because they know very well that in that case the exportation would be curtailed forcibly sooner or later. That is why at the time of the depression they had throughout this and other countries great advertisements in regard to the new uses of nickel, and those advertisements proved very effective because in those fields there is a greater demand to-day than ever there was.

Personally I do not see how the government could control the exportation of nickel, because the greatest demand is for the purposes of industry, and if the export were controlled, it would hurt one of the biggest industries we have in this country. We must remember that before the depression this company was employing 7,000 men. The number was reduced to as low as 2,000, but to-day it has risen to 4,700. I believe the control of exportation of nickel would cause embarrassment to that company and would produce an effect contrary to that which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants, because it would increase unemployment. Therefore I hope no embarrassment will be caused to that industry, and we can have faith in the ability of the intelligent directors of that company.

[Mr. Hurtubise.]

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to make it very clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that any criticism I have to offer is not in any sense of the word personal. I think, however, his resolution is ill-timed and does not reflect on his part very much study of the nickel industry. It is true that in the early stages of that industry it depended almost entirely upon the manufacture of armaments. But that picture does not present itself to-day. After the war the nickel companies put their metallurgists to work, spending a million dollars or more a year—and they are still doing this to-day—to find new uses for that metal. Consequently ninety-six per cent of all the nickel used in the world goes to industry.

The whole argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was based on the assumption that all we have to do to end war is to prohibit Canada from exporting nickel.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I suggest I expressly stated that that was not my position.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Well, that was my interpretation. I have always been of the opinion, in fact my information is to the effect that in Canada we produce eighty-five per cent of the nickel of the world, but I am quite willing to accept the hon. member's statement that we produce ninety per cent. Even at that, only four and a half per cent goes into armaments.

Mr. CANTLEY: Not half that.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Ten per cent of the nickel production of the world is outside Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask the hon. gentleman where he gets the information that four and a half per cent goes into armaments?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I got it from the Department of Mines.

Only recently Russia stated that large bodies of nickel bearing ore had been discovered in that country. Does the hon.

member for Winnipeg North Centre for one minute think Russia would not export nickel if she got a chance after she had developed those deposits, refined the nickel and was ready to export? Surely he would not go that far. The figures given by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) would appear to indicate that the country in the far east about which the hon. member is worrying most in regard to war is about the lowest user of nickel in the whole list. It has been stated, and it is quite true, that fifty per cent of our production goes to the United States and about twenty or twenty-two per cent to Great Britain. The hon. member enlarged somewhat on our great exports to Norway. It is evident again that he had not studied the situation very much or he would have known that one of the large nickel producers in Canada, the Falconbridge Mining Company, owns a refinery in Norway and does all its refining there. That is the reason such large exports go to Norway; the Falconbridge Mining Company sends its whole output there to be refined.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and to re-export.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): From there no doubt it is distributed to wherever they can find purchasers, but I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to presume that the output of that nickel refinery in Norway is going to Japan or Russia or any other country to be used for armament purposes. If he wants to prevent war, why stop at nickel? Napoleon once said that an army fights on its stomach. Why not stop the export of wheat?

The hon. member for Pictou enlarged on the subject of copper, and I agree with him that copper is very much more important than nickel so far as the manufacture of armaments is concerned. Why not stop the manufacture of meat, clothing, boots, shoes, lead, zinc and other items I could mention that are used in war? I do not need to remind the hon. gentleman that wars were fought long before nickel was produced and will be fought again even if the production of nickel is prohibited. In no time science would find a substitute for it. I have been through a couple of skirmishes in a couple of wars, and if I have to be shot to-morrow, I would very much prefer to be shot by a nice clean nickel bullet than by one of those old lead balls, if the house wants to get down to the human side of this matter.

Nickel production is one of our most important industries. It suffered, of course, during the depression along with all other industries, and has recently started to pick up, due to the fact that all other industries in the world have also started to improve. Industries are increasing their production by the help of the N.R.A. in the United States, and probably, to some extent, by similar methods in Great Britain. What do we find in connection with this great industry in Canada? I have the figures for only ten months and I find in ten months the industry paid out:

Wages and salaries..	$7,700,000
Capital expenditure..	2,580,000
Supplies and upkeep..	6,650,000
Railways and utilities..	3,300,000

In the last seven years it has paid out in plant and equipment $55,000,000, and it uses in its mines 2,000,000 feet of Canadian lumber per month. Surely as the leader of a great party—I do not think it is a great party but I expect the hon. gentleman does; he would be a poor leader if he did not—as leader of a party that is continually damning this government for not finding work for our unemployed, the hon. gentleman must see that this resolution is ill-timed, and, I think, should be withdrawn. I do not know how he is going to face these workingmen in the town of Sudbury where, as the hon. member for that riding just told you, about three-quarters of the miners have for the last four years been almost on the verge of starvation, a lot of them on relief. The industry now is just getting back its stride and starting its men back to work. Surely the hon. member as a labour leader does not want to do anything to cripple that great industry and drive the business to some other country. Because it is very clear that if only 4½ per cent of Canada's exports of nickel goes into armaments, other countries capable of producing 10 per cent of the nickel supply could provide the nickel needed for armament purposes. I know the hon. member has achieved his objective in getting this material before the house. I am not questioning his sincerity for one moment, but I think the resolution has served its purpose and I hope he will withdraw it in the interests of that great industry that means so much to Canada.

Mr. J. F. WHITE (London): I have been quite interested in the discussion of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I believe that every member in the house will pay tribute to the honesty of the hon. gentleman in bringing this resolution before the house—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (London): I think his honesty of purpose is unquestioned, and his interest in humanity. Also I have every sympathy with his efforts to prevent the further manufacture of armaments. But, sir, I cannot see that the idea he has presented will have much influence on the manufacture of armaments or on wars which may occur in the future. As to the desirability of curtailing the manufacture of armaments, we need no other evidence than was presented in this city last week when the annual convention of the Canadian Legion was held here. No man could go to that convention, or see the members of the legion going about the streets, and not come to the conclusion that war is hell.

The hon. gentleman has assumed in his discourse that most of the nickel produced comes from Canada, 90 per cent he said, others say 82 to 85 per cent. He has assumed that most of it is used in armaments and things of that kind, and for that reason he proposes to forbid its export.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, Mr. Chairman, not all nickel; I expressly said merely nickel to be used for armament purposes.

Mr. WHITE (London): I understood the hon. gentleman to say just what he has said now. But the question arises, can we prevent the export? We have 85 per cent of the world's nickel as at present known, and there is a very considerable world demand for this product, no doubt developed by the International Nickel Company metallurgists and the results achieved by the users of nickel. The question of forbidding the export for armament purposes may be a very serious one and lead to international complications; but I do not intend to proceed further with that. The main question, it seems to me is, would the prevention of export have the desired effect? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has shown on other occasions and again to-day that there are other alloys that can be used in the manufacture of steel which produce the same qualities as nickel. The argument has been advanced: "Perhaps so, but it will cost more." But our experience in recent years has shown that the cost of war is not a very great consideration while the war is being conducted; that comes later. The quality which is given to steel by the use of nickel is toughness, practically that only. Other alloys are used to secure other effects. I have the report of the International Nickel Company for the year ending December 31, 1933, in which they say in part that the improvement in sales—has been well spread among all consuming fields and that nearly every buyer took more nickel than in 1932.

Then it goes on to cite the world's consumption in various years. It also refers to the uses to which nickel is put. Then I quote the following passages:

The channels through which nickel has passed to the ultimate consumer have continued to be mainly those industrial applications, either old-established or of more recent development, which have been the principal support of the industry since 1921. Many of the more recently developed uses for nickel have, however, made even greater strides during 1933 than the industry as a whole. . . .

The automotive industry was the outstanding consumer of nickel steel in 1933. . . . Nickel steel has been used in other fields as well,—in locomotive equipment particularly in Europe, in oil-drilling and oil-refining equipment and in the machinery field generally. Several thousand tons of 3·5 per cent nickel steel are specified for the new San Francisco-Oakland bridge. . . .

Under the stimulus of orders from an important railroad, nickel steel boiler plate is now manufactured in Great Britain, and this has led to the adoption of nickel steel by another leading British railroad. . . .

The amount of nickel in use throughout the world for subsidiary coinage was increased quite substantially in 1933. Three new governments, those of the city of Danzig, of Iraq and of Japan, were added to the list of those which have issued such coins, comprising now some 27 countries in all. . . . It is estimated that there are now about three billion pure nickel coins in circulation, employing about 15,000 tons of nickel in all.

So that you will see, Mr. Speaker, that there are many uses for nickel. There is a further feature, that nickel once incorporated in steel always remains. In that fact is a partial answer to the question propounded by the hon. gentleman who introduced the motion as to what happens to nickel. He quoted figures to show that the termination of the war was accountable for the drop in the sales of nickel. I offer another reason for that; I think it is largely owing to the fact that scrap material had been gathered from all the battlefields of Europe, and re-melted, and as I said, the nickel content always remains. Further melting or manipulation in the way of rolling and so on causes very little disappearance of nickel, in fact nothing like the percentage that disappears of the steel itself. So we have the presence of scrap containing nickel which on many occasions helped certain countries over a hard spot in their need for nickel. Nickel is used largely in automobiles; automobiles are scattered throughout the world, there is always an export trade going on in automobile scrap which is a source of supply of nickel steel. Nickel is also used in heat resisting metals, for purposes such as locomotive grate bars and things of that kind. It is impossible to keep track of nickel after it has once been put into steel.

Now, sir, it seems to me that in view of all these facts the adoption of this resolution would have a very damaging effect on Canadian industry. To begin with, we cannot prevent wars, we cannot prevent war material being made even if we curtail the export of nickel. But we should consider the amount of work being done and employment being given in Canada by the International Nickel Company and the Falconbridge Company. I suppose the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), being a labour representative, will appreciate these figures, though perhaps he may not appreciate my first statement. Roughly speaking there are one hundred thousand shareholders of the International Nickel Company. According to the last report the company has 8,300 employees, of whom 4,800 reside in Canada. The company has plants in the United States and in England. Even to curtail the export of nickel would affect Canadian industry as a whole and, as I have said, would not achieve the desired object.

Something has been said with regard to the different countries that import nickel. During the last year the United States has been our best customer, with the United Kingdom next. There are two countries whose exports of nickel cannot be tagged. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) I think referred to the fact that the Falconbridge Nickel Company refined their ore in Norway. My information is that in its early development the Falconbridge Company endeavoured to have the International Nickel Company refine its ore in Canada. The International Nickel Company were not particularly interested in helping to develop the property and business of a rival, and the two companies could not come to any arrangement in that regard. About that time, owing to the exhaustion of certain ores in Norway, a nickel refinery was for sale or for rent, and I am told that the Falconbridge Nickel Company rented or in some way acquired this refinery and with it certain very desirable processes in the refining of nickel. So any exports from Norway really are Canadian nickel sent out in the raw state, refined in Norway and then shipped to wherever they can be sold. It may be that, therefore, the nickel which goes to the Netherlands and to Norway may ultimately find its way to the countries of Europe that are perhaps interested in the development of armaments. The bald fact remains, however, that the United States and Great Britain are the two countries that consume the greater part of the nickel produced in Canada.

Now I should like to say a word as to the actual object of this resolution. I do not believe anything can be done along the line desired by the hon. gentleman through the reduction of exports. I do think, however, that a great deal can be done by constantly advocating that the governments of the various countries take over the production of war material. I think it is a great mistake to have private enterprise interested in such production. We have heard from many quarters that disputes are fostered and animosities engendered all for the sake of business. If the various manufacturing countries of the world would take over the manufacture of all armaments and war supplies I think a great forward step would be taken in the promotion of peace. How far our present machinery will carry us in that direction I am unable to say. The League of Nations has done some good, perhaps, but in many instances it seems powerless to prevent conflict. Perhaps a rejuvenation of the ideas which prompted the establishment of the League of Nations might have some effect; I believe it would, and I am glad to know that the influence of the League of Nations has been sufficient to bring about renewed interest on the part of the people of this country, and incidentally the people of my own city, in the reduction of armaments and the ultimate elimination of war.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take just a few moments to discuss this matter. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is quite sincere in introducing this question, but his amendment means nothing unless back of it is the idea of lessening the possibilities of war. I think that must be the whole purpose behind it. So far the arguments have been that the export of nickel cannot be prevented without crippling the industrial activities of a great many countries, and in these days that is not desirable. We must bear in mind the important fact, however, that armaments are no longer produced in arsenals; to-day countries do not depend upon local arsenals for the production of armaments.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, I gave a short talk here as to the nature of a modern war, and I pointed out that the next war would be determined by air activities. In that connection nickel will play a very small part indeed.

The supplies for the next war will come from the materials used in the industrial life of all countries. Glycerine, which is used in the manufacture of soap, is one of the necessary ingredients of explosives; benzine, which is used in a great many factories, is the source of some gases; picric acid, another explosive, is a product of chemistry and is used in so many industrial processes that it could not be controlled. So I think these materials deserve far more attention than nickel, and that is why I say that if the amendment is not based on the idea of reducing the possibilities of war, it means nothing.

In the next place, I do not think you will get very far unless you can get all the nations interested. At a meeting of the nations before the great war it was resolved that bombs and gases should not be used. Great Britain and Germany signed that pact, but the United States refused to sign, and when the move was not unanimous nothing resulted. To-day, however, poison gas and aeroplanes are the important elements of war, and nickel has no part whatever in their production.

I rose principally, Mr. Speaker, to refer to a point which was raised by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt). Perhaps I have seen more destruction and more wounded men than any man in the house. I have seen 5,900 cases go through our hands in one day. If you are going to have war you must remember that nickel is one of the most humane things that can be used. Before the introduction of nickel we had nothing but lead bullets; to-day the nickel-plated bullet is one of the most humane instruments of warfare. To show how slight is the damage that can be done by a nickel plated bullet I need only point to my finger; it was struck by a nickel plated bullet. I have seen a wounded man who was struck by a nickel plated bullet; it went through the bone and left a hole but did not cause a fracture. I have risen to say simply this, that science which produces so many destructive things has also produced industrial activity, and I say that we cannot have a great mass of destruction without chemical factors behind it. Here is one factor which is humane in its use, and it would be a sad day for us if we had to return to the old lead bullet, if we could have the protection and the possibility of lesser injury from the nickel plated one.

Nickel-plated armaments to-day are positively out of date. The nickel-plated and steel-protected cruisers about which hon. members have been talking, are obsolete. The amount which would be spent in building a battleship or a cruiser would to-day build hundreds and hundreds of aeroplanes. No nation to-day having in mind the possibilities of modern warfare is using the same number of nickel-plated cruisers and battleships as it used before.

In conclusion may I say that the motion now before the house amounts to very little, so far as the prevention or possibility of war is concerned. The day of the steel cruiser is past; the armoured train is gone; the old guns are out of date. Infantry travelling along at twenty miles an hour is out of the picture altogether. The tank which was used in the late war is obsolete, when it is faced with the potential strength of aerial activity. The air battleship which can race upon its enemy at the rate of 150 miles per hour is taking the place of all these things, and removes the necessity for heavy expenditures on nickel. I believe that if we tried to understand the attitude of the people, and remembered, that year after year conventions, leagues and other bodies are trying to prevent war, and that those who have suffered more than others are definitely opposed to modern warfare, we might accomplish something.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, with the purpose which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has in mind, I am in deep sympathy, and I am sure every hon. member in the house is sympathetically inclined, although some may differ as to the effectiveness of the means he has suggested. There is no hon. member for whom I have more affection than the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley).

Mr. CANTLEY: Thank you.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He told me on one occasion that although he could not share my views and did not like some of my opinions he had a sneaking affection for me which I heartily reciprocate. But my hon. friend is a man who holds strong views of his own, and one who is rather impatient of views different from his own. I believe all hon. members will agree, however, that the hon. member who has moved this resolution is sincere, and that he devotes much thought, energy and activity to the solution of the problems he has at heart. I believe the difficulty is one of facts. As a member of the national executive of the League of Nations Society may I say that this question was discussed at the annual meeting held last November, and upon that occasion the same difference of opinion occurred as has been expressed to-day. We had received resolutions from different associations throughout Canada asking that a resolution similar to the present one should be adopted and sent to the government. One member of the executive, who is a scientific expert, took the view which the hon. member for Pictou has expressed, and said that to state that the great increase in the export of nickel which has taken place in recent months was due to the increase in armaments, was not in accordance with the facts. Secondly, if nations or manufacturers of armaments were deprived of using nickel they have substitutes which they could use in its place. The result was that the national executive adopted a resolution asking the government to investigate those various questions concerning the production and export of nickel. I suppose the investigation is still taking place, because to my question of yesterday as to whether or not a report had been received the reply was in the negative.

I agree with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) that to be effective a move of this kind should be the subject of an agreement with other nations; there should be international agreement. In that respect the fact that Canada is the largest exporter of nickel in the world gives her a position of great influence in any conference or any meeting where the question might be discussed. I am in agreement with the view expressed in a remarkable study by Mr. Escott Reid entitled Canada and the League in which he states with regard to this particular matter:

> In order to show her good faith, however, Canada should state that she is willing to accept such international regulation of the nickel industry as the permanent disarmament commission considered desirable.
> The permanent disarmament commission might recommend that it should, from time to time, for each country, set an annual quota of so many hundredweight of fine nickel for all purposes, industrial, monetary and armaments. The commission could grant permission for imports in excess of this quota on proof being furnished that the increase was desired for purposes other than the manufacture of armaments. Under such a scheme export from all countries would be by licences similar to the licences granted for the export of narcotic drugs. The annual world production of nickel might also be set from time to time and each producing nation be given a quota. Canada, would, of course, be given about 90 per cent of the total world quota.
> A similar control might be exerted over other raw materials essential to the manufacture of munitions such as manganese, tungsten, tin, chromite, mercury and mica. This control in the interests of disarmament might be made part of the general international control over the distribution of raw materials, which has already been recommended.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, at the conclusion of his remarks, rather adopted that view and stated that international control is most desirable. I think it is not only most desirable but it is the only way to reach the goal we have in view. As to the private manufacture of armaments of course, we, in common with other member nations of the league, have all said, in the covenant of the league we agree that the private manufacture of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objection and that the council shall advise how the evils attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented. On various occasions Canada has expressed its unanimous support of the control or even prohibition of the private manufacture of armaments. This matter is now before the league. In his motion the hon. member suggests that we should request the League of Nations to set up the necessary machinery. This question has been discussed most extensively by both the council and the assembly of the league, and the matter is still before these bodies. In 1931 the council adopted a resolution which linked up this question with the questions to be discussed at the disarmament conference. I am glad that that conference has not been abandoned entirely, as my hon. friend suggests; I have hopes that it will be revived.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for London (Mr. White) express himself so emphatically in favour of the control of the private manufacture of armaments. Canada has expressed herself as being in favour of such control and has given a leadership to the world. I must say with some regret that apparently the British representatives at the conference were not so enthusiastic as those from Canada. France and other countries have expressed themselves as being in favour of such control and I think Canada should exert her influence to convince the other members of the British commonwealth of nations. We did convince them in connection with the acceptance of the optional clause of the statute setting up the court of international justice. Great Britain was very reluctant to accept this clause but Canada urged that it should be accepted and it was finally accepted by Great Britain and the other members of the commonwealth. This demonstrates that action by Canada may have some influence and a great deal of effect upon the other countries of the commonwealth. I think Canada should express herself in no uncertain terms on this question, and I am sure such action will have good effects.

There is no doubt that the private manufacture of armaments is an evil, and this is stated in the covenant of the league. One has only to remember what has taken place during recent years. Everyone regretted the civil war which took place in China but the manufacturers of armaments were competing with one another to sell the munitions with which that war could be carried on. The same thing happened recently in the conflict between China and Japan. Nations were quarrelling with one another in their efforts to sell their armaments at the highest possible price. This is an evil which all nations should combine together to end.

I desire to congratulate the leaders of the nations for the work they have done, especially during the last few months, for the promotion of peace. The New Year's message of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), issued jointly with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), has done a great deal of good in Canada and has offered a great inducement to all those who would work in harmony for the promotion of peace. I desire also to congratulate the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). I have listened with great interest to his speeches over the radio; although I do not attend the meetings at which he speaks—perhaps he forgets to invite me—I have read the reports and I realize that during the last few months he has done a good work. I should like to see something practical done, something which would signify to the league and to the world that Canada has taken a stand and is more than ever willing to help to promote international control of armaments. I hope the government is investigating all the phases of the production and export of nickel and will let the house have all the facts before the end of this session.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to those who have addressed the house on this resolution. I do not think I need dwell upon the fact—I think it is a fact—that no hon. member of this house and but very few people throughout the country desire to see an occasion arise when difference between nations must be adjusted by force. I regret that there is a vocal class—I make no reference to any hon. member in this house—not only in this but in other countries which is constantly talking about war. It would seem that those who were farthest removed from actual contact with the last war are perhaps more vocal than those who were actually concerned with it. Many hon. members are returned soldiers, but it is rarely indeed that we hear any reference to war made by any of them. If you attend the meetings of the Canadian legion you will not find any member talking about war or the fear of war. Their minds are turned to the betterment of their fellowmen through the channels of peace. I cannot help but observe that it would be much better if the newspapers and public men of this country would desist from talking about the fear of war and things of that character. They should devote themselves to the advancement of the position and the condition of their fellow men instead of creating fears and anxieties in the minds of the people.

With respect particularly to this resolution, if I thought that the prohibition of the export of nickel would result in the abolition of war or the postponement of war, then I most certainly would vote for the resolution. But would it? Are we not just playing around with the larger question? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) described a battleship with fourteen inch armour toughened by the introduction of nickel, which would protect those on board against destruction from huge shells. It is curious, if that would be the effect, that we should even think about banning the export of nickel. I would say, let everybody have nickel and save everybody, rather than ban it at all. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) says that wars were fought before nickel was ever heard of, very destructive wars, and I have no doubt that is true; and again I say, following the observations of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that if we are to make any considerable impression, if we are to make advances in international affairs that have to do with war, then let the League of Nations or any other international body pursue its course and bring the nations together, and, if they are driven to the point where by international action they think that they can stop war by the prohibition of the export amongst the nations of the instruments of war, let them do it. But without international action how is it possible?

We have of course a great industry at Sudbury and mills in other parts of Ontario, and there are mills in Britain and in the United States that have to do with the refining of this metal, and so far as I can learn from the best informed sources, at the outside there is not more, some say less, than probably four per cent of the nickel going into armaments. Now, it is well known that a much greater percentage than that is produced outside Canada over which Canadians have no control. The development of the nickel industry in this country has gone on for a long period of years and huge expenditures of money have been made, many hundreds of millions of dollars; and until very recent years the fate of that industry was by no means bright. A huge sum of money has been lost in the development of the industry because the science of metallurgy had not solved the intricate questions associated with the development of nickel alloys that could be turned into the arts of peace.

The International Nickel Company of Canada since 1922 have devoted a considerable annual sum, probably more than a million dollars, to the development of metallurgical practices designed to discover nickel alloys that could be used successfully in industrial life, and great advances have been made in the last half dozen years. It is one of the large and major individual units of industry in Canada. The city of Sudbury is totally dependent upon its success. When the nickel industry is prosperous many thousands of Canadian miners are prosperous; when the nickel industry is prosperous it provides a great sum of money yearly—the figures have been mentioned and I will not go over them—in our transportation business. Last year the nickel company at Sudbury consumed 90,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal. This coming year I am hopeful that the nickel mines at Sudbury and the refineries and smelters there will consume over 135,000 tons of the same coal.

The development of the Sudbury nickel field and the practices in the refining of their ore, as well as their mining practices, have been so perfected that there is little fear to-day that the other known nickel deposits of the world will be developed. But there are other nickel deposits outside of Canada, apart from Caledonia and some places in Europe. There are known nickel deposits in Russia. Supposing we, by some governmental action, put a ban on the activities of the International Nickel Company, of such a kind as would inspire the Russians to develop in their country nickel mines and refineries: I wonder whom we would send there as emissary to convince the soviet that they should adopt such an altruistic course as has been suggested.

Mr. CANTLEY: The member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. GORDON: No, I would not say that; but we should have to search with care to find anyone in this country who would be able to convince the soviet that they, with their nickel production, should adopt the course suggested in this resolution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out to the minister that it is not suggested in any way that nickel production would cease at Sudbury.

Mr. GORDON: That is quite true; but once let a government start on the course suggested in this resolution and I greatly fear that we should find the business of that company seriously hampered, because there are so many people uninformed concerning the activities and hazards that surround that business, that one thing would lead to another. I say this because of the obvious difficulty, if not impossibility, of identifying the nickel that actually goes into armaments. This is probably the first time since I have been a member of the house that I have ever referred to a newspaper, but I have before me a clipping from the Northern Miner of November 23, 1933. This paper which is published in Toronto, is certainly the oldest mining paper in Canada if not on the continent. Discussing this question, it says in part as follows:

> A part of the Canadian public has seized on the erroneous idea that nickel is some sort of sinister metal when there is war talk. People profess to become alarmed, even somewhat horrified, over the prospect of this country supplying metals to belligerent nations and they speak of restricting or controlling production and exports of a metal of which Canada has a practical monopoly.
> Actually nickel is not half as important in war operations as copper. In the last great war there was not nearly the employment for nickel that had been anticipated. Significantly, nations that could not secure it in quantity got along well enough without. Germany was practically shut off from supplies and the war-making of that nation lingers in the memory.
> The principal war use for this war metal in the great conflict was as a covering for lead bullets that would have torn our troops to pieces unless so protected. It acted in a merciful rather than in a sinister role. It deserved a red cross.

That is probably in keeping with the observations made by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross). The article continues:

> How could war be conducted without copper, lead and zinc? They are absolutely essential metals in war operations. Has there been any talk of restricting production or export of these metals in time of war? Certainly not.

And the article goes on. Then the hon. member for Quebec East in discussing what was taking place in the League of Nations, in substance made this observation, that the nations of the world, at least some and probably all of them, were quite content to control the exportation of nickel, and on the other hand Canada was quite content that the manufacture of armaments should be done under governmental supervision. It will be noted that the nations which wanted to control the export of nickel do not produce any and Canada does not manufacture any armaments, so that the representatives to the League of Nations, I should say, should put the matter very bluntly to the nations of the world when they sit around the council table.

The products of the International Nickel Company to-day enter into almost every industrial activity where steel is used, from kitchen sinks to bathtubs. I do not know whether all hon. members are aware of the uses to which nickel is now being devoted. Monel metal is only one of the alloys; there are a dozen of them that during the last eight or ten years have been discovered and are peculiarly adapted to some sort of industrial activity. How is it possible, even if it would be effective, for anyone without impeding the wheels of industry to earmark nickel that might get into armaments?—because it is a comparatively simple matter to take the scrap into which nickel is introduced, refine it and reintroduce the nickel into armaments.

In conclusion, let us not for the sake of publicity or otherwise, for the sake of having our observations recorded in Hansard, fool around with a problem that is so serious, namely that of the settlement of men's differences by force. Do not let us fool around with the question whether we will ban nickel or not, but let us continue to support the only international tribunal that is at present available and Canada need take no second position to any other nation in the world in that respect. Let us continue to support the League of Nations so long as that body can command the respect and is entitled to the support of this country, in the hope that those who sit around the international council table will be able to devise some scheme or method whereby in the future nations will be constrained to submit their differences to that or some other tribunal for a peaceful solution. If we do not adopt that attitude, then if nations get into a clash where one concludes for some reason that another nation is not dealing fairly with it, probably at some time we may have some more war.

Every time anybody talks about war and every time a paper puts in a scare headline in regard to it, there is always a certain section of the community, irresponsible at first it is true, but in an ever growing circle which simply lends itself to the support of the idea. I would say in great sincerity: Stop talking about war.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with the sentiment by which this resolution is actuated, but I am a little bit wary about its practicability, that is, as the minister has already stated, the practicability of earmarking the quantity of nickel that is exported to so-called belligerent nations. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) mentioned something about nickel and lead bullets, saying that it would be easier to die by being shot with a nickel bullet than with a lead one. Personally I do not care to be shot by any kind of bullet. Even if we do away with exports of nickel it seems to me nations will resort to some other metal. They will use steel; they will use iron or something else. When they run out of minerals they will use sticks and when these are no longer available they will use rotten tomatoes or possibly custard pie. I think the question of nickel is only one factor that enters into the matter.

In proposing a resolution of this kind it seems to me that we are dealing with the sympton rather than the disease. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) has just mentioned the League of Nations. We send a delegate to the League of Nations every year. I personally feel that the trouble in Europe and the whole world to-day is due to such matters as the war debts, the war reparations, monetary questions and also the question of minorities. They have over there forty millions of minorities under the domination of other races. Europe has been split into two camps, the status quo camp and the revisionist camp. If the treaty of Versailles is revised immediately there will be war. If you stick to the status quo there will be war anyway. Therefore I think it is the duty of our representative to the League of Nations to advocate something that will bring peace in Europe, because I think that all our troubles on this continent can be traced directly to the situation that exists at present in Europe. I do not hesitate to say that the Versailles treaty was based on no principle, ethnological, geographical or other principle whatsoever, but on greed, animosity and chauvinism. It was signed too soon after the war when nerves were on edge and passions at their peak. I also do not hesitate to say that I advocate revision of the treaty of Versailles. I believe that all these minority peoples should be repatriated and then some effort made to organize a so-called general economic government that will evolve into the United States of Europe and all those peoples over there be accepted into this United States of Europe, not on the basis of the United States of Europe proposed by Briand, but based on a revision of the treaty of Versailles. When they were settling these boundary lines over there—and this in my estimation is one reason why there is no peace in Europe—a cartoon appeared in The Calgary Eye-Opener with Sir Clifford Sifton's picture in it and that of Sir Robert Borden. Although they were looking for Czechoslovakia they had a map of Africa before them and Sir Clifford said: Where the dickens is Czechoslovakia, and Sir Robert replied: I'll be darned if I know. That is perhaps an exaggerated illustration of what was taking place over there. It explains the attitude of mind of the makers of this treaty. I believe we should treat the disease rather than the symptoms thereof, and I certainly believe that the treaty of Versailles contains all the germs of the present situation in Europe, and until it is revised I do not think it likely that there will be peace and thus a return of prosperity over there, and until our customers are prosperous it is not likely that we shall be prosperous on this continent.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I have the job of talking this question out, but I agree entirely with the direction in which the proposer of this resolution is moving. Like the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) I had some practical experience in the war. In the navy we always used to say that what one man stuck up the next one could knock down. I remember vividly in connection with mines, the British invented a paravane which carried on the front of the ship permitted that ship to steam through a mine field. Thereupon for some time it was possible for us to steam through these mine fields and nip off the mines without any danger to the ships, but then the Germans brought out a mine with jaws in the anchor that cut the paravane adrift. I think some such thing probably would happen if we did away entirely with nickel in the manufacture of armaments—I mean some substitute would be found. Frankly I believe it is not a question of material; it is a psychological, a mental question. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) said: Do not talk about war. I think if he, like myself and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), had been in Europe this summer, he would have heard a lot about war. When I was in Moscow I observed that the Russians, who have a great war psychology, seem to think everyone wants to go to war with them, and I believe they have certain grounds for thinking that way in view of what has taken place in the last seventeen years. A newspaperman concocted a story that even the Americans wanted to go to war with the Russians. I said: I know nothing about the policy of the American government, neither do I know anything about the official policy of the Canadian government, but I do know the viewpoint of the man in the street in America towards the next war in Europe, that is, "cash on delivery." I think that reflects the viewpoint of our people. I speak now more from the viewpoint of their mental attitude because a change in the men tality of the people in Europe is essential When I was in Brussels I gave a picture of the conditions on the North American continent, told them we have an international boundary 3,600 miles long without a gun on it, yet within the confines of our nations we have all the bloodstreams that exist in Europe to-day, notwithstanding which we are able to get along in peace in the new world; I said, you people should exemplify the spirit of peace which we have proven practicable on the North American continent. The situation is, whether we like it or not, that there is possibly going to be war in the east as soon as the snow thaws; I think it is a reasonable analysis of the situation that there will be war. A system of dictatorships exists in Europe at the moment—dictatorship in its very essence is predicated on war. You have Mussolini telling the Italian people his dreams of an empire and power recreating the glories of ancient Rome. In the carrying out of that policy the British people will have something to say. Then there is Hitler, half-clown and half-fanatic, who tells the German people that one of the policies necessary to meet the present economic problems confronting that country is an expansion of the boundaries of Germany into Poland and the Ukraine. Of course Russia and Poland will have something to say about that. The same old diplomatic game is going on in Europe. After all it does not matter whether it is civil servants or nations, ambition makes strange bedfellows. You see Stalin saying to Pilsudski: Come to Moscow and talk things over; in other words "Come up and see me sometime," yet six months ago he was calling Pilsudski a butcher. You see Herriot, the radical French socialist, going to Russia recently and saying to the Russian people all the nice things he could say and in my judgment making observations absolutely contrary to the facts, whereas only six months ago the attitude of the French government was directly the opposite in regard to the Russian government. You see the emissaries of Mussolini coming to Paris and saying nice things about the French, whereas these countries have been at loggerheads ever since the close of the great war. We have seen the development of a gigantic vise around Germany, ready to crush out her very national life if the German people should move in the direction of carrying out the policies enunciated by Hitler prior to the last election in that country. So I believe sincerely that it is far more than a mere material problem; it touches the very mainsprings of the individual nations themselves. It is a psychological problem, and I think it can be said that North America has made a magnificent contribution in the last seventeen years in its approach to international problems in Europe. It would be different if we were fifty years away from the last war; if the people of these countries had not lived through the carnage and the physical, mental and material suffering; if they had not experienced all that. They have the exemplification of the utter futility of war in the enormous cemeteries that exist at their back doors and in the maimed and crippled such as we saw in Ottawa last week during the convention held in this city.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that no one would welcome international cooperation in connection with the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre more than I would welcome it. I believe Canada is making its contribution. It was pointed out by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that there must be some form of international agreement in connection with this matter. I believe he was on absolutely sound ground in making that statement; I do not think there can be any argument against it. After all is said and done you cannot justify bad judgment on the grounds of good intentions; I think your premises must be sound. I think we have exemplified, through the representatives of the Canadian government at Geneva, the attitude of this dominion towards war in Europe. It is rather disheartening to go to those countries and see that almost every other man is a soldier; to go to Russia, where they have snuffed out the lives of millions of people in the last ten or fifteen years but where their greatest contribution—I am speaking now, of course, of the territory within the confines of their own country—is the creation of an army possibly second to none in Europe to-day. Of course they argue that it is to be used for defensive purposes. Frankly I would rather follow the policies that reflect the mentality of the Canadian people.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the proper approach to this problem, apart from the mental viewpoint, is that the governments themselves should control the munitions factories within their own countries. Put the children on the doorsteps where they properly belong. Then, of course, I think no government has a right to lead its people into a great war without first crystallizing the viewpoint of the people in relation to that war. I think a referendum should be taken in each country. If that were a part of the machinery of the league; if it were provided that this must be done in any country contemplating carrying on a war, I believe that in the interval that would elapse between the declaration and the actual carrying on of the war the people would find that their spirit would cool down and they would reflect upon suffering that would result if their country should embark upon a war.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am heartily in accord with the purport of this resolution in the direction of controlling, by national and international action, the warlike forces of this and every other country in the civilized world.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If no one else wishes to speak—

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no reply open to my hon. friend. I was going to suggest that perhaps his purpose has been accomplished by bringing about this discussion, which has been illuminating and, we trust, informative, and which we hope has served some useful purpose. I was going to suggest that perhaps it would meet the wishes of my hon. friend to withdraw his amendment now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that I have no reply, Mr. Speaker. May I say that originally my purpose was to introduce this matter to the house in the way of a private motion, but the only way I could introduce it to-day was by means of an amendment. I very gladly withdraw the amendment as it now stands.

Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Gott in the chair.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 22, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Stinson.

LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 40, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

He said: The changes to be made by this bill are not very important. Certain changes in definition are being made in order to comply with the modern practices of the trade. Another change is in connection with the control of chick hatcheries by any province wishing to have such control. Section 8, subsection 5 is being amended by the substitution of the word "thirty" for the word "sixty." The principle of the act is not being changed in any way.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AIR MAIL SERVICE, CHIEF SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Who is the chief superintendent of the air mail service?

2. When was he appointed?

3. What is his salary?

4. Where was he born?

5. How long had he been in Canada prior to his appointment to the civil service of Canada?

Mr. DUPRE:

1. George Herring.

2. First appointed to civil service April 2, 1907. Appointed to present position April 1, 1929.

3. $4,620 per annum.

4. Inverness, Scotland.

5. Approximately one year.

SWIFT CURRENT EXPERIMENTAL FARM—SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What was the annual salary paid to Mr. Taggart, superintendent of the Swift Current experimental farm during each of the years in which he held the position?

2. How many expert assistants did he have?

3. What was the total amount paid to them in each of the same years?

4. What percentage of the cost of running the Swift Current experimental farm has been paid out of the revenues received from the production since 1929?

5. What is the total amount expended on the said farm in each year since 1929?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. March 31, 1922, $1,140; March 31, 1923, $2,160; March 31, 1924, $2,280; March 31, 1925, $2,400; March 31, 1926, $2,520; March 31, 1927, $2,640; March 31, 1928, $2,880; March 31, 1929, $3,000; March 31, 1930, $3,090; March 31, 1931, $3,120; March 31, 1932, $3,120; March 31, 1933, $2,772; March 31, 1934, $2,772.

2. Two.

3. March 31, 1923, $825; March 31, 1924, $1,664.46; March 31, 1925, $1,609.98; March 31, 1926, $1,650; March 31, 1927, $1,710; March 31, 1928, $3,630; March 31, 1929, $3,720; March 31, 1930, $3,426.60; March 31, 1931, $3,490.50; March 31, 1932, $3,645; March 31, 1933, $3,240; March 31, 1934, $3,240.

4. ·83 per cent.

5. 1929-30, $52,372.38; 1930-31, $56,229.25; 1931-32, $59,260.45; 1932-33, $42,093; 1933-34 to February 28, 1934, $37,124.62.

EASTER RECESS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday the 28th of March instant, it shall stand adjourned until Monday the 9th of April, 1934.

Motion agreed to.

RURAL CREDITS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire if it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session in connection with short and intermediate rural credits.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The intention of the government will be made manifest when the legislation is introduced, if it is introduced. It is now under consideration.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

VOTE OF ONE-SIXTH OF ESTIMATES FOR FINANCIAL YEAR 1934-35

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as supply for this year will have become exhausted on March 31 and we do not reassemble until April 9, the public service would be seriously hampered and the public interest would be detrimentally affected if we did not pass interim supply. Of course, I can proceed only by unanimous consent but I ask the house for unanimous consent for the passing of interim supply of one-sixth of the main estimates for next year. I am asking for one-sixth rather than one-twelfth because under the new act we require a larger proportion than was the case under the old practice. I can go into further details if the house so desires. To-day being Thursday, when the motion to go into supply is put, Mr. Speaker leaves the chair without question put, but inasmuch as I am asking for unanimous consent I suppose I would have to make a motion, which I now make.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was kind enough to speak to me yesterday of his intention to move to-day for interim supply. I told him that in view of the representations he had made and which he has repeated just now I did not think there would be any objection so far as the official opposition is concerned to granting one-sixth at this time. However, when the minister moves to go into committee I should like to direct the attention of the house to a matter which bears immediately upon the control by parliament of appropriations voted by the house. I assume it is understood that interim supply will be voted on the same conditions as those on which previous interim supplies have been voted, that is, without prejudice as to criticism of any item which may come before us for subsequent discussion or as to the withholding in whole or in part of any item, or part of the supply, if such should be the desire of the house.

Mr. RHODES: It is understood that all reservations customary under such circumstances shall be made and that the fullest opportunity will be afforded for discussion of or objection to any individual vote at a later period. I do not quite understand my right hon. friend's reference to a discussion on the motion to go into supply. If that motion is to be the subject of discussion, I would not be able to proceed with unanimous consent. The same opportunity would be given to every hon. member and the object which I had in mind would be defeated as well as the rule with respect to proceeding into supply on a day other than Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister is quite right. I overlooked the unanimous consent for which he is asking. When we get into committee of ways and means I shall bring up the matter which I have in mind.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister intend to ask for one-sixth of 100 per cent or of 90 per cent?

Mr. RHODES: I shall ask for one-sixth of the supply as it appears in the estimates. This procedure will have no effect upon the subject which my hon. friend has in mind. In view of having to have unanimous consent, perhaps it would be necessary that a motion be made without prejudice to the application of the rule later on to-day. Therefore, I move:

That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $30,073,471.87, being one-sixth of the amount to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1935, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1935.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending March 31, 1935, the sum of $30,073,471.87 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to take advantage of this opportunity, which is the first I have had since seeing the auditor general's report for the year ending March 31, 1933, to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance, of the Prime Minister, and in fact of parliament, to a statement which appears in that report and which is of very grave concern, I think, to hon. members of this house and to parliament itself. The statement appears on page 55 of the introduction under the head, "Operation of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act." The auditor general there states:

As the present report is the first one covering a full year's operation under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act of 1931, I consider that I should state, for the information of parliament, how this act, amending as it does the previous act, has altered the duties and modified the responsibilities of the auditor general acting as an officer of parliament, and the resultant effect on parliamentary control of expenditure of public moneys.

I need not complete that paragraph. The next one reads:

There is, however, another aspect of the changes made by the new act which calls for special consideration at this time as it involves the principle of parliamentary control over the issue of public moneys. Under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act of 1878, provision was made for the appointment of an officer who would be independent of the government of the day and be answerable to parliament alone in respect of such issues. However, under the Amending Act of 1931, the power of issue of appropriated moneys was removed from that officer, the auditor general, whose powers are now restricted to the examination of accounts and the reporting thereon to parliament. The cases cited hereunder may indicate an inclination to overlook the statutory limitations regarding the expenditure of moneys appropriated, thereby diminishing parliamentary control of these moneys. Under the old act, if the auditor general objected to certain expenditures on the ground that they were not properly authorized, he could refuse to make further issues of moneys; but under the new act he has no such power.

On the next page the auditor general gives instances of the result of the withdrawal of his control over the issue of public moneys.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would not mind reading those.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to read them. I had intended doing so. The point to which I wish to direct the attention of the house is that, by the Audit Act of 1931, the control which formerly this parliament had over public expenditures, by having its servant, the auditor general, made responsible for the issuing of appropriated moneys, has apparently been withdrawn; that power which the auditor general formerly had has been withdrawn and vested in an officer who is not a servant of parliament but an official of the government, one whom the government has it in its power to dismiss. Let me say at once that I have the highest appreciation of the worth of the present official, and I do not for one moment assume that there will be in his case any possibility of action of that kind. But I do think it is most important that parliament should retain the power, which it has had for fifty years, of exercising control over public expenditures in the manner in which formerly it did. I submit that at the time the bill was introduced the house was not given to understand that the new appointment of comptroller provided by the act meant any withdrawal from the auditor general of this particular function, which is the most important of all he formerly had, and placing it in the hands of an officer of one of the departments of government. Had the house so understood, I am sure there would have been strong opposition to such a proposal, and that the house would never have consented thereto. I am not sure that when the government brought in the bill its members appreciated the fact that this would be the consequence. The Prime Minister has asked me to read what the auditor says with regard to the effect of the change. I will do so. On page 56 of the introduction he states:

Availability of one vote to cover over-expenditure under another. On pages 195 and 198 of this volume is printed the correspondence with the comptroller of the treasury and the treasury board relative to the procedure followed in the case of several departments which in my opinion was subversive of the principle of parliamentary control over the expenditure of public moneys. In each case the over-expenditure on one vote was charged against a surplus on a vote provided for another purpose. Under section 27 (1) of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act it is provided that all issues of public moneys shall be made under the direction and control of the comptroller but no such issue shall be made in excess of any appropriation. Under section 50 (2) I am obliged to call the attention of the House of Commons to every case in which a grant has been exceeded. The only definite prohibitive direction to the comptroller in the act is that he shall not issue any money in excess of a parliamentary appropriation, and the first duty laid upon me in respect of my report to the House of Commons is that I shall call attention to every case where that prohibition has not been observed. These statutory directions are valueless if the procedure followed in these three cases is to become the accepted practice. Such practice is contrary to the underlying principle of supplementary estimates and of the issue of governor general's warrants. In confirmation of my views I cited previous treasury board decisions, resolutions of the British House of Commons and the debate in our House of Commons in 1888 between leaders on both sides relative to this subject. The principle of parliamentary control is so fundamentally important that I feel impelled to call attention to any departure therefrom.

Payment from general vote of gratuities in lieu of retiring leave.—In volume 1 of my report for 1931-32 (page 286) and page 187 of this volume is printed correspondence with the treasury board in reference to the payment of gratuities in lieu of retiring leave without any special vote having been provided by parliament. In my opinion this was irregular in that payments were made as gratuities, equivalent to or less than the retiring leave authorized by statute, from votes provided by parliament for other purposes. The treasury board differed from this view.

Since then another order in council has been passed, dated July 31, 1933, providing for the retirement of employees who have reached a certain age limit, with gratuities equivalent to retiring leave of so many months' salary. In some of these cases the gratuities were in excess of the retiring leave that may be granted under the Civil Service Act, and in other cases gratuities were paid to employees who are entitled to no retiring leave under any act of parliament. No special vote was provided and the payments have been charged to various votes under the respective departments. Although the present retirements are being effected in the interest of good administration a procedure is established under which, without any authority other than that provided in an order in council and without any special appropriation being provided, gratuities are being paid to retired employees in excess of those payable under the Civil Service Act, or are not authorized by any statute. The question of the advisability of obtaining a vote of parliament to cover such expenditures has been resubmitted recently for the consideration of the treasury board. The British practice in cases of this kind is determined by a decision of the treasury in the following terms: "My Lords fully agree with the view of the committee that if in exceptional circumstances a gratuity is given on retirement in addition to the statutory superannuation payments, that gratuity should not be paid until an estimate making clear its extra-statutory nature has been presented to parliament and passed."

I shall now read the concluding paragraph:

However I have certified all applications submitted to me for pre-audit as this question had been dealt with in my previous annual report but I feel that the matter should again be brought to the attention of the House of Commons since this class of payments has been extended to cover gratuities that are in excess of what is provided by the Civil Service Act.

The auditor general in the report states in so many words that the Civil Service Act has been violated; that moneys which were voted for one purpose, have been used for another; that moneys have been paid out of the public treasury without any previous appropriation by parliament for the specific purpose and that these violations of a former practice have grown out of the fact that by the Audit Act of 1931 there was taken away from the auditor general as the servant of this parliament the power which he had for many years exercised of issue of appropriated moneys to be placed to the credit of the different government departments. Certainly the house was given to understand that the purpose of the Audit Act was to bring about a more effective control and not to lessen it; least of all was it thought that its purpose was to transfer control which parliament has most zealously exercised from the very beginning, to the government and to an officer under the government's control. When I read this statement in the auditor general's report I felt it my duty to bring the matter immediately to the attention of the house, not with a desire of provoking a discussion on the question, but with a view of seeing once this had been done whether in the mind of the government the Audit Act should not be amended so that parliament may have restored to it that power over expenditure of public moneys through the control of issue of appropriated moneys by its servant the auditor general, which has been customary ever since the first audit act was passed.

Mr. RHODES: So far as the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act is concerned, the question of parliamentary control, I submit with all deference, does not arise. All the auditor general is doing in that statement is calling in question an action of parliament itself. Parliament may or may not have acted wisely in passing that act. It may be a question whether there is or is not that same degree of control which obtained under the previous method. But inasmuch as I did not know my right hon. friend intended to bring this matter up to-day and also in view of the circumstance that I have asked unanimous consent of the house, I would be the last to wish to consume time under those conditions. I take it that the purposes of my right hon. friend will have been met if I say to him that I shall be very glad to take his references to-day as a notice and to indicate to him that I shall be pleased indeed at a later stage in supply or at some time when it may be convenient other than when we are voting interim supply, to discuss the question in full detail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would certainly have given my hon. friend notice of what I intended to say—

Mr. RHODES: I am not criticizing my hon. friend for not doing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —had I meant in any way to start a discussion. In reading the report I noticed the statement by the auditor general and as I believed it was of concern to parliament I considered it my duty to bring it immediately to the attention of the house. I thank my hon. friend for promising to give it consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I saw the volume of the auditor general's report to which reference has been made, and while I did not read the details of the matter, because I was familiar with the position taken by the auditor general, I at once recognized the references when the right hon. gentleman read them. The truth is that the new act entirely changed the conditions under which moneys were made available for departmental expenditures. The truth is also that the auditor general has always disapproved of it. It wiped out the entire bookkeeping establishments in the several departments and instead of credits being granted by the auditor general, they are now referable to the votes of parliament under the comptroller and unless there is provision in the estimate of the particular department for the payment of the moneys that are sought to be expended, then the auditor general declines to sanction the payment when the item comes before him. I do not propose to do more than to say that the effect of the action taken has been to save the country, I think the figure for last year was $231,000—I speak subject to correction—because the new method is partly responsible for the reduction in personnel mentioned in the return made a few days ago by the Minister of Finance. I feel satisfied that when the right hon. gentleman and those associated with him have studied the operations of the act, they will be satisfied that parliamentary control has not been lessened and that the machinery set up for handling the financial operations of the country is such as would obtain in good business establishments and retain to the utmost the control of parliament.

I said to my colleague the Minister of Finance that in view of the attention of the house having been directed to the matter by the right hon. gentleman, we might discuss it fully when the house is again in supply on Monday or Tuesday or any other day that might be convenient. Possibly the best time would be when the item of cost of management in connection with the financial operations of the country is under consideration by the committee. Every facility that can be afforded for the purpose of the discussion will be given and if the right hon. gentleman will indicate that there is any information he desires to be furnished from the department, I will see that it is made available for him before the discussion takes place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with the Prime Minister's promise a few minutes ago to bring down information to help in understanding the matter of control of public expenditure, perhaps he or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) will be kind enough to have the officers of the department prepare a memorandum which will show by comparison the old system of control and the new and what the differences between the two may be.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, certainly, that will be done.

Mr. DUFF: I think I am correct in saying that the amount which it is now proposed to vote, is not for March salaries or for payments due to the public to March 31 of this year, but it is intended to cover moneys which will be due to civil servants and to other people who are doing business with the government for the months of April and May. Before the vote is carried, I think this is a very opportune time for the government to tell the house whether we are going to return to the payment of 100 per cent of salaries to lighthouse keepers, customs officials and other officers of the service throughout the country. We should therefore have an expression of opinion from the government with regard to getting back to the payment of 100 per cent of the salaries, whether it be the salary of Mr. Speaker, or that of the Deputy Speaker of this house, or of the chairman of the committee of the whole, or my remuneration as the member for Antigonish-Guysborough, or the salaries of the deputy ministers of the different departments and other officials, or of the lightkeepers and charwomen and elevator men and all the other civil servants of this country. We should have a statement from the government now, because if we vote this money to-day and adjourn over Easter and do not come back until the 9th of April there will be very little time between then and the 15th when the cheques go out for the government to take any action. This vote, as the finance minister said in answer to my question, only covers the amount set forth in the estimates, and as we know, in these estimates the ten per cent is deducted. It is very easy for the finance minister and the government to bring down a supplementary estimate covering the ten per cent, the difference between 90 and 100 per cent, so that the civil servants after the first of April can get 100 per cent which in my opinion is due them.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) that the question of asking for interim supply has any bearing on the major question of the amount of the supply itself. That is an entirely separate thing. I may say further that even if it had any bearing I am not in a position to make any announcement today for the very good reason among others that when at their request I met a delegation consisting of the heads of the various civil service organizations some weeks ago, I told them no decision would be arrived at until after a further conference, and that further conference does not take place until tomorrow. That alone would preclude me making any announcement now. I know that under these conditions my hon. friend will not press the question.

Mr. DUFF: As long as the hon. minister gives that information to the house before we adjourn I am quite satisfied.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot even give an undertaking to that effect, although I have every hope of doing so.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1935.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I had not the pleasure of hearing the Prime Minister speak in Hamilton last night, but I am told, by one or two who had, that they understood from his remarks that he promised the city of Hamilton a new building when the program of public works was brought down. I would like to know if that is correct?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think it would be a fair inference to draw from what I said, that when any program of public works goes forward provision will be made for such a building. The necessity for it is so apparent that it does not require any argument. Unfortunately, for my own peace of mind, I should add there were a number of representatives there sitting at tables marked Brantford, St. Catherines, Galt—

Mr. DUFF: Niagara Falls.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. BENNETT: Niagara Falls and other cities, and I am bound to say it did not seem to meet with that measure of approval that one might hope for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is, I suppose, the first of the promises the Prime Minister is making for the next election.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I hope it is not the first.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And not the last.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not the last. And I may add that he is now in process of endeavouring to give effect to some of those that have already been made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I invite the Prime Minister to come and make a speech in the city of Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: I might say that if I receive the same reception there as I did the last time I was there I shall be quite content.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You made only promises there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister when the house may expect to receive details of the program of construction?

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman is serious about it—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What I said was in a jocular manner in dealing with the question of public works. I said that any program of public works would in my judgment be incomplete that did not provide for a public building in Hamilton. Those, as nearly as I can recollect, are the exact words I used. I think that yet. So if there is a program of public works I would regard it as incomplete if provision were not made for a public building in Hamilton, where, I understand, they have owned a site for a very long time, and where the government offices are scattered over the community. And I think, if the records were looked at, it would be found that my right hon. friend's party made somewhat similar observations in times past. There is nothing about it that is new to anyone, with respect to the necessity of a building in that community. The provisions of the measure dealing with this matter will be made known as soon after Easter as may reasonably be but the bill will not be brought down until then.

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is in a position to make a statement with regard to the questions which will be submitted to the supreme court arising out of the recent decisions of the tariff board. The Prime Minister I think mentioned the other day that he would make a statement shortly.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I said I would endeavour to table a copy of the order in council by the end of the week. The questions have been discussed and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has prepared the submission, but there was a difficulty as to whether or not a third question should be submitted, and the matter was brought to the attention of the house the other day. I hope I may be able to lay a copy of the order in council on the table to-morrow, but if not it will be done on Monday. There are days when it is difficult to find time to consider these matters; this would have been done to-day but for the fact that the committee concerned with the Jacques Cartier celebration met with us, so we did not have a chance to discuss the order in council.

SAINT JOHN OVERHEAD BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to state to the house whether or not an order in council has been passed giving authority to the harbour commissioners of Saint John for the construction of an overhead bridge, so called.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Speaking from memory, I remember that a submission was made to council by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) of recommendations made by the harbour commissioners as to an overhead bridge over the tracks at the new berth, No. 4. My memory is that such an order in council has been passed. I will verify that, and if it has been passed I will send a copy to the hon. gentleman.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting relief measures generally similar in terms to the Relief Act, 1933, but which also makes provision for payment of federal proportion of delayed relief accounts, if any, which may be received subsequent to the date of the expiration of said act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister if I am right in assuming that this resolution is necessary because the provisions of the Relief Act of 1933 expire on the 31st of this month, and, if that is so, that with it ends all the government has by way of providing assistance in connection with unemployment. That, I understand, is the extent of the government's policy on unemployment, namely, the system of the dole that was adopted last session. That system has been continued under the act of 1933, which expires at the end of this month. Unless we put through this measure before March 31 the government has nothing further that it can do for the unemployed, as I understand it.

Mr. GORDON: The right hon. gentleman is right, in substance. The act of 1933 expires on March 31 of this year, and unless legislation is enacted before the expiration of the fiscal year there will be no funds available with which to carry on the various activities of the dominion in assisting the provinces in connection with unemployment and general relief work.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: At the beginning of the session I asked a question of the Minister of Labour which is reported, together with his answer, at page 142 of Hansard. The question and answer were as follows:

1. Since the month of August, 1933, has the Department of Colonization of the province of Quebec proposed to the federal government that it carry on certain work in the parishes of St. Elzear, St. Emile d'Auclair and St. Benoit de Packington, Témiscouata county?
2. Has this work been approved by the federal government?
3. If so, on what date?

Mr. Rhodes:

1. Yes.
2 and 3. The relief works proposed to be carried out by the province of Quebec at St. Emile d'Auclair, Témiscouata county, received dominion approval on January 24th, while the works proposed to be carried out at St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington are still under consideration.

They had been under consideration since the previous August. On February 5 of this year the following order was passed by the house:

For a copy of memorandums bearing numbers 48, 54, 56, covering the work which the Department of Colonization of the province of Quebec proposed to have done in the parishes of St. Elzear, St. Emile d'Auclair and St. Benoit de Packington, Témiscouata county, and which were sent to the federal government for approval on August 30, 1933; also copy of all the correspondence, reports, telegrams, petitions, concerning the said work.

Approval was given with regard to the parish of St. Emile d'Auclair but, according to a letter I received from the Deputy Minister of Labour, the proposals concerning the parishes of St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington are still under consideration. In the return I have just mentioned, which is sessional paper No. 192 and which was tabled on March 2, 1934 by the Minister of Labour, there is some important correspondence at pages 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16. This contains the list of settlers in those constituencies who need relief, and the house will remember that last year I complained with regard to the way the settlers were looked after by this government. At that time I was told by the Minister of Labour that I was slandering my province. There was a man, whose name I will not mention to-day, who distorted the facts on that occasion by falsifying the reports of my speeches, and at the request of the Prime Minister the judgment I passed on that gentleman was deleted from Hansard. I wonder if he was rewarded for distorting the reports of the House of Commons by being appointed to the Post Office Department at $2,100 per year; in any case there he continues his dirty job of slandering the members and lying continuously in the newspapers. I shall not insist any more in connection with this matter. But when the Minister of Labour stated in the house that I was slandering my province when, in fact, I was defending the settlers in my constituency and in all other parts of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario I resented his action very much. Now, however, I have part of the proof; I have not the whole of it because I see that the return has been combed before being placed on the table of the house. I repeat that it has been combed. However I have something before me which I shall read to hon. members so that they may know about the real situation of the settlers in my constituency. I regret to have to take this action, but I believe I am bound to do so because although the minister may have been acting in good faith I do believe that surely he must have been wrongly informed when he blamed me so unfairly.

From the return which I have mentioned I shall refer to a letter from a missionary, the parish priest of the new settlement at St. Emile d'Auclair. This communication is addressed to Mr. Harry Hereford, director of unemployment relief in the Department of Labour, Ottawa. Dated on December 18, 1933, it reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—

I am entrusted with the spiritual welfare of the settlers of Saint-Emile d'Auclair, founded in 1932. I forwarded to your address, some time ago, the information relating to our people.

I clearly explained the situation of my settlers to your inspector, Mr. Lafortune, when he came through here in October.

Over a month ago, your department authorized an expenditure of $9,100 for work to be carried out at the settlement of Lejeune, an adjacent parish, which has a much smaller population than mine.

I have been patiently waiting, until this very day. It will take a miracle to save my settlers from starvation, that is the plain fact, with the few hundreds of dollars which I succeed in obtaining each month at the price of endless complaints and recriminations. The small children of settlers in my parish are without shoes, or stockings or clothes to cover themselves this winter to attend school (a large number cannot leave the camps), they are in great distress, utter destitution—

I shall draw the minister's attention to the fact that this missionary says that the condition is one of black misery.

—a life of cruel disappointment for a poor missionary who is in charge of all these people.

Would you be kind enough to inform me, whether the provincial government has sent in a request for relief in connection with the settlement of St. Emile?

The parish priest wondered if a request for relief had been sent by the provincial government to the federal government. His letter inquires as to whether the request had reached the federal Department of Labour in the previous month of August.

What was the amount? What reason or reasons prevent you from granting this amount? Why these interminable delays as regards my settlement, when you have granted so many requests, here and there?

Kindly inform me whether you approve or reject the requests made by the Quebec government for my settlement. I have witnessed the great distress of my settlers. I must act one way or another, for the heart of a missionary cannot endure such sufferings among those who have been entrusted to him. Please reply immediately.

I have the honour to be your very obliged in J.C.

(Sgd.) J. E. A. Beaulien, Missionary Priest.

Mr. Chairman, that is the text of the letter received by the department from the reverend gentleman I have named. There is attached to the letter, at the request of Mr. F. Lafortune who, I understand, belongs to the Department of Labour, a list of people who need relief in that new parish which has been created as a means to relieve unemployment. It is as follows:

This is the list of family heads which was sent to the department on October 12, and on December 18, two months afterwards, no answer had been received. In proportion to the population there were more unemployed in that new settlement established to relieve unemployment than there are in the large cities of Toronto and Montreal. Besides that, the names of many bachelors appear on the same list. Following the names of bachelors is another list containing the names of the heads of families. There are two double column pages of unemployed and people who need relief, and there are further names on the third page. A certificate by the parish priest is attached.

I have received letters from people in the parishes of St. Elzear, and St. Benoit de Packington. The matter is still under consideration, and only to-day I received the following letter from the deputy head of the Department of Labour:

Ottawa, March 19, 1934.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

I have your letter of the 16th instant, and note your questions in regard to relief works at St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington.

Sessional Paper No. 192, reference No. 22, tabled on March 2, contained copies of the correspondence which passed in connection with these schedules to the Quebec agreement.

I note you also ask whether the projects are still under consideration by the minister and department. In reply I might state that as the agreement between the dominion and the province under which federal contribution was provided for on these works expires on the thirty-first instant, and as the agreement contains a provision for all such works being completed by that date, it has been decided not to approve of any further works under the present agreement.

Many months have elapsed since August and the department has no excuse for having waited until December before approving requests received from the Quebec government. I should like an answer to certain questions, and I shall send a copy of these questions over to the minister.

Referring to the answer given by the Minister of Labour and which appears on page 142 of Hansard of this session, to the effect that since the month of August, 1933, the Department of Colonization of the province of Quebec has proposed to the federal government that it carry on certain work in the parishes of St. Elzéar, St. Emile d'Auclair and St. Benoît de Packington, Témiscouata county, province of Quebec. Has the work proposed for the parish of St. Emile d'Auclair been approved by the federal government? If so, why? I know it has been approved, but I should like to know why. Has the work proposed for the parishes of St. Elzéar and St. Benoît de Packington been approved by the federal government? If not, why? With regard to the two latter parishes, is the government in possession of any correspondence to the same effect as that contained on pages 9 to 16 inclusive of sessional paper number 192, reference number 22, tabled in the house by the hon. Minister of Labour on Friday, March 2, 1934? If so, from whom was each document received and what is the date? If such correspondence exists, why is it not contained in the above sessional paper?

Mr. GORDON: On reference to the record I find that the federal government received from the provincial government of Quebec a large number of schedules asking that the federal government approve of work to be done in the constituency of Témiscouata. In all, twenty-five schedules were received for our approval. Wherever possible inspectors visit the locality where relief by way of works or otherwise is sought. Of the total number of schedules received from Quebec, only six were not approved, and of those six, two were subsequently cancelled by the provincial authorities. Undoubtedly this cancellation was brought about by the gradual pickup in business, particularly in connection with pulpwood and lumbering operations. An inspector from the department visited the parishes to which the hon. member has referred. He interviewed those who in his judgment were acquainted with local conditions and reported that there was no necessity for either a contribution by the dominion government to the province or an expenditure of money by the province. The department acted upon the advice of the inspector.

Mr. POULIOT: Was that inspector, Mr. Lafortune?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the file before me, but I am inclined to think it was.

Mr. POULIOT: How is it that Mr. Lafortune's report is not included in the return?

Mr. GORDON: I would regard the report of an inspector who visits a locality and makes an investigation on behalf of the department as being strictly confidential. The names of people are mentioned and, speaking generally, I am afraid that people are rather resentful of anyone who would put barriers in the way of an expenditure of money from the provincial or dominion treasuries.

Mr. POULIOT: Did the minister have the letter from Father Beaulieu translated for his own purposes?

Mr. GORDON: I have no recollection of such a communication but the hon. member will realize that tens of thousands of communications are received by the department in connection with relief matters throughout Canada. I think I can say that if such a letter did come into the department I would have knowledge of it. I will look into the records to refresh my memory and during the course of the debates I shall make a further statement with respect to that.

Mr. POULIOT: I think it is only fair that the minister should have such letters translated in order that he may have personal knowledge of them. On the other hand, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether to his knowledge or to the knowledge of his deputy who sits beside him now, there is no correspondence of any kind apart from Lafortune's report or the inspector's report with regard to these two parishes of St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington since August last.

Mr. GORDON: I can only assure the hon. gentleman that at the earliest moment I will look up the file, refresh my memory and answer within the course of a day or two.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for his answer and I wish to tell him now that I am ready to take his word on that. On the other hand, knowing the people as I do, and knowing the facts as I know them, I have every reason to believe that there is some other correspondence with the department to the effect that the request made by the Quebec government should not be granted to these people. It is my personal belief and impression; and when I say that I say it on the strength of reliable authority. I have received letters which I am not going to read; they are long and I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee; but when one of our fellow countrymen is suffering it is the duty of a member to bring the matter to the attention of the government. With regard to the grant for the parish of St. Emile d'Auclair, the residents of which complained last year through me to the government regarding the deplorable state in which they were living, the minister admitted that I was acting in good faith, not slandering my province, but taking every available opportunity to come to the assistance of these people, without any political motive, but just to do my duty as a member of the House of Commons. I thank the minister for his answer and I hope he will be kind enough to supplement it at an early date.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What sort of public works were carried on under the control of the provincial government in Charlevoix and Saguenay under that measure last year?

Mr. GORDON: I have before me the numbers of schedules for the constituency, showing the estimated cost and the dominion proportion, but as to the actual character of the work I should have to refer to the details of the many schedules. However, it may suffice if I run over the various schedules showing the amounts in the constituency represented by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What do all these schedules cover? Is it for special work in each case, or have the schedules reference to different work at various times?

Mr. GORDON: Each schedule sent us by the province of Quebec outlines shortly the locality in which the work is to be carried on and gives a description of the kind and character of the work.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would it be possible to supply me with the names of the places and the work done under each schedule? I do not want to put the minister to the trouble of reading it to the committee, but he might send me a list of the various schedules showing what work they cover, and where the work was carried out.

Mr. GORDON: I should be very glad to prepare for the hon. member a statement showing where the work was done and the character of the work proposed or done.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know whether the minister has this information, but if he can give it, I would like to have the names of those engaged on these various works, including the superintendent.

Mr. GORDON: The Department of Labour has no record of the employees. That matter is entirely in the hands of the provincial authorities in Quebec. No doubt, on application, the information could be obtained from the provincial authorities.

Mr. BRADETTE: This resolution means simply that the country is going to have direct relief again for another year. The Minister of Labour knows very well that this is an unsatisfactory state of affairs so far as Ontario is concerned and it shows on the part of the government a lack of policy in regard to dealing with unemployment. I have in mind utterances made last year by several members of the Ontario government, more particularly by the Hon. Mr. Finlayson, highly condemning the direct relief policy of the federal government, even going so far as to say that it was practically a waste of public funds to the country and to Ontario in particular.

Mr. GORDON: Would the hon. member permit me an interjection at this moment? It must be remembered that at no time was a policy of direct relief or of works or otherwise a policy of the dominion government. The legislation passed was to assist the provinces to carry out their constitutional responsibilities. The provinces themselves lay down and administer the course which in their judgment they think it best to follow, having regard to all the circumstances and the needs that confront the various provincial governments in their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister tell the committee what the dominion government's policy with respect to unemployment was or is? As I gather from the minister's remarks, any policy as far as there is or was one relating to unemployment was entirely a provincial one, and the dominion had no policy other than just to assist the provinces. Is that the situation?

Mr. GORDON: So far as the administration that falls within the Department of Labour under this legislation is concerned, the dominion has merely contributed to assist the provinces to carry out their obligations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the dominion any policy apart from that or in addition to it? Is not that the sole policy of the dominion, the beginning and end of it?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think I need enter into any extended debate so far as the observation of the right hon. gentleman is concerned. He knows quite well this government has taken many measures which in its judgment would tend to improve matters throughout Canada with respect to trade, industry, agriculture and all the other various activities of the Canadian people. In my view, the actions taken by the government have in effect been very helpful. So far as this legislation is concerned and dealing with the expenditure of moneys, the policy was merely to supplement the efforts of the provinces in taking care of those who are unable to provide for themselves and also to supplement the funds of the provinces in the projection of such desirable works as in their opinion could be carried on in order to provide some employment for their people.

Mr. BRADETTE: The fact remains that unemployment relief has been the child of the federal government since the fall of 1930. That policy was inaugurated then by this government and has been administered by the provincial authorities. Another feature of this is the fact that for the first year, 1930-31, the government had a public works policy, but for reasons known only to them, it was found wanting and abrogated and then they took up direct relief. That, however, does not conflict with the statement I made a few minutes ago that the provincial authorities of Ontario fully realize that direct relief is only a palliative; that it is not a remedy for the present situation, and I believe I am absolutely in order in saying that the introduction of the resolution now before us brings very forcibly before the house and the country the fact that the federal government has no policy so far as unemployment is concerned. Unemployment relief, as I say, is purely and simply the infant of the present government. I could quote several papers which the minister knows are Conservative in their views and which certainly are not satisfied with the present method of unemployment relief. The objection is not as to the way in which it is administered, but they relaize that it is only a palliative and they feel now that after nearly four years in power the federal government should have a policy whereby it will be able to deal with such an important national problem in a way that will satisfy every section of the population. Unemployment relief at the present time is purely and simply the dole and it is a system which is largely deteriorating the moral fibre of our Canadian people. All it is doing is to permit the unemployed and their families to keep body and soul together, holding no hope for the future.

In making these remarks I want to be constructive in my criticism, but I know I have the backing of members of the Ontario government. Last summer and fall and during the winter Mr. Finlayson was quite outspoken in regard to the direct relief policy inaugurated by the federal government. He said practically that it was a scheme that should not be carried on any longer. I was hoping that the government would have a policy whereby unemployment would be dealt with at the root and from the proper angle. As I said, the present method is purely and simply a small stop-gap; it is only a way whereby the people keep body and soul together hoping for better times to come. When those times are going to come, they do not know, but surely the people of Ontario and of Canada generally have a right to expect to get relief and some hope from the present administration.

I know I shall have an opportunity of speaking on the back to the land movement when that estimate comes before us and at present I want to confine my remarks to directing attention to certain works that should be undertaken in my section of the country. Last fall the people of Canada entertained high hopes for a certain length of time because they were led to believe—I do not know from what member of the present government the report came—the government was going to inaugurate a program of public works. Whether the government had in mind at the time the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway being commenced early this spring, I do not know; but if such hopes were entertained, they were badly shattered last week. So far as eastern Canada is concerned, there is no hope of relief in the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway, but there are other programs of public works of national importance that could be undertaken by the government. It was said three years ago that it was found that the cost to the government of public work construction was practically prohibitive, but surely after three years of experiment the government can find it possible to undertake works of a national character and in an economical way. Knowing the minister so well personally, I make the statement in all sincerity that I know he is not satisfied with the resolution under discussion at the present time. I know he fully realizes, because he is conversant with the situation that exists throughout Canada, that the settlers in my section and his own and the farmers and workingmen generally are not satisfied under the direct relief scheme as it exists at present. Newspapers in my district, including even my regional one, have been absolutely against the relief meaures we have had on the statutes of Canada for the last few years. Surely it should be possible for the government to give employment to worthy people. It is true that under the relief provisions our people have not actually suffered greatly, that they have at least been able to eat three times a day and to be clothed to some extent, but there are anomalies in the application of those regulations. There is the fact that some able-bodied men have not done a day's work ever since relief was inaugurated, also that men who were willing to work on their farms for instance could not do it because for work done on their own property they could not receive remuneration from the government. I do not know if the Minister of Labour is familiar with the fact that last summer in our section an official of the northern development branch declared in the town of Cochrane that every settler who spent his time working on his farm would receive remuneration. That declaration was received with enthusiasm by every section of the population, urban and rural. I believe it would be a proper method of administering the Relief Act in new colonization areas. But unhappily for our fine rural population that policy was not made effective. I hope the minister will use his influence during the coming summer to see that settlers who are willing to stay on their holdings and clear their land for cultivation shall receive a certain amount of compensation, comparable to what was paid last summer for work on colonization roads. That policy would involve no extra cost to the administration.

Another matter which I have mentioned on several occasions, which is national in its scope and in which our section is greatly interested, is the trans-Canada highway. The minister is familiar with the promises made in his riding and in mine during the last federal election that the trans-Canada highway would go through Haileybury, Cochrane and Hearst. I am sorry to say that as far as my section is concerned it has not been routed as we expected. Consequently our people were unable to get the amount of work that was provided, for instance in the Ottawa valley and around the north shore of lake Superior. The promise was made during the last election and should be fulfilled. Some people say that election promises are only to catch votes and must be forgotten after the vote is cast, but my section of the country will not stand for that. There was a definite promise made at that time that the route of the highway was then or would soon be decided. But as far as I can see, outside of some minor work that has been done on the Ferguson highway at Englehart and Cobalt, very little work has been done towards connecting that highway with the transcontinental highway. That promise was very definite and well-understood by every section of northern Ontario. It may be that the provincial government said two or three years ago that they were not decided on the route but surely after three years of investigation the provincial government should be willing now to give a lead as far as that highway, and our section, is concerned. We believe in our section that we have been fooled on that important question. Although we realize that certain sections of northern Ontario have a right to be connected with the trans-Canada highway, I believe the promise made during the last federal election, which was a logical promise, should be implemented. We want to be connected somewhere east of lake Nipigon with the other section. But I believe our section is being entirely forgotten at present.

To show how much money has been spent on the trans-Canada highway and how much more will have to be spent I will quote a few figures given in answer to a question of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Hurtubise) as to the amounts of money expended on the trans-Canada highway in the province of Ontario for the years 1931, 1932 and 1933. The answer given was as follows:

1933	273,242

It is easy to see that the federal government is satisfied as long as a road is constructed in the Ottawa valley and a certain amount of work done around the north shore of lake Superior, and our section absolutely forgotten. I may tell this committee that not a single inch of work has been performed west of Hearst and no move made in that direction. This is work of national importance. One of the finest and most rapidly growing sections of this country is being absolutely ignored, and at the same time the route by the north shore of lake Superior is by far the more expensive. Anyone familiar with the physical obstacles in that section will readily realize that it would cost millions more to route the road that way than through our section. There is still time to remedy the injustice that has been done. We still hope in our section that through the influence of the Minister of Labour we shall receive the justice to which we are absolutely entitled. One feature strengthening that position is that to-day the province of Quebec is giving a lead in that direction. If my information is correct, presently a large body of men working north on the Mont Laurier road will be connecting on the C.N.R. with Senneterre and that will give the closest route from the maritime provinces and Quebec to Winnipeg. If hon. members will study the map of Canada they will see that nearly 600 miles would be saved by going via our section.

So in considering any national program of public works I hope the minister will see that a certain amount is provided for this highway between Cochrane and La Reine in the province of Quebec. There is only a short link on the Ontario side required to connect with the province of Quebec, about 72 miles in all.

Mr. GORDON: Might I interrupt a moment? As far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as saying that in his judgment the trans-Canada highway should go up to Senneterre and out to Manitoba in that direction. And I do not think he means that the road from Sheenboro to connect with Kipawa in Quebec is not being built because of any neglect on the part of the Dominion government, because the fact is we have received no schedule and no request for any contribution to that road which would connect with the Ontario roads passing through Rouyn down to Ottawa and Montreal. The Sheenboro-Kipawa-Ville Marie road is the one break which has necessitated the people in the north end of Pontiac and the Rouyn mining country coming down to Montreal and Toronto by the Ferguson highway in Ontario. I do not think the hon. member wants to be understood as meaning that the province of Quebec has given the lead to Ontario as far as opening up that part of northern Quebec is concerned, as compared with the efforts of the provincial government of Ontario in opening up roads in Ontario, which has been going on steadily and to an increasing extent each year. The Ferguson highway has been the outlet to the front, both Toronto and Montreal, for all of that north part of Pontiac to the present time, and still is as far as vehicular and motor traffic is concerned.

Mr. BRADETTE: Perhaps I have not made myself clear. The minister is familiar with the fact that Cochrane is situated on the Ferguson highway. He is also familiar with the fact that the province of Quebec has a good roadway system all the way from Senneterre to La Reine, near the Ontario border, which is only 82 miles east of Cochrane, and presently the Quebec government is constructing a road from Mont Laurier going northwest to Senneterre, which will give direct connection from Montreal to Cochrane, or at least La Reine, and will then be knocking at our door.

Mr. GORDON: Montreal now has direct connection with Cochrane.

Mr. BRADETTE: It has, by a roundabout way through the Ottawa valley; if you want to go from Montreal to Cochrane you have to go through the Ottawa valley to North Bay. The new road now being built by the Quebec government by way of Mont Laurier will mean a saving of at least 200 miles. Surely the minister is familiar with that situation.

Mr. GORDON: I am sure the hon. gentleman would not suggest that, when going through such a wonderful country, a person should take the shortest possible route and go as quickly as possible?

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not know whether or not the minister drives his own car, but I want to tell him that even if there is a converging road around the north shore of lake Superior, no matter how beautiful the country may be the people certainly will travel by way of Cochrane. Then there is the further advantage that people will be able to go one way and come back the other. To-day the province of Quebec is providing direct communication with the town of Cochrane, and I want the minister to realize the urgent need of constructing that 72 mile link, which is all that is necessary to complete that direct road. Within two years the province of Quebec will be tapping at our door, and we will have no connection between Montreal and Cochrane if this link is not completed. I know the minister is progressive enough to realize that we are entitled to have communication with the city of Montreal, and I have pointed out that we will have that communication when this remaining 72 miles of road is constructed. This is one of the public works which I believe should be carried on.

The minister also is familiar, no doubt, with the agitation, or activities, if I may call it that, in that section of the country for the construction of a highway from Timmins to Sudbury. The minister is aware of the fact that such a road would establish communication with such places as Shining Tree, Gowganda, Elk Lake, Matachewan and Porcupine, and would open up a rich territory, partly agricultural but mainly mineral.

Mr. GORDON: I wonder if I might interrupt once more. I am sure the hon. member knows, though perhaps it has slipped his memory, that the government of the province of Quebec, with whom rests the designation of the route within that province of what has been commonly termed the trans-Canada highway, have declared by order in council that the highway shall come to Lachute and cross into Ontario at that point. After it leaves Quebec, of course, they have no further authority, but that route has been designated by the government of Quebec as the trans-Canada highway. My own view is that this road by way of Mont Laurier would be a very useful piece of work, and while it may not be called the trans-Canada highway I assume that in time, with the annual improvements that will be made, it will become a very passable road. Then getting over into Ontario, I do not think the hon. member will deny that each year the highway from North Bay to Cochrane and west to Hearst is improved very materially. In fact I doubt if there is any gravel road in Ontario that is better than the Ferguson highway from North Bay on up to Porquis Junction and on to Cochrane and Hearst.

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not want the minister to put up a straw man only to destroy it; I have not said a word of criticism with regard to the Ferguson highway. I am going to make this prophecy, however; once the province of Quebec has direct communication with the town of Cochrane, through Mont Laurier, I am sure they will pass another order in council calling that the trans-Canada highway, if we then have direct communication with the western provinces. Of course if the promises made by the minister and his friends during the last campaign are not carried out, then we will be out of luck.

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I will have to interrupt again. The hon. member mentioned the promises I made during the last election. I think he will search the records for a long time before he finds any promises I made.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the minister deny that during the last campaign, in both our ridings, one of the strong planks in the platform of the Conservative party was the promise that the trans-Canada highway would go through that section of the country?

Mr. GORDON: No, I would not care to deny that.

Mr. BRADETTE: I know the minister will not deny that, because that promise was made in his own riding, whether it was made by himself or by his party. This must not be forgotten.

Mr. GORDON: It is not being forgotten.

Mr. BRADETTE: The promise will have to be implemented, and the Ontario government will have to come across with the proper routing of the highway. If I show some earnestness when I make that statement it is because I know what has happened in my own section of the country.

Again let me refer to the public works program. I have mentioned two matters, the construction of the communication road between Quebec and Cochrane and the road from Sudbury to Timmins. The minister is familiar with the situation in the north country, and he is familiar with the activities of those two large centres of population. He knows that a road between Sudbury and Timmins would open up a great mining area, and the federal government can help by implementing the public works program. I mentioned also last year that certain hazards in northern Ontario should be done away with. I have in mind more particularly what has happened in the minister's home town and in my own home town, where we had disastrous forest fires which in a few hours destroyed the results of years of labour. Most of the towns in northern Ontario are located in the virgin forest, and only a couple of years ago the city of Timmins had another scare; for a number of days smoke fogs hung over that town and the people expected daily that the fire would sweep through. Forest fires are always dangerous. I maintain that the government should find it possible to clear away all the inflammable material from around those towns for a distance of at least three-quarters of a mile in each direction. I know the minister is in sympathy with such a policy, and if it were put in force hundreds of young people would find employment.

May I again express the hope that this summer the government will find it possible to allow our settlers to spend most of their time on their holdings, and to receive some compensation almost equal if not equal to what they would receive if they worked on the colonization roads. Then I come again to the back to the land movement which I mentioned a moment ago. I believe my riding is one section of the country in which that policy has been carried out to the greatest extent. Hundreds of families have been placed on the land there, and I may say that in most cases the venture has been a success. The fact remains, however, that last summer we had some very fine people brought from the industrial centres and placed on new farms miles from any road. Surely that should not be tolerated; surely it is within the power of the government to see that no families should be placed on new farms to which they have to pack on their backs provisions for themselves and their cattle. I believe the government should inaugurate a national program of colonization roads, not only for my section of the country but for the whole dominion. It is not my intention to speak at greater length, but I must repeat that under this resolution the people of Canada cannot find satisfaction for the hopes that were entertained at the beginning of the session. Some of the ministers in the Ontario legislature and of the federal government led the people to believe that a program would be inaugurated different from the one which after three years of application has been found wanting and has not proved a solution of our problems. Having given the problem of unemployment a very thorough study I believe that instead of improving conditions the present policy is aggravating them. Further than that, I know of hundreds of young people in my section of the country who are ready and willing to work on the farms. Some of them are college graduates, and they would be willing to go back to the new land if an opportunity were given to them. But that opportunity has not been offered.

Although I have many clippings before me from newspapers in my section of the country I shall read only a few comments from the Porcupine Advance, a newspaper published weekly and well known to the Minister of Labour. This newspaper may be termed a Conservative-Independent publication, and has always fought the battles of the north country with fair-mindedness. Part of an article written last autumn is as follows:

> From the earliest signs of the depression The Advance has maintained that only through the providing of employment could any true help be expected. In this young country of Canada there is so much work necessary for the development of the country that it seems absurd to refuse the opportunity for having some of the needs supplied in the way of public enterprises of various kinds. This was the solution promised by Hon. R. B. Bennett's government. It was the plan adopted first by that government and there is every reason to feel that it worked out with reasonable success.

[Mr. Bradette.]

I was not satisfied when two years ago the government found it advisable to abandon the policy of public works and to adopt one of direct relief. To-day I am not satisfied in my own mind as to why that action was taken. Some people have said that the cost of the work then done proved to be prohibitive. That is easily understandable when we remember that the work done in the winters of 1930 and 1931 was done in frozen ground. I am speaking of the construction of roads, ditches and other similar works. Surely if that policy had been followed during the summer months the cost would not have been prohibitive, and to-day the government should not be groping to find its way out of the trouble with which it is now faced.

In the name of the settlers and labourers in my section of the country, and in all sincerity I make the assertion that the people do not want the dole, but that they do want a chance to work. I am an ordinary layman, so far as financial matters are concerned, but undoubtedly if the American congress had seen fit to adopt the St. Lawrence waterways project this government would have found it possible to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on a national undertaking. Where would the government have found that money? I presume that the project would have cost the Canadian people at least half a billion dollars, and that money would have had to come from somewhere. But to-day the government does not find it possible to have a national program of public works whereby our people would find the employment they deserve and wish to have. If the money could have been found for proceeding with the St. Lawrence waterway scheme it should be just as possible for the government to inaugurate a policy of public works. Further than that, if to-morrow, in another war, Canada were called upon to defend her good name and ideals, even in European countries, money would be found; there is no doubt about that. Money was found, to the extent of $60,000,000, to back the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Surely in this year of grace 1934, after the government has been experimenting for the last four years on policies which even their own friends and supporters have judged to be a complete failure, the minister should have something to offer better than he is offering at the present time. Some spokesmen of the federal government and some ministers in the Ontario legislature created the impression throughout Canada that the policy of direct relief would be abolished and one of national public works would be inaugurated. In that way good times would be experienced again because of the fact that the working population would find it possible to engage in remunerative work and add to the prosperity which in Canada is so badly needed, and will greatly accelerate the quick return of normal times.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should not like to do anything which would interfere with the giving of relief, but may I say that this matter is brought before us now almost as an emergency measure. We have been in session for about two months, and one might have thought that with as great a problem as that of unemployment before us we would before now have had some concrete proposal brought down by the government.

As was suggested a few moments ago by the right hon. leader of the opposition, apparently up to date the government has no policy and is simply giving some relief when such action is forced upon it by the necessities of the provinces. I note that the measure we are now discussing is to be similar in terms to the Relief Act of 1933 and, as I have done before, I should like to protest that that measure of relief is wholly inadequate to meet the situation. May I be permitted to bring to the attention of the minister and hon. members the report of the committee on unemployment which was recently adopted by the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion. I think this was excellently put and summarizes well the objections to the present policy of Canada, if we may call it such, with regard to unemployment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Lack of policy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, policy or, as the right hon. gentleman has said, lack of policy of the government. I read from the report:

> The general tenor of the resolutions and statements before your committee clearly indicates that the members of the Canadian Legion regard the tragic consequences of unemployment as a menace to the stability of our national life. It is equally clear that they are determined to challenge any further delay in the utilization of the national resources and credit to the fullest degree, in order to remove the peril of wide-spread poverty throughout the dominion.
> It is considered that general attention should be directed to the following salient features of conditions resulting from prolonged unemployment and inadequate relief measures:—
> (a) Decreasing relief benefits with increasing living costs resulting in more general malnutrition and ill-health in the homes of the unemployed, with consequent danger of epidemics.
> (b) Dangerous depletion without replacement of household equipment and supplies, as well as clothing, causing unsanitary conditions and inability to exercise the ordinary precautions against physical disorders and infections.
> (c) The disastrous effects of prevailing conditions on the younger generation in the undermining of morale and physical stamina.
> (d) Insecurity of tenure of homes.
> (e) The lack of measures offering any hope for the reabsorption of the unemployed into industry, the segregation and branding of those compelled to accept relief as a class apart and outcast, and the perpetuation of conditions likely to create a permanent and dependent pauper class deprived of normal economic privileges and rights.
> (f) The general indifference and ignorance shown toward the danger of submitting a large section of the population to conditions of which the foregoing are indisputable features.
> (g) The tendency of some employers to exploit the circumstances of the unemployed in offering inadequate wages for temporary employment.
> (h) The increasing determination of the unemployed to defend their homes by any available means against the social injustice of enforcing degrading and perilous poverty upon them in the midst of plenty.

It is quite obvious that one might easily spend considerable time in expounding and illustrating each of these paragraphs.

These paragraphs are in clear and concise English and I intend to let them stand just as they are. I quote:

> Your committee is of the opinion that the gravity of the situation is such as to demand immediate and drastic measures of a temporary nature that the cumulative effects of prolonged unemployment may not further menace the well-being of the entire community.
> It is, therefore, recommended that this dominion convention of the Canadian legion urge upon the federal and provincial governments early ameliorative action with respect to the general problem of unemployment and relief, as indicated hereunder:
> (a) The promotion of a program of necessary public works maintenance and development, of sufficient extent and character as to absorb all able-bodied unemployed persons at a scale of wages that will ensure decent living conditions;
> (b) Pending promotion of a public works program an immediate increase in the scale of relief, commensurate with increased living costs, and with uniform application in all cities, towns, and municipalities;
> (c) Free medical, surgical, dental, and optical treatment for all recipients of unemployment relief and their families;
> (d) That in the operation of work camps regarded as essential in connection with public works projects, a minimum wage of $1.10 per day be paid in addition to provision of food, shelter, and clothing;
> (e) That more adequate and special provision be made for the protection of unemployed single women;

(f) That the provincial commands be requested to urge upon their respective provincial governments the necessity of protection for all unemployed persons against evictions and loss of their homes through foreclosure or tax sales.

Had these recommendations been made by a body other than the legion it is quite possible that those advancing them would have been called agitators, bolshevists or impossible dreamers. In my humble opinion they represent a sane and safe program which ought to be taken into serious consideration by this government. I quote:

Your committee recommends that the dominion executive council be instructed to urge upon the federal government the appointment of an economic advisory council, including economists, statisticians and engineers of unquestioned integrity and ability. It is further proposed that such council shall function in an advisory capacity to the government, with the main object of correlating all available data and preparing, as may be warranted by the facts, an outline of a planned economy under which,—

(a) Industry may effectively reabsorb human labour displaced by technological advancement.

(b) A national financial policy may be so determined as to properly relate distribution to production and enable such adjustment of the monetary system as will give paramount consideration to the economic needs of all the people.

Your committee further recommends that the convention endorse the following proposals in principle, and urge that same be brought under advisement by the federal and provincial governments and all industrial interests, as well as the proposed economic advisory council.

(a) That in order to spread available employment in industry, legislation be enacted to shorten hours of labour without reduction of properly established wage schedules, and that an immediate step be taken in this direction by the federal and provincial governments as applicable to all public works and publicly owned transportation systems.

(b) That piece work and overtime be controlled by government regulation so as to ensure maximum employment.

(c) That the educational age limit be raised, with adequate and free facilities for vocational training of the youth.

(d) That a general policy be instituted as regards old age pensions, superannuation, industrial pensions, et cetera, as may influence the general retirement of workers at the age of 55 years.

(e) That a rigid enforcement be given the application of minimum wage legislation.

(f) That sweat-shop conditions be abolished.

It is recommended,

That the federal government be urged to enact legislation during the present session establishing a national scheme of unemployment insurance.

I heartily endorse the report as adopted and commend it to the very careful consideration of the minister and the house.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Woodsworth) has drawn attention to the fact that the resolution states that the bill to be based upon it will be similar to the legislation of last year. I should like to ask the minister if it is the intention to include in the new legislation a clause to give the government authority to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government. This was an emergency clause which appeared in the legislation of 1931 and again in 1933. I should imagine that by this time it should be possible to drop this clause, otherwise what is termed emergency legislation will become the general practice.

Mr. GORDON: The bill will invest the government with authority to take such measures as are deemed necessary for peace, order and good government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to protest very strongly against this power being given to the administration for another year. Originally it was introduced to deal with an emergency situation, that was three years ago. To-day we are not talking of emergency legislation but rather of continuing legislation. The minister's declaration simply means that the government is usurping entirely the functions of the House of Commons. I feel the more strongly with regard to the inclusion of such a provision this year, in view of the statement made only a night or two ago by the Prime Minister. I imagine the country will also resent such a step. The Prime Minister stated that the government had made a $60,000,000 guarantee to the banks in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and that this had been done under the provisions of this act which vests authority in the governor in council to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government. The Prime Minister stated that he intended to make use of powers thus delegated. In view of that statement, this house should consider more carefully than it has ever done in the past whether such powers should again be delegated to the government. This measure purports to be one for the relief of unemployment but in reality it is a measure for the granting of aid to large industries by enactments under peace, order and good government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was not done under that clause.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is under that authority.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 2 (a) gives the power to make grants to corporations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Subsection 2 (a) of what?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of the act. That action was not taken under the peace, order and good government section; it is an express power given by the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the same power that is now being asked for.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The subsection reads:

(a) Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon,—enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise; loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking;

The peace, order and good government section is number 2-b.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The order in council may have been passed under a different subsection of the act, but it was passed by authority of the same act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit respectfully that the time has come when this house should be more careful than it has been up to the present in considering bills such as this which permit vast expenditures and vast guarantees. If that clause remains in the bill hon. gentlemen opposite may expect considerable discussion on the wisdom of its retention.

In the act of last year the amount for unemployment relief was fixed at a definite sum. Is there to be a similar restriction of the amount in the present act? If so, what is the figure?

Mr. GORDON: That question was given a good deal of thought. Up until the 10th of March there had been paid, on account of direct relief, in round figures, $13,000,000; that is, we had actually disbursed that amount. Unquestionably there will come in, after the 31st day of March, accounts which were incurred under the authority of this legislation. The exact amount of course it is difficult to determine, but there will be no limitation in this legislation because I believe that, with the new agreements that will be entered into, it would not be efficacious to stipulate a limit in the act. We might be met with an overplus, as we may be this year, a small amount, for which the bill will make provision. But I believe that under the agreements which we shall make with such provinces as cannot get on this year the amount given for direct relief will be very substantially reduced. I believe so, from what information I am able to gather regarding conditions in many of the industrial centres throughout Canada.

With respect to the other observation of the right hon. gentleman, the new legislation proposes to exclude the authority which was contained in last year's measure, appearing in section 2 (a), wherein the governor in council was invested with authority to loan or advance money or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking. So that if there is sound criticism that can be offered against the course the government takes with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other public body, the provision investing the government with authority to give such guarantees, loans or advances does not appear in the proposed bill, the reason being that, in the judgment of the government, this year will not see the necessity arise for executive action in assisting public corporations like the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am pleased to hear the minister give that assurance to the committee, but may I point out to him that all that he has said is another reason why subsection (b) of section 2 should be excluded also—subsection (b) of section 2, or rather the similar section in the bill to be introduced—that is, the one which gives tc the governor in council power when parliament is not in session to pass orders for the maintenance of peace, order and good government. Let me read the concluding words of that section:

—and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I am wondering whether, notwithstanding that it is proposed to delete the words to which the minister has referred, it will not still be possible for the government to do exactly the same thing under this general power. The minister excludes a specific power but retains the general power, and I hope that he will appreciate where his own argument leads him, and that before the measure is introduced he will give further consideration to the deletion altogether of that wide power, which I do not think should have been given at any time but certainly, in view of what the minister has just said, should no longer be continued.

I should like to discuss one other matter in this connection. The government has recently tabled an order in council dated March 12, 1934, which was passed with a view to instructing the auditor general to begin to audit the accounts of the municipalities and provinces with respect to unemployment relief. The minister will probably remember that at the special session of 1930, speaking on behalf of the opposition, I urged very strongly that the auditor general should be authorized and directed to audit all the accounts that had to do with the expenditure of public moneys for purposes of relief, in so far as they were voted by this parliament. We were told by the Prime Minister at that time that it would be an insult to the provinces to ask the auditor general to do any such thing. I believe he used that word or some word as strong as that; at any rate he used language the equivalent of it. This money we were told was being given to the provinces and they should be permitted to spend it as they thought best. After there has been no end of waste of relief moneys, as the minister well knows, after the sessions of 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, we come to the session of 1934, and find that the government has now instructed the auditor general to audit these accounts—to do something which at the present time it is impossible to do. Had such instructions been given at the beginning, had there been inserted in the contracts conditions which would have given the auditor general and his officers power to follow the various commitments and expenditures as they were being made, there might have been something in the nature of an audit. Let me read two clauses from the order in council:

> And whereas the audits and investigations which have been made and reported upon by the auditor general, in pursuance of the directions hereinbefore recited, have disclosed the necessity for a more extended audit of the accounts relating to relief expenditures if the interests of the dominion treasury are to be adequately safeguarded; . . . Now therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, is pleased in the exercise of the powers so conferred by the Relief Act, 1933, to order and doth hereby order and direct the auditor general to conduct such audit of provincial and municipal accounts in connection with unemployment relief expenditures as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury.

There are two questions which I desire to put to the minister in this regard. First of all, this order makes reference to reports that have been made by the auditor general showing the necessity for a more careful and complete audit of the moneys spent on unemployment relief. Will the minister be able to give us these reports? No doubt he has them, because they must be made to him or to the Minister of Finance or to the Prime Minister. I submit that the committee ought to have the reports before it is called upon to approve of the renewal of a similar measure.

In the second place, will the minister tell us how the auditor general will find it possible at this time, the year of 1934, to conduct an audit of provincial and municipal accounts, in connection with unemployment relief expenditures, in such a way as will be sufficient to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury? The moneys have gone to all provincial governments and to municipalities from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is hardly a community in Canada in which some of it has not been spent. And now, with a view to having it appear that the government is seeking to audit relief moneys, it instructs the auditor general to do something which anyone reading the instructions will find to be a wholly impossible task, even if the auditor had an army as staff. I should like the minister to tell us just how the government expects the auditor general to be able to audit these expenditures in a way that will protect the dominion treasury, and particularly how he will audit accounts of provinces and municipalities, seeing that there was no condition put in the contracts in advance giving him this right. In view of that, how will he audit the accounts of the municipalities and provinces?

Mr. GORDON: With respect to the first question, the auditor general has from time to time made the reports which have been referred to and they will be made available to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend have them laid on the table at his earliest convenience?

Mr. GORDON: I can have that done. With respect to the general observations made by the right hon. gentleman, the auditor general has been making test audits, I believe, since the expenditure started under the various relief measures, and it was as a result of the test audits he made that something over a year or a year and a half ago the first order in council—I do not have it before me—was passed. At any rate, one was passed as a result of conferences or at least one conference I had with the auditor general. Probably it was as a result of an interview and conference the auditor general had with the director of unemployment relief, the auditor general was asked to audit the provincial accounts and he has made audits of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What provinces?

Mr. GORDON: I believe he made audits of the accounts of all the provinces with the possible exception of Prince Edward Island, but whatever audits he has made, I shall have the reports tabled. In the course of the auditing of the provincial accounts it appeared that there may have been a laxity in connection with certain municipalities. Of course the Department of Labour has no audit system set up and as a result of the investigations made by the auditor general it was deemed desirable that he be instructed to carry out the audit as set out in the order in council to which reference has been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that I am surprised at the statement the minister makes, if he says that the auditor general has audited the provincial accounts. Has he gone to each province and audited all the accounts that have to do with unemployment relief?

Mr. GORDON: I believe he has gone into all the provinces and audited the unemployment relief accounts in all of them. That is the provincial accounts.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Surely the minister is mistaken. I think the auditor general has been instructed to audit, so far as the provinces are concerned, only that portion of the accounts that has been paid to the provinces by the federal government, and not the money paid by the provinces as their share or by the municipalities as theirs.

Mr. GORDON: Just with respect to federal moneys.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All the auditing the auditor general has done is to the extent of discovering whether cheques that have gone from the federal treasury have reached the provinces, but he has not followed the expenditure of the money, notwithstanding it is federal money that is in part involved. That is the point. When the minister says that the auditor general has audited the provincial accounts, he creates an entirely erroneous impression in the minds of those who hear him. All the auditor general has done, according to what the minister now says, is to see that federal moneys have been paid over to the provinces in accordance with the terms of the agreements that were entered into with those provinces, but he has not followed the payment of those moneys by the provinces to the municipalities or by the municipalities to the persons to whom the money has been paid. That is the only audit that would amount to anything in revealing what was or was not wasted. Does the minister believe it possible for the auditor general and his department to audit now moneys that have been derived from the federal treasury with respect to the uses to which they have been put and to whom and how the expenditures were made?

Mr. GORDON: I can see no insuperable difficulty. The agreements with the provinces under which the advances by the dominion were made are clear. While certainly it will be quite a task, I do not think there is any reason to believe the auditor general cannot see to it that the moneys have been disbursed in accordance with the agreements entered into and the regulations made thereunder.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What were the terms of the agreements respecting audit? Can the minister give us that information?

Mr. GORDON: I am looking now at the agreement with Quebec for 1933, and the only reference made to accounts appears in section 10 which reads:

> Statements of accounts for expenditures made by the province and municipalities pursuant to the provisions of this agreement shall be submitted by the province to the Dominion Commissioner of Unemployment Relief, accompanied by a certificate of the appropriate provincial authority that expenditures have been duly made in accordance with such statements; and such statements and certificates shall be in the form prescribed by the Dominion Commissioner of Unemployment Relief.

That is the only reference in the agreement, and I believe that same form of paragraph was incorporated in the agreements with the other provinces. But while in the paragraph itself no mention is made of the auditor general, I do not think that precludes the Dominion government from instructing him to audit the accounts of the provinces or of the municipalities. I cannot conceive that by reason of the agreement not in terms stating that the auditor general must make an audit in such a way, he is divested entirely of any right to go ahead even without instructions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is apparent that so far the auditor general has done nothing beyond what I indicated, namely making sure that the moneys were paid over to the provinces. So far as the expenditure of those moneys is concerned the Dominion Commissioner of Unemployment Relief is really acting as auditor of them, and that only to the extent of accepting certificates from the provinces themselves, if we are to judge from what the minister has just read.

Mr. GORDON: No, it will be disclosed that the auditor general has been making what he calls test audits—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a different matter from a general audit.

Mr. GORDON: —and he has audited, I believe, all the provincial accounts with the exception of possibly those of Prince Edward Island. As to the extent of his audit in each case, I am not prepared to give much information because I am not an auditor, but his reports will be laid upon the table for examination by those members of the committee who are probably more familiar with audits than I am.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will leave that until we get the reports. Let me draw the minister's attention to the fact that a test audit might relate to an expenditure of a few thousand dollars at the most, whereas a total audit of what has been paid out or guaranteed under these measures would cover over $100,000,000.

The minister intimated that the amount required for unemployment relief might be less next year than it was last year, and he went on to say that for that reason the government was not going to ask for a specific amount. In other words the government intends to revert to the old practice of asking for a blank cheque. It seems to me that is going again entirely in the wrong direction. We succeeded at the last session in getting the minister at least to provide a specific amount, but he alleges now that because he expects that less will be wanted he is going to ask that the government shall be given a blank cheque for unemployment relief. That is something which will be very strongly objected to, and I suggest that the minister consider the matter carefully before asking parliament to adopt again any such procedure. What this measure amounts to, as described thus far by the minister, is that the government shall again be provided with authority in the nature of a blank cheque for the expenditure of public money and blanket authority to legislate as it pleases with respect to anything it may wish to classify under the heading of peace, order and good government. In the fifth session of this parliament and at a time when the country is expecting a general election in the near future, I think these are powers that should not be granted to the administration under any consideration.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister be prepared, either now or after eight o'clock, to make a statement on the subject of unemployment insurance? He made a statement a year ago when we were discussing a similar measure. I think the committee would like to have a statement as to what has taken place since then, what the situation is now, and what we may reasonably expect in the future.

Mr. GORDON: When the estimates of the Labour department were before the committee some days ago a question was asked as to the policy of the government with respect to unemployment insurance. At that time, I made an answer to the question, and I can make no further answer to-day.

Mr. NEILL: As far as I remember the answer was an evasion of the most patent character. In fact I think it was a suggestion that the question was out of order. I am sorry if that is the best the minister can do after a year's interval and after the very definite statement of the Prime Minister three years ago that before his term of office expired the government would "crystallize into legislation" the information that they intended to procure, and which later statements indicated that they had procured. The minister's statement now will not be at all satisfactory to the people who were led to believe that some action was to be expected in the near future. If that is the best we can get I suppose we will have to be silent, or at least let it stand.

Then in connection with the powers contained in this proposed measure would the minister state whether in dealing with peace, order and good government such powers would in his opinion be sufficient to enable the government to alter or amend or modify any terms of, for instance, the Dominion Elections Act? That is a very important consideration in view of the possibility, if nothing stronger, of an election this year. It is highly desirable that the house know whether the powers could be so used. Whether they could be so used or not, I hope the minister will be able to assure the house that they will not be. It may be that there are reasons why the government should be given these large powers, but I cannot think of any possible circumstances which would justify the exercise of them in connection with the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think that elections or the elections act have much to do with peace and order, though they may have something to do with good government. I assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that this power would not be sufficiently comprehensive to enable the government to interfere with the Dominion Elections Act. If it were, I think I can speak on behalf of the government and assure the hon. member that the government will not use any such power to change the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. REID: There are one or two matters that I would like to draw to the minister's attention, and some suggestions I would like to make to him arising out of this relief measure. I want to speak particularly of the extra burden being carried by the province of British Columbia in connection with transients. Would the minister tell me if I am correct in understanding that the registration of these transients was stopped on September 30, 1932, with the result that all transients coming into the province after that date became a charge on the cities and municipalities? Many of these transients are being cared for by welfare organizations, particularly in the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster; the information given to me is that there are at the present time some 10,000 new transient arrivals in that province since the regulation went into force. The province found on going into the figures that against that there are in other provinces some 2,000 transients belonging to British Columbia, which leaves 8,000 on relief in that province who are not and should not be a direct charge on either the municipalities or the province. That is something of which I think the dominion government should take note. The government cannot very well take the attitude that it is not their responsibility but that of the province. The provinces cannot bear the expense resulting from the influx of transients, neither can they stop people from coming in.

The latest figures on relief, those of January 19, show some 97,100 persons on relief in the province. Out of that number there are 10,000 transients. In the city of Vancouver alone there are over 720 transient families; in Burnaby, 157, in New Westminster, 45. All told there are 1,058 transient families in the lower mainland of British Columbia alone. This is too great a load for these cities and municipalities to carry, and I think the Dominion government might well assume the whole of this obligation.

But the more one goes into the question of relief and its administration the more one realizes the wisdom of the suggestion made from this side of the house that a commission should handle or supervise the whole matter throughout the dominion. I cite one case which is a striking illustration of the cause of trouble and dissatisfaction in this country. People are prone to judge by comparisons. I was asked to attend a legion meeting in Langley prior to coming to Ottawa, and one matter under discussion at that meeting was the case of a German and his family who, coming from Germany, had been in the country five years and one month and who were receiving $30 or $31 per month of relief. Living near him were returned men who were receiving only $10 and $11 a month. The feelings of those returned men can be well imagined when this German showed them the cheque received from the government for $30 or $31, when all they got was $10 and $11 a month. Perhaps the minister will say: That is not our doing; it is up to the municipality and the province. But the minister knows quite well that British Columbia is totally unable to carry a much heavier load than it is carrying. Many of the municipalities have their backs to the wall; in fact three have been in the hands of the receivers for the last two years. The municipality of which I speak, in which this case occurred, has been carrying an extremely heavy load and finds it difficult to provide even $10 or $11 per month for those who are destitute. That is just one of those things which, in these days, bring about unrest and foment a great deal of trouble, and I can tell the minister that the feeling was very high in that returned men's organization in connection with the treatment given this transient who had been in the country just long enough to be beyond deportation and who received this sum of money. I do not altogether object to his receiving help, but I think the case should bring before the committee the necessity for some more equitable system under which there would be an even scale of wages provided.

Now I am going to make a few remarks, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the question of the dole and work. I was one of those who advocated that work should be performed by those receiving assistance, and I think it was a mistake when that policy was changed to allow the provinces and municipalities to do as they wished in the matter. Some municipalities require work in return for the little they give, while other municipalities provide the relief and do not ask that work be done. That is not conducive to peace, order and good government; it brings about a good deal of trouble. Before the Department of National Defence took over some of the camps we had the spectacle of men, who were clothed and fed but who were not required to work, walking down the street and talking to men who were working, almost intimidating them, sneering at them and telling them to throw down their tools. Cases like these make me feel that the suggestion that some commission should handle relief should have been acted upon, so that a more equitable method could have been inaugurated in this country and some uniform scale worked out. Then useful work could be done and no municipality would be allowed to give relief unless work was done.

I should like to make a plea to the minister in connection with the youth of this land. He may very well say that it is up to the provinces to take care of the young people, but the youth of the land present quite a serious problem. I am going to make one suggestion that I think might well be adopted by this country. I only point to what is taking place across the line, where many of the youths are being employed in the reforestation of burned-over areas. I think there is plenty of work of that kind in Canada that could be done to advantage, and in the days to come the country would reap the benefit of that work. We have the land, we have the seed plants and we have the youths who to-day are gathering in the cities debating and wondering what the future holds for them and what parliament is going to do for them. Thousands of these youths of eighteen to thirty are destitute; they have no outlook upon life at all, and have almost lost hope.

There is another matter to which I think the attention of the minister should be directed; I refer to the question of single men who live with their parents. I attended a meeting in New Westminster last year which was also attended by representatives of the Fraser valley men as well as by an official of the department in Ottawa. The question of single men occupied the attention of that meeting for about three hours, and it seemed that no one could really say what were the regulations with regard to single men who lived at home. I want to cite one case which I think illustrates the lack of common sense in dealing with this problem. Municipalities which demand work in return for relief also demand that the work be done by the head of the family only. I have in mind the case of a man seventy years of age who has three sons at home, ranging from twenty-one to twenty-eight years of age. These sons are unemployed and are being kept by the relief secured by their father who was compelled to work. Surely something should be done in such a case. It is only a matter of common sense; it does not require a great deal of expert knowledge to straighten out many of these matters. Many parents in British Columbia are forced by the regulations to put out their children; as they are unable to keep them. Many people had three or four single boys at home for whom no relief was provided under the regulations, because presumably their father had a home. When their parents turned them out into the street, however, they were then cared for by the Dominion government.

I think the minister should take note of these things, because it is not right for him to say that this is a matter entirely for the provinces and the municipalities. I think I am right when I say that the regulations were drawn up by the Dominion government, and the provinces that came here to ask for relief had little choice in the matter. They were not in a position to dictate as to the regulations or as to the amount of relief which could be given. They were almost in the position of beggars, so to speak, coming to the Dominion government for help, and my information is that the regulations were drawn up by the Dominion government. So I think it is only my duty to bring these matters to the attention of the minister. I think many of these cases could and should be straightened out, and these regulations lend themselves to fomenting trouble and unrest among our people. When I sit down I should like the minister to tell me how many provinces have been asked to return the funds that have been misspent or misappropriated, and I should like to know the amounts as well. Perhaps the minister would also tell me if his department has any men in the labour camps other than those conducted by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. GORDON: In answer to the last question, in addition to the National Defence camps the government has camps in the national parks of Canada under the Department of the Interior. With respect to the second question, I will obtain a memorandum with regard to the refunds made by the provinces of moneys that were spent and that did not come within the regulations.

With regard to the other observations made by my hon. friend it must be remembered that the question of single, homeless men arose in the western provinces some two and a half years ago, when people were riding the rods and giving a great deal of trouble to local municipalities. Representations were made by the western provinces, including British Columbia, that they could not take care of these single homeless men, and as a result the burden of caring for them, to the extent that they were eligible to enter the federal camps, was taken over by the Dominion government. It is so easy for a province to say, "We will shift our burden to the dominion if we can; we cannot carry it." But the provinces have their responsibilities; under our constitution they have certain rights reserved to them, and certain rights invested in them. That very fact alone gives rise to corresponding responsibilities. I think that perhaps after the last dominion-provincial conference there will be a better understanding of the relationships between the dominion and the provinces with respect to the capacity of each in connection with the revenues and sources of revenues to which each could resort. I believe there is a better understanding as to the efforts which each could put forth in the discharge of the responsibilities resting upon it. I shall make only this observation, namely that if we had a different type of constitution this matter would become immeasurably less complex. But, mention that fact to a premier of a province and one does not get very far. The time may come however when the provinces will have to understand that if they seek to render clear their own position under the constitution they must be more astute in seeing that the corresponding responsibilities upon the provinces are assumed by them.

Mr. REID: So that I may have a true picture of the situation, do I understand the minister to say that all the single homeless men are taken care of by the dominion? I should like to have an answer to that, because the information I have is that since the regulations were made 10,000 transients who are not eligible for registration have come into British Columbia, and have become a charge on the cities of that province.

Mr. GORDON: I said that the dominion assumes one hundred per cent of the cost of maintenance of single homeless men who are certified by the Department of National Defence as being eligible to go into the National Defence camps to obtain work. Unquestionably there are those who are unable to work, and then there are others who will not work—do not forget that there is such a class of persons in this country. Then there is another class who will work only at jobs they like and under conditions they themselves lay down. But one hundred per cent maintenance is provided by the Dominion government for those men who are certified as eligible to work in the National Defence camps.

Mr. REID: I shall have to accept the minister's statement, but may I explain that I attended a government unemployment relief office the week I left British Columbia, and the information given me, and which I have before me, was that the men in the camps were one hundred per cent the charge of the government, but that there are great numbers for whom no provision has yet been made, owing to the fact that the camps are filled, and that in connection with them only fifty per cent is chargeable to the Dominion government. That was the information given to me by the provincial relief office.

Mr. GORDON: With respect to those others who for one reason or another are not certified as eligible to go into the camps, the federal government carries fifty per cent of the load.

Sir EUGENE FISET: As explained only a few days ago by the Minister of National Defence is it not a fact that these concentration camps have a limited establishment, and practically speaking they take care of only those people who apply for entrance to them? Let us for instance consider the province of Quebec; in that province there is only one concentration camp, and it is located at Valcartier. From Valcartier to the Gaspe peninsula is a distance of nearly 360 miles, and I need not tell the minister that it is practically impossible for anyone applying to enter those camps either from Gaspe or the county of Rimouski to be accepted as eligible and to be admitted. That is the reason why last year the board of trade of the city of Rimouski asked the Department of National Defence to establish a second concentration camp at the aviation field in Rimouski. Unfortunately the matter is still under consideration, and for that reason I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that between Valcartier and the Gaspe peninsula there is no such concentration camp. The consequence is that not only are those people unable to take care of the single men, but in order to place anyone in the camp we have to make application which sometimes does not reach headquarters for three weeks. May I assure the minister that the system adopted has not operated successfully.

Mr. GORDON: It was only in the provinces of western Canada that the position with respect to single homeless men became acute. When the Dominion government assumed responsibility in western Canada, Ontario, the province of Quebec and the maritimes made representations with respect to a similar class of single homeless men within their borders. Provision was made to take care of those men in the eastern provinces, in so far as it was within the power of the organization of the Department of National Defence so to do. Wherever in their judgment work of a useful character could be done, camps were established. At the moment I cannot give the names of the places where camps have been formed but I believe that information was spread on the record only a few days ago by the Minister of National Defence.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Maloney): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is it the intention of the government to launch its building program under this bill, or will separate legislation be brought down for that purpose?

Mr. GORDON: I would prefer to wait until the Prime Minister is in the chamber before answering that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at the beginning of the session whether it was the intention of the government to introduce its building program in the form of estimates similar to public works estimates. He assured me that estimates would be brought down in a similar manner, and I hope that that decision is to be adhered to.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Just before recess, and in answer to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), the minister read a schedule of works which had been approved of for Quebec. I gathered from the remarks of the minister that it was the intention to abandon this system of relief in so far as certain provinces were concerned. I should like to know if the government intends to go on with the system of tripartite agreements between the municipal, provincial and federal authorities. I should like to know also if works already approved by order in council but not yet started are to be proceeded with. The minister will recall that last summer I communicated with him in connection with the construction of a bridge at Trois Pistoles in the county of Rimouski. The minister replied that only one work was being approved for that county, and that was at St. Fabien. The minister apparently forgot that last year there was an amalgamation of counties under which the town of Trois Pistoles was transferred to the county of Rimouski. I think he will find the schedules show that this bridge has been approved but appears as in the county of Temiscouata. I am afraid I neglected to mention that this town had been transferred to that county, so the fault is just as much mine as his. I took the trouble to inquire of the provincial authorities whether an application had been made for this bridge, and they told me that it had been not only recommended but approved by federal order in council. Because of the winter starting so early last year this bridge was not commenced; the construction would have been too expensive. I should like to know if in order to have this work proceeded with during the coming summer the town will have to make a new application to the provincial government, or will the order in council already passed be sufficient authority to proceed with the work?

Mr. GORDON: The present legislation expires on March 31, as do the agreements made under it. The bill which will be founded upon this resolution will contain a clause to provide for payment after March 31, 1935, for any works submitted by a province and approved by the dominion which have been commenced but which, if discontinued, would result in the loss of the work already done. As I recall, the application for the bridge to which the hon. member refers was submitted last fall by the province of Quebec, and that submission was approved by the dominion. Unfortunately the provincial authorities decided that the work could not go on during the winter, and just how the people in that locality have survived without that work going on—

Sir EUGENE FISET: Public charity.

Mr. GORDON: —is something of which I have no knowledge. My opinion is that it would not be within the powers of the dominion to subscribe to a work which was approved under an agreement and a statute which expire at the end of this fiscal year. If the province of Quebec or any other province maintains that help is needed for their indigent people which they cannot provide, this would have to be the subject matter of a new agreement. I trust that if such an occasion arises there will be no undue delay in determining the provisions of such an agreement.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I take it that if a petition is launched by the town of Trois Pistoles and the application is recommended by the province of Quebec, as authority has already been given for this construction the minister will give the application his kind consideration.

Mr. GORDON: I will be kindness itself. All of these matters will have to be the subject matter of an agreement to be entered into with the province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The resolution states that the bill is to be similar to the one passed in 1933, but it goes on to say that it also makes provision for payment of the federal proportion of delayed relief accounts, if any, which may be received subsequent to the date of the expiration of the act. Is anything more implied in these words than is to be found in the last section of the act as it now stands, which provides that on the expiration of the act:

—any obligation or liability incurred or created under the authority of this act prior to the 31st day of March, 1934—

It would be the thirty-first day of March, 1935, in the new bill.

—may be paid and discharged out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund notwithstanding the expiration of this act on the said date.

Is anything more implied in the words that appear in the resolution than appears in the act itself?

Mr. GORDON: The act which will expire on March 31 had a provision limiting to the sum of $20,000,000 the amount which the federal government could contribute to direct relief. That of course was merely an estimate made by the officers of the department after a review of the whole dominion picture as they saw it. The situation at present is that up to March 10 the dominion, under the various provincial agreements, has been called upon to pay some $13,000,000 odd towards direct relief. The winter has been a very severe one and it may be that in view of the fact that the accounts are always delayed, sometimes two, three and four months, and in the case of Montreal many months, the $20,000,000 provided for in the legislation will not be sufficient. I cannot say whether it will or will not be, but the bill which it is now proposed to introduce will take care of the possibility of that $20,000,000 being exceeded by accounts which will come in after March 31. The present bill also goes a little further than last year's measure when it makes provision for payments out of the dominion proportion under the agreement with the provinces in order that building works and other undertakings of that kind which have been started and for some reason or other have not been completed before expiry of the act may be carried out. Authority is sought to make provision for the dominion contribution in order that these works can be completed after March 31, 1935.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That, I think, is a provision which will have to be considered with a good deal of care, particularly in view of what the minister said this afternoon, that it is not the intention to limit the total amount of expenditure under the bill, but that the government will ask for a blank cheque to enable it to expend whatever it wishes under the provisions of the act. If the ministry seeks that power it will have to give the house pretty definite assurance that it will not be authorizing the expenditure, in 1934-35, of moneys that may run on to 1936, 1937, 1938 or 1939.

Mr. ROSS: Will the regulations under which this act will be enforced be the same as the regulations that were applied in 1933? I would remind the minister that certain municipalities ruled that small property owners with property assessed at five, six or seven hundred dollars could not get relief, while relief went to the tenants of large property owners, so that the large property owner was assured of his rent, whereas the small property owner had no relief and no assistance in the payment of taxation.

Mr. GORDON: That is another question that will have to be dealt with when we confer with the provinces, if this legislation passes. There are undoubtedly some property owners who are having some difficulty at this time, but it must be borne in mind that governments as well as individuals are having difficulties, and there is a limit beyond which the government cannot go in assisting various classes of individuals who find themselves in difficulty. I cannot be more definite with respect to the question asked, and can only say that when the conferences with the provinces take place, which will be immediately after this legislation is passed, all these matters will be taken into consideration.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does that include the question of single and married persons, or is it proposed to take care of single as well as married persons under the act?

Mr. GORDON: That also will be a matter of conference with the provinces as to what their difficulties are which they cannot take care of, and the extent if any to which this government should go towards contributing to the provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is proposed that this is to be again a tripartite agreement.

Mr. GORDON: That is, between the provinces and the municipalities and the federal government?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. GORDON: That will have to be a subject of conference with the provinces.

Mr. VENIOT: In 1932 or 1933 I called the attention of the minister to the housing act, under which the dominion government loaned the provinces so much money for the construction of homes for labouring men and others, the administration of which was placed under the provincial governments; and I pointed out then that if an arrangement could be made by which those people owning such houses, having had them built under the housing act, could be given an extension of time, it was desirable that this should be done, instead of having the period of depression counted in the twenty years stipulated. I pointed out that it was difficult for them under the circumstances to meet the conditions imposed by the housing act. The minister then said that he would take the matter up with the provinces, and that was done. In New Brunswick the matter was considered by the provincial government, but the terms under which they attempted to relieve the situation were such as could hardly be met. I think a two year period was given. The result has been that some of those people who had their houses built under the scheme, and were unable to meet the two year condition, had to lose all they had put into the property. When the provincial conference takes place, would it not be possible for the minister to discuss the whole situation with the provinces to see whether some better terms could not be adopted? The hardship is too great that workingmen and salaried men who have invested in properties valued at $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 under the scheme and had made all their payments prior to the time the depression started, should lose all they had put in. I know one or two cases in my own town where the hardship has been very serious. The people were unable to come in under the two year extension and the result is that they were virtually put on the street; they had to walk out of their houses. The town had to take those properties over, and it cannot sell them because there is no demand for them. It might rent them, but it would have to do so at a great deal less than it was getting under the housing scheme. The new system is causing a loss to the town, because it is responsible to the provincial government for collecting the money which is lent to the town at five per cent, and the result is a hardship to the town treasury. It would be desirable if an arrangement could be made between the federal and provincial governments whereby they would extend the term until the end of the depression, especially to people who had been making their payments prior to the start of the depression. This would not cost the federal government anything, but it would be doing much good and would be of great help to those people. I hope the minister will consider the point I have made and bring it up at the provincial conference when it takes place.

Mr. GORDON: If my recollection serves me correctly, the housing scheme came into being in 1919. The general plan was—and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) will correct me if my recollection is wrong—that the dominion lent money to the provinces, the latter in turn lending it to the municipalities for the purpose of erecting moderately priced houses on an amortization scheme covering a period of twenty years. That was taken advantage of by a number of cities and towns. My view is that if in any of the municipalities that took advantage of the housing scheme the people find themselves, after having made payments for a number of years, unable because of present conditions to continue doing so, this would be a very proper matter for discussion with the provinces concerned, I shall be glad to take a note of it.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister will remember that the province took the matter up at his request, but the terms are not ample; the two year period is too short.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the bill of which this resolution is the forerunner is it proposed that any particular program of federal works for the relief of unemployment shall emanate directly from the dominion itself, or is every action to be taken in conjunction with some agreed upon plan with the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: The bill to be founded upon this resolution does not contemplate federal works strictly so-called, as referred to by the hon. member. It has been said that the Prime Minister has made a declaration as to how federal work shall be carried on, and of course this may and probably will be the subject of a special act. Certainly it does not spring from this proposed legislation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I remember very distinctly that the statement was made in the newspapers—whether by the Prime Minister or by somebody else is another question—that a program of public works for the relief of unemployment was to be started by the Dominion government in the spring at a cost of something over $50,000,000. The figures and the details were given. Now it appears that this is not to be a purely dominion scheme but it is to be a tripartite or at the very least a two-party proposal. Can the minister give the committee any idea of the amount of money it is proposed to expend under this scheme? I ask him particularly because western newspapers mentioned a specific amount and actually had it divided into a certain allotment for each province. Is it to be $50,000,000 for the whole country, or how much is it going to be?

Mr. GORDON: I have no doubt if the newspapers carried a story that the sum of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 was to be expended in federal works, it would be immediately divided up in various ways by those who were to be benefited. There would be no hesitation or delay about that. That legislation is not now before the committee or the house. Undoubtedly there will be federal works projected, federal works that are essential.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Purely federal?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, quite outside and apart from any provision that is made in this legislation for taking care of needy people in various parts of Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then the scheme is to be a sort of two-fold one. It is proposed to continue the tripartite agreement of the past, and, in addition, to launch a program of public works financed purely by the federal government. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member for Bow River is, so far as my knowledge goes, correct in what he says. Of course there never was, strictly speaking, a tripartite agreement; it was purely a bilateral one.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is correct, but there were three parties involved.

Mr. GORDON: Not so far as the federal government was concerned. We dealt only with the provinces, and they in turn dealt with their municipalities.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The scheme is usualy described as tripartite.

Mr. GORDON: I had not heard it called that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Technically the minister is correct, but usually it is described as tripartite.

Mr. MITCHELL: At eight o'clock I asked the minister whether a building program was to be launched under this legislation. Now the minister says that it is not contemplated. Previously this evening he said that the Prime Minister would make an announcement in that regard. From the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Bow River I understand it is not the policy of the government to include the building program in the four corners of the present proposed legislation.

Mr. GORDON: I thought I had made the position plain. The federal building program to which reference has been made will be purely federal, dealing with essential federal works.

Mr. VENIOT: Under control of the federal administration?

Mr. GORDON: Quite. Under this legislation it is competent to enter into an agreement with the provinces providing for contributions to provincial or municipal works. But it is greatly to be desired that that will not be necessary. And that of course will have to be the subject of conference with the provinces because I think there are no provinces that desire to add unduly to their provincial debt by expenditures of public moneys that can be avoided.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not an answer to my question. What I asked was, in view of the reply given to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), whether the contemplated building program that the Prime Minister spoke of in Hamilton last evening is going to be launched within the confines of this particular legislation.

Mr. GORDON: No, it is not.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister answer the question I asked a little earlier? Can he give any idea of the amount of money proposed to be expended under this resolution? Is it $50,000,000? Is it $75,000,000, or what amount is it? Surely there has been some discussion of the amount.

Mr. GORDON: I cannot forecast how much money may be spent under this proposed legislation. I can only say that as far as the government is concerned no money will be spent that is not found to be absolutely necessary.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the minister has no estimate?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could the minister tell us how many persons were receiving direct relief to which the federal government contributes, say at the end of February this year?

Mr. GORDON: It is difficult if not impossible to answer that question, because in the returns made to the department by the provinces, which in the main I should think are gotten from the returns made by the municipalities to the provinces, the figures are compiled, I gather, on the basis that if a person gets relief for a day or a week he is included just as if he had been on relief during the whole month. So it is impossible to tell just what it amounts to in numbers, unless one went into the question of how many meals were served and so on. I think that by far the larger proportion of those receiving relief do not get it continuously throughout the month. They may be on relief for a day or a week, then get work and be off relief for a week. So that any figure that can be compiled would not be of much value. We have figures, which I confess I do not rely upon, as to the cumulative numbers—let us put it that way—of those who during the month have received relief from the municipalities, the provinces and this government.

Mr. MacINNIS: Evidently the department has some figures to which the minister has referred. Would the minister let the committee know how many received direct relief for the month of February last, regardless of whether it was for one day or the whole month?

Mr. GORDON: For the month of February the estimates sent in by the provinces showing the number of heads of families given relief—and this means direct relief for varying periods; it might be one meal for a day or a week, or the whole month—the cumulative figures are, 267,853 heads of families throughout the dominion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister the figures as to the number of dependents of these heads of families?

Mr. GORDON: The number of dependents for the same month totals 955,334; and the same observations apply to dependents as to the heads of families.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister now tell us how many were receiving direct relief for the same month of 1933?

Mr. GORDON: For the month of February, 1933, the number of heads of families was 276,468 and the number of dependents 1,121,142. The same observations apply here regarding the method of compilation, that is as to the varying periods and varying amounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister evidently has the figures by months. Could he put on record the figures for the calendar year 1933 by months, showing heads of families and dependents receiving relief?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I would have to make up a statement. I shall be glad to have that prepared and lay it on the table before the bill goes through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister do that? And perhaps it might be arranged by provinces as well, to enable the outlays the better to be understood and comparisons the better to be made. May I ask if the minister has at hand the figures of the number of unemployed at the present time? Has the Department of Labour any statistics showing the total number of unemployed, by months, for the last calendar year, and the total number at the present time?

Mr. GORDON: There are no figures other than those supplied by the bureau of statistics and the trade unions. I could probably get a statement of that also and table it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the minister would give us that information it would be very helpful. It also should be by provinces and by months for the calendar year 1933, and brought as near up to date as may be possible. It had better be given for the years 1931 and 1932 as well.

Referring to the bureau of statistics, I would like to direct the minister's attention to a matter I spoke of once before, that is the manner in which some of the statistics with relation to employment are compiled. I noticed, and pointed out to the house, that the figures given by the bureau as to employment may be wholly misleading unless they are carefully analyzed and explained in advance to the public, for the reason that under the head of employment are included those employed by relief moneys as well as those employed by private industry in the ordinary course of business. I think the unemployment problem is sufficiently important to expect the bureau of statistics carefully to distinguish in its statistics on employment between employment that is afforded as a result of money voted out of the taxes of the people for purposes of relief and the employment which arises in the ordinary way from private industry. I would ask the minister if he would take up with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is the minister responsible for the bureau of statistics, the importance of having the statistics relating to unemployment make that distinction very clearly in future. I think it is one that ought to be made in regard to all the figures of employment for these years of unemployment, and I wish the minister, as Minister of Labour, would try to secure that information for hon. members of this house. I think it would be extraordinarily helpful in future to find out how much employment has been afforded as a result of moneys voted for relief purposes as distinguished from the employment that has been provided in the last three or four years in the regular course of industry.

While I am speaking on this subject I should like to take this opportunity to say that when I said the figures had been manipulated in a way that caused them to be misleading, I had no intention at all of reflecting on the bureau of statistics or upon any member of the bureau of statistics. What I meant was exactly what the word "manipulate" means. It has a sinister meaning, I know, but it also has the very ordinary meaning of being handled in such a way as to make a certain showing. The figures issued by the bureau of statistics in connection with employment, as they have appeared in the press, would lead the public to believe that the employment afforded by private industry had very considerably increased. As a matter of fact, when one analyses the figures one finds that the greatest increase has come from employment occasioned by the use of relief moneys, has, for example, been in connection with highway construction, most of which is carried on out of relief moneys, whereas as regards this class of employment the least increase in employment is in connection with the railways, which would be a very good index of the amount of general business going on throughout the country. I want to correct an impression that I was in any way seeking to reflect upon the members of the bureau of statistics. I think that department does its work in a wholly creditable way, but I do think the minister responsible for the bureau, and the Minister of Labour in particular, ought to have seen to it that the bureau of statistics was instructed so to classify the statistics as to make perfectly clear the extent of employment arising out of relief as contrasted with employment in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid an impression has been left with the committee, quite unintentionally, of course, that this resolution is the prelude to a bill that will provide for certain bilateral agreements or undertakings in regard to public works. Is there to be another bill in addition to the one that will be based on this resolution, or will the bill that is to come forward include those purely dominion federal works for the relief of unemployment as well as provision for the bilateral agreements?

Mr. GORDON: Any further legislation that may be introduced will deal only with purely federal works, essential federal public works, and will have nothing whatever to do with provincial works.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is to be another bill?

Mr. GORDON: Quite.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not this bill at all?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I see; splendid. Then perhaps when the minister is considering the question he would examine this document. It is issued by the Canadian Surety Company, which calls itself the arch of safety, and which deals with fidelity and surety bonds, automobile, burglary, forgery, liability, plate glass and fire insurance. In a recent issue it encourages the people to be of good cheer because the Dominion government is going to launch a definite federal program for unemployment relief involving the sum of $51,000,000. It states that this sum is to be allotted for construction work, to be divided between the different provinces as follows:

British Columbia	$ 3,640,000
Saskatchewan	3,975,000
Ontario	17,560,000
New Brunswick	2,075,000
Alberta	3,215,000
Manitoba	4,484,000
Quebec	13,366,800
Nova Scotia	2,425,000

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if statements of this kind are being circulated the Department of Labour is entitled to check them up, and in justice to the country there should be a contradiction and correction if the statements are not true. The last sentence here is very interesting; it is as follows:

> The very fact that the governments are getting behind the construction industry in so substantial a manner will provide the necessary impetus to revive activity.

—and therefore, of course, there will be more insurance taken out, more fidelity and surety bonds purchased from this company. Frankly I protest, first of all against this type of advertising, and especially if this information is not correct. I want to ask the minister if the information contained in this sheet, which I have read, is correct or incorrect.

Mr. GORDON: No one knows better than the hon. member for Bow River that if a minister's time were taken up in contradicting misstatements that come from many sources, he would have very little time for anything else.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite so, but the minister has a well staffed department.

Mr. GORDON: I have not a department well staffed for the purpose of contradicting, correcting, revising or reviewing statements that may be made by a section of the press or by such people as those who issued the statement to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. GRAY: Has that statement any foundation in fact?

Mr. GORDON: I would suggest to the hon. member that the place to direct that question is to the author of this publication.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister be fair with the committee? I am sure he would like to be. Are the statements contained in this document, as I have read them, substantially correct or incorrect? Surely the minister can answer that question. I am willing to accept his word.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GORDON: So far as I am concerned as a member of this government, I never heard of any such division of any such money, and I have missed but few council meetings.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the minister say whether the buildings that may be included under this program are of the class for which parliament usually makes appropriations, and whether the construction work is of the kind that ordinarily comes under the federal government? Perhaps I might make myself clear if I asked if it is intended that such public buildings or works of construction as hospitals, sewage plants, gaols, asylums and buildings of that kind will be included in the federal program, or are these still to be regarded as provincial matters?

Mr. MALONEY: Is this discussion not entirely out of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It all relates to unemployment relief.

Mr. MALONEY: It refers to a new proposition which the government is supposed to be about to bring down, and has nothing to do with the resolution before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to the point of order raised by the hon. member, I submit that we are endeavouring to discover what the government is doing towards unemployment relief. I should think the hon. member would be pleased to have the government make as good a showing as possible; heaven knows, up to the present it is poor enough.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the right hon. member will be patient he will know when the bill is brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the trouble is that like everyone else we are getting impatient.

Mr. POULIOT: Opinions are free, and the hon. member is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister be prepared to answer the question I asked him as to whether or not the class of buildings and construction work in any federal program will be similar to the class of buildings and construction work appearing in the ordinary estimates of the departments, or will they go beyond that and make provision for the class of buildings and the construction work usually carried on by provinces and municipalities?

Mr. GORDON: The right hon. gentleman has asked whether or not the work for which provision may be made in subsequent legislation will be work such as the building of hospitals, sewers, asylums and things of that character. I thought I made it clear a little while ago that any subsequent legislation will make provision for only essential federal works.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That answers my question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NEILL: Reverting to the point—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. member for Vancouver South has the floor.

Mr. MacINNIS: After a great deal of questioning the minister gave information about the number on relief, which information other hon. members and myself have been trying to get for some time. It would seem to me from the circular read by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that the Canadian Surety Company has easier access to government information than have hon. members of this house.

This year I put a question on the order paper asking for the number on relief, if the government had the information. I received an evasive reply. However I knew the government had the figures, and when last year we were discussing a similar resolution I quoted some of them. I said that up to the date of the discussion there had been an increase from month to month in the number receiving direct relief. So well informed was the minister that he corrected me—and quite rightly so—stating that in one month there had been no increase, but a decrease. When we are considering a question as important as that of unemployment I cannot understand why it is so difficult to obtain satisfactory information from the Department of Labour. Surely if there is any question before the Canadian people today that is important and upon which they should have accurate information it is that of unemployment. No other question affects so directly the homes and lives of our Canadian people as does the one we are now discussing. We can ascertain quite easily how many pounds of nickel, butter, or copper, or how many carcasses of beef, mutton or pork are shipped out of or produced in the country, and yet when it comes to this important matter we have to squeeze the information from the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Wring it out of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is the fifth session of parliament in which there has been a discussion of this problem, and it would seem that to-day the government are just as far away from a solution of it as they were when the special session in the year 1930 was called. As a matter of fact, they are farther away, because at the special session they did have a program; it might not have been a good one, but it was at least a program. Also they had some hope. Now, however, it seems that they are bereft of hope as well as of a program.

In answering questions this afternoon the minister tried to place blame upon some of the provinces for the difficulty in dealing with unemployment, taking the position that the provinces would not agree to give up any of their constitutional rights in order to enable the Dominion government more efficiently to discharge its unemployment obligations. I believe there are two ways in which the federal government could very quickly take care of that situation. First of all I would suggest that the next time the provincial premiers or provincial representatives are called into conference with the federal government, such conference instead of being held in camera be held in public. Everything that occurs should be within the knowledge of the public. The press should have access to the meeting so that the position taken by provincial and federal representatives may be known. I am satisfied that the public feel so strongly in this matter that they would very soon bring to time any government, whether dominion or provincial, that interfered with the efficient and humane handling of this important problem.

There is another way of dealing with the matter. The federal government, having the upper hand economically, as it were, could bring any provincial government to time and could impose whatsoever conditions it wished. I should like to quote from the words of the present Prime Minister as reported in Hansard of 1930, page 2373, uttered at a time when the house was dealing with the situation obtaining in the steel industry in the province of Nova Scotia:

> Did Canada thereby become, amongst the nations of the world, a member of the League of Nations? The answer is yes. Did the Liberal party in solemn convention assembled adopt the labour articles of the treaty of peace? The answer is yes. Did the Conservative party do the same? The answer is yes. To-night the question is whether or not the parliament of the Dominion of Canada that signed the treaty of peace, with two great parties pledging themselves to its observance and the group to my left also supporting it, is helpless. It is true that property and civil rights are matters exclusively under the control of the provincial legislatures. It is equally true that this parliament may, if it so pleases, impose conditions with respect to any matter wherein it expends public money or confers a benefit or privilege upon any person or class or corporation.

The government does all of these things when it helps provincial governments with the problem of unemployment. It assists these provinces financially and, as the present Prime Minister said at that time, when he was leader of the opposition, it may impose any conditions it sees fit to impose. So that I do not believe the government is in a strong position when it tries to place on the shoulders of the provincial governments the responsibility for the present deplorable condition and the present futile policy in dealing with the unemployment problem. The answers which hon. members receive in the house in regard to matters concerning unemployment are so confusing that I am quite sure hon. members may be pardoned for not having a real understanding of conditions.

When the estimates of the Department of National Defence were before the committee the other day a question was asked of the minister by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). This question and the reply of the minister appear on page 1541 of Hansard, as follows:

Mr. Howard: Has the department any plan for some day taking these men out of the camps? How do they intend to rehabilitate them in the ordinary life of the country?

Mr. Sutherland: We endeavour in every way possible to encourage the men to get back into civilian work, and with a good deal of success.

The minister then went on to give the number of men who had left the camps in the different provinces. Shortly before this the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked a question which appears on page 1523 of Hansard, as follows:

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): Have the numbers in these camps been increasing or decreasing in the last three or four months?

Mr. Sutherland: They are increasing gradually.

I wonder how long it will take the government to rehabilitate the men in these camps with the methods they are using at the present time when the numbers in the camps are increasing gradually.

A word with regard to the camps themselves. During the past summer I visited some of them. I do not intend to criticize them as camps; for I am prepared to agree with the statement which has been made, I believe in this house and elsewhere, that conditions in the camps are good—fair to good, at any rate. The food is good and well prepared, but the shelter accommodation is not as good as it might be. Double decked bunks are used; these should be done away with. While the camps serve the purpose as a temporary expedient, they are certainly not a good thing as a permanent fixture.

Mr. GORDON: What kind of bunks would the hon. member suggest?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Feather beds.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not at all, although I do not see why the men who are in these camps through no fault of their own should not be entitled to feather beds just the same as the rest of us; they have made the feather beds for the rest of us to sleep on.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I have never been able to afford a feather bed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Neither have I, but I do not intend to crack wise jokes at the expense of the men who are in these camps through no fault of their own. I believe the regulations governing the logging camps are that every man is entitled to a bunk or bed for himself, and to a certain number of cubic feet of air space. The governments of the various provinces have prescribed rules and regulations to govern men working in the lumbering and other camps, and I think these regulations should be followed when the government puts men into unemployment camps.

Mr. GORDON: What are the rules obtaining for the lumber camps?

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot cite the rules offhand.

Mr. GORDON: Why suggest that the government do the same as is done in the lumber camps when you do not know what is done there?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am saying that the rules as to sanitation, comfort and sleeping accommodation which the government lays down for the lumber camps should be—

Mr. COTNAM: Will the hon. gentleman state in what camps the rules as to sanitation have not been carried out?

Mr. MacINNIS: I was referring to sleeping accommodation.

Mr. COTNAM: In what particular camp?

Mr. MacINNIS: In nearly all the camps.

Mr. COTNAM: The sanitation was perfect in the camps I saw.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the hon. gentleman say that there were no double-decked bunks in the camps he visited?

Mr. COTNAM: Are there not double-decked bunks in the sleeping compartments on the trains? Do they give the hon. member a special compartment when he travels?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. However, my hon. friend can make a speech in his own time.

Mr. GOTT: This speech will not look so good in the papers.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is all right; I am not concerned so much about the papers as is my hon. friend; I am concerned more for the men in the camps.

Mr. GOTT: For the papers.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) is so much interested he should tell us about the passes issued to dependents.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. member who has the floor should receive the courtesy of the committee and be allowed to continue his remarks; he should not be interrupted from every corner of the chamber.

Mr. COTNAM: When the hon. gentleman makes statements which are not correct, he should be checked up on them.

Mr. MacINNIS: After I have finished any hon. member can correct any incorrect statement I have made. I do not interfere with hon. members when they are making statements in this house, and I feel I am entitled to the same courtesy as I extend to them.

I was pointing out that the camps would be quite satisfactory as a temporary expedient if the men knew when they could leave. I am sure the men would not object if they felt there was some hope of leaving the camps and entering again into the active life of the community. I have talked with a great many of them and I have not met any who objected particularly to the conditions. They all agreed that the food was satisfactory, but they did point out that the sleeping accommodation was not all that could be desired, although they were prepared to put up with it. What they were objecting to was the fact that when they entered the camps they did not know whether they would be there for six months, a year or five years. I suggest that a temporary policy of this kind, while it may be good enough enough in its way, is not a good policy for this government to offer to the people of this country. During the recess I visited one of our penitentiaries. I found conditions quite satisfactory from the point of view of food and accommodation. But there was a difference between the penitentiary and these camps. When a man enters the penitentiary it is for a definite term and he knows when he is coming out, but when a man enters one of these camps he does not know how long he will be there. He can leave at any time, but the circumstances which forced him to go there in the first place will force him to go back.

Whatever may be the conditions in other provinces, they are certainly not improving in British Columbia. A few days ago I received a resolution which had been passed by the unemployed miners of Nanaimo, as follows:

> Resolved that we ask the city council to enter into an agreement with the provincial government for work and wages for the unemployed, at full time, at the regular city scale.
> Whereas, there has been another large number of miners laid off from the local mines, and whereas, the mine itself is only working two days per week in midwinter, with increased distress to the inhabitants in all walks of life, including the business section and the city council itself;

Then it asks for cooperation with various other bodies in bringing this to the attention of the dominion and provincial governments. Now, these are situations that prevail throughout the whole of British Columbia, and I submit that the policy or lack of policy of the government at the present time is not a satisfactory answer to the condition that now exists.

Mr. NEILL: To revert for a moment to the question of unemployment insurance, the minister told us before dinner that he was not prepared to make any statement as to the policy of the government in the future, because they had not yet decided upon a policy. It is somewhat difficult to go behind that statement. We may condemn their lack of policy or their delay in making up a policy in view of the promises made as far back as three years ago; but if they choose to take that position and assume responsibility, we cannot very well force them to make an announcement which they are either unwilling or unable to make. But as regards the past, as to what has actually happened I think we are entitled to ask for information.

It is known that since the minister spoke last, that is a year ago—it was on the 20th day of March to be exact—there has been a conference of the provinces and the dominion, and one of the items on the agenda was the subject of unemployment insurance, more particularly I understand the consideration of how the difficulty of dual jurisdiction could be got round. That conference took place and beyond some very casual political gossip in the papers we have had no information as to what occurred at it. A suggestion has been made that there was something sacrosanct about it; the provinces did not want to show their hand, and therefore the whole thing was to be kept secret. I submit that a conference of that character is not entitled to be kept secret. We have had imperial conferences, the Ottawa conference and the world conference, and there was no nonsense talked about there being anything sacred about them so that what took place could not be revealed. I think we are entitled to know what took place at this conference, because it has a very important bearing on the point of view we take of the whole subject. The government might possibly justify their want of action by saying, "We were willing but the provinces failed to come through; we put up a reasonable scheme to the provinces, one that called for concurrent action with us, but this province or that province refused"—if the government could so inform the house, then it would redound to the credit of the Dominion government and there would be no reason why this government should not wish to show its hand. And if refusal to cooperate came from the province from which I come, then I for one wish to know because others from British Columbia as well as myself might interest public opinion to ask the government of that province to take a reasonable attitude in the matter. If on the other hand the Dominion government made no real offer of any definite scheme but merely said to the provinces, "You have a certain amount of control and we have a certain amount of jurisdiction; will you surrender your jurisdiction without any quid pro quo or any understanding or any proposal on our part," then the question would be that possibly the provinces were in the right in the stand they took and the dominion was to blame. These are things we want to know about and we are entitled to that information, and I do not see why we should be asked to pass this resolution until we are so advised. I think the minister would be well advised, in his own interest as well as in the interest of this committee, to give us such information. I cannot see how keeping the matter secret can be justified. Other matters which the provinces have met to debate have been made known to the public; why not the results of this conference? It is due to the provinces and to the dominion as well that we should know how the matter stands, so that we can formulate our opinion as to who is to blame for the lack of action in this forward movement promised three years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think the minister would be so discourteous or unwise as to let the matter go without an explanation.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member has brought this question up a number of times. I do not think there is anyone in this house who is better acquainted with the difficulties that confront any government than is the hon. member—not only difficulties of a constitutional kind but difficulties that have to do with matters of employment in a country such as Canada. So far as any unemployment insurance is concerned, the provinces are by no means in agreement as to the wisdom of it at any time, and certainly they are not in agreement as to the wisdom of it at the present time. So far as the federal government is concerned, acting within the scope of its constitutional rights, if any measure looking towards the introduction of unemployment insurance is brought down by this government I can only tell the hon. member that he will have to be patient and await the time when such a measure is introduced. As to when it might be introduced I cannot enlighten him.

Mr. MITCHELL: Last year on the introduction of a measure similar to this the minister, if I remember rightly, made a lengthy speech in which he spoke of the back to the land movement as a major policy of the government in meeting the unemployment situation. I would ask him what progress has been made since last year in connection with the announcement of that policy, whether it has been driven forward or whether the matter was allowed to stand after the passage of the legislation.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member is not quite correct when he says that I made a statement in which I said that this was one of the major efforts. It was one effort looking towards a partial solution of the difficulties that confront this country. Among other things I outlined at that time the return to agricultural life of a great many people in this country, and provision was made in the 1932 legislation to make a certain non-recoverable grant of $200 in conjunction with similar amounts from the provinces, and each municipality which participated in the scheme in order to assist those who had the desire and the experience to become self-sustaining on the land. I know there are some who scoff at the idea and some who say that they are farmers and maintain that that is the last place in the world to send anybody, but whoever says that is not, I think, much of a farmer. That program has been carried out during the past year and I hope it will meet with greater success during the coming year. The difficulty that confronts anyone in an effort of that kind is on the one hand to restrain those who are unable, by reason of inexperience or othewise, to take advantage of the opportunities that this country offers, and on the other to see that only those who have a fair or good chance ultimately to succeed are selected to go on to land locations. Immediately the scheme was evolved some municipalities thought it was a proper occasion to rid themselves of people who were utterly hopeless. That had to be curbed, and it was, as quickly as the government and those acting in conjunction with it could do it.

Mr. GRAY: What power has the minister's department in the selection, or is that left entirely to the provincial authorities?

Mr. GORDON: There is now and has been almost from the outset a joint committee representing the Department of Colonization of the federal government, the provincial government and the land settlement branches of both provincial and federal governments. Once this committee got organized and working, the mistakes that were encountered in the earlier stages almost entirely disappeared. The whole object of this colonization at home plan sprang from a realization of the fact that a very large number of people who were induced to come to Canada ostensibly to go on the land did not do so but rather went to our industrial centres, and the fact that industry each succeeding year for many years offered less and less job security to those who had been attracted from the rural into the urban centres, the main objective being to render as many as possible of our own people self-sustaining units and to correct the obvious disequilibrium between rural and urban life. No matter how attractive urban life may be to some people, there is an ever increasing realization that probably more difficulties and more anxiety and sharp suffering are met with in industrial centres when men by reason of the advance of science or otherwise suddenly find themselves out of a job than are encountered in rural life. At least in rural life there is plenty of work to do. That is shortly the objective. I see the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for South-east Grey having a hearty laugh over what I have said.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is not a laugh; we are just agreeing with the minister that the farmer certainly has plenty of work. The minister is quite correct in that.

Mr. GORDON: I have spoken to many good farmers and I rarely hear them complain about hard work.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is true too. They complain of what they get out of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is one of the most important problems confronting the dominion. I understood that the policy in connection with the back to the land movement was a major policy of the government. The minister says that it is not a major policy. I would like to ask him what are the major policies in motion at the moment for meeting the problem of unemployment.

Mr. GORDON: Earlier in the discussion on this resolution a similar question was asked of me, I answered it and I have nothing further to add to what I said.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Before the hon. member speaks again, I am sure all members of the committee are anxious to have the bill before them, and as all of this discussion will in all probability be gone over on the bill, it would be desirable if the committee would take into consideration the fact that the business of the house must progress and would let the resolution through, bringing the discussion up again on the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: This matter has been under discussion since the sitting began this afternoon and I do not think I have taken up more than five minutes of the time of the committee. I represent a large industrial constituency and I know that the question of unemployment is an awkward one from the viewpoint of the government. This might just as well be said now so that the government might contemplate something in between the passing of the resolution and the introduction of the bill. We have had discussions on many factors and phases of our national life, and it is only fair that we who come from industrial constituencies should be given at least some opportunity of questioning the government as to its policies in connection with what I consider the paramount problem in the dominion to-day. We have had the government make a grant of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. GORDON: No, a guarantee

Mr. MITCHELL: Or a guarantee. I would like the government to guarantee the mortgages under which thousands of people in my community are likely to lose their homes. If it is a sound principle to make such a guarantee to the Canadian Pacific, it is sound to do so for the individual. Under this legislation we have had the pegging of securities held by insurance companies. I would like to feel that the same policy was to be carried into effect with regard to every individual in Canada who finds himself at this moment in difficulties because, as I pointed out before, the greatest tragedy in the depression is the confiscation of the homes of our people. As regards my use of the term "confiscation", when a man or a woman is anxious and willing to work and through inability to find employment loses his or her home, it is correct to say that that home is confiscated by the state. The government in my judgment have absolutely failed to meet the problem. There is no secret about the matter. They were elected to cure unemployment; that is what they told the Canadian people, in short, sharp sentences, and I think it is fair to say that the huge majorities rolled up by government candidates in the last election reflected the viewpoint of our people toward what was then, in my opinion, a paramount problem.

So far as the question of unemployment insurance is concerned, the government have had ample opportunity in the past three or four years to meet the problem in a resolute way. They had the advantage of the last census returns, and they have had the advantage of a number of provincial-federal conferences in connection with the matter. Yet in this, possibly the dying session of this parliament, we cannot get information of any kind or any indication that the government has studied the matter of unemployment insurance or contemplates the introduction of legislation concerning it.

I think the depression should be met on many fronts. Notwithstanding the opinions expressed by the Prime Minister, this government will have to deal with the question of interest rates, whether they like it or not. It has been dealt with in well-nigh every other country in the British commonwealth—by Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia; and it will have to be met here. In England today, through the lowering of interest rates, money is flowing into the building industry, which is a basic industry in every country, resulting in an enormous reduction of unemployment. I think a major policy that this government could set in motion to solve the problem of unemployment would be to declare a general election. I believe the new blood that would come into this House of Commons straight from the people would set in motion policies on a par with those in the country to the south of us. It was necessary to have an election there and to get a brand new government direct from the people, and that government has been responsible for the enormous reduction of the figures of unemployment in their own country. I would like to think that the Prime Minister could say on the radio what I heard the president of the United States say to people threatened with the loss of their homes or farms, that if anyone faced with the loss of farm or home would communicate direct with him, machinery would be set in motion to prevent such a thing happening. This government's policy in connection with unemployment seems to be an absolutely negative one, if it can be called a policy at all. Every state has a responsibility to feed its people; that is elementary and fundamental. But over and above that I think a government has a responsibility to see to it that the hundreds of thousands of men and women who are ready and anxious to go to work are provided with the opportunity to do so. We can talk of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we can talk of sound money—

An hon. MEMBER: Where is it?

Mr. MITCHELL:—and I forget the other thing the Prime Minister referred to the other evening, but fundamentally the wealth of any country consists in the ability of its people to work and to make goods. I say, as I have said many times before, and say it in a kindly way, that I think the Minister of Labour is overworked. But I would ask that when they bring down this legislation the government at least have something of a constructive nature to offer, rather than the milk and water policy enunciated by the minister to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) what is the use of offering constructive criticism or suggestions when they are given no consideration? The greatest asset of Canada is not the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railway or the Sun Life Assurance Company, or any big concern of the kind, or any man in particular; it is the Canadian people as a whole. This will not be denied by anyone in this house. Therefore it is of the utmost importance to look after the welfare of the Canadian people.

My hon. friend was asking the minister what is the major policy of the government with regard to unemployment. It is very hard to tell, because the government seems to have none, either major or minor. The government is drifting, while the number of unemployed becomes greater and greater. I listened with great attention to the figures given by the minister not long ago as to the number of heads of families and their dependents on relief. The minister in reply to my right hon. leader promised to give figures relating to the total number of unemployed. The number at any rate is very large. Of every three men in Canada only one works all the time, one works part of the time and the other is unemployed. There is no excuse for such a state of things.

Very often in this house I have offered one constructive suggestion to the government with regard to unemployment. No progress will be made in relieving unemployment until there is a system, until we have order in the organization of relief. It is an elementary proposition that no one can succeed in any thing without having a plan. One may criticize the Russian plan, one may criticize the Roosevelt plan, but every country has a plan, is doing something. Chancellor Dollfuss in Austria has a plan; the British government have a plan; in the United States they have the National Recovery Act; in Russia they have the five year plan. But here we have a moving picture policy. The only difference between the program of this government and the program at the Capitol or the Regent theatre is that the program at the moving picture theatres changes once a week and that of the government is changing every minute. It reminds me of the story of a woman who was running on the street: someone asked her why she was running so fast, and she said: "I am going to buy a hat before the fashion changes." That reminds one of this government. During the last campaign the poor were given a title—I knew then that the title matter would come before the house—they were called "unemployed." Processions were organized of so-called unemployed, with white buttons in their lapels; they were paid so much per head by the Conservative organization to form huge parades to protest against the Mackenzie King government doing nothing for the unemployed. It was just political propaganda. Then after the election in 1930 we were called here for a special session to end unemployment, as had been promised by the Prime Minister several times during the election.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In three days.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, faster than that—we will say the day after he took the reins of office. That was the story. Unfortunately the people were credulous enough to believe it. I told my constituents when they were shouting "hurrah" for the leader of the Conservative party that their worst punishment would be to see him in office, and the trouble would be that the good would then suffer as much as the bad; those who knew he could not fulfil his promise would suffer as much as those who believed in those promises and by their votes helped him to secure office.

Then we came here for the special session of 1930. I remember distinctly, though it is not in the records of the house, that when the Speaker asked the house if we were ready to accept the new high tariff I said, from my seat, "on division." It was not recorded in the papers of the house, but I said it and it was reported by the gentlemen of the press gallery. What were we told then? The Prime Minister said, "We must raise our tariff in order to end unemployment." Then he read or told us about promises he had received from manufacturers to the effect that they would not reduce the number of their employees, nor would they reduce salaries. That is what we were told by the Prime Minister, who was very bombastic at the time. Did conditions improve after that special session?

Then we had the London conference, which had a strong smell of "humbug" about it, and again the tariff was changed. What was the result? We had more unemployment. Later the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General came back to Canada, after the Prime Minister had been given a degree by Mr. Thomas. That was the first degree he received after coming into office—"humbug." He came back here, at all events, and we had the session of 1931, with still higher tariffs. I remember that my right hon. leader asked the Prime Minister during the session of 1931 if he had not increased half the tariff items, and the Prime Minister said he had not. My leader said, "Let us be fair; let us say one-third," and the Prime Minister agreed to that. Were conditions better after that? They were worse, because the tariff was increased at the request of men who saw only their immediate profit and who were not sufficiently farsighted to see what were the real interests of the Canadian people.

The argument of the Prime Minister was that by increasing the tariff we would reduce unemployment, and that as a result no man in this country would be in poverty. If his argument had been right we should have had thousands, tens of thousands and millions of immigrants coming to Canada and no one would have been unemployed, because the tariff has been raised again and again. What the Prime Minister said was childish; he was not serious when he said it. He was so far from being serious that he realized that a country is like an individual; it cannot live alone. The Prime Minister said, "Now that we have isolated ourselves we in Canada are like a prisoner within the walls of a gaol. Now we will have to secure outside help." Then he turned to the other dominions and to Great Britain, and we had the Ottawa conference of 1932, with brass bands. What was the result of that conference? We had prognostications about the possibilities, potentialities and probabilities of the hog trade. We had visions of the future as described by the leader of the Conservative party, but that was only humbug, as was his statement in London when he told an audience that Canada was self sufficient. The trade of Great Britain with the British dominions amounts to only nine per cent of the world's trade. These Ottawa agreements were signed at the last minute; the departure of the boat by which Mr. Baldwin travelled back to Great Britain was delayed for one day in order to give him an opportunity to sign these papers, and there was a famous feast at the Chateau Laurier. The newspapers said the tables groaned under the weight of the food and wines placed on them. If my hon. friends think I exaggerate they need only look at the files of the Citizen and Journal in order to verify my statement. It will be remembered that nothing had been signed and in fact nothing had been agreed to up to the very day Mr. Baldwin was to go back. At the last minute something had to be done; some papers had to be signed; some agreements had to be reached. The secretaries and scribes became very busy putting letters and words one after the other, together with rows of figures in order to have something to show the people. That something turned out to be nothing at all. According to the blue-books containing the reports of the Ottawa conference, this was to be the salvation of Canada and was to bring about the restoration of our trade. Is that what has happened? The conference was such a failure that the government realized that we could not trade only with England and our sister dominions. We are one of the nations of the world; we are proud to be such, and Canada has to trade not only with England and the sister dominions but also with all the other nations of the world. That will be our salvation. When that is brought about we will cease to have unemployment; there will be no need for direct relief for those who have no jobs and those who cannot find a way to earn a livelihood and bring up their families.

I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we will have to pay direct relief until the government comes back to plain common sense. That is all we ask of them. We ask them to lay aside these new programs and plans which are absurd and which destroy the very life of Canadian trade and the confidence of the Canadian people in their own country. Sir, the Ottawa agreements clearly proved that the stand taken by the Prime Minister in London in 1930 was wrong. First he thought he was so great that he alone could dispose of the future of our country. After his experiences with the tariff in 1931 and 1932, he realized that he was wrong. Then we had the conference and agreements of 1932, and after that I hope his ministers were good enough friends of his to tell him he was going in the wrong direction. He saw that the agreements of 1932 were wrong, and then what did he do? He tried to bring about a restoration of the former Canadian trade with all the nations of the world, and with that in mind he and other ministers went to London as the representatives from this great country. While there they met the official representatives of sixty-three other countries, from five continents, three of which the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) has just visited. Yes, five continents were represented at that momentous gathering. The idea of the restoration of world trade for Canada was so important that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) stated in this house that the government was ready to decrease the tariffs and to bring them to a normal level provided other nations were willing to take similar action. He admitted at that time that Canada's tariff was too high. The trip to London was a new experiment; and what were we told by the press while the Prime Minister was in that great city? First of all we were told that the conference was behaving very badly. I do not mean that there was misbehaviour, but that the state of health of the conference was very poor. And then they found a doctor, a political practitioner who found the evil and saved the conference from wreckage. It was the leader of the Conservative party, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. We learned from the press that two days later the conference was in such good health that it died. It was a marvellous operation which was performed by the Prime Minister.

People do not realize that when power was given to the Prime Minister he received more than that. Actually the Canadian people gave him an axe with which he has completely despoiled Canadian trade. Now he offers a diversion and states, "We have sold so many cans of salmon," when in fact the production of the fisheries has decreased by $21,000,000 when our exports to the British Empire and foreign countries have declined by $11,000,000. At such a time he states, "We are sending so many cans of salmon and so many cans of lobsters." Great! Great! He makes these statements at a time when merchants are selling nothing for weeks and months. When a merchant sells a package of chewing gum for five cents he thinks he has made a great profit. The government is acting in the same way.

I want to tell you, sir, that we are sick of humbug; we are sick of smoke screens. We want the truth, and we want it naked, because when an operation has to be made it is not made on a body covered with frills, but on a naked body. If we have to make an operation we must make it on the naked body of Canadian trade, so that we may know the true facts which will enable us to diagnose the sickness. Now, sir, I will diagnose the disease. We hear that in the United States there has been a great improvement in business. Is that improvement due to the N.R.A.? I will not say that. How is it that confidence has been restored in the United States? I believe the explanation is very simple: The people were fed up with the Hoover regime; they wanted a change, because they had no confidence in the Hoover government. People who had money were not spending it; business was very bad, and the American people were afraid of civil war or revolution. Then what happened? There was a change in government; Mr. Roosevelt was elected, and that very fact restored confidence to the American people. The same must happen in Canada. We have had enough promises; we have had enough experiments; we want a change. We want to open the windows in order to get some fresh air so that we may breathe. It is essential for us to come down to plain facts. In this House of Commons I have been advocating truth, in order that we may know where we are. When I ask questions of any member of the government or for the tabling of a return I want the same as is required from a witness—I want the truth, and the whole truth.

If the ministers are familiar with their departments, as I believe they are—I give them that credit—they have no excuse whatsoever for refusing to give any information requested from the floor of the house by an hon. member, and they have no excuse for not giving a complete return in accordance with the order of the house. I say that because the government is just a committee of the house, and it is we, the members of the House of Commons, who have the power to decide whatever we think fit. This is a fact which has been ignored, and is one of the reasons why we have that moving picture of changing programs.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A slow motion picture.

Mr. POULIOT: Slow in motion, but fast in theory. I hope that in the very near future the rights of parliament will not be ignored. Repeatedly I have stated in the House of Commons that hon. members on this side of the house are willing at any time to cooperate with the government in order to bring about some improvement in the business of Canada. I wish to be well understood when I say that when any hon. member on this side of the house offers a suggestion to the government he does so having in mind his responsibility as a member, and in the belief that he is doing the best he can to serve his country. What is said in that spirit should be so accepted, and no hon. member from whatever section of the house he may speak should be exposed to a rebuttal when he is dealing fairly with the government.

After these preliminaries—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: After these preliminaries let me state that again and again I have suggested to the Minister of Labour, and to the government as a whole, that no decision will be arrived at with regard to unemployment unless there is system and order, and unless the government takes the time to concentrate and considers each particular case. I think the committee is fair enough to acknowledge that I have told the government very often that it can have no success in relieving unemployment unless each case is considered separately. This is what was done during the war in taking care of the wounded soldiers. Some of these men received gunshot wounds, others were shell shocked, others received different kinds of wounds. A man who had been wounded in the eye could not have been cured if the chief medical officer had issued an order that each wounded soldier should take a seidlitz powder each morning. It would have been ridiculous to apply the same remedy to all cases, and the same applies to unemployment. Each case should be treated on its own merits.

It is essential that there should be a classification of the unemployed in order to arrive at the correct number of those actually unemployed. There are many who are not on direct relief, those whom we call in French, "les pauvres en habit noir." These people are too proud to let their poverty be known. There are many sons who have lost their jobs and who are receiving from their fathers and mothers food, shelter and clothing for themselves and families. They do not come to the provincial government asking for relief. Such a classification would indicate to us the true economic condition of this country, and when that is known it will be time, if the government does not decide to hold an election, to call a special session to examine the figures. The results which could be obtained from such a session would be far greater than those obtained from that failure of a special session in 1930 when the tariffs were increased so greatly. I ask the minister to let us know if he will not take this suggestion under advisement. The government would save money by such a classification, as there are many cases of duplication in the payment of money for direct relief. The government may say that it is impossible to do this, but I would remind them of the provincial conferences which are held in Ottawa. There will be another one shortly, and I ask the government to submit this matter to that meeting. I was told by one of the leading men in the St. Vincent de Paul Society in Montreal that they have full records as to the unemployed who have received assistance from that society, and that this information could be available in twenty-four hours. This society is giving relief to many people who will not ask for direct relief. The information is available provided it is asked for. All the rights of parliament were taken away when the government adopted the blank cheque policy. The least we can do now is to see that the money is well spent. This is all we can do until the government realizes that the only thing which will effect a restoration of trade and save Canada is to abandon humbug and return to common sense.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, before we conclude the discussion on this resolution I think it is desirable that this House of Commons should recognize the position in which it finds itself in dealing with this greatest and most important of all questions in the country to-day, the problem of unemployment. This afternoon the Prime Minister moved the following resolution which was agreed to:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday the 28th of March instant, it shall stand adjourned until Monday the 9th of April, 1934.

What does that motion mean as respects the matters at present under discussion? It means that unless the bill to be founded on this resolution carries between now and Wednesday of next week, so far as any provision on the part of this parliament to deal with the problem of unemployment is concerned, there will when members leave on their Easter vacation be none whatever. I think it is all important that that should be clearly understood. For reasons best known to itself the government this year is adopting the procedure which it adopted in previous sessions of leaving until the very last moment the discussion of the great question of unemployment and unemployment relief. We are within four days of the adjournment of parliament for the Easter recess and within that time we have not only to complete the discussion of this measure but to enact whatever legislation may be necessary to meet the problem of unemployment at the expiration of this fiscal year, which is March 31. Let me make it perfectly clear that if the bill to be founded upon this resolution is not passed before Wednesday—this means not only its passage through this house but its passage through the Senate and its receiving the royal assent by the representative of the crown—there will not be available from the federal treasury a single dollar to assist in the relief of the unemployed. Notwithstanding the fact which the minister has had to admit to-night that the number of families dependent upon relief runs into the thousands and into the hundreds of thousands and notwithstanding there are hundreds of thousands of unemployed, there will not be a single dollar available from the treasury for the purpose of any work of construction to aid and furnish employment to those who are unemployed. More than that, if this legislation is not passed the government will no longer have the power which it has been enjoying when parliament is not in session of making provision by order in council for matters that pertain to peace, order, and good government and of meeting emergent conditions under that provision.

Further than that, the government will not have at its disposal a blank cheque from which it can draw funds necessary to deal with unemployment relief. It will not have any of the moneys fixed by the legislation of the past year for the purpose of helping to meet the unemployment situation or to relieve rural distress. That is the position; there will be absolutely nothing authorized, nothing out of which the government can make provision to deal with this great question of unemployment relief, and that notwithstanding the fact that the question was regarded by the government, at the time it came into office now nearly four years ago, as so urgent that a special session of parliament had to be called to consider it. We had a special session to deal with the all important question of unemployment relief, which was then declared to be a great national issue; we had that session, a second, third, fourth and now a fifth session; and what is the position at the moment? Should the discussion of this measure, by any chance, last into the middle of next week when parliament adjourns for Easter and the members are away, the government will find itself beginning a new fiscal year without any provision whatever with respect to unemployment in Canada so far as the federal government is concerned. I ask the Minister of Labour and the administration, is it any wonder that unrest and distress are increasing in the country when neglect and indifference to that extent can be shown with regard to the government's attitude towards this great problem? Nothing could be more eloquent of the neglect, or the indifference, or the incapacity—because it is one of the three —of the government to deal with the problem of unemployment relief than this very fact that there will be nothing on the statutes of Canada that will give the government power to turn either to the right or to the left in coping with the problem of unemployment as it exists in Canada to-day unless some legislation is put through before Wednesday of next week. If this parliament should adjourn at Easter without any provision whatever having been made for unemployment, would it be any wonder if a cry of distress went up from one end of the land to the other on the part of the people everywhere who are looking to this federal parliament that has promised to help them in their efforts to cope with the most critical situation with which the country has ever been faced? If we on this side do not continue, to the extent that we should like, the discussion of some of the matters involved, it is simply because we recognize this fact, that unless some legislation is put through by Wednesday next there will be nothing whatever on the statutes to enable the government to make provision of any kind.

For that reason I say to the minister, I hope he will find it possible to bring down immediately, so that it may be available before the second reading of the bill, the information which he has promised to-night to let us have. I should like him to bring down first of all the reports of the auditor general to the ministry, or different members of the ministry, with regard to those cases in which he has discovered that the provision for controlling expenditure, so far as relief is concerned, has been inadequate; next, a statement with respect to the total numbers of unemployed, classified by months and by provinces for the past year—indeed, if he could give it year by year from the time the administration came into office it would be preferable; and the same information with respect to the numbers of persons receiving relief. In addition to that, I wish the minister would also lay on the table a statement giving the latest figures with regard to the total expenditure by years and provinces that has been made under the different relief measures since the administration came into office. If we have this information to-morrow we might let this resolution pass to-night so as to enable the minister to introduce the bill, and we might be able to proceed with the second reading of the bill on Monday, if the government itself is ready to go on at that time. But we ought certainly to have that information before being asked to continue with the measure.

May I add this further word. I hope that between now and Monday the government will consider carefully whether at this session, which may be the last of the present parliament, it should ask this House of Commons again to give it blanket authority to legislate by order in council with respect to any matter it cares to classify under the head of peace, order and good government, and also whether it should ask the House of Commons to endorse a blank cheque with respect to the expenditures the administration may wish to make for actual or alleged purposes of relief, especially when the minister has announced, in connection with the work of public construction which the government may bring in, that the government may enter into contracts which will be continued over a series of years, and the payments under which may be guaranteed for a longer period than the customary fiscal year.

Mr. GORDON: I could give a good deal of the information that the right hon. gentleman has asked for, but perhaps, in anticipation of the filing of the report contemplated by the statute, it would be better if I brought in the information in the form of a statement instead of giving it here to-night. For instance, I could easily give a recapitulation of federal disbursements under the various relief measures from 1930 on to March 10, 1934, but perhaps it would be just as well if a statement were tabled at the opening of the house to-morrow. I think it can be prepared by then, so that all the information asked for can be before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I suggest to the minister that it would be a matter of very small expense to have these statements presented in printed form so that they might be made available to members of the house generally. I am referring to the tabular statements. I do not mean a comprehensive document but a statement in tabular form by provinces and months for each of the past three calendar years and up to the present, of the numbers of unemployed, the numbers receiving relief, and general expenditures on relief, presented either in printed form or in manifold copies.

Miss MACPHAIL: How much money is loaned to the unemployed who are being put back on the land—the policy which the minister has been following for some little time? What is the total amount of money that goes to each family and is it the same for all families?

Mr. GORDON: There is no money loaned, so far as the federal contribution is concerned. There is a non-recoverable grant from the federal treasury of $200. That is supplemented by an equal sum from the province and the municipality respectively concerned.

Miss MACPHAIL: Making $600 in all.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Miss MACPHAIL: What is the total number of families who have gone back on the land in the last year?

Mr. GORDON: The total number of families is 2,701; the total number of dependents is 11,657; the total acreage is 328,027 acres.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Miss MACPHAIL: Are the farms mostly in northern Ontario, or are there some in southern Ontario, so far as that province is concerned?

Mr. GORDON: They are scattered throughout the province, but I think the major portion will be found in that part called northern Ontario.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is this policy being followed in other provinces?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. The figures I have given are for all of Canada under this scheme.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the minister find that the families who went back on the land a year or two years ago are self sustaining?

Mr. GORDON: Generally speaking, yes. There have been some failures. The exact number of those who have returned to their municipalities I have not before me at the moment, but from the reports I get from the various provinces I would say that no plan under the department of colonization in the past seeking to induce people from other lands to come to Canada and settle here has met with the same degree of success that this plan has. It is of course a slow process, but the percentage of failures is very much smaller than under any other scheme that I have had under review since coming into the department. That applies to all the various schemes since 1921.

Miss MACPHAIL: About what extent is the average parcel of land? How many acres? Are they large or small holdings?

Mr. GORDON: No holding that I know of is larger than 160 acres.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is in western Canada?

Mr. GORDON: That would be in Ontario and western Canada. In some parts of western Canada the location may be larger than that, but a good deal of it would likely be rough land.

Miss MACPHAIL: I remember when the minister first suggested this plan, which I believe means a great deal to him, I thought he was genuinely enthusiastic about it, but I felt it could not succeed. I cannot see now how putting on the land people many of whom, I suppose, have not had great experience there, can succeed when those who are trained and experienced farmers and who are on property that has been in their family for one, two or three generations are really not self sustaining on the land. I know that in my constituency of Southeast Grey many who are good farmers with mortgages of some considerable size against their land have lost their property, and many more of them will be in a similar position when the moratorium which at the moment is protecting them is lifted. I should be very happy if the whole farming population in Canada could be made self sustaining, but in my opinion they are not at the present time. At least the farmers in my constituency—and there is nothing peculiar about it—are losing out. If they had money in the bank, that money is gone, or if they had not, they have borrowed just as much as they can, and are not able to pay even the interest on their borrowings. I believe that, generally speaking, is a truthful statement. In endeavouring to carry on, they have sold so much of their live stock that they cannot carry on farming operations as efficiently as they could some years ago.

I do not like to discourage the minister, but I feel this back to the land policy is unsound and will, as time goes on, fail. I do not see how it can do anything else. The minister said that the farmer at least never was out of work. That is quite true. The farmer and the farm woman have more work to do than they should, but they do not get paid for it, and the disequilibrium in population between urban and rural communities arises from the fact, not that there is no work on the farm, but that the people who do this arduous work over years and years, are not paid for it. We all know that, and so to attempt just to take unemployed people, and having given them $600, which I admit is a help, put them on the land and expect that they are going to profit thereby—well, I do not like to say it, but I think it shows the minister knows more about mining than about farming. I believe he is sincere and wants the plan to succeed, but I do not think it can. Some of the older members will recall that in 1922 for ten days there was a debate in the house in which protest was made against the wholesale immigration that was then taking place; we brought in more and more immigrants and put them on the land, especially in western Canada, and we are producing such quantities of farm products that under the system prevailing markets for them cannot be found. Now we are adopting another land policy. It is not called immigration, but it is possibly the dregs of the former immigration policy; we are attempting to put people back on the land. As the representative of an almost wholly rural community, I protest against this; I believe it cannot succeed, and in so far as it does succeed it will make the situation just that much more difficult for the farmers who have been on the land and who have been trying to farm it for quite some time.

I am not, however, going to say that I think the disequilibrium between the population of rural and urban communities is attributable to just one thing; that is not so. There are many causes, but I am not going to take time to go into them to-night. The tariff has had something to do with it; the money power in the hands of a few people who deliberately built up rapidly the industrial life of Canada has had something to do with it, and an educational system that does not in any way fit people to get the beauty and cultural value out of the country in which they are living also has something to do with it. There are many causes for the conditions as we find them, but as the representative of a fine, intelligent rural constituency I protest against this back to the land policy which is being followed. It may for the moment seem to succeed, but just as soon as these people can get off the land, they will do so. As long as it is the only place where they can have any sort of shelter and can produce some food for themselves, they may stay, but that, after all, is not making a living. Finally they will have to get machinery, clothes and many other things they are not thinking very much about at the moment, and I do not believe they can get them under this scheme. I do not suppose the minister will call this the major policy of the government as regards unemployment, but I think he will find that as time goes on it will fail.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know whether the minister has already given this information; I have been attending to my duties in the banking and commerce committee. I should like to know how much is given weekly in each province for the unemployed for each member of his family?

Mr. GORDON: That is a matter which rests entirely with the municipality and with the province. So far as the federal government is concerned we have never put any maximum or minimum on how much a family would receive. That obviously must of necessity be attended to by the local authorities who know the conditions in each case.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister in his possession information in connection with how much was paid in each province in such cases for each family per week?

Mr. GORDON: No figures such as the hon. member asks for are available.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have in mind rentals that may be in arrears by the unemployed. Has provision been made that out of moneys paid by the federal and provincial governments and the municipalities certain amounts are to be devoted to the payment of rentals for the benefit of the unemployed?

Mr. GORDON: If there is such an arrangement it was made by the province with the municipalities. I am not acquainted with any such arrangement that may have been made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I suppose the minister would be in a position to give us a copy of the reports he has received from all the provinces regarding their dealings with the matter of unemployment in reference to this act, and also the amount expended by each province? Has the minister got this report from each province?

Mr. GORDON: Under the provisions of the act a complete report must be tabled in the house within fifteen days after the end of the fiscal year. That report is in course of preparation now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It will be tabled, then, in April?

Mr. GORDON: Within fifteen days after the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The report that is in preparation regarding the administration by all the provinces of the moneys contributed by the federal government will be tabled only on the fifteenth of April next?

Mr. GORDON: I hope to have it tabled before the last day for tabling it, but it will be some time after the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: So we shall not have available for consideration the reports from the provinces before we vote on the second reading of this bill?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did I hear the minister state that these 2,000 families that were returned to the land received $200 from the federal government, $200 from the provincial government and $200 from the municipality concerned?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, 2,701 families were settled under that arrangement.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Have any families been settled on land under the Unemployment Relief Act or any other act by some different scheme? Is there any other scheme by which an unemployed man and his family, if the muncipality does not wish to contribute, can be reestablished on the land?

Mr. GORDON: I believe a small number of families was settled in Saskatchewan by a joint contribution from the Dominion government and the provincial government. And I believe that under a similar arrangement, namely a contribution of $400, some Mennonites were settled around Swift Current and some place in the northern part of Saskatchewan. These people had apparently come to anchor around the towns and evinced a desire to get out and get a piece of land and hustle for themselves. There was apparently no municipal responsibility, and a joint contribution was made in a few cases, half by the provincial and half by the federal government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose a man who is unemployed in one of these little hamlets in unorganized territory desired to go on the land with his family, is there any way for him to be helped to do so to-day?

Mr. GORDON: I would approve of such an arrangement. If a person living in unorganized territory, at present on relief or likely to be and without money, wants to take up a piece of land, he would probably be the kind of person who would have a greater chance of becoming self sustaining than even one who had lived in his youth and perhaps beyond youth on a farm and then spent a number of years in the cities. If there were cases of that kind, and the province viewed it with favour, I would recommend that the federal government join with the province to that extent to settle that man with his family.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The application will have to come from the province?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Under the Relief Act of 1931 the farmers of Saskatchewan, and I think of other parts of western Canada, were required to give notes for the relief they obtained. Would the minister when the bill comes up give some information in regard to those notes, particularly the amount involved, whether they are being collected, what method is being used to collect them, what amount has been collected, and so on? That has always been rather a sore point with me. It seemed unfair that our farmers should have had to give a note for every little bit of relief they obtained, whereas in the cities it was not so. I am glad the government abandoned that idea.

There is another thing to which I would draw attention, as there is need of something being done immediately. I am getting letters from farmers in my constituency saying that they must get more feed for their stock, that stock is dying off continually, and that unless they get feed for their horses they will not be in fit condition to put in the crop this spring. They need feed not only for seeding time but in order to get their horses into shape to do the spring work.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay inquired of the hon. minister what amount was granted to each unemployed per week, in each province, the reply of the hon. minister, if I am not mistaken, was that these figures were not available. As the accounts of each province must be minutely looked into by the minister or his officials, he should be in a position to state whether the treasury is well guarded or the grants made to relieve unemployment were fairly distributed to all the provinces and then to the unemployed. The same applies to rentals. I do not know whether I was well informed, however, I think that in certain provinces rentals are almost entirely paid, while in others no payments are made on them. The distribution of grants to relieve unemployment in the various provinces should be carried out justly, because they all have to pay their quota of taxes to the state. If the government, in the administration of the affairs of the country, acted with reasonable care, its duty would be to scrutinize more closely the statements submitted by the provinces and see that a fairer distribution is carried out.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You should mention this fact to Mr. Taschereau.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Let the minister reply. He will, perhaps, do so more intelligently.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Mr. Taschereau is not responsible for this measure, but the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and those who promised to end unemployment in three weeks must assume such responsibility.

Mr. MITCHELL: Arising out of an observation made by the minister in connection with this building program, a thought passed through my mind. I was under the impression that the minister had no knowledge as to the extent of the policy, the amount of money that was to be spent or where the buildings were to be erected. It passed through my mind that a number of sessions ago the government invited the members to let them know of any public works that were required within the confines of their different constituencies. I think that would be a good policy to adopt in connection with the forthcoming building program. I do not believe this should be—and mind you I am not insinuating that it will be—a kind of preelection pork barrel for the party in power. The members themselves have a very clear understanding of the needs of their constituencies in this regard, and I merely make this suggestion in view of the fact that the policy has not been drawn up or agreed upon. I think the government might bear that in mind when bringing the policy to the house for ratification.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

Friday, March 23, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): A very considerable interest has been manifest in this house in the proceedings of the conference on the limitation and reduction of armaments and of all subsequent proceedings arising out of that conference. The Department of External Affairs has thought that it might be well if a short resumé were prepared and published of the proceedings to date, and this has been done under the direction of the officials of the department. I now table two copies in English and French of the report of the conference on the limitation and reduction of armaments, 1932 to 1934.

PRIVATE BILL

Mr. L. G. BELL (St. Antoine) moved:

That the petition of George Harold Allen praying for a bill of divorce from Marjorie Nelson Allen, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I have received, and I think other members have as well, letters and telegrams protesting against a certain clause in a section of a bill, being an act to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, introduced in another chamber and now being considered there. I refer to section 34, which states that every British company other than Lloyds shall, as a condition of being registered, make a deposit with the minister. Lloyds is not required to make that deposit. Has the minister received such protests, and will the government—this being a government measure—take cognizance thereof?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Obviously the question could not properly be addressed until such time as the bill is before the house. The question ought properly to be directed in the Senate at the moment, and we know not what form the bill will take when it reaches this chamber.

Mr. GRAY: Is it a government measure?

Mr. RHODES: Yes and no.

CORRECTION—MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): On page 1742 of Hansard of yesterday a correction should be made. I am glad to interrupt my remarks here to welcome the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) to the house. The passage in Hansard to which I refer reads:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: But the trouble is that like everyone else we are getting impatient.
> Mr. Pouliot: Opinions are free, and the hon. member is not.

That remark was not addressed to my right hon. leader. In the meantime the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) had risen and said, "This is of course your own opinion," and it was in answer to him that I said, "Opinions are free, and the hon. member is not."

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) were advised by me the other day that I would inform them as to the order in council that had been prepared for the purpose of submitting certain questions relating to the jurisdiction of the tariff board, to the Supreme Court of Canada. The order in council has been prepared but has not yet received the approval of His Excellency or of his deputy and therefore I cannot lay it on the table today. But as soon as it has been approved a copy will be laid on the table, at least on Monday, and I may be able to-morrow to send a copy to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the absence of the hon. member for North Waterloo and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

IMPORTATION OF PARROTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. I have received from New Brunswick an inquiry whether there are any instructions and what they are in regard to prohibition of the importation of parrots. Would the minister please explain what the prohibition is and whether it is under a law or under a regulation of the Health department.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member please explain whether it is a parrot or a macaw that is in question?

Mr. VENIOT: Either one or the other.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): There are such regulations and they are under the administration of the Minister of Agriculture. Perhaps it would be in order to let the minister of that department make a statement.

Mr. VENIOT: Having been informed by the Minister of Pensions and National Health that I have directed my question to the wrong minister and that I should ask it of the Minister of Agriculture, I now direct it to him. I believe he heard the question.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry I did not hear the question.

Mr. VENIOT: The question was that I had received an inquiry from New Brunswick to let them know whether there was any prohibition of the importation of parrots and if so, whether it was under a law or a regulation of the department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to give the hon. member that information in writing.

Mr. VENIOT: I thank the hon. minister.

SALE OF FISH IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): May I make a reference to the question of eels as I see the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) is in his seat and is interested in that. I might say to him now that the supervision of the proper condition of food such as fish and eels comes under the local authority, but I have been informed by the federal officials that after inquiry the statement to the effect that the fish in question were in an unfit condition was not found to be correct.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to deal legislatively at this session with the question of contributory unemployment insurance?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I do not think the question requires any answer. The intentions of the government are not made manifest by question and answer.

Mr. McINTOSH: Notwithstanding this I thought perhaps the Prime Minister could indicate to the house the intention of the government.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 26, respecting fruit.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. STEVENS: I understand the minister desires to have a slight amendment made to clause 1. It is just a slight amendment to the title. I move:

That section 1 be amended to read: "This act may be cited as the Fruit and Honey Act, 1934."

The amendment is to include the words "and honey" in the title of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister why the home consumption of honey in 1932-33 as compared with 1930-31 has decreased by 9,535,000 pounds, and whether this legislation will remedy that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That will have to wait to be demonstrated.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister also why the home consumption of apples in 1932-33 as compared with 1930-31 has decreased by 1,209,000 barrels?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Without accepting as authoritative the figures given by the hon. member, I may say that the situation is this, not necessarily that there is less production, but that there has been a greater export which might account, if his figures are correct, for the smaller domestic consumption.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the minister should have resort to the old adage: "An apple a day keeps the doctor away." I notice from the explanation given by the minister, in the last year for which statistics are available, the home consumption of apples and honey has decreased considerably on account of the fact that our people have no money with which to buy those articles. I ask the minister to be kind enough to table a report showing the exports, the imports, the production and the home consumption of the fruit, also of honey, mentioned in the speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister on October 12, 1932, in which the right hon. gentleman told the house of his expectations in connection with imperial trade in relation to fruit.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information is available to the hon. member in the trade statistics.

Canadian Commercial Apple Production

Years—	Barrels
1929	3,939,000
1930	3,419,000
1931	3,793,000
1932	3,976,000
1933	4,892,000

The production for 1933 being the greatest for all these years.

Mr. POULIOT: What was the home consumption?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The exports for the same years are as follows:

Years—	Barrels
1929-30	1,878,525
1930-31	1,587,497
1931-32	1,682,506
1932-33	1,818,801
1933-34 (incomplete)	3,224,749

The last year showing a very large increase.

Mr. POULIOT: What are the figures for home consumption?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The home consumption I take it would be the difference between production and export.

Mr. POULIOT: Are there no imports?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And with the imports taken into consideration, yes.

Mr. POULIOT: What was the average price each year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The records I have here are not complete in that respect. I shall be glad to let the hon. member have this information at the earliest possible time next week.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. gentleman admit that the figure I have already given is correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say without checking it up.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to tell us about dried apples, the production in each year since 1930, the exports, the home consumption, and the imports?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to give this information at a later time in connection with the estimates on fruit. We have not got all the information here. I do not know whether this is the proper time to prolong a discussion on the request for such information, but I shall be glad to give the information when the estimates are up.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman. But we have before us now a bill of importance which is supposed to assist the farmer in the sale of his fruit and honey. There is a large decrease in the home consumption of apples and of honey, therefore we must have that information before discussing the bill. If we take the estimates and pass them in the meantime we shall have to do it with our eyes shut. Therefore I ask the hon. minister if it is not possible for him to give that information right now, as he has the fruit commissioner of his department before him.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No, Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret I was not able to hear the hon. member's question. If he would repeat it and it is possible for me to hear it—

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. POULIOT: I shall repeat it as many times as the minister wishes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order; may I ask the committee to keep better order? It is very difficult to hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you very much, sir, for the dignity with which you conduct the committee. I shall put it another way. I shall ask the minister to tell us what kind of fruit will be sold in greater quantity on account of this legislation, or what are the fruits the sale of which might be affected by this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No person could answer that question, I believe. This is in great part a revision of an act that has been in force for thirty-three years. It has been submitted to the committee on agriculture and colonization, they have gone into it very fully and have adopted it without amendment.

Mr. POULIOT: It becomes important to see the definition of fruit as given in section 2 of this bill, because the act is to be known as the Fruit Act, 1934. The first thing we have to know is what kinds of fruit are affected by the bill. It is said that:

> "fruit" means fruit of every kind grown in Canada, known botanically as such, except wild fruit in respect of which no grades are prescribed.

I understand quite well that this bill has nothing to do with wild strawberries, raspberries, blueberries and so on, because they are considered as wild fruit, except some special kinds of strawberries and raspberries which grow in gardens and greenhouses. At this time of year I do not speak about wild strawberries. But there are greenhouse strawberries and cultivated raspberries which might be affected by this bill. Also I understand that this bill has nothing to do with bananas and pineapples that do not grow in Canada. Fruit means fruit of every kind grown in Canada; therefore we will leave aside the blueberries which grow wild. I wonder if the hon. gentleman is ready to accept that contention, that blueberries are not included under the word "fruit" in this bill. The same question would apply to cranberries.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Cranberries are not included, and will not be included unless a special request is made by the provinces to have this done. Quebec has already made such request in regard to blueberries, and the word "fruit" will be interpreted to include that fruit.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Now let us be very particular. We have peaches, pears, plums and gooseberries; we have mentioned apples. Here we have four or five kinds of fruit largely grown in Canada. Would the minister be kind enough to give us some information as to the production, consumption, importation and exportation of these fruits? We have had some information already with regard to apples; could we have the same information with regard to plums, peaches, pears and gooseberries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not that information with us. We did not think these questions would be asked except on the estimates, but I will be glad to get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that the minister takes that stand. We are willing to support him if he proves to us that this bill will be of some benefit to the fruit growers. Some hon. gentleman mentioned cherries, another delicious, Canadian-grown fruit, and there are also other fruits I have not mentioned. I am sorry the minister takes that stand, because that means we will have no information before this bill is reported by the committee, and this is where we must ask the minister for that information. When it was stated that this bill would come up today I was sure the minister would be fully prepared to answer questions of this kind, which are closely related to the bill. The estimates do not come up until later; we take only one step at a time. This is the first step; this is the act, the law of the country regarding fruit and fruit growers, and it is of the utmost importance because of some competition which arises early in the spring through imports from the United States and other countries. I believe the minister is too fair to insist upon putting this bill through the committee before the information asked for is made available to every member of the committee. Does the minister insist on his stand or will he reconsider his position.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to supply any information asked for by the hon. member.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the minister could tell me how this bill compares with the bill that was considered by the Ontario fruit growers' convention?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The draft of this bill has been submitted to the various provincial fruit conventions held throughout Canada during the past six months. The Norfolk county fruit growers, communicated with the department concerning the bill. I can say that it has been approved by all provincial fruit growers' conventions throughout Canada, before which it has been placed during the past six months.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is practically in the form approved by the Ontario growers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that we are still on section 1, the short title. I think it would be better to pass this section and get on to section 2. The discussion is wandering very far afield from section 1, which has only to do with the title.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, Mr. Chairman, and in that connection I would point out that the bill has been very carelessly drafted. Honey is mentioned in part 3 and in other places as well; therefore the title should have been drafted accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The title has been amended.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not mean to say that the amendment is wrong; I believe the amendment is very proper, but the bill should have been properly drafted and the title should have appeared as it is now suggested by the amendment.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I believe I am in order in addressing these remarks to the minister at this time. May I say that the success of this act, which in its present form is wide open with regard to the specifications of fruit containers and so on, will depend entirely upon the way it is administered by the department. In that connection I should like to direct attention to the fact that on March 7 I asked for certain information in connection with the inspection of fruits and vegetables in the different provinces of Canada. The answers I received contained no information at all, and in my opinion were a straight attempt on the part of somebody to evade the necessity of giving proper answers. On February 15 I asked for the same information, and the answers I received then were erroneous, in my opinion; I believe the minister has acknowledged that they were not correct.

I am simply bringing up this matter at the present time to show that without the full cooperation of the fruit branch with the fruit growers under this act, the interests of the fruit growers will not be properly looked after. I should like to go further and place on Hansard a letter which I received from the Minister of Agriculture under date of March

12. From the standpoint of the fruit growers in my riding this was the only way in which they could get the answers to the questions I had asked. Under date of March 12, the Minister of Agriculture wrote me as follows, in regard to the question to which I have referred:

Further to our conversation on the 8th, instant, I am pleased to supply you with the following information with respect to requested inspection of apples for export and domestic marketing, whether voluntary or compulsory.

Owing to different fees payable for less carloads, also coastal traffic and quantities in excess of carloads, destination inspections and reinspections, the records for such service are on the basis of the reports on each inspection, and possibly the information you desire would be more complete in this way rather than to attempt to convert the tonnage into carloads. Under this compilation reports of inspections were issued as follows during the fiscal year ending March 31 last:

British Columbia	5,668
Ontario	2,021
Quebec	129
New Brunswick	22
Nova Scotia	4,514

In addition to the foregoing, there were administrative inspections for which no fees are payable which, if required, could be compiled, although it would entail considerable clerical work. These reports are not issued unless a violation is recorded. The violation reports issued on apples for the year in question amounted to 570 and no fee is payable for these.

The records of fees collected are also kept on the basis of the certificate number with no reference to the class or kind of fruit or vegetables. However, in order that you might have the information desired in regard to apples, the time of two clerks was continuously employed for a period equal to five days each segregating the revenue from inspections of straight shipments of apples but not including apples in mixed cars, and the following fees were collected for the inspections tabulated above:

British Columbia	$16,581 90
Ontario	5,972 30
Quebec	519 00
New Brunswick	46 50
Nova Scotia	13,397 25

The following is the total amount of the inspection fees collected in connection with all fruit and vegetable inspections in each province during the year ending March 31, 1933:

British Columbia	$24,278 20
Ontario	16,797 80
Quebec	4,218 50
New Brunswick	9,737 00
Nova Scotia	13,725 25

If the above does not cover your requirements and you will so advise, we will endeavour to secure the information desired.

Clause (d) of subsection 3 reads:

To provide for the inspection, certification and grading of any kind of fruit and the inspection fees which shall be payable.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

In regard to this clause of the bill I should like to ask the minister if it is the intention, under the bill, to continue the charge for inspection fees on apples in car lots?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would suggest that the discussion be confined to the section now before the committee. The hon. member who has just spoken has directed his remarks to a clause which appears later in the bill. I believe we would make better progress by taking each section as we come to it. However now that the remarks of the hon. member will appear in Hansard I should like to make a few observations in regard to the statements he has made. In the first place, the questions as placed on the order paper by the hon. member were not interpreted by the officials to mean what he evidently had in mind. An hon. member on this side of the house who is interested in this matter stated to me that he did not think the information had been given which the hon. member wanted, or that the officials had not interpreted the questions as would have been expected by the hon. member. I immediately got in touch with and discussed the matter with him, explaining matters as I felt they should be explained.

The hon. member has left the inference that there must have been some reason for this misinterpretation. I suggest that the best test of that is that I believe he now has the information he required, and I leave it to him or to any other hon. member in the house as to whether or not there is anything in that information which any of the officers in the fruit branch would have tried in anyway to keep from him. I believe the hon. member will agree with me that there is nothing in it which the officials would have tried to keep from him in the first place. There are likely to be different interpretations. In the anxiety of the department to get the information and have it forwarded as soon as possible in this instance they may not, perhaps, have given the matter the thought it should have had. I contend, however, that there is nothing in the information which has been supplied which the officers of the department could have desired for any reason to withhold.

With reference to the charges for inspection I would suggest that the questions asked by the hon. member should be left until we reach that part of the bill. Although conditions may change I may say that it is the intention at the present time that charges will be made. I believe there have been no requests from the fruit growers' associations that they should be done away with.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I sincerely hope the minister did not misinterpret my statements in connection with these questions, inasmuch as he feels that I was of the opinion there was any particular reason for withholding information. I did not insinuate that. But if anybody will read the question, particularly those officials in charge of the fruit branch who understand not only the phraseology but the practical application and result of the questions, and tell me that the official, whoever he was, did not know what information I required, I would say that the minister should check up on his officials and deliver a copy of Webster's dictionary to them. They understood the questions perfectly well, and they knew what I wanted.

Let me go further: The third section of my question asked on March 7 is as follows:

How many inspection reports upon apples were issued free of charge during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1933?

And the answer was "570," meaning 570 reports. Can the minister tell me why those reports were issued free.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the case of violations of the act there is no charge made.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I ask a question in connection with the inspection fee on apples under this Fruit Act, which will of course be left to the discretion of the minister and the department? Would it be the policy of the department to continue charging fruit growers an inspection fee for compulsory inspection, or is it the intention of the government to make that fee cover other horticultural and agricultural products as well? I may say to the minister that the fruit growers in my section of the country and throughout the province, with the majority of whom I come in contact, have felt and do feel that they have been and are being penalized in connection with the charge for compulsory inspection of apples. They do not feel that they are being treated in the same manner as are other producers who do not have to pay an inspection fee. It is my information, and I feel I am voicing the sentiments of the apple industry of Ontario, when I say that the department, particularly when the inspection is compulsory, should either indicate a nominal charge or eliminate the inspection charge altogether, and place the fruit growers on the same basis as the honey producers, or some other producers. Hon. members know perfectly well, as do the officers in the Department of Agriculture, that in the last few years the apple growers have had plenty with which to contend, without being penalized, as they feel they have been, by an inspection fee for compulsory inspection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): These charges have been made, so I am advised, at the request of the industry itself. When there is any sufficient representation made objecting to the charge such representation will be given full consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I appreciate the minister's reply as it concerns associations of fruit growers. I have followed the proceedings during the last few months of the committee of the apple growers' associations in the province of Ontario, and if it is the minister's impression that the apple growers of Ontario, and I might enlarge that territory to take in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, are satisfied with the inspection fee, particularly when other products are not penalized to the same extent, I am afraid his impression is entirely erroneous. I would like the minister to assure the committee that consideration will be given to eliminating the fee or that it will be used to advance the interests of the fruit growers throughout the dominion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have already stated that consideration will be given.

The CHAIRMAN: I would again direct attention to the fact that under section 1, the short title, the discussion has wandered very far afield. It appears to me that it would be much more orderly to pass this section and then proceed with the other sections.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We can discuss the whole principle on the title, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ILSLEY: My understanding of the rules, Mr. Chairman, is that the principle of the bill can be discussed on the short title. There are a few questions I would like to ask on the principle of the bill. Some of us who have to attend the many special committees of this house have to take such opportunity as presents itself for asking questions on measures in which we are particularly interested.

The first question is, was this bill in its present form presented to the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers' Association, and was it approved in its present form by that body?

My second question is, what situation was the act drafted to meet? What particular abuses is it designed to remedy? What particular change in principle is there between the Fruit Act presently existing and the act as sought to be amended?

If I may be permitted to put all my questions at once, although they are somewhat unrelated, my third question is in reference to the fees for fruit inspection. Is it correct, as intimated by my colleague from Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), that apples are the only agricultural commodity for which the producer is charged an inspection fee? If that is correct, then I submit as my colleague from Northumberland has so forcibly done, that that situation should be remedied. The minister has said that no representations have been made by the industry itself to the effect that inspection fees should not be charged, but I am confident that in the province of Nova Scotia there is the impression that we are being treated as regards apples as are the producers of other commodities, and if the fruit growers of the province of Nova Scotia felt that the producers of other agricultural commodities were receiving their inspection at government expense, while the producers of apples are having their apples inspected at their own expense, the minister would be overwhelmed with protests in a very short time. As the member for a constituency which is vitally interested in the production and exportation of fruit I should like the minister to answer these questions.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This bill in practically its present form was presented to the fruit growers of Nova Scotia, and I believe that a copy was also mailed to every member whose name was submitted to the department. There have been one or two minor changes in the bill since, but they are quite minor, and they have been endorsed by the Canadian Horticultural Council at a meeting here with representatives of the fruit industry from, I believe, each province.

In the main this is a revision of the Fruit Act which has been in force for some thirty years, in order to bring it more into line with modern practices in the industry. Apples are not the only commodity which pays a fee for inspection. Within the last two years, at least, the vegetable growers, the turnip growers of Ontario, specially requested that they be allowed to have their vegetables inspected. Vegetables are inspected as well as apples. It is also true that an inspection fee is charged for seed grain inspection. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard) reminds me that there is also an inspection fee charged the wool growers. There is also a fee charged for potato inspection and grape inspection. Personally I think the sound thing would be to have each industry pay for its own inspection. That leaves the industry in an advantageous position to ask for any extension or improvement of the inspection. I agree that if it is sound for one industry, it should be the same for all.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister's answer is satisfactory so far as it goes, but, on the vital matter of the principle of the bill he has scarcely answered my question. He said the bill was being passed to meet the practices in the industry as they exist to-day. My impression of the bill was that its main object was to eliminate rigidity of regulation. I understand that various matters which before were dealt with by legislation are now to be dealt with by regulation and that the minister has power to alter the regulations from time to time, maybe from day to day, as he may see fit. Is that the essential and central principle of the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret, Mr. Chairman, if I omitted answering certain parts of the questions asked by my hon. friend. I would suggest that if one question were asked at a time it might facilitate the work of the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was simply trying to shorten it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Power is being given to the minister to make regulations where it is felt by the producers as a whole that there should be greater flexibility to deal with situations that arise, such a situation, for instance, as arose in Nova Scotia two years ago, when the second last crop of apples suffered in a big windstorm which knocked down much of the fruit. I stated when this bill was introduced that as long as I held this position, regulations or any changes in them would be submitted to the industry for its approval.

Another change in principle, and this has been almost universally requested, is that brokers, commission agents and dealers, should be licensed and bonded for the protection of the producers.

Another change, perhaps not altogether in the principle, but to a certain extent it is because it comes under the heading of grading, is that fruit that is not fit for consumption cannot be offered for sale except to cider mills or otherwise where it will not come directly into human consumption without being processed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the minister tell the committee whether there is any other agricultural commodity the inspection of which is compulsory, as in the case of apples for export, where the producer is compelled to pay the cost of the inspection, and if so what?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The following are the commodities that are subject to compulsory inspection: (a) All apples, plums and pears exported from Canada; (b) All grapes moving from Ontario to any other province; (c) All fruit from British Columbia to any other province; (d) All potatoes and turnips from Prince Edward Island; (e) All potatoes and turnips from New Brunswick; (f) All fruit and vegetables from Ontario; (g) All fruit and vegetables from British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can the minister give the list of commodities inspected by the government free to the producer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot offhand, but I shall be glad to submit that information.

Mr. ILSLEY: That constitutes the great bulk of agricultural commodities.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No the grain growers pay for the inspection of their grain by a levy, and grain is a very large item, perhaps the largest single item in agricultural products in the export trade. Seeds and hay also pay for their own inspection.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In discussing the principle of this measure the minister made a reference a few minutes ago, when explaining how the bill was drafted, to the Canadian Horticultural Council. Does the minister consider the Canadian Horticultural Council a representative instrument of the fruit growers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should say, from the information available to myself, yes. I know personally a number of those who are members of the Canadian Horticultural Council and my understanding is that they are active apple producers and fruit farmers.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am very glad to have that reply from the minister because my information, from my dealings and association with the fruit growers and the officials of the Canadian Horticultural Council, is exactly the same as the minister's. I would therefore ask the minister, in view of the fact that this is practically a wide open act so far as specifications and grades are concerned, whether the regulations and changes involved in the sections of the bill will be submitted to the Canadian Horticultural Council, and whether the fruit branch will be guided by the advice of that body.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulations will be submitted to the Canadian Horticultural Council as well as to any other representative fruit growers' association in the dominion, and the branch will no doubt be guided by their recommendations.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Referring again to the official body known as the Canadian Horticultural Council, representing the fruit and vegetable growers, and affiliated industries, I would ask the minister this question. When considering the continued application of the inspection fee, which I take it from the minister's remarks is the intention of his department, will he take into consideration the advisability, if that fee is levied for these inspection charges, of contributing at least a part of the fee to the Canadian Horticultural Council or to any other established or acknowledged representative body of fruit growers, to assist their work in the interests of the fruit growers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have already stated that any representations made with reference to the charge of a fee wil be given every consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): With reference to the clauses generally of this bill, and particularly section 3, which provides that the minister may from time to time make regulations enumerated in the bill, may I point out that in the past, as a result of the issuing of regulations at an inconvenient time, the fruit growers have been placed in an unfortunate position. On August 19, 1933, an order in council was passed changing the grade, after some of the crop had been sold. I mention this fact only for the purpose of eliminating in the future any possibility of these regulations being made at a date too late to enable the fruit growers to change their methods in order to comply with the new regulations. Again, changes might be made too late to allow of the change in package dimensions or something of that kind. Naturally—and I say this with all due respect—the officials of a department cannot keep in close touch with the particular industries with which the department is concerned, and unless intimation is made from time to time, and in time to take care of the necessary changes that may be involved, to the official body representing the fruit growers, the same condition may arise in the future as arose in 1933 in connection with the order in council of August 19.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a very fair request.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am merely trying to point out the difficulties which we have encountered in the past in the industry.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have no objection to the fruit growers getting all the advantage possible in their industry, but I am interested in the fruit consumer, because if the fruit grower is going to make a success of his business, his fruit must be consumed. The minister said a few moments ago that a draft of the bill had been in the hands of the fruit growers associations and the horticultural council. Has he taken into full account the interests of the consumers of fruit? I think he will appreciate the importance of this, living as he does on the prairies where we do not grow much fruit but should like to consume some. This bill I understand empowers the department to make regulations, and it sets out those regulations. Now, with regard to apples, so far as western Canada is concerned, a year or so ago the freight on bulk apples was increased to the prairie farmers, although that was about the only way that we could get apples; we depended upon shipments in bulk. The farmers on the prairies are not looking for great big red Mackintoshes or anything like that; they simply want good apples, and if this bill is going to make regulations in regard to packing and grade, whereby the farmer will not be able to buy the fruit which he has been accustomed to get in bulk, it will be unfair to him. I hope therefore that the minister has given the consumers every possible consideration. As regards honey, perhaps the minister would answer this question. Can a man who keeps bees produce honey and put it on the market without being licensed, even if the honey he produces is exported through an agency of some kind? Of course, he generally puts his name on the container. Will he be allowed to go on producing honey without a licence?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He would require a licence if the honey is exported.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the minister assure me that he has taken the interests of the consumers of fruit fully into consideration in this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I believe so. One of the changes, in principle, made in this bill is to prevent, as in the past, the shipment in bulk in cars of fruit not fit for consumption. It would appear that in some cases, merely because there was no other market, fruit of low quality would be shipped in bulk, particularly to the western provinces. The enforcement of this legislation will prevent such a condition occurring, in that no fruit may be offered for sale in bulk or otherwise unless it is fit for human consumption.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But it may be offered for sale in bulk if it is in proper shape.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In view of the questions by my colleague, I should like to go on record as saying in connection with this legislation that as regards the interests of the consumer as well as the producer, the clauses of the bill will improve the position of the consumer, assuring him of getting suitable apples, apples that are fit for human consumption, instead of those, as the minister has pointed out, that have been shipped in the past and that have been found not fit for human consumption. I should like to go one step further for the information of my colleague. So far as the apple business is concerned, the consuming public of Canada have available practically every year large quantities of good Canadian apples from the Okanagan, the Annapolis valley, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, at prices that have not paid the producer the cost of production.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is not the case when the apples reach us.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am speaking now in connection with the effort on the part of the department to improve the position of the fruit producer as well as to protect the consumer. I might go just one step further and say that the clauses of the bill as now drafted will not in any way increase the cost of apples but will be an asset to the consuming public of Canada for the reasons I have given, by protecting them against shipments of apples that should never be offered for sale, in addition to the fact that the very placing on the eastern as well as the western markets of those apples to which the minister has referred has given the Canadian consuming public a basis for condemning Canadian grown apples. This measure will have the effect of placing Canadian produced apples in at least an equal position so far as quality and grades are concerned with apples imported from New Zealand and other parts of the world.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I hope the hon. member did not gather the impression that I was trying to cast any reflection upon the apple and other fruit growers. That was not my intention. But the fruit grower is a human being and if all these measures in regard to his industry that have been presented to the commons were presented to him first for his approval, it would be only natural for him to take a little advantage if that were possible. I spoke just to try to see that the man who is not able to produce fruit and who may be eight, nine or twelve thousand miles away from where he can get an apple, would be fully protected and would be able to eat one once in a while.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I do not wish to take up any further time, but I feel justified in stating in answer to my colleague that unless a catastrophe occurs, there is and will be for many years in Canada, an over production of apples and competition and volume of production will eliminate any possibility of exploitation of the Canadian consuming public by way of the price of apples.

Mr. NEILL: As the whole of this discussion has been out of order for the last hour, perhaps I may also fall in line. We have wandered far afield; we have gone even to section 36, which is in part III of the bill and we are supposed to be discussing the title. This, however, does not matter to me so long as I receive an equal privilege. I should like to ask the minister—and he has already in part answered the question—why he thought it necessary by clause 3, which we have not yet reached, to take out of the act the grades and to put them into the hands of his officials to set by means of regulations. I know he has stated that the reason was to make the regulations more flexible, but that argument does not hold if we look up the old act, because under section 5 it gives him full power to deal with what might be called emergencies. What we should have in the act are the standard, the, so to speak, basic grades. I have often spoken of and have noticed for many years the ever-growing attempt, too often successful, of departmental officials to take power away from the House of Commons and lodge it in their own hands. The way it is done is by means of taking these regulations, grades and forms out of the act and putting them by regulation under the power of departmental officials. A prominent official said to me a few weeks ago—and to prevent misunderstanding I may say that he is not associated with the Department of Agriculture—"You fellows in the house think you are running Canada, but you are not; it is run by officials and regulations and orders in council." It was only last year or the year previous the same minister introduced similar legislation taking grades of hay and straw out of the act and putting them under regulations. I received no satisfactory answer as to why that was done except that it suited the convenience and autocratic powers, perhaps, of the departmental officials.

Why should we want these grades in the act? One reason is that we would have a say as to what the grades should be. It is more than possible that so far as the bill before us now is concerned, the grades are in the minds and possibly on the desks of the officials. We might not agree to those grades, but we do not know what they are and we can only guess at them. The minister says that the act has been submitted to fruit conventions by which I suppose he means conventions of gruit growers, but they did not know what the regulations to be prescribed will be, and it would be selling their rights for a mess of pottage to give the officials full power. I notice when the minister introduced the act, he said that it had been presented to every fruit convention in the last twelve months, but to-day it appears that it is in the last six months, which is quite a different matter. As I say, however, we want these grades in some place where the common people can get at them. It is all very well for the fruit growers in the Niagara peninsula or in the Okanagan valley of British Columbia; they are in districts where the industry is concentrated in raising various kinds of fruit; an inspector is handy and he can give the grades and grade the fruit. But I am speaking of more distant places where people are engaged in a small way in fruit raising. A member of parliament has a copy of the act and he can tell the small grower what the regulations are, or a lawyer will have a copy of the act and it is readily available. But if the grades are contained in the regulations, some man may come to me and say: "What kind of blankety-blank thing have you placed in the act? It means so-and-so to me." All I can reply is that I do not know what it is; I shall have to write to Ottawa and get a reply. That will take a fortnight, and possibly longer. For that reason we should have the grades embodied in the act. We are told that the reason for the change is for flexibility in an emergency, but if that is what the minister wants, it was dealt with under the old act. Why not put the standard, the basic grades in this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The request to make this change came from the fruit growers themselves. They felt that if occasion did arise for changing the grades, after submission to them—as to which we have given our assurance—it could be done without delay. True, as the hon. member states, in the case of emergency we have power to do that. But I think we all agree that the people who are most concerned about this matter are the producers, and that they, at these meetings, are in the best position to give the question consideration, bringing their practical experience to bear upon it. They have requested very strongly that the grades be taken out of the act and power be given to the department to change them or to set up new grades.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister think that the utter absence of stability is a desirable thing? As one member said, it might be changed in a day or a week. It takes nearly a fortnight to get word to the outlying places. Is it wise that the possibility should exist that at their whim two or three officials, or someone claiming to know all about it, or some horticultural society—my hon. friend to the right seemed to have some doubt about their ability—may get to the minister and have something railroaded through, and then it be discovered afterwards that it is not satisfactory? Meanwhile a lot of fruit has already gone on the market under the previous conception of grades.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Allowance is made for cases such as those to which the hon. member refers; anything that has gone forward under a grade is allowed to be sold, even though the grade is changed.

Mr. NEILL: Look at the complications involved.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I ask when the specifications under this new act will be issued?

Mr. NEILL: When they feel like it!

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are being drafted now and will be submitted at the earliest possible date after the bill passes.

Mr. NEILL: Why not before? Would it not inspire confidence in this committee if the regulations were drafted before the bill passes, even if they are not put in the act, so that the members could satisfy themselves that they are satisfactory at least at the start?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We feel that the industry itself having requested that authority be given to set up standards outside the act, under the regulations, they have the best knowledge of what is in the interests of the industry. It can only be in the interests of the industry if it is in the interests of the consumer, because the more the consuming public get what they want the more they will buy; it reacts very directly upon the producer. Before sending out our draft of these regulations we wish this bill to go through. We do not think it would be in order to send them out before. Also we wish the bill to get through at the earliest possible date so that it may be submitted to the provinces.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am familiar with what took place in the course of the deliberations of some of the fruit-growers conventions and meetings of the Canadian Horticultural Council, and I appreciate the statement made by the minister, acquiescing in the decisions of these bodies. Yet I pointed out very strongly to the representatives of the fruit-growers, and would like to repeat here, from my knowledge of the industry, that I am very much afraid that difficulties and complications are going to arise through the elimination of certain specifications at least in the act. That is my opinion, having as I said considerable knowledge of the industry. I suggest that the minister with his departmental officials should give serious consideration to the question whether it would not be better even at this date to have an amendment to the bill embodying some of the standard specifications, so that they will be known not only to the fruit-growers but to the consuming public, and be standard.

Mr. REID: Is the present bill, with its many regulations, designed to take care of the marketing of all fruit, whether for domestic use or for export?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All fruit. With reference to the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) I cannot agree that after the consideration that has been given to the drafting of this bill, for several months past and from one end of the country to the other, we could now consider changing the draft in such an important particular. Following the principle that has always been followed in connection with the Fruit Act, that all changes be submitted to the industry, it would necessitate months of delay, in fact it could not be dealt with before the next session of parliament.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I appreciate the position and I wish the minister to understand that my purpose is to be of assistance, in the interests of the industry, not criticism or opposition, as far as these specifications are concerned. But I still feel that there are very strong reasons why these regulations should be embodied in the bill.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Power to make regulations.

Mr. REID: The minister answered a moment ago that this bill was designed to apply to fruit for domestic consumption as well as fruit exported, whether to another province or abroad. If that is the case I would point out that the enforcement of these regulations in the lower Fraser valley is likely to work a grave hardship on the farmers there. I know that the object of such legislation is to improve quality, so that only the best product shall reach the market. We have districts in Canada, such as the Okanagan, where they are engaged in growing fruits such as apples in great quantities, having large packing plants and so on. But in the Fraser valley the farmers are engaged largely in mixed farming, they grow a certain quantity of apples, not very great except in the Chilliwack valley, quite a lot of strawberries, some black currants, some raspberries, etc. which are marketed mostly in the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster. There is a market every Friday and the farmers come to that market with this locally produced fruit. Enforcement of these regulations there would cause difficulty and hardship. That is true for instance in connection with marking the containers, transportation, and the right given to inspectors to stop fruit coming in. Take also the clause by which it is provided that when fruit is held up the owner shall be notified by telegram; if these provisions are enforced in the Fraser valley grave hardship and loss of revenue will result to the small farmer, and I must register my protest. If these regulations are only to apply to fruit exported to another province or beyond Canada I see a good deal of merit in them, because of course we want to export only a first-class product.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The matter has been given consideration and will not interfere with farmers in the lower Fraser valley, they will still be free to offer their own products for sale on the markets if in open containers. All that is required is that they shall have on the containers their name and address. That matter has been given every consideration.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Offences.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know where the minister got some of the information he gave a moment ago, but I certainly want to have it embodied in this section, not merely stated by the minister, before it passes. I do not care whether this act has been approved from Halifax to Hongkong; this thing is wrong and is going to work a great hardship on the small mixed farmers. In answer to the hon. member for New Westminster the minister said that provision had been made to allow the farmer to sell his produce provided it was in an open container, and so on. I will not be satisfied to pass this section as it now stands unless it embodies something more than the assurance of the minister. I do not wish to make any reflection upon the minister; I would take his word for anything in a private capacity, but I have a very vivid recollection of something that happened some years ago in connection with a bill dealing with soldier settlers. I asked the minister if it meant so and so, because I suspected that it might be read in a different way. He gave his word as a minister of the crown that it did mean so and so, and that appeared in Hansard. Six months later I produced that reference, demanding that the bill be interpreted in that way, and I was told by the very same department that they were not responsible for what the minister or anybody else said in the house; they were guided by the act. So I propose, for the moment at any rate, to be guided by what is in this section, which contains two vicious principles. The section reads:

> No person shall transport, pack, or repack, advertise, display, offer for sale, sell or have in his possession intended for sale any fruit in closed or open packages—

Mark that.

> —or in bulk, unless such fruit has been graded, packed, repacked, marked and inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act and regulations.

I will deal first with the question of transport. I am thinking of the small mixed farmer; I am not dealing with the great areas devoted solely to apples and so on. A farmer wishes to send a couple of crates of strawberries to the local grocer and he asks someone who is passing, "Will you take in these two crates of strawberries?" If the passerby says yes he is liable to a penalty of not less than $25 if the fruit has not been graded, packed and repacked in accordance with the act, and it must be inspected as well. It is utterly absurd to ask a man who may transport fruit in a small way to be responsible for the contents. If this goes through he will have to say, "I am sorry, but I cannot take that fruit unless you can prove to me that it has been inspected according to the act."

The other vicious principle is contained in the words "and inspected." I am going to move that those words be struck out. Here we have a small mixed farmer. I do not refer to those who deal only in apples, which are more or less a standard crop, the great bulk of which can be marketed at once. A farmer may get two or three hundred boxes of apples and then send for the inspector. I am referring to the farmer who grows strawberries, which do not ripen in one day or in two or three days and which cannot be held over and picked up all at once. Everyone knows strawberries must be picked day by day; the whole patch must be gone over and the berries that are ripe must be picked. The farmer may not ship more than two crates to-day and two more crates to-morrow, but he would be liable to a penalty of not less than $25 unless he had those berries inspected before they left his little five-acre farm. He might, with the greatest desire to obey the law, grade them, pack them, repack them and mark them; he might put his whole family pedigree on the box, but unless he has them inspected he may not sell them. He may be 150 miles away from an inspector. How is he to have that inspection done day by day? He may be selling only to his next door neighbour, but unless the berries are inspected he is liable to this penalty.

The minister says this bill has been referred to all these conventions. Yes, but these are the big growers, and it is possible to put over something even at a big convention. People do not always grasp the full meaning of these things. It is not the convention that will be held responsible for this bill; we will be held responsible when we go home. The hon. member for New Westminster said this will bring about chaos in his district, and to a smaller degree it will have the same effect in mine. We will have to explain why we kept silent and let this bill go through. I recall that many years ago in the British Columbia legislature we passed an act dealing with boiler inspection. There was only one man in the house who knew anything about it, and at the time he happened to be away. The rest of us put through the bill in great shape; we vied with each other in showing our ignorance. This gentleman turned up on the last day, when the bill was to go through, and picking up the bill in a rather casual manner he said, "This is a nice bill, but I do not see any provision for a safety valve." Someone said, "Look at section 6." He did so, but found that section 6 dealt with something else. Then he was referred to another section but that did not apply either. Finally he sat down saying, "It seems to me that hon. gentlemen do not know much about boilers." As a result the minister in charge hastily withdrew the bill, which had to be recast in accordance with the casual suggestion made by the man who knew all about the matter.

I only give that illustration to show that possibly conventions, which are not composed of lawyers and which very often are in a hurry, do not always give due consideration to these matters. No doubt they were thinking of their own interests in the big districts where they have inspectors at their back doors, and perhaps they were not as well acquainted with the possibilities as they might have been. I propose to move an amendment to strike out the word "transport." It should not be an offence to transport the goods; the penalty should apply to the man who grows or offers the fruit for sale. I propose also to strike out the word "inspected" and to insert the word "and" before the word "marked." Surely if the grower does not comply fully with the law and sells the fruit when it has not been graded and properly packed, the responsibility is on him. The penalty also is excessive; formerly it was not more than $25 while now it is not less than that amount. I do not know why this change has been made; I should like some information on that point. I move those two amendments, that the word "transport" be struck out in line 12 and that the words "marked and inspected" be struck out of line 16, and that the words "and marked" be substituted therefore. Then this part of the section will read:

—unless such fruit has been graded, packed, repacked and marked in accordance with the provisions of this act and regulations.

I submit that the minister might consider those amendments and perhaps let this section stand for the time being.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni appears to see a great deal of difficulty in this section, but if he had read and considered the section as a whole I think perhaps he would have given it a different interpretation. The section reads:

No person shall transport, pack, or repack, advertise, display, offer for sale, sell or have in his possession intended for sale any fruit in closed or open packages or in bulk, unless such fruit has been graded, packed, repacked, marked and inspected—

Here is the important part.

—in accordance with the provisions of this act and regulations.

This is effective only in accordance with the regulations. A good deal of thought has been given this part of the bill with regard to meeting certain situations which we feel might be very detrimental to the fruit industry, especially in the movement of fruit from province to province or even within a province, in relation to the carrying of disease. So far we have been successful, and perhaps lucky; I believe there would have been a greater repercussion if some of the shipments that were sent out had not been caught by our inspectors. All that is meant is this: We do not know of any other way that will enable us to check the movement of fruit unless we can take the authority that is given here, and the fruit industry are as one with us in that connection. But provision will be made in these regulations, and we do not know any other way in which everything could be covered so as to exempt the small fruit farmer or any person marketing his products in open packages, or in the ordinary manner in which the small farmer markets his products, on the open market or otherwise. They will be exempt. This will be applicable only in accordance with the regulations which will be set out, and I can assure hon. members that the matter has been given a great deal of consideration. When the bill was before the committee on agriculture I can assure hon. members that this matter was the subject of a great deal of discussion, and those who were vitally interested agreed that it should stand as it is.

Mr. NEILL: The minister's assurance is very much to the point. Were he forever to remain in charge of the department I would ask no other assurance because I would take his word. Unfortunately, however, as I said when I was speaking previously, it is not what the minister says it means, but it is what some lawyer says it means a year later. There is no question that when it is stated in the section that one must not move or sell the product unless it has been inspected—I admit the section contains the words "inspected in accordance with the provisions"—it will be so interpreted. The fact that the word used is "inspected," requires that it must be inspected in some shape, and according to the interpretation section the inspection could be done only by an inspector. The inspector may be situated one hundred and fifty miles away. The minister has said that it was impossible to use language which would take care of the conditions I have described. But if the human brain could conceive the provisions to be placed in the regulations it could also conceive similar language to be placed in the act. That is all I want. It is quite possible to draw up a provision which would state that the section would not apply to the small man who is selling direct to the consumer, or some language of that kind. Right at the moment I have not the exact wording in my mind. I am sure however that if the minister would put his mind to drawing up a section such as I have indicated I would be satisfied.

I have in mind a man who in the summer time, the holiday months, trying to make a few odd cents has his children put up a little stand on the side of the highway from which they sell fresh fruit at first hand, right from the orchard or berry patch to the passerby in a motor car. Unless some provision were made he would not be able to make those sales, because he would not have his stuff inspected. I do not see how one could make an order in council to say that something which has been ordered for inspection shall not be inspected, unless such exemption appears in the act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The section contains the words "inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act and regulations." The regulations will state that such cases as have been described will be exempt from inspection, and will set out those who shall be exempt.

Mr. NEILL: The word "inspection" will not allow for such exemption.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The regulation will set out when inspections shall take place. The hon. member mentioned the instance of people who wish to operate small stands at the sides of their farms for the sale of fruit. It was just such conditions as those which led us to use the language we have used, because there are so many questions which could arise. It is felt that the best way to prevent injury being done to such persons is to leave those in charge free to meet each exigency or each case as it arises.

Mr. REID: I should like to draw to the minister's attention something which could and might arise when this bill comes into effect. It may be true, as the minister has stated, that through the regulations the small men will be cared for. I was pleased to note that he was aware that if the bill came into effect without such regulations a hardship would be worked on the farmers in the Fraser valley: Last year in that section of the province there were idle men who took their trucks, went up into the Okanagan valley and brought down No. 1 and other grade apples to the farmers' market. If this bill becomes law and no specific regulation is made these men might complain to the minister or to the deputy that the farmers who were coming in with their local produce of apples were not complying with the law. The minister knows, also, that it is almost impossible for us in the Fraser valley to compete in the apple business with the apple growers in the Okanagan valley, due to the fact that in the vicinity of Vancouver and in the Fraser valley the climate is a little too moist, with the result that the apple is not of as fine texture, and is more or less diseased due to excessive moisture. Last year these men brought apples from the Okanagan valley and sold them against the farmers' pack in the open market. I can imagine that they might complain to the minister and say that the farmers are not complying with the regulations, because they are not trasporting them properly, packing them properly or grading them properly. Unless some regulation is placed in the legislation I must join with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in stating that the legislation is not a good enough safeguard.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): As I understand the situation, the word "inspected" does not imply that every shipment or every crate or package of apples has to be inspected.

Mr. REID: The minister said it did.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not understand that to be the practice. I understood it to be a case of inspection if there is any reason for inspection, on account of the quality of the fruit.

Mr. NEILL: Insert the words "inspected where called for by regulations" or something of that kind. Or, added to the end of the section could be the words "but so as not to interfere with local sales of small quantities." It cannot be gainsaid that when one says a thing must be inspected he cannot by regulation say that it does not have to be inspected. The words in the section are "inspected in accordance with.. ..regulations." The regulation can only qualify the inspection when it takes place. If it said "inspection when called for by regulation" it would be all right.

Mr. MARCIL: I am interested in wild fruit, and I see in the interpretation clause the words "except wild fruit in respect of which no grades are prescribed." Section 4 however applies to any fruit. Why not put in the proviso "except wild fruit," or something like that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): "Fruit" is interpreted by the act.

Mr. MARCIL: There is no interpretation of it in section 4.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Fruit is set out in the beginning.

Mr. MARCIL: The interpretation clause contains the words "except wild fruit in respect of which no grades are prescribed," but section 4 states "any fruit."

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is at present no grade set out for wild fruit.

Mr. MARCIL: There is no exception in section 4.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the minister would allow it to stand.

Mr. MICHAUD: In view of the discussion which has taken place I should like to ask for some further enlightenment or explanation. I understand that inspection which will be required will have to be made in accordance with the rules and regulations which will be enacted under the provisions or the authority of section 4. Will these regulations and rules regarding inspection and sale be compulsory on the mixed farmer who grows apples or berries in the spring and fall, and who takes them from the orchard to the markets. I refer to the farmer who peddles them to the stores or other places in the vicinity. In the St. John valley of New Brunswick we have farmers who make it profitable to cultivate apples and take them in the fall of the year from the orchards to the markets along the St. John river, a distance of one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles. Will the inspection be compulsory on these people, or will it not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It will not.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to ask one question in regard to section 4. May I give an illustration for the purpose of securing information from the minister? One of the largest fruit growers of Ontario has been accustomed to selling his apples on the trees at so much a barrel. The company to which he sells picks his crop and transports it a matter of twenty-five miles to their warehouse, where the apples are packed in hampers or barrels as the market demands. This man has written me asking how, under this clause, he can get over the regulation in connection with the transport of the crop from the orchard to the warehouse, twenty-five miles away. I have written him in reply, that in my opinion those apples would be subject to inspection when they were packed and offered for sale by the purchaser of his crop in the purchaser's warehouse. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): He was afraid that he would not be permitted to have the crop trucked without a special permit.

Mr. NEILL: The case cited by my hon. friend would certainly be covered by this section which says that no person shall transport fruit unless it has been inspected according to the regulations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wonder if I might make a few observations. The committee when this section was before them, hesitated for some time before passing it but we had the advantage of having the fruit commissioner with us and we had a thorough discussion of all the intricacies involved which this committee has not had. I have had some experience in passing and administering this kind of legislation, and I have found that you always have to have what seems to be a lot of unnecessary severity and a wide application of the law in order to make it generally applicable and cover all possible abuses, in order to catch those who want to get past the inspector and put poor goods on the market. It is better in the main to have the section or whatever it is apply generally, and then make your exceptions afterwards. It may not appear so to those who are not familiar with the administering of this kind of legislation, but that has been my experience. The agriculture committee after hearing the explanations that were given by the fruit commissioner and after hearing the minister, took the ground that it was better to have this section as it stands. There have been a great many abuses in the marketing of fruit in the past. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) has mentioned some of them, and as a buyer of fruit I have frequently run across such abuses myself. I think at this stage of our marketing experiences it is better that we should make our law pretty strict, and then by regulation make the exceptions for the small man. Producers are often exempted from the application of a general law applied to traders for sound and valid reasons. I have confidence in the fruit branch staff, knowing some of them, and I believe the minister has, and that is the reason he believes from his experience with the staff up to the present that they will be faithful and sane in carrying out what will seem to some a severe law. If I had not this confidence myself I might feel exactly as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) does, and I might want many things put in the act itself herein left to regulation. I used to think that way myself, but after wrangling over many pieces of legislation involving grading of almost every farm product I have come to the conclusion that it is best not to clutter up the bill with almost interminable provisions only to end up in the committee of the whole house with a compromise bill which leaves you sometimes with a very poor piece of legislation after all. It is better to deal with the exceptions afterwards by regulation So while I understand the attitude of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, if he presses his amendment to a vote I shall have to vote for the bill as it stands. I should not like to have to do that because there is enough in what he says for me to suggest to the minister that perhaps he might get together with the minister some of the other hon. members who have raised these objections with a view to getting something that would be mutually agreeable and that would not interfere too much with the purpose the minister and his staff have in mind. That would be my suggestion. I am prepared to support the bill as it is if there is any vote but I prefer not to have to do that if it can be avoided.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Following the remarks of my hon. friend from Melville with regard to the administration of the fruit branch, I should like to say that with the exception of February last when somebody in the branch tried to be funny in answering questions I put on the order paper my experience in dealing with the officials of that branch has been very satisfactory. I think that the hon. members who have taken exception to the phraseology of clause 4 can rest assured that the officials of the fruit branch in conjunction with the industry and the consuming public have only one objective, and that is to regulate the handling of fruit in Canada in the interests of the three branches of the industry and the consuming public. Like my hon. friend from Melville I am quite prepared to support this bill in its present form, having confidence in the officials of the fruit branch and knowing their conscientious anxiety to help the industry in every possible way. That has been our experience—I am speaking of the fruit growers—with the fruit branch. I have no doubt that this act as presented to this committee will be administered by the fruit branch to the satisfaction of everybody just as they have performed their administrative duties in the past. The only fear in my mind has been the point I have brought up. They may under certain conditions, owing to recommendations that have been made by fruit associations in different parts of the country, feel it is necessary for them to put into force regulations under this bill either too soon or too late to suit the conditions of the industry. I am satisfied, however, that if the fruit branch will keep in touch with all branches of the industry and keep well informed, as they generally do, we shall have no difficulty under this bill as it now stands.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. member for Melville and the hon. member for Northumberland are going to desert me perhaps I had better withdraw my amendment. If they prefer to deal in trust and hope and faith and charity as compared with the strict letter of the law, that is their privilege. For my part, a long experience has taught me to fear God and trust no man, and I much prefer to see what I want put in the act, rather than trusting to the good judgment and fair-mindedness of somebody else. If I withdraw the amendment does not the minister think he might meet me to this extent, that after the word "inspected" he might put in a word or two to convey the idea "when or if the inspection is required by the provisions of this act and regulations." I would say to the hon. member for Melville that if it is possible to put suitable language into a regulation it should be possible to put it into an act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is this difference, that you have to wait for another amending act of parliament to change the act if changes are found desirable and that would take a year probably to do, while frequently you want changes in mid-season to suit the vagaries of the weather and changes in the type and quality of the fruit. Regulations therefore can be changed at any time of the year, and that is why they are much more serviceable to those whom we are trying to serve, mainly the consumers and the producers.

I might make another observation to overcome one of the difficulties that might otherwise arise. In no case should a copy of the Fruit Act be sent out to an applicant who requests it unless a copy of the regulations is nailed right on to the act as a part of it. If that is not done you will have this difficulty and misunderstanding multiplied by hundreds. I would make it so that the regulations could not be separated from the act. I suggested in the committee that the enabling legislation passed by the various provinces concerned should also constitute part of this law; that is to say, the law should be in triplicate: the act itself, the regulations, and the enabling legislation of the provinces. That would get over a good deal of the difficulty. We seem to be buying a pig in a poke, though we are not really doing so.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Melville has brought this point to the attention of the committee. It is the intention that the regulations and the act will be included in the same pamphlet or publication.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is good. I remember they used to be separate and the two would get separated and one might be lost.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister's remarks as they appear in Hansard be embodied in it so that people will know what it means?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The substance of it.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the minister think that he could see his way to put in the words I suggested, "when and if?"

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We will give it consideration.

Amendment withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the section carry?

Mr. NEILL: No; it stands.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think anything would be gained by allowing the section to stand. I have stated that the regulations sent out will be published with the act, and that should be sufficient. If any extra words would help we shall be glad to consider them. I do not wish the committee to think that I am over-anxious not to receive any amendment such as has been proposed, but my concern is to get the measure through as quickly as possible so that the provinces may have it this coming week.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I happen to come from a riding in which a great deal of excellent fruit is produced, and I understand that the act as presented was passed upon by the Ontario fruit growers at their convention. I have a great deal of regard for any suggestion coming from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but I submit that, unless he is very warmly wedded to the suggestion he makes, the more nearly the committee keeps to the act approved by the fruit growers the better it will suit, at any rate, the Ontario district that I represent, because I know that they gave it a good deal of consideration at that time.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—carelessly destroying fruit, etc.

Mr. NEILL: I call the attention of the minister to this section:

> Every person who carelessly handles, destroys or pilfers any fruit in the process of packing or handling in transportation, warehousing or otherwise, shall be guilty of an offence.

The penalty used to be not more than $25, but now, under section 22, it is provided that the penalty for a first offence shall be a fine not exceeding $50 and not less than $25. That is too drastic for any very trivial offence. This is not a matter of fraud or the misrepresentation of grade, or trying to put anything over the public; the offence might consist merely in careless handling. Who has not carelessly handled fruit? A man may get a contract to truck fruit to be taken twenty-five miles away and while loading it, a pretty girl comes round the corner and his attention is momentarily diverted; one of the boxes falls and a corner is broken. The man has no opportunity to evade punishment even for a first offence and the minimum fine is not less than $25. I suggest that this is out of keeping with the penalty imposed for any ordinary offence such as careless handling. I believe it is the experience in all criminal jurisprudence that severe penalties do not lead to the enforcement of law but rather to the evasion of it, because the magistrate, who is generally a decent man, will not impose a heavy penalty as a minimum, and rather than do that he will let the defendant off. Moderate penalties should be resorted to. I will not put the point to a vote, but I would ask the minister why he thinks it necessary to double the penalty that was formerly imposed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This was one point on which there was no difference of opinion in the recommendations of any of the associations. They were all of one mind, that because of the lightness of the penalty as it existed it was not a sufficient deterrent to offences.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Powers of inspectors.

Mr. REID: How many inspectors will be appointed under the act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A total of 344 were employed under the existing act.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Detention of fruit and notice.

Mr. STIRLING: I move that the word "immediately" be inserted before the word "notify" in line 13. With the present wording it might be that the inspector might allow several days to elapse before notifying, and it is desirable that he should do so immediately.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was agreed to in the committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 19 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On section 22—Offences against sections 4 to 15.

Mr. NEILL: This is another example of the take him out and hang him business. For any offence connected with this act, however trivial, the fruit may be placed in detention at the expense of the owner, or forfeited to His Majesty and destroyed or otherwise disposed of as the minister directs. One could understand it if the fruit were unfit for human consumption, or if there were any misrepresentation in regard to grade. But that is not the provision; it applies to any offence, however trivial: it refers to all fruit in respect of which any offence has been committed. That might apply to offences under section 14, where the fruit had been carelessly handled on the truck. An offence is committed in respect of it and under clause 23 the fruit may be forfeited to His Majesty. Why should it be forfeited to His Majesty and what is the provision for doing so? Is the inspector once again to have the power to do this just on his mere say-so, or is there provision for going before a court and ordering the forfeiture? These words mean nothing and should not be in the clause or else there should be provision for proper, legal forfeiture. It is very drastic to say that for any offence, however trivial—and it may be a most casual one—the whole consignment may be or shall be forfeited to His Majesty. The word used is "shall." I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Section 23 is to enforce the observance of the act from the time the shipment leaves the producer until it reaches the consumer. Perhaps too much emphasis has been laid on any offence, no matter how trivial. I have no doubt any offence will be given the same consideration that has been given in the past in the interpretation of the spirit of the act. For example, during the past year we have been particularly fortunate in the work of our inspectors with reference at least to one matter and that is inspection in connection with the apple maggot. In the United Kingdom where there is great concern about the danger of this apple maggot being imported and becoming a menace to the fruit growers there, they have been very careful in checking up on all shipments going forward. As regards the result of the work done by the inspectors in Canada during 1932-33, the figures are as follows:

Number of paid inspections..	26,681
Reinspections asked for..	245
Reversals in the inspection certificate.	16

That is of grade. The percentage of reversals over the total number of inspections was ·06.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of having sufficient teeth in this legislation so that there will be no inducement for any person to try to evade in any way the provisions of the act. That is why we have had to insert the privilege of entering for inspection any type of transport and the provision that no transport, rail, truck or otherwise, may accept fruit unless it is covered by these inspection certificates. The producers' associations insisted that such a penalty be incorporated as would prove a decided deterrent to infractions of the act.

Mr. NEILL: The attitude of the minister sems to be that the legislation is very drastic but it will be enforced in a manner less drastic than called for by it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I admit that it is drastic. They wish it to be drastic.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder whether the people who agreed to that fully grasped the meaning of these words:

Or shall be forfeited to His Majesty.

Would the minister ask his colleague the Minister of Justice how that will be interpreted? Will the inspector do the forfeiting, or will there be provision for going before a court? It will be recalled that the same question came up the other day on the Meat and Canned Foods Act. The section was withdrawn and I understand it is to be replaced by providing that confiscation may take place on the order of two magistrates. Will that apply in this case, or is it just to be the inspector who shall have power to come along, wave his hand and say that the goods will be forfeited?

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, after conviction.

Mr. NEILL: But that is not in the legislation. I really must draw the line in continually accepting the minister's assurance. Surely provision should be made in the legislation that forfeiture shall be only after conviction and after such forfeiture is ordered by a competent court. As the clause reads now, it means either nothing or too much.

On section 23.—Detention of fruit.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to section 23 I beg to move:

That in line 29 the word "shall" be struck out, and the words "after conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction may" be inserted instead.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does not the word "conviction" there relate back to the word "owner" in line 27? Should it not be "after a conviction"? It has to read "or may after conviction," I understand. The conviction is against the owner.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The owner is the only one mentioned in the section, is he not? Perhaps it should be "after conviction of the owner."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that makes it quite clear.

Mr. NEILL: Might I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) if that makes it clear that the court will do the forfeiting, not the inspector?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It cannot be forfeited until there is a conviction. The forfeiture will follow the judgment of the court. Then the subsequent destruction or disposition is in the hands of the minister. He can give it to a hospital or use it himself.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is the Minister of Justice adding anything to this section by the amendment?

All fruit and all fruit packages in respect of which any offence against this act or regulations is committed . . .

Nobody knows whether it is committed or not until after the conviction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was only to clear up the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that there could not be any forfeiture until after a conviction, that the words were added.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not clarifying it, it is making possible two constructions.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—Head packers.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Relative to clause 20 I would like to ask what the purpose is or what the department has in view in connection with the registration of foremen or head packers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The request for that was quite general, I believe, and particularly from Nova Scotia. They thought that by licensing the foreman packer responsibility could be fixed, and it would improve the quality of their pack.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Is it then the intention to vest in the head packer any authority of inspection?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I ask that because one of the Ontario fruit associations has, I believe, approached the provincial department in connection with just this sort of thing with another object in view, that is that they would have available on the premises an official inspector. I want to guard against any possibility of division of authority between the handler and your department.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would defeat its own purpose, I should think.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 20 does not impose any restriction upon the employment of unregistered packers, does it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. ILSLEY: It merely authorizes the preparation of a book here in Ottawa in which the names will be written.

Sections 24 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

On section 37—Regulations.

Mr. REID: Will this bill conflict with the provincial regulations? Am I right in assuming that the regulations contained in this bill are for the sole purpose of regulating the grading of honey for export only, not for home consumption?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are no provincial regulations with regard to the grading of honey, I am informed. This grading will only be compulsory for export out of Canada.

Mr. REID: I think this section should be more specific, because the explanation says that the purpose of this part III is:

to establish classes and grades for all Canadian honey shipped from the province in which it is produced to any other province or out of Canada;

But subsection (a) reads:

to provide for the classification of honey . . .

I think the words "for export" should be added there to make it clear that what is being classified is honey for export.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Within the province it is optional. We expect there will be a demand to have it made compulsory, once the people see the advantage of it.

Mr. REID: Reading the section right through, subsection (b) says "intended for export." From subsection (c) those words are omitted. I claim those words should be inserted in that subsection, it should read "all containers in which honey 'for export' shall be packed." . . . Then you find the words "for export" in the other clauses until you come to (i). If it is the design of the bill that it shall relate to honey for export that should be specifically stated in every clause. Why are those words in some clauses and not in others?

Mr. STIRLING: I beg to move that section 37, subsection (c), be amended by inserting the words "for export" after the word "packed."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 38 and 39 agreed to.

On section 40—Registration.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister explain what is meant by the assembling of honey, and also how the registration is to take place?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of this section is to provide that the individual who may assemble honey from different farmers will have to be licensed so that it will be possible to check up, if any complaint is made, as to whether the sources from which he secured his honey are supervised to ensure proper sanitary conditions.

Mr. NEILL: It would not apply to a shipping broker?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He would be an exporter, I should say.

Mr. NEILL: And how does the registration take place?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This applies to the man who collects honey from the various farmers.

Mr. NEILL: How is the registration to be carried out? Does the man apply to someone, or what is the procedure?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is done also by regulation.

Mr. REID: Will this affect the ordinary apiarist who has enough honey of his own to export?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. It is just a matter of form, getting the registration or the licence.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will this honey be assembled at the usual points of export, as has been the case during the voluntary grading, that is, at Montreal and Saint John, or will it be assembled on the Pacific coast also?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The inspection will take place at any of the various warehouses where it is assembled.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the interior also?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 41 and 42 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall I report the bill?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I was called out a moment ago, and I was particularly interested in section 18. I wonder if that section was amended.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

European war—naval, militia and air forces after the war—$42,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is aware of the discussion which has already taken place with regard to the action of the board of pension commissioners in making deductions from or completely suspending pensions of pensioners in cases in which it was considered there had been some irregularity as to marriages, or where proof of marriage had not been sufficiently established. A short time ago a statement was made in the house by the Prime Minister to the effect that pensions were being paid, and that a review was taking place. Would the minister make a statement as to the nature of the review which is taking place, and the proceedings going forward with regard to settling the merits of the cases and rights of the pensioners?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The reviews as carried on by the pension commission began on or about February 1, 1933. The amended Pension Act did not become operative until October 1, 1933. During that interval while the amendments to the act were not operative reviews were held regarding a considerable number of cases, without the application of the principles which were laid down in the amended act. That is to say, the cases concerned were not considered before quorums of the pension commission, and decisions were reached in those cases as a result of inquiries and completion of forms submitted to the men concerned. As a result, in some cases pensions were either cancelled or reduced. Had the amended Pension Act then been operative the procedure would have been different. It was laid down in the act that before these cases are considered the people interested shall have an opportunity of appearing before a quorum, and be given a hearing. Following that, decisions may be reached.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does that section of last year's legislation apply to the marriage cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand that it does. It is true that the hearings are held on the ground of basis of entitlement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was an omission made in last year's legislation.

Mr. MacLAREN: As these cases were then dealt with in a manner different from that which would have been followed had the act been operative, and in a way which parliament had intended should be followed when the act became operative, it was felt that in conformity with the general principle of, shall I say, British justice, those who came under the present amendment, whether or not the act was actually operative, should have an opportunity to be heard. As the house is aware, that policy has been followed. As was announced in the house by the Prime Minister, the present position is that those cases which were dealt with between February 1 and October 1, 1933, should be restored to their former status, that such reductions, or amounts arising from such reductions or cancellations should be restored to all those whose hearings before quorums are pending. I understand that very largely the refunding has taken place. A considerable number of cheques were to be made out, and they have all been, or soon will be, refunded.

As to marriage cases I have this to say: There is a good deal of difficulty reaching decisions in such cases and the course which has been followed has been that they are referred to the Department of Justice. I do not know that all such cases have been forwarded, but I do know that either that has been done or they are being prepared for forwarding to that department. I do not know what the advice of the Department of Justice will be, but the pension commission will be advised. I understand that these irregular marriage cases may be classified in certain groups, and that decisions will be reached in accordance with the conditions formed in the different classifications. I have no definite information on that point. So far as I am aware the Department of Justice has not yet advised the pension commission in this connection. If there is any other point about which the hon. member would like to ask, I would be pleased to answer.

Mr. RALSTON: The matter to which the minister first referred is not the particular classification I had in mind. However since he has opened the discussion we may as well deal with that angle of the matter. In section 5 of the act passed last year provision was made that pensions should not be cancelled or, due to a change in the basis of entitlement, before the pensioner was afforded an opportunity of appearing before a quorum of the commission. On that point I complain and complain very bitterly that notwithstanding the fact that that was in the act, simply because of the fact that the act was not proclaimed until October 1 the board of pension commissioners proceeded to review nearly 77,000 cases and cancelled or reduced many of them on the ground of a change in the basis of entitlement without any hearing of any kind. That complaint remains, notwithstanding the remedial measures which have been taken. That, it is true, was not in defiance of any act which was in force, but it is in defiance of the spirit of the legislation. I feel quite satisfied that the minister concurs in the idea which parliament had at that time, and that was from the time that this act was passed parliament accepted the principle that a change should not be made in pensions where the basis of entitlement was concerned without giving the man a hearing. The minister concurs, I think, in that principle. It was at least contrary to the spirit of the act that such a change should be made. That is one class of cases to which the minister has referred, but I am not dealing with that class at the moment. I understand from the minister that these pensions where a reduction or cancellation was made on the basis of a change of entitlement have been restored. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: To the full extent which existed before the review was made?

Mr. MacLAREN: So I understand. They have been either restored or are in the process of restoration. I think they have been restored, but there were a good many to deal with, and restoration proceeded at once after having been announced in the house. I would like to make this clear, without reflecting on the board of pension commissioners at all, that my view, as a non-legal man, is and has been that it was simply an act of justice that every man, whether in the end he was proved to be in error or not, should have the opportunity of having his case presented and being heard. That is the principle that is pursued in all our courts, that a man has the opportunity of being heard however clear apparently the case against him may be. That is a primary requisite. That has been my view and I am pleased to say that it is the course that is being followed to-day. It is an essential of justice that a man should have the opportunity of a hearing before his case is decided.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that the minister made known his views in that respect to the board of pension commissioners, did he not?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is the case, yes, and I think the correspondence will show it. What I should like to say about anything in the correspondence is that my views apply to all these cases of entitlement or irregular marriages. I drew no distinction because I thought the same principle applied to both. Naturally everything does not appear in the files because, as hon. gentlemen know, my offices are located in the same building and we find it advantageous to have discussions and conferences of which no record is kept.

Mr. RALSTON: I presume the minister means by that, that in conferences as well as by correspondence he made known those same views to the board of pension commissioners.

Mr. MacLAREN: I made my views clear.

Mr. RALSTON: That, as the minister says, applies to all cases—

Mr. MacLAREN: Except assessments, naturally.

Mr. RALSTON: Except assessments. Let me point out to the minister that as I understand it any reviews which are taking place are only reviews in connection with cases where there is alleged to have been a change in the basis of entitlement and pensions have been cancelled or reduced. Is that correct?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not quite understand whether the application is to the first of February or to the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking the minister whether the new reviews or the re-reviews which are taking place are in connection with all cases of assessment or are in connection only with cases where there is alleged to have been a change in the basis of entitlement.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 9, to incorporate the Bishop of the Arctic (as amended, and recommending that the title of the said bill be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Bishop of the Arctic of the Church of England in Canada").—Mr. Geary.

Bill No. 35, to amend the Criminal Code (Race Meetings).—Mr. Morand.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: Before six o'clock we were dealing with the procedure which was being adopted in connection with the re-reviewing of cases which had been reviewed by the board of pension commissioners at the instance either of the board or of the auditor general since February, 1933. I was asking the minister what steps were being taken to secure a re-review of the cases particularly dealt with in the proviso to section 5 of the consolidated Pension Act, that it the cases where the pension has been cancelled or reduced due to an alleged change in the basis of entitlement. By whom are those reviews being conducted, and what machinery is being provided to do the work?

Mr. MacLAREN: The pension commission consists of eight members divided into quorums usually of two, and as two members remain at headquarters, this means that three quorums are moving about the country hearing the cases. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. RALSTON: I understand from the minister the review is being conducted by the members of the pension commission themselves.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am not now speaking of the reviews; I am speaking of the hearing of the cases. At the present time cases regarding entitlement are being heard before quorums. As I understand the matter, this is not a review.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps I misled the minister in using that term. I meant a re-review of cases which had already been considered and regarding which action had been taken.

Mr. MacLAREN: As regards the review of those cases which had been dealt with prior to October 1, they will be heard before quorums.

Mr. RALSTON: That is to say, those quorums which travel around will at regular sittings give notice to the pensioner to allow him an opportunity to come in and be heard as to the claim being made that his pension should be reduced.

Mr. MacLAREN: Let me put it in this way: Those cases that have been dealt with prior to October 1, 1933, that is which have been dealt with without a hearing, will be heard. The pensions have been restored in the meantime. The men who are affected will be notified and their cases heard before a quorum.

Mr. RALSTON: My difficulty in connection with that class of cases is this: The members of the Canadian pension commission are only human and, as the minister knows, the decision has already been made in connection with those cases. That is, deductions or cancellations have been made presumably on evidence which the board of pension commissioners consider to be sufficient. Does the minister think it is quite fair to the pensioners to refer them again to the same court? That is what I bring to the attention of the minister, and, as he knows, I have already called it to the attention of the government. The decision having already been made against the man and a reduction in pension having taken place, I feel he starts under a handicap, particularly as the restoration has been made not voluntarily by the board of pension commissioners but on account of an assurance given to the house by the Prime Minister. Is it quite fair to applicants to ask them to go before the same tribunal which has already decided their cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not know how far that point has been considered. I can quite understand it would be more suitable for those men to be heard before a different tribunal, although it consists of two members of the commission. It would be a fair procedure if those men were heard by a tribunal other than that which has already passed upon their cases. I wish to get this correctly. Those cases which have been dealt with were dealt with at headquarters here and no doubt that would involve only a certain portion of the commission because the men's cases were considered on their records here. I would think it could be readily arranged that those men when they had their hearings would come before a quorum which had not already given decisions from the records at headquarters. Have I made that clear?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not know whether it might have happened that they were all present here at some time and took part, but I think it would be desirable so far as possible to arrange that the hearings which are to take place before the quorums in regard to those men on whose cases decisions have already been taken, should be before members of the pension commission who had not taken part in the previous decisions.

Mr. RALSTON: I agree with the minister as to that. I feel there is a good deal to be said for going further than that, that the fact that members of the same tribunal have made a decision, makes it a little more difficult for the applicant to reestablish himself, if I may use that expression, before brother members of the same court. I certainly agree with the minister that this is at least going part way and recognizing the principle in which I think he agrees with me, namely, that a man should not rejudge a case on which he has already formed an opinion and rendered a decision. That has to do with cases which were dealt with on the ground that there had been a change in the basis of entitlement. Has the minister the approximate figures of the number of cases in which reviews were made from February 1 to October 1, 1933, and where the pensions were either cancelled or reduced because of what was alleged to be a change in the basis of entitlement? How many cases are there in that particular class?

Mr. MacLAREN: While the figures are being looked up, I might say that I am unaware of what the pension commission may have arranged in regard to these hearings. They may have already decided upon some procedure that they thought was the fairest that could be adopted. I am not aware of what was in their minds or what they proposed doing, but I shall see to it that this viewpoint is brought to their attention. I do not wish to imply that they are not already arranging for hearings in accordance with a similar method.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not suggested that.

Mr. MacLAREN: I know that. They may have done so, because naturally as they administer all these matters, this does not come under my observation except casually or accidentally. I believe I made the return which answers the question put by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. The figure I have here is 1,420. Does that correspond—

Mr. RALSTON: No, but I recognize that figure. In the first place that has to do only with dependents' pensions, and in the second place it has to do as I understand not simply with pensions which were changed on the ground of a different basis of entitlement, but pensions which were reduced because of a change in the rate of assessment. That is not the figure I asked for.

Mr. MacLAREN: I believe the figure is 1,003.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to be sure about that. I have that figure too; it was given me in sessional paper 123B as the number of disability cases in which pensions were reduced from January 1, 1933, to September 30, 1933. What I want to know is whether in all those cases they were reduced on the ground that there was a different basis of entitlement, or whether some were scaled down on the basis of there being a different degree of disability.

Mr. MacLAREN: I believe it was on the basis of entitlement.

Mr. RALSTON: Then can I take it that all the 1,003 cases to which the minister refers, which are mentioned in this return, will be reheard by the Canadian pension commission under the assurance given by the Prime Minister, but not reheard by members who have already heard the cases here?

Mr. MacLAREN: My answer would be that they will be reheard, or opportunity given to have them reheard—for some of these men may not be found—and as far as possible reheard by others than those who have already adjudicated upon them. I can see a possibility that if all the commission were here and all took part in adjudicating on any cases, that would not be possible. I do not know, but I presume that was not the case. I think I can assure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, as far as my representation would go, that these cases will be heard by a different personnel of the commission.

Mr. GEARY: The new commission was appointed some time in the autumn, I understand. A great many of these cases were ruled upon by what must have been the old board of pension commissioners. I think it would be quite simple to find out which members of that board heard the different cases.

Then it is entirely incorrect to speak of these as rehearings. These men have not had a hearing at all. Their pensions were cut down in the first place from the head office of the board of pension commissioners, and in the second place by the newly constituted body. I take it they are having a hearing for the first time. I think the minister will find that the great majority of these cases were dealt with by the old board of pension commissioners. It would be a simple matter to let them know that it is the sense of this committee that they would be doing what they had no business to do if they undertook to hear these cases, after having once ruled upon them, ex parte as it were.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I quite agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. I think all these 1,003 cases were decided by the board of pension commissioners, and it is also reasonable to assume that the chairman of the old board was one of the quorum of the board that decided the cases. I suggest very strongly that that chairman, who is now chairman of the Canadian pension commission, be not permitted by the department to take part in the adjudication of these cases. I think it would be very unfair. These are to be new hearings, as promised by the Prime Minister. The men were not present before; the cases were heard in secret, and I suggest strongly to the minister that the chairman of the old board, who is now chairman of the pension commission, do not adjudicate at the new hearings at which the pensioners are to be invited to be present.

Mr. MacLAREN: While the discussion was proceeding I overlooked this fact, that during the period we are speaking of there were only three members of the old pension board, perhaps with a medical adviser who was a member ex officio, making four. So as a matter of fact there would be only four at the most, which would leave the other four who could not possibly have dealt with any case, because they had not been appointed. That will make it all the easier to carry out the idea.

Mr. RALSTON: I am putting this on record for the use of the minister in dealing with this matter as he has suggested. He has mentioned the 1,003 cases in which pensions were reduced. Let me point out that that is only the number of disability cases in which pension was reduced. In addition there were 960 disability cases in which pension was cancelled.

Mr. MacLAREN: The figure I have in my book is 690, but 960 may be right.

Mr. RALSTON: There may have been a transposition of figures in copying. Now in addition to those which are disability pensions, and, as I understand, disability pensions which were either reduced or cancelled because of alleged change in the basis of entitlement, there were 277 dependents' cases in which pension was reduced and 59 in which pensions were cancelled. So the grand total is, I think, 2,299 cases. I put that on record now so that the minister in checking up the matter with the Canadian pension commission can see to it that that number are given the opportunity to which he referred to-night. Will the minister correct me if I am wrong?—because I want to be sure about this. The minister's information is that all these pensions were altered on the basis of a change in entitlement?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is what I understand.

Mr. GEARY: Does the return which my hon. friend has indicate how many of these were altered on account of the point concerning marriage?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, that is separate altogether. I was coming to that next. In addition to the numbers I have mentioned, according to this return there were, between January 1, 1933, and September 30, 1933, disability cases to the number of 166 in which pensions were suspended entirely or reduced, due to alleged overpayment on the ground of invalidity of marriage. In addition there were two cases of dependents' pensions which were either suspended or reduced for the purpose of recovering overpayments claimed on the ground of alleged invalidity of marriage.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the pension would not actually be reduced, but payment, or a portion of it, would be withheld.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is quite right in the expression he uses; I think one should say suspended or partly suspended.

Mr. MacLAREN: Or withheld.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not suggesting that the pension was cut down, but that a portion of the pension was withheld in order to recover an alleged overpayment. There are 168 such cases, and I should like to deal with those for a moment because those are the cases to which I was particularly referring in the house the other day. Under section 5 of the Pension Act parliament imposed upon the board of pension commissioners the duty of considering and adjudicating upon all questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension under this act and the recovery of any overpayment which might have been made. I take it that in the exercise of that power the board of pension commissioners from January 1, 1933, to September, 1933, suspended either entirely or partially 168 pensions, and I may say that from October 1 to December 31 they suspended 64 more, one a dependent's pension and 63 disability pensions. This is water gone over the dam, and I do not want to go into it at length to-night. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions have both realized the unfairness of the attitude which was taken, and these cases are covered by the assurance given by the Prime Minister that the pensions would be restored and opportunity afforded for a hearing.

Now I want to ask the minister what opportunity is being given or what is being done with regard to these cases. He partly answered me before the dinner recess, when he said that certain cases were being referred to the Department of Justice. I submit to him that this is not going far enough. With all deference to the Minister of Justice, and I am not reflecting on the Department of Justice in the slightest, it seems to me that the minister, the department, the government and the board will have to go much further than that. Let me put it in this way: There may be cases in which it is impossible to prove the death of a spouse. Insistence may be made on a certificate of death. I hold in my hand a letter written by C. E. Jones for the secretary of the pension commission under date of March 13, which indicates what is being required to-day by the board of pension commissioners with regard to the proof of death:

> With reference to forms recently completed by you with regards to your claim for additional pension on behalf of your dependents. Until such time as you can submit the death certificate of the woman you first married in February, 1912, no additional pension can be paid on behalf of your marriage on the 16th February, 1922.

I submit that this is neither good law nor good policy in connection with these cases, and I do not think the Department of Justice will say that any such evidence is required in order to validate what is alleged to be an existing marriage. Further, there will be cases which I think this house will be called upon to consider, in which a ceremony of marriage has been gone through in absolute good faith; children have been born, families have been raised and the responsibilities of domestic life have been undertaken. Those children have been supported by the man or woman, as the case may be, and the money which has come from the board of pension commissioners on behalf of the dependents has been spent for the purposes for which it was intended. Now, ten or fifteen years later, because they cannot get a death certificate and cannot prove conclusively the death of a former spouse, the board of pension commissioners proposes to withdraw the pension from that man or that dependent and to suspend the pension which he is getting now until he repays to the board all the money that has been received and spent in support of the wife and children in regard to whom he undertook the responsibility. I submit that this is a class of case with which the house will have to deal, and may I say that it is not in the slightest degree out of line with pension legislation already on the statute book. In the first place illegitimate children are expressly recognized by the Pension Act as children. In the second place, in cases of death, where an absolutely legal marriage cannot be proved, the woman may still be considered to be the man's wife. Where you have people who are living in the community as man and wife and are recognized as such, I believe parliament and the country intended that for the purposes of the act they should be recognized as such.

That is my first point, Mr. Chairman. Then I say a man should not be deprived of the pension to which he is now entitled in order to repay something which he has received honestly and in good faith and which has been devoted to the purposes for which it was intended. That class of case, I submit, cannot be effectively dealt with even by submission to the Department of Justice, because it is quite possible that the Department of Justice may advise that the evidence which is submitted does not prove a legal marriage, and we will still have the difficulty of providing for these cases. I can assure the minister, and no doubt he knows it of his own knowledge, that there are many such cases. I am not going to ask as to the intention of the minister, but has the minister considered amending the act in order to cover these cases?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before the minister replies I should like to say a word. I understand from what my hon. friend has just stated that, according to the figures before him, there are 232 cases, which we term the marriage cases, in which the validity of a marriage is involved. The figures submitted to my department are greatly in excess of that number. My information is that there are between 550 and 600 of these cases; I think the department has already received more than 200 files as a first instalment.

I fully realize the difficulty which has been so well stated by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), and at the present time I cannot see what advantage is going to result from a reference to the Department of Justice in regard to these cases. At the present moment, through special assistance which we have had to secure, the department is endeavouring to arrange these various cases into categories. I think they will probably fall within seven or eight different categories. There are some cases which I have read over rather hastily which at once present certain difficulties with which we shall be confronted in the majority of these cases. Let me cite one case from British Columbia, where before the war a man and wife were legally married and living together. The woman left her husband, went to Seattle, in the United States, and obtained a divorce from the United States courts. The husband had no domicile in the United States. That divorce was not valid or legal in the Dominion of Canada, but after a few years, just before the war, the husband married again. He thought he had a legal right to marry. He went to the war and became entitled to pension and now, after his death, the question arises as to whether or not he was legally married and whether his children are lawful children or bastards. In my own experience I can recall many marriages, not in military but in civil life, under practically the same circumstances. In all the cases I can recall. not only in Toronto but in Hamilton and Guelph as well, people who have remarried under such conditions have always been considered by their friends in the community as being legally married. Technically I suppose they are not legally married, and if the Department of Justice, on looking into such a case, were bound to give a strict legal opinion, I am afraid we would have to say that the marriage was not valid, or at least that the validity of the marriage was extremely questionable. And if we referred such a case to the court I fear we would secure a decision against the strict validity of the marriage. Both in this country and in Great Britain there is a very strong legal presumption in favour of the validity of marriage; I think perhaps it is one of the strongest of all legal presumptions, and can only be rebutted by positive evidence. Without committing anyone but myself to the views which I now express, I believe that where people have been living together as man and wife the presumption of legal marriage should be allowed to prevail unless there is positive testimony to rebut such a presumption.

Let me cite another case which is of some interest, a case where the parties were married in Canada but subsequently removed to the state of New York and established legal domicile there. In the courts of New York, the wife sued for and obtained a divorce, but in the decree of the New York courts a condition was imposed upon the husband forbidding him to remarry. The husband came back to Canada, took up his residence again in Canada, and after the lapse of a few years remarried in this country. There is a very strong legal opinion that the condition imposed by the courts of New York had no validity in this country and consequently that his marriage in this country was valid; and so I would hold. But I believe the board of pension commissioners have taken a different view of the husband's second marriage. I could relate from the cases I have so far read many very peculiar circumstances, but in each case which I have read the parties have been living together as man and wife, and have been assumed by the whole community in which they resided to have been legally married. In such circumstances there is a very strong presumption in favour of a legal marriage, and as I said before unless that presumption can be overcome by positive evidence, the marriage should be held to be legal in all respects. I do not see any way of getting around the difficulty without some further amendment to the act. In the meantime the Department of Justice is endeavouring to separate these marriage cases into various categories. But when this has been done and we are ready to submit the cases for the adjudication of the courts if judgment is to be given on strict legal principles, I am satisfied in a great number of cases the courts will pronounce the marriage to be invalid, just as the board of pension commissioners has done. In that way I believe in the vast majority of cases the applicants would not get the relief to which they are entitled.

Mr. RALSTON: Along the lines of what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, may I mention an inquiry which was made by the minister and the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, showing how thoroughly the minister is in sympathy with what the Minister of Justice has just said as to some way of expeditiously disposing of these cases. In a return which the minister was good enough to bring down, No. 213, there was a letter under date of January 2 from the minister to the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, in which this question was asked: "In a presumption of death is there any way in which cases can be acted upon more expeditiously?" And the chairman answered, "Not in the opinion of the commission." I understand that the Minister of Justice is expressing his own personal views and is not committing the government. I believe he indicates how anxious he is to have these matters disposed of expeditiously and not to have people dragged through the procedure of having to secure legal opinions or make a case before the Department of Justice or before the courts. I do submit that it must be possible to follow out some such suggestion as that offered by the minister and to evolve some amendment to the act whereby there may be a quick and expeditious disposition of meritorious cases. Those are the only cases with which any of us are concerned. I know that in connection with pension applications, just as in other types of applications, fraud has been practised, and I use that word advisedly. I know it is being used a good deal by people who perhaps have not as much sympathy with this matter of pensions as have the House of Commons and the country in general. But I want to say this about the whole matter of fraud, and the talk of illegitimacy, bigamy, crime, and things of that kind, that I believe the record for honesty of ex-service men in connection with applications can be put up against the record of the general public of Canada with regard to income tax returns or any other returns which have to be made to the government. I think it will be found that the percentage of fraudulent cases is exceedingly small. Going over the cases it would seem to me that about one per cent would be cases in which there has been any attempt to defraud the government or the Canadian pension commission. The point is that none of us has any sympathy with those cases, and they are not the cases for which we are speaking. What we are endeavouring to do is to secure justice for those cases we consider to be meritorious, and the cases which this country intended to benefit when the act was passed. For hon. members on this side of the house I can say that we will join most sincerely and heartily with the Minister of Pensions and the Minister of Justice and the government in endeavouring to work this matter out, because I realize from the answer made by the Prime Minister that the government has every desire to do that.

While I am on my feet may I say this further word: The minister has said with regard to reviews that he will consult the Canadian pension commission and if possible have them carry out this procedure. I realize that the commission is not directly under the minister's jurisdiction, but in some way or other this government has succeeded in getting the pension commission to act in regard to the matter of these premature reviews. I believe if the government takes the same stand with regard to this matter it, too, can be dealt with.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Delay is causing no inconvenience to the pensioners; they are being paid. It may cause some inconvenience to the treasury, but we are trying to find a solution of the difficulty just as quickly as possible, and particularly in regard to the two questions of presumption of marriage and presumption of death. My own view is that we will have to have legislation to clear up the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask a question in regard to the statement made by the Prime Minister on February 13. What method has been adopted by the government to enable them to send out cheques to pensioners whose pensions were suspended?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The pension commissioners and the committee of the cabinet discussed the matter together, and after a discussion the commissioners intimated that under the circumstances they would order the cheques to be sent out and would at once refer the particular cases, namely marriage cases, to the Department of Justice. Pending notice being given to all of the enumerated list of cases, and until final decision was taken, payments would be continued.

Mr. GRAY: Could the Minister of Pensions tell the amount of money which has been sent out since February 13, upon which date the Prime Minister made the announcement of the restoration?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not that figure, but I can get it.

Mr. GRAY: It seems strange to me—and I need not enlarge upon what has been said by hon. members on both sides of the house—that all down through pensions legislation which we have had since the days of the Ralston commission, all through the various committees which have been set up, in view of what has been indicated by the minister, in view of the correspondence tabled for the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) in which is shown a sympathetic and sincere desire that these men should be heard and appear for hearing; in view of what has been said by the Minister of Justice, by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) and other hon. members—it is strange that through all these years in which we have been studying pension matters we should be defied by the former chairman of the board of pension commissioners and the present chairman of the Canadian pension commission. And it does seem strange that it should require an ultimatum from the Prime Minister, when the matter was raised in this house by my two colleagues to my left, before any action could come. I do not know where the Prime Minister obtained jurisdiction to give that ultimatum, but he did, and it was effective. It is worthy of note, however, that as late as February 26, thirteen days after the announcement was made by the Prime Minister, the chairman of the Canadian pension commission was going blithely on as he had been doing since January, 1933, giving statements to the minister in preparation for this bluebook showing the men who had been cut off the list, and as late as February 26 we have four statements wherein the reason given is "legality of marriage not established." Notwithstanding what had been brought to the attention of the house by my two colleagues, and notwithstanding what had been stated by the Prime Minister, the chairman of the commission goes blithely on his way as he had done previously without regard for what had been done, reporting to the minister that in preparation of the bluebook he had these three further cases, although I am quite satisfied that what was said by the Prime Minister was known throughout the length and breadth of this country immediately after the Prime Minister made his announcement. Reading this file from beginning to end you will find, instead of a sincere desire to see justice done to these men, as the minister wished, that his recommendations have been entirely ignored by the chairman of the old board, and indeed by the chairman of the Canadian pension commission. If you will read the file you will see that the minister would write to the chairman say on the first of the month, and he would be lucky if he received a reply by the end of the month, if at all, and then it might be from some official of the department. In the meantime each week he would report to the minister the number of cases that he had succeeded in cutting off, whether on the ground of illegality of marriage, bigamy or something else. I protest, Mr. Chairman, and will do so more vigorously when we come to consider the personnel of the Canadian pension commission, but I say quite frankly here and now that if the chairman of the Canadian pension commission is not prepared to follow the will of parliament as submitted through the members representing the various constituencies and passed on through the Minister of Pensions, who is responsible to the country, then the sooner the minister sees that that gentleman is removed the better it will be for this country as a whole.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would like to say a word or two along a certain line that I have not yet heard touched upon concerning what seems to me the crucial point in the case of these married people who had pensions cut off, and that is that evidence was given sufficient to satisfy the board of pension commissioners in many cases many years ago that the marriage was legal. I have a case, and I think nearly every member of parliament has one or more similar cases from his own neighbourhood, in which the point at issue was this: The couple were married in 1919. The husband and his wife considered that they had proof that the former husband of the woman had died. They were married and their certificate of marriage was accepted by the old board of pension commissioners as proof positive. Now if the board at that time had raised the question of the legality of the marriage it seems to me that a number of these difficulties would have been solved at that time and would not now be arising. In the case I speak of a form was sent out last year asking for the death certificate of the wife's former husband. The parties endeavoured to get that and found out that the man had not been dead at the time they married, as they thought he was. He did not die until 1929. The case again came before the commission; the pension was withheld, and recovery commenced. In this particular case these people remarried immediately to regularize the thing. But if the old board had asked for the death certificate in the first place the case would never have come up. These people could have been legally married in 1929 and the wife would then have been entitled to her allowance, but having gone beyond the first of May of this year they are not legally entitled to it. That is a case in point where evidence was given of the marriage which was accepted as satisfactory at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) on the stand he has taken with regard to the legal position in respect to these cases, and I should also like to put on Hansard a memorandum that was submitted by the present president of the Canadian legion, a judge of one of our courts in Saskatchewan, in reference to these cases:

It is a well recognized principle of English law that when a marriage is alleged and it is proved that the parties went through a form of marriage and thereafter lived together as man and wife and were by general repute regarded as man and wife this constitutes not an irrebuttable presumption but a presumption rebuttable only by the most conclusive evidence of the validity of marriage.

In the case of Morris vs. Davies, 7 English Reports, page 365, Lord Lindhurst, at page 404, speaking of this presumption said, "that presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled, it is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probability, the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory and conclusive." Then in a leading case on the subject, Piers vs. Piers, 9 English Reports, page 1118, the Lord Chancellor, page 1129, expressly approved of the law as stated by Lord Lindhurst. There the fact of the ceremony was not in doubt but no evidence was available to prove that the special licence required by law and necessary to the validity of the marriage had been secured, nevertheless the House of Lords held that the onus was upon the parties seeking to attack the validity of the marriage and upheld the rights of the parties claiming thereunder. To the same effect is the judgment of the privy council in the case of Aronegary Vaigalie, 6 A.C., 364. Once this presumption arises the onus is upon those who seek to attack the validity of the marriage. Goodman vs. Goodman, 28 L.J. ch. 745; Haviland vs. Mortiboy, 32 L.T.O.S., 343; Harrod vs. Harrod, 69 English Reports, 344; Homanuke vs. Homanuke, 13 Saskatchewan L.R. 186, and Hedge vs. Morrow, 20 D.L.R., 561.

This by no means exhausts the law on the subject but it is sufficient to show that the commission are proceeding upon the wrong principle. If the pensioner is apparently legally married the commission have no power according to English law to require him to prove the legality of the marriage other than the fact of its existence. If they question its validity on the ground of incapacity of either party or for any other irregularity the onus should be upon the commission to establish that fact and to ask a man to go back twenty years and establish the death of a previous wife is to my mind absurd.

I think that entirely endorses the stand taken this evening by the Minister of Justice, and again I wish to congratulate him on his statement with regard to the merits of these cases.

I also wish to endorse what has been said by my colleague the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray), and also what has been said by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and by the Minister of Pensions (Mr. MacLaren). I wish to congratulate the minister upon the stand he has taken. For the last four months the minister has been endeavouring to obtain some results in connection with the arbitrary action taken by the chairman of the old pension board, the present chairman of the Canadian pension commission, in regard to these marriage cases. I wish also to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for West Lambton in regard to what I would call a callous disregard of the minister's requests for information, evidenced in this correspondence. There are on this file some letters that have never been answered by the present chairman of the Canadian pension commission, and there are other letters on the file answered by supplying further additions to the list he was going to give, while there are others answered by members of the board of pension commissioners and other officials of the board.

I thank the minister for the stand he has taken in the last three or four months with a view to having justice done in this matter, and I think the cabinet should be congratulated on the peaceful persuasion which they have exercised on the present commission in securing the dispatch of cheques to pensioners whose pensions were cancelled or suspended. I trust that, in the interests of the cause which everyone in this house has at heart, that same peaceful persuasion will be carried still further and that the present chairman will be removed from jurisdiction inasmuch as he has lost the confidence of ex-service men throughout Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think I can explain the difference in the figures as between those quoted by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and those quoted by the Minister of Justice. As regards marriages, the figures quoted by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth were from January, 1933—

Mr. RALSTON: From January 1, 1933, to September 30, 1933, and I also included the figures from October 1 to December 31, 1933.

Mr. MacLAREN: Considerably larger figures were given by the Minister of Justice, and the explanation is that his figures went further back than January 1.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two letters which I think we should have on the record. There is, first, a letter from the minister dated January 2, 1934, to the chairman of the Canadian pension commission. In this, the committee will observe that the minister is asking for information with regard to the procedure followed by the pension commission and also for information in connection with these cases. This is the letter:

The Chairman,
Canadian Pension Commission,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Your memorandum of the 28th of December, in reply to my memorandum of the 18th, regarding suspension or reduction in payment of pensions, will be quite helpful, I believe, in avoiding hardships and lessening criticism.

There are several important points on which I shall be pleased to be informed. Many of them are matters which might go a long way towards meeting complaints.

1. Regarding your paragraph 1 (a), is the affidavit of a pensioner regarding his marriage acted upon as such, or is he given an opportunity of appearing before a quorum before action is taken?

2. What will be the procedure followed in those cases where a man has not been given an opportunity of a hearing before a quorum before a decision was reached?

3. In the case of those applicants who have not had an opportunity of a hearing and whose payments of pensions have been reduced, what can be done to meet this situation in whole or part until there has been an opportunity of a hearing before a quorum?

4. Regarding 2 (a), in cases where there has already been a reduction in payment of pension, there have been numbers of cases where the present policy does not seem to have been previously acted on. Can this class of case be dealt with? There will probably be a considerable interval between the time at which the payment was reduced and a hearing before the quorum. Is it feasible to reinstate these cases or deal with them in any suitable way? I am attaching a few cases which seem to be examples of this.

5. In presumption of death, is there any way in which the cases can be acted upon more expeditiously?

6. There are representations with reference to this class of men. A man was enlisted, went overseas, stated he was married, drew separation allowance, on discharge was pensioned, with allowance for his wife. After years, it is found that there was an irregularity in the marriage. Can anything be done to avoid the present hardship and difficulties arising from the allowance of the wife and children being discontinued and a reduction made in the payment of the man's pension?

Murray MacLaren, Minister.

On the same date the following reply was dispatched:

Memorandum to:—
The Honourable the Minister,
Department of Pensions and National Health.

I would refer to your memorandum of the 2nd instant and the various paragraphs therein.

Your memorandum assumes that the man is entitled to appear before the commission before any suspension of pension is made. I would point out that a man is only entitled to a hearing before a quorum before his pension is cancelled or reduced on the ground that the basis of entitlement is changed. This applies only to his basic pension, it does not in any way apply to allowances. He may ask for a hearing as any pensioner may who complains about his assessment; and I would point out that with regard to assessment, the assessment remains reduced or discontinued unless or until the man establishes his right to a higher rate.

1. The affidavit is acted upon.

2. The pensioner is not entitled to a hearing; the pension is suspended after a reasonable opportunity has been given the man to establish that his marriage is legal.

Quite the reverse of what the Minister of Justice suggests should be the basis of procedure.

3. My memorandum of the 28th December sets out the situation. The pensioner is not entitled to a hearing.

I do not see on the file the memoradum of December 28. Perhaps the minister will make a note of that and send it to me.

4. The statute does not provide for any hearing before a quorum. It is not feasible to reinstate these cases.

It has been found possible since the matter has been taken hold of, and I understand they have been re-instated under the present arrangement.

5. Not in the opinion of the commission.

6. Not in the opinion of the commission, except as set out in my memorandum of the 28th December concurred in by the whole commission.

J. Thompson,
Chairman.

In regard to this letter, I would point out that it was written when there was on the statute book an act which expressly provided, in section 5, that the commission should be charged with the duty of considering and adjudicating upon all questions relating to award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension, or the recovery of overpayment made. Now, the first principle of adjudication, as I think everyone will agree, for it does not require a lawyer to perceive this, is that there should be a hearing for the person whose case is being adjudicated; yet it is categorically stated by the chairman of the board, "You are not entitled to any hearing." In other words, the attitude is this: The pension may be granted, but by reason of the fact that we happen to be in a position where we can say that you have not proved that your former spouse is dead, inasmuch as you have no legal evidence of death and do not produce a death certificate, we will hold your pension and recover the amount already paid on account of your present spouse or your children.

I submit that the correspondence shows an attitude of mind which is absolutely repugnant to the whole spirit of the act. I know that it is difficult for a man who occupies a judicial position to go outside the statute; but there has never been a time in the history of this country, and I do not believe that that time will ever come, when a chairman of the board of pension commissioners could not come to the government in power, whatever government that might be, and say, "We find that an anomaly exists and there are hardships resulting therefrom. We cannot believe that parliament intended this, and we should like to have your assurance that if the pension is granted the government will pass an act validating the payment." I should be disappointed in any government in this country that would not give such an assurance. The board of pension commissioners was in that position, not in the position of a judge far removed from parliament, but in close touch with parliament; and it seems to me that this is a procedure that would commend itself to the public at large. Moreover, it is a procedure which is just to those for whom we are legislating at the present time.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I direct the attention of the committee to this fact, which I do not think has been mentioned, namely, that the auditor general and his staff have been inspecting the files for some considerable time and have drawn the attention of the pension commission and, I believe, of the pension board to certain things which they thought were incorrect, and I believe this has had a very considerable influence on the commission in the direction of an effort to meet the views and criticisms of the auditor general's staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that every pensioner who is called before the board is required to bring a marriage certificate, birth certificates of children, and divorce certificate, if any? I understand a good deal of resentment has been caused recently among people who have been called before the board.

Mr. MacLAREN:: All I know is that pensioners are supplied with a form which they are asked to fill in and on which are certain questions about marriage, previous marriage, and an affidavit at the foot of the form. That is all that occurs to me at the present time.

Mr. GRAY:: Is that practice still continuing, in spite of what has been said?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think so.

Mr. GRAY: Is there any necessity then for those men to be given a hearing?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are asked to make an affidavit that the statement is correct, and I see no objection to that; but I do not think it is sufficient to end the inquiry there. That is all.

Mr. RALSTON: In that connection, in the last return from which I read there is a document mentioned called a life certificate. Will the minister tell me what that is? Evidently the Canadian pension commission are issuing a certificate called a life certificate.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is an annual statement that each pensioner is asked to make that he continues to support his wife and children and that there is no material change in his condition.

Mr. GRAY: If no other member wishes to discuss the marriage phase of the question I should like to ask the minister some questions as to the formation of the personnel of the Canadian pension commission. But before doing so, I should like here and now to place myself on record, as I have done in the past, as paying tribute to the ex-members of the tribunal which was established in 1930 and which disappeared on October 1, 1933. I think it is the experience of all members, certainly of ex-service men, that in their appearance before the tribunal, they received a fair consideration of their cases. Not always did the pension tribunal agree with them, but in any event I believe they came away satisfied that they had had a fair hearing, and although I may be condemned—perhaps I may condemn myself for not having voiced my opinion more strongly last year when the amendment was introduced—I for one felt and still feel that the pension tribunal should have been given a further opportunity under the act as passed in 1930. I feel sure that if we as a parliament had taken a decided stand with respect to those appeals that were made by the pension commission, a great deal of the difficulty in which we find ourselves to-night would have been eliminated. But the committee of last year in its wisdom saw fit to make the amendment which came into force on October 1 of that year.

I now propose to ask the minister some questions with respect to the personnel of the Canadian pension commission, and in particular with respect to what became of the old tribunal. I want to ask him first: Of the eight members of the Canadian pension commission that has been established how many of the old pension tribunal were taken in and appointed as part of that commission?

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. MacLAREN: There is one who had previously served on the tribunal.

Mr. GRAY: Sir Richard Turner?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. GRAY: I would like to know what became of the substaff, that is the under officers and staff of the tribunal, and how many of them were taken over by the Canadian pension commission.

Mr. MacLAREN: Many of them have been absorbed.

Mr. GRAY: I am not concerned with how many were absorbed in other departments. How many were taken over by the Canadian pension commission?

Mr. MacLAREN: As regards the substaff?

Mr. GRAY: Yes.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am afraid I have not the figures for the personnel. For instance, there were registrars and various officers part of whom have been absorbed in the present commission, because it is larger than it was before and is doing more work than it used to do. It has therefore absorbed a considerable number of them, while the services of others were discontinued, but I have not the figures.

Mr. GRAY: I know the minister will be glad to give the committee, first, the number that were absorbed by the new Canadian pension commission; second, the number that were absorbed in other departments of the government, and, third, the number that were let out altogether.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be pleased to get that information.

Mr. GRAY: I should like to know what compensation, if any, was given or what arrangements for compensation were made as regards the old tribunal officers.

Mr. MacLAREN: That matter has not been definitely settled. I believe I can say that provision will be made in the estimates this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will that apply to the personnel of the old federal appeal board as well?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am speaking personally now, but I am speaking with some confidence, in saying that the estimates will contain provision for both the federal appeal board and the members of the tribunal. As a matter of fact I made an announcement in the press, I think in September last year, intimating that this matter was being favourably considered by the government.

Mr. GRAY: Before I deal with any criticism that I may offer in connection with the personnel, may I follow up a conclusion on that particular point by asking what was the name of the reviewing officer appointed under the amendment to the Pension Act?

Mr. MacLAREN: Doctor Shields.

Mr. GRAY: What had he been employed at prior to his appointment as reviewing officer?

Mr. MacLAREN: Doctor Shields was a medical adviser to the board of pension commissioners from September 1, 1916, until his appointment last year as reviewing officer.

Mr. GRAY: How many cases has he reviewed since then?

Mr. MacLAREN: Eighty-seven.

Mr. GRAY: In how many of those has the minister advised an appeal?

Mr. MacLAREN: Ten cases have been appealed by the reviewing officer.

Mr. GRAY: I think if we had had some of that consideration on the part of the old pension tribunal, if the percentage had been more like that, we would not have had so much difficulty.

I wish now to go back to the personnel of the Canadian pension commission. It has been stated that one only of the members of the old tribunal was absorbed into that commission, namely Sir Richard Turner, V.C. Although it may be well known, I should like to have placed on record by the minister the names of the other seven commissioners, and the positions they occupied prior to their appointment to the new commission.

Mr. MacLAREN: First there is the chairman, Colonel John Thompson, who had been chairman of the pension board since I think 1920 or thereabouts, and was reappointed some years ago. Then there are Doctor Ellis, for a number of years formerly of the pension board—I am sorry I have not the exact dates; Doctor Kee, who was for many years the chief medical adviser of the board; Doctor Gray, who had been a member of the pension board for one or two years, and who had formerly been a medical representative for a number of years both in Calgary and in Vancouver; Sir Richard Turner, who had been a member of the pension tribunal for three years; Doctor Lionel Robert, who was a medical officer with the Department of Justice from 1921 to November, 1929, when he was appointed a medical examiner at Montreal to the board of pension commissioners; Mr. Conn, who for some years was a commission counsel in Toronto; Mr. Stephen Jones, who was a departmental agent. He served overseas in an infantry regiment and subsequently in the Canadian army medical corps.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister explain what he means by a departmental agent?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not know exactly what it means. I thought it was more or less a technical term.

Mr. GRAY: I thank the minister for the information he has given. It illustrates what has been said already, not only in this house but throughout the country, by the returned men, that after some fifteen years of struggle to have this matter dealt with fairly and with due regard to the interests of the soldiers, after having had it investigated by royal commissions and parliamentary committees, largely upon the complaints of the returned men as to the operation of the board of pension commissioners, they have been delivered back, as I think the past president of the Canadian legion expressed it, into the bondage of that commission. I dwell on this at the risk of wearying the committee, although the matter is so important that I do not think that we should pass over it lightly, especially in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has suggested that there might even yet be brought down this session amending legislation with respect to another matter, so that perhaps something could still be done with respect to this one, which surely must have been brought to the minister's attention.

It has been said in the house—I heard it said to-night—that the committee of last year, certainly members on this side who have spoken, felt that in the creation of the new Canadian pension commission there would be what has been termed a merger of the board and the tribunals. Bearing out what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and others, I would like to place on record what was said by the past president of the Canadian legion, Major Roper, at its recent session in Ottawa on March 12 to 15, 1934. I propose to quote only parts of his speech, but it is important that the house and the country should know the feeling of the Canadian Legion as interpreted by the past president and heartily endorsed by the legion at the closing session of that convention. He said:

It was our distinct understanding, and, I am convinced, the understanding of all members of the committee, that the principle of merger between the tribunal and the pension board would be followed and, in fact, it was for the purpose of placing tribunal members on an equal status with the members of the old board that equal tenure of office for all was decided upon;—

They were to be appointed for a term of seven years, and I ask the minister to note that they were all to be on an equal status.

—and it was for the purpose of providing for the retention of a substantial number of tribunal members that the number of commissioners was increased to provide for a maximum of twelve.

Then, turning to the appointments to the commission, Major Roper had this to say:

I now turn to the matter of the appointments to the new commission, which took place at the end of September, 1933, effective, as provided by statute, on October the 1st, 1933. I must make it clear, and it will be admitted by the authorities, that no effort in any way, shape or form was made by the legion to influence these appointments. We relied implicitly on the understanding reached at the parliamentary committee, to the effect that the principle of merger between the tribunal and the pension board would govern the appointments, and we relied upon the authorities to make the best selection from each body. We had let it be known that in our judgment the amount of work in sight would require the appointment of the maximum number provided for, namely, twelve commissioners.

It was with the utmost astonishment and I say frankly, dismay, that we learned from the press that of the eight members appointed to the new commission (the minimum provided for), five were of the old board of pension commissioners and its staff; one was a former commission counsel; another was a newcomer to pension administration; and one member and one only had been a member of the former pension tribunal, namely one of our dominion honorary presidents, General Sir Richard Turner, V.C. Not only had the principle of merger, agreed upon with the parliamentary committee, not been carried out, but of even greater significance to ex-service men, the new commission had been placed almost entirely under the domination of the old pension board.

This action, coming immediately on top of the other disturbing happenings to which I have referred, brought about a state of mind throughout the entire legion and amongst ex-service men generally that I can only describe as chaotic. The soldier felt that here was proof of what he had already begun seriously to suspect, namely, that powerful influences were using all the means in their power to his detriment. The immediate reaction was one of intense resentment, accompanied by strong evidence of lack of confidence in legion officers, the first and perhaps natural conclusion being that these appointments would not have been made without the concurrence of legion officers. I am thankful that we were fully able to dispel this impression; but in the meantime the legion became seriously threatened with nation-wide disruption. Fuel was added to the flames by the announcement of the appointment of the chief reviewing officer, as provided under the act, the appointee being another member of the staff of the old pension board, making a total of seven out of nine. Storms of protest from coast to coast rolled in upon dominion headquarters. Explanations were of no avail, or at least could give little satisfaction. I, as your dominion president, sensing that the very existence of the legion was in grave jeopardy, after consultation with available dominion officers, and in accordance with a resolution passed by dominion executive council in January, 1933, decided to announce the holding of a dominion convention, to take place early in 1934. British Columbia, to whom the next convention had been pledged, unselfishly relinquished its claim, in order that the convention might meet in Ottawa, the seat of government and it is to deal with these issues we are here to-day.

Further he said:

At this point let me say that upon the appointments being announced, feeling that it was my duty to make a public statement, I ventured the opinion that the appointments would not prove satisfactory to ex-service men, a statement which I thought mild and conservative, and I asked that the new commission should be given a fair trial before being judged adversely. Later, when the appointment of the reviewing officer was announced, I stated further that this but completed the delivery of ex-service men into the bondage of the pension board.

While we on this side of the house always have been kindly disposed towards the minister, and have appreciated his work with regard to ex-soldiers, at this time I cannot help but express my keen disappointment in the appointments that have been made. I feel that the minister himself, upon whom the responsibility must be placed, has failed the ex-service men in this regard. I hope there may still be some way out, but in the meantime I say without hesitation that the minister, knowing as he must have known what had been the cause of trouble from the time a commission was first established, appointed the old commission with the exception of two men, and, as Major Roper has said, and I think rightly, the soldiers were sold back into the bondage of the old pension board.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the hon. member made the speech to which we have just listened. There were many members of this parliament looking after the interests of the soldiers before the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat became a member of this house, and I am convinced that after we have all departed there will be gentlemen here quite capable of looking after them and anxious to do so. No matter what may be the hon. member's opinion of the persons who were appointed to these positions, I think it is most unfair to prejudge them and their work and make inflammatory speeches of this kind before we know what kind of service they are going to give. I say frankly that in my opinion such speeches will not result in any benefit to the returned soldiers. I have been on many committees and commissions dealing with this question, but I never heard such an inflammatory speech delivered in this house.

The hon. gentleman quoted Major Roper, who made a speech which to my mind he should not have made. It is nothing but common justice to allow these courts to function so that we may see what kind of service they will give. If they are not fair in their work, parliament is big enough, and I think independent enough, to make the necessary changes. We have done so before, and I have no doubt we will do so again. The personnel of these different commissions has changed greatly in the last twelve or thirteen years. At one time we had only the board of pension commissioners. Their work became very unsatisfactory, and I am sure I am correct when I say that the first suggestion of an appeal court was made by the late Mr. Hume Cronyn, at one time a member of this house from the city of London. For quite a long time that suggestion was opposed, but finally it was adopted. The change did not prove as satisfactory as had been expected by hon. members of the house. Matters went on for some years and the courts became clogged with cases. Those who took an interest in this work at that time will remember that the board had to try to make decisions not after a study of weeks, days, hours, or even minutes; the pressure of work was so great that they had to decide cases practically in seconds. They could not do the impossible.

Then came the tribunals. That legislation was drawn up originally by the soldiers themselves at a convention held in Regina, but it was not so presented to this house. It was presented to the house as a partisan measure, and hon. gentlemen tried to capitalize on it not only in the house but in the country as well. That change was adopted by the house. It was adopted also in the committee, but not without some objection, because I for one had grave misgivings as to its workability. We adopted it, however, because of the fact that it was what the soldiers wanted. It did not go as far as I thought it should go, and when my hon. friend's leader was in power I had the distinction of being the only person to whose private resolution closure was applied. Closure was applied to a resolution that I brought in reversing the onus of proof. It never even got to a vote; closure was put on and it was sent to the committee. So far as I could judge, the personnel of the tribunals was satisfactory to the returned soldiers. Personally I was disappointed, and I think it was a mistake, that more of them were not reappointed, not because others could not do the work, but because at last we had found a tribunal in which the soldiers had confidence. I think all hon. members will agree that the machinery had become hopelessly clogged. A couple of years ago I made some remarks in this connection and I believe at that time in one court or another there were about 30,000 cases waiting to be heard. The clogging of that machinery led to an overhauling of it. I always thought the government made a mistake when the commission was appointed; I think all governments make mistakes when they place such matters outside their own power. Half were appointed by the returned soldiers and the other half by the staff of the department. It is a mistake for any government to put itself into the hands of a committee over which they have no control. When you put responsibility upon anybody you must also give him power; that goes without saying. The machinery was overloaded, and for the present we have another system of courts.

Whether we like it or not, I think in the last analysis we must admit that the government is responsible and that it must take the responsibility for the personnel appointed. Whether they have made a mistake or not I cannot say, nor do I think anybody else can; but I think it is only fair to these men that at least they should have reasonable time within which to prove their adaptability and their ability to handle matters placed before them. I have said before, the worst thing which could happen returned soldiers in this country is to have their case get into politics. If it were made a political question the country would be split in two, with half the people on one side and the other half on the other.

Returned soldiers can go only so far and get only such elements of justice as public opinion in Canada will support. I say to them to-night, as I have said to them before, that they should keep their demands within reasonable bounds of justice, because I am certain that parliament has always been willing to grant such demands. The country has taken the same position. But in the course of time conditions must be modified, and, as I have stated to returned soldiers, there is to-day a large army of young men and women about twenty-eight, thirty or thirty-two years of age who were not old enough to go to war; if they were only fifteen years of age when the war ended they are over thirty to-day. By act of parliament those people are to a large extent debarred from entering the service of their country, and the time is coming when, to my mind, we may have to recognize that fact. We cannot blame these young men and women for not participating in the great war when, as a matter of fact, during the period of the war they were mere children or young people in their teens. Neither can we forever keep them debarred from the service of their country. Everybody knows that when there is a vacancy in the public service and a returned soldier is available who can show that he has the minimum legal qualifications, he automatically is given preference over seventy-five or a hundred others who are debarred, not through lack of service or ability, but because in a time of distress they were not old enough to serve their country.

I believe we should give the courts time to prove what they can do; we should not damn them before they begin their work. As I have said, I would have been much better pleased if more of the tribunal members had been reappointed. When they deserted their callings and accepted positions on tribunals in the expectation that they would have a reasonable tenure of office of eight or ten years, it was hardly fair to cut them off with a service of two or three years. But at the same time we should be big enough and fair enough to give the new appointees time to prove whether or not they can dispense that element of justice which the people of Canada are willing and anxious should be given to returned men.

I must say I am disappointed that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) has on this occasion spoken as he did. I was disappointed when Major Roper, standing at the head of the legion, made the inflammatory speech with which he is credited. A year hence such statements might have been all right, or might not; certainly in my opinion this was not the proper time to make them. Criticisms of that kind are detrimental to the interests of returned men, and that is practically all I am interested in. I believe that the people who went to France, placed their lives upon the altar of their country and came back to Canada crippled in body or in mind, have a right to recompense. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the law of Canada does not give a man anything as a pension for service. It never did give anything for that, and it is for that reason I have always opposed making deductions from pensioners. The law is such that if a man went overseas and came back minus an arm the country says to him, "We will give you in money what we believe to be equivalent to your physical loss brought about through service to your country," To those who contracted tubercular trouble while on service the same applies. For that reason I believe those people stand on a basis different from that of others who are drawing pensions or pay from the government of Canada. I believe their interests can be left to the care of hon. members from all sections of the house, and if the courts which are now dealing with the matter fail in their task, there are members in this House of Commons independent enough to see to it that legislation is brought in which will restore to the people affected any right which they have been denied.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) was altogether fair to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray). I am sure it must be a matter of some satisfaction to the hon. member for West Lambton to hear the sentiments which he expressed stated, possibly in milder tones, but, knowing the earnestness of the disposition of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I would take it that he was just as sincere as was the hon. member for West Lambton, but the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I am sorry to say, is the first one to have interjected partisanship into this discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. RALSTON: I am in the judgment of the committee. We have been getting along pretty well in connection with this subject, and his was the first suggestion I have heard of partisanship. I do want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in support of what has been said in regard to the old tribunal. Like my hon. friends I was very much disappointed that the services of the members of the old tribunal were not availed of for appointment to the new commission. Nobody has suggested that it was because of political reasons. It seems to me that it would have been well to take into the service those who had had experience in the field in connection with that work.

There is a feeling abroad, and this is the impression that I rose to correct, that the tribunals were too favourable to the soldiers.

In that connection I want to refer to a letter that was written by Mr. Scammell, the secretary of the department, on January 10, 1934, giving figures with regard to the work done by the tribunals. I want to indicate from these figures that the tribunals certainly could not be charged with being unduly favourable to the ex-service men, and on the other hand it will be found that their judgment has been well upheld by the appeal court. Let me give the figures.

Out of a total number of 10,438 cases dealt with by the tribunals, 6,593 were decided unfavourably to the soldier and 3,845 favourably to the soldier. Of these 3,845 decisions favourable to the applicant, 899 were not appealed. That left 2,946 as the total number of tribunal decisions favourable to the applicant appealed by commission counsel. Of these, 488 had not been heard by the appeal court on January 10, 1934. I deduct those, and it leaves 2,458 cases heard by the appeal court, and in 906 of these cases the tribunals' decisions were upheld; 342 cases were remitted for rehearing, and in the remainder of the cases the decisions were reversed.

Here is the summary: Tribunal cases decided in favour of the applicant, 3,845; appealed to but not heard by the appeal court, 488; leaving 3,357 cases, and of that 3,357, 342 cases were sent back for rehearing, leaving 3,015 cases actually disposed of by the appeal court or not appealed from. The net result of those 3,015 cases which the tribunal decided favourably to the applicant is that 899 cases were not appealed, and in 906 cases in which an appeal was made the tribunal's decision was upheld. So that in 1,805 out of 3,015 cases, or an average of over 60 per cent, the decisions of the tribunal in favour of the applicant stood. I think that those figures should be put on record in justice to the tribunal and for the benefit of those—there are not so many of them in the house—in the country who feel that the tribunals decided too favourably to the soldiers. In the first place they decided 6,500 out of 10,400 cases against the soldier, and of the 3,105 cases that they decided favourably to the soldier 1,805 were upheld by the appeal court or were not appealed from. So it seems to me that there is some justification for the feeling that it would have been advisable to appoint some of the tribunal to the new pension commission. Of course we are going to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario that the new men be given a chance to make good. But it is going to be somewhat difficult for them, no doubt, on account of their lack of experience in dealing with cases in direct contact with the applicants throughout the country.

One thing more in regard to what my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario has said. He said that the tribunal system worked badly because it was too much clogged. I have never felt that the tribunal system should be blamed for that, because there was one thing that clogged it, and that was an act of this parliament which provided that there should be an automatic reference to the tribunal of every case decided unfavourably to the soldier, with the result that the tribunal got piled up with cases put on their doorstep by statute. We amended the act a year ago and provided that those cases should not go from the board to the tribunal unless the applicant expressly asked for it, with the result that a different situation exists to-day. Both the tribunal and the pensions advocates, did remarkably well to clean up as many as 10,000 cases which were dealt with by the tribunal, in view of the immense accumulation of work ahead of them. They were new men with a lot to learn, but they did their work expeditiously and well, and they should not be blamed for the damming back of cases with which they were flooded. The new commission will not have that situation to meet, because the soldier himself must say whether or not he wants his case to be proceeded with further.

I do not know that I have anything to add except to pay a tribute, as I think tributes should be paid—and not too many have been paid—to the work of the tribunals which certainly laid the ground for confidence among the soldiers from the fact that they had an opportunity to meet in person the men who were going to decide their cases. I think that that did a lot to allay the discontent and dissatisfaction which existed when men simply made a report to a medical examiner, saw their papers sent away, and in two or three or four weeks the soldier got an adverse decision without a chance to tell his story. The tribunal system was in advance of the system of deciding cases without meeting the applicant face to face, and the present commission will continue this idea, which is germane and fundamental to any humane and satisfactory administration of pension matters, by travelling around the country hearing cases in the field.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a letter that I received from one of the commissioners dealing with the interpretation of section 12 of the Pension Act. I shall not place the name on Hansard, but I will read the second part of the letter:

This man died from aortic aneurysm, the result of specific infection. The initial infection, according to his military documents, was incurred prior to his enlistment, but the resulting condition was aggravated during his service, and as he had service in France, under section 12 of the Pension Act he received during his lifetime pension for aggravation at the amount of his total disability.

He died in February, 1932, following which the relationship of his death to his military service was considered by the commissioners, and in accordance with an interpretation of section 12 of the Pension Act handed down by the Justice department, the commissioners ruled that the man's death had been caused by the aggravation during his service. The dependent widow was accordingly awarded pension.

In June, 1933, however, the pension appeal court gave a ruling regarding the interpretation of section 12, namely, that no pension could be awarded to the dependents of ex-soldiers who had died from specific infection, whether incurred prior to enlistment and aggravated during service, or incurred during service, and accordingly the pensions of all widows and dependents in cases of death from preenlistment specific infection were discontinued. In this particular case the discontinuance of pension was effective from October, 1933.

In view of this interpretation of section 12 of the Pension Act by the pension appeal court, the commissioners had no alternative but to take the action which was taken in this case, namely to discontinue this widow's pension.

I presume the action taken by the appeal court in that case was under the powers given to them by this house in section 65 of the act of last year, subsection (c), by which they have power in regard to "any question of interpretation of this act which may be referred by the crown or, by leave of the court, submitted by any applicant; and the procedure on such reference shall be as prescribed by the court."

I also recall that the royal commission of 1923, in regard to section 12, made a very strong and specific recommendation, that the discretion to award pensions should be exercised with regard to dependents, even where misconduct was on service. And this is a case, like many others, of pre-enlistment misconduct, widows being deprived of pension so many years after the war, notwithstanding that the royal commission recommended the exercise of discretion, and the Department of Justice having construed section 12 of the act as containing that discretion. This being so, it is unfortunate that the appeal court in their wisdom should have interpreted section 12 as they have done, thereby bringing about the cessation of many pensions, without the pensioners concerned knowing the exact cause of such cessation.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand that one of the class of cases referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is now coming before the appeal court again, and the matter has not been lost sight of by any means. At the present time it is more or less under review.

I have found the information asked for by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray). He is not in the chamber, but the information will be taken down and he will see it in Hansard. The question was with reference to the distribution of staff under the 1933 amendments to the act, so far as the pension tribunal is concerned. There were retained by the Department of Pensions and National Health 20 permanent officials and substaff; there were retained by the Canadian pension commission 20 permanent and 9 temporary; transferred to the Department of Finance, 3 permanent; retired by the Canadian pension commission, 19 permanent and 2 temporary. This makes a total of 62 permanent and 11 temporary.

Now I would say a word about the personnel of the pension commission. As I have already said in the house, I knew of no such arrangement as was given out by the previous president of the legion; I had no knowledge of it and have no knowledge of it now. And that has been so with two members of the commission who happened to mention it to me. I do not know how the misapprehension came about; all I know is that so far as I am concerned, I had no knowledge of it.

As regards the appointment, I am quite aware that there has been much criticism over the appointment of the personnel, although I must say I did not anticipate the amount of criticism that has occurred. This can be said of the personnel of the commission, that on the whole, and as regards a very large percentage of them, they are greatly experienced men in pension matters. We could hardly have selected as members of the commission men who had had more experience in matters of pension. I can say this as well, that they are most industrious; and as regards the number of cases to be heard, and the promptness with which matters are dealt with, the situation has never been so good as it is. I believe it will not be many months before such things as long waiting will have passed. Apart from the commission, about which there is a difference of opinion, I cannot understand anyone having an objection to the reviewing officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): None was taken.

Mr. MacLAREN: I believe there was.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; I do not think there was any objection.

Mr. MacLAREN: Not by any member of the house, but, I gathered, from an article that was read. However, I am glad to hear that there is no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that as a matter of fact he was commended on the percentage of appeals; that was my understanding.

Mr. MacLAREN: The hon. member for West Lambton made no comment whatever; he simply read the article. But what does the reviewing officer do? He reviews decisions and decides which should properly be taken to appeal; but that does not interfere with the returned man, because every returned man has the right to appeal. So that regardless of the reviewing officer the returned man is not interfered with; at most it can only mean a delay in the award as a result of the time taken in appeal. But why was it that Doctor Shields was selected as reviewing officer? It was because he had spent years in reading files and making reports thereon and was able to pick out the outstanding features in the files. An ordinary man cannot do that. He was a man specially trained for that work, and really it is difficult to see what objection can be made to his qualifications.

I do feel this, and I think it is only just for me to say so, that so far as individual cases go—and I am not referring to technical or legal questions—as regards fairness and integrity as well as from the point of view of freedom from influence, I really do believe that the present pension commission can merit our full confidence. It is important, especially in the country, to have that confidence. I do not think, so far as fair and honest dealing is concerned, that the men need be apprehensive of the members of the pension court. I say this again, with a good deal of comfort, that all vexatious delays—and they were vexatious and long—are being obviated, and I can see that in the near future cases will be dealt with, decided and disposed of within a reasonable time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am sure the committee welcomes the predictions and assurances given by the minister in regard to the acceleration of cases still awaiting decision.

May I now direct the hon. gentleman's attention to certain cases I brought up for discussion in the estimates a year ago. These are the so-called disputed cases. The case I used last year by way of illustration of all these cases was the well known Skitch case. The minister may recall that last year I took a certain stand in regard to the board of pension commissioners, as it was at that time, implementing the former decision of the federal appeal board. Since that time this case has gone through the various stages of appeal from the board of pension commissioners through the pension tribunal to the appeal court. I should like to put on record, in vindication of the attitude I took last year in regard to this case, some extracts from the judgments of the present appeal court. I think the judgments in all cases are exceedingly able. Mr. Justice Hyndman, president of the court, has this to say:

> The former federal appeal board, as above referred to, decided that death was attributable to service, upon which decision, however, the commission refused to act, although it had been declared in a judgment of the exchequer court, that the federal appeal board had jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim. I have never been able to understand just why this decision was not given effect. In view, however, of the decision which I have come to on the merits of the claim, I find it is not necessary to deal with the legal aspect of the case which was presented before us, namely, the motion for a decision of this court that the federal appeal board decision was valid and binding and that therefore entitlement must be granted.

Next I shall give some extracts from the judgment of Mr. Justice Taylor, who says:

> I would assume that some question had been raised as to the jurisdiction of the federal appeal board, but just what that question was is not quite clear. However, one would think that the decision of the Exchequer court would have settled the matter and left no excuse whatever for further postponing payment to the applicant with respect to her own claim and that of her child. Still, however, payment was refused. Then the pension board suggested that she should renew her application under the new legislation which had then only recently been passed permitting any case disposed of by the federal appeal board to be renewed.
> The applicant did apply to have her application renewed. Why she did so is hard to understand. It seems unfortunate that appropriate proceedings were not taken at that time to enforce the decision of the federal appeal board instead of renewing the application.

I want to lay particular stress upon these words of Mr. Justice Taylor:

As matters stand now, the applicant has been deprived for over seven years of the money she should have received at that time. In an ordinary court the other side would be made to compensate her for delay of this kind, at least by payment of interest.

In addition to being deprived of the use of the money the applicant has been put to a great deal of expense since obtaining the favourable decision of the federal appeal board. We have no information as to what that would amount to. If, even now, she is to be fully compensated, she should receive some consideration in this respect as well.

This court, of course, has no jurisdiction to order the payment of interest or expenses of an applicant but it is certainly a case in which, under similar circumstances, that would have been ordered in any other court having jurisdiction. All we can do, therefore, is to pass this suggestion on to the Canadian pension commission in the hope that they may find some way of making her some compensation to take care of these items.

Then the third distinguished member of the court in his judgment says:

According to this judgment we therefore have a decision of the federal appeal board which was binding on the applicant and upon the commission. It would appear, nevertheless, that the commission did not see fit to implement this decision of the board and thereby forced the applicant to seek redress from the pension tribunal. This she did through her solicitor, Mr. C. B. Reilly, K.C., who, however, did so without prejudice to the applicant's right under the federal appeal board judgment.

At the hearing before the tribunal there was submitted the decision of the federal appeal board allowing the applicant's claim and also judgment of the Exchequer court declaring that the federal appeal board, as it existed on 3rd August, 1926, or on the date of the reference, had jurisdiction to entertain and determine the applicant's appeal from the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners. This judgment of the federal appeal board was sufficient, in my opinion, to establish the applicant's claim and stop the commission from attacking the validity of that decision as it sought to do through the evidence of Doctors Klotz, Goldie and Graham by endeavouring to establish that the death of the deceased was not due to military service—section 10 of chapter 60, 14-15 George V, in my opinion, having no bearing in the matter in respect to death claims.

I can see no justification for the Board of Pension Commissioners' action in refusing to implement the federal appeal board's decision; the ground upon which they base their refusal sems to me to be too technical to obtain in pension matters.

If it were within the powers of this court I would allow cost to the applicant. I regret that it is not within my powers to do so but I concur with pleasure with His Lordship the President, whose reasons I have had the privilege of reading, in allowing this appeal.

As a result of that unanimous decision of the appeal court the orphan was awarded a pension amounting to $3,015.36. Immediately the Canadian pension commission deducted from that the sum of $1,429.36, which amount had been given to the mother by the patriotic fund, despite the observations which were made by all three judges of the appeal court in regard to the situation. May I say further that the commission have refused in this case to pay a pension to the widow despite the recent judgment of the pension appeal court which I have read and they have written that the matter is to be "referred to the Department of Justice for consideration as the marriage appears to have been contracted subsequently to the appearance of the injury or disease causing death." So the widow is still awaiting the judgment of the Department of Justice. Meanwhile the amounts paid her by the patriotic fund have been deducted from the pension that properly belongs to the orphan and, in my opinion, to the orphan alone.

The question I am now coming to is this: Last year there were six cases known as the disputed cases. According to the observations of Mr. Justice Taylor and the other members of the appeal court, those payments which were found to be properly due by the old federal appeal board were not paid immediately by the Canadian pension commission, thus compelling the applicant in each case to commence new proceedings through the old board, the pension tribunal to the appeal court or now through the Canadian pension commission to the appeal court. I am asking the minister whether he can give me to-night any information as to what action the pension commission can take with respect to implementing the judgment and the observations of the three distinguished members of the appeal court in regard to those other cases apart from the Skitch case which I brought up last year.

Mr. MacLAREN: Those other cases were not dealt with. I have not the details before me, but it occurs to me that one or two of them were withdrawn, although I cannot be accurate as to the details. I believe this is the only case that was finally determined.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was the only case that was determined by going through the ordinary procedure of pension appeals. I would point out that Mr. Justice Taylor stressed the fact that a second appeal should not have been launched at all and that those payments found to be due under the old federal appeal board system should have been immediately paid by the Canadian pension commission. That is the finding of the appeal court at the present moment, yet it may be necessary, despite this judgment of the appeal court, for the other applicants once again to launch their applications and appeals. If the minister will be good enough to look into the situation, I think he should emphasize the point that the Canadian pension commission to-day should act upon the recommendation of the distinguished members of the appeal court. I believe the decision was given only a month ago, February 28.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be pleased to make inquiries, but as this communication has gone to the Department of Justice on some point about the payment of pension—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is an entirely different point, I may tell the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to wait to hear what the view of the Department of Justice is in regard to that matter. As to the question of the patriotic fund, I do not know anything about that. I do not see why that payment should count, but the commission appear to think it does. I shall be pleased to look into the matter and give the information as soon as it is available.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister will realize that there are two points to be considered: first the question of payment of pension to the widow, and, second, the question of paying pension to the other disputed cases, along the lines recommended by the members of the appeal court on February 28.

Mr. MacLAREN: I must say the case is an extremely unfortunate one, going from pillar to post; I cannot help thinking that there were several factors that were blameworthy. Whether it was a case of obstinacy or what, I do not know, nor do I know why it should have gone on to this time. Now I think some decision seems to be in sight.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have no desire to prolong the consideration of the estimates, as the ground has been pretty well covered to-night, but I should like to make one or two observations. I deplore the tone of the speech made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) to-night—I see he is not in his seat now. I was a member of the special committee on pensions in 1928 and again last year, I have always taken considerable interest in the matter of pensions, but when the Liberal party were in power and since they have been in opposition, and I have never seen an instance of a member on either side of the house attempting to play politics in connection with pensions for ex-service men. If there is one question that comes up for discussion here from time to time in connection with which I can say that politics have not been played, it is this question of pensions. But I am of the opinion that amendements to the Pension Act should be brought down by the government this session. In that regard there is one point I want to clear up, and may I say first that it is not done in any critical way or with the intention of casting any reflection at all upon the minister. On February 6 last, on the orders of the day, I addressed a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The question was, as reported at page 332 of Hansard:

I would ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) if it is the intention of the government at this session to introduce any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act?

The reply of the minister was:

The question is under consideration at the present time.

On February 6 last the minister, speaking for the government, said that the question of amendments to the Pension Act was under consideration.

On March 19 I again addressed a question to the minister as follows:

Mr. Speaker, about three weeks ago I directed a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). The question was this: Is it the intention of the government this session to bring down any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act. The reply of the minister at that time was that the matter was under consideration. Has he any further information to give to the house.

The minister's reply was:

The answer is in the negative.

I did not hear the minister very well when he made that answer, but on looking it up in Hansard the next morning I saw that the answer was ambiguous, so on March 20, on the orders of the day, I again directed a question to the minister, as reported at page 1784 of Hansard:

Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren). The question was one I had asked previously, namely, on February 6, last. When the minister replied yesterday I was unable to hear him. The answer I saw in Hansard this morning is ambiguous, and does not convey anything. I shall put the question to nim again. Is it the intention of the government this session to bring down any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act?

Hon. Murray MacLaren (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My answer is very similar to the one I gave yesterday: The government has not considered the subject.

The answer on February 6 was that the matter was under consideration by the government; the answer on March 20 was that the matter had not been considered. The minister went on further to say:

Yesterday the hon. member asked whether it was the intention of the government to bring down legislation, and I said the answer was in the negative. In other words, the government has not considered the subject.

I said to the minister:

If I may be permitted to say so, when I put the question to the minister on February 6, his answer was that the matter was under consideration.

The minister replied:

I shall have to look into the matter and see what the circumstances were. Probably the circumstances at that time were different from those obtaining to-day.

I should like the minister to be frank to-night, now that his estimates are under consideration, and tell the committee whether it is the intention of the government to bring down any amendment or amendments to the act. On February 6 he said the matter was under consideration; on March 19 he said the answer was in the negative, and on March 20 he said the matter had not been considered. I shall not ask the minister to give his reply until I get through with a few other observations I have to make, but I should like a frank answer. We are paying out a vast sum for pensions, in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000 a year; thousands of returned men are making applications, and there should be amendments to the Pension Act from year to year as need arises; for these reasons I think the minister should take the house and the country, and the returned men if you like, into his confidence and tell us what the intention of the government is. If he tells us that it is not intended to bring down any amendments, well and good, but let him be candid.

I wish to say a word or two about the tribunals. I was always of the opinion that the tribunals were, on the whole, doing fairly good work, and that perhaps they had not been tried out long enough. But after sitting with that committee for many days and going thoroughly into all the questions that came before it, I agreed with the majority of the committee that the amendments that they were to recommend on the whole would probably work out well. They have worked out well on the whole, but the act is still far from perfect. Canada has done well for her returned men; perhaps no country is doing better, nevertheless there are still many defects in the Pension Act, and amendments should be made from time to time. I agree with what some of my colleagues said to-night who were also members of the special committee, that it was the intention that some at least, as many as possible, of the personnel of the old tribunal should be absorbed into the new Canadian pension commission. Apparently that has not been done. I do not know that I have a great deal of criticism to offer in that connection, but I think it was understood by the members of this committee that this would be done. I do not know why only one member of the old tribunals was appointed to the new board.

There are one or two other matters, which are perhaps of minor importance, to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. I am not reflecting upon the new commission, but there does seem to be something wrong with their system. They have got into a rut; they have adopted an attitude, probably through the fault of the staff, whereby they seem to consider that most of the applicants for pensions are trying to get something from the government to which they are not entitled. Therefore they do not give the sympathetic attention to the cases that they should give. I might refer to the amendment that was made in 1928, I think, under which when there was any doubt as to whether or not the disability was due to war service, where that disability could not be traced directly to such war service, the returned man was to have the benefit of the doubt. I am afraid that has not worked out as it was expected to work out. I believe there are thousands of cases where it is impossible definitely to trace the disability to war service, and these men do not get the benefit of the doubt. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister for his earnest consideration.

Now I should like to refer to two cases I have in mind. I need not give the names of the men concerned, but they both live in the riding which I have the honour to represent in this house. In the one case the man went over with the first contingent and spent nearly four years in France, being demobilized in 1919. He was examined but, like thousands of other cases, the examination amounted to nothing at all. He wanted to get back into civil life; he wanted to get out of the army, and his examination did not amount to anything at all. He started to work; as time went on disabilities developed and he was on the sick list most of the time. He did not apply for a pension—this was his own fault—until about a year and a half ago, when his application went in. The matter dragged on; no decision was given. I can quite understand that it takes some time to review the evidence in thousands of pension cases and give decisions, but finally this man received a letter from the secretary of the board advising him that his application had been turned down. When do you think that letter arrived? He received it the day before Christmas; the letter was dated December 22. I put this to the minister, and I hope he will pass it on to his staff: There must be something wrong. I am sure it was not done intentionally, but surely when an application had been pending for a year and a half it might have been arranged to have the letter conveying the decision of the board reach the man at a time other than the day before Christmas. That man had not earned anything for over a year; he had been on charity, and then along came this letter from Ottawa notifying him that his application had been turned down.

That was one case, and there was another exactly similar case except that the letter came three days before Christmas. You may say this is a trivial matter to bring up in the House of Commons; I do not think it is. I believe the minister, who is kindly and sympathetic, will agree that this practice should be stopped, and I hope he will take the matter into his serious consideration. My colleague behind me suggests that it was a peculiar Christmas box. I will be perfectly frank and tell the minister what one of these men said to me. His words were, "That's a hell of a Christmas box to get from Ottawa."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SANDERSON: If my hon. friend from North Huron says it is out of order, Mr. Chairman, you may be sure that it is quite in order. I hope the minister will give that some thought at least.

Now I come back to the question whether we are going to have any amendment or amendments to the Pension Act this session. Will the minister be good enough to give the committee a definite answer, either yes or no?

Mr. MacLAREN: If my hon. friend who has just taken his seat will give me the numbers and names, privately, of those men to whom he referred, I will have the cases looked into.

Mr. SANDERSON: I shall be very glad to give the minister the information.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend has the virtue of persistence, which is a great thing in life. I believe I am acquiring something of a legal mind, because I do not see any real discrepancy between those two answers that I gave. After all, six weeks elapsed between the two questions, and if my hon. friend were to ask me again in six weeks my answer might be just as varied, because it would depend on the interval that had elapsed since the question was previously asked. Circumstances change. I am not joking now; I would be happy to give a frank answer and say yes or no if I could, but that is something I cannot do. All I can say is that when I can make that answer I will make haste to let my hon. friend know. I would prefer that the hon. member should not press that matter for the present, because it is impossible to say yes or no. The answer given the other day may have seemed to him to be a little involved, but it was a guarded answer and was within the bounds of accuracy. I think we might well let the matter stand.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am perfectly willing to let the matter stand if the minister is referring to the question whether or not any amendment or amendments will be brought down. But I want to put this question to the minister now: Can he tell the committee if the government is giving any consideration to the matter?

Sir EUGENE FISET: He is strong on consideration.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister was strong on consideration on February 28, but on March 19 he was off consideration.

Mr. MacLAREN: I might have become very weak by that time. One's condition of strength varies from time to time, according to circumstances. I shall do the best I can, but I am sure that I cannot give the hon. member an answer which would satisfy him at the present time. I shall be delighted to do it when I can.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister could easily give me an answer which would satisfy me.

Mr. RALSTON: All he has to do is to say yes, and you would be satisfied.

Mr. SANDERSON: If he would say yes, I should be satisfied, and if he would say no, we would know that the government was not going to bring down any amendment. Does the minister wish to leave the matter just where it is?

Mr. MacLAREN: I should prefer that.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well then, I shall have to accept the minister's answer, such as it is, and he will have to take the responsibility of not satisfying me. I have given him every opportunity and every chance, not only once, but for the second and third times. This is now the fourth time. While on the first, second and third occasions he wavered, on the fourth occasion he almost toppled over, and still he says nothing. I am perfectly willing to leave it at that.

Mr. REID: Before the item passes I should like to make one or two observations. While most of the discussion this evening has been about marriage licences, I have before me the particulars of a case which, although not quite within the category of the cases under discussion, is important enough to bring before the minister. This man has been separated from his wife for twenty-six years. Five years ago he married a woman who was also a pensioner, her husband, a returned man, having died, and she being in receipt of a pension. On her marriage to this man she lost the pension, but of course his allowance was increased owing to the fact that he had married. Upon inquiry it now turns out that he was not legally married to the woman he is now staying with.

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. REID: Having been separated some twenty-six years they say he is still legally married to the woman in England.

Mr. BENNETT: Is she living?

Mr. REID: I understand that she is. But the situation is this: He married the second time in good faith, and if he is not legally married, the woman, who, was originally a pensioner, should have her pension restored. The board should be consistent.

Mr. MacLAREN: Where does the matter stand? Is it now before the courts?

Mr. REID: No, the matter is not before the courts. They are deducting so much a month from this man, stating that during these five years he has been over paid, although at the time of his marriage to the woman with whom he is living he notified the board of the circumstances, and no objection was then taken.

Mr. MacLAREN: This case may have been restored; I cannot state definitely, as a matter of fact, but restoration may have been made, under the announcement made some time ago by the Prime Minister. If the hon. member will let me know the name I shall look into the matter.

Mr. REID: I made inquiries from the board of pension commissioners, and only a few days ago received a letter from the man in question in which he states he had not received pension. In making inquiries I was informed that this case would not come under the cases for discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: It clearly would not.

Mr. REID: If it would not it is an awkward position in which to be left. If she is not legally married to the man her pension should be restored. She is the wife of a returned man who had died, and before she married was in receipt of a pension. I believe this case is worthy of attention.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member say she has not had the pension restored to her, either?

Mr. REID: No she has not.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is quite sure of that?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot have it both ways; that is reasonably clear.

Mr. REID: I believe the case is important enough to bring before the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will give the minister the name.

Mr. REID: I shall do so privately; I have it before me.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the answer is that she is supposed to be living an immoral life.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I think that is nonsense; it is not fair.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) spoke about the benefit of the doubt clause, and I am wondering whether hon. members have really touched the crux of the matter as it was put to me by the returned men's organization before I came to Ottawa. I think there is a great deal of merit in their claim. Subsection (a) of section 11 states:

Pensions shall be awarded to or in respect of members of the forces who have suffered disability in accordance with the rates set out in schedule A of this act, and in respect of members of the forces who have died in accordance with the rates set out in schedule B of this act, when the injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death in respect of which the application for pension is made was attributable to or was incurred during such military service.

The word "incurred" is in clause (a), but when one comes to clause (c) hon. members will find that the word "incurred" has been left out. The returned men's organization which interviewed me maintained that the board of pension commissioners took no notice whatever of clause (a), but that they based their findings on clause (b), and if that is the case section 73, the benefit of the doubt clause, has no effect. That is evident, because in subsection (c) the word "attributable" is left out, the word "incurred" alone remaining, and a man has to prove hospitalization during the time he was in France or England before he is able to prove that the injury from which he is now suffering was incurred in service. At the time the act was drafted the words "attributable to" were put in so as to give a man the reasonable benefit of the doubt of injuries attributable to war service and from which he might be suffering to-day. I believe it is because this expression is left out of subsection (c) that there is a good deal of unrest and dissatisfaction from one end of the country to the other, especially on the part of those who have been turned down, due to the fact that they were not able to bring proof or to show in the records that they had incurred disability while serving either in France, in England, or with the forces.

I think these matters should be taken into consideration. If the minister is contemplating any changes in the act he would do well to look into the wording of subsection (a) and note that while in that subsection the words "attributable to" appear, they are left out of subsection (c), and there is just the word "incurred"; so that in dealing with section 73 the board has been looking only at subsection (c) and ignoring subsection (a). That is the crux of all the trouble and the dissatisfaction of many returned men who find themselves suffering from ailments attributable to war service.

While the cases in which the question of marriage is involved have been discussed, I have before me a complaint which is entirely different but which I believe should be mentioned. My understanding is that the act did not come into force until October 1 of last year. In the changes made last year there was provision under which any children born after May 1 would not be granted a pension or could not be registered. I have had several complaints from my own constituency about children born in the month of June. Apparently the board were acting ahead of time; at least they were acting before the law had been made operative by official notice. I think from the investigations I have made that we were perhaps a little to hasty last year when we enacted that legislation regarding children born after June 1, 1933. Many men who served at the front are still comparatively young men, and when that clause was put in we were, in a way, telling them that children they had in future would not be registered with the board of pension commissioners, nor would they receive any pension on their account. But cases that happened in June of last year should have been registered and should have received the small pension, at least until such time as the governor in council made the proclamation in October, 1933. I am sorry to have taken up the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, but these matters are very important.

Mr. MacLAREN: We have made a note of the hon. gentleman's point in reference to the drafting of that clause. Personally I think it is correct, but it is a difficult question, and if the hon. member would come to the department some time we could go into that fully.

Mr. REID: I shall be very pleased to do so.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is my duty to bring to the attention of the committee a case that I have brought up in two previous years.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will not proceed to-night, as the Minister of Labour desires to table some papers.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

INFORMATION AS TO EXPENDITURE, LOANS AND ADVANCES, ETC., TABLED BY MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked for certain information in connection with the resolution that was then being dealt with in committee, and with the consent of the house I desire to lay on the table auditor general's reports, twenty in number; also statements concerning expenditure by the federal government, by provinces, under the various relief acts since 1930; statements of loans and advances to provinces; numbers receiving relief by months, from January, 1933, to February, 1934, inclusive; also statement as to the number employed in trade unions.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) also asked that he be supplied with details of the work to which the federal government had subscribed in that constituency. The hon. member is not in his place just now, and I will lay that information on the table so that it will be available for him.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Monday, March 26, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table certified copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council approved by the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General on March 23, 1934, respecting the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of certain questions affecting the Tariff Board Act.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table the following documents:

Complete texts of orders in council which were passed during the recess of parliament and which were synopsized in the Canada Gazette;

Also sessional paper No. 84, being a memorandum of the auditor general with respect to the investigation of relief payments in the province of Saskatchewan;

Also a statement showing the number of refunds which have been made to the dominion government under the Relief Acts of 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933;

Also full texts of orders in council directing the auditor general with respect to audits of relief accounts.

[Mr. Gordon.]

All of this was asked for by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) on Thursday last.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RETURNED NATIVE-BORN CANADIANS

Mr. COTNAM:

How many native born Canadians returned to Canada to take up residence, during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 respectively?

Mr. GORDON:

The number of Canadian born persons, still British subjects returning to Canada from the United States, after having taken up residence in the United States, is as follows:

Fiscal year 1930-1931..	26,811
" " 1931-1932..	17,691
" " 1932-1933..	16,320
10 months ended January, 1934.	7,619

The following table shows the number of Canadian born persons returning from other countries than the United States, but the department is unable to show how many of these returned after having taken up residence abroad; it is thought that the number of such is very small and that practically the entire movement is made up of Canadians who have been visiting abroad:

Fiscal year 1930-1931..	13,989
" " 1931-1932..	11,020
" " 1932-1933..	11,796

MR. A. J. MORIN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Has Mr. A. J. Morin carried the mail to the post office of Pied du Lac, Boisvert, Les Etroits and Belanger siding, since 1930?

2. If so, from what date to what other date?

3. Is there a contract between the said Mr. Morin and the Post Office Department with respect to the carriage of the mail to such localities?

4. If so, what date does such contract bear and what sum was paid to the said Mr. Morin, to date?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.

2. From August 9, 1933, to November 20, 1933.

3. No.

4. Mr. Morin performed this service free of cost to the Post Office Department.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PROPOSED TAXATION OF LEAF TOBACCO

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Has the government received petitions asking that a tax of 20 cents per pound be levied on the sale of leaf tobacco?
2. If so, how many such petitions have been received?
3. How many persons in each province, made such a request?
4. How many persons, in each separate municipality, signed such petitions?
5. What manufacturers proposed or recommended the taxation of leaf tobacco?
6. What are the municipalities whose municipal councils may have approved, by way of resolutions, the proposal to tax leaf tobacco?
7. Has the government received petitions or resolutions from municipal councils protesting against such a proposal?
8. If so, how many?
9. How many persons, in each province, signed such petitions of protest?
10. How many persons, in each municipality, signed such petitions of protest?
11. What are the municipalities whose municipal councils may have protested, by way of resolutions, against the proposal to tax leaf tobacco?

Mr. RHODES: In asking that this question stand as an order for return I might indicate that it asks for a great deal of information of a character which hitherto has been regarded as confidential, namely, representations made to the government with respect to matters affecting tariff and taxation. I have no objection to its passing, but it must be understood that we must conform to the usual practice in this respect in bringing down the return.

PENSION COMMISSIONERS

Mr. ROSS:

1. How many sessions of quorums of the Canadian pension commission have been held since the appointment of the commission?
2. Where were these sessions held, and what members of the commission sat at each session?
3. How many cases were considered at each session and how many decisions favourable to applicants were given?

LAUZON, QUE., DRY DOCK CLERKSHIP

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the civil service commission advertise a vacant clerkship, grade 3, at the drydock at Lauzon, Quebec, in 1933?
2. If so, what persons applied for this position?
3. What was the rating of each such person?
4. Was an appointment made in connection with the filling of such position?
5. If so, who was appointed and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

RENTAL OF OFFICES IN HAMILTON

Mr. WILSON:

1. What offices are rented by the dominion government in the city of Hamilton?
2. Who owns these buildings?
3. From what agent or agency were they leased?
4. When and for how long were leases made?
5. What amount of rent is paid in each lease?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Return tabled herewith.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA EMPLOYEES

Mr. VALLANCE:

1. What are the names, ages, titles and addresses of all inspectors in the employment of the federal Department of Agriculture in Saskatchewan during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, showing which were permanent and which were temporary?
2. How many of such inspectors have had their services dispensed with in Saskatchewan since January 1, 1933?
3. What were the specific reasons of termination of services?
4. What are the names, ages and titles of all returned soldiers in the employment of the Department of Agriculture in Saskatchewan during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, and 1933?
5. What are the salaries of each?
6. What per cent of war pension did each receive, if any?
7. What are the names, ages and titles of those whose services were dispensed with during 1933?
8. How many inspectors have been engaged by the Department of Agriculture in Manitoba and Saskatchewan since 1929?
9. What are their names, addresses and official titles?
10. What are the names and addresses of such inspectors still in the employ of the Department of Agriculture?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DISMISSAL OF DR. L. R. MURRAY

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, orders in council and other documents, in connection with the dismissal of Dr. L. R. Murray, medical representative of the Department of Pensions and National Health at Sussex, New Brunswick, and the appointment of his successor.

RIVIÈRE AU RENARD, GASPE, WHARF

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all pay lists respecting works carried out at the wharf of Riviere au Renard, county of Gaspe, during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, and 1933.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Rhéaume):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and reports exchanged between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick, respecting the refund of federal contributions made by virtue of the Unemployment Relief Acts of 1930 and 1931.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Rhéaume):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and reports exchanged between the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia, respecting the refund of federal contributions made by virtue of the Unemployment Relief Acts of 1930 and 1931.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT—ONTARIO

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Rhéaume):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and reports exchanged between the federal government and the government of Ontario, respecting the refund of federal contributions made by virtue of the Unemployment Relief Acts of 1930 and 1931.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Rhéaume):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and reports exchanged between the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan, respecting the refund of federal contributions made by virtue of the Unemployment Relief Acts of 1930 and 1931.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF ACT—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Rhéaume):

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and reports exchanged between the federal government and the government of British Columbia, respecting the refund of federal contributions made by virtue of the Unemployment Relief Acts of 1930 and 1931.

LOANS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. PLUNKETT:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, orders in council or other correspondence, between the Prime Minister, Minister of Finance, Minister of Labour or the deputy ministers, and the Prime Minister of British Columbia or any other cabinet minister of the present government of British Columbia or their deputy ministers in reference to direct financial loans to the province of British Columbia and unemployment relief measures, with a complete statement of such loans and amounts paid or received in accordance with the last available returns.

SALE OF NICKEL TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce?

[Mr. Brasset.]

According to the morning papers the Sunday Express of London stated yesterday that the soviet trade organization had bought £1,000,000 worth of pure nickel. I would like to ask if we are resuming trade with soviet Russia via London; and further if the minister could inform us whether this nickel is going to arm soviet Russia or going into bathroom fixtures and other commercial purposes?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I presume that the hon. gentleman heard the other day in the debate on this subject most of the information he is seeking in the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not get the information. May I ask if the Minister of Trade and Commerce has no knowledge of this nickel deal?

Mr. STEVENS: Only what I read in the press.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman perhaps knows that sales of all Canadian metals are largely made, not in Canada at all but through metal brokers in Great Britain, to whom the metal in many instances is sold and who resell it. That is the reason we are not in a position to say what the final destination of many of our sales of metals and minerals may be. I assume that the hon. gentleman from his personal investigations has ascertained that, as I have. That reference made in the Express of yesterday, if it is accurately transmitted, may involve a well known firm making sales with which we have nothing to do; the nickel might have been bought and held by them in store for a substantial period of time.

CAIRO POSTAL CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I would like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister and to the members of this chamber generally the fact that although the Postmaster General has returned from an extended trip abroad the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is not in his seat to greet him.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Senate of the United States has declined to ratify the treaty providing for the joint construction of a St. Lawrence waterway is that treaty now null and void?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I made a statement on the matter the other day which is self-explanatory, and to which I have nothing to add.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I did not catch it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RUMOURED ABANDONMENT OF LINE BETWEEN HOPE AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Railways. A few days ago I asked him a question regarding the abandonment by the Canadian National Railways of the line from Hope to Vancouver. At that time he stated to me that he had no knowledge of any such abandonment. In view of a report which has just reached me that trackage is being constructed at the present time by the Canadian Pacific Railway with that end in view I would ask the minister if he would be good enough to inquire into this and bring a report.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Yes, I shall make inquiry, and answer the hon. gentleman to-morrow if possible.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That, it is expedient to bring in a measure to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to provide for a dominion marketing board, the remuneration of the members thereof and of assistants and employers, and to authorize payment to the board of such sums of money as may be necessary for the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I believe that at the close of the sitting on Friday last it was indicated that the first order of business would be the relief bill. But if it be convenient to take up order number 17 first it would enable the house to see the printed bill as soon as the first reading is given. As the bill is already printed it might be desirable to proceed in that way, without in any way lessening anybody's rights.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): If it will expedite matters the opposition is quite agreeable to have the house proceed in that order.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think this is an opportune time for the minister to give us details of what he intends to do under the proposed bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I feel that no purpose would be served by attempting to go into the details of the matter now, for no matter what interpretation I might give, hon. members when they have the bill before them, might wish to give another interpretation. Therefore I think it desirable that the matter be expedited so that the bill be placed before them for their own study and consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This matter of the establishment of a marketing board has been in the minister's mind now for over three years, and I have no doubt discussed quite fully by the government in council and so should be fairly well prepared for complete incubation by this time. I therefore do not feel like delaying it much, because there are farmer representatives here who have been waiting anxiously for the last two months to get a peep at this bill before they return home prior to the Easter recess. Therefore any delay on my part would be just aggravating the delay that has already occurred. I might however, point out that some explanation might be made as to what "natural products" includes. Does it include processed or semi-processed commodities? Does it include bacon, cheese and other products which strictly speaking are not natural products because they have been processed? If the marketing bill does not include these products it would be looked upon by many as quite incomplete. Two years ago, when the minister's estimates were up, I indicated that I was favourably disposed to the proposition of an export marketing board, and I am still of that opinion, but I think the minister might give us a little inkling of what is contained in the bill and its main principles. We do not know when the bill will be brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be introduced as soon as the resolution is through.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then perhaps I had better wait patiently for the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is usual in a matter of this kind for the minister to supply us with some information; otherwise this becomes a purely formal matter. We are not generally asked to accept a pig in a poke, to use an old phrase; we should have some intimation as to what really is the scope of this bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The bill is printed and it is intended to move the first reading as soon as the resolution is reported. Then hon. members will have the bill before them for consideration. The explanation of the bill itself is pretty well covered, in a general way, in the resolution. It has to do with the marketing of natural products. There have been many discussions in this house in connection with the marketing of natural products, and questions have been raised as to whether or not the farmer received a fair proportion of the price paid by the consumer. The question also has been raised as to the control of the rate at which products should go forward. It is the purpose of this bill to take what steps may be deemed advisable to make it possible, by cooperation with the trade and the producers, to have a greater proportion of the money spent by the consumer go to the producer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then may I ask one other question. Is it contemplated that this bill will dovetail with provincial bills that we may expect to have passed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to ask the minister the same question that was asked by the ex-Minister of Agriculture. This bill deals with natural products, such as wheat, cattle, pigs, sheep and so on, but does it deal with such things as flour, bran, shorts, bacon, ham, mutton, beef and articles partly processed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Natural products and those partially processed.

Mr. DONNELLY: It does not deal with butter and cheese?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The horticultural council passed a resolution in favour of setting up a dominion marketing board for fruit. I should like to ask the minister whether this is the board or whether a separate marketing board is to be set up for the marketing of fruit.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sure hon. members will agree that this will be best explained when the bill is introduced. Full consideration has been given the recommendations of the horticultural council in the drafting of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the intention to send the bill to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That still has to be decided.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that is done this will be our only opportunity to ask questions of the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; there will be ample opportunity for that even if the bill is sent to the committee.

Mr. DUFF: In view of the fact that this resolution mentions natural products I wonder if the minister can tell the committee whether fish and fish products will be included.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the minister should give a little further explanation as to the provisions of this bill. This measure is of vital importance to many sections of the dominion; in my constituency there is perhaps more interest shown in this legislation than in anything else to be brought down this session. I think the committee should be informed as to the general principles of the bill. It might be possible to set up a marketing board with very wide powers; it might have the power to curtail exports or perhaps to restrict production. Very important and far-reaching principles may be at stake.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Provision is made in the bill for cooperation with provincial and other boards that may be set up in accordance with the bill. Might I suggest once more that if hon. members would report this resolution the bill would be placed in their hands at once for consideration and study.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is the only time we will be in committee, and this is our only opportunity to ask questions of the minister in regard to the bill itself.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On the motion for second reading there will be ample opportunity to discuss the details of the bill.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask the minister if wheat is included in the products to be marketed under the proposed bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All agricultural products are included.

Mr. NEILL: The words used are "natural products." Would that cover fish and lumber?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to ask the minister if the members of this marketing board will be typically representative of agriculture in a national sense?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have no hesitation in saying that the members of the board will be chosen with regard to their qualifications to look after the interests of agriculture.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to ask the minister if this is the legislation under which the provincial measures are going to be made operative.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would suggest that the interpretation of the bill might better be left until the bill itself is before the house.

Mr. VALLANCE: I appreciate that the minister may not be as familiar with the procedure of this house as others may be, but this is the first intimation we have had as to this resolution on which the bill is to be based, and this is our first opportunity to discuss it. If the resolution is accepted probably the bill will be accepted, but I believe it would be possible to kill this legislation at this stage. How can we consider the matter intelligently unless we know something of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This morning there came to my hand a copy of the legislation being introduced in the legislature of Alberta. I just want to say to the minister that if his legislation is as drastic, with regard to the marketing of wheat, as are the proposals contained in the provincial bill, so far as I am concerned I intend to offer it pretty strenuous opposition. I quite appreciate the fact that the minister cannot at this stage tell us about the contents of the bill; to get that we will have to wait until the bill is introduced. But the proposals which have been introduced in the legislature of the province of Alberta are the most drastic that I have known to be introduced into any democratic legislature since I have been acquainted with public affairs. I wish to say only this, that if I were a member of the legislature instead of a member of the House of Commons I would oppose them with all the strength I possess. I trust this government is not going quite that far.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Is it any more drastic than the Special Powers Act introduced by Mr. Pattullo in British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will have to speak on his own behalf; I cannot say as to that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. VALLANCE: No; I should like to ask the minister the same question he was asked before: Under the bill will it be possible for us to discuss the whole of legislation pertaining to marketing, or the control of the production of wheat in the Dominion of Canada? In this regard I am like the hon. member for West Edmonton. I have in my office to-day a copy of a bill which either has been put through the legislature of Saskatchewan or is being contemplated, and I should like to know if the legislation now before us is to be simply concurring legislation to make the provincial measure operative?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member probably knows that the provinces have jurisdiction with respect to property and civil rights, and the question as to the quantity of wheat which may be grown is a matter to be dealt with by provincial legislatures. The bill which will be founded upon this resolution, dealing as it does with natural products, will of course afford opportunities if occasion arises, to deal with any question which may arise in connection with wheat.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has raised a question which I think might properly be discussed. The only reason the resolution is before the house at all is because it involved an expenditure of public moneys. I confess that when the new rules made it no longer necessary to introduce resolutions when dealing with matters of trade and commerce we thought possibly this measure might not require a resolution. But in view of the provision for the payment of officials out of public revenues it is quite clear that a resolution is necessary. I appreciate and sympathize with the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member. In moving his resolution the minister is not supposed to do more than to state the general purposes of the measure. On the introduction of his bill, when asked, as I understand the rules he should, he may give a succinct statement indicating the general purposes of the legislation, and the principles to be crystallized into legislative form. And in committee after the second reading there may be a full discussion of every detail. In the very nature of things the marketing bill is just what it says it is, it is a bill providing for regulations as to the marketing of natural products in the dominion. Details, of course, will have to be considered, and that can be done only when the house is in committee on the measure. The motion for second reading will involve the approval or the disapproval of the general principle indicated by the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with any measure which is introduced is it not customary for the government to advise hon. members at an early date as to whether or not the measure will be referred to one of the special standing committees of the house? That has been asked, and no reply has been made.

Mr. BENNETT: I might say to the right hon. gentleman that in recent years a practice has grown up which is wholly at variance with what was the custom in this house or is the custom in the British House of Commons. To refer measures to select standing committees was not done with respect to all the great measures passed between 1896 and 1911, 1911 and 1917, and from 1920 forward. From time immemorial the Bank Act has been referred to a special committee for reasons that are obvious. But general legislation, upon which the government has determined its policy, is usually submitted to a committee of the whole house. I know of no reason why this measure should not be dealt with by a committee of the whole house, so that questions may be asked by hon. members and answers given by the minister in charge. If there are any good reasons given why this practice should not be followed, then those reasons will have to be considered and a conclusion arrived at in an endeavour to suit the convenience of the house and the best interests of the country as affected by the legislation. At the moment I can see no reason why this measure should follow other than the ordinary course, namely to be considered by a committee of the whole house after it has received second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has answered the question asked as to the government's intention. That is all that was asked.

Mr. ILSLEY: I take it that it is the intention of the government to refer the measure to a committee of the whole house, and that is my opinion of what should be done. I understand also, however, from the Prime Minister's remarks, that on a resolution such as the present one the minister in charge ordinarily explains the principle of the bill. That is the only thing we are asking the Minister of Agriculture to do. As this is a matter of some interest to the part of Canada from which I came I have made some inquiries about marketing board legislation in other countries of the world, and the principles upon which marketing board acts, per se, are framed in other countries of the world. I expected the minister to tell the committee about those functions. For instance, will this marketing board have power to purchase surpluses? That is a very important power for such a board to have, and I may say that marketing boards in some other countries do have that power. Another question which might be asked is this: Will it have power to destroy surpluses, as is done in Brazil in connection with coffee.

Mr. BENNETT: And as has been done with pigs in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will this board have power directly or indirectly to restrict production? That is a question which will go to the very root of the principle of the bill, and one which is very important because there are people who do not believe in restriction of production, and there are others who take the opposite view. Will this board directly or indirectly have the power to fix domestic prices? I believe that if the minister would explain these matters to the committee, and tell us as to whether or not those principles are embodied in the legislation we would be fairly well satisfied at this stage.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that upon a moment's reflection the hon. member will agree that the questions he has asked are details in the application of a principle. Obviously one of the questions to be asked concerning the application of a principle is: Does the marketing measure provide for the distribution of surpluses? Further, does it provide for the restriction of production? Does it provide for the destruction of animals, such as was done in Denmark during the last few months, the ashes of which animals were used for fertilizer? Then, in the United States, there was a destruction of pigs. All these questions could be asked on the application of a principle. We may or we may not do those things. But supposing the answer were either yes or no, such answer would not have any effect upon the resolution. On the first reading of the proposed bill, having regard to its character, I understood the minister proposed to make a short statement as to the principle. Then the house, after having become seized of the whole measure would or would not give it second reading, would debate second reading, or would divide upon it and take such action with respect to it as is desirable.

Let us suppose there were no resolution at all; the only reason for the resolution is that of expenditure. Had there been no resolution, by this time leave to introduce the bill would have been granted, the bill would have been read the first time, after a statement had been made, and would stand for second reading. I can see no great reason in view of what has been said, why the details of the bill cannot be dealt with at the proper time. The principle must be considered when the measure is submitted for second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the bill is submitted to us, Mr. Chairman, I wish to put on record a few statistics in regard to the production, export and home consumption of certain products. They are as follows:

Production

1932 compared with 1930

	Quantity		Value
Tobacco	(pounds less)	447,199	$ 1,641,172*
Dried apples	(pounds less)	208,832	75,168*
Canned apples	(cases more)	238,479	489,530†
Canned pears	(cases more)	78,541	75,329*
Pickles and sauces	(gallons less)	839,950	1,417,753*
Unmanufactured leather			5,748,197*
Manufactured leather			12,570,690*
Canned tomatoes	(cases less)	1,906,283	4,781,095*
Vegetable oils in pounds	(pounds more)	9,257,179	149,807†
Vegetable oils in gallons	(gallons less)	1,678,343	3,310,329*
Fish products			21,847,107*
Unmanufactured wood			171,000,000*
Pulp			57,943,419*
Paper products			71,751,802*

*Less. †More.

It will be noted that there was an increased production in only two items, canned apples, and vegetable oils in pounds.

Now I wish to give a few figures comparing home consumption and exports in 1933 with 1930:

	Home consumption year 1932-33 compared with 1930-31 Increase	1933 exports compared with 1930 More
Tobacco (pounds)	2,217,477	$2,413,375
Canned pears (cases)	78,541	243,409
Pork meat* (pounds)	196,774,707	4,788,666
Butter† (pounds)	25,698,173	416,369

*The price of bacon and hams per hundredweight was $24 in 1930 as compared with $11 in 1933.

†The price of butter per pound was 30 cents in 1930 as compared with 17 cents in 1933. More.

In the preceding list it will be noted that in four items, tobacco, canned pears, pork meat, and butter, there was an increased home consumption. In the following items there was a decreased home consumption:

	Home consumption Year 1932-33 compared with 1930-31 Decrease	1933 exports compared with 1930
Apples..barrels	1,209,934	$2,050,494*
Honey..pounds	9,535,689	111,263*
Eggs (1)..dozen	45,959,763	352,507*
Dressed beef (2)..pounds	89,161,967	672,534†
Concentrated milk..pounds	48,990,807	851,093†
Cheese..pounds	7,548,392	5,130,401†
Peas..bushels	973,616	3,819†
Potatoes..hundredweight	2,284,769	5,504,758†
Oats..bushels	4,116,422	635,552*
Barley..bushels	30,140,741	225,488*
Wheat..bushels	55,146,394	63,373,340†
Wheat flour..barrels	1,689,000	18,523,737†

* More. † Less.

(1) The price of eggs in the shell, per dozen, was 37 cents in 1930 as compared with 21 cents in 1933.

(2) The price of dressed beef, per hundredweight, was $15.70 in 1930 as compared with $5.83 in 1933.

The commodities, therefore, of which there has been a decreased home consumption in 1933 as compared with 1930, are apples, honey, eggs, dressed beef, concentrated milk, cheese, peas, potatoes, oats, barley, wheat and wheat flour; and as to pork meat, beef, eggs and butter, the price in 1933 was greatly reduced as compared with 1930.

I wish now to give a list of exports of certain commodities for 1933 as compared with 1930:

Raw tobacco	$ 2,402,674*
Manufactured tobacco	10,701*
Fresh apples	2,050,494*
Dried apples	147,082†
Canned pears	243,409*
Honey	111,263*
Pickles and sauces	221,165*
Bacon and hams	4,788,666*
Eggs in shell	352,507*
Cattle	271,318*
Dressed beef	672,534†
Sheep, lambs and mutton	40,329†
Unmanufactured leather	1,485,006†
Manufactured leather	452,412†
Canned tomatoes	274,017*
Peas	3,819†

I should like to ask the government if something is to be done to preserve our local markets and to increase home consumption. According to the official figures which have not been contradicted and which have been on Hansard since February 13, the home consumption of some very important commodities which are produced by the farmers of this country has been decreasing rapidly. As the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) said some weeks ago, we will be faced with a famine if conditions do not improve. I should like to ask the government, first, if something is to be done to improve home markets and, second, if something is to be done to bring about the restoration of Canadian trade on the markets of the world.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has stated that he desires that this bill should be considered in the committee of the whole house. I have no particular complaint to make as to this procedure but I would point out that many representatives of groups which will be affected by this marketing bill have contemplated that it would go before a standing committee of the house. The ramifications of this bill are so varied that it seems to me it should go before a standing committee in order that those who will be affected by the legislation may have an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. POULIOT: As the government has not answered my question I suppose I am to understand that it does not intend to do anything to improve home marketing conditions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the fact that in the past and under previous administrations practically all bills affecting agriculture have been referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization. This is probably the most important legislation we have had in recent years and, as the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has pointed out and as I have already indicated there are representatives of farmer groups who have been present in Ottawa for two whole months. It is quite true that they have been staying at a nice place like the Chateau but at great expense and they want to get away. They should be given an opportunity to be heard before the agriculture committee. I thought as a member of that committee I would have ample opportunity of taking part in the discussion. The attitude of the government in connection with this bill would look as though they are trying to conceal something. I understand that the bill is printed and will be placed on the table in a few minutes, but I do not know whether that information is correct. No witnesses will be able to come before the committee of the whole and I think the experts and those who are interested should be heard first before a standing committee also. This bill is supposed to be modelled upon the marketing act of Great Britain, but when that act was passed every opportunity was given to those interested to be heard. I urge the government not to depart from that practice, otherwise the bill will start out by leaving a bad taste in the mouths of those most interested. It is a sort of relative star chamber procedure and from the short talk I have had with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), I am sure that that is not his intention. I am committed to the principle of this bill because I took the stand early in the session that if the bill was to be based upon the principles of the British marketing act, I would be in favour of it. It looks as though it was not to be based upon those principles, otherwise the government would be adopting a different attitude.

Mr. BENNETT: After the bill has been given first reading and is standing for second reading ample opportunity will be given to consider whether or not it should be sent to the standing committee on agriculture or considered in committee of the whole. I stated that my preference was that it should be considered in committee of the whole as that is the proper place but if it is desired that it should be considered by the select committee, there will be ample time in which to make up our minds as to how it can be best dealt with.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The consideration of the bill by the standing committee would not prevent its being considered by a committee of the whole.

Mr. BOTHWELL: This bill refers to the marketing of natural products in Canada and I should like to ask the minister if it is being put through at the request of the provinces or will it become effective before enabling legislation is passed by the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Interprovincial business is governed by federal legislation. This bill has nothing to do with the internal business of the provinces, it deals with interprovincial and export business. The provinces may enact legislation to suit their own convenience. The bill contemplates the possibility of the provinces utilizing this board for their own purposes while, if necessity should arise, the provincial boards may be used as agents of the federal board.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Weir (Melfort) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister kindly explain the bill?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some of the fundamental principles of this bill are, first, principles that are embodied in the British Marketing Act, that if a representative number of producers of any commodity have a scheme which they think will be in the interests of the marketing of their products and feel that their numbers are sufficiently representative, they approach the marketing board or the minister designated to administer the act, and submit their scheme. In this respect the bill, like the British act, is flexible; it was felt that flexibility was essential because of the diversity of the problems connected with marketing the products of the primary producers in this country.

Second, it will work in cooperation, where it is deemed advantageous to do so, by mutual consent with provincial boards or boards set up within the provinces, thus making more effective than at present the work of those boards. One part of the bill is different from the provision in the British act in that opportunity is given to investigate the various costs of marketing and to report whether those spreads are considered fair or unfair. The bill is, as I stated at the outset, flexible; it was felt that it should be because of the diverse nature of the problems that are certain to be submitted to it.

Mr. YOUNG: Do I understand the minister to say that if a representative number of the producers of a given commodity had a scheme which in their opinion would be of benefit, they could carry that scheme, any old scheme, to the minister or to whoever is in charge of this board and have it imposed upon all the producers in Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member was certainly not listening with any degree of attention or he would not have given that interpretation.

Mr. YOUNG: Would the minister please explain the bill again?

Mr. BENNETT: But not on the first reading.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the first time? Now. Mr. Weir (Melfort) moves that the bill be now read the first time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the bill is going to be read the first, second and last times right off, I must object.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill will be read the second time at the next sitting.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What stage is it in now? Is this the first reading?

Mr. BENNETT: The first reading in order that the bill may be printed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While I am on my feet I might as well speak on it; it is quite as much in order I think to speak on it on the first reading as on the second.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no debate on the first reading because the bill has not been printed and you cannot debate that which you have not seen.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have had many discussions on first readings though that is not usually the time, but it is the option of the government or anybody else, so far as I understand the rules, to discuss a bill on its first reading even though based on the very meagre information we have and in this case it is very meagre.

Under this bill we are going to have an opportunity—and I endorse this principle—to facilitate the organization of groups in order that they may merchandise and warehouse their own commodities. But if that is applied to all natural products, the government is going to get into some trouble because that raises a somewhat acute issue in the west with regard to the pros and cons of a voluntary or compulsory pool. I would suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of making different majorities apply to different commodities. For instance, you might have a group of producers completely and entirely organized. They would go out and have a plebiscite where they had grouped themselves together; with their organization comprising the producers concerned over the whole surrounding district who had already become registered, they would be able to put their plan across with comparative ease and the majority called for in a circumstance like that should be I think larger where the opposition to it may not be organized at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order. Standing order 71 reads:

> When any bill is presented by a member, in pursuance of an order of the house, or is brought from the Senate, the question "That this bill be now read a first time," shall be decided without amendment or debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the minister going to speak at this stage? I did not notice whether he had risen to speak.

Mr. GORDON: I did not intend to make any observations at the moment.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill to which the house is asked to give second reading is the only measure the government has introduced thus far this session with respect to the relief of unemployment and farm relief, which continues to be the largest question before the country. The bill, as is apparent from its provisions, and as was stated at the time the resolution on which it was based was introduced, is similar to the measure which was enacted at the last session of parliament, the provisions of which measure, however, expire on the thirty-first of this month.

I wish on the second reading to protest again as I did on the introduction of the resolution, against the little time that has been afforded the House of Commons for a discussion of this all-important question. As is well known, the house is to adjourn on Wednesday of this week and it was only on Thursday of last week that the resolution on which this bill is based was introduced. It is to-day, Monday, that we are asked to consider the second reading. After the second reading we shall have to discuss the bill at some length in committee and in order to become law before the Easter recess it has still to pass the Senate and receive the royal assent. If it does not become law before then, the position will be this, that though parliament has been in session now for a couple of months no provision of any kind will have been made with respect to the further relief of unemployment and for the relief of rural distress. In addition to that the government will be powerless to do anything whatever until some enactment is passed to enable it to deal with distress either in rural or urban areas, for the measure that was passed last session and which gives the government power when parliament was not in session to pass by order in council certain measures with respect to relief under the broad heading of peace, order and good government expires on the last day of this month. Moreover no supply for unemployment relief has as yet been voted. The act of last session gave the government moneys up to a certain sum for the purpose of unemployment relief; any portion of that sum ceases to be available with the expiration of the act, and the government will not have at its disposal any other moneys appropriated by this parliament for the purpose of unemployment relief. Nothing could show more clearly the indifference or neglect of the government or its incapacity to deal with this great question of unemployment than the fact that it is possible that this parliament may adjourn in the course of another two days with no legislation whatever enacted which will enable it to do aught for the relief of unemployment.

But serious as that is with regard to the immediate situation, it will be seen to become infinitely more serious when I draw attention to the fact that this delay in bringing down legislation relating to labour problems, and the problem of unemployment relief in particular, appears to be a deliberate policy on the part of the administration. It is the policy which has been pursued from the very beginning of the present parliament, to limit as much as possible any discussion in this house with respect to this great question of unemployment relief. Take the first session, the special session, called for the purpose of dealing specifically with the question of unemployment. Although hon. members came from all parts of the country to be present at that session, the time occupied in discussing relief measures was only fractional as compared with the time taken up in the discussion of matters pertaining to the tariff, and amendments to the National Revenue Act. The session might much better have been termed a session to increase the tariff and give certain arbitrary powers to the Minister of National Revenue, than a session to deal with unemployment. The session of 1931 enacted the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931; the resolution under which that bill was introduced was not taken up until July 27; prorogation took place on August 3. Take the next session, that of 1932, which enacted two relief measures. The first of these, the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act of 1932, was not enacted until some time after the act of 1931 had expired. It continued its provisions from March 1 to May 1. It was April 26 before the Relief Act of 1932 was introduced, as I say. The Relief Act of 1932 was not introduced into the house until April 26, although the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, passed earlier in 1932, expired on the first of May. That meant that in order to have the discussion over before the expiration again of the previous legislation dealing with unemployment matters the only other time the house was given to discuss the whole question of unemployment relief that year was between April 26 and May 1. As a matter of fact the bill did not pass the commons till May 12. Prorogation took place on May 26. The same thing happened in the session of 1932-33. The Relief Act of 1932 expired on March 31, 1933, the resolution for the succeeding act was not introduced until February 24, and the third reading passed only on March 27. This year we have a similar situation. The Relief Act of 1933 expires on the 31st instant. It was not until March 22 that the government introduced the bill that is in now before us, and the Easter adjournment takes place on March 28. Hon. members will recall that in one of the sessions to which I have referred the government was so late in introducing its legislation that the previous act expired at the time of the Easter recess and it became necessary later on to resurrect a dead statute, to revive it and give it vitality sufficient to enable it to function and to provide the government with measures for unemployment relief. I submit that when as every one knows the question of unemployment relief is and during the past four years has been the most important of all questions, there should have been provided by the government at each session the fullest opportunity for the discussion of the legislation and of the problem itself, and parliament should not each year have been put in the position in which it finds itself at the moment, wherein if there is to be any legislation in effect at all we are obliged to confine our discussion and our opportunities for obtaining information to the two or three days immediately preceding a recess or a final prorogation of parliament.

I wish to protest next against the paucity of information supplied by the government to parliament and the country in respect to this unemployment problem. If the Department of Labour has one duty above any other at a time like this it should be that of obtaining the fullest possible information with respect to the extent of unemployment. I submit that instead of securing that information the department has evaded every request for full and complete information. I asked the minister on Thursday evening last if he would give us such information as he could get. He admitted at the time that he had not much he could bring down. He brought down some statistics and reports which were tabled on Friday and he brought down some more this afternoon. What opportunity is there in these one or two days for hon. members to acquaint themselves with the information contained in the documents tabled? In the first place only one person can read them at a time. It has been wholly impossible to secure what is needed. As far as the information that the minister tabled the other night goes I have had a glance at it. I thank him for what he has given, but it only serves to illustrate very clearly the fact that the government has not gone to the extent it should in obtaining information on this important subject to place before parliament. I have in my hand the statement the minister presented to the house on Friday night in regard to the disbursements under unemployment relief legislation. The minister has given us very full information on that point. He has told us that the government has disbursed altogether up to March 22 of this year public funds from the dominion treasury amounting to $110,198,273, and in addition that the government has made loans and advances for the purpose of assisting provinces and corporations in one way and another to the extent of $52,927,267. In other words there has been a total payment out of the treasury in direct disbursements and advances or loans of over $163,000,000 up to March 22. But though this has been for the alleged purpose of relieving unemployment the minister is unable to give any figures as to the extent of unemployment at the present time, and except for the first estimate has never given any from the time this parliament came into existence nearly four years ago.

On one of the statements tabled by the minister there is mention of the fact that there are certain sources from which information regarding the number of unemployed could be obtained. The first mentioned is the decennial census. We know that the census, coming once in ten years, would only give the record for one particular period. I submit that at a time like this when a great problem such as unemployment is the most pressing, if need be the government should have continued the services of the census staff and bureau to obtain information on this one problem alone, rather than that this house should be left in the dark as to the total numbers of unemployed. In the next place the statement tabled says we have the figures from the trade unions, and it gives the figures so far as the trade unions are concerned. I might read what is said there:

> The latest returns tabulated showing the volume of unemployment in trade unions is that covering the situation as at January 31, 1934. Returns for this date were received from 1,728 local unions representing approximately two-thirds of the total number of local unions in Canada. These organizations reported a total membership of 149,630 of whom 31,695, were unemployed, or a percentage of 21·2. This figure compares with 25·5 which was the percentage of members unemployed on January 31, 1933.

But the minister knows very well that the trade unions represent only a small portion of the total labour of the country and that as far as unemployment is concerned, it is less in those trades that are organized than in other trades. In giving to parliament only the figures that come from trade union sources the house is being completely deceived as to the probable total extent of unemployment. As I say, it is in the unorganized trades that unemployment is felt to the greatest extent, while it is in the organized trades that work, as it becomes available here and there in industry, is found for the membership of the particular unions concerned. So these figures, instead of being helpful, really are of little service. It is true that the practice of gathering these figures goes back to 1916, so apparently we have not to thank the minister even for opening up that source of information.

That seems to be the only source of information from which figures are quoted. Mention is made of another source, namely the unemployed applicants registered at the offices of the employment service of Canada. But no figures are given the house as to what the numbers are. I think that return ought to have been made in detail, because it would have been a further index as to the number of unemployed. The only other source referred to is given as the returns available under the operations of the federal unemployment relief act. And here apparently there are no returns available, or if there are they have not been made available to the House of Commons. It is here that I wish to direct my criticism most pointedly to my hon. friend and the Department of Labour. While the government has spent $110,000,000 in cash and has advanced in addition half that amount in bonuses or guarantees in order, so it is alleged, to deal with unemployment, the minister responsible and his department have not attached to the various grants they have made a condition obliging those who received relief, whether they be provinces or municipalities, to make any return to the government as to the numbers of unemployed in their particular areas and districts.

The minister's statement, which I assume was prepared by an officer of the department and not by the minister himself, goes on to say:

> Requests for the figures showing the total number of persons unemployed in Canada are being constantly made, and much thought has been given to the subject of devising a practicable scheme for collecting such data. However, the cost of setting up and operating machinery that would be competent to produce continuous, authentic and comprehensive data has been deemed to be prohibitive, but the right honourable gentleman, the leader of the opposition, may rest assured that if he can suggest any practicable scheme of securing such information, his suggestion will receive most sympathetic consideration.

If that was written by an officer of the department, and if I were inclined to be critical, I would say it was a piece of impertinence for any officer to send a statement of that kind to this parliament. More than that, I think it is a bit of a reflection on the minister himself when an officer of his department ventures to take it upon himself to say that suggestions made in parliament will receive consideration by the department. That reply, if it is to be made at all should be made by the minister himself. It is not for any civil servant to tell a member of parliament, let alone the leader of one of the parties in the house, that suggestions which he may make in parliament will receive consideration.

May I point out the additional special pleading which this document contains:

> Even in the mother country, where an old established scheme of unemployment insurance, applied to industry on a very wide basis, is in operation, the total number of persons unemployed in that country can only be estimated.

That was not what I was asking the Department of Labour to furnish this House of Commons with. I did not ask for information as to what is being done in the old country. If there is any statement of that kind to be made, the minister can make it in apologizing for his officials and his department, but even the statement as it appears reflects, to my mind, upon the government. If it has been possible in the old country to furnish estimates, and if the practice in the British parliament is to have the Department of Labour furnish estimates to the House of Commons, at least this House of Commons should have had estimates as well. We have not had even an estimate as to the number of unemployed in the different parts of the country.

This statement says that if the leader of the opposition will make a suggestion it will be considered. I have made several suggestions. At the special session of 1930 I made a suggestion which I have repeated at each succeeding session of this parliament, one which, if it had been carried out, would have given this parliament the fullest information as to the numbers of unemployed in the country. That suggestion was that the administration of all unemployment relief moneys expended by the federal government should be under the direction and control of a national commission that would be broadly representative of all those organizations in this country that are most interested in seeking either to obtain relief for their membership or fellow citizens or to see that no one in this land goes without employment if it is possible for employment to be provided. I say that suggestion has been made at every session, and if it had been carried out there would have been available at the present time, as well as during previous sessions, a record as to the total number of unemployed by municipalities, by provinces and for the dominion as a whole for the different years since this condition of unemployment became so serious. There is no reason, indeed, why something in the nature of a permanent register might not have been started four years ago, from which it would have been possible to ascertain who are the individuals who have been unemployed and just how long they have been unemployed.

That is not the only suggestion that has been made. The other night I asked the minister to obtain information from the bureau of statistics. The returns that have been brought down do not include any information from that bureau. The minister himself mentioned the bureau of statistics as one of the sources from which information could be obtained. In speaking on the address I made use of some figures obtained from the bureau of statistics to indicate the number of those who were obtaining work through government relief moneys. That is a source from which a good deal of information might have been gathered. I used the figure to indicate that it was possible to make up an estimate as to the total number of unemployed in Canada, but the minister has not given us any of that information, and it seems to me there has been a deliberate intention to conceal it, or to prevent the officials of the departments of government from gathering the necessary information. I want to repeat the request I made of the minister the other night, that he or the government ask the bureau of statistics to use its staff for the purpose of trying to ascertain the number of unemployed persons in Canada, and in particular, in its statistics on employment, to distinguish between those receiving employment out of public moneys voted for purposes of providing relief through work and those being employed by private industry in the natural course of business. To get a correct impression of the extent of unemployment in the country there should be included not only all those who are actually without work at all but also all those who are on work provided out of funds which have been voted by parliament. That latter information is in the offices of the bureau of statistics at the present time, and I would ask the minister to endeavour to have his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) see that it is compiled in the form of a special statement which can be given to parliament, so that it may be made available to the members of this house before the prorogation of this session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish not only to protest against the little time that has been afforded for the discussion of this question, the lateness of the time at which this legislaion is being brought in having relation to the time when the relief measure expires, and also the paucity of the information placed at our disposal; I wish to protest very strongly against the legislation itself. The bill which we have before us contains all the objectionable—I will use a stronger word and say reprehensible—features and provisions of previous legislation to which very strong objection has been taken on this side of the house.

This is the only legislation the government has offered for the purpose of affording relief to the unemployed. As it is an unemployment relief measure I presume that, at this stage, hon. members on this side of the house would not be justified in opposing the second reading, for we are not opposed to the principle of granting relief where that is absolutely necessary to cope with unemployment, though we do not favour the dole as a policy. We are however very strongly opposed to some of the provisions in the measure now before us, and the position we take to-day in opposition to them is as strong as it was on former occasions. Nay, Mr. Speaker, I would say our views are very much stronger, because these provisions, in the present year, have a significance which they could not have had in previous years. This is a year in which, in all probability, there will be a general election, and the powers which this House of Commons is asked to confer upon the government at this time are powers which, if the measure were accepted the government would possess at the time of such election. I submit that the government has no right to take advantage of its majority to secure for itself arbitrary powers which it can use when parliament is not in session, and which may be exercised during the period of an election without the knowledge even of the electorate. Under the guise of seeking to obtain relief for the unemployed it would be free to exercise these powers as it pleased.

May I point out the provisions contained in the measure. Let me say first of all that the main purpose of the bill is to take from parliament and turn over to the governor in council all powers with respect to relief measures. Its provisions make clear that its underlying principle is to take the question of unemployment relief entirely away from parliament, and in its entirety to turn it over to the governor in council. In this measure the government attempts to use parliament simply as an instrument for giving power to the governor in council, to act as he pleases both as to legislation affecting unemployment and as to the expenditure of public moneys in connection therewith. One provision is that when parliament is not in session the governor in council shall have power to legislate with regard to peace, order and good government. I need not remind hon. members that that provision was fought very strenuously in 1932 both by the official opposition in parliament and by other groups, and it was carried only after closure had been resorted to on two occasions. That particular provision was dropped in the following year. The bill brought down the next year dropped the provision giving to the governor in council the power to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government. May I ask this question: Where is the justification at this time for giving to the government that power which in two sessions out of four of this parliament it has not been necessary to grant? What makes it necessary to give such power to-day? Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we are getting out of bad times, that the emergency phase of the situation is nearing an end, that times are greatly improved, that men are being employed, and that there is reason to congratulate the country upon its progress. If that is so, and taking hon. members opposite at their own word—I do not admit, by any means, that they are properly describing the situation—how can they justify asking this House of Commons to give power to the government to enact measures by order in council with respect to peace, order and good government?

As I pointed out before, when dealing with this particular phase of the matter, the powers sought by the government on former occasions, and which they are seeking again, are greater than those which were given by parliament to the government during the period of the great war. When Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister he never asked for power to legislate generally with respect to peace, order and good government. He asked for those powers to be enforced only in the event of actual invasion of the country. In his time, which was a time of war, there was no effort to give the government the powers the present government are asking to-day in a time of peace. Further than that, when Sir Robert Borden came before parliament and asked for large powers with respect to the expenditure of public moneys, he never asked for a blank cheque, another power being again asked for to which I shall refer presently, but he asked for specific appropriations definitely limited to certain amounts, always keeping before him the fundamental principle of the right of the commons to control the total expenditures of the country. This administration however is asking us to go beyond the powers which were granted a government in time of actual war. This government is asking now for the powers I have described, at a time when the country is on the eve of a general election. I say that this house should not be asked to give any such powers to the administration, and I hope that the minister in charge of the measure and the ministry in general will, when the bill reaches the committee stage, give this phase of the matter further consideration, and that they will be prepared to amend it.

The other provision to which I have just referred is that respecting the money which this house is to be asked to vote for unemployment relief. On former occasions we objected very strenuously to endorsing any principle whereby the government would be given a blank cheque and be enabled to expend any amount it wished. I must say that on former occasions our protests did carry some weight with the administration, because at the last session of parliament they conformed in an ostensible way to the general practice in this house in the voting of supply, in that they named a definite amount. In connection with unemployment relief, we have never sought to restrict the ministry in any way in connection with the amount to be made available, so long as a definite amount was named, and some reasonable ground given for naming a certain sum. Our position in that regard remains the same to-day. At the last session the government did fix a definite amount, and there was no trouble at all in having an immediate vote of that sum. It is indicated in this bill that the accounts for 1933-34 are likely to exceed the total amount voted. I may say that so far as those excess outlays are concerned, I do not think there will be a moment's hesitation on the part of the opposition in seeing that the excess outlays are made good at once if the accounts have been properly audited. I do say, however, that after having conceded the principle that the appropriation should be definitely specified the government should not revert to-day to the practice of asking parliament to grant them a blank cheque a practice which was so strongly condemned not only in this House of Commons but throughout the country.

There is a further reason why money should not be voted in that way. On Friday reports from the auditor general showing where these moneys have been spent, and how distribution has been made between the municipalities and the provinces, were laid on the table. These reports show that much of the money was wasted, or worse than wasted; it has been distributed in ways for which even the municipalities and provinces cannot account. The minister will recall that at the very first session of this parliament I urged as strongly as I possibly could that in connection with all federal moneys a provision ought to be made that the moneys expended out of the federal treasury should be properly audited, and that any agreements with the provinces or municipalities should contain provisions which would ensure the auditor general, a servant of this parliament, the right of auditing accounts relating to federal moneys.

What was the position taken by the government? The Prime Minister said that to suggest anything of the kind was an insult to the provinces. Not only did he make that reply on one occasion but he made it on two or three. What has happened in the interval? In the interval the waste of public moneys has been so considerable that even the government itself has found it necessary to retrace its steps, and now that the money has been spent and the vouchers are no longer to be discovered anywhere the government passes an order directing that the very thing be done which it said at the begininng of the expeditures of these moneys would be an insult to the provinces and the municipalities.

Let me read from an order in council which was passed only a few days ago, this very month, on March 12, 1934. After reciting that the auditor general has pointed out that the need has arisen in connection with the auditing of provincial accounts, the order in council goes on:

> And whereas the audits and investigations which have been made and reported upon by the auditor general, in pursuance of the directions hereinbefore recited, have disclosed the necessity for a more extended audit of the accounts relating to relief expenditures if the interests of the dominion treasury are to be adequately safeguarded;
> Now therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, is pleased in the exercise of the powers so conferred by the Relief Act, 1933, to order and doth hereby order and direct the auditor general to conduct such audit of provincial and municipal accounts in connection with unemployment relief expenditures as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury.

That order in council was put through on the twelfth day of March, 1934. That gives to the auditor general to-day a direction which we said should have been given in 1930, and it is given after it is no longer possible for the auditor general to begin to safeguard the public treasury because the public treasury has been literally looted, as will be seen from the way in which these moneys have been spent without any proper auditing.

I have not time to begin to read what the auditor general has told the government. The Minister of Labour mentioned to us the other evening that the auditor general had made a few tests here and there within the last year just to find out whether the expenditures were in order or whether money was being wasted. The minister would have had us believe that in that way the government had been complying with some form of audit. But the interesting fact is this, that while the minister laid on the table reports from the auditor to the government relating to every province in the dominion, with the exception of Prince Edward Island with respect to every single province the auditor general makes the same statement, namely that these tests show that the audit made was not sufficient to protect the public treasury, and that there have been all kinds of waste in connection with the money that has been disbursed by this government for unemployment relief. In the face of that the government now asks us to give them again a blank cheque to spend whatever sums of money they desire to spend for purposes of unemployment relief.

Let me, because I think we ought to have this on record, cite a few of the instances which the auditor general has given to this parliament of the way in which relief moneys have been expended. I am not going to name any province but I shall include mention of all except Prince Edward Island from what I have here as appearing in the auditor general's reports to the government. I start with what is said of the auditing in one, I might say that they all contain this statement:

> It is apparent from the details of overshared expenditures stated in the annexes hereto that this audit was inadequate and therefore did not safeguard the interests of the federal treasury. In view of the situation disclosed in the towns which were visited by your representative I am of the opinion that a detailed examination in the other municipalities of the province would disclose additional improper charges to joint account and that, with a view to discovering and adjusting these, an audit of all municipal unemployment relief expenditures since the inception of unemployment relief in those municipalities where the shared expenditure exceeded say $5,000 in any one year, should be made locally under the direction of the province.

That statement that an audit should be made in every province and in all municipalities occurs with respect to every province, also the statement that in no case has the audit been equal to what is necessary to protect the federal treasury.

What does the auditor general go on to say in his report by way of illustration? The report shows among other things:

Improperly included in amounts shared by federal government were costs of maintenance of highways, administration expenses, including salaries of officials. At page 23 is listed an item of $42,000 as having been improperly shared by federal government.

Families were assisted under land settlement relief who would not otherwise have been in receipt of direct relief.

Relief was not restricted to employable persons, but granted to aged and infirm.

That is the case in one province. Take the next province. The auditor general says in regard to it:

Provincial Audit:

Inquiries made at the various municipal offices visited by your representative elicited the information that the unemployment relief records had never been subjected to local audits by provincial officials.

No audit of any kind even by provincial officials. He goes on:

I am convinced that the provincial audit has not protected the interests of the federal treasury. . . . The province did not keep any accounting records of the direct relief transactions leading up to the claims transmitted to the federal government.

Because of the absence of properly detailed accounting records showing the cost of a specific authorization and because the payrolls and vouchers examined were not identified by officials at the sites of the works with the specific projects on which labour and materials were expended it was impossible to do more, in the course of the examination, than to see that the vouchers and payrolls had been checked and that they represented, only, expenditures incurred within the geographical limits of the schedule to which they were charged; furthermore it was impossible for your representative to satisfy himself that all the credits and refunds applicable to expenditures shared by the federal government had been suitably credited.

The accounting records of direct unemployment relief expenditures maintained at the municipal offices visited by your representative were in all cases inadequate. They were generally designed by those who operated them, and lacked any form of internal check. Officers of municipalities stated that they received no assistance from the province in the form of accounting directions.

What were the results? Here are only a few of them. I have had a chance only to glance at these documents since Friday night. What they would show if gone into in detail I hesitate to say. But here is a further report with respect to that same province:

Construction of fences and highway guards, not referred to in federal authorization, were included when provincial claims were submitted for federal contributions.

Excessive rentals for machinery were submitted for federal contributions.

Items of superintendence and truck hire were included as labour.

Direct relief was not restricted to employable persons.

In the town of ——— the investigator found relief orders and merchants' accounts had been destroyed.

I come to a third province. The auditor general speaks of the brief inspections which made it impossible in the little time he had to make anything like what was required in the way of investigation, and he is of the opinion that "a thorough audit of the details of the accounts of all provincial relief works projects would disclose inaccuracies further than those reported herein." But what are those he does report in this particular province?

Gasoline tax paid to the province submitted in accounts for federal contribution.

No inventory available of material and tools remaining after relief work on projects completed, the cost of which equipment had been shared by the federal government.

Department of roads did not take advantage of cash discounts offered by merchants.

Excess charges made for rental of machinery.

Duplication of charges took place.

Certain overseers paid at rates in excess of those prescribed by provincial government.

Sixty-two paylists, amounting to $96,000, could not be verified because vouchers not available.

Pay of labourers signed irregularly by persons other than the labourer.

Pay of as many as 25 persons signed by one person.

Many signatures on paylist appear in same handwriting.

In one case signatures of 29 labourers did not appear on paylist.

Irregularities in paylists revealed that some of the men did not receive amounts for which they signed.

In some cases wages and travelling expenses paid twice to supervisors.

May I remind the house that this represents the inspection of only one man sent down to make a quick test inquiry into the accounts in certain localities. It does not begin to represent any comprehensive audit or to indicate what would be shown if the auditor general's department were to begin to audit all these accounts.

Mr. MALONEY: May I ask to what province my right hon. friend is referring?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said at the outset that I was not naming any province. I am not discriminating at all. My hon. friend is free to bring up any province he sees fit. He can read the return just as I did. The point I am making is that this is all federal money—

Mr. GORDON: Not all federal money.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is only federal money that is spoken of here. There is not a reference here to moneys that were not federal moneys; they may have been used in association with provincial and municipal moneys but it was federal moneys that were being audited in this connection. Let me give a few more instances. The report says:

Municipal methods of auditing in several cases insufficient to safeguard interests of dominion treasury.

In some cases no allowance made for residual value of equipment for which government asked to share complete cost.

Damages caused by an explosion on relief work reported as material.

Rental charges in several cases were excessive.

Gasoline tax paid to province included in amount to be shared by federal government.

Wages paid for maintenance work on city streets, et cetera, submitted for federal contribution.

Defective paylists were submitted.

Part of salaries of civic officials and other administrative expenses irregularly included for federal contribution.

It is impossible to audit the expenditure of funds for direct relief advanced by municipalities to welfare societies because complete records were not kept.

Relief orders not signed by recipients of relief.

The report continues:

This audit of relief work expenditures was not adequately protective of the interests of the federal treasury in respect to timekeeping; compilation of paylists, and payment of labourers; indemnities paid to injured relief labourers, which indemnities were treated as wages; issues of municipal stores to the relief jobs; claims for contribution to the cost or maintenance of municipal equipment having a residual value;

And again:

Funds were used for undertakings other than those authorized.

A paylist was claimed for twice by the city and shared twice by the federal and provincial governments.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

City did not pay any premium to workmen's compensation board for protection against injuries to labourers on relief work and that compensation for injuries was reported as wages.

Excessive claims were made for rental of municipal machinery.

Gasoline tax paid to province submitted in accounts for federal contribution.

The report reemphasizes the inadequacy of the audit to protect the federal treasury. There is this general statement:

It is needless for me to state the opportunities for misappropriation and for improper application of relief moneys, and other irregularities, which were made possible when (i) funds received for specific purposes were not kept separate from other moneys; (ii) there was a total or partial lack of adequate accounting records and of supporting vouchers; (iii) there was not restriction on the destruction of documentary evidence of expenditures, and (iv) when proper audits were not carried out.

This is all information which the auditor general, as a servant of parliament, is giving to parliament for its guidance with regard to what it may do in the future, as well as to what it may seek to remedy of the past.

The report in connection with another province states:

In some cases important information shown on the municipal statements is not carried forward to the statement made out by the province and there was no evidence on the accounts examined by me that any audit had been made other than the ordinary office check. The municipal auditors do not make any additional audit to safeguard either the province or the dominion and no inspectors' reports were upon any of the files examined by me.

The report goes on to speak of the instructions of the secretary of the unemployment relief fund not being supported by any vouchers and not giving sufficient information to enable the check of the proof of payment. It is then pointed out:

It is noted that a systematic program of audit was not carried out by the province.

Particulars are as follows:

Costs of administration were included in amounts submitted for federal payment.

Tax on gasoline paid to province was submitted for federal payment.

Item for supplies, for which catering firm had paid province, was included in accounts submitted for federal payment.

Payments for compensation on account of injury or death of workmen were included in the accounts of one city.

Purchase of land amounting to $21,000 was included in accounts of one city.

It continues:

In some municipalities the indigent is required to do a certain amount of work for the municipality and by doing so is replacing the labour ordinarily charged to other municipal works. The relief given in payment for this work is charged to direct relief and the municipality is thus receiving assistance for expenditures which are properly chargeable against the general funds of the municipality.

The report shows:

Considerable items for wages of regular city employees were submitted in accounts for federal payment.
City administration expenses were also included.
Claims for reimbursement by one municipality were considerably in excess of the amount paid.

The report in connection with another province states:

The interests of the federal government are not protected by the provincial audit of municipal direct relief expenditures.

Among other things the report shows:

Salaries and other administration expenses were shared by the dominion.
That equipment for the new unit of a university amounting to $18,000 was included in the certificates of expenditure.
That large amounts were shared by the dominion on trans-Canada highway operations prior to the coming into force of the agreement under the 1931 act.

The report in connection with another province states that in the interests of the dominion the audit of the provincial records leaves much to be desired. It continues:

It was difficult to conduct a satisfactory audit because of the nature and condition of the records in most of the offices examined.

The report gives further particulars as to why this statement is made.

The report on expenditures in another province states that the accounting records of the provincial government are not intended to contain the details requisite for the conduct of an audit of relief expenditures by the federal government. The report shows among other things that:

The dominion has contributed to costs of administration.
The profits from boardinghouse operations on relief projects have not been shared with the dominion.
The refunds on seed grain advances have not been shared with the dominion.

The report in connection with the last province states:

To audit direct relief expenditures was a task almost impossible of accomplishment because of failure by the province to segregate suitably expenditures by means of proper accounting records, and to earmark the corresponding vouchers respectively applicable to the various direct relief schemes. It was also made difficult because in many cases expenditures were regarded by the federal government as applying to one fiscal period, whilst the province applied the same expenditures to the subsequent fiscal period, or vice versa.

It goes on to say:

—it was impossible to ascertain from them whether or not full credit had been given to the federal government for its share of recoveries.

And again:

—the vouchers for entries therein were not appropriately arranged for checking to the accounts of the respective projects.

And again:

—the provincial audit of provincial and municipal relief expenditures does not fully safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury.

Among other things the report shows:

Administration expenses were included in amounts shared by the dominion;
Also payments to persons not entitled;
Also equipment of camps;
Also profits on provincial supplies held in stock by the province.

As I have said, this is simply a gleaning from a cursory glance at the reports which the hon. minister presented to this house on Friday night last. So far as the audit itself is concerned, as the minister said on Friday night, it is merely a test here and there, at random, by one or two officers of the auditor general's department. They all tell the same story, that money has been spent out of the treasury without any regard to safeguarding the treasury or the interests of the public. Be it remembered always that every dollar of this money is so much in the way of increased taxation. If people wish to know why it is that they have had to pay a tax on sugar, if they wish to know why it is that the income tax has been increased, if they wish to know why it is that the sales tax and other taxes have been increased, they will find one of the reasons in the report of the auditor general which tells exactly how relief moneys have been spent by this government under the blank cheque authority which the government has sought and obtained from its followers.

I should like to refer to what was said in this house in 1930 when the government started this policy of contributing vast sums with no provision for a satisfactory audit. At that time I asked, nay I implored, the Prime Minister to adopt some system of auditing. First of all I advocated the appointing of a commission to supervise all these expenditures of federal monies and stated that such was the method which a previous government had adopted at the time of the great disaster in Halifax. On that occasion public moneys were voted and placed in the hands of a commission which had its own board of auditors and which superintended carefully all expenditures. There were no come-backs with regard to the way in which that money was spent because proper provision was made in advance. The Prime Minister rejected my suggestion. It has been said that the opposition does not seek to cooperate with the government, but I would point out that in the case of every suggestion we have made we have received nothing but rebuffs from the administration although the suggestions which have been made have all been shown through the course of time to have been of a constructive and helpful nature. I should like to quote from Hansard of 1930, page 164. Speaking to the Prime Minister, I said:

If there is one time above another when the government should be careful to safeguard expenditures and to prevent extravagance and waste it is when this parliament is trying, with public money, to end unemployment and to use every cent to the advantage of those who are unemployed. That being the case I submit again that hon. gentlemen opposite find some means whereby all the moneys that are spent out of this appropriation may be audited to the last degree possible by the auditor general, who is an officer of parliament itself.

Elsewhere, at page 172, I said:

Before recess I handed my hon. friend for his consideration—because I thought that was the most courteous and effective way in which to deal with the matter—a suggestion as follows: I suggested that there should be incorporated in this bill some such clause as the following:

"Where any moneys are expended under this act by way of contribution to provinces, municipalities or other bodies, the auditor general shall audit the expenditure made by the province, municipality or other body, and shall report thereon to parliament within thirty days after the commencement of the next session."

How was that suggestion received? I quote the words of the Prime Minister as they will be found at page 173:

How can we depart from a fixed principle, that principle being that this parliament must provide machinery for the audit of public expenditures, but that it cannot follow to its destination every expenditure that is made, involving an interference with the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures and municipal councils and bodies of that character. Are we to be told, because two or three members of this house stand up and complain of a provincial legislature, that therefore we are to insult that legislature by saying that we are to deal with their affairs and not our own? Are we to mind our business or their business?

Again, as reported on page 175, the Prime Minister had this to say:

I will look further into the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition, but I cannot conceive how under our constitution any self-respecting province would expect the dominion government to place upon it what I regard as an unenviable and unnecessary insult by saying:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

"Where any moneys are expended under this act by way of contribution to provinces, municipalities, or other bodies, the auditor general shall audit the expenditure made by the province, municipality or other body, and shall report thereon to parliament within thirty days after the commencement of the next session."

Those are only two of the occasions on which the Prime Minister said that it would be an insult for this parliament to direct an audit of the expenditures of its money. A third will be found on page 164, the Prime Minister again speaking:

This parliament has no jurisdiction to interfere with the provinces and the municipalities in the expenditure of their moneys. If that were made a condition I think it would be regarded by the provinces as an insult.

After four years, and after we have had this waste of public money that the auditor general has brought to the attention of the government, we have passed this order in council of March 12, 1934. And why has it been passed? Simply that the government may have something to point to, to enable it to say that it has taken a step to audit the accounts in a way which will safeguard the public treasury, and this after it is too late. That is the very thing they had termed an insult four years ago and the order in council is in the precise terms that were suggested to the government by me as leader of the opposition in 1930. This is done after, as I said the other day, it has become a physical impossibility for the auditor general to attempt, even with a staff as large as an army, to begin to find out how those moneys have been spent. I want to read the directions of this order in council again on top of what I have just given to the house:

Now therefore His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, is pleased in the exercise of the powers so conferred by the Relief Act, 1933, to order and doth hereby order and direct the auditor general to conduct such audit of provincial and municipal accounts in connection with unemployment relief expenditures as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury.

If it is possible to do that in 1934, surely it was possible to do it in 1930, in 1931, in 1932 and in 1933. The way in which this government has wasted the public money on unemployment relief is shocking beyond all words. We have only an indication there of the kind of thing that will be disclosed once there comes, as there certainly will in the course of time, a very full inquiry into the way in which those public moneys have been used. The point I wish to stress at the moment is that with this information before us, surely the house is not going to give to this administration power to issue from the public treasury any funds it pleases under a blank cheque given by the House of Commons: and that particularly, as I have already said, in a year in which there is likely to be a general election.

But those are not the only features of the bill which are bad. It has all the reprehensible features of the previous legislation but it has something reprehensible in addition that was in none of the other acts. We are being asked not only to give the government blanket authority to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government and to give them a blank cheque, but to give them the right to enter into commitments that will extend over a term of years. In other words they are asking for authority to make contracts in connection with public works and buildings and to commit the country to the expenditures involved not merely for the period of the next fiscal year but for a series of years thereafter. That, again, is wholly subversive of the rights of the House of Commons in its control of expenditure of public moneys and of its duty in the protection of the public in the matter of taxation. That clause should be struck out and I hope, when the bill comes into committee, the minister will see his way to do so, because he cannot begin to defend it.

In connection with this relief legislation, every single canon that exists with respect to the control by parliament over expenditure of public money has been violated, and set at naught by hon. gentlemen opposite. That wrong is being repeated in the bill before us. In the first place, by asking for this blanket authority to legislate and to spend, they are taking away from parliament altogether its functions in the appropriation of public moneys. Where they have come to parliament and asked for moneys, they have not brought in an estimate or given to the house any grounds on which an estimate might be based; they have not limited their appropriations to specific and definite items which, as no one knows better than does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), is the proper way to proceed in asking the House of Commons for moneys for any purpose. Those principles have all been set at naught. In the face of results which we now can see were inevitable, we are being asked to repeat the same kind of action for another year. I do hope the house will pause before it allows the measure to pass in the form in which it is at present.

I want to make a further reference to the significance of these powers being asked for this year. From the beginning I said that I did not believe the government's idea was primarily that of meeting the unemployment situation as an emergency, that its desire was simply to get power to deal with an emergent situation. I said that I thought they had rather in view what would serve the large financial corporations and the situation with which they would be faced when a general election came on. I think one has only to look at the list of the different uses to which the moneys voted under relief measures have been placed to see how true the statement is that for every dollar there has been spent and gone to labour for unemployment relief, a much larger sum has been spent or guaranteed in the interest of some financial corporation. Under this relief measure the government took power first of all to fix arbitrary values of securities held by insurance companies. What has that to do with the relief of unemployment? Yet it is under this broad power to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government assumedly for the purpose of relieving unemployment that action has been taken. The government has advanced moneys to the provinces, a proceeding which of course was quite right, but in that case we should have had a bill introduced especially for that purpose and the agreements with the provinces should have been placed before parliament for its approval. The government has advanced money to Newfoundland under this measure. How can the government justify the advance of money to Newfoundland under a measure enacted by parliament for the purpose of affording relief to the unemployed?

Mr. RHODES: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misstate the case—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. RHODES: No money was advanced to Newfoundland.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, a guarantee was given.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend for correcting me. "Advanced" was a slip; it was guaranteed. A guarantee was given to Newfoundland as a means of aiding unemployment in the Dominion of Canada. The next thing is that the banks have been guaranteed for advances made by them to the wheat pools. Certain banks have been given guarantees for what they have done for some other bank. Moneys were advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the banks have been guaranteed with respect to a $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. EULER: And Beauharnois.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and in connection with outlays of millions upon Beauharnois the banks have again been guaranteed. There were purchases of railway ties. Finally we find among the orders in council that have been laid on the table, though not yet discussed, a guarantee given with respect to advances to the Algoma Steel Corporation for the manufacture of steel rails for the Canadian National Railways. I wonder how the government is going to justify that under its relief measure. The Canadian National gives a contract to the Algoma Steel Corporation, and under these relief measures certain advances to the Algoma Steel Corporation are guaranteed by the government. I should like to know in the face of all this, and it is far from being the whole story, if I am not right in saying that the government has been using this legislation to further the interests of certain financial corporations rather than in the interests of the unemployed.

Mr. MANION: That was done entirely for the relief of unemployment in Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says it was done entirely for the relief of unemployment. We will have a discussion on the order later, but it will be interesting to discover just how advances to this corporation had to be guaranteed by the government to relieve the unemployed.

Now that we have before us these instances of the kind of thing that has been done under the powers given with respect to peace, order and good government and under this blank cheque authority, I ask this House of Commons, is it fair and just to renew those powers to the administration in this year 1934, powers which were given by the house to the government as powers solely to meet an emergency? That emergency having existed now for four years, is it just and fair to continue those powers in this year when in all probability this house will be dissolved before parliament has another opportunity to consider how these powers are to be or have been exercised? This is a year in which in all probability we shall have a general election. With this record of the past four years, what is the government not likely to do if it is to have a free hand to pass any order in council it pleases during the period of a general election, has the public treasury at its disposal to draw therefrom any sums it may wish in the name of unemployment relief? Surely there is such a thing as fair play and justice in matters of government, even as between political parties, to speak of the least of all the considerations. Certainly in the interests of the country it is desirable that this government should not be given these powers to the extent they are asking for them at this time.

I heard an hon. gentleman opposite this afternoon, when mention was made of the arbitrary powers which the legislature of Alberta is about to take in connection with a wheat marketing measure, powers that practically give it absolute authority to control wheat production and sale in that province and with respect to some other matters, ask what about the Special Powers Act of British Columbia. I think that was a pertinent question. I received on Saturday a communication, which has since appeared in the press, which I will read to the house:

Victoria, B.C.,
March 24, 1934.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Ottawa, Ont.

A mass nonpartisan meeting of protest held in Victoria, B.C., against Pattullo's special powers act appeals to you as Liberal leader to intervene for the preservation of civil rights and liberty in line with well known Liberal principles.

C. S. Quainton,
Chairman.

That is the Very Reverend C. S. Quainton.

Mr. COTNAM: C.C.F.!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have to say of that message is that the time to have called mass meetings to protest against arbitrary action on the part of the executive was four years ago when we, of the Liberal opposition in this house sought to arouse public opinion concerning action calculated to divest parliament of its powers of legislation and of the control of public moneys. For four years we have been steadily protesting against parliament being robbed of its authority in the matter of legislation and of the control of expenditures and taxation. Now when a provincial government undertakes to assume certain exclusive powers to meet a definite situation immediately a mass meeting is called to protest against an act of that kind. My reply to that message was that if there had been an infraction of provincial rights which demanded intervention it was the duty of the government of the day to intervene, that the leader of the opposition in the dominion parliament had no authority whatever to intervene in any provincial matter, and as far as he was true to the traditions of Liberalism in connection with relations between the provinces and the dominion he would allow the provinces to manage their own affairs and not attempt to intervene in them one way or another.

But what I want to ask is, what is going to become of our country if the government of one province after the other, in addition to the dominion government, undertakes to establish some form of complete control over public moneys and the right to deal with public resources as it thinks best? I deem it important to direct the attention of the house to what I regard as a very serious situation, namely that the example which has been set by this federal government and followed during the past few years has been such as to occasion provincial governments to adopt a like course. We have now at least two of them, and undoubtedly there will be more in the course of a little time—the same, I believe, is true of the government of Saskatchewan—making three up to the present, all beginning to emulate this government in the matter of taking away from parliament, in this case the legislative assembly, powers intended by the constitution to safeguard the rights and liberties and moneys of the people.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it possible that the suggestion to do so might have come from this government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that my hon. friend will have to judge for himself. What I do say is that once the public becomes accustomed to a certain method of procedure the seriousness of it ceases to be as apparent as it otherwise would be. I well remember that when this legislation was first introduced in this house hon. members were aghast, even hon. gentlemen opposite, and would not have countenanced it for one moment except that they believed there was an emergency which might be very serious, and which after all might only last a very short time. They were prepared to grant these emergency powers for one year, then they granted them for a second year, then for a third year, and for a fourth. What at first was given only to meet an emergency has come now to be a regular practice. Having come to be a regular practice by this government, it has come in virtue of its action and example to be assumed by provincial governments that such is the way they also should proceed to deal with their problems at this time. I say that raises the largest question that has ever been raised in this country. After all, Canada and other parts of the British Empire remain in the world to-day the one stronghold of the liberties of the people preserved by their parliaments and legislatures. If this country begins to go as Europe has gone, and Asia has gone, and some other parts of the world appear to be going, what is going to happen to the rights and liberties and freedom of the people of Canada? I direct attention to that large issue at this time because I think it needs to be reemphasized. I raise it in connection with this legislation because it comes concretely before us in that connection.

Apart from all that, I say about the proposed enactment itself, that it does not contain one single line of a constructive policy. The relief measure suggested is a continuance of the dole, that is all in the way of policy the government has to offer, notwithstanding that it came into office on the promise that it was going to relieve unemployment and give work, not doles, to everyone who was ready and willing to work. So, Mr. Speaker, while we are not going to take exception to the second reading, which approves of the principle of giving relief where relief is a necessity, we will reserve to ourselves the right to ask the government to amend some of the clauses of this bill before it gets through the committee stage.

I want to say just this further word. While the legislation before us offers nothing but a continuance of the dole as a means of coping with the problem of unemployment, here when we have come to the fifth session of this parliament there is nothing of record as to what really has been achieved by the administration except this statement that $110,000,000 has been spent, and another $52,000,000 advanced in loans or guarantees and that, by the way, obviously does not include the $60,000,000 guarantee to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There has been no national policy of any kind with respect to relief; there has been no national recovery plan. No commission, not even a department of government, has been gathering data that would have been of infinite service to parliament in dealing with the situation to-day, and in dealing with the unemployment insurance problem which will have to be dealt with in the future. There has been nothing but this vast expenditure, and the vast waste which I have quoted from the reports of the auditor general.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): In his concluding words, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out that this relief measure is a continuance of the dole. At this stage might I ask why, after almost four years of Conservative government, it should be necessary to bring in a relief measure. I think this is an appropriate time to ask what this government has done, if anything, towards eliminating the problem of unemployment. We all know that several factors contribute to employment. I think it will be agreed that one great factor is international trade; if we have international trade and our factories are working, men are employed instead of unemployed. Another great factor is the purchasing power of the people. If men earn wages and have money to spend they can do much to relieve unemployment. If the purchasing power of the people, however, is reduced by wages being lowered or by high taxation, so that men have very little to spend, the unemployment situation is only aggravated in this or any other country.

In examining the record of this government of necessity we must compare it with the record of the government which it displaced in 1930. I need not remind the house that during the regime of the Liberal government the trade of Canada gradually increased until in 1929 it amounted to $2,654,000,000, in round figures; that between 1926 and 1930 the Liberal government reduced the national debt of Canada to the extent of about $250,000,000, and that during the same time it reduced taxation at the rate of about $118,000,000 annually. Under the regime of the late government we had the largest number of persons employed in Canada since confederation, and those workers received the highest wages ever paid to workers in this country during peace times. The working population, with increased wages and therefore with increased purchasing power, were enabled to maintain a fairly high standard of living and in turn that enabled the railways to show surpluses instead of deficits and to increase the wages of their employees.

That was the state of affairs at the end of 1929, when the world depression set in. In comparison with other countries Canada stood up well under that depression. We had an election in 1930, however, and the leader of the Conservative party and his friends wanted power. They took the opportunity to go through this country and tell the people that they never had seen anything like the unemployment that existed at that time. According to their own figures after they came into office there were 117,000 people in Canada unemployed. The Conservative candidates, led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), went through the country making rash statements which they must have known, if they knew anything, were not true; they made rash promises which, if they knew anything, they must have known they could not fulfil and which they never intended to fulfil. They stated that the unemployment prevailing at the time was not because of world conditions but was because of the policies of the government that was in office at the time. They said it was the duty of the federal government to provide work for all the inhabitants of this country, and the right hon. gentleman said he would end unemployment or perish in the attempt. He made his position very clear at Sarnia, when he said:

> Someone is responsible for unemployment; not individuals, but governments. Governments by their majorities in parliament are responsible for enacting all legislation.

In Quebec he said that if his party were returned to power and he did not fulfil his promises he wanted his followers from Quebec and the rest of Canada to vote him out of power. His words will be found in the Ottawa Citizen of July 14, 1930, and are as follows:

> There was no necessity for a conference on unemployment, he continued. The solution was too apparent. "What you want is work," he exclaimed, "not conferences, and you are going to get work." Unless his promises to the people of Canada were kept if elected to office, Mr. Bennett said he wanted Quebec and other members of his party to vote him out of office.

"Wages, not charity" was the slogan of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, and many thousands of workers throughout Canada took him at his word. They have had very little but charity since that time, and now we have before us a bill providing for an extension of the dole. Thousands of workers throughout Canada took the word of the right hon. gentleman and his candidates; they voted for a change of government, and they brought about that change. What has been the result of about four years of inactivity on the part of this government? No one will deny that conditions have been going from bad to worse; not even members sitting on the government benches will deny that statement. They make excuses, however. In 1929 the total trade of Canada in round figures was valued at $2,654,000,000. By 1933 the total trade stood at $886,000,000, representing a loss in trade between the years 1929 and 1933 of $1,768,000,000. Is it any wonder that we have unemployment? As a result of unemployment and the accompanying loss of wages there has been a reduction in the purchasing power of thousands of our citizens. The loss of salaries and wages in our industries is a distinct menace.

Let us consider the manufacturing industries. In 1930 the salaries and wages were $736,000,000. In 1932 they had dropped to $497,000,000, representing a loss in that respect alone of $239,000,000. That means that there was $239,000,000 less purchasing power in Canada. Is it any wonder that our workers are becoming depressed and dissatisfied? Is it any wonder that they are becoming impatient at the inactivities of the government, a government which upon assuming office found only 117,000 unemployed, but deplored the fact throughout the country? Last winter the Minister of Labour admitted that there were 1,357,000 persons on direct relief, and now, only about four years after the government took office, there are about half a million unemployed, and thousands more are working in relief camps for their board and miserable pittances.

What about the farmers? Are they content?—because I understand this is also a farm relief bill. After four years of this government's legislation should the farmers have to read in the newspapers that they must accept further relief? What were they promised by this government? This is a sample of what was told the farmers during the election campaign of 1930. The right hon. leader of the opposition of that day, the present Prime Minister, is quoted as follows in the Vancouver Province of June 18, 1930:

If Mr. Mackenzie King thinks I will not so build up our agricultural and industrial life, that its strength will drive our products into the markets of the world, then he is wrong, for that I will do. If he thinks I will not establish new markets for those products, strive with all my heart to retain them, drive our products with all my power into new markets, into old markets, into reluctant markets, he is wrong, for that I will do.

He meant it, all right, there can be no doubt about that, because he is quoted in the Montreal Gazette of June 19, 1930, as follows:

So will I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties.

Well, let us see how the farmers are faring at the present time. In January, 1930, the index figure of price levels for farm products stood at 102·6. In January, 1934, it had dropped to 55·3. For the year 1930 the index price level for farm products averaged 82·3; in 1933 it averaged 51.

Then the presentation on behalf of the farmers before the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada is found at page 70 of the report of the Macmillan commission:

In a memorandum prepared by a committee representing the governments of the three provinces . . .

The western provinces—

—it is estimated that the annual gross revenue from agriculture in these provinces fell from $843,153,000 in 1928 to $273,738,000 in 1932, representing a loss of 67½ per cent in farm income.

In the memorandum filed on behalf of the United Farmers of Ontario an estimate made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics of the value of field crops in Canada was given as follows:

1928..	$1,125,003,000
1932..	416,586,000

One may learn from those figures that the farmers are in a bad way. While on a train I heard one of them say, "Between the activities or inactivities of the present Conservative government and the grasshoppers in western Canada we farmers are in a pretty bad fix." That is why they have no money to spend on necessary articles, and why so many farmers are leaving their farms. A peculiar circumstance is to see the Minister of Colonization, together with various provincial ministers attempting to place people back on the farms, at a time when real farmers are leaving their farms because, owing to the policies of this government, they cannot make a living. Farmers have been deluded; they realize now that this government has neither blasting power nor business ability with which to run the affairs of the country.

Members of the government are going through the country making further excuses, and placing before the people the effects of the Ottawa agreements. Let us examine the results of those agreements. In 1929, without those famous or infamous Ottawa agreements, trade within the empire was valued at $793,000,000, whereas in 1933 it had fallen to $342,000,000, showing a loss of $451,000,000. The government ought to know by this time that Canada is an exporting country and that our 10,000,000 people are able to manufacture and produce far more than they can consume. For that reason we ought not to regulate our channels of trade in any one particular direction; we ought to be prepared to trade with any country of the world willing to trade with us.

I should like to ask the farmers now the question the present Prime Minister asked them during the election campaign of 1930, at a time when he was leader of the opposition. He asked, "How much money have you in your pockets as a result of the King administration?" Then he said, "Let that be your answer." At this time I ask the farmers, "How much money have you in your pockets to-day, as a result of the policy of the Bennett government?"—and I ask them to let that be their answer. I am satisfied as to what their answer will be. Is it any wonder that we have a railroad problem on our hands in view of all these restrictions on trade, these wheat agreements and other restrictive agreements, and all the loss of trade consequent thereto? What has been the effect on our railroads of all this loss of trade? In 1930 carloadings stood at 3,146,247, and in 1933 at 2,032,157, or a decrease in the three years of 1,114,090. That of course has had its effect on railroad earnings, and that is the reason why we have a railroad problem on our hands to-day.

What has been the effect on railway earnings? In 1930 railway earnings amounted to $454,000,000, and 1932 the earnings had dropped to $293,000,000, or a decrease of $161,000,000. Is it any wonder that the railway companies had to lay off men and put other employees on short time and make a reduction in the wages of the railway men in order to make up that loss in earnings of $161,000,000? The spectacle of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) on the floor of the house the other day when he read a letter from the heads of the railway unions in this country thanking the Prime Minister for intervening at a time when they were about to strike to maintain a semblance of justice was one of the most childish things I think I have ever seen in a public body in my life. Why, the Minister of Labour will find on his files, and if he cannot, I can produce them, although I regard them more as personal letters than anything else, dozens and dozens of letters from the railway unions and other unions all over this country thanking the then Minister of Labour and the government in power in this country from 1926 to 1930—for doing what? For redressing their grievances and settling their controversies without the necessity for a strike at a time when they were getting increased wages. But now under this government we have the Minister of Railways standing on the floor of this chamber and saying how proud he was of the Prime Minister intervening in a labour dispute at a time when the railway men of this country had to take a fifteen per cent reduction in their wages. A great achievement! I am glad that it is the present government, and not one of which I was a member, that boasts of such an achievement.

Then there followed a reduction in the staff of the railroads. Some men were laid off and others were put on short time. That naturally affected the earnings of the railway men and reduced the purchasing power of the citizens of this country. To what extent? In 1929 salaries and wages for railway employees in Canada amounted in round figures to $290,000,000; in 1931 they earned less by $64,000,000; in 1932 they again earned less by $109,000,000; in 1933 again they earned less by $130,000,000. In other words $240,000,000 less was paid to the railway men in salaries and wages after three years of the policies of this government.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. GORDON: Has the hon. member the figures for the United States railways for the corresponding period?

Mr. HEENAN: No, I am dealing with the railway men in Canada.

Mr. GORDON: I suggest that they might be useful for purposes of comparison.

Mr. HEENAN: I have not got those figures, and if I had I do not think they should be compared with the figures I have given, because it was not President Hoover or President Roosevelt who told the railway men of this country that if the present government was put in power they would be working full time and overtime at increased wages, and that their wives would be going around the kitchen and the dining room happy and smiling every day. It was my hon. friend's friend, the gentleman who is now high commissioner for Canada in England, who went out and told that to the people of this country.

Mr. GORDON: The only reason I interjected was that if the hon. gentleman had the figures before him for the United States railways for the corresponding period I would have liked to see them spread on the record where they would be readily available.

Mr. HEENAN: If I had them I would not have spread them on the record, because I am talking about Canada and not about the United States. It was a very high price for the railroad men of this country to pay—$243,000,000 less in wages and salaries in three years—for putting in power a government that advocates and puts into effect policies that tend toward a restriction of trade. If my hon. friend wants to compare the United States and Canadian railroads, I can tell him that so far as Canada's railways are concerned the number of railway employees in this country decreased by 65,000 in 1933 as compared with 1929. That is not ending unemployment. This government is simply adding to the hordes of unemployed, and apparently now the government has made up its mind that there will be no further necessity for many of the railroads in this country. The government has given up hope that they will ever get much of this lost trade back, because last year they passed the most iniquitous piece of legislation that was ever put over on a people in a white man's country. It was camouflage, because it resulted in the amalgamation of the operations of the railroads of Canada and in a pooling and merging of their services under the guise of cooperation. The purpose of this legislation was to eliminate duplication and certain main lines and branch line services. So it is quite evident that this government has made up its mind that we shall no longer require railroads to the same extent that we did previously. I say that that legislation was iniquitous because a direct pledge was given to the people by the present Prime Minister, standing in the centre of Canada on June 9, 1930, when he pledged himself and his party that the policy of his government with respect to the railroads would be "amalgamation never, competition ever". Before many years have gone by, Mr. Speaker, the words of warning I have given will be found to be only too true. Competition? It is not competition that we are getting on the railways. The present Prime Minister must have known the conditions of the railroads at that time. He was not a young and green member of this house. He had been in parliament for years and had taken part in the debates on railway matters. I recall the time in this house, I think it was in 1913 or 1914, when he designated the present leader of the government in the Senate as the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann. So he was well versed in the railway situation at the time he was speaking. He it was who stated at Winnipeg on June 9, 1930, "We are all proud of this nationally owned system. We are proud of the transportation system of Canada." And he also said during that campaign, speaking, as he said, to one million of his fellow countrymen over the radio, "If any of you hear or see me tampering with the railroads, ask for my resignation, because I shall be unworthy of the great position to which I aspire." Then lo and behold! we find that we have an amalgamation of the railways under the guise of cooperation. We find that there has taken place a pooling of passenger and freight traffic, and that about ninety railway men have been laid off by the pooling of services between Ottawa and Toronto. The Minister of Railways, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the other day, stated that ninety-six men were affected between Quebec and Montreal. When he was reading a letter he had received from the chairman of the board of trustees he said that these ninety-six men would not lose their positions; apparently he was trying to leave the impression that they would just revert to other jobs by virtue of their seniority. Everyone knows that these ninety-six men engaged in passenger service would not lose their jobs; they would find work in mixed or freight service, but they would push ninety-six other men off the bottom of the list. Men who have been twenty and twenty-five years in the railway service, and who have worked themselves up to be engineers and conductors, cannot get jobs to-day as wipers or brakemen.

This measure states that further relief is needed by the provinces. I wonder if the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) have looked up the public works estimates from 1930 down to the present. Those estimates show a continuous reduction in the amounts voted for public works. Public works would have furnished relief to the unemployed in the various provinces. During the elections of 1930 this government promised that they would construct a great national highway with funds from the federal treasury, and that they would administer old age pensions from the federal exchequer. They promised also that they would provide for technical educational training, and in 1931 passed a bill under which an annual payment of $750,000 was to be made for fifteen years. Had those payments for technical education been made, a total of $2,250,000 would have been paid to the provinces down to the present time.

After listening to the speech of my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) one can understand why there is such a small amount left with which to pay the wages of the working men of this country. I may have something to say about this in the future. This government permits the governments of Ontario and other provinces to pay starvation wages under the guise of unemployment relief at a time when they are contributing one-half the cost. Why they have nothing to say about this is beyond me. This bill gives the government full power to make regulations with respect to the matter. When the subject was first before the house in 1930 the government made the promise that the fair wage and eight hour day clauses would apply to these works. According to the regulations which I have before me the provincial governments are permitted to set a maximum wage, that is, the government receiving money shall not pay more than what is paid by the federal government for the same class of work. The provincial government may pay as small a wage as they want to as long as they do not pay a wage higher than that paid by the federal government. This is a reversal of the whole fair wage policy; it allows a maximum wage instead of a minimum wage.

Having regard to the fact that we have a Conservative government in power; that this government has destroyed the trade of Canada; that this government has apparently given up all hope of recovering that trade; that this government led the way in the reduction of wages and seemed to be proud of having done so, I suppose we should be very thankful even for this bill. Perhaps we should get up and thank the Minister of Labour and the government on behalf of the workers of Canada for allowing them to live. All I can see in this bill is the giving of a pittance to the workers to keep them from hungering to death. I can speak with knowledge on this matter because during last fall I visited some of these men. I saw the conditions in their homes. I have seen sickness and death in the homes of men who were working on the highways in northern Ontario. I have seen a hat passed around to buy a casket. I do not want to shed crocodile tears and try to make things out to be worse than they are. Whatever this government may give to the provincial governments, to the municipalities or to any other body, they should act according to the wish of this house, and it is the expressed wish of this house that fair wages should be paid on all works constructed by means of contributions, grants or guarantees from the federal government. With the exceptions as expressed by my right hon. leader, I support this bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house, although not the most important one that will come before us this session, at least deals with what I conceive to be the most difficult problem confronting the Canadian people, namely, that of taking care of those who, by reason of unemployment, are unable to take care of themselves. More particularly is this the case because of the difficulties with which those are beset who are endeavouring to get Canadian workingmen into employment where they can earn a living for themselves and their families.

I am not at the moment going to follow the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan), who preceded me immediately before six o'clock, excepting as regards one question. My hon. friend made a comparison of the attitude of the present government with regard to unemployment with that of the government of which he was a member prior to 1930. This reminded me very forcibly of a situation that developed in the part of the country with which I am more particularly acquainted, northern Ontario, when from a period quite early in 1929 there had been a serious unemployment situation in the pulp and paper industry arising out of the collapse in a large measure of that industry. The hon. member who preceded me as representative for East Algoma, the Hon. Mr. Bowman, came to Ottawa to intercede with the Minister of Labour of that day, to see whether he could arrange some plan whereby the federal Department of Labour would join with the government of Ontario in providing relief for the 389 families that were entirely destitute at Espanola. The delegation that was here to meet the then member for East Algoma had the pleasure of sitting in the gallery immediately above where I stand and watching the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, then Minister of Labour, pound his desk in ecstatic glee as his leader spat out the words: "Not a five cent piece" to relieve unemployment in Ontario.

Mr. BRADETTE: In Ontario?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, in Ontario.

Mr. BRADETTE: He never mentioned Ontario.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have said many times that I know of no other man who is quite so good a friend of labour in this country as is the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River except at times when there might be a possibility of his being in a position to do something for the workingman. At other times, however, he makes use of his position for political purposes to render it difficult for all those who directly or indirectly are endeavouring to provide employment for workingmen in Canada.

A few days ago, speaking in the house on this and kindred subjects, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) made statements to which I shall refer in some little detail later on, but at the moment I wish to say that those statements were of a character that indicate one of two things, and the hon. members can take their choice. They were either speaking of something of which they knew absolutely nothing or deliberately misrepresenting the facts. I might put the situation more strongly than that, but I think that will indicate what I mean.

In an effort to relieve unemployment, to put men back to work, the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia last year took steps to confer with operating lumbermen, pulp and paper manufacturers, to see what could be done, to take advantage of the opportunities presented in the United Kingdom market by reason of the 1932 Ottawa agreements, and also of the apparent upturn in the pulp and paper industry to see what the operators could do in getting men into the woods. As the situation in Ontario had been specifically mentioned, I shall deal with that province alone because I happen to know something of conditions there. As nearly as it was possible to tell, every operator from the Ottawa river to the western boundary line adjoining Manitoba met together with the Minister of Lands and Forests and his officials in Toronto and discussed the problem for a full day. Arrangements were made under which a number of operators agreed to undertake certain operations that they felt then were justified in order to take men off relief in northern Ontario. When I give the house the story of what has happened in the meantime, it will have some appreciation of what I meant when I spoke of the difficulties facing those who were endeavouring to provide employment to men who were on unemployment relief. No sooner had those operations begun, no sooner had it been announced that certain firms, contractors and companies were arranging to put men into the bush, than a composite organization which can best be described as the federation of Canadian communists, began to take action to make it impossible for woods operations to be carried on. The difficulty arose first in the Port Arthur district; it later spread to what is termed northern Ontario in its most northern point along the transcontinental railway, Kapuskasing, Smooth Rock Falls, Cochrane, Iroquois Falls; then along the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario and later along the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway through the part of the country in which I live. As evidence of the character of the organization let me say that ten days before any employer of labour or woods operator in the Port Arthur district was advised by any man or organization that there was any difficulty whatsoever, a communist newspaper, the original editor of which, Arvo Vaara, was deported from this country, published in Sudbury a notice to bush workers throughout northern Ontario advising them that there were going to be strikes in the woods operations in that section and saying: "Woodsmen, keep away."

Now I come closer to home, because I want to give just the situation of which I have personal knowledge. There were two contractors, Messrs. Brownlee Brothers and Mr. Robineau, substantial woods operators, men who have been in business in that country for twenty-four years, who are looked upon as ideal contractors, who have never had any difficulty whatever with their employees, maintaining the very best of relations with them and paying the highest rates of wages prevailing in the industry in that district. Arrangements had been made by which those contractors could give employment to approximately 700 men, and they began in October. With every gang of men that went into those camps there went a communist or two communists, agitators, to make it impossible for the work to be carried on. I have under my hand a list of more than 500 men who received transportation, meals en route, clothing after they arrived at the camp, tools with which to work for Brownlee Brothers, and who remained there just long enough to get a good square meal or two, and then walked out. Others remained in the camps long enough to perform some labour, but none of them long enough in the main to make it possible for the contractor to fill his contract. In a moment I will tell you why. The same applied to the contractor further down the river, Mr. Robineau. These men had never had the slightest difficulty in 1931, the last year they operated in the section, for as soon as it was known by workingmen that these contractors were going back into the woods, men flocked in; it was not necessary to send outside for anyone. But the situation this year was entirely different. These organizations, financed from outside this country—from soviet Russia in fact—in order to make it impossible for the Canadian lumber and timber industry to take advantage of the preference we secured in the United Kingdom and the curtailment of Russian timber purchases by Great Britain as a result of the Ottawa agreements, determined that they were not going to allow the Canadian lumber industry to come back if they could prevent it. In the particular location to which I am referring these activities were carried on through October, November, December and part of January, making it impossible to keep men in the woods, or to get those who were in the woods to do a day's work, with the exception of a minority. Men were constantly going in and coming out. The doctrine was preached to them: Your purpose in going in there is not to perform the service for which you will be paid, but to make it impossible to perform service at all, as was stated in the circular that was then circulated and is now being circulated throughout the lumber and pulp camps in northern Ontario. I have a copy of a circular that was distributed throughout these camps on the Jack Pine river and camps in the Port Arthur and Nipigon districts, and that is being circulated to-day through camps on the Kapuskasing and at Smooth Rock Falls. In effect it said: "If you are cutting pulpwood by the cord, do just sufficient to enable you to earn your board, but not sufficient to enable the contractor to fill his contract. If you are hauling and are expected to haul six loads, be careful that you do not haul more than four." The hauling season is short and if the wood is to be got out it must be got out rapidly. The foreman cannot be at every turn in the road where a load might upset. This really means damage of equipment as well as delay in the work.

That is one circular. Another one that is being distributed through the camps in northern Ontario is to this effect: "The camps will soon break up, and the men will have to come out of the bush. Do not go to your homes; stay at Kapuskasing"—where this organization has rented a large building and opened headquarters—"at Cochrane, or at Iroquois Falls, in order that we may make it impossible for the wood that is now in the rivers to be driven out on the drives, and tie up the pulp and paper mills."

Mr. BRADETTE: Who signed that circular?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will tell the name of the man who signed that letter, it is D. Makela, of Port Arthur, the secretary of the communist organization. The man who signed the circulars that are going round the country now goes under a variety of names. He operated in the Chapleau district at one time under the name of Davis, another time Reilly and another time Dacko. My friend said a few days ago he knew all about it. These men, like their organization, change their name to suit the particular place or conditions under which they are working. I heard one of them make the statement in a public building in northern Ontario that his purpose in changing his name was that it made it easier for him to evade the police.

Now may I give you one or two concrete instances of this plan of malingering and sabotage. Because unlike my hon. friend, who says he visited the camps and never did—

Mr. BRADETTE: I ask the hon. member to retract that. I visited camps in my own section of the country.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not going to wait at this moment—

Mr. BRADETTE: I want it withdrawn now. The hon. member said I did not do it, and I did.

Mr. SPEAKER: What does the hon. member object to?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. BRADETTE: I object to the hon. member telling this house that I said I visited some camps, but that I did not. I say I did visit the camps.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In Hansard of March 12, at page 1415, you find in the second column my hon. friend began his remarks with regard to what he termed the strike situation in the Chapleau district. For the whole of that column and a substantial part of the next he is referring to the Chapleau district. Let me quote one thing he said:

Some hon. members may object—

That is after the hon. member threatened to read to the house a nineteen page letter:

—but these men have been suffering. They do not know just where to find a solution for their problem. It is stated in this letter that certain comps are absolutely filthy and not fit for human habitation. I know—

How did the hon. member know?

—that no hon. member would live in them for even half a day.

That had reference to camps in the Chapleau district. Which camps were they? Later on my hon. friend said these camps were not in his constituency, and further on he said: "I visited these camps and know what I am talking about." If you read that page and a half of Hansard you will find verification for every word I have said. That is why I said at the outset that my hon. friend, like the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, was talking about something he knew nothing about, or was using his position in the House of Commons deliberately to misrepresent the facts. I personally visited those camps on an average of once a week from the fifteenth of October until to-day, every one of them. I know what the conditions are; I know how men were working and what they were doing.

Mr. MANION: The Ontario board of health inspectors visited them too, did they not?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, not once, but twice, at my request, to see that the camps were in proper condition. I went to one camp, and I shall just give this as an illustration of the organized malingering. Fifty-two men were engaged in cutting pulpwood by the cord at a price ten per cent higher than that which is provided for under the N.R.A. code in the states of Michigan and Wisconsin and the northeastern part of the United States. That rate prevails both for monthly men and for piece workers all over northern Ontario, in the district represented by my hon. friend as well as that which I have the privilege of representing. These fifty-two men produced in one week 206 cords of pulpwood—a fair average but not up to normal. But when analysis was made of what the men actually did it was found that twenty-one of these men produced 162 cords and thirty-one produced 44 cords out of the 206. Half of the thirty-one men did not produce a cord of wood in a week. Thus it was made impossible for the contractor to operate, and he was defrauded of the money he had advanced for transportation, food and clothing for these men, to the extent that Brownlee Brothers are to-day out of pocket in actual cash in that regard between $6,000 and $7,000. I know it had exceeded $6,000 at the end of January; I have not the figures for February or March up to date.

But that is not all. The communists work through these camps all the time. I have proof of the fact that when a group of men is put on the train by the employment service at Toronto, or when a group of men is put on at Sudbury, one or two communists get on the train with them and go into the camps. The camps are permeated with them. They continued this from the 30th October to the 15th of January. Then six communists, financed by Vapaus in Sudbury, secured tickets under false pretences, giving false names, from the government employment office and came to Brownlee Brothers' headquarters and were sent to the Jack Pine river on January 9. They hired as pulpwood cutters. They had never cut pulpwood in their lives, and so acknowledged; they knew nothing about it. They stated to travellers on the train that their purpose in going there was finally to tie up Brownlee's work, and bring about a strike if they could. It just happened that I was in the camps on that occasion; I did not know or see the men at that time, but I was there and I knew where these men went on their arrival that night. On January 15, I received a wire in Toronto that the men were leaving Brownlee's camps. I took the first train to Chapleau, from which point I went into the camps by plane to see what was the situation. I arrived on Tuesday, the sixteenth, and as I flew over the tote road I could see the men coming out.

Let me repeat that not a single man employed by Brownlee Brothers ever made any representation that he was dissatisfied with his wages or with the conditions under which he was living or working. After the men had left the camps, however, a series of demands was presented to Brownlee Brothers by a communist who had hired under the name of Riley. This man at times went under the name of Dacko, and as nearly as it is possible to learn his real name was Davis. He was an ex-convict who had been out on ticket of leave for about a year; his leave had just elapsed. I am not going to take time to read these demands, which cover five pages, but I should like to quote one or two of them. One demand was that Brownlee Brothers undertake to secure the release of seven communists from Kingston penitentiary. Another was that they secure the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code, and another was that they undertake to recognize all workers' organizations, including the communist party. Finally they demanded that if the work were to be carried on in these camps the company had to undertake to agree to allow the workers' unity league, as it was called there, to organize camp committees, such committees to say where the men would work, how they would work, how the timber should be cut and so on, and no man was to be disciplined or removed without the consent of the committee. Let me say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I have something, though not all, to do with Brownlee Brothers. When the time comes for the communists to say how the work is going to be carried on, then instead of using their funds to destroy industry in this country they will have to use their funds to finance industry.

It was stated, as my hon. friend has stated, that there was a strike. I say to you now, sir, and I know whereof I speak, that there never was a strike of any kind. Men were jumping, to use the expression used in the lumbering industry; they were walking out without saying why they were going or anything else. It is true that on January 15 and 16 these communists succeeded in getting a larger number to leave, but, as I say, they made no representations to their employers as to any changes they might desire. These communists were not employees of Brownlee Brothers in any sense whatever. They were there under false pretences, and if I had my way the law of this country would be changed in order that these men could be put behind the bars, where they belong, for that sort of thing. Of a total of 561 men, 228 walked out. I had occasion to meet the men at their headquarters; I mingled with them, and I saw men whom I have known for years being led around by the nose by a group of men whose only purpose in this world is to destroy the opportunity for Canadian citizens to earn a living. One of the communists, who is now in gaol, had broken his parole in order to participate in this disorganization of industry in northern Ontario. He came out ahead of the men and came to the town of Chapleau. He had enough money to hire a large hotel; he hired the whole building, as he said, to accommodate five hundred men, and he agreed to give these men $5 a day if they would remain there. But it did not take the men long to become disillusioned. A group of men came to see me at my house one evening. I asked, "Why are you here?" They answered, "We dare not go to your office." I said, "Why? Anybody who wants to walk into that office is welcome." They replied that they had been threatened that if they attempted to go back to work they would be manhandled. I said, "Come to the Canadian Pacific railway station to-night, and if you want to go back to the work you left last week I will see that you get protection." In three days 128 of the men who came out originally returned to their work. They are there yet; they are happy and contented and are doing good work. The communists showed their hand just a little too soon, and we were able to get them out.

Let me give you an illustration of what that means. Of these men twenty-four were pulpwood cutters; this is a joint operation of pulpwood and saw logs. These men were making less than two cords of wood a week before they came out; that was their average. During the first thirty days after they were back in the woods their average was 32½ cords, which is a reasonable amount of work during that period of the year. Here is another point. Tractors are being used in these operations as well as teams. A tractor would start out with a load of perishable food supplies; when it was halfway to the camps on a cold day, or perhaps not even halfway, just a reasonable walking distance for the driver, he would make up his mind to quit the job. Thereupon he would walk back to headquarters and leave the tractor loaded with the perishable supplies in the woods, on the lake, or wherever it happened to be.

That was all part of a general plan. What happened when these men came to Chapleau? They immediately applied for direct relief; that was what was being preached to them. I have positive evidence as to statements made to these men by communist agitators, who said, "Why should you work in the woods for Brownlee Brothers? Why should you stay here cutting pulpwood or saw logs, driving horses or working at anything else? The government of Ontario has to feed you." That doctrine, Mr. Speaker, is being spread across this country; these people are being encouraged by loose lipped agitators inside and outside of this house, whose sole purpose is not to get Canada back on a sound basis and provide work for working men but to create disturbances, either for political purposes or for their own selfish ends.

Before I conclude I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who I am sorry is not in his seat. I wish to say the same thing to him that I have said with regard to the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette); he, too, was either stating things he knew nothing about, or deliberately misrepresenting the facts. This is the statement of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River after outlining what happened at the head of the lakes, and throughout northern Ontario. Then he said that the Hon. Mr. Finlayson—and may I say the Hon. Mr. Finlayson can take care of himself in any duel with either the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River or the hon. member for North Timiskaming—called in the lumber operators—this was after these strikes had occurred to which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred—and reduced the dues from $1.80 to $1 a cord. I have just read the letter of the hon. member for North Timiskaming, and his complaint is that when Chapleau timber was reduced from $1.80 to $1 a cord the operator got the full value of $1.80, and not the men to whom the hon. member referred.

In that sentence there are just three misstatements. In the first place the Minister of Lands and Forests did not call in the operators after any strike or any labour difficulty occurred. He called the pulp and timber operators in before anybody attempted or thought of putting any men in the bush. It is true that he did reduce the dues on pulpwood, but he did not reduce them from $1.80 to $1, because the dues on pulpwood in Ontario never were $1.80 a cord. The dues stand at $1.40, and he reduced them to $1. But with the increment accruing to the pulp and paper company who undertook to finance and organize the operation of the operators at Chapleau to which reference was made—Brownlee Brothers—they had nothing more to do with the dues than had any hon. member in this house. And if the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River knew what he was talking about—and I think he does—he knew that when he was making his statement.

There has been organized in the province of Ontario a lumber workers union known as the Canadian Bushmen's Union. May I say at this point that there is no man in this house or out of it who is a more confirmed and convinced advocate of collective bargaining than I am. I have worked and fought for it for fifty years. The Canadian Bushmen's

Union are not financed from Russia or the soviets, but they are financing themselves and appealing to the Canadian people for support. Let me point out to hon. members some of the things they have set out with regard to these communist groups in a memorandum which is being widely circulated, in an appeal for support:

With such membership as they could secure they have combined forces for the purpose of calling strikes, and through force and threats have compelled unorganized workers who are greatly in the majority to obey their commands. They have failed miserably either to represent the timber workers or to benefit them. And now they are striving for a general industrial upheaval. Unorganized workers in the timber industry have determined that these bolshevik sideshows shall cease.

And I say now that the lumber industry in Ontario, in fact the whole industry in Canada, is ready to cooperate with any properly organized group of Canadian workmen who will get together and make use of a plan of collective bargaining, and say that they will enter into contracts with their employers. Contracts will be carried out, better conditions will prevail, and the industry can get back on its feet.

May I say to hon. members, however, that this outlaw organization is known under a variety of names. Sometimes it is referred to as the Industrial Lumber Workers, other times as the Industrial Workers of the World, other times as the Canadian Labour Defence League, and other times as the Workers United League. What happened in my hon. friend's own constituency? One of the pulp and paper companies undertook to make a contract with these fellows, and the men returned to work. But inside of a week the same men were back and took the men out of three more camps. When protest was entered they said, "Oh, that strike was declared by the Labour Defence League; we are the Workmen's United League." This happened with the same men and same organizations but under different names. That is the sort of thing that is going on. However, at this time I cannot go into the matter at further length, as my time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Canadian Bushmen's Union sets this out:

The organization issuing this information is Canadian first and last. It is registered under the Dominion Trade Unions Act and affiliated with all Canadian unions in a National Canadian Labour Congress. Its members have complete liberty of conscience in matters political and religious. Their organization is not interested in industrial strife and upheaval. It wants peace in industry, intelligent discussion, and goodwill manifested regarding workers' problems, and a fair deal.

Then these men say:

A strike should always be the last, not the first resort.

Every man who has any knowledge of how organized labour has worked and built up an organization knows that that is a fact. They present their grievances to their employers and negotiate for an agreement. But these people never let the employer know what they are going to do. The men are induced to leave the woods without saying why they are going, or anything about it.

Then, just one other point to show the lengths to which these so-called worker's organizations will go. In the Port Arthur-Fort William area last year they went the distance of closing the national highway. With this in mind they placed pickets on the highways leading out in every direction from Port Arthur and Fort William, and unless one carried a permit from communist headquarters he was not allowed to pass. I have in my hand three photostatic copies of such permits, all signed by the same man, D. Makela, one of the men who came to tie up the operations of Brownlee Brothers. The certificate reads that so and so may pass over the highway. These people went further than that; they closed the stables and barns of two or three lumber companies, and would not allow anybody to enter the barns in order to feed the horses. The humane society intervened.

These are the methods by which they preach peace in this country. Here are three cards which any member may see. I had an opportunity of discussing the situation with the management of a pulp and paper industry in northern Ontario which controls certain mills. They have 175,000 cords of pulpwood to be driven down the stream to their mills, and these people have been working and organizing for the purpose of making the drives impossible. The result would be that the mills will be closed down. They will do it in every other part of the country if they can.

One last word. As a result of their efforts to-day in British Columbia the logging industry is virtually tied up, and the mills in Vancouver are forced to buy their logs from Washington and Oregon and tow them up the Pacific coast, so as to be able to fill their contracts in Australia, the orient and the United Kingdom. The possible and almost probable result is that the operations of these people will defeat the very thing which for so long we have been fighting for. We were supported by our government in that fight, and were able to open up a market for a thousand million feet of lumber, and to give employment to 50,000 men in Canada. These people are determined to make that impossible. I personally know an eastern lumber operator who has been forced to cancel cargoes of lumber from eastern Canada because of this very thing, and that is the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of this house will assist by their irresponsible prattle both in the house and out of it with regard to these conditions.

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): It is easy to note, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) is still posing as a moralist in this country. He is bent on throwing out insinuations and innuendoes against the reputation of hon. members.

Mr. STEWART (Lethbridge): His reputation is as high as yours.

Mr. BRADETTE: Are you a judge of that? I have not said anything to the hon. member (Mr. Stewart), and I shall not because it is not my habit to do so. In 1926 my hon. friend from East Algoma was moralizing on the whole civil service. He said something during that campaign which no decent man would ever have said.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would you like me to read it?

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, I would.

Mr. NICHOLSON: With the Speaker's consent I will. This is the third time since 1930 that I have been challenged with regard to that so-called statement. I hold in my hand a copy of Maclean's magazine, dated July 15, 1926. I spoke for five minutes at North Bay on the occasion to which my hon. friend has referred, and I then held in my hand the same copy of Maclean's magazine that I am holding now. At page 16 of that magazine will be found an article written by H. Napier Moore.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacNicol): I shall have to rule the hon. member out of order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then I shall have to take another opportunity of gratifying the curiosity of my hon. friend. But I am rising now, Mr. Speaker, to a question of privilege. The hon. member for North Timiskaming has stated that I made a statement at North Bay that no decent man would make, and he challenged me to repeat it. Mr. Moore, whom I have never had the privilege of meeting, wrote an article for Maclean's magazine entitled "Wanted: Clean Government," and I am only going to read some of the extracts that I read on that occasion:

Mr. King was compelled to resign because sufficient Progressives made an emphatic gesture in behalf of wholesome administration. Mr. Meighen's first and most important vote was obtained on the question of wholesome administration. However much the politicians may clack their tongues about constitutionalities—important in themselves—to the advantage or disadvantage of this or that party, the underlying issue which necessitated a new election was, and still is, that of clean government. No amount of hustings ballyhooing, no amount of logicians' hair-splitting, no amount of frenzied flag-waving can alter that fact. . . .

Stripped of all political camouflage, the sober fact is that the ship of state piloted by Mr. King foundered on the rocks of corruption. Admitted that the Conservative board of strategy forged a political weapon when the gravity of the customs report was apparent—

Then further on:

The plea has been made that the officials of the King government were no worse than their predecessors. That is for the judicial commission to decide. . . .

In short, the first minister of the land sacrificed the honour of Canada to political expediency.

Then, when at last he realized that exposure was certain, he "got rid of" a discredited minister by appointing him to the Senate—an insult to that body—an act which placarded the upper chamber as a haven for a former minister of the crown who stands charged with debauching his subordinates, a minister who hobnobbed with crooks and despoilers of the treasury, a minister whose conduct is described by investigators as being unspeakable.

There is no need to harp on the tactics of certain of the other members of the King cabinet. One former minister already has been censured by a vote of the house. The evidence presented to parliament speaks for itself. The evidence in the investigators' reports as yet not made public discloses vileness that cannot be referred to in a family magazine.

That is exactly what I referred to at North Bay, Mr. Speaker. It is the only thing I said, and if that is any satisfaction to my hon. friend he is welcome to it.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member may have said that at North Bay, but he said something else. He made allusions to the civil service—they were all bawdy houses.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: Certainly he was wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He never said it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, he said it, and no wonder he tried to take it out of that statement. It is evidently in the minds of all hon. members that he said it in 1926.

I have not a single word to retract of what I said on strikes in northern Ontario during the debate on the address, or of what I said last Thursday. I placed the situation fairly and squarely before the house and the country, and I will leave it to the people of my section to judge my statement. The hon. member for East Algoma tried to insinuate that I was in sympathy with the communists.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who says "hear, hear"?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do.

Mr. BRADETTE: You will have to prove that statement. I spoke in Iroquois Falls, Cochrane and Kapuskasing before some of the strike leaders, and I told them that I was not in sympathy with any kind of communism or radicalism, but that I was in sympathy with labour unionism. If to help the labourers and their organizations is to be a radical, then I am a radical. Will the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Nicholson) compare our national and international labour unions in Canada with the communists?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am going to accept that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: You are a Liberal.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am very proud of it. Much more proud than I would be of being a reactionary. During that strike in my own section of the country, where the conditions are better than they are in East Algoma, and I say that frankly, the International Sulphite and Paper Company workers of Kapuskasing, Smooth Rock Falls and Iroquois Falls gave an hour's pay per week to support the strike. They had support also from the mining unions in the Porcupine and Kirkland Lake district. These organizations are not communist in their ideas or their ideals. Some of the leaders might have been criticized for their actions, but you can always tell a tree by its fruits, and if we had strikes in the lumber camps of northern Ontario and Quebec last fall I want to point out that the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec have since found it possible to amend their laws so that to-day the bushmen are getting fairer remuneration and better sanitary conditions than they had previous to the strike. So they were absolutely right in striking.

In the debate on the address I said that an eighteen page letter had been sent to me by a strike leader in the Chapleau district, and I challenge the hon. member for East Algoma to tell me whether the man who writes this letter is a communist or a radical. The letter is written by Mr. Ellard Connolly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Ellard Connolly never wrote the letter.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have it here; it is signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly, and he gave me permission to use it and read it. I will leave that point to the judgment of the house. I am not going to read the whole of this letter to-night, but just one paragraph telling of sanitary conditions at some of the camps of Austin and Nicholson in the district of Chapleau:

> The living conditions in most of the camps are best explained by the word "uncivilized." All men on entering the camps were not issued with clean blankets, as provincial laws demand. When the camps first opened in the fall, clean blankets were issued to approximately five hundred men, but since that I venture to estimate well over another thousand men have used these same blankets without being washed. I myself was issued with a used blanket taken directly from another man's bunk. This is a direct violation against the board of health regulations of Ontario, regulating sanitary conditions in lumber camps in unorganized districts, for which violation a penalty is prescribed by the act.
> The point in this instance which I wish to bring out is that this serious violation being permitted allows for the spread of infectious skin diseases, and even worse, the dread social disease termed "venereal." The citizens of Canada spend much money and I believe have enacted special laws to guard against the social health of the country being afflicted with venereal disease. I know, and I have proof, that infectious skin disease has been contracted from such blankets—

Mr. MUNN: What camp is that?

Mr. BRADETTE: I said Austin and Nicholson's in the Chapleau district. The letter continues:

> —on the limits of Austin and Nicholson. I saw, along with a witness here, a young and apparently clean man assigned to the bunk and blankets of another man who was fired from the camp in the morning because he was so far gone with venereal disease that he was not able to do his work. This was reported to the proper authorities at the time, but still the same conditions exist.

I intend to read the whole letter when we are in committee. The hon. member compels me to take this action, as it is always easy to cast reflections upon certain bodies of men or even upon members of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADETTE: I challenge hon. members to contradict what I said to the house or to say that I have ever tried to cast reflections upon any section of the population or any member of this parliament. I never stoop to personalities, but there is one thing I am always ready to do and that is to fight for the common people and the under dog. I cannot understand why the hon. member for East Algoma got so hot when dealing with this matter. There must be a nigger in the woodpile somewhere. I should like to ask him just what happened up in that part of the country. A couple of weeks ago a magistrate's court was held in Chapleau when a number of contractors were charged with keeping insanitary camps. The hon. member for East Algoma appeared as a witness, and I should like him to tell the house what the decision of the court was.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member has stated that I appeared in court as a witness. I never appeared in court as a witness or as anything else in connection with that case. If it is an advantage to my hon. friend, let me tell him that the man who made the charges withdrew them in writing.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is still pending.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member said that there were no strikes in the Chapleau district, but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) recognized the fact that there were men still on strike in that section of the country. More than that, the hon. member brought some strikebreakers from the province of Quebec to work in his camps. He cannot deny that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, he can.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, you cannot. You cannot because it happened. I have another letter which I received from Mr. Ellard Connolly. This man is not a communist, regardless of what the hon. member may say. His letter reads as follows:

Regarding Chapleau bushmen's strike—

Mr. DUFF: Is that a Nicholson camp?

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes. The letter continues:

—the thirty strikers who have been supported by direct relief since February 6 were informed to-day by the relief officer here that he has no authority to grant any further relief after to-morrow, March 24; that there are places open for ten men on the Chapleau highway at a camp some forty-five miles from this town at the relief rate of $10 a month and board; that there are places open for eight men at the Lockalsh relief road camp, about sixty miles west of here, at the rate of board, tobacco and clothing and that he can issue any man with a railway fare to home or any outside point by Saturday night, March 24.

Mr. DUFF: What camps are those?

Mr. BRADETTE: Government camps. The letter continues:

This is apparently another move to disperse us before our civil action comes up against Austin and Nicholson Company for wages and damages due to wrongful dismissal. Neil O'Hara has at present obtained power of attorney from thirty-five strikers to advance their claims in his name. Our intentions are to remain here in an organized manner until the civil action is settled, as we have established our status and maintained it this far, the object of obtaining justice, but after to-morrow, as it has been mentioned to us by the town police here, we are possibly liable to arrest on a charge of vagrancy, as we do not intend to accept any of the propositions made by T. H. Wolfe, the relief officer, and are therefore cut off relief.

It would be in the interest of justice that we be maintained here in the manner that we have been up till now. The relief officer has been told by us of our civil action. When it is won, our intentions are to repay what has been expended on us individually for relief by the taxpayers. As citizens it is hard to understand the tactics of the relief authorities.

Should we be arrested on a charge of vagrancy under the foregoing conditions, what can we do to clear ourselves?

Yours respectfully,

Ellard Connolly.

The signature to this letter is authentic, and I believe it gives an answer to the innuendo made by the hon. member. Again I repeat, I am in favour of labour organizations in our lumber camps. I repeat the statement I made in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, that conditions existing in some of the camps were a disgrace to the Canadian nation. As far as the activities of communists are concerned, if any of these people attempted to get into any of these camps, they would be thrown out. The big newsprint mills at Kapuskasing, Spruce Falls and Iroquois Falls have recognized the new union. These companies are ready to bargain with the men and they have bargained and cooperated on several occasions since the strike was settled. The men are receiving justice from the larger corporations. Since the strike was settled the Ontario and Quebec governments have found it possible to amend their labour laws so that the axemen and bushmen in our section of the country will receive better treatment than they have in the past. I do not intend to retract one word of what I have said on two previous occasions. As the hon. member has made an attack upon me personally, when we get into committee I intend to give the whole history of the strike in the Austin and Nicholson camps in the Chapleau district.

Leaving this matter aside, I shall deal now at some length with a matter about which I have spoken on several occasions in previous years. The back to the land movement has a direct bearing upon the matter now before the house. A large number of people now residing in my section of the country have come under this scheme. They have left the larger centres of population in old Ontario and have taken up land in the clay belt, particularly in the riding which I have the honour to represent. I intend to follow the course I followed in the past and not make any destructive criticism of the administration. I intend to speak as a tiller of the soil and as a pioneer in my section of the country. I shall refer to the many good things which have happened under this scheme. If the government are really sincere, they will see that it is enlarged. This was the attitude I took in the fall of 1930, because I realized it was a step in the right direction. The following year the government was boasting that this movement was a success, although they had not found it possible to spend any money upon it. I told the government at the time that this movement would never be a success until more money was spent. Another movement was inaugurated the following year in a more concise form. By means of a tripartite agreement between the federal, provincial and municipal authorities, people were placed upon the land. This was an enlargement of the first scheme, and it promised more fruitful results. I am not going to go at any length into the details of that policy as it has been applied particularly in northern Ontario, but as a whole the back to the land movement has been a success. A few cases may be picked out; where men who have been following one type of occupation for ten, fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years are suddenly placed in new occupations in different centres of colonization, naturally some of them are found wanting and return to their previous locations. But generally speaking—and this applies particularly to every section of my riding—ninety per cent of the people placed in the back to the land movement scheme of this government are making a success of their new calling. There are anomalies; no doubt the system is not perfect, but I am giving due credit to the provincial and federal authorities for their effort to remedy to some extent, within the limit of the scheme, some of the drawbacks that a new population has to face.

Last year I stated that I thought the provincial government should have a better follow-up policy, and last summer I am glad to say that more attention was given to those new centres of population. First of all the people were placed in more concentrated areas; they were placed, for instance, in the township of Kennedy south of my home town. At least sixty families were put along the same road where the land was carefully surveyed to allow those people to have access to the main highway and to be closer to one another. This is certainly a step in the right direction.

One matter that I want to bring to the attention of the house at this time is the fact that there is much resentment of the attitude taken by the provincial authorities in not rendering monthly accounts of the money those people are receiving from the government. No doubt the prices are correct, but they do not know what they are paying for their goods; they do not know what they have to pay for the material they put into their buildings, stables and so forth, or what prices they are charged for some of the equipment they have received from the government. When the federal government finds it possible to grant those people $600, that amount becomes their sole property and they are entitled to receive a statement of their purchases of the previous month, the same as anyone dealing with a store on a credit basis is entitled to receive a statement of the goods purchased during the previous month. I am bringing this to the attention of the government because it is a matter that is easily remedied. Apart from a few minor anomalies that I found more particularly two years ago —the fact, for instance that some people were placed on new holdings where there was no colonization road and where they had to pack on their backs and in some instances carry for several miles provisions for themselves, their families and their cattle—the situation is being remedied gradually. Last summer the Hon. Mr. Finlayson found it possible to visit most of those new centres of colonization, not only in my section but in the whole of northern Ontario. There is, however, one anomaly that exists, under the present scheme, and it is something which will test the sincerity of the government in regard to it. The back to the land policy has caught the attention of the whole of the Canadian people. It came at the proper time; it has been accentuated on account of the prevailing economic conditions. The movement holds great promise for the equilibrium of population between the urban and the rural centres, but I state frankly and sincerely that the present scheme does not go far enough. One limitation I have in mind, and one that is practically at the root of the question of the present administration of this policy, is the fact that it is a tripartite scheme. There is a section of our population which will more readily settle on the land, the farmers' sons, the young people who have spent their youth on the farm. This I suppose applies to every rural section not only of Ontario but of Canada generally. These young people find it impossible under this scheme to receive the $600 offered by the three different governments. I maintain that if the federal government is sincere in regard to this policy it will enlarge it, making it purely provincial and federal, so as to apply to all who have the necessary qualifications who live in organized or unorganized districts, in little towns, not necessarily in cities. I have in mind at the moment a number of people in my section, and this will apply just as forcibly to the riding of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). Our rural families have a surplus population that cannot be absorbed on the land, for the very good reason that while a farmer may be able to place a son—the eldest or maybe another—if he has two, three or four left, on account of the present financial situation he cannot place them also. Most of the farmers, practically all of them, find it impossible to place all their sons on the land. But if the scheme were enlarged to apply to young people not only in my section, but in every rural section of Canada, so that the $600 would be within their reach, thousands instead of hundreds of people would be induced to settle on the land. This would be a step in the right direction, and one of the best ways of solving the unemployment problem.

In all these schemes it is always easy to use poetic terms, to speak of the fine population living on the farms, and to describe farming as an arcadian occupation, almost an idyll, but any hon. member who knows the hard work the farmer has to do and the length of time he has to wait for the results of his labour without any remuneration therefor will realize that farmers are not interested in poetical descriptions. They want something concrete, something substantial. They feel that the government should enlarge the scheme. They know that the solution of the agricultural, the rural problem, means the solution of all the ills confronting the country, because the source of a nation's vitality is its rural population and the basis of its economic prosperity is agriculture.

[Mr. Bradette.]

I want to make myself very clear. Although for the last three years I did not criticize the movement, and it is not my intention to do so at the present time, I believe the people want this government to prove their sincerity by enlarging their policy. Only a few days ago in the Ontario legislature the Hon. Mr. Finlayson asked for the sum of $75,000 which will be required by the Ontario government to place 250 families on the land. Anyone familiar with the present unemployment situation realizes that to take only 200 or 250 families away from the urban centres and place them in rural districts is only a drop of water in the bucket; it is only a beginning in solving the problem. A few days ago the Minister of Labour said that in Ontario last year the sum of $25,000 was spent in the back to the land movement. Such a sum is simply ridiculous. The government, to show its sincerity in regard to this movement, should spend money not by the hundreds but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

There is a reason for the back to the land movement. Only a few days ago the Minister of Labour mentioned the fact that in the past we had a bad immigration policy. I am pleased to refer to that because some years ago when I was on the government side I deplored the attitude of the administration of that day towards immigration. A Canadian citizen is struck by the fact that most of the people who came here at that time had the idea of settling on the land. Although there was plenty of land available and the soil was fertile, because of the amount of capital required to farm ninety-five per cent of them found their way back into the cities. It was not so much the immigration policy that was wrong as the new social order we had to face. That trek of the rural population to the larger centres is not a new thing; you read of it in the history of countries like England, France, Italy and Germany, for centuries past. This trek to the large centres was accentuated when industry, reaching its golden age of development, became more highly specialized and a working man received a fair remuneration and was in a position to have at hand some ready cash. I remember my grandfather saying on several occasions that there were years when they did not see any real money on the farm. The movement to the larger centres of population was accentuated also by the war. Many demobilized young soldiers, having tasted of the pleasures and the glamour of city life, were not content to go back to the old father and the old farm. And so it was with the younger people who remained in Canada during the war, on account of the high wages they received in the munition factories. But now that the situation is so bad in the industrial centres; now that we have what is called technological unemployment, a displacement of labour in highly mechanized industries, we find people in the cities looking away beyond the confines of their habitat to the green fields of agricultural life. Most of those who want to go back to the land have had a certain amount of agricultural training. To-day we are talking of unemployment insurance, and it is coming; we hear of the four hour day and the five day week; they are coming. But the present conditions, instead of making for equilibrium between the city and the country, are intensifying the difficulties in that regard. When the wheels of industry return to normal operation many who have been placed on the land will return to the cities; many young sons of our farmers, will find their way to the larger centres, because the country people have not received and are not receiving the attention from the government that the industries have received through tax exemptions, tariff protection and various forms of municipal, provincial and federal aid. Our best brains have been applied to the assistance of industries; artificial means have been employed to help them, and, the result is that our rural centres of population are declining. That is true even of our new sections and of the whole of the western provinces. I well remember when as a young man I lived on the farm we had local industries—the wheelwright, the harness maker, the shoemaker, the grist mill, the woollen mill, the general store, and so on. These employed a good number of people, and as our requirements were limited and we were satisfied with less, the rural sections were practically self-supporting. To-day the situation is absolutely changed. Anyone visting the famous clay belt of northern Ontario, one of the finest agricultural sections of Canada, sees these small villages with perhaps a little church, perhaps a blacksmith's shop, one or two stores, but practically no local industries, no hospital, no such local institutions as I have mentioned; everything is becoming more and more centralized in the larger centres. A few months ago I read with interest an article in the Ottawa Journal stating that industries were being decentralized. Well, perhaps in our day we shall see a miracle, but I for one am doubtful whether industry will find it possible to decentralize to such an extent as to bring back our rural centres to what they were thirty years ago. So we must adapt ourselves to the new order. If in the past we had to employ artificial measures to build up what we call our modern industry, we must adopt similar measures to encourage people to remain on the farms, which are the mainstay of any country. If our rural people could get a reasonable price for their products; if for the last three years western Canada had sold wheat at a dollar a bushel, with a market for all their production, unemployment and depression would be unknown in Canada. Agriculture and industry are closely linked together; there is no section of the country that is not concerned about the labourer and the farmer. The industrialists of the east are just as much interested in the wheat crop as are the wheat growers of the west. It certainly is a step in the right direction, therefore, when we find the provincial governments and the central administration and every public body concerned about the state of the farmer and seeking a solution for his problems.

I make this appeal very sincerely, I say that the present scheme does not go far enough. An expenditure of $25,000 in one year on the back to the land movement to restore the equilibrium between the two sections of our population is ridiculous. There is now under way a movement looking to slum clearance, which has been greatly accelerated by Doctor Bruce, the lieutenant-governor of Ontario. It is true that there are slums in our larger centres of population but if one could see side by side some of the little dwelling houses and log shacks and tumbledown sheds, stables and barns that are scattered throughout our newer sections, he would know the exact meaning of the word "slum." The original settlers have not been able to graduate from the status of pioneers to that of farmers; they find it impossible to put up proper dwellings for their families. Sanitary conveniences are practically unknown through lack of funds. In all these small places you will find cleanliness, but the fact remains that the dwellings are not sanitary. There are no proper means of ventilation, and they are far too small in many cases to meet the needs. Here is a wonderful opportunity for the government to inaugurate a policy which, as well as doing away with slums in the larger centres, could be adapted to providing better housing conditions for the farmers. The appropriation of $5,000,000 a year for twenty years to assist in providing better housing for the rural population would be one of the finest steps the government could take. In my section the settlers see new people come in among them, and they ask themselves the question: How is it that after we have toiled for fifteen or twenty years to develop this country, at a time when unemployment is just as pronounced in our midst as it is in the larger centres, the government finds it possible to give these people $600 per family while we who have done the initial work of colonization are left practically to ourselves?

The hon. member for East Algoma a few moments ago spoke of the great sacrifices the lumber dealers had to make last fall to give employment to the poor settlers. But I say it was sacrifice to the settlers to work under that scheme. In my own riding they were getting the magnificent sum of $3.50 a cord for pulpwood. No settler can keep body and soul together on returns as small as this. Something will have to be done. I do not doubt for a moment the sincerity of any hon. member on either side of the house, regardless of what the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Nicholson) said against me. Still less have I doubted the sincerity of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I say that very sincerely. But we find to-day among our native rural population a certain amount of dissatisfaction because they seem to have been left out of the existing order of things. So far as this policy is concerned apparently they are the forgotten men. Because they happen to live in the newer sections of the country, in unorganized districts which have not enough money to come under this scheme, most of their young men cannot be placed on farms. I do not ask the government to lay out millions or tens of millions of dollars; for a few hundred thousand dollars it would be possible to maintain all the young men in our section of the country.

In passing may I say that in my opinion the educational system of our province has been wrong in its relation to the rural population, but there are signs of the application of remedy. To-day we have college graduates in northern Ontario who under this scheme would be good farmers. A man on the threshold of life in my section of the country finds only two courses open to him now. If he goes on the farm without assistance he sees ahead of him a drab life of near despair, with no hope of success, but if he could receive government assistance he would have a good chance to come through and live a fuller life. Assistance has been given our industries in the past, and that money has not been begrudged in my section of the country. I have a vivid recollection of the occasion that the government bonused the wheat growers, when millions were spent in the west; not a word of criticism was heard from my section of the country. Last year we set up a stabilization fund which we expected would cost us from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000. Due to the fact that the English pound came to parity with the Canadian dollar that money was not needed, but the fact remains that in my section of the country we were willing to have that money spent to help agriculture. Surely, then, it ought to be possible for the government to work out a scheme which will permit our rural population to remain at their present occupation. Farming is not a profession; it is not a trade. It is more than that; it is a vocation. Sometimes people are inclined to laugh and to ridicule the farmers, saying that they ask too much, that they are not content to live on the farms. It is said that they insist on the attractions of the city. The farming population have an absolute right to the comforts that exist in the cities, but they are willing to make certain sacrifices in order to remain on the land, because there is a great appeal in having their own farms. To them the farm is their kingdom, where they can maintain the traditions of their ancestors, whether they be from the great Loyalist stock of southern Ontario or from that of the pioneering Frenchman who colonized the shores of the St. Lawrence river. These people have it in their hearts to remain on their holdings, and they are the finest people we have in Canada. They are one of the greatest stabilizing factors in the nation, if not indeed, the greatest.

During the last ten years in eastern Canada, with the price of land going up and with industry attracting workers, the young people have found it impossible to remain on the land. The movement towards the cities will not be stopped until we find it possible to allow the young people to settle on the land. It is not my intention to dwell longer on that very important question, but I believe this offers the solution of the evils we have to face at the present time. Let me repeat that if to-morrow our farmers could receive a fair return for what they have to sell, to-morrow unemployment would disappear. We must remember that a farmer must be and is also a business man in the true sense of the word. Sometimes, because the farmers live so far apart, they have not the organization that exists in other industries, but the farmer is a business man, and the fact remains that no class invest their money more readily than do the farmers. A prosperous farmer seldom puts his money into a savings account; he reinvests it in better buildings, new equipment, or improved stock, and this should make the government realize the necessity of finding a solution for the rural problem. In French we say, "La pitié de l'agriculture," speaking of his present plight, which is absolutely true. At present the farmers are toiling but are not receiving hardly anything in the way of remuneration; they realize that in the past they have not received the attention they deserve, and they are in a state of despair. Here we have a solution of the problem. Here lies the hope for the rural population of this country, its lifeblood, its future. Let us not lose sight of the fact that Canada must remain primarily a rural country. If we fail in this regard we shall suffer as all past civilizations have when they allowed agriculture to deteriorate and decline.

Mr. D'ARCY B. PLUNKETT (Victoria): I should like to say one or two words in support of the remarks made by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). I do not think I have ever heard a more definite statement of facts or a clearer exposition of conditions in this country. It was so clear that the seats of the C.C.F. were deserted: we did not seem to suit them tonight. They could not take it.

I should like to give a little evidence in support of what the hon. member said. He made the statement that throughout Canada there was an organized effort to upset the lumbering industry. I have before me a press dispatch which I should like to read, because legal minds consider the evidence in the case and nothing else. This is the dispatch:

> Decide to Close Logging Camp
> Lake Cowichan, March 20.—The workers of Camp 10, V.L. & M., were surprised to be called in from work on Monday afternoon to attend a meeting at the cookhouse.

This cookhouse is an agreeable spot for all of us.

> Their surprise was increased when, after an address by J. Long, camp superintendent, they were told it had been decided to close down the camp at once for an indefinite period. The reason given was the agitation which has been going on about wages and other matters in the camp during the last few weeks.
> The workers recently gave one day's pay for the relief of the loggers on strike.

I believe that supports the statements that were made by the hon. member for East Algoma. I should like to hear from the hon. member for North Vancouver (Mr. Munn); he is a lumberman and he understands the difficulties of this situation. What has he to say in regard to it?

Mr. MUNN: In regard to what?

Mr. PLUNKETT: In regard to what I have just said. It is not my fault if the hon. gentleman did not hear me.

Mr. MUNN: I heard you; I know all about the situation there.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Would the hon. gentleman make a statement?

Mr. MUNN: I am not contradicting your statement.

Mr. PLUNKETT: Thank you. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am through.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I am intensely interested in this unemployment and farm relief bill, and wish to make a few remarks in regard to it. I have the misfortune to represent a district which for the past five years has had no crop whatever. Of our people ninety-five per cent are on direct relief; ninety-five per cent have to receive their dole from the government each month. In regard to conditions in my constituency may I say that it is necessary for the farmers to haul their grain, straw, hay and rough feed from the towns out to the country so that they may feed their stock. No hay, straw, grain or rough feed of any kind have been grown there for the last five years. One may gather from that information an idea as to the conditions under which the people in that district have been living due to the crop failures in the past five years.

I do not wish to criticize the government with respect to the manner in which it has handed out unemployment and direct relief in my constituency. Politics has played no part in the handing out of relief, but I do offer criticism from a business standpoint, because in relief measures there has been an absolute lack of business practice. As the years go by and relief measures are continued the people in charge seem to become more and more inefficient, and each year more difficulties arise.

May I give an illustration of what took place in my own district. The people there were told that anyone living within twenty miles of the coal mines had to go to the mines to get coal. They were ready to comply with that arrangement, and were waiting for orders. They waited a long time, and time after time sent in requests for coal orders. At last, when winter weather had set in and coal was essential, they went to the coal miners and, almost on their knees, asked for coal. The coal miners replied, "We will give each of you a ton of coal, so as to carry you over, and when your orders come in let us have them." The people got their coal from the miners, but did not receive any orders until late in November when the snow was on the ground and frost had set in. Why those orders could not have been given earlier, when the officials knew that relief had to be given, nobody knows. This is only one example of a lack of business ability.

Let me give another. For some reason last fall the authorities took the notion that all orders for flour had to be for a particular brand; the order received indicated the type of flour which had to be purchased. The result was that sometimes sixty or sixty-five orders would reach a small town, all calling for a certain kind of flour. Often the particular brand named on the orders could not be obtained in the town, and the people had to wait two or three weeks until that flour was brought in. Why could this matter not have been handled as it had been for years previously—give a man an order for so many sacks of flour, and let him get it?

These are only examples, and I could give many, indicating an entire lack of business ability in handling relief problems out there. Many other problems of the same type exist; these are not political difficulties, but arise from a lack of business ability in the handling of relief. One would think that an organization which had been handling relief measures for five years would be working smoothly by this time, but year by year they seem to be unable to meet the difficulties and get into more and more trouble.

As I have said, ninety-five per cent of the people in my constituency are on relief. Let me indicate for the benefit of hon. members the amount of relief they receive. A family of eight will receive each month an order for groceries, such order not to include flour or coal; these two items are extra. The order for groceries will amount to $8 a month. With that amount of money these people are supposed to buy their tea, sugar and groceries. Then, if they have on the farm a hog, cows, eggs, milk or butter, or if they have a hen so that they may get an egg now and then, the $8 is reduced and they must accept less. The amount the person on relief receives depends upon how much he produces himself. Hon. members may imagine what a fat living the people receiving this relief must enjoy.

Then, as to clothing the adult receives $9 a year, with which he is supposed to buy overshoes, boots, socks, underwear, overalls, smocks, caps, mitts, and if he has anything left he must buy his bedding. Hon. members will know about how much bedding he could buy with anything left from the $9. The relief which these people are handed each month is their only means of keeping alive. Children do not receive as much as adults. Depending on its age, a child will receive $5.50 or $4.50, and as to the amounts received a distinction is made between boys and girls. This is an indication of the way people are being treated in this district. They are all on the dole. I know of only one or two farmers who are not receiving relief from the federal government working in combination with the provincial government.

Hon. members will recall that during the last election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) went through the country almost crying for the unemployed. He was going to have work for all of them. Instead of that, however, they have received nothing but the dole.

Mr. MORAND: He has no control over the weather.

Mr. DONNELLY: We should have had some kind of work. Let me tell my hon. friend that practically no money has been spent on road work in our district, while in the northern part of the province where there were crops thousands of dollars have been spent. The authorities seem to think that the people in my constituency do not need the work, that as they are living on the dole they should not have employment. Although the government has kept those people alive, kept their bodies and souls together, what about the stock? What about the horses, the cattle, the pigs, the sheep and other animals? Last winter all through the country horses were dying through lack of feed. They were coming to town and lying down to die beside elevators filled with grain, because there seemed to be no way to get the feed out of the elevators. I remember quite well that a request was sent in to the relief officers asking for feed. The provincial Minister of Labour went through our district, returned home and stated that he had not seen any horses dying,—just as if a farmer would drive his horses to town to die! Following that the officers of the municipality became indignant and wrote a letter to the Regina Leader explaining conditions in their locality. They stated:

> In five municipalities in southern Saskatchewan more than 600 horses have died since October 1, 1933. In the rural municipality of Lake of the Rivers more than 100 horses have died. . . . In Stonehenge municipality officials reported 120 horses dead. . . . In Waverly municipality about 130 horses have died. . . . in the rural municipality of Wood River more than 150 horses have died since October 1. . . . Rural municipality of Pinto Creek is in the same position; 100 horses have died.

Horses are dying all over the country just for lack of feed. Here is another letter written to the Regina Leader:

I have nine horses and two cows. Seven of the horses are trying to get a living out on the bald prairie. This winter I got a ton and three-quarters of hay and eighty bushels of oats, which is used up. I have 150 acres for crop this spring and these horses must do it. Four of the seven just manage to walk around. If I do not get feed within a week it will be too late.

I could read many other letters. Here is one from a municipality:

Our allotment of feed grain from the Saskatchewan relief commission is just over 49,000 bushels, which figures out to approximately twenty bushels per horse in this municipality, and this leaves nothing for other live stock such as pigs and poultry. Owing to the scarcity of forage and fodder it has been necessary to feed the grain shipped in by the commission during the past months. We have already received two-thirds of the allotted 49,000 bushels and the balance, if and when received, will no more than carry the stock through to seeding time.

We have made representations to the commission that we will require at least a further allotment of 50,000 bushels to feed our horses during seeding time but to date have had no assurance that any further amount than the 49,000 bushels will be supplied.

Here is another letter:

We have the unfortunate experience of a great many of our clients coming in and advising us in some cases that they have no horses left, in other cases that they have two or three or four where they need six, seven, eight or ten. The high mortality which has taken place during the past winter is, in our opinion, almost entirely due to shortage of feed.

Those are the conditions that exist, Mr. Speaker, with regard to our stock. We listened the other day in the banking and commerce committee to a story—

Mr. SPEAKER: Reference to what takes place in a committee is not in order until the committee reports.

Mr. DONNELLY: We have heard from many sources, Mr. Speaker, of the terrible problem that exists in this country with regard to our wheat. We have a great carry-over of wheat that we do not know what to do with. We want to get rid of it; why not put some of it to a useful purpose? Some have suggested that this wheat be sent to China to feed Chinamen. Charity begins at home. Why not use a little of it to help our own people? If I may suggest it to the government, why not take this wheat, mix it up with oats and barley and other grains, have it ground up into feed and give it to these farmers so that they may feed their stock? Finance them, if you will. Do not give it to them, for they do not get relief to-day in any form whatever for nothing. The farmers have to sign notes for whatever they get from the relief commission; let them sign a note for the feed. Then they will have something to do; it will enable them to work for a living. They can start to feed poultry and pigs and sheep and other stock, and raise and sell this stock and make a living in that way. If this suggestion were acted upon, not only in the west but all over Canada, the government financing it, if you will, in a year's time or eighteen months, or at most two years, we would be able to supply our full quota of bacon and ham in the English market; there is no doubt about that, and our people would be doing something and earning a living. Besides we would be getting rid of this surplus glut of wheat of twenty or thirty or fifty million bushels. France has a scheme whereby she puts an analine dye in her wheat to make it unfit for use as flour. Why not in somewhat the same way grind our surplus wheat up with oats, barley and other grains so that it cannot be used for flour, and then hand it out to these people to be used as feed for their stock.

The whole morale of our people has gone. When you put people on the dole, on charity, and tell them to live on a handout from day to day, their whole morale goes. I have heard people say, "Oh, the morale of the west is as good as ever," but I do not find it so, I am sorry to say, and I believe it is due to the dole more than anything else.

I just want to leave that suggestion with the government. I believe it would be a good scheme to take some of our surplus grain and grind it up into feed and supply it to our farmers, financing the thing so that the farmers could earn a living for themselves and not have to be kept on the dole.

Mr. J. E. MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, the bill that is now before the house for consideration is entitled the Relief Act, 1934. The fact that for the fifth consecutive year it has been found necessary to submit a relief measure to the house for renewal is sufficient to arrest public attention and indicates a situation that is deserving of serious consideration on the part of members of this house.

One must not forget that this country was promised that unemployment would cease four years ago. It is interesting to recall those promises in view of the statements which were made in this house on Friday last and to-day. In 1930 the country was promised that if the present government was elected unemployment would end, work would be provided for all those who were willing and able to work,—that work, not doles, would be provided for Canadian workmen. But to-day we are asked to renew a relief measure in which there is no program of work whatever. Coupled with that is the statement made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in the house the other day that the government has no unemployment relief program.

This bill by its preamble and its main provisions gives power to the government, first, to enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures; second, for the granting of financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advances, guarantee or otherwise; and third, to maintain peace, order and good government when parliament is not in session. These last mentioned powers, as contained in paragraph (b) of section 2, were not within the last five years directly used for the purpose, and so for the moment I will dismiss that provision.

The main features of the legislation are to enable the government to enter into agreements with the provinces to relieve unemployment, and to grant financial assistance to provincial governments under the guise of unemployment relief. The principle of the bill, and its main feature, is to enable the government to help the provinces solve the unemployment problem, in spite of the fact that the government had promised that it was to undertake a program of public works for the definite purpose of relieving unemployment. The following admission of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), appears on page 1721 of Hansard of March 22:

> It must be remembered that at no time was the policy of direct relief or of works or otherwise a policy of the Dominion government.

I should like to know what has been the policy of the Dominion government with regard to the relief of unemployment if the methods adopted by the provinces in conjunction with the dominion for the last five years are not the policies of the Dominion government? This is the system which was adopted in 1932 and continued during 1933, but the minister does not want to acknowledge it as a child of the government. Section 4 of the act of 1932-33 reads:

> The governor in council may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of this act, but the amount paid for direct relief for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1934, shall not exceed the sum of twenty million dollars.

I submit that during the last fiscal year the government has been committed to the extent of twenty millions to a direct relief policy or dole system. We now hear from all quarters that this is not a proper policy for the permanent solution of unemployment, but so far the government has failed to submit to the country a proper scheme or program for the solution of this problem. All it promises to do is to help the provinces with respect to relief measures that may be adopted. The government have failed to implement the promise made five years ago, and repeated since, that they would offer a program for the permanent solution of unemployment. They have also failed to adopt a permanent program to deal with the nine provinces. The minister has stated that as far as certain provinces are concerned there is a definite program of public works projects. As I understand the statement made on page 1720 of Hansard of March 22, the policy of the department is to agree upon certain projects of public works submitted by the provinces. When these projects are submitted the Department of Labour sends an inspector to the district in which the work is proposed to be carried out. If the inspector reports that the work is necessary and is of such a nature as will relieve unemployment; if he reports that relief is necessary in the district, then the department approves the proposal and the work is proceeded with. I submit that this is the method which should be adopted with all the provinces. So far as I have been able to ascertain, it has been followed in the province of Quebec. No work has been carried out in that province without first receiving the approval of the Minister of Labour.

However, I find that a different policy has been followed in New Brunswick. It has been brought to my attention that during the past year no projects were agreed upon by the Department of Labour and the provincial authorities. The provincial authorities informed the public during last spring and last summer that no works were being carried on for the relief of unemployment and that there was no necessity for any such works. However, we find that on October 10, twenty days before the end of the fiscal year in the province, a retroactive agreement was made with the Department of Labour under which the province was to be reimbursed for work done. It was to receive forty or fifty per cent of the expenditures made on the trans-Canada highway and fifty per cent of the expenditures on road work and bridges.

Mr. VENIOT: For which no projects were submitted.

Mr. MICHAUD: For which no projects were submitted. After the provincial authorities had broadcast that no money was being spent last year on public works for the relief of unemployment, and only ten days before the close of the fiscal year, this agreement was arrived at. I submit that the works for which the province has been reimbursed to the extent of forty and fifty per cent were not works carried on for the relief of unemployment but were simply the usual road work carried on year after year by the provincial department of public works. It was only toward the latter part of October that certain districts in the province were told that there was money available for the relief of unemployment. When the soil was frozen several inches deep and when in some districts there were two inches of snow on the ground, the government of New Brunswick and the federal Department of Labour got together and decided that some money should be spent for the relief of unemployment in my province. This was at a time of year when in the province there was no need for that because lumbering operations were resuming and the men were being engaged in some kind of employment, more or less profitable. This, however, synchronized with the election which was then being carried on in my district. On that occasion responsible ministers of the crown in New Brunswick made statements to the electorate of the province directly promising that under the unemployment relief program work would be given to those who would support the government candidate. Only to this extent was unemployment relief granted to that province last year under the act of 1933. I submit that this is an abuse of power, and if the relief has been carried on in other provinces as it has been in New Brunswick it is no wonder that irregularities have crept in and that to-day criticism from all sides is being directed at the Minister of Labour for the way in which unemployment relief money is being spent in the various provinces. This is one of the results of the fact that the Dominion government has not outlined any unemployment relief policy.

Mr. GORDON: I assume the hon. gentleman wants to be sure about his facts. In New Brunswick fifteen projects were approved in 1933, and only one of them in Restigouche county.

Mr. VENIOT: On what dates were they approved?

Mr. GORDON: I can get the dates when the bill is in committee. It is quite true the agreement was dated October 10, 1933.

Mr. MICHAUD: Will the minister state to the house that the projects were approved before October 10, 1933? They could not have been approved before that because the agreement with the New Brunswick government regarding unemployment relief in that province for 1933 was entered into only on October 10, 1933. If the minister wants to refer to the report of the Minister of Public Works for New Brunswick for 1933, he will find on page 3 this statement:

> Under the terms of the agreement made with the federal government under date of October 10, 1933, the federal government agreed to pay 50 per cent of work on trans-Canada highway and 40 per cent of other projects retroactive to June 1, 1933, on colonization roads and to August 1 on other projects. This agreement terminates March 31, 1934.

So the agreement between the Dominion government and the government of New Brunswick regarding not direct relief, but unemployment relief works for that province, was entered into only on October 10 last, twenty-one days before the close of their fiscal year. As a result of this agreement and the payment of $200,000 by the federal Department of Labour to the province of New Brunswick, applicable to the works as mentioned in the agreement, the deficit of the province was lowered to that extent. In view of the attitude taken by the Department of Labour, the minister and the government towards Quebec, I submit that the same policy should be followed in regard to the agreements with the other provinces. This would prevent abuses and it might save money from being wasted.

Mr. PRICE: I should like to ask the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) whether it is not a fact that during the period of which he speaks in the month of October, he and his friends were complaining about certain piles of broken crushed stones, asking what they were for—if they were there simply to look at, or if they were to be put on the roads. Was the hon. gentleman during that campaign not asking why this pile of stones had not been put on the roads, and by so doing did he not show that nothing of the kind he suggests was being done to help the government candidate?

Mr. MICHAUD: If my hon. friend does not yet know the history of that pile of stones, he must be deficient in his knowledge of the history of New Brunswick. He refers, no doubt, to the Dalhousie pile of stones, which has been there for three years and has cost New Brunswick $67,000, perhaps half of which was paid for by the Dominion government. The pile is there yet.

Mr. PRICE: If the Minister of Labour at Ottawa had wished to assist the province of New Brunswick and the government candidate in that campaign, would it not have been a good policy to go ahead with the work which the hon. gentleman says took place as a result of the election campaign?

Mr. POULIOT: People who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who has the floor gave way to the hon. member who interrupted him, and therefore I shall ask him to proceed.

Mr. MICHAUD: In order further to enlighten the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price), let me tell him that last year not a single part of that pile of rocks was used to carry on work under the unemployment relief scheme to which the Minister of Labour has contributed some forty or fifty per cent. I did not mention this by way of complaint, because I have no reason to complain. I brought it to the attention of the minister because he told the house last week that in respect to certain projects carried out in Quebec he had a definite program, which I think is the only way in which such projects can be carried out. I thought that principle applied to all the provinces, but to my astonishment I found that it did not apply to New Brunswick, and the people in that province who were out of employment last year complained that they were deprived of the unemployment relief to which they were entitled. This has led to certain abuses and may lead to greater abuses if the policy regarding cooperation with the provinces is not strictly adhered to.

For example, it is a matter of public knowledge that the government of New Brunswick intends to carry on an extensive program of permanent paving of highways. We have 1,300 miles of main highway, and it is the intention of the government to embark on a program of permanent paving provided the Dominion government contributes fifty per cent of the cost under the Unemployment Relief Act. It is not for me to say here whether or not, that is a good policy on the part of the province of New Brunswick, but it is our duty to give our opinion as to whether money contributed by the Dominion government should be spent on such a program. I submit that the money so spent will not end unemployment, will not solve permanently the unemployment problem in that province. It would be a palliative; it would help temporarily, but the problem cannot be solved in that way. The unemployment problem in New Brunswick will remain unless some definite policy is adopted to reestablish in the economic life of the country those who are now unemployed.

I submit that our unemployment is due largely to the fact that certain secondary industries had to close down and cannot be profitably reestablished, and thus a great number of men have been thrown out of work. It is also due to the reorganization of the lumber industry in the eastern part of Canada, more particularly New Brunswick, the transition from the long lumber era to the pulp and paper era. We all know that the long lumber industry employed many more hands than does the pulp and paper industry, and as a result of that transition a large number of men have been permanently thrown out of employment. If the Dominion government have any money to spend for the relief of unemployment, I submit they should embark upon a real policy looking to a permanent solution of the problem instead of contributing to work on highways which will give employment only for a few months in the year. They should adopt some policy to reestablish permanently these men in the economic life of the country. My suggestion is that instead of being provided with work with pick and shovel on the highways for a few months and then thrown back on their villages and towns without work, they should be placed on the land; the money that would be spent in providing temporary work on the highways could be much more effectively used to defray the cost of an extensive scheme of reestablishment on the land.

I throw out the suggestion to the minister because if the problem is a national one, it must be treated nationally. We have proof that the policy followed during the last four or five years has not solved the problem. For the fifth consecutive year the government have come to parliament with the same demands. Not until the Dominion government embarks upon a program of real works of a permanent nature which will enable large portions of our unemployed population to be permanently reestablished in the economic life of the country, will our unemployment difficulties be solved.

Then I submit that the provision relating to the granting of financial assistance to the provinces should be carefully considered before it is again renewed and power granted to the government in that respect. Provincial governments have taken advantage of these powers to embark upon schemes of great magnitude for small provincial governments. They know that the Dominion government have these powers whereby the provinces will be saved from default; they know the Dominion government will come to their rescue, even if they fail to balance their budgets, and so they embark upon projects upon which they should not embark. I submit that if this power were curtailed, or restrictions placed upon it, it would help the Dominion government and strengthen its hand in intimating to the provinces that they cannot continue to overexpend year after year, fail to balance their budgets, and then come to the Dominion treasury for relief. An end has to be made to this kind of policy which has been followed in recent years by practically all the provinces.

Another feature of this act which is not healthy and is bound to lead to difficulties is that it is a blank cheque for unemployment relief. In the act of last year a maximum of $20,000,000 was set for direct relief. The minister reports that under that act up to a few days ago, the tenth of March, $13,000,000 had been spent, and that there are accounts not yet filed, so that the total may overrun the $20,000,000. But this is no reason why this year the amount should be left blank. If it is necessary to make it a little higher, well and good, but I submit that it would be in the best interests of the provinces as well as of the Dominion government to place a limit on the powers of the provincial governments to spend money; because after all it is the provincial governments that have the last word in the matter. The amount contributed by the Dominion government depends upon how much the provincial governments spend, and we know that in the provinces the matter is left to the municipalities. I submit that this leads to abuses, to overexpenditures, to unnecessary expenditures, and to other difficulties which will have to be met before very long. We cannot allow the provincial governments to overexpend year after year, under the guise of unemployment relief, and then come to the Dominion treasury for assistance. Unless some limitation is placed on the power of the provincial governments to spend money for the relief of unemployment, the Dominion treasury must meet these demands. I submit that the government should say once and for all that they will abandon making contributions towards the cost of direct relief, that they will not subscribe to the cost of public works which are not necessary, but that instead they will undertake a relief program, either by way of public works which are absolutely necessary or by way of gratuities or bonuses to the main industries of the country, which would reinstate a large number of our unemployed. Instead of holding out inducements to the provincial governments to embark upon schemes which will some day lead the provinces to bankruptcy, the Dominion government should initiate a policy of spending that money, if it has to be spent, in helping the basic industries.

Let me illustrate what I mean. I am familiar with the lumbering industry of the east, and particularly of New Brunswick; I do not speak of the industry in the west, where I am not familiar with the conditions. If two years ago the lumbering industry of New Brunswick had been granted half the money that has been spent for road work and direct relief in that province, in order to compensate for the lower prices, they would have continued to employ large numbers of men who have been thrown out of employment and put on relief. Those men would have been employed at the work with which they were familiar, and to-day we would not be faced with the problem presented by many of our people who are not willing to work, who prefer—and quite naturally—to receive the dole or direct relief instead of going back to their former employment. Instead of giving these blank cheques to the government we should limit them, so that in dealing with the provinces, the municipalities or different industries they will be in a position to establish very clearly the different contributors to any unemployment relief projects. In that way we will prevent the abuses which were pointed out this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I should prefer to see the government embark on a real policy of some kind to relieve the situation and do away with direct relief, which, if it is not a policy of the Dominion government, has been subscribed to and approved by the government, and unfortunately to-day we cannot get away from it.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house at any great length; I rise only in order to substantiate a statement I made during the debate on the address. At that time I stated that one of the factors likely to bring about a curtailment of production in the west was the fact that, as the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has just said, the mortality of horses has been very high, so high that many men will not be in a position to put in their usual acreage. I gave a specific illustration; I said that a gentleman had told me just before I left home that he had counted eight dead horses while driving between two towns only seven miles apart. Now I find that not only can I substantiate my statement but that the condition is infinitely worse than I thought.

When I made that statement, Mr. Speaker, it was questioned by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) who, in a very patronizing tone, advised the hon. member for Lisgar to be careful in the statements he made. I know that by the rules of the house I am not allowed to read from a former debate, but if any person wishes to find a fine example of the sort of thing that at times passes for reasoning in this house I would refer him to page 336 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Souris sought to offset my statement by saying that he had received letters from four men who were prepared to take affidavits stating that the things I had said were not true. What kind of logic is it when a man puts against a plain, positive statement a negative statement from a man who says he knows nothing about it? That was practically the argument advanced by the hon. member for Souris.

When my statement was questioned I thought I would write home, and I did write to thirteen persons in a very small part of my constituency. I received thirteen replies, and when you receive thirteen replies to thirteen letters you may rest assured that conditions are serious. I shall not take time to read all these letters, but I should like to quote a sentence from one of them:

> Many horses have died. I know of sixty-nine horses that have died in 1-13

That is in one township, six miles square. I also wrote two persons living in the district to which I referred in my previous statement. One man gives me not only the general statement that fifty horses have died; he gives me the names of those who have lost horses, and the number they have lost. I know the majority of those people personally. So I was not very far astray when I said that probably it would be necessary to reduce the wheat acreage in the west because of the mortality among the horses.

I should like also to endorse the position taken by the hon. member for Willow Bunch. Is it not a serious situation when, within a few miles of where these horses are dying, there are thousands of bushels of wheat in the elevators that might be used for feed, if not in the immediate vicinity at least within easy reach? These are the conditions which prevailed six weeks ago, and I am satisfied that they are much worse to-day. When seeding begins the condition will be aggravated, because the horses which have managed to live through the winter will not be able to do half a day's work. The condition in this area is particularly serious, because, comparatively speaking, it is not large. In the southwestern part of the province, through drought and grasshoppers, there has been complete devastation, and relief has been handed out. In this more limited area, however, there are many individuals who were hit by the drought and grasshoppers just as seriously as were the people in the larger area. Conditions as I know them are most deplorable.

Again let me emphasize the necessity for and the desirability of doing something along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Willow Bunch. We are worried about how to dispose of our surplus wheat. Well, we need not worry very long if we are willing to take the obvious course and use it to feed the live stock which is now dying. That is all I wish to say at the moment.

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak this evening, but after hearing what was said by the hon. members for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) I thought it my duty to make a few observations. I do not wish to say anything about the general purport of the bill, but shall refer only to one or two points.

May I first speak about the lumber camps in my constituency. In the past I was not as much interested in the lumber industry, but owing to the fact that under the last redistribution the territory allotted to the member for Nipissing has been greatly increased and now embraces an important lumber region, I feel that I have added interest in the matter. Under the redistribution I have not only a district but almost a diocese. At the outset may I say that at least in part I agree with what was said by the hon. member for East Algoma. He spoke at length about the propaganda broadcast by the communist organizations throughout the camps. I know of that activity, and, with the hon. member for East Algoma, I believe if we wish to have peace among our loyal citizens, some measures should be taken to curb such activities. On the other hand he forgot to speak about the honest industrial workers, but it was pleasing to note that the hon. member for North Timiskaming spoke on behalf of that class of labour in the lumber camps. I too will always sympathize with and defend the rights of organized labour, as long as they are reasonable in their demands.

Referring to the work in those camps, located, for the greater part, in the constituency of East Algoma, may I say that in January I was visited by three young married men full of ambition, who were thrifty and eager to make a success of life. Although they were not within my constituency they will in the future belong to it. If hon. members will permit I shall relate briefly the story they told me, which I am sure will indicate that these young men were honest and industrious, and not communists. On October 11 they were hired in Sudbury to work in the Austin and Nicholson camps, and were to work specifically for J. J. Brownlee, who was mentioned by the hon. member for East Algoma. For their work they were to be paid from eight to ten cents a log. The three of them worked from October 11 to December 5 and in that time cut 3,000 logs. On the 5th of December, wishing to go home to see their families and to settle some of their accounts, they were offered $14, $7 and $11 respectively. May I add that the company scaler culled 1,000 or one-third of the logs but when the government scaler came along he culled only 300. The men refused the amounts offered to them, and as a result there was an argument. The next morning they were offered larger amounts. The $14 offer had risen to $27.46, the $7 offer to $20.78 and the $11 offer to $22.62. The men accepted the money because they had to go home and had no money in their pockets. The case is now in the hands of their lawyers. These facts will serve to indicate the treatment some of the men receive in lumber camps. With the hon. member for East Algoma I am in favour of curbing communist propaganda, but at the same time if we do not take care of the honest men in the lumber camps we will get that condition which we are trying to avoid. We must give justice and satisfaction to the poor labouring classes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask a question? Would the hon. member furnish the names of the men and the camps in which they were working?

Mr. HURTUBISE: If I am not obliged to give the names I shall not do so, because those men might not have a chance to get further work in the camps. I shall furnish the names only when I am forced to.

The hon. member for North Timiskaming has spoken about a matter in which I am particularly interested, namely the back to the land movement. When last year or the year before we were offered the Gordon plan I, for one, was pleased to see that at last the colonization movement had been given some encouragement. I have watched in detail that movement in my district. I took the trouble last summer to visit at least one hundred of these settlers, and I questioned them as to how they came there, how they were doing, and whether they were on relief or otherwise; so I know what I am talking about. I do not want to discourage the Gordon plan at all. Perhaps the minister is in earnest about it and means well, and it may succeed in some places, but in my district around Sudbury I must say that the Gordon plan is a real joke, and when we read in the newspapers that the Minister of Labour is increasing the total grant from $600 to $700 it is a worse joke still, because none of the settlers has yet received one cent of the $600 grant. Naturally the municipality has first to contribute its $200 before the provincial and federal governments will contribute their $200 each, and if the municipality does not furnish its $200 the settler gets none of the $600 grant. So the minister can promise $5,000 if he likes; the settler will not get one cent just the same. Around home the Gordon plan, while it has not been altogether a failure, is not a success; its success has been nil.

A few days ago I put this question to the Minister of Labour:

How much money has been spent in the province of Ontario for colonization purposes?

The answer I received was, $20,564.60. As the hon. member for North Timiskaming said, that is just a drop in the bucket. It means nothing at all. To talk of colonizing a province with $20,000 is absurd, so I hope that the minister will not boast about the amount the government has spent for colonization.

My second question was as to how many had benefited from that colonization plan in Ontario, and the answer was 362. That is, 362 had received the $200 from their municipality. But none of them came from my district. I was also given a list, in reply to my third question, of the municipalities from which these settlers had come. There were 362 settlers, according to the reply I received, and on the average they had received $455.

I have this question of colonization very much at heart, and I am afraid that if the present plan is not changed we shall lose a great opportunity of making it a success. Many healthy young men who are fitted for the vocation of farming will be lost to the land and will either join the ranks of the socialists or communists or take the first chance that offers of getting work in the industrial centres. These young men are ready to accept some help and go on the land, but they are not given the chance.

I say first of all, Mr. Speaker, a general plan should be formed not only for Ontario but for all the provinces. There should be put in every centre of colonization one man for each little district who will make colonization his special work—not a political job, but a man who has colonization at heart and will give his best efforts to make the plan a success. Do not let us have a repetition of what was done in my district, where townships were opened for colonization and men were sent out by the municipalities who would tell them: You go out there and we will see you in a few days. I questioned these settlers and I found that they were given transportation and food and a small building outfit and from $40 to $75 by the municipality. It is done because the municipalities want to get rid of part of their unemployed. After these men have gone out on the land they have to live as best they can. They are not encouraged in any way. They never get the $200 from the municipality, nor the $200 from the province or the federal government.

The first thing that should be done is to survey the townships and have the lots well defined, because what happens now is that settlers very often find, after they have cleared their land and built a little home and put in a few months' work, that it has all been done on their neighbour's property, and that their whole work and time has been lost. That has happened in many cases around Sudbury. So I say that no township should be opened for colonization until it has been properly surveyed and every lot well defined.

Next the settler should be given the chance to earn a few dollars. Do away with all kinds of timber restrictions. To-day the settler is forbidden to cut certain kinds of timber. Remove these timber restrictions, open colonization roads, and even pay the settler a small wage. Give him a chance to earn a few dollars with which to buy something according to his tastes and needs. Just now the situation is that these poor settlers do not know where they stand. They have no work and no chance of earning a dollar. They are on relief, and the first chance they get of a job in the industrial centres they will leave the land and go back to the city. Unless the present plan is changed it is absolutely useless. I am making these suggestions to the government for the benefit of colonization and of the settlers, and I hope that they will be taken into consideration. I have studied the situation in considerable detail.

For the information of the minister may I say that in Sudbury a plan of colonization is being carried out. The man who looks after colonization looks after relief at the same time. It is Mr. Laforest. He is very earnest and he tries to do all he can. He likes the farmers and he is doing his best to help them, but he himself admits he is absolutely helpless—"We have nothing more to work with." So if the government are earnest about this scheme I hope they will take the means to help these poor fellows and encourage them in their work. As I said a little while ago, agriculture is a vocation, and there is no use bringing from the cities men who are hard up and have big families and do not know what to do for a living, and put them on a farm and expect them to make a success of it. Rather encourage those with farm experience who have only lately gone into the city. Those who have been there a long while it is useless to bring to the land because they will not stay there; as soon as prosperity returns they will hasten back to the city. It would be better to take only those men who have had agricultural experience and have been in the cities but a short time. The government should give encouragement to the sons of farmers. These boys have had experience and they should be assisted with settlers' loans. If these men and boys are not placed upon the land during this time of depression they are liable to go astray and no one knows what will happen to them.

I agree with the hon. member for North Timiskaming when he states that agriculture is the principal industry of this country and that it should be given every encouragement. During the past few weeks reference has been made in the house to all kinds of loans and guarantees given by the government to different industries and corporations in order to help them through this crisis. What has been done and what is intended to be done in the future for agriculture? Unless something is done, that industry is doomed.

As I stated last year, the system of education in the rural districts should be changed. The present system develops mentality for the city, and the textbooks should be changed entirely. I hope the federal and provincial governments will cooperate and see that there is a change in the system of education. I should like to see less money spent on agricultural colleges and more on small district organizations. A short time ago I read that there were 250 agronomists in the province of Quebec and as many more engaged in preparatory work. In northern Ontario, which is the largest part of the province, there are only three or four agronomists. These men can only get around to the different districts once in a while. Unless the younger generation is educated along scientific lines the future of agriculture is doomed. I hope the government will be able to make as large expenditures, under the peace, order and good government part of this bill, on colonization work and agriculture as will be made for the assistance of other activities.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): I should like to ask the minister a question based upon the statement made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). If my memory serves me aright, the hon. member stated that 69 horses starved to death in one township. I do not doubt the veracity of that statement but I should like to know if the government has attempted to limit the Manitoba government in any way, shape or form in connection with the giving out of relief in these drought areas.

Mr. GORDON: The answer is in the negative.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): In that case the fault lies with the provincial government, the government which the hon. member for Lisgar almost ran his feet off two or three years ago trying to elect.

On motion of Mr. Veniot the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 27, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

Third report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Senn.

PETITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BARRETTE (Berthier-Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table of the house petitions comprising many thousands of signatures and protesting against the levying of a 20 cents tax per pound on Canadian leaf tobacco.

Petition of the municipal councils of St. Modeste and St. Louis de Ha Ha, protesting against a new tax on tobacco in leaf.—Mr. Pouliot.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Annual report of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Steamships for the year ended December 31, 1933.—Mr. Manion.

PRIVATE BILLS

PERSONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead) moved the first reading of Bill No. 42 (from the Senate) an act to incorporate Personal Finance Corporation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HACKETT: This is an act which has been introduced in the Senate and is in terms identical with an act that was passed by parliament last year. I do not know that there is much to be said about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any hon. member wishes to address the house he may do so. The motion is agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 44 for the relief of Gertrude Ethel Mosgrove Roast.—Mr. White (Mount Royal).

Bill No. 45 for the relief of Clara Dingman Freeman.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 46 for the relief of Marguerite Pearl Hopper.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 47 for the relief of Sadye Harris Rosenberg.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 48 for the relief of Eva Brabant Paradis.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 49 for the relief of Williamina Muir Briggs.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Motions for first readings agreed to on division.

ULYSSES—CENSORSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Province and which states, in effect, that Victoria has received official notification from Ottawa that the Prime Minister is going to undertake to censor the book known as Ulysses by James Joyce. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has taken over the duty of censoring literature.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have had no intimation of any such fact.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING TO BE NAMED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and some others have been asking in regard to the appointment of the special parliamentary committee on railways. I just wish to advise them that, the reports having been tabled to-day, immediately after the Easter holidays we will set up that committee.

RUMOURED ABANDONMENT OF LINE BETWEEN HOPE AND VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked me, according to Hansard, as to the abandonment by the Canadian National Railways of the line from Hope to Vancouver. I have made inquiries, and I can find no indication that the Canadian National is considering abandoning that line.

CONFERENCE WITH WESTERN PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if he has any statement to make to the house concerning the reported conference between the dominion government and the governments of the western provinces?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): On Saturday last the government spent a very substantial part of the day in considering the financial position of the four western provinces, especially in view of the representations that recently have been made as to the amount of money they will require, in excess of what they expect to derive from taxation, to meet what they conceive to be their requirements. A telegraphic communication was sent to the premiers of the four provinces suggesting that their legislatures might adjourn over Easter, in which event either the premiers or their representatives might meet the government here on Thursday, April 5, for the purpose of discussing the situation.

The government of Manitoba had made arrangements contemplating an early adjournment, and suggested that a later date would best suit their convenience. The province of Saskatchewan, having telephoned Manitoba and Alberta, sent a telegram in much the same sense. Alberta did not reply directly, or in other than the manner I have just indicated, as suggested by the telegram from Saskatchewan. British Columbia suggested that the position of the prairie provinces was somewhat different from their position and that the matters might be discussed at a later date as they were making arrangements for prorogation. Last evening I dispatched a message to the four western provinces indicating that apparently any day next week would not be a satisfactory date on which to discuss the matters, and that they might stand to a date to be mutually agreed upon.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS MEMBERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, last week in another place notice was given of a resolution suggesting that Canada should withdraw from the League of Nations. In view of the publicity that has been given this notice, not only here but also in Europe—the fact having been broadcast by some people who were pleased to see that action taken—does not my right hon. friend think it should be made known to the world that this does not represent the view of either the people or the government of Canada?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The suggestion advanced by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is not without merit, but it is difficult to see how this chamber can proceed to deal effectively or effectually with any matter that as yet has not been discussed in another place. As I understand the matter, notice only was given of the intention to discuss the resolution, the resolution being that Canada should give notice of withdrawal from membership in the League of Nations. I need hardly say to the hon. gentleman or to the house that such notice was in no sense supported by the government directly or indirectly, and that His Majesty's government in Canada had no intention of submitting to this house or to any other house a resolution involving the withdrawal of this country from the League of Nations.

CIVIL SERVICE

RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION FROM SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the house rises to-morrow and does not reassemble until April 9, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if any decision has been arrived at with regard to the salaries of civil servants and others who are paid by this government, including members of parliament and members of the Senate, so far as 100 per cent payment is concerned. It seems to me that before we adjourn to-morrow some statement should be made by the government. I should like to know what the Minister of Finance has to say in regard to the matter.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no decision has as yet been reached. If one is reached in time for an announcement to-morrow, an announcement will be made.

FRUIT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 26, respecting fruit and honey.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sullivan in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: The other evening, as we were leaving the chamber, a question was raised respecting the Canadian National Railways appropriation. These appropriations are for the last year, not for the future, and do not go to the committee in any event. This represents a balance which has to be paid for last year's operation.

Mr. EULER: Providing for deficit?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I promised I would let the right hon. gentleman know.

Travelling and living expenses of Judge John McKay of Thunder Bay district while acting in Rainy River district, $318.65.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): This is to cover the expenses of a judge from Port Arthur who took the place of a judge at Rainy River stricken with illness. The Rainy River judge has since died, and a new appointment has been made. In the interval the judge at Port Arthur performed the services, and this is to cover his expenses which were unusual and not anticipated.

Item agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Loan to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of:—

Deficits in operation of the company and of the vessels under the company's control during the year ended December 31, 1933, and interest requirements — further amount required, $196,997.30.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals the meaning of this vote?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Chairman, I believe the item is self-explanatory. This is a loan to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of deficits in operation of the company and of the vessels under the company's control during the year ended December 31, 1933, and interest requirements. This is an amount in addition to that in the estimates of last year to meet the requirements of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited.

Mr. EULER: What is the total amount of the deficit? How much was in the estimate of last year as being appropriated towards a possible deficit, if any, and what is the total deficit in the operation of the steamships?

Mr. MANION: I did not know that this matter was coming up, but in a general way I may say that the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, together, have, in round figures, a deficit of about $1,000,000. But to differentiate between them I would have to have my figures, which I did not bring with me.

Mr. EULER: I suppose the amount here appropriated is in excess of what was anticipated when the estimate was voted last year?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps it is not best to ask for information which may possibly be given more readily in committee, but I was wondering if the minister could say at this time whether during the past year any of the vessels of the Canadian Merchant Marine were disposed of, at what prices and how many are still left?

Mr. MANION: A number of them were disposed of in the past year. We have had quite a few ships lying in the dock simply rotting away, if I may use that term, because that is what it amounted to. Some of them were sold at practically scrap prices, because the prices of steamships throughout the world, as my hon. friend knows, have in the last few years been very low. Since the war there has been a very great excess of steamships. Ours were lying in the docks, many of them requiring resurveys costing thousands of dollars. On the recommendation of the directorate of last year, and with our concurrence, a number of those vessels were disposed of. I cannot say at the moment as to the number disposed of, or the number remaining, but as my hon. friend has said when we are discussing the matter in the special committee which we will appoint shortly after the opening of the house after the recess, as I mentioned this afternoon, we will go into details, and give more accurate information than I could this afternoon.

Mr. DUFF: Would it not be wise to allow this item to stand until the committee is appointed and we are in a position to investigate the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited?

Mr. BENNETT: The money has been spent, and the company requires this vote to pay its debts. In the meantime they borrowed it.

Mr. DUFF: Parliament did not give any authority to the company to spend the money. I thought parliament was supposed to vote money before the company could spend it.

Mr. MANION: We did vote a good deal.

Mr. BENNETT: This is one of the unfortunate results as pointed out last year and previous years. The amount of money voted for the company has been exceeded, and having been exceeded the company required money before the end of its fiscal year. Money not being available, the company makes arrangements with its bankers, and before the end of March the estimate is supposed to be passed and the money provided.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand the banks will not carry it any longer? Will the banks not carry it until we make an investigation? If they will not carry the company we do not want it to go into liquidation.

Mr. EULER: I notice this vote is described as a loan; is that a correct description?

Mr. MANION: They are all supposed to be loans—although they are irrevocable loans.

Mr. EULER: You do not expect it to be repaid?

Mr. MANION: I do not expect so.

Mr. VENIOT: In the item I notice the following words:

Repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council.

I wonder if the government could not be as generous to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited as they were to the Canadian Pacific Railway, when they loaned that company $1,447,000 without interest.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is wrong as to that. What was done was that the money was advanced for the purpose of enabling the shops to be kept open, and that money was put into circulation in Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: And no interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Not until the contingency happened. That contingency will happen.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not accept the statement of the Prime Minister as being correct because the order in council reads "without interest," and principal is to be paid only when the Canadian Pacific Railway has earned sufficient to pay more than five per cent dividends to its shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the 1931 item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want to impede the passage of this vote. I understand the money has been spent, and that we have to vote it. It is better to vote the money now than to carry it with the banks and continue to pay interest.

I understand that the position is that the steamship company makes an estimate of the amount it will expend and of the amount it will receive during the year, and that in this particular case their expenditures exceeded their revenues by the amount in the estimate, and they went on and spent this excess amount without authority. That is a reprehensible practice in my opinion, and I desire to call attention to it. I think my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is right, that the practice should be avoided if at all possible.

Mr. MANION: The only answer to that would be that after having estimated their necessities for the year, and their revenues not coming up to their expectations, if we refused to make good the excess amount spent until the house met, they would close down their ships. The same is true of the railways.

In reply to my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) I do not think it should go out that this house is treating the Canadian Pacific Railway better than the Canadian National because, so far from it, as my hon. friend knows very well, while we mark this down in our books as a loan repayable with interest, as a matter of fact none of these loans has been repaid, and we have within the last few years loaned to the Canadian National, not simply the amount that was necessary to keep open the Canadian Pacific Railway shops, but $600,000,000 odd—

Mr. VENIOT: Do not forget the guarantee of $60,000,000.

Mr. MANION: That was not a loan; that was a guarantee.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say it was a loan.

Mr. MANION: And that large amount I mentioned is shown as a bookkeeping entry on the books of the Canadian National. We have not received back any of it, and I say frankly that I do not think this or any other government will ever receive back one cent of the amount aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars which have been so advanced to the Canadian National.

Item agreed to.

Maritime Freight Rates Act

Additional amount, in excess of the sum of $6,611,000 already appropriated, required to provide for the payment from time to time to the Canadian National Railway Company of the deficit in receipts and revenues, occurring during the year 1933, of the eastern lines as provided by the Maritime Freight Rates Act:

(a) Amount of the deficit (less that amount thereof occurring on account of the reduction in tolls under the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act) in the receipts and revenues, $80,569.36.

Mr. EULER: In regard to this additional amount required for the Canadian National Railways under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, is there a similar amount payable to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if not, why not?

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. The Canadian Pacific Railway and any other lines that used to exist down there—they are practically all taken in by the Canadian National now—have the same twenty per cent paid to them as the Canadian National. In addition, if the Canadian National has a deficit, as it has been having in the maritimes on its eastern lines, we make up that deficit, which of course does not happen in the case of the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. EULER: But the Canadian Pacific Railway would get some amount because there is an excess of what was appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. MANION: The Canadian Pacific Railway gets the twenty per cent reduction in freight rates exactly on the same basis as the Canadian National under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Mr. EULER: Where is the estimate that provides the amount payable to the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. MANION: The estimate last year provided sufficient to cover it; so there is nothing further required.

Item agreed to.

Deficit of Canadian National Railways

Amount required to provide for payment to Canadian National Railway Company of the net income deficit, including profit and loss, incurred by the system during the year 1933, as certified to by the auditors in the annual report of the company for the year 1933, but exclusive of all non-cash items, including interest on dominion government advances, and exclusive of eastern lines deficits, as further certified to by the auditors and approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals; this payment to be applied in reduction of accountable advances made to the company from the consolidated revenue fund under authority of the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1933, $52,263,819.05.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this item stand, and I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would like to ask the minister if this will be referred to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): It is carried.

Mr. EULER: The minister suggested that it stand, and that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. MANION: No, Mr. Chairman, I suggested that the item stand.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. MANION: I have no objection if the chairman has not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): It is signed and has gone away. I cannot call it back.

Mr. MANION: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the hon. gentleman be permitted to ask his question.

Mr. SANDERSON: My question is this: Will the minister inform the committee if there is any move being made to inaugurate pool trains from Toronto west to London and from London westward?

Mr. MANION: All the arrangements for the pooling of trains are made by the management of the two roads, and without doubt they are investigating many different sections of the country in regard to possible economies from pooling arrangements. As to the details I know nothing whatever because they are not submitted to me or to the government. I cannot answer as to the particular territory my hon. friend inquires about, but if there are any advantages in making pooling arrangements down there no doubt the management of the two roads are investigating the possibilities.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Before the committee rises may I ask if the Canadian National needs this $52,000,000 odd before the end of the present fiscal year in the same way that the $196,000 is needed?

Mr. MANION: This $52,000,000 odd is the deficit on interest which the Canadian National has incurred in the past year, 1933. In other words, their interest charges were $56,000,000 odd, and their earnings were sufficient to pay $4,000,000; at least they have so submitted to us, but as a matter of fact that is not quite correct because they used some of their reserve material to the extent of some million dollars. Their actual deficit is closer to $60,000,000 than to $52,000,000, but by using some of their working capital and goods on hand they have arranged it that their needs so far as interest is concerned for 1933 amount to $52,000,000 odd.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not think the minister understood my question. The Prime Minister said that this $196,000 odd for the West Indies Steamships had been spent and that it was necessary to vote the money before the end of the fiscal year. But I understood the Minister of Railways to suggest that this item of $52,000,000 stand and be referred to the committee.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. MANION: No, I did not suggest that it be referred to any other committee. It will be taken up again in this house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister suggested that the item stand, or at least that was the impression I got, and I am asking whether it is necessary to vote this item of $52,000,000 before the end of the present fiscal year. If it is not needed before the end of the present fiscal year, why not let the item stand? May I ask if this $52,000,000 is needed by the Canadian National before March 31 next?

Mr. MANION: Yes. The money was paid as needed.

Mr. DUFF: I am opposed to having this item stand. It is in the same position as item 275. We have to vote the money to pay the deficit on the Canadian National Railways under this item just as we voted to pay the deficit under item 275. We voted $196,000 odd by item 275 to pay the deficit on the Canadian National Steamships Limited. I think both these items should be treated the same, as they are in the same position; either they should both pass or they should both stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing seems to be too good for the Canadian National but there seems to be a question raised when it comes to voting a million dollars to keep the Canadian Pacific shops open, or $60,000,000 to help them finance their operations.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have no objection to the item passing but the minister has suggested that it should stand. I am asking the minister if this money is needed before March 31.

Mr. MANION: The money has been paid.

Mr. BENNETT: I hesitate to trespass upon the time of the committee but hon. members seem to be having a little difficulty in their desire to make trouble. They cannot reconcile what they conceive to be the explanation. As will be seen from the report which was placed in the hands of hon. members this afternoon, on December 31 last the road had the deficit therein indicated. It becomes necessary, therefore, to vote money through this house. The reason the end of the fiscal year is mentioned is for the purpose of, shall I say, regular dealing with financial matters. We have voted a supply bill for two months of the new year and the old year's financial transactions should be disposed of by March 31. This supplementary estimate is being put through by the minister in order that the supply bill for the year ended March 31, 1934, may close the financial transactions for the year. The transactions for the new fiscal year begin with the appropriation of two months' pay; that estimate has been submitted but this should be out of the way first. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) suggested that the item should stand as some questions arose as to a figure. He intended that it should stand only to later on in the day. He wanted to be certain as to the figure.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Sullivan): The item will stand.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to say that he wanted the item to stand but afterwards you said that it had been signed and sent away. I wonder if you signed the item with your christian and family names or just with your initials; it was all done so quickly. Some hon. members think it should be voted; I have no objection to voting it but I should like to know just where we stand, whether the item is to stand or whether it has been voted. There seems to be great perplexity about it. I am delighted to see my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) giving such courteous answers to the questions asked. I think he sets an example to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and other ministers of the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking on a very relative matter, on the way in which questions are answered. I take this opportunity to congratulate the minister upon being so courteous to hon. members. I appreciate it and in saying that I think I speak on behalf of all of us. I am just telling those hon. gentlemen, who do not need any explanation as to the policies of the government or who would not understand anything if those policies were explained, just what I think of the manner in which the minister has acted. I shall say no more about this matter but I wanted to give the minister all the credit due to him.

Mr. RHODES: My colleague, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), wants to verify his knowledge with respect to this figure so I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Monday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Gordon for the second reading of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking any part in this debate until I heard the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) read extracts yesterday from the report of the auditor general and his findings in connection with the expenditure and distribution of federal aid to the different provinces. When I heard those quotations I decided that I should make my voice heard, not to say to the government "I told you so," but to draw attention to the fact that in 1932 I made certain charges in connection with the expenditure of federal aid in certain sections of the province of New Brunswick. At that time I called the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to the fact that paysheets had been padded by placing upon them the names of men who had not done one day's work. I read six or seven affidavits which I offered to the minister. I demanded that an investigation be held and I put my seat at stake. I stated that if at least ninety per cent of the charges contained in those affidavits and the charges made by myself could not be proved before a proper tribunal, I would resign my seat in parliament. I offered these affidavits to the Minister of Labour but he refused to accept them. He told me, as he has often told the house since, that the matter rested entirely with the provincial authorities of New Brunswick and that his department could have nothing to do with an investigation. I refused to allow these charges to be investigated by the provincial authorities but I was prepared to have them investigated by a properly constituted tribunal to be named by the government or by the house.

In the quotations from the report of the auditor general, that official states that in New Brunswick as well as elsewhere he found padded paysheets and that the federal government had paid its share of amounts which it had no right to pay under the law. He stated also that paysheets and accounts were not properly kept, so I decided it was my duty to direct the attention of the house to the warning I gave the government in 1932. On that occasion I spoke from personal knowledge of the way in which things had been carried on in certain sections of New Brunswick. I was told by some hon. members opposite that I was decrying my own province, running down my own people. No; it was not my intention to decry my province but to point out to the government of this dominion the necessity for better regulations, a stricter inspection of the way in which the work was being carried on under the relief measure, and if possible putting a stop to this graft and maladministration in connection with federal aid not only in the province of New Brunswick but elsewhere—because I see from the auditor general's report that the same condition of affairs exists, in connection with the distribution of expenditures of federal money for unemployment purposes, all over the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Are these the same charges which the hon. member preferred in 1932?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not know whether the auditor general refers to them or not, but I am now referring to the 1932 charges.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Was not an investigation being held by the provincial government of New Brunswick at the time the hon. member made that statement in the house in 1932?

Mr. VENIOT: Not of the accounts in reference to which I read affidavits in this house. An investigation was being held into expenditures of road money in the county of Westmorland; I am not referring to that investigation nor to the charges made and investigated at that time. In 1932 the affidavits I read referred to bridge work in Restigouche county, expenditures in connection with which were not being investigated, and I also referred to road work in the county of Gloucester which has never been investigated. The auditor general's report now bears me out. It shows that I was right when I warned the government against the way things were being done, and advised that measures, stricter than those already in force, should be taken to prevent this maldistribution of public funds of the dominion. I was perfectly right. The auditor general now points out, as I have stated before, that not only in the distribution of direct relief but in the distribution of aid to unemployment in the matter of public works, fraud has existed, accounts have not been properly kept and paysheets have been padded.

The auditor general, or the person whom he sent to investigate these accounts in the various provinces, had only a slim chance to go into these matters. But slim as was that chance, we find that the condition has been rampant throughout every province in the dominion. In 1930, when the first $20,000,000 was voted for aid to unemployment, the official opposition warned the government against the methods they were adopting to have the money expended. We claimed that there were not sufficient safeguards surrounding the expenditure of the money, and we asked that an audit be made on the part of the dominion. But our friends opposite poohpoohed the idea; they told us that it would be insulting the provinces and the municipalities if we insisted on an audit. Well, to-day they are insisting on an audit, but they have locked the barn door after the horse has been stolen. It will be impossible to have an adequate audit of the operations of the last four years, but I do hope that a very strict audit, in accordance with the order in council of March 10 last, will be made in the future. But when you have the proof from our own auditor general that crooked work has been carried on in these expenditures is it possible that the present government is going to entrust to the same individuals, who were guilty of this crooked work, the expenditure of money for unemployment relief, either directly or indirectly, according to the terms of the bill now before the house? I say that those in authority who permitted this maladministration are not fit to continue the administration of any money which this parliament might vote for unemployment relief either directly or indirectly, and that another system should be adopted by which the dominion could more properly safeguard its interests.

Last evening my colleague, the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud), referred to certain projects in 1933 that had been carried on in the province of New Brunswick. He said, and rightly so, that the money in connection with these projects had all been expended weeks and months before the projects were approved by the federal Department of Labour. That approval was given on October 10, I believe, whereas the money in connection with these projects had been all expended in August and September, and perhaps in July. Let me say to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska that that has not been uncommon since the inauguration of this relief system, because in 1931, hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended in New Brunswick before a single project had been approved. The projects of 1931 were approved on November 26, and in July, August and September, and part of October, all this money had been expended. There had been no inspection whatever of the projects submitted to the government for unemployment relief in the matter of public works in that province, and I condemned that transaction at the time. I called the attention of the minister at the time to this fact and insisted that in the future no projects should be accepted by the Department of Labour unless they were first examined by an engineer representing the federal government and approved and recommended by him. But evidently that was a suggestion that has not been carried out, at least in the province of New Brunswick.

Now there is a bill before the legislature of New Brunswick authorizing the government of that province to expend $10,000,000 on hard-surface roads. Let me say to the Minister of Labour that the province of New Brunswick cannot afford under present conditions to spend any such amount of money on roads. New Brunswick, with a debt to-day of approximately $68,000,000, cannot afford to increase that debt by from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000, as the case may be, under present conditions. The government have stated in this house on different occasions that restraint should be placed upon the expenditures of provincial governments, that these governments have been extravagant, and are constantly coming to the Dominion government seeking financial aid. If ever there was an occasion when the government of Canada should restrict any expenditure which is unnecessary it is in the case of the province of New Brunswick. I may be told that this government have no authority over the expenditures of that province. I well know that, but this government have control over the amount of money they will expend in furthering hard surfaced road projects in that province. In that way and to that extent this government can regulate an expenditure which I claim is not necessary at the present time and which the province of New Brunswick cannot afford.

I may be told that this work is required to help unemployment. I am in favour of helping to relieve unemployment. I am prepared to support any measure within reason to help the unemployed in my native province. But there are other means by which the unemployed can be helped, with more permanent effect than by the expenditure on the part of the dominion government of six or seven million dollars for hard surfaced roads in that province. Here let me point out to the Minister of Labour that in the province of New Brunswick there are not more than two or three municipalities—I doubt if there are three—that are able to take advantage of the government's back to the land policy by paying their $200 share for each settler. Our municipalities are almost bankrupt. They have been brought to that position through the enormous sums that they have had to pay to relieve unemployment, especially by the method of direct relief. The municipalities of New Brunswick cannot take advantage of the Gordon back to the land scheme—I think that is the name by which it is known to-day. Let the government, instead of contributing large sums towards the construction of permanent roads, contribute a larger amount as their share to encourage this back to the land project. At present under that act the federal government pays, I understand, $200 per settler, the province pays $200, and the municipality $200. The municipalities cannot meet that demand. Let the provincial government pay its $200 and let the federal Department of Labour add another $200 to what they have already offered, using that money to place unemployed men on new farms in the province of New Brunswick; in that way they will be doing something to establish these people permanently so that in future depressions they will not need to call upon the country to help them. Let me say that the employment afforded by a system of permanent hard surfaced road construction in New Brunswick will not be commensurate with the amount of money expended. We know this work will be done by contract, that the contractor will employ machinery as much as possible and as little hand labour as he can get away with. Therefore the unemployed will not benefit nearly as much as if they were helped to establish themselves permanently on farms. I think I am correct in saying that the auditor general stated that he found in many cases the provinces charging rental to the dominion government for machinery belonging to the province. While he did not condemn such a charge he did state that in many cases the rental was exorbitant. In commenting on that statement I do not wish to reflect at all upon the Minister of Labour, but I am informed that the Minister of Labour himself is perhaps to blame for permitting rental to be charged for the use of provincial machinery on provincial roads. He is also to blame for the exorbitant rental charged, by allowing the ministers of public works of the different provinces to fix what the rental should be, instead of agreeing upon or setting a charge per machine or whatever article is charged for. I have in my hand the report from the Daily Mail of March 14 last of a speech made in the legislature of New Brunswick. It appears that the leader of the opposition there, Mr. Dysart, attacked the Minister of Public Works for having purchased a machine costing $24,000 and charging it up to federal aid. The Minister of Public Works in defending himself against that charge made the statement that he told the Minister of Labour:

> —that it was not practical to use the money received from Ottawa for relief purposes on the trans-Canada highway entirely. . . . The federal Minister of Labour had stated at that time that the provincial government might buy equipment to carry on work and the rental of same could be charged to the dominion government. Consequently, in place of $24,000 being spent as stated by the leader of the opposition, five per cent of the value of the machine was charged as rental and the provincial government absorbed fifty per cent of the cost.

Whether it was fifty per cent of the rental, or of the cost of the machine, that was absorbed is not clearly stated in that speech, but I take it it was fifty per cent of the cost of the machine. If that is so, $12,000 was paid by the federal government, for a machine purchased and owned by the province. No wonder the auditor general says that the rental charged in many cases was exorbitant.

The auditor general also refers to the discovery that ordinary patrol work in the province of New Brunswick was charged up against federal aid, and the federal government called upon to pay its share. I brought that matter up in this house in 1932, I showed where men engaged by the season or by the year on patrol work were included in the items charged against the federal government for unemployment relief. That was not giving relief to the unemployed. These men were paid so much a month, I believe, because their work could be carried on only from May until the end of October or November, according to the season. Those men were regularly employed; what right had they to receive money under unemployment relief? They were receiving regular salaries; that should have been sufficient, and the men without work should have been given a chance to earn the money which was paid these men.

This situation does not exist only in New Brunswick; it is to be found in different sections of Canada. I brought up the matter in this house, but the Minister of Labour would not heed my warning. Now he is brought face to face with the statement made by the auditor general, an official not of the government but of this House of Commons. The minister would not accept the warning as to this kind of expenditure which was given in the house, but he is forced to accept the statement made by the auditor general.

The auditor general draws attention to something else which I brought up in the house in 1932, and I think again in 1933. I directed the attention of the minister to the fact that the provincial government had submitted a plan to the minister asking for federal aid in the construction of a power line from Dalhousie to Jacquet River, in which the share of the federal government was to be approximately $27,000. I pointed out to the minister at that time that this enterprise would bring in sufficient revenue to pay for the cost of construction and the upkeep and that the federal government had no right to share the cost of a project under the guise of unemployment relief which could be constructed by the province under the supervision of the hydro commission. In his report the auditor general refers to this matter. He does not condemn it as I condemned it at the time, but no doubt that is because he does not know it is a revenue producing enterprise and that the province of New Brunswick could have constructed that line without incurring one cent of debt that could not be met within a given number of years by means of a proper sinking fund. The report goes on to indicate that even in connection with that enterprise the accounts were not properly kept, and that refunds should be made to the federal government.

I wish now to touch on the question of direct relief. In 1933 I pointed out to the minister that the administration of direct relief was subject to abuse. At the time I referred only to the province of New Brunswick, and I was told by hon. gentlemen opposite that I was decrying my own province. The statement I made then, however, has been endorsed by the auditor general with regard to every province of Canada. I said then, and I will repeat it now—and I have more evidence now than I had then—that there was grave maladministration of direct relief. I showed that men with money in the bank were receiving direct relief. I showed that men who were in receipt of pensions, not as returned soldiers but from other sources, were in receipt of direct relief. I pointed out that men were receiving direct relief who were not entitled to it under the act. To-day we find the auditor general pointing out that in many cases direct relief has been granted to persons who should not be under that scheme. He goes further and points out that in certain parts of New Brunswick where medical aid, dental services and medicine were not provided for, such accounts were entered as food. That occurred in more than one municipality, and at another point these items were rendered as clothing. Thus the authorities in Ottawa were deceived, because the municipalities knew very well that if the government knew these accounts represented medical attendance, dental services or medicine the government would not pay their share, and rightly so, because that was not the policy. So the statement I made at that time has been substantiated by the report submitted by the auditor general. If that gentleman had time to go further into the matter he would find that in certain sections of New Brunswick municipal councillors rendered accounts to the municipalities for services as councillors in the distribution of relief. Those accounts were paid, and I say that was a direct violation of the municipal act. That practice was followed in the county of Gloucester until this year, when the question was submitted to the attorney general of the province for a legal opinion. He stated that they should not receive remuneration in any case. I know of one councillor who sent in a bill for $166 for visits said to have been made in his parish to see whether certain people required relief.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The accounts were passed by the municipal councils?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, until this year, when they were refused.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They were submitted to and passed by the council, so why blame the government?

Mr. VENIOT: If a better system had been adopted in connection with auditing these accounts they never would have been paid; the federal government would have seen at once that the accounts were not proper, and payment would not have been made.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They were approved by the municipal councils, by Liberals and Conservatives alike?

Mr. VENIOT: Does the hon. gentleman wish to bring politics into it?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: No.

Mr. VENIOT: Then he had better be patient for a while. Then there is another point on which I should like an explanation, in connection with the report laid on the table the other day by the minister. I find that the government's share of the cost of unemployment relief carried on by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1930 and 1931 was $1,072,746.98. Am I right in saying that the federal government paid fifty per cent of the expenditures made for that purpose by the Canadian Pacific Railway? If I am right in that, then the share of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be $1,072,746.98, the same as that of the federal government. If that is correct certainly an explanation is required, because I find that the present government has loaned $2,447,222.71 to the Canadian Pacific Railway for unemployment purposes, whereas according to this return the shown expenditure is a great deal less than that. Perhaps when the bill is in committee the minister will be able to give an explanation. If I am wrong I wish to be corrected.

I have spoken about direct and indirect relief; I have criticized the Department of Labour and the provincial and municipal authorities. Having done so it would be nothing but right for me to endeavour to submit something concrete by way of suggestions. With that in mind I make bold to submit the following:

First, that all federal moneys for direct relief be entrusted to a commission in each province, such commission being composed of one or two representatives in good standing in each municipality.

Second, that municipalities where direct relief is necessary be asked to pay only twenty per cent of the direct relief recommended by the provincial commission, the province to pay forty per cent and the federal government forty per cent. I make this suggestion because of the well known fact that the majority of municipalities in Canada to-day are not in a financial position which would allow them to keep on paying thirty-three and a third per cent for purposes of direct relief.

Third, that in the matter of relief to unemployment by means of public works carried on jointly by the provinces and the federal government, such as roads, bridges and so on, no project be accepted by the federal government unless same has first been approved after thorough investigation by a federal engineer, and only upon his recommendation that such work is of a useful nature and necessary to relieve unemployment in the district where the project is located.

Fourth, that a thorough audit be made by a federal auditor of moneys expended on roads, bridges and so on, either by the relief commission, or by the provincial authorities.

These are a few suggestions which I consider to be of a constructive nature and worthy of the consideration of the Minister of Labour. I wish to add only one or two more. First may I direct attention of hon. members to the back to the land project. I have already stated that the municipalities are not in a position to meet the conditions laid down by the Minister of Labour in regard to the back to the land movement. May I emphasize that point, although I believe I need not stress it unduly to the Minister of Labour, because by this time he must know that the municipalities at least in some of the provinces are not in a position to accept his proposition. I repeat what I said a few minutes ago, namely, that instead of spending large amounts of federal money to aid the provinces in the construction of new roads or the hard surfacing of roads already in existence, at least a portion of the money should be laid aside to help the back to the land movement in those provinces where municipalities cannot afford to pay their share of the $200 per settler. If that is done a permanent policy will have been established so far as this movement is concerned.

People will go back to the land. I know there are thousands waiting for the opportunity and financial aid to locate on crown lands. I know that the government of New Brunswick is willing to open those lands to as many of the settlers as it is satisfied will make good. I believe hon. members opposite from New Brunswick will agree that there are no better settlers to be found in the whole world than those who settle on the crown lands of our province.

In conclusion may I crave the indulgence of the house to speak on one other point, because I believe the time at my disposal has almost expired. I believe it was the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) who stated yesterday that there was in existence an organization operating throughout Canada in opposition to the lumber industry. I do not know to what organization he refers, unless he had in mind communistic activities which prevail in the province of Ontario and in the western provinces. Thank God we have very little, if any, communistic activity in New Brunswick. Let me say to some of the lumbermen in eastern Canada, not to all of them but to the great majority, that if they wish their industry to prosper and if they wish to meet the better conditions for the lumber industry appearing on the horizon, they will have to pay their men better wages than they are paying to-day. The trouble with the lumbermen in New Brunswick is that they are not paying wages sufficient to encourage the men to go to and remain in the camps. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, of a lumberman who is paying $10 to $18 a month for the services of a lumberjack? What do you think of a lumber firm which will send a man into the woods and pay him $1.25 or $1.50 per cord for pulpwood? That man has to cut the pulpwood, load it and pile it. He has to pay from sixty cents to seventy cents per day for board in the camp operated by the lumber company. Under those conditions he cannot make a living. But worse than that, because he has worked in the lumber woods and received a pittance for his labour, hardly enough to keep body and soul together, and despite the fact that his family may be starving at home, upon application for direct relief his wife is told, "You cannot get it, because your husband is employed." Let me warn the lumbermen of the province of New Brunswick the sooner they recognize that reasonable wages should be paid to the men in the bush the better will they get along in their industry.

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the house this afternoon in a discussion of matters to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). I was surprised in the first instance to hear him proceed to blacken the character of the Department of Labour, in the second place the provincial government of the province of New Brunswick, in the third place the municipal councils of that province and in the fourth place the people who elected the government of the province and the governments of the municipalities, which are the very foundation of our democratic life. I know the hon. member would not be so unfair as to attempt to lay at the door of the Minister of Labour many of the irregularities to which he has referred this afternoon, and which are probably as unknown to the Minister of Labour, and were at the time they were committed, as to some man who might happen to be at the north pole.

Mr. VENIOT: He knows it now, though.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): My hon. friend says that the minister knows it now. In that connection I wish to refer to certain incidents which occurred in the province of New Brunswick while the hon. member for Gloucester was Minister of Public Works for that province.

Mr. VENIOT: What has that got to do with this?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): Many of the things to which I shall refer have just as much to do with the question before us as the matters my hon. friend from Gloucester has mentioned this afternoon. He was very careful to say that his speech was not political, and yet at the same time one would not have to be a keen observer—

Mr. VENIOT: I never used the words that my speech was not political.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I only need to submit to the house the interjection that was made by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) and the reply which came from the hon. member for Gloucester county to corroborate the statement I have just made.

Mr. VENIOT: I never made the statement, Mr. Speaker, and I demand that the hon. member withdraw his remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Gloucester says that he did not make the statement. The hon. gentleman may infer, if he wishes, what the statement meant, but as the hon. member for Gloucester has denied it I would ask him to withdraw unless he can produce the actual words taken down.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I think my statement, Mr. Speaker, will be amply borne out by reading Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that I never made the statement, and it must be withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I just want to finish my statement.

Mr. VENIOT: No, you cannot do it.

Mr. SPEAKER: He is speaking on the point of order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): My hon. friend from Gloucester referred to the interruption made by my hon. friend from Inverness as being political, and I therefore say that he wanted to make it appear to this house that his own speech was not political.

Mr. SPEAKER: That may be so, but the hon. member for Gloucester says that he did not use the words that his speech was not political, and the hon. member should therefore withdraw his statement.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I am very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to comply with the rules of the house. I submit still further, knowing the propensities of the hon. member for Gloucester—

Mr. VENIOT: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): —and as the house knows them, that I do not think anyone would charge him with having politics at the bottom of his speech.

I was about to say that the hon. member for Gloucester was at one time Minister of Public Works for New Brunswick. I make this reference to show him how easy it is for the head of a department not to know of irregularities that may be going on under the officials of his department. The hon. member very well knows that during his regime as Minister of Public Works I made certain charges in the legislature of New Brunswick in 1917 or 1918 with respect to the management of his department. He very well remembers also that an investigation was made into those charges and that he himself took occasion to preside over and conduct that investigation. He would not allow any outsider to come in and conduct it, but he himself took full responsibility, and he would not even allow me the privilege of having legal counsel to present my side of the case. It therefore became necessary for me to do the best I could. Information was furnished to my hon. friend as Minister of Public Works at that time in the province of New Brunswick, that men's names were on the payroll of his department and that men had received wages from the department who had never worked a single hour on the road. It was also brought out that children eight years of age had their names on the payroll. That was sworn to before my hon. friend, and yet he never took occasion at that time even to criticize the supervisor who was guilty of that.

Mr. VENIOT: That statement is absolutely not correct. The supervisor was punished under my direction for his misdoing.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): The statement I make, Mr. Speaker, is this, that any supervisor who is to be punished cannot possibly be also exonerated on the floor of the legislature of New Brunswick, and that is what my hon. friend did. When these charges were considered in the legislature of New Brunswick, my hon. friend as Minister of Public Works exonerated all the supervisors who had been found guilty of placing on the payroll the names of children eight years of age and the names of men who had sworn they were out at sea during the whole season. He exonerated everybody in common even the whole bunch.

Mr. VENIOT: That is wrong. The supervisor was dismissed.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): I refer to that to show that it is absolutely impossible for the head of a department to follow through the line of action taken by all his officials and under-officials.

The Minister of Labour in this government enters into an arrangement with the provincial government of New Brunswick to provide a certain amount of relief money which goes both directly and indirectly to the unemployed. Who is responsible for the expenditure of that money? First the provincial government. They hand the money out to the municipal councils. The municipal councils submit their bills from time to time to the provincial government, and in turn these come before the Department of Labour at Ottawa. How can you expect the Minister of Labour at Ottawa to know of these irregularities which have been referred to by my hon. friend from Gloucester?

Let me say further that my hon. friend from Gloucester is trying to criticize and blacken the character of the provincial government of New Brunswick. The Conservative government of New Brunswick, as my hon. friend knows full well, is the only government in that province that ever created a royal commission and gave everybody a chance to appear before it and give evidence against the department concerned and the government of the day. The door was thrown wide open and my hon. friend was one of those who took advantage of that opportunity. He appeared many times before the commission to have his charges sustained or otherwise.

Mr. VENIOT: Some of them were sustained.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): When they were sustained, those guilty were punished, not exonerated.

Mr. VENIOT: What about Flemming?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): He was punished. I regret that the hon. member for Gloucester has found it necessary to refer to one who has since passed away and who performed such a splendid service for his native province.

Mr. VENIOT: He punished himself. It was not the government that punished him.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): It will be observed by hon. gentlemen that the hon. member for Gloucester and I agree on almost everything.

Mr. VENIOT: Especially to disagree.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): There is one statement the hon. member made with which I am happy to agree, and that was that the public debt of the province of New Brunswick has reached an enormous figure; but we are not as badly off as many of the other provinces. We are able to meet our obligations in New Brunswick, and we always have met them. I consider it is one of the first duties of any government to see that the financial integrity of the people of the different provinces of Canada is fully maintained. I cannot but recall the many times I have heard my hon. friend from Gloucester, when he was Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick, stand on the floor of the legislature and tell the people that he was there to spend the money and he intended to do it. I ask him to state in all fairness who is responsible for the staggering debt of the province of New Brunswick. Is it one party more than the other? He knows that both parties are guilty. He should go back in his memory a little and recall the year 1925, when he placed a proposition before the people of the province which, if it had carried, would have made that province absolutely bankrupt. The people denounced him and his party at the polls and put another man at the head of affairs in the province.

My hon. friend referred to the wages paid in the lumber camps of the province and that is one point upon which we both fully agree. However, I expected that he would have been fair enough to tell this house and the people of this country that the provincial government of New Brunswick has been the first this season to pass an act to provide for minimum wages in the lumber camps of New Brunswick. That was an omission by my hon. friend. I am sure he must have overlooked it because he is usually so fair about these things.

Mr. VENIOT: I was not talking about the government of New Brunswick, I was talking about the conditions in the lumbering industry.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria): The hon. member referred also to the construction of hard-surfaced roads. A few years ago the province passed an act to empower the government to build hard-surfaced roads. At that time I took occasion to call upon the then premier and tell him that I did not think the financial condition of the province would warrant the construction of such roads. I still maintain that position, so the hon. member for Gloucester and I are on all fours in connection with this matter.

I apologize for the fact that conditions in New Brunswick have been brought into the picture to such an extent and have absorbed so much time of this house. I hope the few remarks I have made will clear the mind of the hon. member for Gloucester to some degree and make him realize the difficulties confronting the Minister of Labour, the Department of Labour and the heads of other departments in tracing such irregularities as he has referred to in his remarks.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why this legislation has been delayed until this late date in the session. Parliament adjourns to-morrow for the Easter recess and does not reassemble until April 9. On the thirty-first of this month the relief bill of 1934 will have expired and unless this legislation is passed before the house adjourns to-morrow, the distribution of relief will automatically cease. Parliament is confronted with the necessity of passing legislation introduced only yesterday and which cannot have due consideration or of assuming the responsibility of depriving pepole of relief without which they cannot get along. Parliament has been in session for many weeks and there has been practically no important legislation before us. This and other bills should have been in our hands a month ago in order that we might give proper consideration to the matters involved. Instead of that, we find legislation being withheld until the very last minute. We are now up against the necessity of either putting this bill through by to-morrow night or assuming the responsibility of depriving people of their relief. I do not know what the government has in view in withholding legislation until the last minute. If their purpose is to get it through without due consideration, then I must congratulate them upon the success of their tactics. Parliament was not created and is not maintained for the purpose of putting through legislation without consideration, it was created for an entirely different purpose, to give consideration to important measures of this kind. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was sitting on this side of the house there was no man in Canada who was more insistent on maintaining the rights of parliament but since he has become Prime Minister he is an entirely different man. We have never had a Prime Minister who was so intent upon usurping the rights of parliament and reducing it to a position of subservience. He is now repeating his performance of last year, of the year before and of the year before that by bringing down legislation at a time when we have to put it through almost without notice and without due consideration or assume the responsibility of depriving people of their relief.

I support my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the statements he made yesterday with regard to auditing the accounts of the provinces in connection with relief expenditures. I remember the fall of 1930 when the leader of the opposition was insistent that an audit of these expenditures should be carried on continuously. I remember also how the Prime Minister objected and said that it would be an insult to the provinces to tell them that we were going to audit their accounts. But what happened? We have the report quoted yesterday by the leader of the opposition in which it is stated that the provinces have collected the gasoline tax from their own people and then collected the same tax over again from the federal government. The idea of these measures was to reimburse the provinces for the money they spent, not for the money they collected. The more they collect from the people, the more they collect from us. They have been collecting from us, not on the basis of money spent but on the basis of money collected.

If I understand the bill aright, its aim is to cure unemployment by the launching of an extensive program of public works. Surely the government has learned by this time that unemployment cannot be cured by the construction of public works. Other countries have tried and are trying it and surely the government can learn something from its own experience. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has asked us to give the government credit for being able to make its own mistakes; I wish we could give it credit for being able to profit by them, but I am afraid we cannot.

Mr. MANION: Do you ever profit by your own?

Mr. YOUNG: I try to.

Mr. McINTOSH: Give him a chance.

Mr. YOUNG: The only way unemployment can be cured in this or any other country is by a revival of industry. Every measure that tends to retard the revival of industry will increase unemployment; every measure that tends to decrease the burden upon industry will tend to cure unemployment. What is the trouble with industry to-day? The trouble is that the costs of conducting industry are greater than the returns to be expected.

Mr. MacNICOL: A little free trade.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not care what industry you are engaged in, whether it be farming, lumbering, manufacturing or a commercial enterprise, the expenses to-day in connection with carrying on that industry are greater than the returns you can expect to receive. That is the reason why industry in this country is stagnant and the only remedy is to remove some of the burdens which industry carries upon its shoulders.

One of the greatest burdens of industry is that of taxation. The Associated Chambers of Commerce of this country have estimated that one-third of the national income is collected in the form of taxes by the various taxing bodies. If the figures quoted are correct, then the Chambers of Commerce have under-stated the case. If one-third of the national income is collected in taxes, that one-third is part of the national income. That is to say, the national income is the sum of the incomes of all the people. If the wealth created in this country is represented by two, that two represents the incomes of those engaged in industry. If the government collects one unit of that two in the form of taxes and turns it over to another class of people, the amount so collected becomes the income of those people and helps to make up the national income. Therefore, the national income becomes three but the taxes collected are one. That is one-third of the national income but one-half of the created wealth. So that if the figures of the chamber of commerce are correct we are collecting one-half of the created wealth of the country in the form of taxation. That is a burden that industry cannot stand. It means that whether you work at the plough, or at the bench, or at the lathe, or in the counting house, one-half of the product of your labour is being absorbed in the form of taxes. This measure before us, calculated to relieve unemployment by creating public works, will have the effect of increasing the tax burden of the country, and to increase the tax burden is to increase the burden on the back of industry, and therefore create more unemployment rather than reduce it.

Last year the building industry was only 15 per cent of normal. Why was it so low? Why do men not build houses? The first thing a man does when he contemplates putting up a house is to figure what it will cost him, and then he adds what the taxes will be after it is finished, and if the cost of the building, together with the taxes he will have to pay, is greater than the probable value of the building, he will not build. A proposal of this nature, which will add to the cost of building and add to the taxes that will have to be paid on the building afterwards, will further discourage him, so that instead of 15 per cent of normal, building will be less than that. Therefore your public undertakings, public works created to relieve unemployment, will result in more unemployment because it will discourage the building and other industries under private enterprise.

In 1930 we had before the house a bill which proposed to spend $20,000,000 on such a thing as this, to relieve unemployment. At that time we on this side warned the government that it could not be done. We told them that it would not relieve unemployment in the slightest degree; for before you can spend a dollar on public works you must collect that dollar from the people; and when you collect your dollars from the people you reduce their purchasing power by that amount, and when a man's purchasing power is reduced he buys less goods, so that the merchant sells less, the railways haul less, the factories produce less, and there is less employment in the country. So that these schemes which are put forward for curing unemployment through the creation of public works have this effect, that you might create a dollar's worth of employment where you spend a dollar, but you create a dollar's worth of unemployment where you collect the dollar, and the last condition is worse—worse, I say, because in addition to the expenditure on your public works you are saddling yourself with a maintenance cost which will reduce the purchasing power of the people in future years.

I know that some people say that we will print new money to pay for these works; we will not borrow the money but will print it and circulate it. What is the difference? When you print money you really borrow it. When you borrow money in the old fashioned way from the bank, or on debentures or bonds, you borrow from the rich and undertake to pay them back principal with interest; but when you borrow money by printing it you borrow chiefly from poor people and you do not pay them back either principal or interest. That is the essential difference between borrowing in the old fashioned way and printing money. I have here a Canadian dollar bill which states that the dominion will pay to bearer one dollar on demand. It is nothing but a promissory note, and if you print money to pay for these works you will be paying for them with promissory notes. What is the effect? The effect is this, that those who are engaged in productive industry will have to support not only their own industries but other unproductive works which it is proposed, I presume, to create under the provisions of this bill. What kind of works will they be? I do not know, but section 3, subsection (a) says that the governor in council may:

Provide for special relief,—

I do not know why the comma is there.

—works and undertakings under control and direction of the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior.

No limitation is set to the amount of money to be spent, no control over the works to be engaged in. Unlimited sums could be spent and the most fantastic schemes could be engaged in. They could undertake to build a paved highway across Canada, something which would be stupendously expensive to keep up later on. And what good would it be to anyone except a few tourists? Under the provisions of this act they could undertake, at Canadian expense alone, to build the St. Lawrence waterway. Not only that, but having started it, they could carry it on long after the expiration of this act, because section 10 declares:

> This act shall expire on the thirty-first day of March, 1935, but any obligation or liability incurred or created under the authority of this act prior to the thirty-first day of March, 1935, together with any liability for expenditures after that date for projects required to be completed in order to preserve the value of work already done may be paid and discharged out of the consolidated revenue fund notwithstanding the expiration of this act on the said date.

That is to say, they can undertake any works, and provided those works are undertaken before the end of March next they can commit this country, they will commit this country, to carry on such works to completion no matter what the expenditure might be. Under this act the Minister of National Defence—because he comes into it—could build fortifications in the arctic circle and no one could stop him.

Have hon. members considered what it would cost to maintain these works? The maintenance cost of public works must be stupendous, and yet it will all be charged against productive industry for all time. And then what will the government do with the unemployed in the remote districts? You cannot put up public buildings in every city, town, village and hamlet in Canada. These works must be located in certain places, and they are bound to be remote from a great many of the unemployed. You cannot take a married man away from home and set him to work in some far distant place without paying him sufficient wages to maintain himself at the works and his family at home, so that you will pay wages out of proportion to the value of the work done.

There are some public works which, perhaps, if the government is bound to adopt a policy such as this, they might consider, namely, public works of the kind which would be at least self-supporting and which would not saddle us in the future with maintenance costs. For instance, they might turn their attention to reforestation projects. They might reforest some of the waste lands, and in some of the prairie sections, where land is not fit for agriculture, it might be worth while to make experiments in the growing of trees adapted to that country to see whether the monotony of the prairies could be broken and these lands put to some useful purpose.

Mr. GORDON: The government has been doing that for two years.

Mr. YOUNG: I would recommend that they extend their experiments.

Mr. GORDON: We have set out about seven million trees or more.

Mr. YOUNG: Where?

Mr. GORDON: In the government camps at Petawawa and on other lands owned by the dominion government.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad to hear it. They might also turn their attention to the draining of some of our lands. I am not an authority on this, but I have been informed that in some of the timbered areas trees would grow more quickly and be bigger if the water table were lowered somewhat. I do not know whether that is correct, but if it is, then a very profitable expenditure could be made in the direction of lowering the water table to promote the growth of timber in such areas. We have in some of our agricultural lands areas that would be better if drained; they would be more easily reclaimed. In some of the drier sections of the prairies it might be profitable, and I believe it is being considered, to find ways and means of catching the spring water and holding it against the drier summer season; not that enough water could be held to affect the climate seriously, but such reservoirs would help in the dry season and would provide men with water for their stock.

I would point out to the government that on the whole the financial situation of the country is such that we cannot afford to indulge in one dollar of unnecessary expenditure. We have to take care of the unemployed; we cannot see people starve in our midst; but the only thing to do is to do it in the cheapest way, and I submit that a program of public works is not the most economical way. We had some experience of it in 1930, when we found that it cost the treasury $4 to put $1 in the hands of a worker. That is to say, for every $4 we spent, $1 went in wages and the other $3 for material and so on. I would suggest to the minister that he should not confine his expenditures to public works but should find cheaper ways of extending relief to people who are in great need.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the special session of 1930 the Prime Minister spoke thus on September 16, as reported at page 238 of Hansard:

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving that you do now leave the chair, I do so because of the disturbed conditions that exist in this country and because of the circumstances that this parliament has been called to consider the problem of unemployment. I indicated a few days ago that the measures proposed were three in number, of which a tariff measure was one. Our tariff measure is not a general revision of the tariff, but deals only with such items in the tariff as it is believed will ensure additional employment to a large number of men and women in Canada.

This was a great speech. A little further on the Prime Minister continued as follows:

It is not for the purposes of protection that the tariff is being revised to-day. The resolutions that are being submitted to this house are not for the purpose of affording protection in the sense in which that term is usually used; but if that term is used to designate just what we, during the election, indicated that it did mean, namely, the giving to Canadians an equality of opportunity with others who are building up their country to enable us to build up our dominion, and to give fair competition to the worker in Canada, be it man or woman, then it is protection that we propose. There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, in the mind of any hon. gentleman within sound of my voice, that this government at least has a mandate to give effect to that policy.

It was naturally an experiment.

In every part of this dominion I was at great care to make it known to the audiences who listened to what I had to say, so that there could be no mistake as to what I meant, that in the event of their supporting candidates of our party they thereby supported a policy that would ensure fair competition to Canadian workmen and work women and equality of opportunity to Canadians to build up their country.

That sounded very nice. He continued thus:

A number of items only will be dealt with. They will be dealt with on the basis of the employment that will be given to those who are not now employed. And we have very definite assurances from the producers in this country—

Mark that, sir.

—that as a result of the action we are taking they will increase the number of men and women in their mills and factories. I said the other day, Mr. Speaker, that the number might be estimated at 25,000 within a reasonable time. I think that is too low an estimate, but I desired that the estimate should be at least conservative—as in keeping with the party for which I speak at this moment. When I say 25,000 I think I am understating the number of men and women who will find employment by reason of the action we are taking.

[Mr. Young.]

I shall now ask the hon. gentleman in this most important debate to answer from his seat and tell us who were those manufacturers who made that promise, and what was the promise, that was made. But I do not see the right hon. gentleman there, I do not think the Prime Minister is in his seat. Oh, I understand; Mr. Herridge must be in town, and his company is more interesting to the Prime Minister than the company of his colleagues. But, sir, we are discussing a most important matter. On Thursday last when we were discussing unemployment, the Minister of Labour was in his seat but the Prime Minister was not. Someone told me: "Herridge is in town." Yesterday we were discussing unemployment, the Prime Minister was not here. Herridge was in town! Herridge interests him more than the matter of unemployment. Perhaps the Prime Minister wants to hear the gossip as to how the St. Lawrence waterway treaty came to be defeated in Washington; that may be the big interest with him. We are discussing the most important matter of the session, the matter of unemployment,—unemployment created by his insane policy, but the right hon. gentleman is listening to gossip in some other room of the house. The captain is not on the deck. I think the attention of the house should be called to that. I am very sorry it happens that way, for I would like to have some answer to the very reasonable question that I have put, after reading excerpts from the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in the special session of 1930. But he is not here to answer; and if he were there would be no answer, for he always finds a way to evade answering reasonable questions put by members of this house. What was said then by the right hon. gentleman was most childish; he would have been most credulous to believe what was said to him by these manufacturers, promising to employ more men if the tariff were increased. Did they keep their word? No.

A little further on in the same speech the Prime Minister continued:

We propose therefore to provide that so far as may be reasonably possible the requirements of the 10,000,000 people living on the northern half of this continent shall be provided by Canadian producers.

What happened? We find distress, especially among the farmers and labouring men. What the government did at the suggestion of the Prime Minister in 1930 was to raise the tariff without taking the trouble to study the effect in detail. They raised the tariff at the request of these people who were filling the corridors of this house and pressing the Prime Minister for an increase of tariff without any due consideration of the merits. He had power, he used it, but did he relieve unemployment? At that time the number of unemployed was about 100,000, one for each hundred of the population. It was very easy for Canada at that time to give relief to the poor. Municipalities were doing that without even the assistance of the provinces. The works done at that time were normal works. But little by little, step by step, the number of unemployed increased until now at least one-third of the citizens of Canada are unemployed. The first experiment in unemployment relief was to raise the tariff, on the assurance given by manufacturers that they would employ more men, 25,000 more they said, but the Prime Minister said that was not enough; he would provide employment for more than that.

That was the first step. What happened at the same time? The Dunning budget that had been prepared with a view to giving opportunity to the Canadian delegates to discuss trade matters with other countries was thrown aside. The Prime Minister came back from London with empty hands. He was unsuccessful at the conference of 1930 because he had no policy. Then came the session of 1931. After having cut off the hands of Canadian trade at the special session of 1930 he cut off the feet of Canadian trade at the session of 1931. Then we had that famous imperial conference of 1932. Well, the government bears a great burden of responsibility. I try to be fair, I do not put the blame so much on the other ministers as I do on the Prime Minister. The blame attaching to them is that they do not tell him to go at once and let some other minister —any one—be the captain of the ship in these stormy days. We have had enough of those experiments with the butcher knife or the axe. Tariffs are not to be dealt with in that way. It is an extremely delicate thing, and when considering the tariff it is most important to take every precaution, to be well informed, to weigh the pros and cons and thoroughly discuss the change that may be suggested. The government has no plan. Why do we have this blank cheque policy? It is because the government program is blank; there is nothing to it. The Prime Minister decided nothing and waited until the last moment to urge the house to pass his legislation. All legislation should be carefully studied; that is most important. We have special rights as members of this house, rights that date back to the Magna Charta. Why were those rights put aside? It was because the government had no program at the time. In 1930 the government had no program except to raise the tariff; that was idealism. The Prime Minister said his party had a mandate to raise the tariff. Well, Mr. Speaker, many other matters were discussed during the campaign. The Prime Minister had a mandate to increase the price of butter, to the benefit of the producer. He had a mandate to bring prosperity to every home. That was why the people elected him by such a large majority, but if the people had known what was to happen in the latter part of 1930 and in 1931, 1932, 1933 and until the present do you think so many would have voted to support the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite?

The right hon. gentleman always comes along with a new experiment. Why does he not succeed in the government of this country? The reason is very simple; it is because he has disregarded and discarded Liberal policies. He put them aside and said, "Now we will try experiments." He was not qualified; he was not sufficiently prepared to make the change by himself. Sometimes I have the greatest commiseration for his ministers, some of whom are very able. They have no opportunity to be heard, because the power behind the throne is in Washington. I regret that very much. The members of the cabinet are in a very humiliating position; they are not equally gifted, but some are very able men. I am sorry that their opinion does not count. It is Herridge who bosses everything; the Prime Minister, instead of listening to the sound advice of his ministers, listens to gossip from Washington. I am sorry for those who suffer as a result; I am sorry for the workingmen, the farmers and men in every other walk of life—

Mr. SHAVER: Lawyers.

Mr. POULIOT: I say I feel sorry for those men, whether their representative sits on this or the other side of the house. We regret very much that it is impossible for the Prime Minister to concentrate. He suffers from travelitis; he goes to and fro. At the beginning of the session, when we were discussing important matters, he went to Toronto three or four times. He also went to Saint John in connection with the new construction at that port, though it was the duty of the Minister of Marine to go, and he also went to Montreal. The Prime Minister cannot remain in his seat in the house; he cannot even stay in Ottawa. He has to travel around like a wandering Jew. We want him here in his place; when we have questions to ask we want him here to answer them. If he travels a good deal, sir, I am sure he does so because he is unable to answer the questions that are put to him by hon. members of the house. I resent it very much, not on my personal account but on behalf of the people whom I represent in this house. We have had enough of these experiments at the expense of the Canadian people; we have been fed with words long enough. The situation is very serious, and we should no longer tolerate the apparent indifference to what may happen in the country because of the fact that the right hon. gentleman desires to continue as Prime Minister at the expense of the prosperity of the Canadian people. Have we an iron man in this country? Yes, sir, we have; we have Eric the robot, and what is the difference between Eric the robot and the Prime Minister? The difference is that Eric the robot has been answering questions at some exhibitions in Montreal, according to the press.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is often more than we can get in the House of Commons.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the Conservative party will not elect Eric as their leader. I do not mean that very seriously, because I know that among the Conservative members, where I count some very dear friends, there are many who feel as I do. I have nothing personally against anyone in this house, but when I see the people in my home town and the surrounding district suffering because of the fact that this government and the Prime Minister have no policy, the only thing I can do is protest most energetically on behalf of my own and the entire Canadian people.

We hear at times, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister is a very busy man. I submit that instead of wasting his time looking up the stenographic reports of my remarks in Hansard he should devote himself to finding new measures by means of which the condition of the Canadian people might be improved. The right hon. gentleman is responsible for what has been happening since 1930. He tells us that everything is going well, but what does he say when he feels that he has to give expression to his real feelings? He says the country has reached the limit of its credit. Those words mean a good deal coming from the Prime Minister; yet here we are faced with the expenditure of another $50,000,000. If Canada has reached the limit of its credit how can the government find $50,000,000 more? Then there is another point, sir. Some time ago, on March 19, Mr. Mussolini, who had a plan previously, enunciated a new plan. He announced a huge construction project, because he wanted to build houses for the Italian people. Then, on March 22, in answer to a question asked by my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister stated that he had promised to build a public building in the city of Hamilton, and from that remark the deduction was that the government would build new buildings at different points throughout the country. I have no objection to that. But if it is true that Canada has no credit, where will we get the money? That is an embarrassing position in which to find ourselves.

Some hon. members opposite paid a very high compliment to the Prime Minster when they compared him to Mussolini. One of them stated that Mussolini should feel complimented because a Canadian had been compared with him. These comparisons went to the head of the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman was compared with Mussolini or with Hitler because no one of the three of them either drinks or smokes. This may appear to be a negative comparison; in fact it is a comparison which could be made equally as effectively with corpses. A corpse does not smoke or drink. Therefore that comparison of the Prime Minister with Mussolini and Hitler, two dictators, is completely negative.

But, sir, let us go farther than that; let us think of the future. We will all die. The Prime Minister will die, just the same as any other hon. member. The only difference between him and me is that his body will lie in a mausoleum and mine will lie under six feet of earth.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. member have nothing to do with the motion to give second reading to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: We must consider this legislation in its true light, and we must realize that all hon. members will be submitted to the same judgment for their actions in this House of Commons. We must act fairly and give the right hon. gentleman credit for his sincerity. I believe he is sincere, but I regret from the bottom of my heart that some hon. gentlemen opposite and a section of the press have paid him compliments so high that they have gone to his head. We must consider matters calmly. We are not in a position where we may make light of them.

When I think of the unemployment problem I am reminded that every day I pass a building on Elgin street which for a time was used as a church and is now used as a shelter for the unemployed. Why is it so? It is because the state is unable to take care of the unemployed, and private charity has to give assistance to the needy. I take this opportunity to make a statement which this week is of particular significance, namely that the church is giving that assistance. The unemployed men were in that church because they found shelter there. They are expecting and hoping for better times, and that sooner or later they may secure work.

Do we not remember that at the special session of 1930 from his seat in the house the Prime Minister said, "Those people do not ask for charity; they want work. We will not give them charity; we will give them work." How is it so many of those men are on direct relief? They are on relief because the government has no policy but is still operating under a blank cheque policy. What has been done under that policy? Money has been advanced to Newfoundland; private firms have received guarantees or support from the government; the state has come to the relief of individuals—conditions which, under a well governed state, should not exist.

I shall not speak at greater length in this connection but shall ask hon. gentlemen opposite to curtail all further laudatory exaggerations of the Prime Minister, and give him an opportunity again to become what he was when he acted as leader of the opposition. In those days he was a simpler man, but they have spoiled him. They have made him different from what he was, and they are responsible. I hope some day they will understand that in this House of Commons flattery is useless, and that members of the House of Commons are above it. Perhaps if hon. members opposite would realize the truth of what I am saying we might some day have from the government sound policies sufficient to meet present conditions.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on this vicious piece of legislation may I say that I want to touch upon three phases thereof before the house. One is that if the government had a constructive trade policy we would not at this time be dealing with an unemployment problem. Some may say that because of a world situation we would have unemployment anyway. Well, to a certain extent that may be true, but the volume of unemployed we have to-day would not exist in Canada if we had a constructive national and international progressive trade policy. Secondly, I believe that the unemployment dilemma in which the government finds itself after four years of attempted rule has come about largely through its trade policy, and because the path it has been pursuing politically and otherwise has been absolutely unsound

First, with regard to trade it might be well to say that the condition now existing in Canada did not always obtain. In 1929 our trade with the United Kingdom was valued at approximately $625,000,000. In 1930, a year afterwards, it had dropped to $472,000,000. In that year the Liberals left office. Then, in 1931, when the present administration was getting down to business, trade dropped to $370,000,000, in 1932, to $290,000,000 and in 1933 to the paltry sum of $271,000,000. These figures indicate a drop in trade from over $600,000,000 to about $300,000,000, or a drop in the ratio of two to one.

In 1896 when the Liberal government came into power under Laurier, what did the Liberals of that day do? They inaugurated and put into effect a progressive empire trade policy. Although the policy was opposed by Conservatives of that day, notwithstanding the opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and those who followed him attempted and succeeded in one of the greatest pieces of trade reconstruction that had ever been known in the history of the empire, and Canada benefited immensely from that move. In 1896 Canada had a trade with the United Kingdom valued at only about $99,000,000, but in 1911 after fifteen years of Laurier rule, it had reached about $250,000,000, or about two and a half times as much. In 1925, when the Liberals were in power, the trade had reached $548,000,000. Hon. members will note that under Liberal rule, trade with the United Kingdom rose from $99,000,000 to over $600,000,000. To-day it is down to about one-third of that; in other words, two-thirds of that trade has been destroyed. Is it any wonder we have unemployment? Is it any wonder we have about 1,300,000 people living on relief in this country and that we have thousands and thousands of unemployed, that the family life of Canada has been to a large extent disintegrated, and that we have the growth of ideas politically in many ways that are not for the good of this country? I do not think we need wonder at the conditions that have come about.

Take our trade with the United States. We find practically the same story. In 1929, when the Liberals were in power under my right hon. leader, our trade with the United States amounted to $1,381,000,000; in 1930, $1,383,000,000. In 1931 it started to go down, the minute this government came into power, dropping in that year to $900,000,000. In 1932 it dropped to $600,000,000. There was a continual dropping and dropping, and with unemployment increasing until we are in the position we are in to-day. In 1933, just a year ago, our trade with the United States was $380,000,000. In other words hundreds of millions of our trade with the United States have disappeared just as hundreds of millions of our trade with the United Kingdom have disappeared.

This decline in international trade means a decrease in national business, and a serious reduction in national business means the destruction of employment and the introduction of unemployment until by degrees we find ourselves in the position we are in at the present time.

What about Canada's total trade—not our trade with the United Kingdom, not our trade with the United States, but Canada's trade with the whole world? That is an important thing to consider because the world is the ultimate economic unit, the ultimate trade unit, and if we do not measure up in world trade, then of course unemployment will appear and the financial and commercial state of the nation will go from bad to worse.

In 1929 Canada's position in world trade was a phenomenal one. Our trade in that year amounted to over $2,600,000,000. In 1930 it dropped to $2,400,000,000. But note the drop when this government came into power and on up to the present time. In 1931 it had dropped to $1,700,000,000; in 1932 to $1,100,000,000, and in 1933, last year, it had dropped to about $900,000,000, or about one-third of what it was in 1929. That does not take into consideration the fact that in 1933 the gold value of the dollar was only 87 per cent of its gold value in 1932, so really we ought to deduct ten per cent from the figure I have given for 1933, and if we do that we find that our world trade in that year amounted to merely $800,000,000.

Looking at it in another way, if we let the total trade of Canada in 1929 equal 100, and we measure our trade by that yardstick, we see that in 1932 our trade had dropped to 34 per cent, whereas world trade measured by the same yardstick dropped to only about 39 per cent. In other words Canada's trade dropped five per cent more than world trade. Surely that makes it plain that all the ills that have come upon us have not been because of a world situation that has developed.

So, Mr. Speaker, we find that the causes of this destruction of trade are to be found in tariffs and trade restrictions, in war debts and the cessation of international lending, but above and beyond all may I say that in my humble opinion tariffs have done more to destroy world trade and bring about the unemployment situation in which we now find ourselves to-day than any other factors. The export trade of Canada in 1929 amounted to $1,300,000,000; in 1930, $1,100,000,000, and in 1933 it had dropped to $480,000,000. There is the trade picture of Canada in its relation to the whole world. I have given it to the house in relation to the United Kingdom and in relation to the United States, and the all-compelling thought is simply this, that the trade policy of this government has been a failure. Its tariff policy too is absolutely wrong. No country like Canada can prosper and grow and develop under a prohibitive tariff policy. In the history of Canada before confederation and from confederation down to 1878, and from 1878 to 1896, and from 1896 to 1911, and from 1911 down to the present time, anyone who cares to read will find that a prohibitive tariff simply destroys Canadan trade, interferes with business, and gradually brings us into a position where we have great unemployment and always a position that is not in any way favourable.

Second, what about the unemployment policies of the present government in 1930, the last time an appeal was made to the Canadian public? You will find that it gave many pledges and promises to the people of Canada—pledges and promises prophetic of its political doom. These pledges have already been put on Hansard, but with a federal election coming on—since we have come to the fifth session of this parliament—I think it is only well to again put on Hansard these widely-proclaimed pledges and promises, for I believe the Canadian people can read and re-read them with profit. They tell the whole story, and the whole story is this: The present government got into power by promises and pledges which they have not carried out. They have not measured up to their promises and pledges, but have done the opposite, so that to-day Canada is faced with the most serious unemployment situation it ever had. In 1930 they promised by a system of prohibitive protection to develop our natural resources. How much have they done, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to develop our natural resources by prohibitive protection? I leave it to the parliamentarians and to the Canadian people to answer whether there has been any development worth speaking of. Consequently that pledge has fallen down.

They—the Conservative high command—also pledged that by a system of high protection they would develop our agricultural and industrial life and keep the consumers from exploitation. Well, the deplorable story that we have heard in this house during the last few weeks, and the exploiting evidence that has been adduced in the committee inquiring into the spread between the price the producer receives and the price the consumer pays, furnishes a direct contradiction of the pledge of the federal government that it would by a protective tariff protect our consumers from exploitation. Had the pledge been put the other way, it would have been the truth. If they had said that by a system of high protection or prohibitive tariffs the consumers would be exploited from coast to coast, that would have foretold exactly what has taken place.

They also pledged to develop agriculture, the live stock industry, the dairy industry, and to bring about stabilization of economic conditions; to build up foreign trade and empire trade, and at the same time to have these compensating advantages extend to all other avenues of public life.

There are their pledges, practically seven or eight, and not one of which has been kept. Not one piece of constructive development has taken place in our Canadian national life in the last four years, no development of our natural resources, no building up of agriculture, no development of world trade or empire trade, and no stabilization of economic conditions. Not one of those pledges has been worked out, and in that we find the explanation of the fact that we have over one million people on relief in Canada to-day. What a record!

May I just touch for a moment or two upon some of the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and see how they measure up with present conditions and with this iniquitous bill now before parliament. What did he say? At Edmonton he said that he would face unemployment at once. But he has not faced unemployment at once or at any other time. He may have faced it but that is all he has done, he has not solved it. Again he said: "I accept the challenge." Any man who is a real man will accept a challenge and face it; he will bring about a condition of affairs so that the challenge will not hold good—will, in fact disappear. But the challenge is as good to-day as it ever was, showing that the Prime Minister has not accepted it in the real sense. He has thrown it aside and the challenge is there still, even worse than it was in 1930. What did he say at Chatham, New Brunswick? He said: "Put me into power and this bogy of unemployment will be destroyed." Has the bogy of unemployment been destroyed? Has it? It is bigger to-day than it ever was. In 1930 it was but a molehill but in 1934 it has become a mountain. The condition is more serious than ever. What did he say at Moncton? He said: "The Conservative party is going to find work or perish in the attempt." I think it will perish in the attempt.

This unemployment problem is the biggest problem facing Canada to-day. The Liberals are going to challenge the government on its lack of policy in not facing this question. Make no mistake about it, the unemployment problem is here and must be solved. If this government cannot solve it, then the Canadian people will soon see that a government is put into power that can solve it. We, the official opposition will watch in all seriousness and with all vigilance every move made by this government between now and election day. We will watch the government to see what policy it brings forth and how it is going to manipulate vainly to get out of the position in which it now finds itself. The only thing the government can do is to bring down a real policy, a policy that will build up trade, relieve unemployment and restore the confidence of the Canadian people.

According to the Ottawa Citizen of July 14, 1930, the Prime Minister said that he would solve the unemployment problem and if he did not he would ask his supporters from Quebec and other members of his party to put him out of office. He has not solved this problem and the members from Quebec have not voted him out of office. The members from the other provinces have not voted him out of office. They sit there day after day in a docile manner; they see the lack of policy with regard to unemployment, with regard to trade, with regard to finance and with regard to everything, yet they continue to vote to keep this government in power. They are opposing themselves to the promises made years ago by the Prime Minister.

What did the Prime Minister say at Vancouver? He said: "I will see that my promises are carried out or I will go out of power trying to do so." There is no doubt that those promises have not been carried out and may I say there is no doubt that he will go out of power trying to carry them out. At Winnipeg the Prime Minister said that he would meet the unemployment problem or perish in the attempt. At Sarnia he said that Canada was in a critical condition. At that time the condition of Canada was not comparable with the condition to-day. If Canada was in a critical condition on July 17, 1930, Canada is in a much more critical condition to-day. He said: "Unemployment exists,"—unemployment to-day is tenfold and twentyfold what it was then; what is the government going to do about it? Proceeding, he said: "—on a scale which never before was known in the history of this country." To-day we have unemployment on a scale never before known in the history of Canada and yet this government is standing idly by without a policy. It has been completely beaten in its attempt to put Canadian industry and commerce on its feet.

At Montreal the Prime Minister said: "The first duty of a Canadian government is to provide work for Canadians." If that is the first duty of a Canadian government then this government has not measured up to its primary duty. It has not furnished work for Canadians. It has not furnished work in the maritime provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario, in the west or in British Columbia. What we want to-day is mobility or activity in exchange. If we get that we will prosper, if we do not get it, we cannot prosper. Canada to-day is without a policy, without leadership, without direction and without determination that something tangible must be done for the Canadian people. We have a government which does not inspire the Canadian people and the result is that conditions are not improving as quickly as they should.

Without dealing further with the promises made by the Prime Minister, may I say that the Liberal party has a policy with regard to unemployment. They had a policy in 1896 and unemployment disappeared in a year or so. When Laurier came into power in 1896 the Liberals opened up the great west and delivered this country from bondage. Laurier made a greater Canada and stood for a greater dominion. He gave scope to thought and action in this country and the result is that to-day we have a Canada from coast to coast. Again, when the Liberals came into power under my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1922 we had unemployment, but it lasted only a year or so until the Liberal policies were under way. Unemployment disappeared like mist before the morning sun. For eight years Canada had development, progress and prosperity. When I make the statement that the Liberals have a policy which if put into effect will solve the problem of unemployment, I am merely stating what is proved by history. It is not guess work, it is a fact. This statement is in accordance with the record of Liberalism in Canadian history.

What is the policy of the Liberal party with regard to unemployment? I assure the house that it is not a policy of prohibitive tariffs. Such tariffs have destroyed Canadian public life and business, both national and international. The time has come when we must have something different in this country. I do not intend to touch upon tariffs at any great length but I should like to give one example. The importation of mowers and binders affects all the farmers in this country. Under Mr. Borden the tariff on these articles was twelve and a half per cent; under Mr. Meighen it was twelve and a half per cent, but under the Liberal administration of the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King it was only six per cent, one-half of what it was under Borden and one-half of what it was under Meighen. But what did this government do in this connection? What they did is known all over Canada. Is it any wonder that agriculture has been demoralized, is it any wonder that our farmers are discouraged when we realize what this government has done? Under Mr. Bennett the tariff on these articles was raised to twenty-five per cent, just four times what it was under Liberal rule. This is what is known as prohibitive tariff legislation and it is such legislation that destroys business and brings about conditions such as we have in Canada at the present moment.

What is the policy of the Liberal party with regard to this unemployment problem, the most crucial problem confronting Canada to-day? The Liberals always had a policy and they always will have a policy because the Liberal party is the party of progress, of idealism, of power, of determination and advancement. Those who stand by that party as did Laurier and the other leaders of Liberalism, will always be in the van of progress.

Now here is the policy of the Liberal party on this question of unemployment. The Liberal party stands for the liberation of external trade. That means that trade is in bondage at the present time, and the Liberal party will take external trade, international trade, overseas trade, out of bondage, out of slavery, and take the Canadian people out of slavery along with it. The Liberal party, in other words, believes that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that Canada needs trade. Heaven knows she needs trade, and more than that she needs a new government and new leadership at the same time. Moreover, the Liberal party will promote trade with all nations, and negotiate trade agreements with every country willing to trade with this country on a reciprocal basis. The Liberal party will abolish extravagant increases in the tariff made by the present administration, which increases have had the effect of strangling trade, exploiting commerce and consumers and robbing the railways of business. The Liberal party will abolish all unwarranted extra taxes on imports, such as the exchange and dumping duties imposed by the present administration. The Liberal party will put an end to the making and altering of tariffs by executive action. The Liberal party will substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs affairs, and will continue the Liberal policy of a British preference, by means of lowering the tariff to Great Britain rather than by a percentage increase in the tariff against foreign countries. The Liberal party will concede to British imports a real preference, and by so doing build up empire trade once more. Further than that, the Liberal party will make it possible for this country to trade with every nation in the world.

But let me go further. The Liberal party stands not only for the liberation of external trade but, in a complementary manner, it stands for the liberation of internal trade, because national trade and international trade go hand in hand. They are complementary; one supplements the other, and if you have one in the larger sense you will have the other, provided you pursue the right policy. And so the Liberal party stands firm for the liberation of internal trade. That means, just as it meant in connection with external trade, that our national or internal trade is also in bondage, in slavery, shackled hand and foot, so that it is impossible for it to function, and the consequence of that is that ten million Canadians are practically in poverty, and industrial stability and development from coast to coast is a thing of the past.

Now what is the Liberal policy, in its exact words, with regard to the liberation of internal trade? Here it is:

> The Liberal party will seek to end artificial price control and agreements in restraint of trade. Price-fixing by agreements restricts and hampers trade internally, and the internal trade of the country has become honeycombed and enmeshed by secret understandings and agreements.

How can national trade grow and flourish under such conditions? Yet this government, and those who sit behind them, have allowed a condition such as I have described to grow up until trade is strangled both inside and outside of Canada. In addition to these two important planks in the Liberal party's policy of building up trade and smashing unemployment, destroying it for good in this country, we have the Liberal party standing firm on the development of the primary industries, on the development of agriculture, mining, lumbering, the fisheries, and on the development of all other primary industries. Unless we free these industries basically we cannot expect secondary industries like manufacturing to prosper, and unless we make it possible for our basic industries, our primary industries and secondary industries to prosper, we shall not have much prosperity in this country, nor shall we get very far away from the unemployment condition that has ominously reared its ugly form in our land since 1930.

The Liberal party stands for the development of our primary industries along sane, constructive and progressive lines. The Liberal party will see that the right degree of democracy is instilled into every industry, whether basic or secondary, and may I quote its policy on this important point, "The Liberal party believes that industrial reconstruction is the problem of the future". It has not yet dawned on this government as the problem of the future, for there has been no industrial reconstruction so far as this government is concerned,—simply industrial destruction. Further than that, the Liberal party will seek in industrial relations, as opportunity offers, to give to workers and consumers a large share in the government of industry, control of industry by those who work therein, thereby bringing about satisfactory labour conditions and giving a lead to reconstruction not only in an industrial way but also with respect to labour, from coast to coast.

I am told that I have but ten minutes in which to conclude my remarks, and in that ten minutes I wish to deal with the bill before us. The preamble gives us an idea of what the bill ought to be, but it does not in reality tell us what the measure actually contemplates. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should not be before parliament. This bill is no honour to the Canadian dominion. This bill is no honour to a man who calls himself a British citizen, a Canadian, or a member nation of the great British Empire. This bill does not appeal to any man who has in him the blood of freedom and liberty that characterized our forefathers, who had to build up the empire, and whose descendants are calling upon us to-day to maintain this same liberty and freedom.

As far as I am concerned, I am not afraid to take a stand on this bill. I repudiate every word, every phrase, every syllable, every clause, and every paragraph of this bill, as far as its import on Canadian parliamentary and public life is concerned. It is not in line with Canadian democracy; it is not in line with British freedom or liberty; it is opposed to all these, and so far as these features are concerned I am opposed to the bill, whether every man in this house votes for it or not. These features I will willingly and anxiously oppose and do my best to destroy. Judging by the preamble, you would think the bill was a wonderful piece of work.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 13, respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.—Mr. Stinson.

OATHS OF ALLEGIANCE ACT

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 34 to amend the Oaths of Allegiance Act—Mr. Lapointe.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has asked me to let this bill stand until he gets some information.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I hope the hon. gentleman will look into this matter. The provisions of the Naturalization Act do not require an oath of allegiance that is in any sense affected by the statute of Westminster. It is only the act to which reference has been made and one or two others to which the suggested amendment would have any application. We have all been looking into the matter, because it was discussed in some of the states of the commonwealth. They have no oath of allegiance that is at variance in its terms with that which is contained in our Naturalization Act, which does not mention "dominions," "colonies," or "dependencies," as perhaps the hon. gentleman will recall. So far as most of ours are concerned they do not call for amendment and they are not altered in any sense by the provisions of the statute of Westminster.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But this is entirely within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am not suggesting that it is not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: These words, the right hon. gentleman will admit, are not in harmony with our present status.

Mr. BENNETT: But they do not appear in the Naturalization Act oath of allegiance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But it is not to amend the Naturalization Act; it is the oath of allegiance that everyone takes who enters the public service, and I do not think there is a form which is identical in all the dominions.

Mr. BENNETT: The oath of allegiance which is taken by those who become naturalized is a fixed oath which has nothing to do with the question of dominions and is not affected by the statute of Westminster.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I think this is a different matter altogether.

Bill stands.

Mr. SPEAKER: The business of private and public bills having been completed, the house will revert to the adjourned debate—

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Speaker, I move that you do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

SUPPLY

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Deficit of Canadian National Railways

Amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway company of the net income deficit, including profit and loss, incurred by the system during the year 1933, as certified to by the auditors in the annual report of the company for the year 1933, but exclusive of all non-cash items, including interest on dominion government advances, and exclusive of eastern lines deficits, as further certified to by the auditors and approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals; this payment to be applied in reduction of accountable advances made to the company from the consolidated revenue fund under authority of the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1933, $52,263,819.05.

Mr. BENNETT: The item stood for the purpose of having the minister look into the question of the accuracy of the figures. Forty-seven millions of this was included in last year's estimate, and the remaining $5,000,000 represents the added deficit. In order to make the matter free from technical difficulty the law officers advise that the whole estimate be dealt with.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—British Columbia and Australia and/or China, service between—further amount required, $39,600.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the explanation of "and/or China"?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the wording that has been used for about six years. It really is unnecessary because it does not at the present time apply to Australia. The contract for this service was entered into in October, 1932, and last year's estimates did not quite cover the full amount required on a per voyage basis.

Mr. REID: Is so much a trip paid to the steamship company?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. REID: Would this amount be necessary because of extra trips?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Is this in addition to what we passed in the main estimates?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the main estimates of this year.

Item agreed to.

Labour: Annuities Act, further amount required, $30,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister explain why he requires this extra $30,000?

Mr. GORDON: When the labour estimates were up a short time ago I made an extensive explanation of this amount. It arises by reason of the increased sale of annuities, which last year was very considerably greater than in any other year since the legislation was passed. This amount is to take care of the commissions due the agents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Were not commissions paid previously?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. There has been no change in the commission, but the business grew to such an extent that the vote of last year was insufficient by this amount.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of the Saskatchewan resources commission, $15,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the commission now sitting in respect to the natural resources, as between the Dominion of Canada and the province of Saskatchewan. The proceedings are similar to those taken four or five years ago as between the dominion and the province of Manitoba.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who is representing the Dominion government before this commission?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The board of commissioners or arbitrators was agreed upon between the province and the dominion. The chairman of the board is Mr. Justice Dysart of Manitoba. Mr. Justice Bigelow, I suppose you would say, represents Saskatchewan, though he was agreed upon, and Mr. McDonald, a chartered accountant of Montreal, was the third man agreed upon. The counsel are Mr. McGregor Stewart, K.C., of Halifax, and Mr. Hunt, K.C., of Winnipeg, representing the dominion, and Mr. Gordon, K.C., of Regina, representing the province.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Can the hon. gentleman give me an idea of the amount claimed by Saskatchewan?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the original figures have been reduced. If Saskatchewan were to receive the claim which they have estimated, it would run to probably $75,000,000 or $100,000,000.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Canadian radio broadcasting service, further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister for an explanation as to why this money is required.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): This is to cover the cost of the transmission lines necessary to broadcast throughout Canada the concerts of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the New York Philharmonic Society from December 1 last on Saturday and Sunday. When the estimates were voted last year, the broadcasting of these programs was not contemplated. This amount is covered by the licence fees; the public is paying for these broadcasts, and these programs have been very popular.

Mr. SANDERSON: Are contracts entered into with the Metropolitan Opera Company and the other organization, or on what basis are they paid?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not prepared to give particulars as to that; I know some arrangements have been made by the radio commission with the Columbia Broadcasting Company, but I cannot give the details. These programs do not cost the country anything except for the transmission lines throughout Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is this to pay the cost of the hook-up?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister said he did not think it cost the country anything. How does he arrive at that conclusion?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This amount is covered by the licence fees; the public is paying for this service. These programs have been broadcast throughout Canada on Saturdays and Sundays, but as these broadcasts were not contemplated last year there was nothing in the estimates to provide for the cost. Since December 1 we have expended $25,000 for that purpose, and I believe the public is well satisfied with these programs and ready to pay for them through the licence fee.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It looks like it, because from all over Canada we have heard praises of these programs by the Metropolitan Opera Company and the philharmonic society.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend say what sort of agreement exists between the radio commission and station CHRC in Quebec city with regard to the programs of the commission? For example, these great opera performances are very popular, as my hon. friend says, but in Quebec city when these programs are being broadcast on Sunday afternoons, station CHRC prefers to broadcast the hockey games of the Canadian-American hockey league. I do not know how many people prefer to listen to those hockey broadcasts, but many complaints have been received during the course of the winter. We have been told that the station broadcasts the programs of the commission, but is it bound to do so if it has something which it is paid to broadcast, and which is a better proposition than the commission programs? Is there any agreement with CHRC which binds that station to broadcast the programs of the commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We were informed of the complaints in that district to which my hon. friend refers, and I am pleased to tell the hon. gentleman that recently we authorized the construction of a relatively powerful station in Quebec in order to give entire satisfaction to that district. The new station will be operated under the control of the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Altogether?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, altogether, and these programs will be broadcast in the Quebec district.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. EULER: When the department issues the licences is there any understanding that the radio commission is entitled to broadcast its programs through any station to which a licence is given? I have asked that question because I am told there is at least one station to which the commission has no access whatsoever. I suppose that station has contracts which are more remunerative than commission programs would be. Can the minister give us any information in this regard?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under the regulations I believe the commission has power to compel the broadcasting of its programs upon any stations. I believe there are fixed rates of so much per hour, and the commission has the power to see that its programs are broadcast.

Mr. EULER: I am told that there is at least one station through which the commission cannot broadcast.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not aware of any.

Mr. BENNETT: It has power under the law to compel the broadcast.

Mr. EULER: They are not doing it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does this vote mean that the radio commission has used the million dollars we voted last year, and requires this further sum?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Exactly.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am very glad to hear the minister say that the people of Canada are pleased with the programs he is getting from New York. I expect those expressions of approval must have been made within the last month or so, because I have not heard a single person in any part of Canada compliment the radio commission upon its work. I believe we would be making a mistake to vote the radio commission any moneys in excess of their estimate, until they make some showing for the money which has already been appropriated.

Mr. JACOBS: When this commission was brought into being last year we were assured that they would be self supporting and could proceed under their own motive power. Now the people of Canada are asked to vote another $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is part of the licence fees.

Mr. EULER: They do not spend it all, do they?

Mr. JACOBS: It is in addition to the money already voted, as I understand it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will allow me to say so, the fact is that last year we did not vote the full amount of the moneys paid by the public for licences.

Mr. JACOBS: What amount was voted last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: One million dollars.

Mr. JACOBS: We were assured that would be all that was required.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was what we expected last year, but as I explained to the committee we did not at that time contemplate broadcasting programs from New York. Requests were made for these programs from so many people that the commission had to take action. It is the excess expense for transmission lines which we are now asking the house to vote.

Mr. EULER: How much was actually collected by way of licence fees?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My memory is that in round figures we collected about $1,450,000.

Mr. EULER: And expended only a million?

Mr. DURANLEAU: A million, plus the cost of collecting the licences.

Mr. EULER: How much would the surplus be?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It would be about $250,000 I would suppose.

Mr. EULER: What becomes of the surplus left over?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is left for the use of the commission, when required.

Mr. EULER: It does not go into the general fund?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course it is paid to the treasury of the country, but if needed it is always at the disposal of the commission.

Mr. EULER: Would it be true to say that some of the money received from the payment of the $2 licence fee may be used for other than radio purposes?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is not contemplated by law.

Mr. EULER: I do not think that would be fair.

Mr. BENNETT: It all goes into the consolidated fund, and only a certain part of it is used.

Mr. EULER: Is the balance earmarked for radio purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. minister inform the house why he refused to renew the permit of the broadcasting station at Montmagny? This station broadcasted excellent programs in that district, it also permitted the people on "Ile aux Grues," who are entirely isolated in the winter, to communicate with the mainland.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I am informed that this station had an amateur's permit. At the request of the Canadian Radio Commission, it was not renewed. The minister, in these matters, is guided by the commission. I wish to inform my hon. friend that the people of "Ile aux Grues" are in communication with the mainland through the broadcasting stations kept up by the Public Works department; they are entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FACTOR: The programs of the Metropolitan Opera Company and the philharmonic orchestra were broadcast without expense to the Canadian public before the radio commission began operations. Who receives the money for broadcasting these two programs? To whom is the money payable?

Mr. DUFF: Mae West.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. FACTOR: No, it is not carried. I want to ask who receives the payment of these amounts.

Mr. NEILL: To whom is the money paid?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that the commission has an arrangement with the Columbia Broadcasting Company for the broadcast of those programs in Canada. The commission does not receive the money for it.

Mr. FACTOR: Is it the minister's opinion that this money is being paid to the Columbia Broadcasting Company for permission to broadcast those programs?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I told the house my information was that nobody was paying for those programs.

Mr. FACTOR: What is the money for, then?

An hon. MEMBER: Tell him again.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The expense is for the services of the transmission lines only. It may be that that amount is paid to the Columbia Broadcasting Company; I am not sure. That expense has been incurred since last December, but only to meet the charges of transmission lines.

Mr. FACTOR: As I understand the radio situation the chain broadcast consider themselves privileged when a station throws itself open for the broadcast of their programs. For using the facilities of the radio commission the Columbia or National chains ought to pay the Canadian Radio Commission for the privilege of broadcasting. I should like to know why it is necessary to vote these moneys to have such programs broadcast.

Mr. JACOBS: In other words, we should ask for $75,000 from them, rather than pay them. That is the suggestion.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is evident that only a few hon. members have listened to these programs. Had they done so they would have learned that the programs in question are made possible through public subscriptions. They are not sponsored by advertisers, and those hon. members who have listened in will know that a prominent newspaper man of New York makes an appeal to the audience for funds. On one occasion I heard him tell of a subscriber in one of the Carolinas who had contributed $50,000 towards the program.

Mr. DUFF: Speaking for the Prime Minister and myself I must object to those secular concerts being broadcast on Sunday afternoons. The Minister of Marine has said that the people of Canada were very much pleased with the different concerts. I am very much afraid that the minister has had his head in the air instead of having his ear to the ground, because there is no question in my mind that the concerts and the reception in Canadian radio to-day is not as good as when Commander Edwards did the whole thing for a much smaller sum of money than this commission is costing the country.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this matter, but I should like to point out that there are some people in Canada who would be very glad to wreck the Canadian Radio Commission. I do not think we should be over critical of an institution which has had very little time to perform a very great task, without having much precedent to follow. It was practically a new business and had to be organized from its inception. On the whole I think the commission has done very well. I believe that there is considerable agitation throughout the country to try to upset the commission and get the whole thing back again into private hands, but while hon. members have every right to question every expenditure and be critical, I think we ought to go a little slow in our wholesale criticism of the radio commission. Personally I think it has been a great improvement. The programs are very much better than they were, and in another year I believe that there will be much greater improvement. I for one have every sympathy for the commission.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the total amount paid by the radio commission to broadcasting companies in the United States?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not in a position to give that information to my hon. friend. The question might be brought up when the main estimates are under consideration. We have set up a committee specially to deal with radio and my hon. friend is, of course, at liberty to go before that committee and get any information he likes from the commissioners who I understand are attending every sitting. This amount of $25,000 is for the transmission lines not only in the United States but in Canada; for these programs are broadcast throughout this country.

Mr. McINTOSH: That makes it all the worse if the programs are no good.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister's answer is not very satisfactory to me. It raises the question that we debated in this house last year. We have a responsible minister of the crown and we have the chairman of the radio commission, and yet when the radio estimates come up in the house the minister seems to have no knowledge of what is going on. This matter was fully discussed in the house last year, and I think the minister should prepare himself to answer questions that may come before this committee. We cannot question the chairman of the commission in the House of Commons, and while hon. members may attend the meetings of the special committee it is not always convenient for them to do so. It brings us back to the point that was raised last year, that the minister is responsible or should be responsible for the chairman and the members of the radio commission, and he should have the necessary information before him when his estimates are considered in the house.

Mr. MORAND: Inasmuch as I am at the present time chairman of the committee that is hearing evidence on radio I do not propose to make any lengthy statement in reference to this matter, but I should like to say, in all fairness, that these programs from New York come into Canada free of charge right up to the stations in Canada. More than that, the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia system in the United States are paying the copyright privileges, so that it costs nothing for Canadian listeners to get these programs except the cost of their transmission throughout Canada.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would ask my hon. friend what is the total amount paid for that transmission throughout Canada.

Mr. MORAND: It is so much an hour.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the total amount it has cost us?

Mr. MORAND: I have not those figures but I shall be glad to get them for my hon. friend in the committee, where they can be conveniently submitted.

Mr. NEILL: The experience in the district I represent is twofold. In that part which is conducted by the minister's own department, that is the taking care of interference, there has been a great improvement, and I am glad to testify to it. They are doing good work. As regards the radio commission part, there is only one complaint, but it is quite a considerable one, and that is that it is of no use because we cannot hear the programs. I get information from over a wide area, and of course I have my own experience, and it is that since the commission has taken this over we cannot get the Vancouver station. They have jumbled the channels or done something which prevents us from hearing Vancouver. That is the universal complaint from distances as far apart as two hundred miles from where I live. We cannot get the radio commission station in Vancouver, but before the commission took it over we had no trouble in hearing it.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I have a letter that I received in the mail five minutes ago which I might read to give the committee some idea of what the rank and file think of the radio commission. The trouble at the present time is that the radio commission is responsible both for policy and for administration, and this has subjected the commission to much criticism that might be avoided if the thing was put on a broader basis. To show what the people back in the rural parts of this country think of the present radio commission I quote from this letter:

> The radio programs have been excellent on the whole. Very good, I should say, without flattery. Before (American programs now) there was too much shrieking about soap, razor blades, patent medicines, jack-rabbits, this and that, plus chewing gum, so that all effect was marred by the trivial advertising. Commission programs carry no advertising, and so are a great improvement. Seems to me, members know not what are long winter evenings here in remote western villages and settlements. It is sometimes blowing and very cold for weeks at a stretch. You have to keep inside and cannot read all the time or play cards, and can't show your nose outside. It is then that good radio is appreciated. If you know these men tell them that radio keeps us from being insane—no one knows this more than we do—in remote settlements.

This letter comes from the constituency of the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) and is dated March 12, 1934. It comes from Hafford, a little village.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think you have got the name of the riding wrong.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: I think you have.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

> Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1934, the sum of $52,661,304.36 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: There is no ten per cent deduction in this?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1934.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon for the second reading of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had dealt with two of the angles of the bill before the house, namely, the question of trade and trade policy upon which depends in the last analysis employment or unemployment in any nation and, second, the question of unemployment, its causes in a general way and the Liberal trade policy which if put into effect in Canada will surely destroy and put to rout the unemployment conditions which exist in this country at the present time. There is a third aspect of the measure with which I want to deal. We are told in the preamble of this bill that it is proposed to furnish financial aid to the provinces by way of guarantees, advances and loans; second, to further the unhampered prosecution of direct relief and a works program in order to help the unemployment situation and, third, to maintain dominion and provincial credit. These are three worthy objectives and I have no fault to find with any bill trying to arrive at any one of them. From a practical point of view I would be willing to support the government in its desire to give financial assistance to the provinces, to further direct relief and to uphold the credit of the dominion and the provinces.

However, when I go beyond the preamble and come to the blank cheque principle and the further principle, closely allied to it, of destroying the power of parliament, then I am opposed to the bill. As far as the principle of the blank cheque is concerned, this brings us face to face with the question of the control of parliament over expenditure. I should like to put on record the position of the Liberal party with regard to this important question. I have in my hand a book entitled "Evolution of the Dominion of Canada" by Edward Porritt. This is a very important publication and on page 149 appears some of the things for which the Liberal party stood for in days gone by. They are:

Reform in the method of sale of crown lands.

Abolition of customs houses and duties on imports.

An elected legislative council.

There has been an abolition of nearly all the legislative councils in Canada. The Liberal party also stood for:

Election by county and municipal councils of all county and municipal officers.

An extension of the electoral franchise.

No expenditure of public money without the control of the legislature.

Representation according to population.

Abolition of pensions to government officials.

Canadian commerce and commercial intercourse with other nations to be entirely under the control of the legislature.

The legislature to have power to alter or repeal any act or charter, imperial or otherwise, affecting only Canada, which the imperial parliament itself might alter or repeal.

I should like to refer to the one paragraph, no expenditure of public money without the control of the legislature. The bill now before us is designed to spend public money and no figure is incorporated in the bill. We can spend hundreds or thousands, millions or hundreds of millions, and if we pass this bill we shall be relinquishing the power of parliament to control revenue a historic principle for the preservation of which the Liberal party in days gone by opposed the Conservatives. It was as a result of that opposition that we have that principle incorporated in our constitution. But this government is taking the same stand which the party it represents took one hundred years ago with respect to this very important fundamental. Hon. gentlemen opposite are opposing the very foundation of parliamentary government and of constitutional rule in Canada, and as a Liberal I am obliged to stand up and oppose such a course. I oppose the Prime Minister, every minister of the cabinet and every member behind the cabinet in my contention for this principle. Let me show the attitude of the Tory party throughout the history of Canada towards this important principle; you will see that where the party stood one hundred years ago it stands to-day. It has made no progress—absolutely none. At page 111 of the same work to which I have referred there appears the following:

The claim for responsible government was conceded in 1841. The concession was withdrawn in 1843, but was completely and finally conceded in 1849. Its first and its final concessions were due, not to anything actually stated in the act of 1840, although that memorable act was the key to all the constitutional freedom now enjoyed by all the dominions. They were due to the statesmanship and democratic spirit of Sydenham, Bagot, and Elgin, three of the four governors-general who were in office from 1839 to 1850, and also, it is important to note, to the new policy literally forced on Downing street by the Liberals of Upper and Lower Canada, who were in control of the legislative assembly of the United Provinces, during the first decade of the constitution of 1840.

So that where the Conservative party stood in 1840, in 1841 and in 1848 the Conservatives of the present day stand; and the Prime Minister's attitude is directly opposed to the stand taken by Bagot, by Sydenham, by Elgin and by Durham, yes, by all constitutional leaders. I say therefore that the right hon. gentleman is diametrically opposed to the parliamentary principles of liberty and freedom on which this great dominion is based.

Le me go further. At page 137 of the same work I find the following:

A disposition to observe constitutional usages and practices was never characteristic of the Tories of the Family Compact groups in Upper and Lower Canada.

That disposition has never been characteristic of them, and it is not characteristic of the Conservative party in this dominion at the present time. They are out to undermine responsible government and to destroy parliamentary control in Canada; and I fancy that when the country is appealed to, this constitutional problem, together with other problems that will evolve as this parliament proceeds, will receive the consideration of the people. I have no doubt about that, and I am satisfied to abide by the decision of the electorate. The author says further, with reference to the Conservatives:

They were a law to themselves, as was sufficiently proved by their ejection of Mackenzie from the assembly at Toronto. They again ignored constitutional usage in the crisis over the rebellion losses bill. They organized many petitions against the bill; but instead of presenting these petitions to the assembly, or to the legislative council, in accordance with the usage at Westminster, they addressed them to Elgin personally. This unconstitutional course was obviously adopted with the design of bringing about a collision between the governor general and his ministry and the assembly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am sorry I have not more time to conclude what I have to say with regard to this constitutional question—Conservative disregard of parliamentary authority—which is becoming more and more important in Canada every day that this government is in power.

Mr. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, thinking that the discussion on this bill would be very brief; however, I have changed my mind, after listening to hon. members opposite repeating their speeches of the last three years. I wish to point out that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was the only one who had anything somewhat new to suggest. By the way, I warn him to be on his guard, because Mr. Taschereau may, one of these days, send him a little note reproaching him for insulting the people of Quebec. I have had some experience in this respect. The right hon. leader of the opposition strongly criticized the provincial governments in connection with the unemployment problem. I quite agree with him in this matter. May I state, sir, that this question was brought up in the house, even before the Conservative party came into office. An attempt is being made to have the people believe that the unemployment crisis prevails only since the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is at the helm of the country's affairs. May I point out that, on March 31, 1930, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) introduced in the house the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take immediate action to deal with the question of unemployment.

Therefore, the unemployment problem existed in 1930, before the Conservative party assumed power.

What did the Prime Minister of the day reply?

On April 3, the right hon. Mr. King stated:

We have no right to state that an unemployment crisis exists in this country.

On April 8, this motion was defeated by a vote of 100 against 81. All Liberals voted against extending help to the unemployed.

However, a general election took place and in the course of the summer the present leader of the opposition toured the whole of Canada. He became aware that the unemployment crisis which prevailed had spread more than he had thought, the fact is, sir, as all are aware, that when hon. members opposite are in office, they are not interested in finding out what are the needs of the people, their only aim is to maintain themselves in power and cater to their friends. The leader of the opposition became aware then that an employment problem did exist. What remedy did he bring to bear? He proposed that a commission be appointed. Fortunately, the people were not deceived by this commission, for they elected the present Prime Minister who immediately, in 1930, summoned parliament for the purpose of enacting measures to relieve unemployment.

In September, 1930, the government appropriated $20,000,000 toward relieving unemployment. What attitude did the Quebec premier take in this connection? He contended that the Dominion government had not appropriated a sufficient amount to relieve unemployment, though he, himself, had proclaimed in the course of the 1930 election that there were no unemployed in his province. Why? Simply to be in unison with his very dear friend, the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King.

The right hon. leader of the opposition four years later discovers irregularities in the distribution of moneys to relieve unemployment. Everybody knows that the Dominion government could take no other means than to have the distribution done by the provinces and municipalities. The irregularities were committed by the provincial governments. In the cases quoted in the house, by the leader of the opposition, we concluded that the principal irregularities took place in Quebec. Why? Because, unfortunately for the Quebec people, the leader of the provincial government is a Liberal.

May I, sir, read what the hon. leader of the opposition stated in the house on January 29, 1934:

> Everyone who knows what has taken place with respect to relief moneys in the provincial elections which have been held is aware of the manner in which public moneys have been used by the governments of those provinces or of the dominion in order to give employment to large numbers of men during the period of elections. The day after the elections the work in large part has been stopped; it had served its particular purpose.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): For instance, in Yamaska!

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): What governments, since 1930, have held elections and profited by this relief work? I am aware of one, namely the Quebec Liberal government which, on the day following the election, dismissed all the unemployed who had been given work, because, having once more stolen the election, the Quebec government had no further need of their services.

However, the Quebec premier's attitude is not for us a matter of surprise. It is no more liberal than the attitude taken by the Prime Minister of the dominion in 1930. In the debate which followed the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg, the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, on April 3, 1930, page 1227 of Hansard, stated:

[Mr. Duguay.]

> May I conclude what I have to say? So far as giving money from this federal treasury to provincial governments is concerned, in relation to this question of unemployment as it exists to-day, I might be prepared to go a certain length possibly in meeting one or two of the western provinces that have Progressive premiers at the head of their governments—
> Some hon. Members: Oh!
> Mr. Mackenzie King: —but I would not give a single cent to any Tory government.

That is, sir, what would have been the stand taken by the Dominion government had the Liberals remained in power. That is why I stated at the outset of my speech that I agreed with the right hon. leader of the opposition when he strongly criticized the Liberal governments for having appropriated public funds purely and simply for political purposes. This happened in the province of Quebec on numerous occasions. I could bring out facts which go to show that the right hon. leader of the opposition was quite correct in stating that the unemployment funds were unfairly distributed. I have no hesitation in revealing the facts to the house. In 1931, a wholesale merchant sold to a dealer in my district some goods. Finding it difficult to meet his liability the dealer offered the wholesale merchant provincial government bonds to cover his debt to him. It was accepted, in 1932, and it was only in March that he received payment for the goods sold in 1931 and delivered to settlers in the course of February.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What year were they paid for?

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): In March, 1934. That is how these goods were paid for. The wholesale merchant was given a cheque with the words "charge chômage 1932" written across. To this was attached a voucher which read as follows:

> Goods delivered to settlers in the course of February, 1933.

The outcome is that the Quebec government settled its stolen election debt in 1931 with the Dominion government funds or else, stated this merchant, my knowledge of business is short.

Similar dealings were clearly evidenced in the report of any inquiry held and laid on the table of the house, in 1932, by the hon. Minister of Labour. I need not further emphasize the point as all are acquainted with the findings of this inquiry.

Immediately after the facts referred to came out, the Quebec Premier, in order to whitewash his colonization agents in my district, intimated to the press of this country that the merchants of my county were, so to speak, robbers because, he stated, they had sold their goods too dear. All are aware that the accounts of the merchants in my county as well as those throughout Quebec were only settled seven or eight months after the goods were delivered. The people also know that the Quebec Prime Minister took this stand not only to exculpate himself and his government for the delay in settling accounts but also to shield its colonization agents who sought, by such means, to defray the provincial election of 1931.

In my opinion, hon. members opposite should not oppose this bill to the extent of obstructing its enactment, because they must admit that had they been in office only Liberal governments would have benefited by the grants made by the Dominion government.

All know that just previous to the 1931 provincial election the Quebec Prime Minister made the following statement, at St. Raymond:

> We shall not force municipalities to incur liabilities. The province of Quebec is capable of supporting its people. The three departments who are in a better position to give out work (Colonization, Highways and Public Works) will receive all the necessary funds to carry on. Our financial situation is excellent. Should unemployment spread, the provincial government will remedy the situation with its own funds.

Did the provincial government remedy the situation with its own funds? No, sir, since the Dominion government's quota in this connection, from 1931 to 1933, amounted to $10,696,543. This proves that the attitude taken by the right hon. Prime Minister differed entirely from the one that the leader of opposition would have taken had he been in office.

There is another question which I wish to broach. Our friends opposite endeavour to convince the people that the Dominion government is responsible for the dole. As a matter of fact, sir, it was the prime ministers of the various provinces who requested that the Dominion government give direct assistance and, the one who, among them all, insisted the most that direct assistance be given rather than work, was a Liberal premier, one of the best friends of hon. members opposite, the prime minister of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau.

They endeavoured to make political capital with the dole. Unfortunately, I must admit, they were too successful. I shall refer to one particular instance: the privilege granted to certain municipalities to contribute only 10 per cent to direct assistance.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): They are friendly municipalities.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): These municipalities are controlled by the Municipal Commission, and are obliged to submit to the commission's instructions because the provincial government forced them to incur debts in connection with work on highways and also to satisfy the greed of influential friends of the Quebec government. This has often happened and is still going on in the Lake St. John district.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Does this commission intend to improve the financial affairs of these municipalities? I doubt it. Their aim is to find lucrative employment for a few friends of the provincial government who have had the misfortune of making heavy losses and who without this help would be destitute. These people receive large amounts not from the Dominion or provincial governments but from the municipalities themselves. I wonder why municipalities which are not controlled by this commission are not given the same advantage as those which are. I think that all should be treated alike, it would only be just.

I am also of the opinion, sir, that the dole system should not be kept up too long, because not only is it utilized in Quebec to relieve the unemployed but also to make men work on small wages for the benefit of lumber companies. The provincial government did not insist, last autumn, that these companies should fix a minimum wage for the men in lumber camps, although it had reduced the rate on the cut of timber. I also wish to point out that when some one, in Quebec, wishes to obtain the same privileges, they are refused. Such privileges seem to be exclusively for these large companies.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): There wiil be a change after the next provincial election.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I know of some municipalities where recruiting agents of lumber companies made arrangements with mayors in order to recruit men for the lumber camps. These men were told: Go to the lumber camps and the municipality will provide for your family. The men had to leave and the families were given relief by the municipality. The dole was therefore resorted to in Quebec to help the lumber companies in recruiting men.

The dole system should not be kept up too long and I feel satisfied that with the present Prime Minister at the helm of the country's affairs, it will cease shortly. I wish, sir, to reply briefly to some statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I do not intend to follow him on all the subjects he discussed or to adopt his manner of speaking. I wish to simply point out to him that it is to the advantage of the Canadian people that the Prime Minister is entirely different from the one he attempted to describe. I rejoice in seeing the present Prime Minister at the helm of the country's affairs; I fought on his side in 1930, and I intend to always give him my full support because I realize that had it not been for his energy, his application to work and experience, Canada would be worse off than it is to-day. The Canadian people will themselves reply to the hon. member for Témiscouata by returning to office the present Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. GORDON moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to section 2 I hope the minister has had a chance to think over the appeal I made to him the other evening to delete this year the clause which gives the government power:

When parliament is not in session, to take all such measures as in his discretion—

The discretion of the governor in council.

—may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada;

And this notwithstanding the provisions of any existing statute or law. I would say to the minister that that section, which ought to appear, if at all, only in time of war or insurrection, is one that, as he knows, has been very strongly objected to from this side of the house in previous sessions. It was not found necessary to insert it in the legislation of the special session of 1930. After it had been inserted in the legislation of 1931 it was dropped in the legislation of 1932, and then it reappeared in the legislation of last session. I should like the minister to tell us first of all to what extent that section has been used for the purpose of maintaining peace, order and good government. To what extent has it been actually used; what were the measures passed by virtue of this power and what are the reasons that render necessary its being granted this year? I think we ought to have that information before the section is discussed further.

Mr. GORDON: The first order in council that was passed pursuant to that portion of the section as it appeared in the statutes of 1931 was with respect to the prohibition of the export of gold from Canada, and I believe no one, in the light of the situation that then confronted this country and of the necessity for taking prompt action, would have any serious objection to what the government did in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt the minister for just a moment. Did not the government have power to take that step anyway under the Finance Act? I think that was admitted some time ago.

Mr. GORDON: They did not; at any rate the action was taken under the relief measure of that year. If my recollection serves me correctly—and I stand to be corrected in this—the matter was referred to the Department of Justice and the government were advised that the action would have to be taken under this section. Then in October, 1931, the government, acting under this section, passed an order in council with regard to the valuation of securities in bank returns under section 112 of the Bank Act. In December 1931 action was taken by the government authorizing the superintendent of insurance with respect to the valuation of securities in the returns submitted to the superintendent under the provisions of the Insurance Act. So far as the Department of Labour knows, those were the only measures passed by virtue of the peace, order and good government clause contained in this section, and I believe that is the only action that was taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely not. There were guarantees to the banks in connection with advances made by them to the wheat pool; there were guarantees to some of the banks in connection with the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific railway; there have been cash advances to the Canadian Pacific under this section, and guarantees were given the banks in connection with loans made to the Beauharnois company, the Algoma Steel Corporation and to other corporations.

Mr. GORDON: My right hon. friend is mistaken. Those guarantees were not given under the clause of the section relating to peace, order and good government. They were given under section 2 (a) which reads as follows:

Notwithstading the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—

(a) Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon—loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking;;

It will be found that the action taken was under that part of the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was looking at the section itself which contains this provision, and I assumed that the orders in council, being under this section, were under this particular clause, but apparently they were under one of the other clauses of the same section. If what the minister now says is correct, the section referring to peace, order and good government has been used only for the purpose of prohibiting the export of gold, and to allow the revaluation of securities of banks and insurance companies. I am to understand these are the only purposes for which this power has been used in the four years during which relief measures have been on the statute books, and in the two years during which this section has been included in those measures. Why then, may I ask, do we need this section inserted again for this year? With all the other powers the ministry have had heretofore and now possess, what grounds can the government urge for again asking parliament to insert this particular clause in the section?

I want to read the entire section, so that the minister will see the force of my remarks. So far as the opposition are concerned, we have no desire to prevent the government from being in a position to take any step that may be necessary to meet an emergent condition, and from having power for which they can give reasonable grounds. But we do very strongly oppose departing altogether from the practice of parliament with respect to legislation, and handing over to the governor in council a power to legislate which belongs, and ought to belong only, to parliament, because that is what it means when the governor in council is given power to pass orders with respect to peace, order and good government, notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law. That phrase is broad enough to cover legislation on anything. The minister tells us it has been used only to prohibit the export of gold and to enable the securities of banks and insurance companies to be revalued. Let us see what the power would be which by this section the government would be given, apart from that given it by this objectionable clause. If that particular clause were struck out of this section to-day the section would read as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—

(a) Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon,—enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise; and in respect of such loans, advances and guarantees, may accept such security, enter into such agreements and generally do all such acts and things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest;

(b) When parliament is not in session—

Then omitting the clause relating to peace, order and good government, and continuing:

—and at all times to take such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

Surely those powers which I think go much too far, are comprehensive enough to enable the governor in council, in addition to existing legislation, to deal with any critical situation when parliament may not be in session. But in the circumstances, if the government say they used those additional extensive powers and will take the responsibility of asking parliament for them, so far as we are concerned we are prepared not to oppose such action. We do, however, oppose very strongly the reintroduction into this measure of a clause which is most objectionable, which was enacted only by use of the closure in 1931, and was dropped in the year 1932. I refer to the section respecting peace, order and good government.

May I give another reason why that particular clause should not be inserted? The government has taken credit to itself for having dropped the following clause:

Loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

Hon. members opposite have taken the attitude that this year they do not need that clause, and they are leading the public to believe that conditions have improved so greatly that there is no necessity any longer to ask for the power to advance moneys to or to guarantee the payment of money by public bodies, corporations or undertakings. If that is so, how can they justify retaining a power which includes that being dropped, is more drastic, goes very much further, and one which has never been used by any government until this government used it? As I pointed out when I spoke on a former occasion this power was intended to be exercised only on the occasion of war or the invasion of the country, actual or apprehended. I hope the minister will not make it necessary for us to contend over this section. If we were to agree to allow the remainder of the section to pass he might well withdraw the objectionable clause, or at any rate allow it to stand until he has had a conference with his colleagues to see if it cannot be dropped at least for this year.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the very fact that the government proceeded under this part of section 2 on only three occasions is at least considerable evidence that they would take action under the section only in cases where it became apparent that in order to avoid a great major difficulty speedy action should be taken. While I am in agreement with the remarks of the right hon. gentleman with respect to the sanctity of the rights of parliament in matters of this kind, yet I think every hon. member will agree that during the last few years we have watched a changing world. In Canada we cannot always be the authors of our own course, or even nearly so, but rather at times speedy action has to be taken. Occasion may arise, even during a recess of parliament, when by reason of events beyond our control action might have to be taken before a special session of parliament could be convened. I say again that I am not by any means unacquainted with the laws and ordinances which have grown up, some incorporated into statute law, and some by reason of long practice and usage, which preserve to parliament its rights. But I am also aware of the fact that in times like these—and I hope it will not be necessary—the executive or the government might have to turn to this authority in order to take speedy action in connection with matters touching vitally the business of the country.

If the right hon. leader of the opposition is really fearful that the government will during the recess of parliament take undue powers under this section and act without good and sufficient reason, I can only repeat that in the past in my judgment the government has not acted in that way, and I do not think it will do so between now and the next sitting of parliament. However I am not averse to having the section stand until tomorrow to discuss the question again, as has been suggested, with my colleagues. I feel that while at times on the part of one party there may be a desire in this chamber to survive over another party—a principle which seems very closely identified with political activities in Canada—yet I feel that the real desire of all members is to adopt such legislation as is best calculated to meet and to overcome the difficulties which to-day and for some years past have confronted Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister has said that in the past the government have never used in an objectionable manner the powers conferred upon them by relief legislation, and that to be sure of the future we should rely on what has happened in the past. It is because we do not believe that parliament has been treated fairly in the past under relief legislation that we have objections to granting anew the powers asked in this bill. A glaring instance is afforded us in the orders in council laid on the table of the house a few days ago concerning the guarantees of the government with respect to the marketing of wheat. The first order in council is the one by virtue of which this country became responsible to seven banks for moneys advanced by them to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited for the marketing of wheat, and particularly including advances for the purchases of wheat or other grains deemed necessary to secure the advantageous sale of such grains already delivered or to be delivered. That order in council was passed on September 12, 1931. It is very interesting to read the order in council and to learn what preceded it. The order in council reads in part as follows:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated 11th September, 1931, from the Minister of Finance, recommending that, in pursuance of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and of an undertaking on behalf of the government, made before the session of parliament at which the said act was passed, to implement by legislation the recommendation hereinafter set out, the governor in council guarantee repayment.

And so forth. So during the whole session of 1931 the country had been engaged to the banks to guarantee the payments of these moneys by an undertaking preceding the session, which undertaking the government had pledged themselves to implement by legislation during the session. Was it treating parliament fairly not to introduce legislation into parliament in order to implement that undertaking? But instead the relief act was passed in July or August taking all the powers to do anything under the sun, and the government waited until September to do by order in council what should have been done by legislation, the confirming of an agreement entered into before the session of parliament. If that is treating parliament fairly I do not see why we should continue to exist as a parliamentary and legislative body.

The preamble of the present bill states the reasons why it is needed. It says:

> Whereas the provinces may require further assistance in carrying out necessary relief measures and in meeting financial conditions as the same may arise; and whereas in such event it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as the governor in council may deem expedient; and whereas it is necessary to make provision for further expenditure for relief purposes under the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior; and whereas for these and similar purposes the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of such relief measures and the maintenance of the credit of the dominion and the provinces thereof should be vested in the governor in council;

All these purposes can be met by the various sections of the bill, excluding the one to which we mostly object, that relating to peace, order and good government. There is nothing in the preamble which justifies the insertion of these words which were eliminated from the preceding bill. I think that on further consideration the minister will drop that clause from the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister propose to allow the section to stand? I should like to draw his attention to this phase of the matter. The minister, in speaking, mentioned as the reason for the possible retention of this objectionable clause the fact that something might come up suddenly that would affect vitally the business of the country and would have to be dealt with in a summary manner. I would gather that the impression which the minister sought to leave was that the government had not adequate power apart from this clause to deal with situations of the kind. If that were the case there might be something to be said for its insertion, but the government has ample power. The statutes of this country for dealing with untoward situations remain what they have been from the time of confederation down to the present. The country has always had to face the possibility of some situation developing that would require immediate action on the part of the government, and ample power to cope with such situations has been in existence all along. It does not come into being by virtue of this particular clause. I believe the existing powers are ample in every way, and I cannot quite understand what the minister has in mind. If he would say quite frankly that what he fears is something in the nature of an outbreak or insurrection, if that is what he means, we would then discuss the question as to whether the powers that are given to the civil authorities and the power which is given the government to aid the civil power by the military forces, the mounted police and other bodies, are not adequate to cope with situations of the kind. Or has the minister in mind some financial condition which the other clauses of the act as drafted and other statutes in existence are not adequate to meet? The point is that there does appear to be ample legislation existing to deal with any condition. This clause was inserted at the outset, or so it was alleged, simply because at the time, 1931, a number of people in the country, and apparently some members of the ministry, were genuinely alarmed at the situation in which Canada found herself under the conditions of depression that were then existing. But this provision was dropped in the following year and nobody was any the worse. It was reinserted last year but apparently not used at all. Why should it be reinserted this year, especially if, as the government says, conditions are improving and the necessity for this form of extreme legislation is not apparent at this time?

Mr. GORDON: I can scarcely follow the logic of the right hon. leader of the opposition in opposing the retention in this clause of the words "peace, order and good government" when he says that there is no necessity for having them there because under other laws the government has this authority. I assume the right hon. gentleman has reference to the War Measures Act, which can be invoked only by proclamation, and perhaps under that legislation action could not be taken as speedily and as effectively as under the legislation here proposed. But if the government does now under that statute or under any others possess this power, why should anyone be fearful even if that power is duplicated in the bill now before the committee? If the power exists now, we are not adding to it by reasserting it as it is reasserted in the present bill.

I have already stated that these are times when governments the world over, even in countries where democracies have been established for a long period of years, are giving to the executive heads powers that are perhaps a direct invasion of the principles upon which those democracies have been established and have grown and prevailed for many years. Each of us can speak only of conditions as they come under his observation and as are indicated by such records as are available, but my view is that conditions certainly are improving. In connection with the business with which I am associated and in the public office which I hold I have considerable opportunity to observe the state of business conditions. I know there are some who will not admit they are improving, who do not want to admit it. There is a class of people in this country who I believe would suffer a very severe disappointment if things did improve just now. There are some who are so mentally constituted, but perhaps they cannot help it. The fact remains, however, that from what information I can get I believe business is improving. As I said a few moments ago, certain countries have been content, perhaps with some anxiety, to invest the executives of their governments with powers which would have been unheard of ten years ago or before 1929 when world affairs, world business and world politics assumed an unprecedented degree of confusion and chaos which has been more or less apparent ever since. I know the opposition is fearful as to whether the judgment of the government will be good or can ever be good. The only assurance I can give hon. members of the committee is that the government will take power under this section only when it is abundantly convinced that that power should be taken in order to maintain within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada. I do not know that I can say anything more with respect to this matter.

I assume that there will be a degree of disappointment expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite at the amendment I intend to suggest in connection with the guarantees to the wheat pool. Section 2 (a) of the act of last year reads:

—loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking;

In drafting this bill I overlooked the fact that the guarantee to the Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited was in the nature of a continuing guarantee until that business was closed out. I intend to have my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), move an amendment to cover this one guarantee.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that section 2 (a) be amended by adding after the word "province" in the fourth line the following words "and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited", and that the marginal reference opposite the section be amended by adding the same words thereto.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As we were discussing the section perhaps we had better continue with it as a whole rather than come immediately to the amendment before us, so that I may answer the points raised by the minister in reply to my remarks while they are still in the mind of the committee.

The minister said that there was something wrong with my logic, since having stated that the government had already this power under previous legislation I should not take any exception to this clause as it simply duplicates that. If that were all I had in mind there might be something in what the minister says. The minister was referring to dangers in the nature of insurrections or something of the kind, or at least I so understood him when he seemed to be talking about untoward events.

Mr. GORDON: I never had any such thing in my mind at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I am trying to find out, what it is that the minister is afraid of, and what makes necessary this grant of power to the ministry to pass orders in council for peace, order and good government notwithstanding existing statutes and laws. The minister referred to the power which European nations had given to their executives.

Mr. GORDON: And the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He must have been referring to Mussolini in Italy, Hitler in Germany and Stalin and some of the others in Russia, and Dolfuss in Austria.

Mr. GORDON: And Roosevelt in the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: And Pattullo in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister cites the United States. I prefer to take British precedents and follow the example of British parliaments which have retained their power to legislate.

Mr. MALONEY: What about Pattullo?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apparently hon. gentlemen are very much exercised about Mr. Pattullo. May I ask them where the premier of British Columbia found his example. He would appear to be imitating or following the example of hon. gentlemen opposite in asking for extraordinary powers. No doubt he is seeking to obtain bargaining power wherewith to deal with the executive of the dominion. However, it is for each province to manage its own affairs. What we are concerned with here are the affairs of the dominion, and the minister has not yet given a reason why there should be included in this bill the grant of power to the governor in council notwithstanding existing legislation, to pass orders when parliament is not in session, on any subject relating to peace, order and good government. If his reason relates to the possibility of an uprising of some kind, and the minister can point out wherein the existing law is not sufficient to meet a situation of that kind, we are perfectly prepared to grant him the further necessary power. But that is not what the minister wants this particular section for. Although he speaks about the changes which may occur in these unsettled times, the only instance of which he has told us where it was necessary to use this power is the permission given to the banks and the insurance companies to revalue their securities.

Mr. GORDON: And the prohibition of the exportation of gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the prohibition of the exportation of gold. Why then should this power be granted again this year to this government? If the government desires authority to enable corporations to revalue their securities they should so state the situation in black and white and make clear what is needed to maintain the financial credit of the country or the standing of individual corporations. What we object to is the government's taking this blanket authority to legislate in regard to anything that may serve its purpose. I hope my hon. friend will not think I am unduly stressing our alarms when I mention again what I said the other night about this being in all probability a year in which there will be a general election. If there is a general election, as hon. gentlemen well know, there will be no parliament to report to as to what may be done by the ministry during the election period under the power of passing orders with respect to peace, order and good government until a new parliament is returned. In these circumstances while there are a good many of us who may have a certain amount of faith in hon. gentlemen opposite, we are not prepared to trust them to the limit with blanket authority to legislate in any way they please at such a time on any subject they may designate as relating to peace, order and good government. That is one of the objections I see to having that clause inserted this year, and I say to the minister frankly that I cannot understand how it reappears at this time, unless the fact of the possibility of a general election has something to do with its insertion. I hope the minister will give us better reasons than he has thus far given for retaining the clause, or else relieve our suspicions as to the purpose of its insertion at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: I think probably the right hon. gentleman means, "to remove our anxiety" rather than our suspicions. I will be generous and say I think he means anxiety.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, probably both. I rise however merely to point out to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that he is entirely in error when he assumes that there was any bad faith manifested to this parliament in connection with the guarantee given to the banks with respect to the account of Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. The truth is, as perhaps he has gathered from the evidence given in the banking committee, that the guarantee was given in 1931 and has continued ever since and will continue until there is a liquidation of the accumulated surplus held by the Cooperative Producers Limited. That I think is fairly obvious. When he points out that the order in council to which he has just referred was prepared in the form in which it was, I would say to him that it was put in that form by the solicitor for the bankers' association, who thought there might be some uncertainty, and was of the opinion that it more clearly expressed the position of the banks in relation to the government if we put it in that form, and I informed him that there was no objection to it.

I would make it clear to the hon. gentleman that the transaction was as follows: (1) Advances made by the banks to the organization. (2) The guarantee given to the bank by the government, which could not in terms mention a specific sum. That, I think, will be found in the evidence given the other evening in the banking committee. (3) It continues from year to year, and the reason it was thought that it might be rewritten in the form in which it was ,was that there was some question as to the sufficiency of the language to carry over the liability from one year to the other and to make it clear that there was no uncertainty as to what was meant by the language employed; and the rewriting to which the hon. gentleman has referred was done for the purpose of removing any doubts and at the instance of Mr. Henry T. Ross, secretary of the Canadian Bankers Association, with whom I considered it, and subsequently with the Minister of Justice, who said that there was no reason why, if they felt that it made the matter clear, it should not be put in the form in which it is.

I can only say that in this relief measure there has been an effort to remove certain clauses which it was felt conferred upon the government larger powers than the house was of opinion, under present conditions, should be conferred upon them; and all those words to which the minister has referred as being in last year's legislation were removed from the present bill. But with respect to peace, order and good government, if the right hon. gentleman is correct in saying that they add nothing to the existing language of other statutes, then it is abundant precaution which can do no harm. If on the other hand he feels that they might be necessary for the purpose of valuing securities, as he indicates was done, and which now fortunately for us is a matter that need give us no further consideration, inasmuch as the securities that were so valued have risen in value to a point far beyond that then expressed as a reasonable value, in that instance we were but following the practice which prevailed in Great Britain as well as in the United States; because our own securities having been sold in large quantities at the express request of the governments of the day to the banks, it was unfair to ask the banks, for the purposes of their balance sheets, to value them at a figure very much lower than that at which they had bought them—and it was not buying that was taking place at any particular time before 1930 but that had taken place from time to time—to enable the government to secure funds from the banks and make success a certainty with respect to the sale of securities.

With respect to the insurance companies, the matter can be put on this simple ground. The liabilities are liabilities maturing in the future, and the whole business of insurance is predicated on the assumption that the present reserve will be sufficient, on the values placed on them at the time they are purchased, to meet obligations that will mature at some future period of time. What we did was to follow the practice that obtained in the forty-eight states of the union, where the commissioners of insurance met together and, with one single exception, determined that that was the proper action to take. And it was taken in a subsequent year as well.

[Mr. Bennett.]

So far as the words "peace, order and good government" are concerned, the reason they appear in the statute in the form in which they do is that they are words used in our constitution. It is felt that they confer, in case of emergency, power to be exercised by the executive for the peace, order and good government of the country for the purpose indicated in the measure, a power that should be in the hands of any government in these days. I think it is rather unfair to say that the government of British Columbia have borrowed from this parliament the proposals they have made to their legislature, because had it been our example, the statute would have read in this form: that during the time that parliament is in recess the governor in council may make laws to be called ordinances, and then recite the whole twenty-nine articles of section 91 of the British North America Act. The statute in British Columbia recites seriatim the various items in section 92 of the British North America Act and declares that when the legislature is not in session the lieutenant governor in council may make ordinances which shall have the force of law. In other words, the legislature is abolished; the assembly is abolished. Now, I am sure the right hon. gentleman will not suggest that we have endeavoured to abolish parliament by the section that appears here, because these words have a well defined meaning; and having a meaning well defined by the courts it is, I think, only reasonable, to ensure this country against any unforeseen difficulties that may arise between now and the time parliament meets, that provision of this character should be inserted in the legislation. There have been limitations imposed which we were glad to impose, but on the other hand in view of the very circumstances to which the premier of British Columbia has referred as to the effects of outside influences on the life of that province, and when reputable members stand in their places in this house and point to external influences endeavouring to destroy the very institutions of the country, I think that even although it may be a repetition of what is found in other statutes, it is well to make assurance doubly sure by providing that the executive, shall have authority, between the time that such conditions might arise and parliament be called together, to make orders for the peace, order and good government of the country. That is as far as it goes. It is difficult to assure hon. gentlemen who will not be assured, but I should like to assure my hon. friends opposite that there is no desire to act either as a usurper or a dictator. If when they allege that we so act they think that the task involves pleasure, they would only have to put in the hours per day that are put in with respect to the very matters to which they refer to see that all pleasure and all happiness and comfort disappear in dealing with problems of this character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will permit me to suggest it, perhaps if he were to share with parliament these anxieties they would be lighter. He was not in the house when I made my remarks about the guarantee given to the banks for the moneys advanced to the wheat producers. I did not complain about the nature of the order in council or its language. I did not deal with the merits or demerits of the transaction. My ground of complaint to-night was about the manner in which it was carried out, and my right hon. friend has not alluded to that. Perhaps he might explain this; in the order in council itself, passed on September 12, 1931, we are informed that this order was to ratify and give effect to an undertaking made on behalf of the government before the session of parliament. That undertaking was that it would be implemented by legislation at the following session, yet we sat here for five or six months and never heard anything about it. When the relief act was discussed I took the trouble to read Hansard to find out whether this was alluded to during the whole course of the discussion, but I find not a word of it. Only after the session was over, in September, did the government by order in council give effect to a guarantee made before the session of parliament, which guarantee they had pledged themselves to implement by legislation. Why did the government not introduce legislation making the house and the country acquainted with the guarantee that was given to the banks for the purpose of helping the marketing of grain? It might be a good thing to give such a guarantee, but I submit it was for parliament to say so, and that it was not treating the House of Commons fairly merely to ask by a relief act to be empowered to give guarantees to provinces or companies, while the government knew all the time that this undertaking had been given to the banks and the wheat producers. That is why we think we have ground for complaint, and why we do not like to continue a blank cheque authority giving to the government the right to do by order in council what should be done by parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I have to trespass upon the time of the committee again for a moment. I was not in the chamber during the whole of the hon. gentleman's observations; I came in just as he was concluding. If he will be good enough to look at Hansard he will find that a statement was made, not only by myself but by others during the discussion in connection with the wheat transaction, that a guarantee had been given. It was not in connection with the relief act that that statement was made, because the question did not arise; it was in the discussion concerning the wheat transaction. Hon. gentlemen will recall that I said I believed it would not be in the interests of the country at the moment to follow the transactions closely, but that if it was thought desirable by the house in committee of the whole I should be glad to do so. I suppose it adds nothing to it to say that if for a single moment it had been thought desirable, or if the question had been asked, I should have been only too glad to say that a guarantee had been given to the banks, because from the very start we had no hesitancy in saying that. From the time in 1930 when an effort was made by the western provinces to induce the dominion government to set up a wheat board, or to "peg the price", as it was called, of wheat at 70 cents, we never showed any hesitancy in making clear to the country through this house what had been done; and from that day to this we have made it perfectly clear what was done. I think we made it abundantly clear the other evening.

I will say this, and I hope it will not be misunderstood, that while parliament is the great court of the country, the court of inquest, which has a right to know everything that is done by its executive, yet in times of stress and strain and difficulty, when the government has to have recourse to many methods of dealing with problems of extreme gravity, until such time as they are concluded it is sometimes injudicious to discuss them publicly. It is not suggested, of course, that there is anything that should not be disclosed, but only that the time is not always most opportune to do it while the matter is pending. I quite appreciate the attitude taken by the hon. gentleman; it is the attitude any opposition would take, that in a matter of this kind, where the executive is exercising its power, it should as far as possible make the fullest disclosures to the house of everything that transpires. I say further—it is not a matter of importance, but my colleagues will bear me out in this—that many times during the last three years when matters have been under consideration I have been asked why I do not make a statement about them. The other evening, after the discussion in connection with the guarantee to the railway company and in connection with the sale of wheat, the question was asked: Why could not these things be said at the time? I only say to this committee, and I ask men of experience in business whether their experience does not bear out what I say, that at times nothing could be more fatal to the transaction of business than a public discussion of it before it is concluded. My glance happening to rest upon the face of one hon. member opposite recalls a certain transaction in the public interest which was about to be carried out in connection with a rather large public undertaking, and a premature discussion wrecked it. Those who are familiar with the story of the purchase of the Suez canal shares will recall what has been said in the accounts of the lives of statesmen of that day as to what would have happened had this transaction, which was dealt with by Disraeli and the Rothschilds, become a matter of public discussion before Disraeli was enabled to close it out as he did.

Now I add only this. There is no desire in any way to keep from this house or from this country any particulars of any transaction with which this government has been connected since it came into office, affecting the public interest, under these various relief measures or other statutes that conferred authority and, in my opinion, imposed responsibilities. Those responsibilities we have endeavoured to discharge in the manner we thought best for the country. It is possible that I or my colleagues may have been in error, but if at times we believed that it was not in the public interest to blazon these matters from the housetops and not to discuss them even in this house until such time as further progress had been made in connection with some of them, I think we adopted a course which sound business at least, by experience, has indicated to be the proper course in connection with ordinary transactions. I believe my hon. friend from Quebec East will find, in connection with the matter to which he referred, that it was made abundantly clear to this house from the inception of the transaction that the government had given a guarantee to the banks to enable the cooperative wheat producers to carry out the business for which they had appointed Mr. McFarland their general manager, and which has been carried on ever since. In 1928 the excessive crop brought about too great a carry-over of grain into future years, which has been reflected in the excess carry-over ever since, until this very day.

I make that statement because, if there has been any suggestion that in any sense there has been an endeavour either to deceive this house or keep anything from it, other than what we thought should be kept back at the moment for good public reasons, I should like the fullest investigation before any committee of the house, with witnesses called to establish that what was done was done with an eye to one single purpose, and that was to endeavour to ensure that this house and this country would have no reason to say that, through the failure on our part to do something, there had been a collapse of public confidence or a panic in connection with any of our institutions that might imperil what had been built up by many years of laborious effort on the part of the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) I think have failed to understand the force of my objection, or at any rate to answer it. Possibly I have not made myself clear. The Prime Minister stated that my objection was that this clause simply duplicated previous legislation; that, to use his words, it was a repetition of previous legislation, that it added nothing to existing statutes, and that for this reason there should be no objection to making doubly secure that which is already secure. That was not my point at all. It is not that it adds nothing to existing legislation; it is that it takes away existing legislation, takes away the protection which existing legislation gives to citizens of ths country with respect to innumerable matters. The government asks that notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session, take all such measures within the competence of parliament as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain peace, order and good government.

That language is as plain as day if one will stop to look at it. It means that notwithstanding all the laws that parliament has made, with regard to insurance companies, banks, railways or anything else one wishes to name, the government may when parliament is not in session, set aside all those laws and pass any orders in council it pleases so long as it cares to designate them as necessary for the peace, order and good government of Canada. That is the power for which they are asking, and I say that power is setting parliament altogether at naught. It is doing away with parliament and what parliament exists for, namely to protect the citizens of this country in their rights and privileges.

I doubt very much if hon. members have even yet grasped the significance of this section. We listened to the Prime Minister speak of the necessity of doing things quietly, of times being troubled and of the need to give the government an opportunity quickly to deal with an emergency, and so on. For my part I am ready to give the minister any powers for which they ask provided they will set out in black and white the exact powers needed and are able to support their request on reasonable grounds. But that is not what they are asking for here. They are asking that notwithstanding the existence of any statute or law, once this parliament has prorogued the governor in council may legislate as he pleases with regard to anything, regardless of existing legislation. I say that the granting of such power has in itself a terrible unsettling effect upon the country. The banks and those who have relations with banks, for example, do not know whether some section of some act on which they rely for protection in their rights is going to be set at naught by some order in council pased under the heading of peace, order and good government. The same statement applies to insurance companies or to anything else one may wish to name. That is what is asked for and that is what we object to granting. We are not objecting to making security doubly secure where there is any danger of an untoward incident of any sort or of the government not having sufficient power to deal with any situation. We are objecting to the danger of taking away that protection which this parliament has placed around business and around its citizens their rights, liberties and privileges, by the laws it has passed; we object to any legislation whereby, notwithstanding existing laws and statutes, these laws and statutes may all be set at naught if the government think it desirable so to do in order to pass an order in council contrary to their provisions.

I say again to the minister that I hope he will not press for this power this session. His powers have been gradually extended in other clauses of this section. To indicate my desire to cooperate with the government, so far as I am concerned, I will not take exception to the amendment which has been moved by the minister, although it gives him additional power with regard to a matter as to which he has already given guarantees. Anything for which the minister can give reasonable grounds in a concrete way will meet with a like reception; he will find the opposition perfectly ready, I think, to meet him in a cordial, cooperative way, but in the light of what may take place I do not think we can be expected willingly to allow the government to set aside, if it so desires, all the existing statutes and laws and remain free to legislate as it pleases when parliament is no longer in session, and when the ministry may no longer exist or may not have this House of Commons to reckon with when it comes to seeking the explanation of why these particular powers were made use of in the manner they were at a particular time.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think it only fair to say a word in reply to the Prime Minister's explanation as to the wheat guarantee. At the time Mr. McFarland was appointed manager of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, on November 30, 1930, the situation was critical. Later parliament met, but the members of this house were not apprised of the situation, according to my recollection, or as we have been able to find in Hansard. That is one of the reasons why we were somewhat exercised, not only the members on this side of the house but people throughout Canada generally; we ran along from year to year without knowing exactly what was being done. The matter is being discussed and evidence is being taken by a committee of this house at the present time. I think it is a good thing that this investigation is being made; it has cleared the air considerably. We realize the critical situation that existed in the fall of 1930 and there has been no complaint from this side of the house as to what was done at that time. The three prairie provinces appealed to the Prime Minister to take action. I do complain however that we have had to go from November, 1930, practically to the end of March, 1934, before we could find out exactly what was being done.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to contradict the hon. member, but if he will be good enough to look at Hansard he will observe that I made very full statements twice on the subject.

Mr. LAPOINTE: 1931?

Mr. BENNETT: I said twice.

Mr. BOTHWELL: We did not know anything about it until some time in the year 1932, and as a matter of fact we did not get a great deal of information at that time. With the exception of the remarks I have made I do not believe any hon. member from the west has any complaint to make. I do believe this however, that had parliament been advised and been in a position to look into the situation, better ways and means might have been devised to handle the situation. At least we would have had the benefit of advice from every organization interested in the wheat situation. I have risen to say only this, that so far as we were concerned, the difficulty in which most people in the west found themselves was that they did not know what was being done.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I was very much surprised to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) say that this clause has been introduced in order to enable the government to peg the shares of insurance and other companies. To follow that up I suggest that if that action could be taken under this clause to help insurance and other companies it might also be taken to help the farmer peg his mortgages, his wheat and other securities. I was not very much influenced or impressed by references to the parties of two hundred years ago and the constitutional questions of those days, because if we went back far enough neither of the larger parties in this house would be very proud of its origin. According to Sir Erskine May the word "Tory" two hundred or three hundred years ago was an appellation used to designate some robber band in the old country, and the word "Whig" used to describe the Liberal party in those days designated what in the Scotch vernacular meant sour cheese.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does Sir Erskine May have to say about the C.C.F.?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: And, speaking of sour cheese, I believe I should rather be a living highwayman than a disintegrated cheese. But even the present government is like the highway bands of three hundred years ago. At least under this peace, order and good government clause it might be the Robin Hood type of highwayman who took from the rich in order to give to the poor.

Mr. LAPOINTE: An amendment has been moved by the Minister of Justice to the effect that guarantees should be continued to the cooperative wheat producers.

Mr. BENNETT: That is because of the elimination of the power to give guarantees to any private enterprise.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not do it by special legislation?

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. BENNETT: This is special legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why do it under a relief act? I think we are entitled to know the amounts of guarantees which have been given to the banks with regard to the marketing of wheat, and I should like the minister to tell us where the country stands with regard to past guarantees, before we give the government power to give new guarantees.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been twice before the committee on banking, and it was thought undesirable—

Mr. LAPOINTE: If we have no right to refer to what goes on before the committee, I think this applies to the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: All right, then, it applies to the Prime Minister. The wisdom or unwisdom of determining the amount I believe I can set at rest in a single minute. The amount of the guarantee varies from day to day. It varies to the extent to which there have been purchases of farmers' wheat to prevent its being without a purchaser. Those who are familiar with the operations of the grain market under which wheat is purchased will realize that the amount that is put up, that is by the purchaser, for which guarantee is given, is an amount fixed by the customs and regulations of the grain exchange itself, and the variation of the amount is of course dependent entirely upon the price which the commodity commands at the close of the day's operations. It was said the other evening that an increase of ten per cent in the then price of wheat would relieve the guarantor of any responsibility. That was thought to be sufficient, and I should think possibly that might be regarded as ample for the purposes of this committee.

I only say to the hon. member that I believe the matter about which he is now speaking is illustrative of the point I previously made, namely the undesirability of discussing the details of a business transaction while the transaction is yet incomplete. I would ask him on reflection to ask himself whether or not he does not think that is a correct statement of the position—that is, while the transaction is still proceeding it is not desirable that there should be an effort on the part of hon. members in this house to disturb or to dislocate business as normally transacted, in order that it may be carried to a successful conclusion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: After all, this is a representative parliament and a representative government. Many of my constituents and, in fact, other people, have asked me on many occasions what amount was involved in respect to or as a result of this guarantee. I have always been compelled to say that I did not know. I do not think they will be satisfied when again they ask that question not only of me but of other members in the house, and receive the answer, "Well, the Prime Minister thinks it is better that you should not know." In my view the people of Canada are entitled to know that; they are the ones who will be responsible if there is any amount to pay. Certainly we have a right to know how we stand at the present time. The Prime Minister states the amount varies from day to day. Let me ask him where we stand at the present time. What was the amount for which we would have been responsible if the wheat had been sold in November, 1932? Before continuing to the government the right to extend the guarantee I think we have a right to know.

Mr. BENNETT: Rightly or wrongly the house has delegated to a select standing committee the power to make an investigation into these matters. That committee has made such an investigation, and the evidence has been printed and is available to the members of this committee. It is quite true that at the moment we cannot discuss the matters considered by that committee in the sense of considering the details of the evidence given, but it is within the mind and knowledge of every hon. member that that has been done, and that the committee has taken a certain line of action with respect to it.

I said that the liability of the country varies with the calendar date that may be selected for making the computation. In other words, if the price of wheat were to rise ten per cent above what it was the other day, the guarantor would be under no liability. If on the other hand the price of wheat should fall, the liability would be increased. But it was pointed out that it was within the normal expectation of those who had given the matter the most consideration that if there is a regulated flow of wheat upon the markets of the world and the excess carry-over or surplus is not permitted to destroy the market price of this world commodity, there will be no liability upon the guarantor. But that cannot be determined at the moment. The hon. gentleman may assure his constituents at least that the liabilities of this guarantor would be discharged to-day for much less than $15,000,000.

Mr. JACOBS: Is $13,000,000 a fair estimate?

Mr. BENNETT: As I say, it varies from day to day, but I have used a figure which is an outside figure, in view of the insistence of the hon. gentleman, who is within his rights; but it is against my own judgment and against the majority of a standing committee of this house. If he insists I can only make the observation that I have made and that I now make. If the house presses for further information I think I have discharged my duty after I have explained to them as fully as I can what I believe the consequences will be, and then if they insist they will carry with me jointly the responsibility that attaches to it.

Mr. JACOBS: I think it is only fair for me to add, although I do not know that I can relate to the house anything that took place before the committee, that as a member of that committee I asked the Minister of Finance to say if the government considered that the divulging of any information of that kind would not be in the public interest, and the Finance minister replied that the government would not say one way or the other, that it was for the committee to decide. Evidently there has been some change in the view of the government since that time.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was a little late getting in this evening. I should like to ask, is it not the intention of the government to carry on the stabilization of the wheat market under this clause?

With regard to the information that has been asked for this evening, in another place it was pointed out that the world at large knows to what extent Canada has wheat within its borders, but what they do not know is who has control of that wheat. Whether it is in the interest of Canada that it should be known how much wheat is held by John I. McFarland in the interests of the government or of the producer is perhaps a debatable question, but I will say this, that to divulge the information can do no good, and it may do some harm, especially to the producer. An hon. member asks me, in what way? I reply, in this way: If you go back to say February of last year or December you will find that wheat hit its low in Winnipeg at 38⅜ cents. If Mr. McFarland performed the functions he was appointed to perform, and he admitted in another place that at that time he had to take 75 per cent of the wheat off the market—if he bought wheat at 38⅜ cents, wheat now being 70 cents, there is a lot in what the Prime Minister says, and Mr. McFarland could probably show himself in a more favourable position to-day than at any other time in the whole of his operations. But if information is to be given as to where he stands to-day, we should have from Mr. McFarland or from the government information as to the position he occupied at the end of every six months period dating from the time he took over on November 30, 1930. Unless that were done, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would paint a true picture.

In conclusion, representing a rural constituency, I cannot see that divulging the information would do any good. I do not know why the government should be anxious to conceal it unless it did not want the world at large to know just who is in control of our wheat. I am of an open mind whether the divulging of the information would do injury or not, but I do say most emphatically that it can do no good and might do some harm.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There seems to be some question as to how far the government should disclose what guarantees it has given to the banks with respect to wheat pool transactions; but guarantees have been given to the banks with respect to a number of other matters. Perhaps the minister will tell us what those particular guarantees are, and their extent.

Mr. BENNETT: Before my right hon. friend proceeds with that I am sure the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will permit me to refer to Hansard of March 17, 1931. Speaking on the address on that occasion, I said:

> In connection with agriculture I do not intend to say more than that we took such action as to prevent a panic in connection with wheat, an action which I think any government would have taken had it been seized with a thorough appreciation of the seriousness of the condition then existing. That action had the result at least of saving the situation at the moment. I can only say that whatever may be necessary for the purpose of enabling agriculture to be placed upon a firm and stable basis, we will do, but no man who has followed the history of world movements during these last eighteen months can fail to understand that the failure to appreciate what was coming had been responsible for what is. The right hon. gentleman mentioned yesterday the necessity for study and deliberation, and I have read in the Liberal press the statement that he did not decide quickly but, oh, so deeply.

Turning to page 1076 of Hansard of April 28, 1931, I again referred to this matter because my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Vallance) was discussing the matter with me. I said:

> What would the price of wheat have been in this country had it not been for the action of the government?
> An hon. Member: What has it done?
>
> Mr. Bennett: Ask any thoughtful man about that.

[Mr. Vallance.]

An hon. Member: Tell us what you did.

Mr. Bennett: I tried to indicate the other day that I think it is very much better that these things should speak for themselves. We put the collective credit of this country behind the wheat market.

Mr. Vallance: It was security only to the banks which you gave, not to the wheat pool at all, or to the farmer. The help was given to the banks.

An hon. Member: It was the banks you saved.

Mr. Bennett: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Canadian people, to judge whether anything could better illustrate the line of thought indulged in by some hon. members than the two observations to which we have just listened.

An hon. Member: God help the farmer anyway.

Mr. Bennett: Could anything be better calculated to bring—shall I say?—despair on the part of those farmers who are struggling with adversity than this counsel of desperation to which we have been listening? The banks have money belonging to their depositors, and they owe it to them. The banks have no right to lend that money upon security which will hazard the deposit. The banks have lent the money to the farmers, to the pool—which was a voluntary organization created by the farmers themselves and not by the country. The banks were called upon to do one of two things; support that market by continuing to advance money; or stop doing so and let wheat drop 40 cents.

Mr. Young: Would wheat have dropped 40 cents if you had not taken the action you did?

Mr. Bennett: I cannot say. I can only say that that is the judgment of those well able to express an opinion on the subject.

Mr. Young: That is 40 cents more than it actually did drop.

Mr. Bennett: No, it would have dropped to 40 cents a bushel.

Mr. Vallance: It went to forty-one cents to the grower at the shipping point.

Mr. Bennett: I am not talking of that, I am talking of the market price. Let us go one step further. We did that. The pool controlled over 50 per cent of the wheat of this country, and the support given to the pool wheat protected and supported the non-pool wheat. That was well known by everybody. At a given day on the Winnipeg exchange it is a fact, known to those who take the trouble to investigate, that but for the action taken by the government the bottom would have entirely dropped out of the market.

Now, 50 cent wheat is no new thing in Canada. Have any hon. gentlemen read the life of Sir William Van Horne? Do you recall the days of 50 cent wheat as reported by his biographer?

Mr. Brown: I recall it.

Mr. Bennett: Then my friend from Lisgar has had experience of what 50 cent wheat means.

Mr. Brown: Overalls were 75 cents then; to-day they are $3.

Mr. Bennett: Quite so.

Further discussion took place, but I desire to direct attention to the fact that it was made abundantly clear at that time that we had supported the situation by guaranteeing the banks. I am quite certain my hon. friend overlooked the observations made by me on April 28, 1931, and the earlier observations made on March 17, 1931, which appear on page 70 of Hansard. My memory was somewhat uncertain as to what I had said at that time but I secured the Hansard, and that is the record.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) will take no exception to the simple question I intend to ask. Mr. McFarland began his operations on the Winnipeg market in the fall of 1930, I think in November. Would not it be the natural and logical thing to have the standing of his account given to parliament at the end of each grain year, that is July 31? This would bring matters up to July 31 of last year and his standing to-day would not be divulged. I think this should be done in order to preserve some of the business ethics of government which they are now demanding of others—chain stores for example. I have never had much business experience but I know of the old saying that short accounts make long friends and long accounts make short friends. Why should not the government try to follow out this adage and give us a short account in order to preserve a long friendship? Where you have an account running for years you are bound to get into trouble. It is claimed sometimes that memos have not been made or have been lost, that this and that has not been put down or someone has died, and perplexities thus arise. I have not been worrying the Prime Minister with questions to-day; this is the first one I have asked.

I might say that I have been a wheat pool contract signer, although there are no contracts now. As a citizen of Canada I have a share in the line of credit being used and the guarantee given by the government. I am interested also as one who still patronizes the wheat pool, even though there are no contracts. I do not think it is exacting or unreasonable to ask the government to let us have a statement up to the end of each crop year. Surely to goodness we could not ask anything more modest than that. I am in the position of my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Lapointe); my constituents are asking me for information about this. If this thing is allowed to run indefinitely there is bound to be trouble at the end. Someone will have to clean up the whole thing and it may not be our friends opposite; it may be some other government, even a government of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. To do this would be recognizing just a little of the business principles which actuate people in carrying on their own business.

Mr. VALLANCE: I imagine the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) is just as well acquainted as I am with the facts in connection with the guaranteeing of wheat in western Canada during the last four years. There was a government which guaranteed the pool before this government came into the picture. The Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta governments saw fit to come to the rescue of the pools in 1929 and 1930. There was no disposition on the part of those governments at that time to conceal from the electorate or the taxpayers the position of things. It was well known during the whole activities to what extent the governments were guaranteeing. In fairness to the hon. member for Melville, I must admit that no ill effects came from that information being given out. I cannot say whether there would be the same result if the information now asked for were given to the committee. My perambulations through western Canada were considerable for the six months before I left to come to Ottawa—I may say that I took part in the Mackenzie by-election—and in all my perambulations I did not meet one farmer who asked me how the government stood one way or the other. It is not very often that hon. members opposite agree that I am fair, but in this instance I must make that statement.

We must admit that there was a time when you could not sell wheat on the Winnipeg market. The only individual who was taking up options was Mr. John I. McFarland. As to how low wheat would have have gone if this action had not been taken, I do not know, but the fact is that there were days when you could not sell Canadian wheat on the Winnipeg market. While I should like to say that the government should not divulge this information, as I said before, I do not see where any good could come out of giving it and there might possibly be some harm.

Mr. BAKER: If the western farmer did not complain, why should a representative of the western farmer make a complaint in this house?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not had the advantage of being a member of the banking and commerce committee, nor have I read all the evidence. I was present for a short time as a spectator but I was not particularly edified by what I heard. However, I am a member of the House of Commons; we are in committee of the whole and I do not think the Prime Minister will say that I have asked an unreasonable question. If he declines, the responsibility is not mine.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 28, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, March 28, 1934.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, acting as the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

F. L. C. Pereira,
Deputy Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EDGAR BOUTET

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of order in council, P.C. 2436, of November 29, 1933, respecting the appointment of Edgar Boutet as executive secretary in the office of the Postmaster General.

CARRIAGE OF MAIL—TEMISCOUATA COUNTY

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between Mr. A. J. Morin and any other person on the one hand, and the Post Office Department as well as the office of the Prime Minister, on the other, respecting the carriage of the mail to Pied du Lac, Boisvert, Les Etroits and Belanger Siding, county of Témiscouata, since 1930.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. ILSLEY:

For a copy of all correspondence since September 23, 1926, between any of the governments of the maritime provinces or any premiers, ministers or departments in such governments, and the government of the Dominion of Canada, or any prime minister, minister or department in such government, or any board of audit appointed by the dominion government, relating to revision of the financial arrangements between the dominion government and the maritime provinces and the reassessment of provincial subsidies mentioned in subsection 6 of section I of the report of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims of which Sir Andrew R. Duncan was chairman.

RETAINING WALL—ABENAKIS VILLAGE

Mr. CHEVRIER (for Mr. Boucher):

For a copy of all contracts, letters, correspondence and paylists, respecting the construction work performed in 1930, and the reconstruction or repairing of the retaining wall opposite the convent of the Grey Nuns, in the Abenakis village, in the Indian reservation, county of Yamaska; also a copy of all reports of inspection respecting the acceptance, defects and renewal of such work.

SHIPS CLEARANCE PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, has the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) been able to obtain the information which I requested about ten days ago? Where can navigators and seamen, especially those of Quebec, obtain books in French relating to marine charts and clearance papers?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, so far as the last documents mentioned by my hon. friend, the question should be put to the Department of National Revenue. As to marine charts and tidal records, there are none at present in French, and there has never been any under whatever regime; however, for some time past, I have given instructions that they be issued in both languages.

CRIMINAL CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I wish to inquire of the government whether it is the intention to codify in the French language the acts dealing with criminal offences enacted from 1927 to 1933, the same as they have been codified in English. Quebec would be very grateful to the government.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): The question raised by my hon. friend is under consideration.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Will this take long?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED AFTER EASTER RECESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as we are about to enter on the Easter recess I should like to ask the Prime Minister if, when parliament reassembles, he will find it possible to inform the house as to what legislation, other than that which may appear upon the order paper at that time, the government is likely to bring down before the close of the session. Also I should like to know if it would be possible to have the major measures brought down as soon as possible after the recess.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour, as soon after the house reconvenes as possible, to make known to hon. members the measures the government will introduce. In the very nature of things there is no effort to delay the introduction of legislation, but the two bills now before the committee on banking and commerce involve legislation in connection with at least three other matters, and until such time as they are disposed of the legislation cannot be submitted to the house. There is legislation foreshadowed in the speech from the throne which has been delayed in preparation, because conferences with those interested have not always been easy to arrange. I have no doubt the right hon. gentleman knows how difficult it is to get all persons interested at one time to consider and to deal with matters of public importance. But every effort will be made to submit to the house as soon after we reconvene as possible a statement as to the major measures which will engage the attention of parliament during this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank the Prime Minister for that assurance. My right hon. friend will appreciate that with so many committees sitting it is very difficult for those of us who have not seen the intended legislation to have a chance to study it, and particularly is that so with respect to amendments to the Dominion Elections Act. If we could have that bill at as early a date as possible that would be appreciated.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, that has been in preparation since we met. I indicated the other day that at one time we thought of leaving the whole matter to the committee, as was done on one previous occasion. But owing to the fact that so many members are engaged in the different committees it is difficult to get a sufficient number to meet in the committee on privileges and elections. With that in mind we have gone forward with the preparation of the bill, which I trust within a reasonable time after reconvening we will be able to submit to the house. After the measure is introduced it can lie on the table for a substantial length of time, so as to enable hon. members to study it.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

REPORT OF INQUIRY CONDUCTED BY HON. DONALD SUTHERLAND

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a report which a number of hon. members would like to see, namely, the report of the Hon. Donald Sutherland on the tobacco inquiry of 1933. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) has a notice on the order paper under the heading of notices of motions for production of papers in which he asks for a copy of the report. The hon. member has been in his seat every time the order has been called, but on each occasion has allowed it to pass. It is difficult to understand what his motive may be.

Mr. GOTT: That will be made known in due course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Whatever that may be, I am going to ask the Minister of Labour, who has the report, whether he could not lay the report on the table of the house before the adjournment this afternoon. There seems to be no reason why the report should not be given to those of us who wish to see it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) will make a statement with respect to the report, but because I must take some responsibility with respect to it may I say that when the member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) placed his motion on the order paper and, in due course, it was reached, he expected that there would be no difficulty about the motion being passed and the report brought down. The Minister of Labour mentioned the matter to me, and after looking into it it appears that the same difficulty arises as has arisen with respect to some other reports made in times past. The minister will give a more detailed explanation than I will, but the report is of such a character as does not contemplate presentation to the house. I may add that the hon. member for South Essex, to whom reference has been made, has been rather insistent that the statute should be disregarded. He has said he has a right to see the document and have it laid on the table of the house. Those of us who know him know that he can express himself in a most insistent manner. It is only because of the conclusion about which the minister will speak, and which the law officers tell me is correct, that this document has not been tabled in compliance with the motion on the order paper.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The report to which reference was made is the report of a commissioner—not a royal commissioner—made under the Combines Investigation Act. In the past it has not been the practice nor has it been considered advisable to make these reports public. Section 28 of the Combines Investigation Act which deals with the publicity which should be given to reports is as follows:

> Any report of a commissioner, other than an interim report, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, in which case the minister may exercise his discretion as to the publicity to be given to the report in whole or in part.
> 2. The minister may publish and supply copies of any report in such manner and upon such terms as to him seems most desirable.

This section refers to a commissioner under the act. Then, section 27 deals with the report of the registrar, and is silent as to publication. However, heretofore the practice has been that those reports are not made public. The reason obviously is that when the registrar makes an investigation by himself or by one appointed for such purposes, all the persons or firms are inquired into ex parte, and the information is given in confidence. The act contemplates that any six persons, by signing an application and without stating anything further than that in their opinion a combine exists, may start the machinery in motion. This proceeding is not like other quasi criminal or criminal matters where informations are laid and where the informant must, as in the case of a search warrant, state the reasons upon which his belief is founded. Very frequently it happens, at least so I am told by those who have been associated with the operation of the act for years, that where the six persons sign the application they do not appear as witnesses at all. It is sufficient to start the law in motion merely to state that in the opinion of the six a combine exists. The registrar then investigates. The registrar on an ex parte investigation may conclude that a combine in restraint of trade, a combine as interpreted by the act, does exist, but up to that time the investigation is still ex parte in a sense, the persons being investigated giving the details of their business to the registrar. But, as in this case, where the registrar in the exercise of his discretion says that in his opinion a combine does not exist it would be unfair, and I think the practice heretofore followed is sound, that the confidential information incorporated in the report of the registrar should be made available to the competitors of the firm or firms whose business was being investigated.

The investigation by the registrar, if further proceedings are taken, becomes the foundation ultimately of a criminal prosecution. The next step would be the review by the minister of the registrar's decision if he has declared that the act has been violated, and then those whose conduct is under review, so far as I have been able to learn, do not appear before the minister whether he may or may not agree with the registrar, although I think it has rarely happened that the minister has disagreed with the registrar.

If a combine is reported to be in existence, the record then goes to the appropriate attorney general, or it may be referred to a royal commission, and the royal commissioner may then conduct an inquiry in public. That is the publicity that is referred to in section 28. He may report that the firms have been guilty of an invasion of the act. But during all these various investigations there has been no charge laid. The people are not put upon their trial. Their business is simply being investigated. Ultimately, as I say, the report may be dispatched to the appropriate attorney general of the province in which the offence is said to have occurred, and it is there reviewed by the law officers of the province, because the province is charged, under our constitution, with the administration of these statutes. They may conclude that there is no offence. If they so conclude, in the face of the registrar's decision and possibly the decision of a royal commissioner, that a violation of the act has taken place, then after the lapse of three months a prosecution may take place at the instance of the attorney general for Canada. But up to that point the people whose conduct is under review have never been charged with an offence, and it is not until they come before a magistrate in the province and a charge is laid and a preliminary inquiry held that the necessity for making out a prima facie case sufficient to put a person upon his trial arises. If a prima facie case is made out the person may be tried before the magistrate or, having the right of election, may go up for trial to the next court having competent jurisdiction, and in the usual course an indictment would be laid before the grand jury. There might even then be no bill found. If a true bill is found, then for the first time the person comes before the courts to have his conduct with respect to non-compliance with the provisions of the Combines Act brought under the review of the tribunal which would impose a penalty if a verdict of guilty was returned.

So it will be seen that during the course of the proceedings under the Combines Act, if the inquiries made by the registrar were made public, the person whose conduct was under review might suffer a very great injury, and particularly so when the registrar's report is to the effect that no combine within the meaning of the act exists, because it is obvious that the information gathered by him and by his officers, being in many instances of a confidential nature, would then immediately become known to the man's competitors. As I say, the practice in the past in this house, so far as I have been able to learn, has been not to make these reports public, and I agree with the established practice. If, for instance, the committee at present sitting on price spreads desires to have the position of the growers of tobacco spread upon the record—

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister permit a question? I would ask if the Hon. Donald Sutherland, the commissioner who investigated the tobacco industry, reported to the Minister of Labour that there was or was not a combine among the buyers?

Mr. GORDON: That is really what we are discussing now.

Mr. SANDERSON: I thought so.

Mr. GORDON: In order that the inquiring mind of the hon. member may be relieved, the Hon. Donald Sutherland made his report to the registrar and the registrar reported to me.

Mr. GOTT: Will the minister permit me to make an interjection? These preliminary hearings have been taking place not only recently since 1930, but ever since 1922.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the minister concluded his remarks?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I know that this matter is not debatable but I should like to point out to the minister that his own words at the beginning of his remarks, and I think he was right, were to the effect that publicity was an important feature of the combines legislation, but that the law states that the report is not to be made public if the commissioner himself says that it is not to be made public. The minister has the discretion as to whether it shall be made public or not. Are we to understand that the commissioner in his report said that in his opinion it would not be in the public interest to have his report made public, because unless that statement is there, there is nothing to preclude the minister from making the report public?

Mr. GORDON: I think the right hon. gentleman is confusing the registrar and the commissioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. GORDON: I read the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Please read the section about the commissioner.

Mr. GORDON: Section 28 reads:

> Any report of a commissioner, other than an interim report, shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner is of the opinion that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication and so states in the report itself, . . .

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I wanted to know, if the commissioner had stated in the report that it was not in the public interest to make it public.

Mr. GORDON: There never was a commissioner in connection with the investigation into an alleged combine in tobacco. The registrar made the investigation and a commissioner was never appointed. With respect to the report of a registrar, the act is silent as to publicity but the practice has been not to make these reports public or to lay them upon the table of the house. Probably I should not make these observations, but I must say that it is competent to the committee now sitting to subpoena witnesses. These witnesses who were interviewed under the Combines Act are easily available and the committee could get their evidence first hand. I suggest respectfully that it would be infinitely better if these witnesses were available for cross examination. It would not be an investigation such as the registrar makes ex parte and at which he very often gains information which is given to him in confidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us forget all about the registrar; it is the report of the commissioner with which we are concerned. Mr. Sutherland was the commissioner.

Mr. GORDON: He was not the commissioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was he?

Mr. GORDON: He was appointed merely to gather this information for the registrar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As commissioner.

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: By what authority was he appointed?

Mr. GORDON: By order in council.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under your department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is my understanding of a commissioner.

Mr. ILSLEY: Might I point out that a commissioner must be one who is appointed by the governor in council under section 2, subsection 2 of the act. Mr. Sutherland was a commissioner under the act.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did he state that this report should be withheld from publicity?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is nothing before the house to warrant a general discussion.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.—Mr. Gordon.—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 2—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last night I asked the minister to give the committee full information as to the guarantees given to the banks under this legislation. He gave only one and I should like to have them all.

Mr. GORDON: A guarantee of $660,000 was given to the Bank of Montreal by P.C. 1285, passed on June 28, 1933, with respect to the production of 30,000 tons of steel rails to be manufactured by the Algoma Steel Corporation.

Mr. EULER: Has that guarantee been discharged?

Mr. GORDON: No. P.C. 1577 of July 11, 1932, P.C. 213 of February 6, 1933, and P.C. 1101 of June 6, 1933, provided for guarantees to the banks against loss with respect to advances amounting to $15,538,500 secured by first mortgage bonds of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Corporation. P.C. 1078 of June 2, 1933, guaranteed the interest and principal of a treasury bill of the province of British Columbia in the amount of $626,533.75 issued to the Canadian Bank of Commerce to meet New York maturities of the province. P.C. 1076 of June 2, 1933, guaranteed certain chartered banks for the repayment of an amount up to $1,100,000 advanced to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation of Nova Scotia in connection with the production of 50,000 tons of steel rails and authorized the payment of interest at five per cent by the government on such guaranteed advances until the rails were paid for by the Canadian National Railways. P.C. 1077 of June 2, 1933, guaranteed the interest and principal of a treasury bill of the province of Manitoba in the amount of $5,894,127.49 issued to the Royal Bank of Canada to meet and retire maturities of the province in New York. P.C. 972 of April 28, 1932, and P.C. 318 of February 22, 1933, guaranteed the chartered banks in Winnipeg against loss due to the assumption of liabilities of the province of Manitoba savings office to the amount of $12,108,301.63. P.C. 538 of March 22, 1933, guaranteed repayment to certain chartered banks of an advance of $625,000 to Newfoundland. P.C. 2238, of September 12, 1931, P.C. 1576 of July 11, 1932, and P.C. 685 of April 12, 1933, guaranteed repayment of advances made by chartered banks to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited in connection with wheat or other grains grown in 1930 and purchases of wheat or other grains deemed necessary to secure the advantageous sale of such grains. P.C. 2239 of September 12, 1931, P.C. 2403 of September 28, 1931, and P.C. 2977 of November 30, 1931, guaranteed repayment of advances by chartered banks to marketing agencies in connection with the 1931 crop. P.C. 2077 of September 20, 1932, P.C. 508 of March 20, 1932, and P.C. 746 of April 20, 1933, guaranteed repayment of advances by chartered banks to marketing agencies in connection with the 1932 crop. P.C. 2490 of November 29, 1933, guaranteed repayment of loans made by chartered banks to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company totalling $60,000,000, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent per annum payable half yearly, such loans to be repaid on or before December 1, 1938, and to be secured by deposit, as a pledge to the several banks, by the said railway company, of its perpetual four per cent consolidated debenture stock having a nominal or par value of $100,000,000. In the event of the dominion being called upon to repay at maturity the whole or any part of such loans and interest, provision is made for transfer by the banks to the crown of the securities held. Those are the guarantees made in the legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the minister was speaking of orders that had been passed under peace, order and good government, he stated that these were all the orders so far as they related to the Department of Labour. Were there any orders which related to other departments of government, passed under that provision?

Mr. GORDON: I believe my statement was that these were the three that the Department of Labour had knowledge of, but they sprang in fact from the Department of Finance, and I believe that these were the only ones passed under that part of the section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister would have knowledge of all orders, I presume.

Mr. GORDON: I presume I would.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then, in addition to this very extended list that the minister has given us for our information, there will be a much larger sum included in guarantees for which the government is responsible in the event of default. I heard for the first time about the guarantee of an advance to Newfoundland, under which the government of Canada became responsible for a certain amount, as well as the guarantees in respect of advances to the Beauharnois company, which involves a very large amount, all to be additional to the amounts we have here, namely, a sum computed at $110,000,000, plus loans to provinces, which are direct loans of, I think, $52,000,000 in round figures. So that under the legislation for the purpose of unemployment relief the government seems to have covered an exceedingly wide field. These guarantees to wheat producers as well as for the purchase of grain, all operating under this act, are to my mind entirely foreign to relief. It might be said that the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the purpose of employing men might well be included. But surely where guarantees are of such a wide and varied character as those indicated by the minister in his report of the orders in council passed under the legislation, the government of Canada is becoming responsible for a staggering amount in the event of failure of payment; and, frankly, with respect to some of these investments the government will more than likely have to come to the rescue. There is one certainty about the matter, and that is that unless economic conditions change the government will be responsible. Taking the tremendous addition to the debt of the country, coupled with the guarantees, the matter assumes staggering proportions. It does seem to me that too wide powers are granted the government under the provisions of this act. I know it is the tendency of the present day for governments to take such powers, and while we are prohibited from discussing other acts that are being brought down, it does seem to me that we appear to be rushing headlong in this direction.

Mr. GORDON: These powers have been deleted from the present bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not so sure about that; one would have to look into the matter more carefully before admitting that they are. Indeed, the last section of the bill gives some wider powers. However, I do not propose to discuss that at the moment. After listening to the recital of these orders in council I must say, however, that the government seems to me to have included everything it deemed necessary, or everything it could include in the act. I knew that the provisions of the act were wide, but I confess at once that I did not think it had reached the point of the government becoming responsible for deficits of foreign governments and for any possible deficits that may occur so far as Beauharnois is concerned.

Mr. RHODES: What foreign government has my hon. friend in mind?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I suppose I was a little unfortunate in the expression I used, but the government of Newfoundland is included in one of the orders in council to the extent to which my hon. friend has guaranteed that government along with the British government. I confess at once that I was unfortunate in saying foreign government; I should have said one of the governments of the empire. But even that, in my opinion, was surely never contemplated as coming within the four corners of this measure. That is the argument I make, and it shows, when you grant these wide powers, to what extent governments will exercise the privilege afforded under the provisions of such an act. We on this side have been protesting and protesting against these wide powers. I may say frankly to my hon. friend I do not think the guarantee to Beauharnois has any business to come under the provisions of this measure. The government knew what they were doing when they were guaranteeing Beauharnois; they knew what the amount would be. I am not going to elaborate now on the terrible mistake I think the government have made in connection with Beauharnois; perhaps some day we shall have an opportunity of discussing the matter, but under the provisions of this legislation the government have strained their powers tremendously in including a guarantee of that sort.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to join with the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) in protesting against what seems to be an unwarrantable extension of the meaning of the act. I could understand how the government might have made grants to the Canadian Pacific for keeping their shops open in order that work might be given to certain of their employees, but it is an altogether unwarranted extension when the government guarantees loans to the Canadian Pacific. That has nothing to do with the immediate purposes of relief.

The hon. member for West Edmonton has made a similar statement on the action of the government towards Beauharnois. That is a private concern; it was not immediately giving work to large numbers of our Canadian people. The government's action was essentially a guarantee to the banks that were financing the enterprise, and I do not think that comes within the original meaning of the act.

The same thing applies to Newfoundland. I am not a lawyer, but it strikes me that it might very well be contested by almost any citizen of Canada whether an act for the relief of Canadians makes possible dealing with affairs entirely outside this country. The only possible argument that could be used would be that Canadian banks were concerned, and in this and many more cases we had to come to the relief of Canadian banks that had investments abroad.

Omnibus legislation of this kind is very unsatisfactory. If the government wants to take to itself power to help Canadian financial institutions it ought to bring in a measure taking power to help those institutions but it should not do so in this back door sort of way.

In connection with relief proper I have a suggestion to offer to the government. This is the last day before we adjourn for Easter recess. It is quite obvious that before we adjourn we cannot get very far in legislation of this kind. Further, as was announced yesterday, the meeting which was to have taken place between the provinces and the Dominion government has been postponed for some time. We cannot intelligently discuss this matter until we have the report as to the arrangements that are likely to be made between the provinces and the Dominion government. Members of every party in the house are quite willing that relief shall be granted and are anxious that a proper relief scheme should be inaugurated, but as matters stand now, we are inevitably thrown into hostile camps and either we have to defend a policy that is not very clear or oppose one about which we know and can know very little. My suggestion is that the government should not press this matter to-day, but rather, during the recess, should take into serious consideration the drafting of a constructive program designed to deal with the whole unemployment situation. We have been promised in the past that the government would seriously consider some sort of unemployment insurance scheme. We have been promised that they would inaugurate some sort of public works scheme. We have been told that the present scheme of the dole is very unsatisfactory. I think the Prime Minister believes that; I think we all believe it. It was initiated two years ago as a sort of stop-gap arrangement and it would seem as if we should not indefinitely carry on along this line.

I should like to give the government credit for two measures that they have brought down this session. First, the central bank arrangement, which, although I do not altogether like the details of it, is one that shows a great deal of boldness and imagination and marks a distinctly forward step. Again, while I do not want to anticipate the discussion on the marketing legislation, I concede that it also has boldness and imagination. The government in these two very important departments of our public life is preparing to take a really forward step. I would venture to suggest that they might very well bring forward a third measure dealing with unemployment. Then side by side with the central bank and marketing legislation, rounding out, as it were, their program we would have a well conceived and carefully drafted bill dealing with this important question of unemployment. It is quite obvious that the government have been influenced in their central bank legislation by some of the developments in Great Britain, the United States and elsewhere, and that also in their marketing legislation they have been influenced by developments in the United States, Great Britain and some of the other dominions. I cannot see why they should not receive whatever help they can from the NRA and from some of the schemes that have been put into operation in Great Britain, and bring in this session a carefully arranged scheme. I believe such a scheme would be fairly well assured of support on the part of this house. I cannot speak for the official opposition, but I think I can speak more or less for members in our own corner, and more than that, for a very large number of people throughout the country. If I read the press aright, I think the public generally expect the government to do something of this kind. I am not particularly concerned with the political future of the government, but even from that standpoint they would be well advised, when they are looking after the financial and commercial interests, not to neglect labour and those who at one time were in the ranks of labour but who to-day are in the ranks of the unemployed. This session would not be altogether barren if the government would carefully consider such a suggestion and bring in a definite scheme.

Mr. EULER: What is the total amount of the guarantee to the Beauharnois corporation? I think the initial amount was something like $30,000,000. Has any further guarantee been given?

Mr. GORDON: No further guarantee has been given. The amount was $15,438,500.

Mr. EULER: Can the minister say what expectation they have as to the date upon which this guarantee may be discharged, I suppose by future financing directly on the part of the Beauharnois corporation? Has he any information on that point?

Mr. GORDON: I have not any information on that point, but the loan was secured on major securities of the company—first mortgage bonds—and I have no doubt that is the method which will be employed to retire this loan.

Mr. EULER: One notices in the press that Beauharnois is making a new issue of bonds and I assumed the moneys were perhaps to be devoted towards discharging the liability to the banks by whom the money was advanced. I am not usually very critical of some of the acts of the government, perhaps not so much as I should be; I like to be on pretty safe ground when I do offer any criticism. Certainly no one on this side of the house, I believe, has any fault to find if the government uses the authority which it has for the purpose of relieving those who are unemployed. But I cannot see how the government possibly can bring under the category of relief to the unemployed such matters as to the guarantee of $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific, for example. That has not the remotest connection with unemployment or unemployment relief. Neither, I think, has the making of loans to the various provinces to the extent of something like $52,000,000. Certainly it can have no possible connection with relief when we guarantee the debts of the Dominion of Newfoundland, or what now has become the colony of Newfoundland. As I recall it the only excuse given for joining with Great Britain in guaranteeing Newfoundland's debts was that it might tend to destroy or hurt the credit of Canada if Newfoundland went into default. I think that is so far fetched, Mr. Chairman, as not to be worth any consideration whatsoever. Thus, by way of guarantees to the Canadian Pacific and to the Beauharnois company; by way of gifts to certain industrial concerns such as the Dominion Steel, the Algoma Steel and the Canadian Pacific; by way of loans and guarantees and advances we have committed ourselves to something like $100,000,000 or $125,000,000, a tremendous sum.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatever to having those powers used for the legitimate purpose of relieving unemployment, but as I said before I do not see how you can possibly argue that such a thing as the guarantee of the loan to the Canadian Pacific or the guarantee of the debts of the colony of Newfoundland possibly could come in that category. If these things are done—and in this connection I refer also to the loans made to the provinces, in connection with which I am not sure that we ought to go any further—is it not just conceivable that the credit of the Dominion of Canada will be affected fully as much as if some of these corporations or provinces were allowed to go into default?

I arose more particularly, perhaps, to criticize the method by which the government guaranteed the advance to the Canadian Pacific. I hope no one will think I have any particular prejudice towards that great company, but I do say, as the leader of the opposition said a few days ago, that it should not have been done under this act; it has no connection whatever with relief. If it were thought desirable—and I think it is highly questionable whether or not it was desirable—to guarantee the $60,000,000 loaned by the banks to the Canadian Pacific against the retirement of their bonds, it should not have been done in the way it was done. The matter should have been brought to parliament and parliament should have passed upon it. I think it was almost an affront to this house and to hon. members, in view of the fact that parliament was in session last year at the time negotiations were being carried on in connection with this guarantee of $60,000,000, that parliament was not advised of what was taking place. I will say this, also; when it was definitely decided that the gurantee should be made, with this house in session I say it was almost an affront to this parliament that due notice was not given to that effect. If we are to continue in that way where in the world will we end? I leave it to the fair minded members on the other side of the house as to whether or not this sort of thing should be carried on indefinitely. If it was right to guarantee the $60,000,000 loan to the Canadian Pacific for the retirement of their obligations surely it was the privilege of hon. members of this house to know about it when we were actually in session at the time.

I rise now to make my protest against that sort of thing; I think it should not be countenanced, and I believe if hon. members opposite had their say they would disapprove of it also.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Following what my hon. friend has just said I should like to ask the minister if he has the total of the guarantees that have been given to the banks. The figures given a moment ago by the hon. member for North Waterloo are far short of the mark. The hon. member said he thought that the amount of advances and guarantees combined would be something like $125,000,000, but I believe they considerably exceed that total. While the minister is obtaining the figures I would direct his attention to some figures we already have. The statement given by the minister as to actual cash disbursements up to March 22, total $110,000,000. The loans and advances given in the statement amount to $52,000,000. The guarantee given in connection with the Canadian Pacific alone would be another $60,000,000, and there are the further guarantees which were cited by the minister this afternoon as well as the guarantee to the banks with respect to the wheat pool to which the Prime Minister referred last night. I think these will bring the total of advances and guarantees to very much beyond the point at which it was put by the hon. member for North Waterloo.

Mr. EULER: Possibly I was misunderstood; I was not referring to the $110,000,000 actually expended on relief, which I presume was handed over to the provinces since none of it was expended directly from the dominion treasury. If that amount is taken in addition to the figure I gave the total would be about $225,000,000 or $230,000,000, an amount that this house surely should consider very seriously.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Mr. Chairman. Will the minister give us the total amount of the guarantees to the banks?

Mr. EULER: I should like to amend my statement again; I entirely omitted to speak of the guarantees given in connection with the wheat purchases. I do not know to how many millions or hundreds of millions that might run.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is being kept under their hats for the present.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the guarantees to which reference has been made were given, of course, under the provisions of section 2 (a) of the act of 1933, by which this parliament gave this government the right to loan or advance money or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking. In the judgment of the government these guarantees were made; the government thought it wise to do so. In the bill presently before the committee, as hon. members will observe, the right to make such loans, advances or guarantees is deleted.

With respect to these guarantees—and I can only speak of some of them, because others come under different departments of the government, and the Prime Minister yesterday made very clear, I thought, the situation with respect to the wheat purchases—I might say this: In connection with the Algoma Steel Corporation, about a year ago a very large delegation saw me with respect to the condition of the working people. Perhaps I had better deal with Nova Scotia first.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So that we may not get away from this question, would the minister give us the total?

Mr. GORDON: It is being totalled now, and I shall have the figures in a moment or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me the minister is getting a long way from the point.

Mr. GORDON: It has to be added up by the officers who are sitting in front of me. First I shall deal with the Nova Scotia steel situation. A very large delegation saw me and indicated that there was acute distress in that province. Workmen had not been drawing wages sufficient to maintain them, and that condition had been in existence for a number of years, probably beginning about the first or the middle of 1929. In each succeeding year the situation had become more acute. The delegation was composed of representatives of municipalities, the clergy, boards of trade and, if my recollection serves me correctly, there was not a member of parliament with them. The government believed that no better method could be employed to relieve the unemployment situation in Nova Scotia than to guarantee one-half of the cost of a rail order of 50,000 tons, that one-half amounting to $1,100,000. Quite true, the Canadian National Railways might not need those rails for a year or two, but they are not destructible. I believe no better form of relief could have been granted than that of guaranteeing the banks in connection with that rail order. It provided work in the steel plants and in the coal mines, and I have been advised by representatives of the company and by other public men that those steel orders being given in Nova Scotia acted as a backlog for a considerable quantity of other iron and steel business. Orders were received from South Africa, Great Britain and Australia, and the president of the company told me that had that guarantee not been given and the work started so that the company could carry on at that time there was no question in his mind that the plant would have had to be shut down. I was informed by Mr. Kelly, the general manager, and by Sir Newton Moore, the president, that this action carried them over what had been probably the most acute time in the country's history. As a direct result they have got the business to which I have referred and expect other business which in all would be sufficient to keep the plant and the mines operating this summer. We may have been wrong in giving that guarantee, but I have given the reason.

In connection with the Algoma steel works a similar condition arose. Men were on relief, and the situation had become very acute. In that instance we guaranteed a rail order of 30,000 tons. Sault Ste. Marie depends to a great extent on the steel plants, and in January of this year Mr. W. C. Franz, apparently one of the receivers of the plant, wrote me as follows:

> Our rail mill started on the 30,000 ton unemployment order December 4, and has been operating on single term in order to distribute the work as much as possible. The order is about one-half rolled and will run to the first week in March.
> The operation of the roll mill on this unemployment order not only restored employment to roll mill employees but has enabled us to secure orders for other material to operate the two merchant mills through the winter. We now have approximately 1,600 men employed, and a payroll of $150,000 per month.
>
> During the last summer we had at Sault Ste. Marie over 1,500 families on relief, and this would have been increased materially this winter had it not been for the steel plant operation. As a result about one-half of these families have been taken off the relief list. We now hope to get some additional rail business on the completion of the present government order, and further reduce the number on relief between now and summer.
> I want to express to you our appreciation—

Probably I should not read this—> —and that of our employees for the great assistance given us in placing these rail orders, which enabled us to start plant operation at a time when it seemed almost impossible to take care of the unemployed in this district during the winter months.

>
> Yours truly,
> W. C. Franz.

The total cost of these two guarantees to the federal treasury will be only the interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister this question: He pointed out that the rails which were manufactured as a result of the order given to Nova Scotia might not be required for another two or three years. I presume that if that is the case the additional order given to the Algoma company would make still longer the time before those rails could be used. I presume they are being paid for by the Canadian National Railways, and the government is guaranteeing the railway company. Is that not robbing Peter to pay Paul? Is that not letting the national railways in for greater liability, and is not the liability of the Canadian National one of the chief objects of the government's criticism?

Mr. GORDON: The Canadian National Railways will not be charged with these rails until they need them; when they need them they will pay for them. Whether or not it was a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, I believe it was good business for both those places in Canada when those guarantees were made. That was my belief, and the belief of the government. If we are mistaken we will be judged upon our mistake.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has said that the Canadian National Railways will pay for the rails when they want them. To whom do the rails now belong? Has the government been buying rails, storing them and will it sell them to the Canadian National Railways later? If not to whom do those rails belong? What is to become of them?

Mr. GORDON: The rails will of course stay at Sydney and Sault Ste. Marie until the railways want them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To whom do they belong?

Mr. GORDON: In the meantime the rails were manufactured or rolled with the bank's money, and the loans made to the companies by the banks are guaranteed by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know this: To whom do the rails belong —to the banks or to the government?

Mr. GORDON: They certainly will not belong to the government until they are paid for. The government merely guarantees advances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a matter of interest in connection with banking operations. I believe the committee on banking will be interested to learn that the banks have gone into the business of manufacturing rails, according to what the minister is saying.

Mr. GORDON: It may be an interesting feature for the banking committee to investigate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are to understand the government does not own the rails, but the banks do. Do I gather that from the minister's statement? And the banks will not be paid for the rails until the Canadian National Railways order them, moreover that order may not be placed until two or three years hence. That is a curious position. "After me the deluge," would appear to be the principle on which the government have been acting.

Mr. GORDON: The time that may elapse before the Canadian National want them can perhaps only be determined in the mind of anybody by his outlook for the future. They may want them all this year; I do not know, but at any rate in the meantime the cost to the government is the interest on the loan.

Mr. EULER: I presume there must be some sort of contract or the company would not enter upon the rolling of these rails. The minister may not know the terms but there must be a contract between the Canadian National Railways, if you like, and the steel mills, and there must be something left to the discretion of the railway company as to delivery. There must be some termination to it. I can well understand why the banks would be asked to pay, and the government guarantee the banks, but again I say there must be some sort of contract under which the rails will be delivered at a specified period.

Mr. BRADETTE: On Monday night of this week there was a matter brought to the attention of this house by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) on which I must dwell at some length on this occasion. If it had been only a personal matter I would have let it rest, but the hon. member for East Algoma tried to put into my mouth words that I did not use, and he tried to make this house believe that I was either a radical or a pretty bad man anyway. I want to state here that I have no personal grudge whatever against the hon. member for East Algoma. I will say more, that I fully realize the difficulties and handicaps under which the big corporations are carrying on their activities industrially and otherwise in these times. I also realize what the hon. member has to put up with in connection with his contracts and lumbering activities. I wish to make it clear that the statement I made previously in the house had nothing whatever to do with the hon. member personally.

But the hon. member challenged me the other night when I stated that the letter I was reading was signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly, one of the strike leaders in the Chapleau section, and he said that Mr Connolly had never written the letter from which I was quoting. I have dozens of letters here from Mr. Ellard Connolly, all duly signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly himself, and I am going to read most of them so as to put clearly before the house the circumstances of the strike in Chapleau. The case was very clear indeed.

Further I want to say that this correspondence was sent to me absolutely unsolicited. I never knew that such a man existed as Mr. Ellard Connolly, and I do not know why he sent these letters to me, but after I had received from him the information contained in these letters I wrote and asked him if he would give me permission to use the information he had given me regarding the strike in the Chapleau section, and in a few moments I shall read his letter giving me that permission.

The hon. member for East Algoma also stated on Monday last there were no strikes in the Chapleau district. I am going to read to this committee a proclamation that was issued by the federal government towards the latter end of last January recognizing that there was a strike in that section of the country.

There was also the matter of an inquiry regarding the statements of Mr. O'Hara, one of the strike leaders in the Chapleau section, against the insanitary conditions existing in the Austin and Nicholson Company's camps. Since I made that statement on Monday last I have received information that a second inspection of these camps was made by the Ontario government and that a report was made that was absolutely unfavourable regarding the hygienic conditions of the camps at that time; but on the promise before the magistrate in Chapleau that the situation would be remedied the complaint was withdrawn. But that does not alter the fact that O'Hara was absolutely within his rights during the strike in bringing to the attention of the province and of the country some of the conditions that existed in the camps above mentioned.

I have no excuse to offer, Mr. Chairman, for taking up the time of the house with this matter because I believe that when the welfare of the bushmen and the labouring classes of this country is concerned it is time well spent by this house. I also believe in having the records straight, in having the books balanced. Again, I repeat, this is not a personal matter between the hon. member for East Algoma and myself, but it is a matter in respect to which I want the house and the country to be fully seized of the actual facts.

I shall now read the first letter that I received from Mr. Ellard Connolly. It is a very long one but I believe it is my duty to read the whole of it, more especially as the hon. member for East Algoma stated that there was no strike in his district, and further because he stated that the letter from which I was quoting was not signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, what I stated was that the letter was not written by Mr. Ellard Connolly, and that is capable of absolute proof.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have here, Mr. Chairman, the letter written in longhand by Mr. Ellard Connolly and signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly himself.

Mr. BURY: How do you know he wrote it?

Mr. BRADETTE: Because it is in the same handwriting as all these other letters.

Mr. BURY: That does not prove that it is Connolly's writing.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member must give me credit for a certain amount of intelligence. I have at least fifty letters written and signed by this same man, and I am willing to place them before the committee and leave it to their judgment whether they were not written and signed by the same man. How many members of this government are writing their letters in longhand, or how many members of this house? Everyone gets his secretary to typewrite his correspondence, business and private, and then he signs the letters and becomes responsible for them. The principle is the same here. So I dispute the statement of my hon. friend from East Algoma that these letters have not actually been written and signed by Mr. Ellard Connolly himself. I shall now read the first one:

Chapleau, Ontario,
February 10, 1934.

Jos. A. Bradette, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,—

Your letter of the 9th was received to-day, for which I thank you sincerely and appreciate your kindly interest.

The strike, which is directly responsible for the peculiar position of the striking bushmen here took place on the fifteenth of January. It was due to the unrest and dissatisfaction of years, culminating in the extremely bad conditions this year. The principal points of contention were low wages, long hours and unsanitary living conditions.

The monthly wage rate on the limits of Austin and Nicholson was on a sliding scale of $15 to $26 per month so that a man never could find out his rate until he was being paid off, and then it was at the discretion of the foreman. Work by the month was difficult to obtain because it was an advantage to the lumber company to have the men cutting on a piecework basis. The price, per double cord of spruce pulp, varied from two dollars to three dollars, and again nothing was definite till the pay-off. The bush was exceedingly poor, for seven of the eight camps in operation on the Jack Pine river were working in old cuts, that had already been worked for three to five years previously. The bush was full of old jack pine slash and tops from previous log cutting operations and the men had to cut their way through this in order to clean out the spruce that was left. Very few spruce swamps remained that had not been cut through before. Only one new camp was in a fresh cut. The "cord" required was of oversize dimensions and measured 8 feet, 4 inches by 8 feet 4 inches by 4 feet 4 inches, and on the strips the cutter had to cut his own road ten to twelve feet wide. During the early part of the season the Department of Lands and Forests cut eighty cents per double cord off the timber dues, payable to the department by the company, for the express purpose of that eighty cents being passed on to the men in extra wages, but the men never received the eighty-cent increase, and therefore decided that the company kept the sum as found money. The most difficult sections of the bush were let out to sub-jobbers who erected miserable shacks and tried to grind a profit out of the hard-working pieceworkers by paying the wretched minimum wage.

The measuring and culling, according to which the men were paid, was done by the camp clerk though there were government scalers, Abitibi scalers and company scalers and check scalers in the camps. The men went out to their work in the dark of the morning and did not return to camp till the dusk of evening in a vain attempt to earn a living wage. In many of the camps the average walk to and from work was from one to three miles.

The food was comparatively abundant for the simple reason that even a steam boiler must be stoked with sufficient fuel to give pressure enough to do the job. It is the unwholesomeness of the food that is the chief complaint, for often the beans and potatoes are served sour, owing to being cooked over and over again. Another glaring example of the disregard for the men's stomachs is the fact that sugar was sent out to the bush for the noon lunch in an unwashed lye can as a container. All the grievances cannot be mentioned here but merely a few that are representative of the many.

Then comes the passage that I quoted in the house on Monday last regarding the deplorable conditions of the blankets issued to the men. The letter continues on page 5 as follows:

The law prescribes certain facilities for washing and drying of clothing. At Gray's camp the facilities provided consisted of two empty lard cans for heating of water and one washtub and washboard for over one hundred men, and the washing was done on the edge of the manure heap between the barn and the river. The men were not permitted to do washing in the camp, while the building constructed in lieu of a wash shack was converted into living quarters for the foreman and his wife.

Men arriving at Nicholson Siding to go into the camps slept over night in the bunkhouse there, which is under control of G. B. Nicholson, and required to sleep in dirty blankets there, invariably became infested with vermin and therefore carried vermin into the camps where, owing to the wooden construction of the bunks and unwashed blankets, conditions can only be described as terrible.

There were no dry rooms in the camps and as a result of wet shirts, socks and boots drying around the bunkhouse stoves at night, the breathing atmosphere was contaminated with steam and foul odour. The floors were not kept clean, no cuspidor of any type existed on the camp floors and the towelling was not sufficient nor kept in a sanitary condition. If only the existing sanitary laws were enforced all this could not be possible.

As a result of the foregoing genuine grievances a strike was organized with the assistance of some members of the Lumber Workers' Industrial Union of Canada who were working in the camps at the time. The majority of the men in the camps quit work of their own free will on January 15 and walked to the headquarters camp where they congregated and held the first strike meeting. At this meeting a strike committee and executive were democratically elected from members of the camps present to represent all the different types of work and nationalities. The committee in session appointed Davis and Berry,—

Mr. GORDON: Is Davis the man who travelled under the alias of Wacku?

Mr. BRADETTE: I think so although I do not know. That is the impression I gathered from the hon. member for East Algoma last Monday. I will discuss that man later on. The letter continues:

—two union men, as president and secretary and myself, not a union man at that time, as picket captain. In this committee were discussed the grievances of the men and a list of demands were drawn up. William Austin, a junior member of the firm of Austin and Nicholson was at the camp that day so he was immediately approached by a delegation of three of the workers in an attempt on our part for strike settlement. William Austin claimed to have authority to settle the affair in the interests of the company, so he was presented with a list of the grievances and demands, and time was allowed him for consideration. In this interval two provincial police arrived at the headquarters camp. G. B. Nicholson had been informed of the impending strike on the previous day and had immediately gone to Toronto to interview the Attorney General and General Williams and, according to reports, had been promised there enough provincial police, man for man if necessary, to counterbalance the strikers. About four o'clock on the afternoon of January 15, William Austin came into the main bunkhouse of the headquarters camp, together with two Ontario provincial police, and told the men that he could not meet their demands, said the wage scale would remain the same as on January 1 and as for shorter hours and better conditions he said he would do his best, conceding that board charges and price of van goods were too high. This was considered as no strike settlement, so the strikers were informed that they were fired and were asked to draw their time and leave the camps. The strikers decided then to make strike headquarters in Chapleau, where the only representative of law and order in the immediate unorganized district was stationed permanently, namely, the district provincial police officer, P. Boland. The strikers were advised by me, as picket captain, to conduct themselves as respectable citizens, to break none of the laws and to use no force in an attempt to have other workers join our cause, other than merely explaining the situation and asking them to join us. This has been the system of picketing to date, and as a result not one man, to my knowledge, has been arrested because of his strike activities. Approximately four hundred men came out on strike. Approximately one hundred remained in the camps as camp foremen, clerks, scalers, some teamsters and personal friends of the staff who were working in the camps.

In the thirty mile walk from the camps to the Canadian Pacific railroad at Nicholson Siding the men suffered hardship of cold and some walking through the night, but all arrived at the bunkhouse at the siding which was thrown open to us by the provincial police as shelter. The police were fair in assuming a neutral position and also made arrangements to have our baggage safely transferred from headquarters camp to Chapleau. On January 17 about three hundred strikers bought tickets and travelled by train to Chapleau while a number walked the 22 miles in order to save the 85 cents for food when arrived in Chapleau. Several men remained at Nicholson Siding as a picket guard to explain the situation to any strike breakers that might be shipped in, but these men were forced to leave the siding owing to Nicholson enforcing a "no trespassing" order.

In Chapleau the strikers shared their meagre funds with each other, as the majority of them were figured out "in the hole" by the camp clerks. Also assistance in the way of cash came in from affiliated union organizations in Sudbury, Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie, Timmins, Toronto, and other centres where bushmen, miners and industrial workers were in sympathy with our clean fight for a living wage, shorter hours and sanitary living conditions. In these centres the workers established picket lines to page the employment offices and notify anyone hiring for jobs with Austin and Nicholson of the strike conditions that existed here. The strike received publicity in all the chief newspapers in Sudbury, Ottawa, Toronto and other centres.

We sent a deputation to the town council of Chapleau to explain our position in the municipality, as an organized body of citizens coming in from the unorganized districts in the vicinity in order to arrange for settlement of an industrial dispute or strike. We explained that as an organized body we were in a position to care for ourselves, keep order among our members and respect the rights of the citizens of the municipality. The town fathers offered us their cooperation on behalf of Chapleau, and we arranged to get the use of the municipal hall for a meeting place on January 18 in order to get all the strikers together from all the camps for the first time, and discuss the situation and grievances in order to draw up a formal list of demands to be presented to G. B. Nicholson, the president of the firm of Austin and Nicholson Company.

The meeting was held on the 18th under the direction of the strike committee, and the town council and the provincial police were invited to be present, which they were. The meeting was orderly and everyone had a hearing.

On January 19, as a result, the following list of demands were drawn up in printed form, with two copies:

I shall not read the whole list of demands because I believe the committee is aware of these. They have been published in most of the daily papers, particularly those published in Ontario. Any hon. member will see that the demands were practical and since this time most of them have been met. The letter continues on page 11 as follows:

17. Van goods to be sold at retail prices and bill to be issued at time of buying, and list of prices to be posted in office.

18. A balance statement to be issued at the end of every month and money if required.

19. All men should have full settlement at the camp which they work.

20. The Board of Health Act of Ontario pertaining to lumber camps must be strictly enforced. Law to be posted in camp.

21. Every man to get disinfected clean blankets on his arrival in camp.

22. Wash-house, bathroom, drying room to be erected immediately.

23. Single steel beds with mattress must replace wooden bunks.

24. Toilet soap and mirrors to be supplied.

25. Towels to be washed every day. One towel for every ten men.

26. Floors to be scrubbed twice a week.

27. These provisions to apply to all camps.

28. A transient camp to be built at Rehal's camp.

29. The men in camps must have rights to have camp committees, hold meetings, elect officers and see foreman regarding any disagreement.

30. No striker to be discriminated against on returning to camp.

This is the list of the demands made by the strikers in that particular section of the country but it is typical of the demands made in the remainder of northern Ontario and in Quebec. The letter continues:

This list of demands was handed to G. B. Nicholson on January 20 by myself together with two fellow strikers, Fred Wright and J. St. Micheal in the presence of two provincial police. Nicholson told us he would give us his reply via provincial police at two p.m. that afternoon. At three p.m. the strikers assembled in the hall and considered Nicholson's declaration. He said, according to script transferred by him, that the wages would remain as on January 1 and that his camps would continue to be run in a clean and satisfactory manner as had always been their practice, at least this was the gist of it. Needles to say the assembled strikers voted unanimously to reject Nicholson's proposal as a strike settlement, as we considered it an insult to our intelligence. We decided to carry on the strike.

Nicholson was furious and called a meeting (public) in the town hall on January 22 where he reviled the town council for assisting a "soviet led group of people," as such he slanderously referred to we strikers in breaking down his ultra-honest business, and made personal remarks which he was forced to retract later in the press. His meeting was not an orderly one and instead of gaining public sympathy, the tendency was to destroy what little he had previously. It was merely a publicity stunt for his own publication in the press.

At this time Nicholson was resorting to despicable methods to break our strike. Men were forced off relief in outside centres of Ontario and shipped to Nicholson, being told the strike was settled. One of these men, Albert Viauzin of Blind River, told me personally of these conditions. Also a number of men from Gracefield, in the province of Quebec, were shipped in as strikebreakers under a heavy guard of C.P.R. and provincial police. This, in my mind, is forced labour and synonymous with slavery, against which our ancestors fought and bled, and now it is here again in the year of 1934. The camps were filled by false pretences and force, and thereby our jobs were taken from us.

By January 24, our funds were depleted to such an extent that we were unable to buy sufficient food supplies to furnish the two feed camps, which we had established to feed our men en masse, two meals a day. As a result we made application to T. H. Wolfe, District Relief Officer, for relief in the matter of food, clothing and shelter, which we claimed to be entitled to, as respectable citizens of Ontario, who had helped to build up the relief funds from which we wished to draw. On January 25 we made formal application and declared destitute in a registration the number of 251 men. The wage scale notice which accompanies this letter was posted and some fifty-three men went back to the camp under the same old conditions, but this did not break the strike. On the 1st of February there appeared a notice in the "Chapleau Post" that we remaining strikers had been finally dismissed, and our names struck from the books of Austin and Nicholson, and that our places had been filled.

Up to this time relief had been refused by the district relief officer on the grounds that there were still our old jobs open to us in the camps. On February 5th outside union assistance failed entirely and we were faced with starvation, so once again we approached the relief officer and he informed us that he had written the department in Toronto stating that we were no longer in the vicinity and that was the information they had to go by in Toronto, but I was able to inform Mr. Wolfe that I had taken a precaution against this by sending the Hon. Charles McCrea, representative of Sudbury district, the information by telegram on February 2nd that two hundred men were still on strike in Chapleau, destitute and forced to seek relief owing to their jobs being taken by strikebreakers shipped in from Quebec and that they had my information in Toronto to counteract his. He had sent in his report without consulting us, the principals, and his report was erroneous so we asked him to send in a true report and obtain the relief to which we were entitled and which, in the face of starvation, was so sorely needed. Mr. Wolfe's voice failed him so that he was unable to phone the proper authorities. The sergeant of the provincial police took up our case in conjunction with the mayor of Chapleau, and as a result we were able to secure enough emergency supplies to carry us till the next day. On the following day, February 6, Mr. Wolfe, the relief officer, was confined to bed and we were faced with a worse situation than before, for the relief officer could not be seen. Therefore I deemed it expedient to send the following telegram to Hon. Charles McCrea, to the Minister of Labour and also the Minister of Lands and Forests: "Bushmen still destitute in Chapleau. Situation critical. Relief formally applied for several days ago. No action. District Relief Officer T. H. Wolfe sick abed to-day. Who is responsible? Reply at once." The following reply came back from Dr. Robb, February 7, 1934: "Relief officer Mr. Wolfe will handle your situation."

On presenting this telegram to Mr. Wolfe at his bedside he stated that anything he might do would relieve the situation till the next morning only. He asked me to leave the town at once, and stated that if the strikers broke down the organization he would deal with them individually and have them come in to him one by one. My reply was that I had been elected by the men to present their case for relief on their behalf, and that our intentions were to remain organized for the mutual benefit of all concerned. Since then Mr. Wolfe has remained confined to the house, and the provincial police have been handling the relief situation and procuring supplies for us, quite to the satisfaction of all of us. Mayor Edwards, on being approached as to whether the relief officer had any authority to ask me to leave town, stated that Mr. Wolfe had no authority to make the request, and the town council said they appreciated the value of our organized efforts in preventing trouble and extended to me their hearty cooperation and the freedom of the town. The provincial police came in on this strike, prepared to fight, but remained to play, so to speak, and they also appreciate the value of organized unity. As citizens we recognize the rights of others and only expect that our similar rights be respected in turn. The Minister of Lands and Forests asked to be advised of the number of men who desired to go to board camps, so we held another meeting and took a census of 130 destitute strikers, who all wished to remain in Chapleau as a unit, to press their claim to the proper government authorities in Toronto and Ottawa for a full investigation into the present existing conditions in the lumber camps, and also investigate discrepancies in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money for relief in the unorganized districts in the vicinity of Chapleau. The men appointed me, by election, at the meeting, to present the case on their behalf to the proper official authorities. The following telegram was therefore sent to Mr. Finlayson, the Minister of Lands and Forests, in reply to his, February 7, 1934: "Your wire received. Mr. Wolfe states that anything he might do will relieve situation until to-morrow morning only. Approximately one hundred and thirty men destitute and willing to work for relief here until strike settled, but require immediate and impartial inquiry into industrial dispute here. The situation is extremely critical to-night. Wire advice." The same wire was also sent to the Minister of Labour, Toronto, on that day, February 7, when the affair was also laid before the federal Minister of Labour, as you have confirmed. Our meeting was no communist affair, as some people in town have been led to believe, for there were two or three provincial police present at the meeting who were quite prepared to handle any eventuality of that sort. We are a lumber workers' organization. Nicholson says that our funds are backed from Moscow but we haven't seen any "Moscow gold" as yet nor do we expect to require it.

G. B. Nicholson made the statement from the public platform on the occasion of his meeting here on January 22nd that his camps conformed to the relief standards as to sanitary conditions. That is one point to be settled before the investigation committee which we require here, as to whether Nicholson's camps are relief camps or lumber camps. If the operation of the Austin & Nicholson Lumber Company is being assisted from the relief funds of the province and dominion, well it is a scandalous misuse of the taxpayers' money which will precipitate one of the biggest investigations in the north country. The district sanitary inspector, D. S. McKee of Sudbury made an aeroplane trip into the camps in the company of G. B. Nicholson, on a tour of inspection, after the strikers had left the camps. Consequently there appeared in the press an account of McKee's report as to sanitary conditions in the camps. This report I brand as false and have endeavoured to have the Ottawa Citizen publish a letter in our defence, for we made no unjustified complaints as to existing sanitary conditions in the camps.

There are three very good reasons why this Chapleau strike should be a federal issue.

1. G. B. Nicholson represented the lumber men of Canada at the imperial conference in Ottawa last summer, and while there, I believe, a great fuss was made about Great Britain trading with countries that employed slave labour and had uncivilized living conditions. Well, this is the very mess which we have laid on Mr. Nicholson's doorstep here in Chapleau, and we are of the opinion that the cleaning-up should begin here at home.

2. The corrupt method of breaking our lawful strike, by bringing in strikebreakers from the province of Quebec, to take our jobs in Ontario, is surely an interprovincial affair, to be investigated best by the federal government.

3. As a direct result of the unscrupulous methods of strikebreaking used by Mr. Nicholson, we are forced to draw on relief funds which, in our case, I expect are 50 per cent federal and 50 per cent provincial, as we are from an unorganized district.

Those are the reasons, fairly put, why we require an industrial investigation, as provided already in the present session of parliament. The investigation should cover, in this Chapleau district, the lumber camps, sanitary conditions, workmen's compensation for bushmen, and the relief scandal that evidently exists here.

Our men intend to remain here as witnesses on their own behalf for the investigation.

The time is now opportune to draft a clean labour code for the north, and the north is worthy of it, for we are now on the threshhold of unprecedented development of natural resources in this district, as the mineral possibilities here are being probed deeply these days.

The situation here requires an investigation committee that will be able to investigate anything from a member of parliament's collar to the Royal Bank. At any rate, it will disclose present graft and corruption which dissipates the taxpayers' sweat-earned contribution to civilization. It is only fair to our imperial trade relations that such an abject condition here should be wiped out, for Britain has ever been averse to slavery, especially in 1934, when we should be marching onward rather than reverting to customs of the dark ages.

As enclosures herewith are copy of Chapleau Post, Sudbury Star, and a section of "The Toronto Star," which contain articles pertaining to the affair here, also one of the wage posters put out by Nicholson.

Personally, I am a Canadian citizen of British pioneer stock, born, reared and schooled in Bromley township, Renfrew county till January 1, 1927, when I came to the unorganized districts in the vicinity of Chapleau, where I have made my living since as bushman, trackworker, sawmill hand, river driver, trapper and prospector. At present I am a property holder in Sudbury district, as I hold a number of mining claims in the Swayze gold area, near here.

Strikers here want only a living wage and civilized living conditions. It is not our fault that the strike is still on, as we have done everything in our power to reach a settlement long ago. We were forced to seek relief as our jobs were filled by outsiders.

Ellard Connolly.

I believe that the Minister of Labour as well as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. members for the two Renfrews are familiar with the subject matter of this correspondence. On February 5, 1934, I received the following letter from Mr. Connolly, signed by himself:

You are quite at liberty to read any letters or documents which I may send you to any person whom you may desire, and make all possible use of them to your benefit, and have particular request to read the letter mentioned, to the House of Commons.

That will cover the matter so far as that letter is concerned. I have under my hand several other letters dealing with the situation and copies of letters sent to either the Minister of Labour at Ottawa or to the Minister of Lands and Forests at Toronto, or to some members of parliament. I also have some pay-roll lists showing the small amount received by some men after days and sometimes after months of work in certain camps. It is not my intention to read these documents to the house. I have also a copy of a letter sent to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon).

As to the statement made by the hon. member for East Algoma the other day that there was no strike in his district, the Chapleau section, I have in my hand a document emanating from the federal Department of Labour under date of January 19, 1934, and reading:

Re reported strike or lockout of pulpwood cutters employed by sub-jobbers on logging contracts for the firm of Austin-Nicholson, Chapleau district, Ont., commenced on or about January 15, 1934.

This statement was made by the Department of Labour on January 19, only four days after the strike had started in the Chapleau section, so that the statement made the other night by the hon. member cannot stand after the committee has taken cognizance of this document.

In a letter dated March 3, the same Mr. Connolly has this to say about the strikes.

Mr. GORDON: I would like to ask the hon. member who Mr. Connolly is.

Mr. BRADETTE: He is one of the strike leaders in the Chapleau section. He is still at Chapleau leading the strikers who remain there.

Mr. GORDON: I do not want to curtail the spreading on the record of any useful information, but I would like to suggest very respectfully to the hon. member that I am desirous if at all possible that this legislation go through before adjournment for the Easter recess. The seriousness of the situation I shall not dwell upon because I think it is well recognized by all hon. members. If there is any other time during the course of any debate that may arise on some other topic during this session of parliament, I would suggest, with great respect and with a good deal of diffidence, to the hon. member that he might postpone reading this letter until then; the Labour estimates are not through the house yet and it might be done at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister says that he would like to have this legislation go through before we adjourn for the Easter recess. I understood the Speaker to say that the deputy of the Governor General would arrive at five o'clock to assent to such legislation as was in readiness. It is now five minutes to five o'clock so that it is obviously quite impossible for this legislation to be assented to then. May I point out to the minister that so far as this side of the house is concerned there has been no delaying of the progress of the legislation; as a matter of fact we have been seeking to expedite it?

As regards what the minister said about the legislation going through before the Easter recess, I should like to point out that on two previous occasions relief measures expired some weeks before the new legislation came into force and the government, nothwithstanding that fact, found it possible to meet any obligations that arose. I would assume they would have the same power at the present moment, so there should be no reason why anyone should be embarrassed through a delay for which the opposition has certainly not been responsible. I have in my hand, for example, a memorandum which relates to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, passed in the session of 1931. That act expired on March 1, 1932, and the relief legislation that followed did not receive the royal assent until April 4. As a matter of fact, the government introduced the resolution to renew this legislation under the title of The Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, on February 26, 1932. Nothing further was done until March, although the previous act expired on March 1. The following is the memorandum with regard to the dates:

	1932
Consideration of resolution in committee deferred to..	March 8
(Resolution debated March 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23.)
(House of Commons adjourned for Easter..	March 23)
(House of Commons reassembled..	March 29)
Resolution adopted in committee, reported, read second time, and concurred in—under closure.. ..	March 29
First reading, Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932..	March 29
Second reading..	March 30
(Considered in committee of whole, March 30, 31.)
Third reading..	April 1
Royal Assent..	April 4

So that over a month elapsed between the expiry of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and royal assent of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

In regard to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, that expired on May 1, 1932, but it was not until May 13, that royal assent was given to the legislation making provision for relief subsequently to the expiration of that act. May I just give the record there?

	1932
Introduction of resolution to renew legislation (under title "Relief Act, 1932")..	April 26
(Resolution debated in committee April 28, May 3.)
Resolution adopted in committee, reported, read second time, and concurred in..	May 4
First reading, Relief Act, 1932.. ..	May 4
Second reading..	May 9
(Considered in committee of the whole, May 9, 11.)
Third reading..	May 12
Royal assent..	May 13

Therefore thirteen days elapsed between the expiry of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, and royal assent of the Relief Act, 1932. The minister must not try to have the committee believe that any interest in regard to the unemployed is going to be prejudiced as a result of the delay over the Easter recess, and certainly if such were to be the case the minister would be wholly responsible for not having introduced the legislation until Thursday of last week, expecting it to be passed without any discussion whatever. I repeat that it is at five o'clock that the deputy of the Governor General is to come to parliament.

Mr. GORDON: I do not want to appear to be trying to place blame or anything of that character upon the opposition or upon any hon. member; I make just the plain statement that on March 31 any right that this government has to continue relief or, rather, to supplement the efforts of those primarily responsible for relief, ceases; and if there is a hiatus, it will result in at least a good deal of confusion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I make the same statement now which I made on Thursday night, that such would be the case and notwithstanding the fact that I made that statement then, the ministry have gone on with other measures in the interval; they have not given the relief measure the right of way. They introduced supplementary estimates. The Prime Minister brought in the marketing legislation and we had a discussion on that. There have also been several other discussions. If the ministry were seeking to avoid any embarrassment, certainly those other measures should not have been permitted to interfere in view of the statement I made pointing out to the house just what the minister is admitting now, so the responsibility for any delay rests wholly and solely upon the minister and the government. Certainly, when the government have had from the time parliament assembled until this moment to deal with this matter, it is very singular that they should have introduced the legislation only on Thursday last. If the minister will look at Hansard he will see that the Prime Minister took good care to put on his shoulders the blame for the legislation not being proceeded with a week or two sooner than it was. I was rather surprised when I read the statement that it was made so obvious that it was because the minister was not in his seat we could not go on with the measure. When the minister seeks to have it appear that somebody else is responsible for the delay, the statement of the Prime Minister should be brought to his attention.

Mr. GORDON: I should like to make just a short statement, and to repeat that so far as the right to grant relief or to help the provinces is concerned that right expires on March 31. I believe that measures have been put through in other countries, much more comprehensive than this measure is so far as their effect on the treasury was concerned, in the space of an hour or two. I am frank to confess that I think ample time has been given for any necessary discussion of this bill since its introduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been very little time given; as a matter of fact the minister has not given us the information for which we asked in connection with many matters. The minister knows that when the legislation leaves this house it has to pass the Senate, and the Senate has finished its business for this term.

Mr. GORDON: The Senate has been sitting this afternoon, awaiting this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: According to the announcement made this afternoon the deputy of the Governor General was to give the royal assent at five o'clock, and when the deputy arrives to give the consent the business of the Senate is concluded. This measure is not through the committee stage as yet. Third reading can be granted only by unanimous consent of the house, and certainly we do not propose to allow this measure to be rushed through without the information being given that will enable us to say whether or not the legislation should go through. We have some very important amendments to move to this legislation both in committee and on the third reading, and certainly we are not going to be denied that privilege because of any effort the minister may make to stampede the committee.

Mr. GORDON: There is nothing further from my mind than the belief that by any act or word of mine I could stampede this committee into any hurried action on anything. In regard to this legislation and the legislation passed last year, the government must table each day the orders in council passed thereunder. Each act reflected by an order in council under the legislation of last year was laid on the table of the house for the information of hon. members, as the records will show. While parliament was not sitting those orders in council were synopsized and published in the Canada Gazette. It is quite possible that there are other matters upon which argument and comment might very properly be made, but the information asked for since the introduction of this bill was contained, I think in its entirety, in the orders in council which have been either published in the Canada Gazette in a synopsized form or laid upon the table of the house daily for the information of the members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to add to what I have just said that this long delay in introducing this measure this session, resulting in the legislation coming up just before an adjournment of parliament, is part of a deliberate policy on the part of the administration to put off at every session until the last moment any discussion with reference to labour matters. It was the same at the special session of 1930; very little time was given for the discussion of labour matters and all the time was taken up with questions of the tariff and national revenue. In the 1931 session the legislation was brought down in the very closing days of the session. It was the same during the following session; if one looks at the records I cited the other night it will be found that the deliberate attempt of the government with respect to this question of unemployment has been to delay until the last moment and then to try to crowd the legislation through because of some adjournment or because of prorogation. I think the minister will find that in 1934 he can do all that he did in 1932, with respect to these matters, notwithstanding that an adjournment may intervene. I think he will find himself able to do all that is necessary in the matter of meeting the situation.

Mr. GORDON: Would the right hon. gentleman suggest that the government could go ahead and authorize the expenditure of public money without statutory authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not making any suggestions whatever; I am citing what the ministry have done before and what they know they are in a position to do to-day. They have their majority; I suppose they are going to stand or fall by this legislation, and I think they know what are their powers in this regard. The minister stated that he had supplied all the information that was requested. A few moments ago I asked him to give us the total of the guarantees given the banks by the government under these relief measures. We have not been given that information as yet. The minister started to talk about the coal mines of Nova Scotia; then he jumped to the Algoma Steel Corporation, and he has been taking up the time of the committee himself.

Mr. GORDON: I gave to the committee the amount of the guarantee in each case, with the exception of the figures in regard to wheat, which are not determinable by me. It is a simple matter of arithmetic, a sum as they used to call it when I was in public school, to total those figures. However, I have added them up for the right hon. gentleman. The guarantees amount to $96,552,462.87. The loans to the provinces, including $2,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, total $52,927,267, making a grand total of $149,479,730.34.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To which, in estimating liabilities and expenditures, there shoud be added the $110,000,000 that has been actually disbursed in cash under the relief measures?

Mr. GORDON: Quite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister if the total of the guarantees he has given includes the guarantees given the banks in connection with wheat?

Mr. GORDON: No; I made that plain, I thought. It does not include the guarantees given in connection with wheat.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. member for East Algoma has the floor.

Mr. BRADETTE: I had the floor when I was interrupted by the Minister of Labour.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The Minister of Labour was followed by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and I first saw the hon. member for East Algoma.

Mr. BRADETTE: I had the floor when I was interrupted by the Minister of Labour, so when I sat down I did not lose my position in respect to the hon. gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. member has not lost his right to speak again after the hon. member for East Algoma has concluded.

Mr. VALLANCE: Surely, Mr. Chairman, you are not ruling that if the hon. member who has the floor sits down in courtesy to the minister, he thereby loses his right to continue his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): The hon. gentleman had the right to refuse to be interrupted by the minister, but he permitted the minister to interrupt him. He does not lose his right to speak after the hon. member for East Algoma has concluded.

Mr. BRADETTE: Surely the committee will not tolerate such a ruling by the chairman. I had the floor and I resumed my seat out of courtesy to the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who is calling order? Who is asking me to sit down? I should like to see any man come and make me sit down. Out of respect to the minister I sat down when the hon. gentleman addressed a question to me, and that was the only reason I sat down. Otherwise I should have continued my remarks. Surely a member should not lose precedence simply because he is respectful to a minister or to any other hon. member.

Mr. BROWN: If this ruling is sustained, Mr. Chairman, the question will arise as to whether we should treat a minister with any respect whatever. If a member sits down out of courtesy to a minister he should not lose his place.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think there is any need of any untoward incident arising at the moment. As a matter of fact I have no doubt the chairman was under the impression that I was under also, that my hon. friend from North Timiskaming had concluded his remarks for the moment. Inasmuch as my hon. friend has said that he had not concluded his remarks but that he yielded his place and sat down in order to permit the minister to ask him a question, I should think he would have a perfect right to continue for the remainder of his forty minutes. I think there is no doubt about that, and I am sure this whole difficulty has arisen due to a misapprehension on the part of the chairman, and on my own part as well. I think perhaps the simplest course to pursue is to accept the statement of the hon. member for North Timiskaming, and to allow him to conclude his remarks within the forty minute limit.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am perfectly satisfied to give place to the hon. member for North Timiskaming, on the understanding that he completes his original forty minutes, but does not begin on another.

Mr. BRADETTE: If that is the dictum of the hon. member for East Algoma I shall accept it gracefully. I appreciate the opportunity of completing my remarks, and shall say only a few words more.

As has been said, on the estimates for the Department of Labour a further opportunity will be afforded to discuss this matter. I should like to mention one paragraph in a letter from Mr. Connolly dated March 3, 1934, and shall reserve my right to speak again when the estimates for the Department of Labour are under consideration. Speaking about the radical element leading the strike, Mr. Connolly states:

The bushmen were merely assisted by the Lumber Workers Industrial Union in organizing the strike and that union also helped to feed the strikers until February 5, when we went on government relief, and the union then lost any control or respect which they may have had up till that time. To illustrate this may I state that immediately after we were successful in obtaining government relief the district office of the union in Sudbury endeavoured, through their organizer Jim Davis here, to call off the strike and organize a retreat. As Davis had no control over the strikers here—

The name of Jim Davis was mentioned by the hon. member for East Algoma.—

—we told him that the strike was ours and we intended to carry on, as we did not come here to do any retreating and we therefore intended to remain on strike till we had obtained a settlement suitable to ourselves.

That is all I wish to say now. Again I wish to express my appreciation for the courtesy extended to me by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Labour. I shall speak again when they are considering the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is a matter of regret to me, and I apologize to the committee for being forced to do so, to refer to a matter in which my name has been used so frequently. But as the hon. member for North Timiskaming has constituted himself parliamentary representative of the Canadian Labour Defence League, and—

Mr. BRADETTE: I rise to a question of privilege. I did not mention the labour defence league while I was on my feet. Not a single word about that organization was mentioned in my speeches either previously or at the present time. I resent the imputation made by the hon. member.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My reason for making the statement is that the labour defence league, operating under a variety of names, are the people behind the difficulties in the lumber operations in northern Ontario. This is a statement which is capable of proof. Speaking on March 12 the hon. member for North Timiskaming made a very radical and drastic statement with regard to conditions in the lumber camps. He told the house that he knew the conditions from his own knowledge, and that he had visited the camps.

Mr. BRADETTE: I never said I had visited the camps at Chapleau.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. SPOTTON: You are always talking.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I repeat that in almost two columns of pages 1415 and 1416 of Hansard the hon. member referred to the Chapleau strike, as he called it. Because on two or three occasions the hon. member has denied his statements, and particularly the statement that he had visited the camps I shall take this opportunity to quote his words as they appear in Hansard. To begin with, he said:

With reference to the minister's allusions on February 26, to the effect that some of the leaders in the Chapleau strike were radicals. . . .

And so on. Later he stated:

. . . . these lumbering camps in northern Ontario. Talk of sweatshops and of people being underpaid.

Then, at the bottom of the second column of page 1415 he made this statement:

Some hon. members may object,—

That was in reference to the reading of a nineteen page letter.

—but these men have been suffering. They do not know just where to find a solution for their problem. It is stated in this letter that certain camps are absolutely filthy and not fit for human habitation.

Then, referring to himself, the hon. member said:

I know that no hon. member would live in them for even half a day.

How does he know?

Mr. BRADETTE: By the letter; the hon. member just mentioned it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member knows it of his own knowledge, because of these letters. Then he continued all down the column in his references to the conditions at Chapleau.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend The Fisheries Act, 1932.

An Act to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the Corporation of the City of Ottawa.

An Act respecting the appointment of Auditors for National Railways.

An Act to amend the Technical Education Act.

An Act to ratify and confirm the agreement respecting the joint use by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of certain tracks and premises of His Majesty at Saint John, N.B.

An Act to ratify and confirm an agreement made between The Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company and The Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.

An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Company.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1934.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1935.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.—Mr. Gordon.—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 2—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just before hon. members were summoned to the senate I was referring to the statements which had been made on March 12 by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). I had pointed out that in his statement which covers two columns of Hansard on pages 1415 and 1416 the hon. member had discussed nothing else but the strike in the Chapleau district. He denies that he had visited these camps, but I should like to quote his remarks as follows:

> Last fall I visited some of these lumbering camps. I found some of them to be all right but others were not. In certain camps a human being should not be allowed to live much less to sleep. There seemed to be no attempt at cleanliness, in fact, filthiness seemed to reign supreme. These camps I refer to are not in my riding—

I should like to ask the hon. member what camps are there in northern Ontario at which labour troubles have occurred this year except those in his own riding? There is no camp in northern Ontario at which labour troubles have occurred except the camps in the Chapleau area and perhaps some at the head of the lakes.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege. My statement which appears in the last paragraph of the first column of page 1416 of Hansard reads:

> Last fall I visited some of these lumbering camps.

At that time the strikes were wholly in my riding and in northern Quebec, there was no strike in the Chapleau district. The hon. member is not right in trying to infer that I visited camps in his section.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member was speaking on March 12 and he was referring to these camps in the Chapleau area.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, on a question of personal privilege; the hon. member is not going to put words in my mouth which I did not say. I said that last fall there was no strike in the Chapleau district.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the hon. member would only listen for a moment; I am referring to what he said on March 12.

Mr. BRADETTE: So am I.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am referring to the statement which commences in the second column of page 1415 of Hansard and continues to the bottom of the first column on page 1416. The hon. member was referring to the Chapleau area from beginning to end of his remarks and he stated he had visited these camps.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, again on a question of personal privilege. The hon. member is not going to put anything over on me. I stated that last fall the strikes were in my own section and in northern Quebec, while the new strike took place in the month of January. Is January in the fall or winter? Surely the hon. member has enough intelligence to know the difference between the two seasons.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I challenge the hon. member to show me one word in Hansard of March 12 which refers to a strike in a district other than Chapleau.

Mr. BRADETTE: I mentioned strikes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOUCHARD: He challenged him.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I challenge the hon. member—

Mr. BRADETTE: On a question of personal privilege; I stated in the last paragraph of the first column of page 1416 that last fall—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): I cannot see any question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRADETTE: Certainly there is.

Mr. BOUCHARD: He was challenged to answer.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member is trying to put words in my mouth and insinuate that I am wrong.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member is quoting Hansard.

Mr. BRADETTE: He is quoting it his own way and not in the proper manner.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member should wait until the hon. member for East Algoma is finished before giving his answer.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not going to waste any more time. As I stated on Monday evening, I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt. At that time I stated he was doing one of two things, he was making a statement about something as to which he knew absolutely nothing or he was deliberately misrepresenting facts. I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and say that in his loose-lipped manner he is talking about things as to which he knows nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want those words withdrawn by the hon. member.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now, sir,—

Mr. BRADETTE: On a question of personal privilege; I want those words withdrawn. I can speak just as nicely as can my hon. friend and I want him to withdraw those words.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me go on—

Mr. BOUCHARD: Withdraw.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member must withdraw those words.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will withdraw anything to satisfy the constituted or self-constituted representative of the Canadian Labour Defence League and the Workers' Unity League in northern Ontario.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want the hon. member to withdraw that. I am not the self-constituted representative of the Canadian Labour Defence League of Canada; I am the constituted representative of the people in the riding of North Timiskaming. I want the hon. member to withdraw that statement. He has no right to insinuate that I am the representative of an organization of which I know absolutely nothing, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member is willing to take up the time of this committee in reading documents written by the paid representatives of the Canadian Labour Defence League.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will have to withdraw those utterances.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I understood that I had the floor and I am not going to allow the hon. member to prevent me from speaking.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am speaking to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) should realize that there are other members of the committee besides himself. This should not be a duel or vendetta between himself and the hon. member. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has the floor. The hon. member for North Timiskaming took the better part of half an hour to make his remarks and he was not interrupted by the hon. member for East Algoma. Surely he can wait his turn to make a reply and not rise up every half second on a question of personal privilege which may or may not be a question of personal privilege. We never could proceed with the work of the committee if we adopted such debate rules as these. I will admit that the hon. member for East Algoma would have better left unsaid some of the things which he has said and that on occasion it might be quite proper for the hon. member to rise to a question of personal privilege, but he should not keep jumping up and down like a jack-in-the-box simply because he does not agree with the interpretation placed upon his remarks by the hon. member for East Algoma. He will have a full opportunity to make a reply.

Mr. BRADETTE: I always appreciate the judgment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) but surely I do not have to stand for an hon. member stating that I am the self-constituted representative of the Canadian Labour Defence League. That is not a fair statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The hon. member for East Algoma has the floor.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will again give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and say that if he is not the constituted representative of the Canadian Labour Defence League and the Workers' Unity League in northern Ontario, he has used the time of this committee to read documents which were handed or sent to him by the paid agents of those associations.

Mr. NEILL: I heard the hon. member himself read one the other day; he read one from the Unity league, from a man named Davis.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I may read one to-day and when I do I will tell the committee just who Davis is. However, having failed in the impression which he has tried to convey to this house and to the country at large—and the newspapers commented on the fact that the hon. member for North Timiskaming had been in the camps in the Chapleau area, and I have read Hansard myself—what does the hon. gentleman do? He reads a series of documents written by a paid agent of the labour defence league, which operates under divers names in northern Ontario, these documents bearing the name of a man named Connolly whom I have known for years. His signature appears on these documents, or is authorized to appear thereon, and this man Connolly boasts openly that he is being paid $4 a day with expenses for doing the work he is now engaged in. I can prove that he so boasts. When his fellow workers were going back to the woods, after having been brought out under false pretences by six communists who went to get them, Connolly stated to his fellow workers, "Why should I worry? Why should I go back to the woods when I am getting $4 a day for what I am doing?" If my hon. friend will go to the bottom of this matter he will find that it is just these communist organizations that are endeavouring to ensnare and entrap honest Canadian workmen. I will say frankly that Connolly was an honest working man, a good type of Canadian citizen without question, as are all the other men working there; but the fact is that they have allowed themselves to be led into this trap.

Let me mention one other matter to which my hon. friend refers. The letter which he read made the statement that Nicholson was a member of the lumbermen's committee at the Ottawa conference. Well, I admit the accusation; I was a member of that committee, it having been my honour to have been selected as chairman. And let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that it was because of the effort made by that committee, and the success it achieved, with the support of this government, in getting Canadian lumber into the United Kingdom market that this attack is made on the industry not only in northern Ontario but as well in northwestern Quebec.

There has been organized in northern Ontario a group of Canadians, honest, earnest Canadian citizens of all nationalities, known as the Canadian Bushmen's Union. They are registered under the Trade Unions Act. In this regard, I wish to repeat what I said on a previous occasion. So far as I am concerned, I will do everything which it is humanly possible for any man to do, and to-day I am actively engaged, with other Canadian lumbermen, in an effort to bring about a condition whereby woodsmen operating in the Canadian provinces will be drawn together in a regularly constituted body of organized labour in which collective bargaining will be possible. It is not possible under present circumstances, and if my hon. friend will only survey conditions in his own riding he will realize that fact. Now what do these bushmen say? Writing to the Minister of Labour they make this statement:

> Press dispatches state that you informed the House of Commons on Friday last, the strike at Chapleau, Ontario, had been organized by the Canadian Labour Defence League according to information in your department. Another dispatch from Toronto quotes Rev. A. E. Smith as stating you were in error in making this claim. Rev. Smith claims that: "The league had nothing to do with that strike except to defend those who may be arrested."

Well, the defence of one arrested was not successful because he is back in gaol, out of which he broke in order to participate in these labour difficulties. The letter goes on:

> This organization, the Canadian Bushmen's Union, registered under the Trade Unions Act, wishes to emphatically endorse the statement you made.
> As the result of intense communistic activities in the timber industry, and the endless upheavals causing heavy losses to the workers as well as subjecting them to constant agitation, the Canadian-minded workers determined to organize on the same basis as other Canadian labour unions. Close to six hundred men have joined the movement, which started the latter part of December.
>
> We have plenty of evidence that the Canadian Labour Defence League is part and parcel of the general communistic move in Canada,—

Everyone who has endeavoured to ascertain the facts knows this to be true.

> —which includes eighteen or more organizations. I have just received information that if the Conviction of Rev. Smith should result in the C.L.D.L. being outlawed, that the United Labour Farmers' Temple Association will immediately take over the activities of the C.L.D.L.

And so on. This organization makes other statements. It has been checking up on the labour defence league all through.

Over a period of years the timber and other basic industries and their labour have been harassed and penalized by the intolerant boorish and fanatical agitation of foreign semi-political organizations. And all business, and labour dependent more or less on the industries affected, have suffered severe losses.

They realize that by reason of the fact that the labour difficulty in the Port Arthur district compelled pulpwood purchasers for the United States to go elsewhere for their products, between fifteen hundred and two thousand men were idle in that district this winter—men who otherwise would have been at work. The whole thing is a carefully planned scheme to prevent the forest products industry from continuing in successful operation in Canada. That is the whole point.

There are one or two other matters which I would refer to. My hon. friend, in reading from that letter which we have heard, took responsibility for it, and the letter stated that the operations in the Chapleau area were being assisted by relief funds. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that that statement is subject to one of two interpretations: Either it is a statement made without any knowledge whatever of the facts, or there was deliberate intention to mislead this committee and this country. No such thing has ever existed. The same applies to what I referred to on Monday night with regard to reduction on crown dues. No reduction was made on crown dues after these lumber difficulties occurred. It was agreed last year with the operators, the pulpwood companies and everyone else in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia that as a means of getting men back into the woods a reduction would be made in crown dues and stumpage. Every contract that was made either for logs or for pulpwood was based on that understanding, the increment arising from the reduction in dues being payable to the contracting firm or company, and the contractor having nothing to do with it. The question of wages was not included.

My hon. friend poses as an advocate of fair play and decent wages for woodsmen. He made the statement, in reading, that wages in these camps were from $15 to $26 per month. I say to this committee that the minimum wage paid in any one of these camps was $26 per month and up. The system of piece work has been followed in the lumbering industry of this country ever since I have known anything about it, because the men want piece work; they want an opportunity of working when they are in the woods and of deriving the advantage arising therefrom. I can say that there are men who are earning $100 a month and board on piece work.

My hon. friend makes another statement. He says that G. B. Nicholson went to Toronto, when this difficulty occurred, to interview the attorney general and the head of the provincial police. I say to him again that that is another statement either based on lack of knowledge or made with intent to deceive. G. B. Nicholson did nothing of the kind. He was in Toronto on a business trip when he received the telegram that some of the men were coming out of the woods. As I stated on Monday night, he immediately returned to his office in Chapleau and went into the woods to see what the difficulty was. My hon. friend stated that 400 men came out of those camps. I state to him now that 400 men did not come out of the camps. There were 561 men in the eight camps affected and 228 came out, leaving 333 in the camps.

The statement is again made that men were put into those camps under a heavy police guard. As occurs in every case in this province, in Iroquois Falls, Cochrane, Smooth Rock Falls and Kapuskasing, as soon as trouble develops wherever it may happen, the authorities take the precaution, on the request of the local police, to get some men in to see that peace is maintained. That is all there is to that. The men went through of their own volition; they were going all the time. Let me repeat what I said before: This trouble did not begin in January; it was not a strike in any sense whatever; it was just a continuation of men being agitated, disturbed and persuaded on a variety of pleas to leave their employment.

As regards the men who caused the trouble, my hon. friend says that they were not communists. Well, they demonstrated the fact that they were not very honest men in the first instance by going to an employment agent and hiring as pulpwood cutters, whereas not one of them, as they admitted, had ever cut a stick in his life before. Six of them hired under these names: McMaster, Riley, alias Davis, alias Dacko, operating on the Transcontinental line in the Kapuskasing district under the last name; Doyle, alias Berry—and both of them ex-convicts sent there by the people financing Vapaus, the communist organ in the city of Sudbury—Menekin and Makela.

My hon. friend says that employees of Austin-Nicholson or Brownlee presented a demand for a change in conditions and an increase in wages. No employee of Austin-

Nicholson ever presented a demand or a request for any changed conditions whatever until exactly one week from the day the men were induced to come out at Chapleau, three of them, Wright, Connolly and St. Michel, came to see me. I saw them, talked with them and stated exactly what we would do; I said: "There are the conditions; if you want to work, you are quite welcome." We kept the offer open for three long weeks and the 128 of the 228, leaving 100 all told—and a large number of them had gone to their homes in the meantime—went back to their work inside of ten days, glad to get the opportunity. They came to my house on the Monday evening, asking me how they could get on the train and out to their work without being molested by this communist organization. I undertook to look after them and they went back to work.

My hon. friend says that these men were destitute. Let me tell the committee exactly how destitute they were. Of the 228 that came out, 142 took settlements from the clerks in the camps and there was distributed amongst them in cash the sum of $6,000 odd for the time that they had worked in the woods. Forty of them never went near the camps before they came out. They were advised by Messrs. Davis, Dacko, etcetera, etcetera: Do not take your time; just leave what is coming to you there, and they walked out, some of them leaving their clothes behind them, under a promise that they would be paid $5 a day if they remained out in order to do what? Just as Mr. Berry, who is now in gaol, stated publicly in the town of Chapleau, their purpose was to destroy this industry and to make it impossible to carry it on.

It is approaching six o'clock. I do not know that I can add anything else except to say that as regards the men who came out, leaving their time behind them, there was still $3,000 due to them which was sent to them just as soon as we were able to find out where they were. My hon. friend says that there are still 200 strikers in Chapleau. He can send anyone there he likes and he cannot find amongst them ten men who have ever worked in those camps in their lives.

Let me in conclusion make this observation with regard to the letters. I have under my hand similar letters and I know the man who is writing them. Because of the sympathy I have for the poor fellow's family I am not going to say who he is although I may be forced to do so if my hon. friend continues the campaign he has undertaken to wage against me and the organization I happen to represent. The letters are being written by a man who is being paid to write them and he is being paid by the communist organ known as Vapaus published at Sudbury. That covers part of the situation. I could spend the whole night reading documents that I have under my hand, to prove just what the situation is.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order, until Monday, April 9.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to file parliamentary return reference No. 68, moved by Mr. Denis, correspondence with respect to George C. Vaudrin, as to the means taken to solve the crisis of unemployment. I have already tabled correspondence with myself. This comprises the final return, being a copy of letters sent to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon).

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53 to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEVENS: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there are two amendments, one is in regard to grading, involving the question of the grading of Garnet wheat, separately. The other is merely an adjustment of the eastern terminal elevator receipts to bring them into conformity with modern practice.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the minister if this bill will be referred to the committee on agriculture?

Mr. STEVENS: I presume so; it has in the past. There is no reason it should not be.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54 to amend the Income War Tax Act (special tax).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for a special income tax of ten per cent on the salaries of the members of the judiciary, the commissioned officers of the military, the naval and air forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE

SALARY DEDUCTION ACT—RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT CUT TO EMPLOYEES RECEIVING $1,000 OR LESS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55 to amend the Salary Deduction Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that there shall be no deductions of the salaries, pay or compensation of any employee of the public service up to and including the sum of $1,000. That range takes in a very large number of employees of the public service. As nearly as we can ascertain some eighteen thousand in number will be affected, including revenue postmasters, part time collectors of customs, lighthouse keepers, wharfingers, charwomen, seasonal or part time labourers, lockmen and bridgemen on the canals. Those in receipt of salaries above the sum of $1,000 will be subject to the same deduction as hitherto.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EMPLOYMENT OF ENTOMOLOGISTS

Mr. BOUCHARD:

1. (a) How many entomologists, assistant and sub-assistant entomologists were employed in the federal government laboratories during the year 1933; (b) how many investigators; (c) how many temporary employees; (d) how many agricultural students in categories (a); (b) and (c)?

2. What was the distribution of categories (a); (b); (c) as regards the different provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

RADIO BROADCASTING—TOTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

What was the total expenditure in connection with the Canadian Radio Commission for the last twelve months, ending March 1, 1934, as follows: (a) salary to each commissioner; (b) travelling and other allowances to each commissioner; (c) office help; (d) inspection and field work; (e) broadcasters, acquiring and improving stations; (f) other expenditures in detail?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, this question was previously asked by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). It was suggested that it was not desirable in the public interest that the question should be asked in the form in which it appears, and that with the radio committee sitting every possible opportunity is afforded to secure such information without resorting to the form of question and answer. I think it would be injurious to the efficiency of the commission if it were to be subjected to this form of inquisition at every session of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should have to attend the sittings of the committee every day in order to get the information.

Question dropped.

THREE THOUSAND FAMILY SETTLEMENT SCHEME

Mr. SMOKE:

With regard to the three thousand families settlement scheme:

1. What was the original number of families settled, in each province, and if the information is available, in each district?

2. What was the original total expenditure in this matter?

3. What was the original average expenditure per family?

4. What number of families are now remaining in the scheme?

5. What has been the total amount of loss on account of families leaving the scheme?

6. As regards families remaining in the scheme: (a) what was the original expenditure; (b) what amount is still due; (c) of the difference between original expenditure and amount still due, what amount, if any, has been written off as loss; (d) are any further losses anticipated, and will any further writing off be done?

Mr. GORDON:

(Soldier Settlement of Canada)

1. Families established on the land:

British Columbia	280
Calgary	373
Edmonton	482
Total for Alberta	855
Saskatchewan	623
Manitoba	301
Ontario	205
Quebec	56
Maritime Provinces	348
	2,668

2. Total loans excluding interest		$12,393,359 55
3. Original average expenditure per family		4,645 19

MEADOWVILLE, PICTOU COUNTY, N.S., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. URQUHART:

1. When was the mail contract last awarded for rural mail route, Meadowville No. 2, county of Pictou?

2. To whom was the contract awarded, and at what figure?

3. Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. On the 4th of April, 1933.

2. Sanford R. Cameron at $590 par annum.

3.

James Blackie, Meadowville	$445 00
Sanford R. Cameron, Meadowville No. 3	590 00
Peter Cotter, Meadowville Stn.	700 00
Robert R. Sutherland, No. 1 R.R.	720 00
Burton Murray, West Branch River John	744 00
Lee Ray Clark, Meadowville	785 00
J. W. Matheson, Meadowville	799 00

Mr. James Blackie being a minor, the department could not enter into a contract with him.

DENMARK, COLCHESTER COUNTY, N.S., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. URQUHART:

1. What are the names of the parties who tendered for the mail contract for Denmark No. 2, rural mail route, Colchester county, when last contract was awarded?

2. What was the amount of each tender?

3. To whom was the contract awarded and when does said contract expire?

Warner Forbes, Denmark. 499 00
Harry E. Sarson, Denmark. 599 00

3. Warner Forbes, at $425 per annum.
Contract will expire on the 31st March, 1937.

RIVER JOHN, PICTOU COUNTY, N.S., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. URQUHART:

1. When was the mail contract last awarded for rural mail route No. 2, river John, Pictou county?

2. To whom was the contract awarded, and at what figure?

3. Who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. On the 19th June, 1931.

2. Charles H. Bigney at $498 per annum.

3. Tenders received for a 14 mile route Smith Holt, River John, $500; Charles Harve Bigney, River John, $600; Calvin A. Langille, River John, $618; Ross I. Langille, River John, $625.

An error having been made in the notices inviting tenders, all four tenderers were requested to submit new tenders for a 12 mile route with the following result: Charles H. Bigney, $498; Smith Holt, $500; Calvin A. Langille, $550; Ross I. Langille, $625.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. COTNAM:

What was the total cost of old age pensions to the federal government in the constituency of North Renfrew for the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, respectively?

Mr. GORDON: Payments made to old age pensioners in North and South Renfrew are not listed separately in the monthly cheque issue register compiled by the Ontario provincial authorities, and submitted to the federal Department of Labour, and it is, therefore, not possible for the department to prepare from the available records an accurate statement of the federal government's share of the cost of such pensions in North Renfrew only. During the month of February, 1934, cheques totalling $12,884.61 were issued to residents of Renfrew county, the cost to the federal government being 75 per cent, or $9,663.46.

The information desired concerning the cost of old age pensions in the constituency of North Renfrew can only be secured from the administrative authority, namely, the provincial government.

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

REPORT OF INQUIRY CONDUCTED BY HON. DONALD SUTHERLAND

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex) moved:

For a copy of the report of Hon. Donald Sutherland on the tobacco inquiry made in 1933.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In view of the observations that have been made as to the public interest being safeguarded by the production of reports made under the Combines Investigation Act the motion will be accepted by the government, and I now produce and table the report in question. It is in part the report made under the Combines Investigation Act by the registrar to the Minister of Labour, dated March 4, 1933, and attached to that report of the registrar is the report of Mr. Sutherland. The report of Mr. Sutherland was not made pursuant to an appointment under order in council as was suggested the other day, because in looking into the matter I find he was appointed under another section of the act, but his compensation was fixed by an order in council, which order in council extended also to the compensation that was to be paid for similar services to various other persons named therein. I produce and table the document the more readily because in certain parts of this country it has been alleged that the report has been kept back because the Prime Minister of the country was largely interested as a shareholder of the Imperial Tobacco Company, and therefore was preventing this action being taken. I avail myself of this opportunity to say to this chamber that I am not either directly or indirectly through the intervention of a trustee or in any other way a shareholder of the Imperial Tobacco Company or any other tobacco company, and so far as I can ascertain never in all my life did I own a single share of that great undertaking.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I was not one of those who either believed or ever heard of the view which the Prime Minister has just expressed as to why the report was not brought down, but I did hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) give very strong reasons last week why the report could not be produced under the Combines Investigation Act. I wonder if the Prime Minister could therefore tell us what circumstances have intervened to make it possible to produce the report now.

Mr. BENNETT: I have said that the Minister of Labour himself indicated to me after looking the matter up, as he did and as I did, that Mr. Sutherland has not been appointed by order in council, and in the public interest there was therefore no reason why the report should not be tabled especially in view of the character of the observations that have been made in various parts of the country as to the reasons why it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Labour must have given to the house wrong information.

Mr. GOTT: Might I suggest that the man who made that report will probably be in this house before very long.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are an optimist.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it not a fact that the Sutherland report was asked for by the members of the price spreads committee and was refused? They asked to have that report tabled.

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is not a fact. This report was asked for and the matter was under discussion between myself, as chairman of the committee, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). The question was raised as to whether the report should be produced under these circumstances but the matter was not finally disposed of. The point I wish to make is that it was not refused in the sense of the hon. member's question.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPS' CLEARANCE PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): Before the orders of the day were called on March 28 last the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) inquired from the hon. Minister of Marine whether the various documents necessary to clear vessels from ports were printed in both English and French. That question has been referred to my department, and in reply I beg to say that the following forms with respect to the clearance of vessels from ports in Canada are printed in both English and French: Form A6, report inwards; Form A7, report outwards; Form C8, ships' clearance.

TRANS-CANADA AIRMAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the government based on the following item which appeared in the Montreal Gazette to-day:

> The dominion government is reported to be ready to award the contract for the long-planned trans-Canadian airmail service which eventually will bring Vancouver to within twenty-four hours of Montreal.

May I ask if there is any foundation for this report?

Mr. BENNETT: No such action has been taken.

PARLIAMENT HILL GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works now that spring is here if he would not have his horticultural staff plan the beautifying of the grounds around this building so that it may be more in keeping with the capital of Canada.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that in shaping up our program for the coming year consideration will be given to the suggestion of my hon. friend.

CANADIAN LEGATION IN JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, last session and again this session I requested the production of copies of certain documents with respect to the Tokyo embassy. I have made inquiry of the sessional papers staff and I find that these papers have not yet been tabled. I should like to know just when I can expect them.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was under the impression that they had been tabled, but I shall make further inquiry.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) give to the house the information as to the further legislative program of the present session which he said he would try to prepare during the vacation. Is he in a position to make a statement to-day?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I did not say I would make a statement to-day; I said I would make it as soon as possible after we reconvened.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Prime Minister in a position to say when we will have the bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act? I asked a question in connection with this act just before the recess.

Mr. BENNETT: The elections act is in process of preparation. It is being advanced and will be introduced just as soon as it can be completed. We were not able to make any substantial progress during the holidays because many of our own members were very tired and had to take a little rest. However, some progress was made with the act.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon.—Mr. Gagnon in the chair.

On section 2—agreements with provinces.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): Shall the amendment carry?

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read the amendment, please.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): It is moved by Mr. Guthrie, seconded by Mr. Rhodes, that section 2 (a) be amended by adding after the word "province" in the fourth line thereof the following words, "and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited," and that the marginal reference opposite the section be amended by adding the same words thereto. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are there any others?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): No.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a few observations to make in connection with what happened last year when this same question was being discussed. I should like to quote what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) said on March 21, 1933, with regard to the member for Témiscouata. These remarks appear on page 3500 of unrevised Hansard of that year. I have not yet received the bound copy of Hansard for last year and I must use the unrevised edition. The hon. minister said:

> If the work carried on by the province of Quebec along these lines in the past needed defence, I defended them in the house against the impeachment of the hon. member for Témiscouata. Anyone who has even casual knowledge of the history of the development of Canada should not be slow to commend the actions of the successive governments of the province of Quebec even before confederation, and in fact almost since the beginning of settlement, along this line.

Those were the observations which the minister made at the time. Immediately after he had uttered those words I rose to a question of privilege. I stated that I was sorry to interrupt the minister but I felt I had to object to his words. The minister continued on page 3501 as follows:

> I am quite content to let the words of the hon. member for Témiscouata, as they will be revealed in the pages of Hansard, speak for themselves. If I used words which were not exactly his I can only say that of course my memory is not so good that I can follow him exactly. Certainly I gathered from his remarks to-day and a few days ago that he roundly condemned the administration of the colonization department of the province of Quebec.
> Mr. Pouliot: By certain employees.
> Mr. Gordon: The government takes responsibility for its officials, of course. The hon. member went so far as to say that the colonists who were sent out by the government had to eat grass and roots and so on, and I believe he even said they lived like swine. I do not come in contact with the provincial colonization men and I have nothing to do with provincial policies in Quebec, but I do know that this department is in touch with our committee, which consists of the representatives of the colonization departments of the railways, of our department and of the Quebec department. From my observations and from what I can gather I cannot conceive that those men would be parties to a colonization effort such as has been described by the hon. member for Témiscouata.

When we were discussing the resolution upon which this bill is founded on March 22 I read a letter which had been sent to the Department of Labour by Reverend Father Beaulieu, the parish priest of St. Emile d'Auclair. That letter was published in English as an appendix to Hansard of March 26, 1934, page 1. I am not going to read the whole letter; I will quote just one paragraph. The Reverend Father Beaulieu says:

I have been patiently waiting, until this very day. It will take a miracle to save my settlers from starvation, that is the plain fact, with the few hundreds of dollars which I succeed in obtaining each month at the price of endless complaints and recriminations. The small children of settlers in my parish are without shoes, or stockings or clothes to cover themselves this winter to attend school (a large number cannot leave the camps), they are in great distress, utter destitution—

The French word is "misère noire."

—a life of cruel disappointment for a poor missionary who is in charge of all these people.

This is an excerpt from the letter which I find in sessional paper No. 192, tabled on March 2 this year by the hon. gentleman. He has received that letter. Now, at the time he received it he had not yet given his approval to the relief works submitted to him by the provincial government of Quebec in August of last year, but he did so on the eve of this session, the very day before the opening of the session. Therefore, in giving his approval to the request made by the Quebec government on behalf of the settlers in the parish of Saint-Emile d'Auclair, he presumably regarded as well founded what was written by Father Beaulieu in his letter. That letter is a confirmation of what I said last year on behalf of the settlers, whose case is very serious. I would therefore ask the minister one question. Is he ready to admit that he was wrongly informed on March 21 of last year when he accused the member for Témiscouata of impeaching the province of Quebec by his statements in reference to the case of the settlers in that province and, in particular, in the county of Témiscouata?

Mr. GORDON: Under the plan whereby the dominion government contributes, with the provincial government and with the municipality, $200 towards the settlement of a family, I find by reference to the schedule that only eleven families were settled in the county of Témiscouata. I have a recollection of observations made by myself in the house last year in answer, I think, to a criticism made by the hon. member for Témiscouata with respect to the administration of the settlement of families. I tried to make it plain that the administration is entirely in the hands of the provinces—not only the province of Quebec but all the provinces. I also, if my recollection serves me correctly, took issue with the hon. member for Témiscouata as to the general success which I at least thought, and still believe, attended the plan. As regards criticisms that were offered at that time with respect to the administration, I can only repeat that it is the province of Quebec, or any other province that avails itself of the plan, which is charged with the responsibility of administration. I do not know that I can add anything to what I have just said.

Mr. POULIOT: I will readily admit that the minister is very clever; he evades the answer to my question, which was to the point. I did not discuss the question as to how many people had been put on the land in accordance with the plan in the county of Témiscouata. The question I asked was this: Does the hon. gentleman now admit that he was wrongly informed when on March 21 last year he declared to this house and this country that the member for Témiscouata had impeached his own province in his remarks on the colonization scheme in the province of Quebec and particularly in the county of Témiscouata? I ask the minister to answer that question in view of the fact that he has in his own files a letter from the Rev. Father Beaulieu, parish priest of Saint-Emile d'Auclair, repeating exactly what I said last year. May I ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to answer my question, which is to the point.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think it would add to the strength of the hon. gentleman's position if someone agreed with him in criticisms he may have made. We all have our own opinions; the hon. member has his and I have mine, and perhaps I am just as firmly grounded in my opinion as he is in his own. His criticisms of the administration of the scheme can be levelled at the governments of the provinces, and as no scheme that I have ever heard of is entirely perfect, there probably may be reasons why criticisms can very properly be levelled and perhaps maintained. But so far as I am concerned, if the hon. member cares to impeach the province of Quebec in its administration, that is his responsibility. I say that the plan generally is working out quite successfully, I believe—as successfully as, and probably more so than any other settlement plan we have had in this country with which at least I have become acquainted.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very sorry that the minister should give that answer. I shall give him credit that as Minister of Labour he does his very best, but I did not tell him, when he did something wrong, that he is impeaching his country. His remarks had an implication of what we call in law "mens rea," "guilty intention," and the hon. gentleman spoke in such a way as to make the house and the country understand that last year the member for Témiscouata was not fighting on behalf of the settlers, to draw the minister's attention to their troubles and miseries, but was in the House of Commons of Canada simply slandering his own province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why does not the hon. member talk to Taschereau?

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. member for York-Sunbury to keep quiet; otherwise I shall speak about his connection with the Fraser Company. I shall ask him how much he charged in former years when the company was nearly bankrupt; was it $37,000?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish I had got it.

Mr. POULIOT: Coming back to the matter under discussion, may I tell the minister that we on this side do our very best for the welfare of our fellow citizens without any distinction of party, creed or race. We regard that as our duty. I am generous enough to give to the hon. gentleman the same fair play as I would like to have from him. Therefore, before continuing my argument I should like to know from him whether on the information which he has about the condition of settlers not only from Father Beaulieu, whom I mentioned before, but also from his own inspector Lafortune, he will evade the question or is ready to say that the hon. member for Temiscouata impeached his own province when he spoke about colonization on the relief bill last year. May I tell the hon. gentleman that this is the last time I shall ask him this question and I expect a fair reply from him. I want to know whether he imputes motives to the member for Temiscouata now that his eyes should have been opened by reading the letter of Father Beaulieu and the report of his inspector not only in the case of the settlers of Saint-Emile d'Auclair but also in that of the settlers of Packington and St. Elzéar, likewise in Temiscouata county. After those preliminary remarks which I hope have been well understood by the hon. gentleman as well as by every other hon. member at present in the chamber, I shall ask the hon. gentleman whether he still maintains, as he did on March 21, 1933, that the member for Temiscouata was impeaching his own province of Quebec when last year on the relief bill he spoke about colonization matters.

Mr. GOTT: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very sorry for the minister that he does not answer. I thought he was generous enough to admit that members on this side of the house are doing their duty and that when they bring forward cases of distress, they do not do so for political propaganda as the Prime Minister did during the election of 1930 when every unemployed man had a white button to show to attend his meetings, but they do it in order to improve the condition of those settlers. If the hon. gentleman is not fair enough to admit that from a political opponent, I am ready to give him that credit, but I have great compassion for those who are voluntarily blind, because the voluntarily blind and the voluntarily deaf are the worst of all.

Mr. GOTT: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) to keep quiet or I shall ask him about trip passes to his dependents and to show his correspondence with the railway board on behalf of his brothers who are commercial travellers.

Mr. GOTT: I challenge the hon. member for Temiscouata likewise to show his correspondence.

Mr. POULIOT: My records are available.

Mr. GOTT: So are mine at all times.

Mr. POULIOT: So much the better. The hon. member had better table them.

Mr. GOTT: That is twice the hon. member has said that. It is on a par with the rest of his remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: Bis repetita placent. The hon. member will not understand, but this is a Latin expression which suits the occasion.

Let us see what has been done in this matter. The Minister of Labour blamed me for having spoken on these matters last year. I was one year ahead of my time. What I knew then he had an opportunity to learn since if he had been willing to give a real chance to the settlers. But what do we see? If we look at sessional paper No. 192, it will be found that in August of last year the provincial government of Quebec submitted to the Minister of Labour relief works for the settlers of the parishes of Saint-Emile d'Auclair, Saint-Elzéar and Packington. What has been done since then by the department presided over by the minister? They waited until January 24 last to give their approval to some of the relief works which had been asked for by Quebec since August of last year. On January 24 the minister gave his approval to the relief works for the parish of Saint-Emile d'Auclair.

Mr. GOTT: That is a thing of the past in relation to the hon. member for Temiscouata for 1933.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope the hon. member will use his pass to go away from the house where he causes general disturbance.

An hon. MEMBER: Let them both go.

Mr. POULIOT: The Minister of Labour is not answering me for a very good reason. It is because he does not even read the reports which he receives from his inspectors. He had the opportunity to read the reports which have been sent to him by Mr. Lafortune, one of his inspectors, who surely recommended the approval of the relief works asked months ago by the government of Quebec for St. Elzear, but when I asked in this house why the relief works had not been approved I had this answer from the hon. minister on March 28:

While our inspector, who visited the district in question, reported that the situation existing did not warrant the approval of the work proposed to be undertaken for the relief of unemployment, subsequent information indicated that conditions had changed and the schedule was consequently approved by the dominion on January 24, 1934.

3. Has the work proposed for the parish of St. Elzear and St. Benoit de Packington been approved by the federal government?

Answer. No.

4. If not, why?

Answer. Our inspector, who investigated conditions in these two municipalities, reported that the proposed works were not necessary as relief measures.

5. With regard to the two latter parishes, is the government in possession of any correspondence to the same effect as that contained on pages 9 to 16 inclusive of sessional paper number 192, reference number 22, tabled in the house by the hon. the minister of labour on Friday, March 2, 1934?

6. If so, by whom was each document received and what is the date?

7. If said correspondence exists, why is it not contained in the above sessional paper?

Answer. 5, 6 and 7. On going through the file it is found that the only document not included in sessional paper number 192, reference number 22, is a list of the unemployed of St. Benoit Abbe. This list which is undated and bears no signature was received without a covering letter and as it was attached to the inspector's report on this municipality, and as the inspector's reports are confidential, the list of unemployed of St. Benoit Abbe was not included in the return to parliament.

I enclose herewith a copy of the list referred to in the reply to questions 5, 6 and 7.

Yours truly,

W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour.

Here is the list which has been sent to me by the hon. gentleman.

Relief authorized November, 1932, to May, 1933: $2,700.

Summer relief, 1933: $500.

Total: $3,200.

To enable those people to live, to supply a living to them from November, 1932, to the date on which that letter came to the department!

Well, sir, the minister should understand very well now that I do not put the blame on the government of Quebec, because in those times of stress and despair the Quebec government submitted a program of works for the relief of those three parishes to the department of the minister in the summer of last year, but in two cases no answer came before March 31, last. It seems that the minister will never admit that those people need relief just as badly as, if not more, than the people who live in towns and have direct relief. That is a very important point. I have been asking the minister a fair question and have not got a satisfactory reply.

Referring to the statements made by the solicitor general in Quebec during the recess, that the Liberals were continuing the same opposition to the bill now as they did in the previous years, let us go back to last year and let us remember that last year I was insulted in a Quebec paper by a man who was formerly in the press gallery and is now a civil servant. He wrote an article entitled "Mr. Bennett disapproves of all attacks on priests." I was very careful when I spoke about one of the employees of the Quebec government. I mentioned in the house that I was criticizing him as a government employee and that I had the greatest respect for his sacerdotal character. What did the man write in a Quebec paper? He wrote that Mr. Bennett disapproved of all attacks on priests. What I mentioned appears as a question of privilege on the first page of Hansard of Monday, April 3, and the English text in the appendix to unrevised Hansard No. 86. I try to be logical in my statements in the house. It is because I try to do so that when my hon. friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) rose on a question of privilege to defend the deputy ministers against the so-called attack made in this house by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I protested against it, basing my protest on standing order 41 of the house. I shall read standing order No. 41:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Opinions are free. But what I say is this, that I was complaining about a man whom I had called a dirty scoundrel. I suggest that the expression could be used with reference to that man because the words "dirty" and "scoundrel" belong to the king's English. I have a right to use them in accordance with the rules of the house, and may refer to anyone in those terms, with the exception of His Majesty, or His Majesty's representative in Canada, the governor general, or any hon. members in either house of parliament. Besides that, in self defence, I am perfectly justified, not to attack anyone, but to pass judgment upon him. Therefore I say I was acting in accordance with the standing orders of the house when I used such language concerning one who has been promoted to the position of secretary to the executive in the Post Office Department. What happened? The right hon. Prime Minister rose in his place and objected to the words I had used, asking that they be stricken from Hansard. What followed that? The hon. member for Compton, who is now in his seat, without reason used the same language against a gentleman who is now president of the press gallery. His remarks were allowed to remain in Hansard.

Mr. GOBEIL: I never used those words, at all.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not insist upon it; my hon. friend is splitting hairs. I remember very well, however, that he used most insulting language about a respectable citizen, and those words were allowed to remain in Hansard. After the proceedings have concluded for the afternoon I should be glad to show the hon. member the page of Hansard where his remarks are quoted. I shall go with him, and will agree that probably he did not use exactly the same words. My memory does not fail me, however, when I state that the hon. member for Compton complained in most abusive language about a gentleman, a highly respected citizen, who is now president of the press gallery. Those remarks were allowed to remain in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gagnon): May I remind the hon. member he is running far afield, and that his remarks are beyond the subject of debate. I suggest he cannot refer to the debates of last year, but only casually.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall explain what I have said. An hon. member makes a statement, and it must be either right or wrong. Any hon. member may make a mistake, but the rules of the house state that no one has a right to impute motives to another. As members of this house, however, I state that any hon. member has the right to pass judgment on another person, so long as that person is not mentioned in standing order No. 41.

I complain that in connection with this particular matter of colonization I was not treated fairly by the Minister of Labour. Further than that, I state that the hon. gentleman did not answer my questions any more than he would have done had I been speaking to a fence post. A man outside the house, and through his own publication, was insulting me, deforming the statements I had made, and imputing to me motives I had never held. Sir, my dignity was offended. As a gentleman and as a member of this house I passed judgment upon that dirty scoundrel. The government took full responsibility for him when the Prime Minister asked that my remarks should be struck from Hansard. This is my complaint, sir. I complain particularly in connection with this matter of colonization. I complain that on account of these dirty writings that man has been promoted in the civil service, and not later than March 20 the Prime Minister stated in the house that the fact the gentleman about whom I am speaking was secretary to the executive in the Post Office Department did not prevent him from placing political propaganda in the papers, despite the fact that this secretary was paid out of public funds.

Here, sir, I asked reasonable questions of the Minister of Labour, and received no answer, or answers that were insufficient. This man who has insulted us through the press is supported by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister treats him as the governor general, and any judgment that I passed upon this man was, at the request of the Prime Minister, struck from Hansard. And not only that; the one in question is given a promotion, and is paid by the state to misrepresent utterances of hon. members in this chamber. Well, sir, this is a pity. But may I tell you one thing, namely, that this action will not prevent me from doing my duty as a member of parliament. When I hear the hon. member for North Renfrew say, "You should go," I answer, "Why should I go"? I am here to defend my people, the people who have suffered. During an election campaign arguments take place between Liberals and Conservatives, but after the election the man who holds the majority in any constituency represents all the people, whether they be Tories or Grits, Conservatives or Liberals, whether they belong to any race, any creed or to any political party. He represents them all. It does not follow that these men who have gone far into the woods, far from all the facilities and enjoyments of life, are to be forgotten. When I ask decent and reasonable information from the government I want answers.

To come back to what I was saying about that dirty Boutet, I say that the government would do much better if it would spend more money for those people at Saint Emile d'Auclair, Packington and Saint Elzéar and not use public funds to falsify statements made by hon. members on this side of the house.

I hope the minister will understand that he will receive from us the same treatment he has given—probably better. I would never have said to him that by his utterances he was impeaching his province or his country. May I say however that the Department of Labour is impeaching the progress of Canada, when it pays no more attention to the settlers. We should not forget those people because they are poor or because they do not rank as high as Sir Herbert Holt, or other people in the financial world. We must not forget them, because they are our problem. They are our fellow Canadians, and are as good citizens as are the richest men in this country. For that reason they deserve full consideration from the government. I regret that I have received no answer from the minister. He knows very well that I have at heart the success of a scheme of colonization, not only as it affects the province of Quebec, but also as it affects that part of northern Ontario in which he lives. I want every Canadian citizen to be happy and to be as prosperous as circumstances permit. Every man in Canada has a right to live. I hope the hon. gentleman will not put on the high hat in regard to the views of any member on this side of the house, but will understand that we are sincerely concerned for the welfare of those who are suffering in the remote parts of this country; and when any provincial government, whether it is the government of Ontario or of Quebec, takes the responsibility of asking him to endorse a request for relief I hope that he will understand it is done for the welfare of these very people. I congratulate the Quebec government upon having brought this particular matter before the Minister of Labour and asking him to do something for the relief of these people who are living in the wilderness. The Quebec government has done its duty, but did the minister do his duty when he waited several months from summer to the middle of winter and then opened his hands to only one parish of the three? Did he do his duty when he refused to give his approval to the requests made by the Quebec government on behalf of those other two parishes?

My time is up, Mr. Chairman, and I shall not continue. I leave it to the conscience of the hon. minister to determine for himself in his own mind, when he goes home after this sitting is over, what the position is, and I am sure that he will say to himself that the member for Témiscouata is right although for political reasons the minister cannot admit it now.

Mr. HEENAN: I see by the press that Premier Henry of Ontario has announced a program of public works for northern Ontario, including the blasting of many miles of rock. Might I ask the minister if it is contemplated that this government will pay a share of that work, and if so, how much?

Mr. GORDON: The matter is not in contemplation, Mr. Chairman. This government has no authority to contribute to the work that is being done in any province at the moment. I am not acquainted with the program to which reference has been made. I have not seen any reference to it, and so far as I am aware no application has been made to this government asking for any contribution to the work which is said to be about to be carried on in Ontario.

Mr. HEENAN: I would like to get this matter clear, Mr. Chairman, because it is very important to our province. The premier of Ontario—I can get his exact statement as reported in the press in a few minutes—has announced an increase of the relief allowance as well as an increase in the wages of the men working in the road camps to 25 cents an hour. In that same statement the premier of Ontario announced that he would have 25,000 more men working in northern Ontario during this summer, and that he was going to let many miles of rock work by contract, especially between Vermilion bay and Kenora. I was wondering if the province was going on with that program of its own accord or whether there would be a contribution by the Canadian government.

Mr. GORDON: There is no agreement between this government and the province of Ontario with respect to the plans of the province in northern Ontario or anywhere else.

Mr. HEENAN: Let me put it in another way. I can quite understand that there is no agreement because the previous agreement has lapsed. But if the provincial government asks for a similar agreement on relief work to that which obtained before March 31 last, is it intended or contemplated under this measure to make such an agreement with the Ontario government?

Mr. GORDON: It would be possible, Mr. Chairman, but I would not care to speculate on the sort or kind of agreement or whether there will be an agreement at all on behalf of this government to supplement anything that the province of Ontario may do.

Mr. HEENAN: Hon. gentlemen will see the predicament in which a member of parliament on the opposition side is placed, and I am sure many members on the other side of the house are in the same position. Here is the government asking for a blank cheque to spend as they see fit, and yet according to the minister's statement they may not make any agreement at all. In other words, we are being asked to vote a blank cheque ostensibly for the purpose of providing assistance to the provinces to take care of unemployment relief, and yet the minister will not even say whether he will make such an agreement. He may or may not contribute to the provinces. It simply means that members of parliament are now being asked to agree to putting into the hands of this government a blank cheque to be used at its discretion without the government undertaking to say whether it will make any agreement with the provinces or not. I cannot take any other meaning from the minister's words than that.

I would ask this further question: In the event of the Ontario government making such an agreement after this measure becomes law, will this government insist upon the contracts being let by tender, and upon seeing those tenders before the contracts are let, in order to see that the work is allotted to the proper, which is usually the lowest tenderer.

Mr. GORDON: It is difficult to speculate on what the government may or may not do until there is clearly before it a particular problem. I am not acquainted with the program which the Ontario government is laying down for the extension of their roads. So far as the agreement that has prevailed during the last eight months is concerned, it lapsed at the end of the fiscal year. It may be that the province of Ontario may be able to convince the government that they are not able to carry on work that is going to give some return to their unemployed. The difficulties of every province must be examined in the light of the need, if there is need. I frankly state, Mr. Chairman, that the province and the municipalities and the individual have that burden charged directly to them, but as has been stated in this chamber many times if in the operation of this law, as in the case of the law that preceded it, it is disclosed that the province and the municipalities and the individual cannot discharge their burdens and a case is made out for contribution, then contributions will be made. When I hear an hon. member complaining that we have been given a blank cheque and then becoming fearful that we are not going to fill it in, it strikes me as not being very logical. The government is charged with the handling of the taxpayers' money and I am not unmindful of the burden which accompanies this responsibility. I certainly will spend no more money than is absolutely necessary to take care of these situations which have arisen throughout Canada during the last four years, the cure of which has required the combined forces of all governments and the individuals themselves.

Mr. HEENAN: Surely this is not an answer to a body of public men who are trying to legislate fairly and reasonably. Surely the minister is not going to hide behind the fact that the agreements expired on March 31 and attempt to make us believe that he does not know in his own mind what is required for the various provinces. I hope the minister is not trying to have us believe that he has not seen the announcement of Premier Henry which has appeared on the front page of nearly every newspaper in Canada. Premier Henry has announced that the wages of the men in the camps are to be increased to 25 cents per hour. The government of Ontario, like other provincial governments, are not any richer to-day than they were a year ago. There must be some reason for all this and still the minister is trying to have the committee believe that he does not know what will be required or what is in contemplation. If the government do not know by this time, they ought to know for they have been at it nearly four years. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) quoted from the report of the auditor general the other day and everyone should realize that this slipshod method of doing business should not be permitted to continue any longer. The Ontario government has laughed at and ridiculed the statements I have made during the last three years to the effect that the wages paid under an agreement entered into by this government were slave wages. The Minister of Lands and Forests has admitted that the wages paid were no wages at all—not even slave wages. While the province is in no better financial standing than it was a year ago, all of a sudden on the eve of an election it announces that the wages will be 25 cents per hour instead of $5 and $10 per month.

I do not think the minister is doing himself credit by not telling us what is in contemplation or just what his survey calls for for the coming year. He is asking for power to make these agreements and surely he must have some conception of what is required. On the eve of an election the Ontario government has increased the wages paid to these men in the camps to 25 cents per hour, yet that government is no better off financially than it was a few years ago. In fact, I know it is worse off. How is it that they can increase these wages to-day when they could not increase them at any time during the last two or three years? Do they intend to give these men some of the money of which they were robbed through not receiving proper wages during the past year? Is this what they are doing just on the eve of an election? I do not think the people of the province will be hoodwinked by this action. I think it was in 1931, when a similar measure was under discussion, that the government gave a specific pledge to the effect that the fair wages policy of the dominion government would apply to any contracts let. But instead of seeing that that was done they permitted the Ontario government to make their own terms and conditions, the result being that $5 per month was paid during the summer time when men were eaten with the flies and $10 a month in the winter time when they froze to death at ten, twenty and forty below zero. At that time the Minister of Lands and Forests told the people that he simply could not pay higher wages. Taking him at his own word, is he in any different position to-day from what he was then?

The minister will have to use some judgment when the Ontario government come to him. He will have to ask them how their financial position differs from what it was at the time the last agreement was made. The only answer which the Minister of Lands and Forests or Premier Henry can make, and behind closed doors, is, "Well, Mr. Gordon, you know we are on the eve of an election and we simply dare not go up into northern Ontario after votes should these men still be working for slave wages; we want you to sign this agreement in order to help us out."

If tenders are to be let I hope they will not be let under the same conditions as some of those let by the Ontario government of which we have heard. This government is contributing fifty per cent of the cost and the minister should look these tenders over to see whether they are being let to friends of the government or to legitimate contractors. I think we should know whether men are to be sent to these camps simply because they have the ability to write letters to the press. Men have been sent to these camps from the older parts of Ontario simply because they could write a letter to the effect that a public man was not stating the case. This is the greatest joke which has ever been played on the public life of any country. Men from various parts of Ontario, even from Ottawa, have been sent to these camps because they were fairly good writers and able to write letters to the press to the effect that some public man is not making a correct statement. These men were promoted immediately to a salary of $60 or $70 a month. Some of them are not even allowed to work even though they want to. I am sure some hon. members have seen a letter from a man from Ottawa in which he takes me to task for talking about these slave camps. He has been going around boasting that he has a letter in his pocket from R. B. Bennett thanking him for his good work. This man's signature appears on the letter in the press and the minister should investigate the whole matter and find out why he was sent up into northern Ontario from down here in Ottawa. If the minister does that he will find out that he is the calibre of man who will sign anything prepared by an officer of the Ontario government. I have received information that he has been promoted to the position of assistant superintendent of Algonquin park. He received this promotion simply because he called some public man—

Mr. VENIOT: A liar.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not say that and if Hansard caught that remark I hope they will credit it to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). This is the way in which public money is being expended. I notice from the auditor general's report that the firm of Crawley & McCracken have a contract to feed and house the men in these northern Ontario camps. This firm has a staff of their own and they are charging the men 60 cents per day. They reduced the men to $5 a month while at the same time Crawley & McCracken's contract was increased from 50 cents to 60 cents a day for the men. That is a new method of economics. Their travelling expenses, railway fares and so on, in connection with the staff of Crawley & McCracken, under a contract with the Ontario government, were actually charged to the federal government. This government has had to pay on that account nearly $3,000 up to the present time. If that is the system that is to be carried out, I think the minister should let us know whether or not it is intended to contribute to this 25 cents an hour. When they agree, as I know they must, then I would ask the minister why he did not insist upon 25 or 35 cents an hour in the last two or three years. If it is intended now to pay back the men with their own money we want to know, because if that is the intention it reminds me of a story I once heard about a fellow who fell in love with a girl. She became very cool and left him altogether. After a while he met her again, being still in love with her. She warmed up to him a little bit and he said, "You don't look as well as you used to." She answered, "No, I have lost all my teeth." Well, he saved up money and bought her a new set of teeth and she became fairly good looking again. He was still in love with her.

Mr. COTNAM: Was he an Irishman?

Mr. HEENAN: I think this man came from Renfrew. At any rate, the girl warmed up to him but subsequently became cool again. He happened to meet a friend about this time and told him that the girl had lost interest in him. He said to the friend, "I met her on the street and she laughed at me with my own teeth." I want to ask the minister whether he is going to permit the Ontario government to laugh at these men with their own money, bribing them during election time with their own money. This money is due these men, having been wrongfully withheld from them, and the Minister of Labour should insist that it now be paid to them as back dues, for they are entitled to it. It should not be used to pay them for the future but should be given to them as back dues. Crawley & McCracken have contracted to feed and house the men—

Mr. McGIBBON: Grit contractors at that.

Mr. HEENAN: Great contractors?

Mr. McGIBBON: Grit—G-r-i-t.

Mr. HEENAN: I know nothing about that, but if that is so it is one good feature about them. At any rate the object of the relief legislation was to provide the men with work whereby they would receive wages. That was the purpose of this unemployment relief measure, according to the Prime Minister's own words; it was to assist settlers in the several communities across the country. Well, Crawley & McCracken have been purchasing their food supplies, their meat and vegetables, potatoes and all sorts of things, not from the settlers along the highway but in the cheapest places, Winnipeg in most instances, or Toronto. That is not helping the settlers along the highway; it is not giving them any assistance in the least. Now, just before an election, after we have been pounding at the Minister of Lands and Forests of the Ontario government for nearly three years, he allows the candidate in the Kenora riding to make a statement on the front page of the local papers to the effect that he has made arrangements —this candidate has made arrangements—with the contractors to purchase supplies, and is inviting all settlers to quote prices and to be ready to supply.

An hon. MEMBER: And join the Conservative association.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not think they have asked them that yet. I do know however of one place where the returned soldiers, the legion, held a meeting, calling upon the local member to explain why they were not being considered in connection with jobs, and I have a letter from the legion that his reply was: "Before you are considered you will have to pay your 50 cents and join the Conservative association, and if the executive recommend you I will recommend you to the Ontario government." Hon. members in this house have no conception whatever of the political thuggery that is going on in Ontario under the Ontario government, bludgeoning the men in.

I have here some cheques which I hope to exhibit during election time. I know I shall not convert anyone on the other side of the house to my way of thinking, but I want the people to see these cheques.

Mr. McINTOSH: Including some of the one cent cheques?

Mr. HEENAN: They range from 70 cents to 1 cent. I see that Mr. Henry has made the statement that he has received, from the gentleman who received the 1 cent cheque, a letter in connection with the payment of that amount. I suppose he has been given a foreman's job; if he has not already got such a job he will get one before long. I would point out however that Mr. Henry and his government have fallen into a trap in this regard, because, with respect to all these cheques, from 70 cents to 1 cent, I mentioned the name of only one man. I did not mention any other names, having received the cheques on condition that I would not reveal any names, because I was told, "If you mention my name, neither myself nor my dad will be allowed to live in this part of the country." That is to say, they would not get jobs. For that reason I did not mention the names that appeared on the cheques, except the name of this one man, Caesar. Well, the Ontario government fell for it, because they got next to this man in some way or other, with the result that he finally wrote a letter, although it does not appear in the newspapers. At any rate, Mr. Henry states in the press that he has received a letter from this man Caesar to the effect that he, Caesar, sent this 1 cent cheque to the Hon. Peter Heenan only by way of a joke. I agree that it is a joke all right; there is no doubt about it that it is a joke to pay a man 1 cent for a month's work. This man says, "I am quite content in the camp," and so on. Now, anyone who knows northern Ontario and is acquainted with the organization in that part of the country knows very well that this man has been got at and has been told that he will be dismissed and will have to get out of the country, or has been offered a position of some sort, as foreman, in order to get him to make the statement he has made. The fact is however that either he was anxious to please Mr. Henry, or that Mr. Henry misconstrued his statement, because the man never sent me the cheque at all, although it seems that he said he did. As a matter of fact he sent it to the editor of the Vancouver Province and the editor cut it out, had it photographed, and published it on the front page of that newspaper on Wednesday, August 16, and I cut it out of the Vancouver Province. To show how satisfied this man was, he said, "Please return me the original, because I want to frame it so that my grandchildren will see how the Ontario government treated the labouring men in that province." In view of the conditions up there, I am inviting all my friends to write letters to say that the Hon. Peter Heenan does not tell the truth and that conditions are different from those he depicts. I invite them all to do that because they will all be made foremen and there will be no more labourers at all.

These are the conditions that exist there and it is a disgrace. And the worst part of it is that the federal government is contributing money to this sort of thing. It contributed half of this 1 cent cheque. The federal government gave this man Caesar half a cent—not directly, but they gave it to him just the same, and they do not seem to be a bit ashamed, notwithstanding that in the regulations it is provided that there shall be fair and reasonable wages for the work done. But does this represent fair and reasonable wages? I should like the minister to inform the committee therefore whether he proposes to see that these tenders are let properly, whether the fair wage clause will be applied, whether the settlers along the highway will get the protection to which they are entitled by the contractors being made to procure from them as much of the foodstuffs required as possible, and what excuse the province of Ontario is giving now for the increase being made in the eleventh hour before the election. Why is it that a year ago it could not do this and now it can? I think those are questions that should properly be answered before this bill passes.

Mr. GORDON: I have listened with a good deal of interest to what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has said. If and when any contribution is made by the federal to the Ontario government, wherein it is contemplated that contracts may be entered into, I think it is proper that where rates of wages are involved, the wage earners should be given such protection by way of schedules of rates or going wages, as the case may be, as it is possible for the dominion government to impose.

With respect to the remarks made by the hon. member about the spoils system or whatever you like to call it, I assume that if what is going on now has only recently started, this is a surprise to most of us. I think the best that any of us can do is to see that in the expenditure of public moneys every kind of precaution is taken in order that the taxpayers' money shall be devoted to the purpose for which it was raised, and in so far as it is humanly possible to minimize the amount of money that may be wasted or may go to people who are not entitled to it, I believe the committee can take my assurance that the government will see to it that moneys are not wasted. It is not a new thing to hear about political parties dealing with public funds in a way that might not commend itself to us, but in order that we may get the picture from a number of angles, I assume the hon. member will remember that a provincial election took place in British Columbia not very long ago, last November, I believe. In February following the election this advertisement was called to my attention. It is from a place in British Columbia called Bella Coola and it starts off like this:

> You must be all right for this job.
> None but Liberals need apply for government work at Bella Coola.
>
> To the victors belong the spoils!
> This is declared to be politically true in the Bella Coola district. . . .
> Applications will be received by the undersigned until noon, February 6, 1934, for road foremen, tractor drivers and truck drivers in the Bella Coola valley and district. Applicant must state qualifications, experience and what position he desires. Applicant must be a Liberal and have his application endorsed by three Liberals in good standing.
>
> C. A. Brynildsen,
> Secretary Treasurer of the Bella Coola Liberal Association.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister endorse that sort of thing?

Mr. GORDON: I certainly do not, but I just wanted to illustrate that sometimes in spite of every possible effort, people who have not what we believe to be the right sort of approach in the spending of public money, do take advantage and I think one of my tasks is to see that that is minimized to the smallest possible amount. I may say that when these matters arise I draw them to the attention of the premier of the province. I drew this matter to the attention of the British Columbia government and I have from them the assurance that they will not countenance this sort of thing. It is very difficult just to say in a broad way that because persons happen to belong to a party that does not hold the same political views, for that reason they are totally without virtue and have no sense of responsibility; that is going a little too far. I offer that to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to ponder over.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister like myself is not speaking very loudly. Did he say he would leave that matter for me to ponder over?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: He need not. I belong to Ontario, not British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON: Let the hon. member ponder over it anyway. I can only repeat the assurance that I gave a while ago that in joining with a province in order to assist in the relief of unemployment and of those in need, this government will take every possible step to incorporate in the arrangement or agreement such clauses and terms as will best ensure that the money which the dominion contributes jointly with the province and other bodies, will be devoted to the purpose for which it is intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The communication which the minister has just read only confirms what we on this side have been saying right along, that something more in the way of direct supervision over the expenditure of federal moneys by the provinces and municipalities should have been provided for by the government in the agreements that they were making with the provinces at the time that this money was being handed over to the provinces. If that had been done, nothing of the sort the minister has just read would have been possible under any circumstances. Had it been understood from the beginning that there was to be an audit instead of that there was not to be one, many of the matters that are now coming to light would not have occurred.

But what I wish to speak about at the moment is this: We are on clause 2 of the bill which contains the provision:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law—

the governor in council may pass orders in council for peace, order and good government. At the very beginning of the discussion I asked the minister whether he would not confer with his colleagues and advise the committee at a later stage whether that clause could not be deleted from the bill this year. The minister said that he would so confer, but he has not yet told the committee whether he has done so, or if he has, what has been done as a result of the conference and what is the decision of the government in the matter. If that clause were to be dropped, it would shorten materially the further discussion of the measure. The minister ought to drop it; the argument that has been advanced from this side in opposition to the retention of the clause at this time is unanswerable.

May I repeat what was said the other day? The clause did not appear, it was not found necessary, in the bill of the special session of 1930, though the session was called to deal with an alleged emergency. It appeared in the bill of 1931, but it was kept there only by the application of the closure on the part of the administration. In 1932, it was dropped, and nobody suffered as a consequence, no public interest suffered in the least. The next year it was reinserted, against the protests of hon. members on this side, but notwithstanding that it was there the minister has since told us that no use was made of it at all last year. He also told us that the only use made of the clause at any time was to allow banks and insurance companies to revalue their securities, and to prohibit the export of gold; according to the minister, that is the extent to which the power has been used. I submit that that does not justify the retention of the clause this year, particularly when, as I have already pointed out, it is known that in all probability this is going to be the year of a general election. And particularly, may I add, when the government is alleging that the emergency is pretty well gone by, that times are improved and conditions are now on the upgrade. There is therefore not the necessity for this alleged emergency legislation that there was before. If under these circumstances the minister does not withdraw the clause he must not wonder that we see an ulterior motive in its retention. As I pointed out, the clause is not to give the ministry power to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government; under the statutes they have already all the power needed for that purpose, but this clause is to give the ministry power, notwithstanding any law or any statute, to pass any measure it pleases by order in council, so long as the order in council may be designated one for the furtherance of peace, order and good government in Canada. As the minister has shown us, the action with respect to the revaluing of securities was taken notwithstanding the existence on the statutes of provisions which gave the citizens of this country belief that securities having a certain value must be shown at that value when returns were being made with respect to them. I do not think the use to which the legislation has been put justifies its continuance. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said the other day, under the power being asked, the government during the period of a general election could pass any order in council it pleased with respect to something happening in the election, which might have a very vital bearing thereon. They might in effect repeal any section of the Dominion Elections Act. That cannot be denied, because the purpose of the clause is to give the governor in council power, notwithstanding the existence of any law or statute, to pass any order in council it pleases. I say for that reason alone we ought to oppose its retention to the limit. It is only too clear that with that power the government, under pressure, in the event of a dispute arising in some electoral district in the course of the campaign, could forthwith pass an order in council and settle the whole matter before the election day, could say that notwithstanding such and such a section in the election act, such and such is to be done. It cannot be denied that that power would be given if this provision goes through. I cannot but believe that some purpose of that kind must be in the mind of the government, otherwise they would not retain the section at the present time. Not the election act only, but any legislation, no matter what it is, may be overridden. The government would be able to do for any corporation, for any organization, anything it pleased to designate as being done for peace, order and good government. No matter what the law of this country may be, it simply means that existing legislation, legislation enacted by parliament for the purpose of giving confidence in their rights and a sense of security to the public, is of no value at all; that there is no liberty, no right, that is not infringed by the power being given to the administration.

I have only heard the minister and hon. gentlemen on the other side give one other reason why the clause should be there, why that power should be given to the government at the present time, and to my mind it is a reason why it should not be there. It was that these are times of great social unrest. That is true. The world at the moment is passing through what may be and will be described in future as a social revolution and changes may come very rapidly. That being so, it is said that the government should be endowed with very special powers, to be able to act at any moment in regard to what may take place if something in the nature of revolutionary change came about.

One hon. member opposite, and I think the minister himself, referred to and gave as a reason for their adoption here the powers given to the president of the United States to deal with emergency conditions. May I first of all say a word with regard to the powers given to the president of the United States, in order to clear that up. The present president of the United States came into office about a year ago. He has had but one year of office; the powers given him were given only for a period of two years. But this administration is now completing its fourth year, it has had four years of power to inaugurate and carry into force the policies designated by it for the purpose of improving conditions. It has had a perfectly free hand in regard to those policies for all that time. It has had this extreme power given it on two previous occasions. As far as the United States is concerned, the president came into a situation which had been going, so it was alleged, from bad to worse, at least so we are led to believe, as a consequence of the inaction of the preceding administration. Here the situation was different. Here the government claims that the situation has been improving right along, and that we are now into the fourth year of improvement as a consequence of their retention of office. So the parallel on that score does not hold. But the real point is this. As the minister knows and as hon. gentlemen opposite well know, the constitution of the United States is based on a wholly different principle from that underlying British parliamentary institutions. The executive of the United States is independent of the legislative body. The American system is a system of checks and balances, it is not a system of reconciling the wishes of the executive with those of parliament and vice versa. For that reason the parallel does not hold—

I am glad the Prime Minister has come in, because I would like, if I might, to speak directly to him on this point. We are discussing the second section of this relief bill; in it there is a clause by which the government asks to be given the power, notwithstanding any statute or law, to continue to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government. I am trying to point out that the grounds for that legislation do not now exist. Whatever may have been said at previous sessions they do not exist now. According to the record, the government did not need nor ask for that power at the time of the special session of 1930, they got it in the session of 1931 only by use of the closure, it was dropped at the session of 1932 when according to the government's own statement conditions were much more serious than today, and no public interests suffered by it being dropped. In 1933 when it was restored it was against the strong opposition of this side of the house, and hon members in other parts of the house as well, but the power was never used last year, and we cannot see why the minister should ask for that power this year. The fact that this may be the year of a general election, which may occasion great uncertainty with respect to what is taking place in different parts of the country may increase the temptation for the government to use the legislation in ways that would not be followed if the pressure were less than is likely to be the case at the time of a general election.

The only real argument that has been urged in support of it is that these are times of great social unrest, that the world is passing through a time of social change. For my part I believe that it is so. I hope very much that far-reaching changes will come about and I believe they will. I hope they will result in a more equitable distribution of wealth, and much more in the way of social justice. I do believe however that unless some country stands firmly for the preservation of its representative political institutions, institutions which have helped to preserve liberty and freedom, there is danger of every country being more or less submerged under the revolutionary tide which is sweeping across the world. Those who might otherwise greatly benefit by any social change brought about in an orderly and proper fashion would be the first to suffer by a change brought about in any other manner. We cannot stem the onward flow of the tide that has set in, but we can control and direct the channels through which it may be made to flow to the advantage and not to the ruin of all concerned.

The arguments urged by hon. gentlemen opposite are to the effect that the president of the United States has had to have exceptional powers; therefore similar powers should be given to our governor in council. When my right hon. friend entered the chamber I was saying that those powers were given to the president just a little more than a year ago. My right hon. friend and his ministers have now had nearly four years in which to shape matters and policies; as a consequence, I submit that so far as meeting any situation they are in a position very different from that of the president, when he assumed power. But apart from that—and this is the point I wish particularly to make—the executive in the United States does not bear the same relationship to the law making branch of government as does the executive in this country, or the executive functioning under British institutions anywhere. The executive in the United States is wholly independent of congress. Being independent where emergency powers are required it is necessary to give to the United States executive many powers which it is not at all necessary to give to an executive under our system of government where the executive is but a committee of the commons, and can obtain from parliament in virtue of its majority any legislation it may want or need.

The president of the United States cannot get the power he requires to deal with emergency conditions by going to the house of representatives and asking for it. He can only obtain what congress is prepared to grant. But my right hon. friend can. With the backing he now has he can come to this House of Commons and to meet a given situation may obtain whatever legislation is required. He may bring parliament together at any time he desires, if it so happens that parliament is not in session. When it is in session he may anticipate a situation and get what he needs in order to meet it. That is a very different state of affairs from the condition obtaining in the United States. I can well understand that in a country where the executive is wholly apart from congress, where no member of the ministry is on the floor of either house or in a position to explain a measure, it may be necessary in dealing with grave situations to have extreme powers given and to trust to their proper use. But that argument does not apply to the situation obtaining in Canada.

It has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that there are dictators in Europe, and that the whole development on that continent is of a type which entrusts one or two men with complete authority to act quickly. I believe that is the very thing which is going to lead to much destruction throughout the world. I believe that to-day danger signals are being displayed in and sounded from almost every country in Europe, with the exception possibly of Great Britain. Great Britain is the exception because she has held more closely than any of the others to the parliamentary method of dealing with all situations.

I say that these movements for social change cannot be stopped. As a matter of fact we do not want to see them stopped, but we do want to see changes brought about in a way that will make human society a better human society not by methods which may lead to its total destruction. If change comes about without orderly development, or by means, and through channels which British parliamentary institutions through many centuries have helped to ensure as certain to be for the benefit of all, it may have a submerging effect, and men and institutions alike may be swept away before its uncontrolled advance. I could develop that thought at greater length, but I believe I have presented it sufficiently forceably to make my meaning clear to hon. gentlemen opposite. I do believe that this country of Canada, with a parliament fashioned on the model of free British parliamentary institutions, if it will but be true to itself and its heritage, may serve as an example to the nations of the world of how great social and industrial changes, in a period of world upheaval and unrest, can be brought about in the interests of the great body of the people, and without injury to any deserving interest. That is a great opportunity. I believe we can put through in orderly channels, and with the consent of the great body of the people all those measures required to effect far reaching change in the furtherance of human need, social justice and the common good.

Just one further thought in conclusion: it is that the consensus of view, the collective wisdom of the nation as a whole, is what parliament is able to bring to bear upon any great public question. That is a much greater safeguard to personal liberty and progress and to orderly change at a period of transition than is the view of any individual or group of individuals, who may be free to sit apart from parliament altogether, no matter how conscientious, earnest or sincere they may be. It is for this above all other reasons that I appeal to the Prime Minister and his colleagues to withdraw this very subversive and dangerous section.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. gentleman was correct when he indicated that I was absent from the chamber when he commenced his address, but as I have listened to it for three years I thoroughly understand what he said before I came in. The only addition to it is the chapter dealing with the powers of President Roosevelt. That is new. There are two or three chapters, however, to which he did not refer. One chapter deals with the position assumed by the executive in the province of British Columbia, and the other deals with the powers assumed by the executive in the province of Alberta. These developments have created a situation far different from that which we have had to meet at any time previously in this house.
