I think perhaps the right hon. gentleman puts too strained a construction upon the words "peace, order and good government." Those words appear in section 91 of the British North America Act. And when we asked that the executive be clothed with power to deal with matters affecting the well being of Canada, in addition to any powers contained in the existing statutes, we did so for one purpose, and for one purpose only, namely, to meet any contingency or emergency which might arise, or would not brook delay until the House of Commons could be called together. Is it at all questionable that there have been moments in this country and in all countries when it has been undesirable to wait two weeks, ten days or even seven days before some action should be taken? I shall not traverse the ground I have traversed on previous occasions to point out that, having the authority to avail ourselves of the provisions of the then existing statutes, we were not compelled to wait a week or ten days to take action which we regarded and which subsequent events showed was absolutely necessary in the public interest.

I wholly agree that the world has changed. I wholly agree it will never be as it was before 1914. The causes need not be analysed, but in the end it will be found they are referable to war and what arose from the war. The conditions which we have today are conditions to which probably man's attention is being directed much more carefully than it has ever been directed before. The question as to the unequal distribution of wealth is not new. One of Aristotle's most famous discussions dealt with the question of the unequal distribution of wealth. That happened a great many hundred years ago. The problems connected with social justice are not new. Only a few days ago I was reading something from the life of Lord Shaftesbury, and only the other evening in picking up a biographical history I was struck with the fact that between the years 1850 and 1870 there were conditions in Great Britain to which nothing in our time is comparable. The cause of social justice has made great progress in the last half century, and will continue to make progress. With my limited vision I can foresee that there will be an entire change in connection with the consideration of some of the problems confronting us. But I do say this, that if parliament or the legislature undertakes to substitute the judgment of the commons for that of the people who are charged with the responsibility for the conduct of their business on the ground that they can conduct the business better than the proprietors, it is not very long before the state will have to take over the business itself, because you cannot have it both ways. You cannot say to people, "We are going to conduct your business for you," without leaving yourself open to the reply, "If you can run it better than we can, take it over and pay us for it." That is inevitable if you carry regulation beyond a certain point, and every thinking man must realize it. During the last few days we have had addresses made in this city with respect to socialism and the socialistic attitude of a great populace of one part of the world toward these problems. We are trying as best we can—I know that to some hon. gentlemen opposite it does not appear to amount to much—

Mr. HANBURY: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It will compare, however, with anything the hon. gentleman is capable of. That might not be so with respect to all gentlemen opposite but it is so with respect to his case.

I say in all sincerity to the right hon. gentleman that no one seeks this power either to use it or to abuse it unless the necessity arises for its use. If the necessity should arise and we did not have this power we should have been derelict in our duty if we had not sought it. If the necessity does not arise it is nothing more or less than a measure that is there to protect the people, and not to abuse their liberty, their freedom or their rights. That is all I can usefully say. I am not going to traverse the ground that we have traversed here during the last three and four years. I am not disposed to do so in view of the position taken by the legislature of British Columbia—

Mr. HANBURY: Would the Prime Minister explain that a little bit?

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to the statute called the Special Powers Act. If the hon. gentleman has read it he will be able to draw his own conclusions from it. It has already been said at least in one instance by those responsible for it that it will enable them to do many things if the occasion arises without calling the legislature together.

Mr. HANBURY: In what way would that affect the federal government?

Mr. BENNETT: It might affect the federal government if the powers given under that act were exercised.

Mr. HANBURY: I cannot see in what way.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not expect the hon. gentleman perhaps to see that. But if anyone will study that act, which in terms delegates to the executive all the legislative power of the assembly of British Columbia, thereby not delegating to but substituting for the assembly, the executive, thereby sweeping out the whole of section 90 of the British North America Act, thereby destroying the right to veto or disallow legislation, thereby destroying the protection given with respect to taxation and with respect to the other matters that are inserted in the statute for the safeguarding of the federal power—

Mr. VENIOT: Might I ask a question? Does not the federal government still retain the power to disallow any act of the legislature if they consider it ultra vires?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has asked a question that is certainly very relevant to the discussion, but he must realize that these are not acts—they are called ordinances—

Mr. VENIOT: I am referring to the act passed by the legislature of British Columbia giving the executive power to pass these orders in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That invitation is one which the attorney general of the province held out for the purpose of showing Ottawa just what he would do to them when the time arises. That is what he held out. It is just because no intelligent executive will at the moment recommend the disallowance of a statute passed for the purpose of having it disallowed, but will leave it in the terms provided by law to be dealt with as the law has provided. There may be ample opportunity to deal with it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not seen the speech of Attorney General Sloan.

Mr. VENIOT: I would not need to see it to convince me that the federal power has the right to veto.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not suggested that it has not, but I do suggest to the hon. gentleman that the attorney general was practically inviting the federal power to disallow the act in order that he might have a grievance. The hon. gentleman's courage—

Mr. VENIOT: It has always stood the test.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall not use the word I was going to use, because it might not be parliamentary. No one will deny his courage, but it does arise at very inopportune times for himself.

Mr. VENIOT: No more than yours.

Mr. BENNETT: I would hardly compare my courage with his.

Mr. VENIOT: I would not compare it with the sort of courage you develop.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman need not become touchy. I am not comparing my courage with his.

Mr. VENIOT: You are getting touchy.

Mr. BENNETT: We all take off our hats to him and say that his courage merits the high encomiums which he has himself bestowed upon it.

May I proceed to another point? In the province of Alberta there has been passed a law which creates an industrial bureau. It provides for codes, rules of ethics, the fixing of wages, rules for the conduct of business, and names those businesses, wholesale and retail, barbers, printers, and a whole long list of others. It vests in the executive power to set up bureaus to deal with these matters. Now we would be derelict in our duty if we did not at this time provide in this legislation the safeguards that are essential for the purpose of enabling us to protect the business of this country if the necessity arises. But leaving that for the moment, the difficulties with which we have had to deal we have usually managed to dispose of except in a few cases without reference to this provision of the statute at all. Other provisions of the statute have enabled us to deal with them. There were a few cases in which we had to utilize the provisions with respect to peace, order and good government, but none of those cases had to do with the freedom or the liberty of the subject. They all had to do with what you might call the industrial, financial and economic fabric of our country, and the action that was taken was for the purpose of endeavouring to maintain them in their integrity until parliament should pass the legislation that might be necessary to enable us to deal with them. One illustration that at once flashes upon the memory of most members was when we dealt with the exportation of gold. We had not the legislation to deal with it when the crisis came, and but for this provision relating to peace, order and good government we would not have been able to prevent the exportation of gold. We used the provision in that case. Then later on the minister introduced the act by which power was conferred upon the executive to deal with that matter. There was not very much difference between seeking the power in the first instance under peace, order and good government to pass an order in council prohibiting the exportation of gold, and coming to this parliament later and specifically dealing with it. The power is exercised in both instances in exactly the same way. It is derived from the power granted by this parliament, only instead of granting it by name it is included in this instance under peace, order and good government. I cannot think of all the cases in which it might be desirable to utilize this power, but hence it is that we had recourse to this provision, and we used it in that instance. No other method suggested itself at the moment, and action had to be taken at once. The right hon. gentleman knows that in 1929 his then Minister of Finance sent forty million dollars of gold to the United States. At once Canada was off the gold standard because once having shipped that much specie out of this country we were no onger in a position to meet the requirements of our own statute. The successor of the late Mr. Robb found himself in the position where he was not able to provide the yellow metal to meet the demands made upon the country. He had no statute such as that and he did not desire to deal with it at the moment in parliament. I was then in opposition and I told my party in caucus—I can refer to this now in the same manner as the right hon. gentleman did with respect to another matter some years ago—I asked my supporters to make no reference in parliament or elsewhere to that fact. I am bound to say that they met my wishes and did not do so. I subsequently discussed it with the minister. The fact was that we were without gold to meet the situation and maintain this country upon the gold standard. As I told my friends in caucus, and as actually happened, an enterprising man gathered together half a million dollars of Canadian money and brought it to Montreal where he exchanged it for legal tender. He went around to the receiver general's office and asked for gold for this money. Arrangements had to be made whereby a chartered bank intervened and this request was withdrawn. When England went off the gold standard a Canadian citizen who was more enterprising at the moment than patriotic conceived the happy idea that there was a good deal of money to be made in gold. He converted $50,000 into legal tender and asked for gold. He got gold for the first $50,000, but the government, having the advantage of this statute, were able to pass the requisite order in council by which the exportation of gold was forbidden. This one lot of gold was shipped out of the country the next day. That is only one of the many illustrations which might be given.

Mr. HANBURY: That is provided for now.

Mr. BENNETT: That is provided for at the present moment by legislation but there are other matters that are not.

Mr. HANBURY: What are they?

Mr. BENNETT: It is idle to say, "what are they?" because they arise every day. If I had been asked that question two or three years ago the prohibition against the exportation of gold would not have suggested itself as being a matter which would have to be met. There are many that may arise. I feel inclined to believe with the right hon. gentleman that they will not arise, but believing that they will not arise, I cannot think that the government would be doing other than the proper thing by providing against a contingency which might arise. Caution is the endeavour to foresee and provide against a condition which may arise. There may be the hope that it will not arise but there is the knowledge that it may.

Mr. NEILL: I do not just understand how Mr. Robb met the situation of there being no gold when the house was not in session and having no statute to provide for peace, order and good government.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not meet it; it was never met except in this way: In the last instance the house was in session but it was not regarded as being in the public interest to direct attention to this fact at the moment. Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not hear me, but what happened was that an arrangement was made with the chartered banks, through which the gentleman from the United States was operating, and he was induced to come to another arrangement than that sought to be made. If the holder of the certificates had clung to his opinion it would have been necessary to enact legislation or else face the inevitable consequences.

I have described to hon. members what I conceived to be the cautious method which should be pursued. Many hon. members disagree with the government in its conduct of public affairs, but will they not admit this: that after three and a half years of the greatest depression the world has known we have kept the ship of state upon an even keel, we have maintained the integrity of our institutions, we have abused no power and have deprived no man unjustly of his liberty or his freedom of action. It is easy to charge a man with hypocrisy from the floor of this chamber; it is easy to denounce him as a dictator, but I ask any fairminded hon. member: On the evidence of the world conditions which have confronted us, would you not, if you were similarly situated, not for any personal reason, take such action as might be necessary for the preservation of peace, order and good government in the Dominion of Canada?

If one is permitted to indulge in a few personal remarks, one must say that he sometimes finds it difficult to understand why his fellow countrymen should think that he is actuated by any personal wish or desire with respect to a matter of this kind. What personal interest can I or my colleagues have in this matter? What personal purpose have we to serve in connection with this? I can understand criticism, but do not put it upon the ground that we have a personal desire that this statute should read thus. If I did not believe when it was first put through that it was desirable and in the public interest, why should it be assumed that I put it there? Why should it be assumed that my colleagues would want to have it there? We have no interest beyond the interests of this country. I have no desire to object for a single moment to hon. gentlemen differing with us, but I can only point out that in following the course we are following in asking parliament to confer these powers upon us we are not doing it for any purpose other than an earnest and honest effort to have available as a precautionary measure the power to safeguard the interests of Canada if the occasion arises. That is all.

Much as I would like to, I cannot agree with the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman. Any thought of the utilization of these powers for electoral purposes does justice neither to himself nor to me. I do not think there is anyone connected with this party who has any desire or thought that this power should be utilized for electoral purposes. The only answer I can make to those who talk in suspicious terms is: Why not be frank about this and admit that there is not an instance which can be pointed to where this power has been abused, that there is not an instance where this power has been used where you yourself would not have used it in the public interest if the necessity had arisen? Because of this and because of the conviction I have that we would be doing the improper thing so far as this country is concerned, I am not prepared to abandon it, much as I would like to meet the views of the right hon. gentleman.

The right hon. gentleman has placed himself freely, frankly and fairly on record with respect to it this year, last year and the year before that. I respect his convictions, but I say that his fears have not been borne out by the results. I challenge any hon. member who will take the time to look into it to say that the power has been abused, the liberty of the subject invaded or his freedom curtailed. He must admit that in every instance subsequent events have shown that the action taken was warranted. This is all I can usefully say in answer to what has been said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in answering my criticism has said that I have added nothing to what I said in previous years except my statement about the position of the president of the United States. In that I think he was quite correct, because I have emphasized over and over again the points I made this afternoon. But my right hon. friend did not reply to what I said as to the difference between the necessity of giving great powers to the president in a time of emergency and the British system under which he as Prime Minister can get whatever he wishes in the way of legislation at any time from this House of Commons. That point he has not answered at all, and to my mind it is the very strongest point that can be made, because it indicates the difference between British parliamentary systems of government and the systems of government that have existed in other countries and particularly, with reference to the subject under discussion, in the United States. I am not going to follow my hon. friend in not replying to him, but I will say, as he said to me, that he has added nothing to what he has said in previous speeches except it be his reference to what has taken place in British Columbia where the government has secured the enactment of the Special Powers Act, and to what has taken place in Alberta in the establishment of a bureau to deal with a number of matters to which the Prime Minister made reference. My first observation, so far as this special legislation is concerned, is that this special powers legislation, to which the Prime Minister has referred, was not known to be in contemplation at the time this statute was drafted for this year.

Mr. BENNETT: The legislation was but not the terms of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is quick to grasp at anything that will serve his purpose, and that seems to serve it for the moment. But may I point out to him that what he has said in regard to British Columbia—and I know he takes very strong exception to what that province has done—is the most powerful argument that can be urged in support of what, on behalf of the opposition, I have been saying on this side in the last three or four years. Neither British Columbia nor Alberta nor any other province in Canada would ever have dreamed of permitting its executive to have the power to do whatever it wished, during the period the legislative body was not in session, except for the example set by this government in connection with this very provision respecting peace, order and good government in its relief legislation. That statement is as true as anything could possibly be. It is one of the reasons why, in my opinion, it is important in connection with all legislation for us to see precisely where we are likely to drift as a result of a particular course of action. To my mind the essence of the matter lies in the difference between this practice which is growing up of legislating according to plans as they may present themselves to the minds of individuals and the practice of legislating in accordance with principles as they have found expression in government under parliamentary institutions now for some generations, principles which bear directly upon all that affects all classes in all parts of the country at all times.

Take the position to which the Prime Minister has referred. He says that the government of the province of British Columbia have taken to themselves all the legislative power of the legislature for the period during which the house is not in session.

Mr. BENNETT: Have vested in the executive.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Well, may I say to my right hon. friend, when he asks, that notwithstanding the existence of any law or statute, he and his colleagues may do what they please when parliament is not in session, under this provision with respect to peace, order and good government, which is merely a designation for the absolute power we are being asked to give that they are doing exactly the same thing. The Prime Minister says, as if it were a very slight additional power, "When we ask, in addition to existing legislation"; but that is not the language of the bill, and this is significant. The language of the proposed statute is not, "in addition to existing legislation" but "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law," and the difference between "in addition to" and "notwithstanding" is the essence of the whole objection we have to this measure. The whole purport and intention of it is that, notwithstanding the existence of any law or statute on the books of this parliament, this government, when parliament is not in session, may legislate as it pleases by order in council. That, I repeat, is the purpose, no matter how you may try to conceal or glide over it by referring to peace, order and good government; the power which the government seeks is the power to legislate as it pleases, apart from parliament altogether and that notwithstanding any law or statute in existence in the country.

Well, what is the position in Canada to-day? The Prime Minister has directed attention to what has taken place in British Columbia, and he has also pointed to what has occurred or is occurring to-day in Alberta. May I suggest that he might have spoken of what has been done in the province of Saskatchewan. The government there have taken to themselves, away from the legislative assembly, vast powers to do as they please with respect to many matters when the legislature is not in session. The Prime Minister might have gone a step further and referred to the province of Manitoba, and have called attention to the measure which was introduced into the legislature of that province within the last few weeks, a measure containing the provision that all powers which the legislature exercises in regard to property and civil rights should cease to be of force or effect if in any way they conflicted with an enactment that this federal government might pass, which would serve the purpose of the provincial exeutive—not of the legislative body but of the executive—at a time when the house was not in session. When the Manitoba house came to discuss the matter the government withdrew that particular clause, with the result that it does not form part of the measure since enacted. But it would have been embodied in that measure had it not been that the forum which the legislature provides permitted argument to carry weight and to prevail, rather than that mere force of numbers should succeed in granting the authority necessary to do that particular thing.

There is the situation to-day—all four western provinces imitating the example set by this government have given their executives power to legislate as they please when the legislature is not in session. But why should the tendency stop with these four provinces, if that is to be the new method of dealing with public affairs in Canada? If that method is going to prevail, then we shall probably find the government of Ontario taking a similar course before long, and possibly the government of the province of Quebec, possibly the government of New Brunswick, and the government of Nova Scotia as well. And what shall we have then? Instead of a number of representative assemblies laying down the laws of the country we shall have so many soviets established in different parts of Canada. We have a dictatorship at Ottawa and, if the process extends, we shall have dictatorships as well in different parts of the country—a nice condition to contemplate. I submit that all this is leading this country along entirely wrong lines; it is imitating the worst features of what has taken place in Europe and rejecting the best of what we possess. After all, what is the situation in Europe to-day? We find that little by little one country after another has torpedoed whatever authority its legislative body possessed, and that power has been handed over, in one instance to a Mussolini, in another to a Hitler, in a third to a Stalin, and so on, until we find a group of dictators taking the place of representative bodies in determining what shall be the law and what shall govern the liberties and freedom of the people. And instead of resisting that sort of thing the Prime Minister takes the view that because these countries have done this sort of thing therefore we should do likewise. My reply to him, so far as that is concerned, is this: Because they have done it we should show them that it is not necessary. This the more, because they will have to recede from that position eventually. The world cannot go on being governed in that fashion. Sooner or later these dictatorships will have to end and power to legislate and control, if it is to be exercised for the wellbeing of the many, will have to reside as we of the British tradition boast it does, in the great representative assemblies, to which executives are wholly responsible. For my part, I should like to see this parliament hold its own as a truly representative body which would at all times exercise the collective will in determining what shall be done in the matter of legislation, instead of permitting the will of any individual or group of individuals to prevail, however able and sincere they may be.

Let me assure the Prime Minister frankly that I am not questioning his sincerity or his motive; I do not believe that he intends to use this power in any indefensible way. But I do say that the minute he takes that sort of power to himself and the government, he has set an example and given a reason to the premier of British Columbia, to the premier of Alberta, to the premier of Saskatchewan and to the premier of Manitoba and to all other provincial premiers to do likewise. Those I have mentioned have all followed his example in greater or less degree up to this point and others may very soon do the same.

Now, what position shall we be in when parliament is prorogued? Here is the position to which we have drifted in Canada. We have at Ottawa a government free to do anything it pleases by order in council. In British Columbia there is a government free to do anything it pleases by order in council. If what the Prime Minister has said is true, we have in Alberta a government free to do any thing it pleases by order in council—along certain lines. The same, I believe is, now true also of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Who is going to know what his liberties are, and how long they are to be preserved? During the session further legislation already brought down will be discussed which will reveal the extent to which we are to be asked to abandon parliamentary institutions, even going the length of delegating to groups unknown at the present time, the right to come together, to enact any measure they please, and further to provide that, once they have determined what specific rules are to govern in an industry, there is not even to be recourse to the courts of the land against what they may lay down as determining factors governing trade and industry. This all simply shows whither we are heading. This tendency to get away altogether from the control of legislative bodies leads inevitably to getting away from the courts as well. One may deride communism and hurl one's bolts at socialism, but in communism and socialism there is nothing essentially different from that. Communism simply gives to a collective group the right to run things themselves regardless of a body properly representative. Socialism gives to a group the right to manage the business of the country as best they can under autocratic powers; powers that in the last analysis have to be supported by force on a large scale.

Mr. HEAPS: What form of socialism delegates such powers as those which the right hon. gentleman describes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where socialism undertakes to run the industries of a country, it cannot attempt that, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, without having bureaucratic powers, without having autocratic powers, without having its efforts supported by force on a tremendous scale. That kind of administration of public affairs is not what is wanted in Canada, or what is needed in any part of the world. What the world needs to-day is, true enough, to have industry controlled, regulated, to have all the conditions under which men and women are to work and earn their livelihood and to live made such that a larger and fuller life will be possible to all and that just relations may be made to prevail in industry and trade and other relations of life. But the way that can be brought about and maintained is by this institution of parliament as we have it to-day where the representatives not of any one class but of the people of all classes and of all parts of the country meet together and, after a full and free discussion of all sides of a situation, decide what is best for all, what is most in the public interest.

Mr. HEAPS: In those countries that have a dictatorship at the present time, was it not the socialist party that was suppressed?

Mr. HANBURY: How about Russia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend has pointed out amounts to this: It is just one autocracy or bureaucracy that has suppressed another. It so happens that in the countries he has in mind the fascists have been a little stronger, and have at the moment more power than the socialists. But imagine the socialists being in control in those communities! What would the position of the rest of the people be under a government exercising the autocratic powers essential to the socialistic state. My contention is that we do not need fascism or communism; what we do need above all is the maintainance of the British system of representative government as we understand it and as it has developed through the years, and to have changes of the social order effected in a constitutional manner through that agency; not the destruction, as would otherwise be inevitable, alike of parliamentary institutions and the social order.

My criticism of this legislation is that it is baneful in the extreme because of the example it sets in matters of government. It is very serious, in my opinion, that this sort of legislation should again appear this year, and that an effort should once more be made to drive it through parliament. That was the reason—and I think the Prime Minister will credit me with sincerity in the position I took—I opposed this legislation so strongly at the outset. If he looks over what I said at the time, he will find that my main criticism was in the nature of the query: Where is this kind of thing taking us? Where are we going? That is the question the people of Canada will be asking themselves very soon in regard to this world revolutionary movement that is influencing this country as well as all others. So far, we have been more fortunate and in a better position than other countries, but with the rapid way in which thought is influencing action and conduct in different parts of the world, if men are going to imitate what is worst and throw out what is best in governmental methods, what hope is there for anyone?

I have said all I intended to say on this section, but I say it with the deepest conviction and out of a fear that so far as Canada is concerned we are at this very time, to use once more a phrase that has been used in another connection, at the parting of the ways. We have to decide whether we shall stand for those institutions that have maintained liberty in the interests of all, and brought about and secured that liberty through their parliament as the palladium of liberty, or whether we are going to cease to have government conducted on a representative and responsible basis and go in for one or other of these extremes, the extreme of communism, on the one hand or of socialism or of fascism on the other.

Mr. HANBURY: Referring to this particular measure, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave us the example of British Columbia, but I am frank to admit that I cannot yet see—and I would like to have him enlighten me in the matter— what measures they could adopt there, notwithstanding the latitude they have taken, that would be beyond their powers in so far as the federal government is concerned. The Prime Minister has given as a particular reason for the necessity of the inclusion of this special feature of the bill, the action already taken by British Columbia and Alberta. I cannot see how they could take any action that would in any way interfere with the rights of this parliament, and I would be glad if the Prime Minister could enlighten me on this point.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask a question of the Minister of Labour? Under clause 2 the dominion may enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein. Is it the intention of the department in entering into such agreements to have a regulation insisting upon audit of accounts by the federal authority?

Mr. GORDON: The government at the present time insists upon an audit by the auditor general. As early as the fall of 1930 the matter of audits by the auditor general was taken up with him and his officials. Before this bill goes through I shall spread upon the record the orders in council and the correspondence that passed, but in the fall of 1930 the auditor general certified to the method that should be pursued with respect to auditing those accounts.

Mr. VENIOT: To the provincial governments?

Mr. GORDON: To the Labour department. It developed in 1932 by reason of certain complaints that came to the notice of the Labour department that the course which had been adopted, and which was certified as sufficient for the purpose by the auditor general, was probably not as complete as it should be. Then an order in council was passed in September, 1932 specifically directing the auditor general as to the course that the government desired him to take.

Mr. VENIOT: Did it direct the auditor general to make an audit at that time?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: In September, 1932?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, September, 1932. That was again followed by a further order in council elaborating on the first.

Mr. VENIOT: That of the tenth of October?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, I think it was the tenth. However, before the discussion of the bill is finished I will spread the orders in council upon the record so that hon. members will have full knowledge of their contents and of the dates on which they were passed.

Mr. VENIOT: The reason I asked that question was to draw the attention of the minister to what I consider was a lack of care on the part of his department, and perhaps also a lack of care on the part of the branch known as the audit department. Why should the department of the Minister of Labour, or the audit department accept an estimate as a basis for payment of federal aid to New Brunswick, as they did in the matter of stumpage? The province of New Brunswick entered into an agreement with the federal authorities that if they reduced the stumpage charge to the lumbermen of that province in order to encourage operation and give employment to bushmen that winter, the federal government would reimburse the provincial government to a certain extent—I do not remember what the proportion was. When the time came to reimburse the province the Department of Labour accepted a certificate from the provincial government of an estimated stumpage to be paid that year. There is no mistake about it; I have it right here in the auditor's report—that payment was made on a certificate of an estimated amount of $51,556.29. It was found later on, when the auditor general audited the accounts of the province of New Brunswick at this point, that the federal government had overpaid $2,523.12.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the date of the provincial government's certificate?

Mr. VENIOT: 1932.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very indefinite. What time of the year?

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman wants to get pernickety about it he had better look it up himself. I am drawing the attention of the Minister of Labour to the report of the auditor general of Canada. He is not giving the dates, and I cannot be expected to supply them. I have his report here in my hand. He reported that the federal authority paid their proportion on an estimated certificate by the Department of Lands and Mines of New Brunswick. If that does not show lack of care in handling relief funds I want someone to find a name for it.

Let me give another reason why there should be a careful audit. In the proportion paid by the dominion Department of Labour of the cost of construction of the electric power line from Dalhousie to Jacquet River, also in the county of York-Sunbury, the auditor general's report shows that there was an overpayment of practically $4,000. If a proper audit had been made at the time there would not be the necessity to ask for a refund to-day. The minister will remember that at the time I drew his attention to these two works, especially the Jacquet River works. I claimed then that the federal government had no right to pay any unemployment relief money for that construction, because the hydro electric commission of New Brunswick had authority to borrow money for that work, which was a revenue producing work. Not only is it bringing revenue, but a surplus over operating expense comes to the treasury of the province of New Brunswick. I pointed out that that money would have been better used to help real unemployment in some other section of New Brunswick. The minister at that time promised me that he would give particular attention to this; that he would look into it. He admitted that if it was a revenue producing enterprise it should not be included in the category in which it was placed. Yet that work went on, and I have yet to learn that the minister carried out the promise he then made that he would look into it.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. VENIOT: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was speaking about stumpage, and the fact that the share of the federal government was paid on estimates submitted by the Department of Lands and Mines of the province of New Brunswick, instead of being paid after the accounts were submitted and the amounts known. I was asked the date to which I was referring, and according to the auditor general's report I find it was May 1, 1932, after logging operations were completed.

I was attempting to show how these accounts could, without proper investigation, be—I was going to use the word cooked, but I do not mean it in that sense—but how these accounts can be made up so as to mislead. For instance, at page 11 of the report of the auditor general I find an item of $41,000 as a bonus for clearing lands. The federal government's share was fifty per cent. Let me explain that long before the depression set in—perhaps a year or two—the government of New Brunswick passed an act in which, in order to encourage the opening up of more lands, they granted a bonus of eight dollars an acre to those farmers who would break up new lands, and who held titles to such lands. The reason the stipulation was made as to titles was to distinguish between the settler on crown lands who had not yet obtained his title, and the established farmer. Under this provincial legislation the established farmer with one hundred acres of land, only forty or fifty acres of which was clear, and who undertook to clear more of his land, received eight dollars an acre. When the depression set in and the federal government decided to aid unemployment by paying a percentage of the costs, the government of New Brunswick transferred this act so that it operated under federal aid. In 1931 fifty per cent of the $41,000 paid in connection with the clearing of this land was paid under the federal aid system and charged to unemployment relief. The federal Department of Labour certified and made the payments.

I suggest that this money could not have been paid as unemployment relief, because the farmers who received the eight dollars per acre were well to do; they did not require any relief in 1931. Prior to the depression years they received this money under legislation of New Brunswick which had for its purpose encouraging the opening up of more lands. Yet we find that fifty per cent of that is charged to and paid by the federal Department of Labour. I am pointing this out not so much to criticize the department but to show how necessary it is that care should be taken and every precaution exercised by the federal Department of Labour to see that the moneys voted by parliament are properly expended and not used for purposes for which they were not intended.

The minister has said that authority was given for an audit. I believe he stated that it was in September, 1933, the government consulted with the audit department and had come to the conclusion that an audit should take place. However, that audit was not made until late in 1933. I should like to know from the minister whether the audit contemplated by the order in council passed in September, 1933, will apply to all works done by the provinces or municipalities to which the federal Department of Labour would contribute, and whether that audit will be made from the date of the adoption of the relief legislation, or rather from the time the work was begun. I wish further to ask the minister whether in connection with laying out public works projects the engineers representing the federal government will have anything to say as to the approval of locations of such projects. The reason I ask that is that the auditor's report I have before me sets forth that the approval of projects given by the federal Department of Labour was so broad that almost any kind of work, even work not contemplated under the agreements, could be included. I know that condition has prevailed. I know that in my own county work was charged up to unemployment relief which could not possibly have come under the federal agreement. Yet hundreds and thousands of dollars were charged up in that way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a large statement to make.

Mr. VENIOT: I gave this statement in 1932, before I ever saw the auditor general's report, and from the floor of this house I read into Hansard the names of the roads in question. I do not now intend to tax my memory—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member said "hundreds of thousands."

Mr. VENIOT: I said "hundreds and thousands of dollars." I did not say "hundreds of thousands." The hon. member for York-Sunbury ought to be more careful when he interjects.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It sounded very much like "hundreds of thousands," and just about as large as the hon. member's statements usually are.

Mr. VENIOT: If my statements are too large for the hon. member may I say to him that I know some statements I could make which would be considered far larger than those I am making now. I do not think the hon. member has any right to interject; if he has anything to say let him get up and say it after I have finished. If he has any objections to offer to my criticism he has a perfect right to make them at the proper time. I suggest, however, that he should allow me to proceed with what I have to say.

The figures I have given are taken from the reports before me prepared by the auditor general, and I take them to be correct. In fact I know some of them of my own knowledge to be perfectly in order.

Mr. GORDON: I wonder if the hon. member would permit an interjection?

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly.

Mr. GORDON: I have a recollection of the comments that were made by the hon. member with reference to the work to which he is now referring. An officer of the Labour department was sent down to inquire into the work that was going on, and as a matter of fact the federal government did not contribute anything to that work.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister is mistaken. It is true that a gentleman by the name of Carter was sent down, and he reported among other things that the work on the Bathurst and old Miramichi road did not include federal aid. But I have here on my desk a reply to a question that was submitted by an opposition member in the legislature of New Brunswick to the Minister of Public Works of that province, asking for the names of the roads in the county of Gloucester to which the federal government had contributed, and included in those roads, in the answer submitted by the Minister of Public Works for New Brunswick, was this Miramichi road. I read to the house at the time a certified copy of the answer of the Minister of Public Works of New Brunswick.

Mr. GORDON: Quite true, but while that may have appeared in some record in New Brunswick, the fact remains that the federal government did not contribute to that road.

Mr. VENIOT: The federal government did contribute to the Miramichi road. More than that, I have it right here in the auditor general's report under the name of the Eskidillock road. If the minister wants to look at the report I will send it over to him. I know what I am talking about when I am talking of my own county anyway, and I know the facts in regard to other counties if my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) wants to know. I know that in the county of York, represented by the hon. gentleman opposite, the accounts submitted to the Labour department included items for medical care, medicine and dental service, which instead of being charged up under those heads were charged up to food in the city of Fredericton.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not correct.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the auditor general is a liar.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I investigated that statement when I was at home—

Mr. VENIOT: The auditor general is not telling the truth?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What happened in the city of Fredericton was that the mayor, one of my hon. friend's friends and a defeated candidate once or twice, and a man who is going to run again I understand, authorized medical relief in the city of Fredericton. When the accounts were gone into the attention of the authorities was called to the matter and the money was refunded by the city of Fredericton.

Mr. VENIOT: The auditor general in this report says that these items were entered as food, and he recommends that the Minister of Labour have the amount refunded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has been refunded.

Mr. VENIOT: Then my statement is correct, that it was charged up as food.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It never was entered as food.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the auditor general lies in this report. I believe the auditor general.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe the officials of the city of Fredericton who are not here to defend themselves.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not accusing the auditor general, but my hon. friend is. The hon. member for York-Sunbury states that the auditor general has made a mistake when he sets out in his report that this stuff was charged up to food. The hon. member says that that statement is not correct. It is he who is accusing the auditor general, not the hon. member for Gloucester. I am trying to defend the auditor general who is not here to defend himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nor are the officials of the city of Fredericton.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not touching the question of the Fredericton officials; I am simply giving the facts as reported by the auditor general. He goes further and says that the same thing was done in the city of Saint John, that medical care and medicine and dental service was charged up to clothing. He states further that clothing collected by the Daughters of the Empire and handed in without any cost to the relief committee in the city of Saint John, given absolutely free, had a price put on it and fifty per cent of that was charged up to federal aid. That is what the auditor general says in his report here; it is not the hon. member for Gloucester who is saying it. If my hon. friend from York-Sunbury will take the trouble to read this report he will find out that every word I have stated is to be found in it, and it ill behooves the hon. gentleman to stand up in this house and say that the auditor general's report is not correct. If the auditor general is making reports to the government and to this house, because he is the servant of this house, that are not correct, he should be impeached. We should not allow an officer to continue in the public service if he is making reports to this house which members can stand up and say are false. The government should look into the matter.

There is another item which I take from the auditor general's report, and perhaps my hon. friend from York-Sunbury will say that this also is not correct. It has been the custom for years—I know it was the practice when I occupied the position of Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick—for the Indian department in the federal government to contribute fifty per cent of the cost of roads constructed across the Indian reserves in the province, the provincial government paying the other fifty per cent. This same practice prevailed in 1932. The Indian department of the federal government paid fifty per cent, or $258, for the construction of a road across the Indian reserve at Church point in Northumberland county. Now what do we find the provincial government doing? They charge their share up to federal aid, and it is paid by the federal Department of Labour; and so the Department of Public Works in New Brunswick gets paid twice for the same work. The auditor general recommends in this report that the forty per cent—I see it is forty per cent, not fifty per cent—that was charged up to the Department of Labour be refunded by the province of New Brunswick.

I think I have shown plainly enough by these items, Mr. Chairman, that it is necessary that an absolutely strict audit be made by the federal department.

Before resuming my seat I wish to refer to a matter which came up this afternoon in a discussion between the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and the Minister of Labour as to the fixing of wages in Ontario. It was stated this afternoon that 25 cents an hour was to be the maximum wage paid under the Ontario government's relief plan for the unemployed, and the question was raised as to what the federal government should pay. Would it not be possible when entering into agreements with the various provinces to provide for the fixing of a uniform maximum or minimum wage? When the road and bridge work was being carried on in 1931 and 1932 to help out unemployment, the wages paid in the various provinces varied considerably. Labour should be worth as much in New Brunswick as it is in Ontario, British Columbia or any other province. The wage paid in New Brunswick was $2.10 per day, with a deduction of 60 cents per day when the man boarded in the road camp. I ask the minister to study this phase of the situation and see if it is not possible to fix a uniform wage in the different provinces.

Coming down to the contribution of the federal government to reimburse the provincial government for the lowering of the stumpage rates, for the making up of the difference between what would have been collected had the regular stumpage rate applied and what was collected under the reduced rate: In the two years 1931 and 1932 this difference amounted to somewhere around $96,000 or $97,000. Having entered into an agreement with the province to reimburse them for the loss caused by the reduction in stumpage, I should like to ask the minister if he could not see that a corresponding increase is given to the men getting out the lumber. If a corresponding increase is out of the question, I should like to see a minimum wage paid to these men. I think it should be stated that if these men were not paid a reasonable wage, no federal aid would be given. I understand that the provinces are looking into this phase of the matter, and New Brunswick has passed an act to cover it. I was brought to task the other day for not mentioning this fact, but the reason I did not do so was that the act was to come into force upon proclamation; it had not yet been proclaimed, and therefore I did not refer to it as an act in force. I understand that the act has since been proclaimed and a commission appointed, under Judge Grimmer I believe, to look into lumbering operations in the province with a view to seeing that the men receive better treatment than they have in the past. The matter of wages to be paid to the men working in the bush may come up, and I ask the minister, should the question of reimbursing the province for the reduction in stumpage be brought forward, that he make certain that a reasonable wage is fixed before federal aid is granted. It may be said that this government does not desire to interfere with the provincial governments in their operations, but it should be remembered that we are contributing forty or fifty per cent of the difference between the stumpage which would have been collected at the regular rate and that collected under the reduced rate. Under these circumstances we have a perfect right to say to the provincial government that they must assure us that proper treatment in the way of wages and accommodation is given to the men working in the bush and making the profits for the lumbermen.

This is all I have to say at the moment, but I may have further remarks to make on other sections of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to intervene in this discussion and probably would not have done so were it not for some wild statements made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot).

Mr. VENIOT: What right has the hon. gentleman to say that my statements are wild?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of the mistaken statements.

Mr. VENIOT: He cannot say that either under the rules of this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will say, unfounded statements made by the hon. member.

Mr. VENIOT: He cannot say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have said it.

Mr. VENIOT: I ask that you withdraw that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that is unparliamentary.

Mr. VENIOT: It is unparliamentary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we were not in a position to make statements of that kind in connection with statements made by the hon. member and many others like him who sit around him, we would never be able to contradict a statement. As a matter of fact, I think the remarks made by the hon. member for Gloucester this afternoon and this evening will indicate to hon. members of this committee that there is a general election in the offing in New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not know that. Are you speaking for the government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am not speaking for the government. The hon. member is beginning to lay a foundation for an attack on the provincial government which his friends in the legislature have failed wholly to do during the last session.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have heard other animals make noises like that.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege: while it is against the rules of the house to apply such a term to an hon. member, may I be permitted to say that I have listened to jackasses braying better than the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My main reason for taking up a few minutes of the time of the committee is to comment upon two or three references made this afternoon by the hon. gentleman, and to what may be termed a charge of misappropriation of relief funds in New Brunswick. I have not read the report of the auditor general and I do not know what is in it, but I venture to say that his report is simply based upon the statements made by his officers. During the holidays a statement was given out to the press that there had been misappropriation of funds by the city of Fredericton. Anticipating that this matter would come up, I made it my business during the vacation to interview the relief officer in that city. What happened was this: Under the contracts made between the two governments there was no provision for medical attendance, medicine or dental relief. The mayor of that city, who is a bosom friend of the hon. gentleman and who has suffered at least one defeat in supporting his policy and will probably suffer more—

Mr. VENIOT: No, he will not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This gentleman is a public spirited citizen. He has been mayor of our city for a long time and is a personal friend of mine.

Mr. VENIOT: He will not be after what you say to-night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is making this speech?

Mr. VENIOT: I just want to give you an example.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everyone knows that Mr. Clark is a public spirited citizen and has given much of his valuable time to public service. He is not to be condemned if he has political ambitions, although they are not likely to be realized for a long time. What he did was to see that in contributing a measure of relief to the poor and unemployed of Fredericton there should be included medical attendances, medicine and dental relief. In the first instance these were paid for by the city, although that was contrary to the letter of the agreement between the provincial and federal governments. When attention was called to the fact that the city had gone beyond the letter of the contract, the error, if such it may be termed, was immediately rectified and the amount reimbursed to the provincial government. I do not think that even my hon. friend will say that the city of Fredericton did wrong in providing medical and dental relief if necessary, and if it was wrong, then it was a great pleasure for the people of that city to pay it out of their own pockets as taxpayers. Moreover, we will continue to give medical relief so long as the exigencies of the situation call for it.

The hon. gentleman took some exception to the expenditure of unemployment relief moneys in the extension of hydro in the province of New Brunswick, including a part of my constituency. That was an extension of hydro lines in rural communities, work which would never have been undertaken by the commission unless they were getting federal assistance. We have been able to put lines into communities where a hydro line would never pay, where hydro would never have been extended, where the capital cost would not have been warranted, and we have been able to do so because of the contribution made by this government. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will go into York county and condemn that expenditure in the next election.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not condemn it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what was the object of mentioning it? Will he go into Jacquet River and condemn the expenditure that was made there? The fact is that the expenditure was a proper one, as was well understood by everyone.

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly it was a proper expenditure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the reduction of stumpage, I agree that the reduction should have been passed on, as far as reasonably possible, to the men who worked on the project, and I believe that this was done except in a few individual instances. In certain cases, as in all other phases of activity, there will however be always the exception, the man who will queer the pitch, so to speak, and who will not pass on this sort of thing. But as a rule the lumber operators in New Brunswick did pass along the reduction, and if they did not increase wages they increased the number of men employed, granting relief that way. On the whole, by and large, I want to say that unemployment relief in New Brunswick has been carried on in as honest and systematic a way as it has been in any province in Canada, and it ill becomes the hon. member from Gloucester to foul his own nest even in the face of a provincial election. That is what he has done to-night, but it will not get him votes down there; I will tell him that,—

Mr. VENIOT: You will find out after the election.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):—because they know the hon. gentleman.

Mr. VENIOT: And so is my hon. friend known, not only in York county, but he is known before the barristers' association.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very nice, isn't it?

Mr. VENIOT: Don't you become personal and I will not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not becoming personal; I am speaking as a politician to you.

Mr. VENIOT: I am talking as a politician and a lawyer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will put my reputation in New Brunswick alongside the hon. gentleman's.

Mr. VENIOT: I have never been condemned by any society I ever belonged to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps you never belonged to any.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, just as good societies as the hon. gentleman belongs to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman was condemned by the electors of New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: I have never had any of my colleagues in politics, opposed to me or for me, condemn me in the way the hon. gentleman was condemned for his action in connection with certain matters in the province of New Brunswick.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Cheap.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Order.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman got personal and I do not see by what right I should be called down because I am retorting in kind.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): The discussion is getting away from the amendment.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but who brought it on? I did not; the hon. gentleman did, and he is always that way. He is a lawyer and is used to the practice, when a man is defending a bad case, of abusing opposing counsel. That is what he practises. Now, in order to put myself right in the statement I made in connection with the city of Fredericton, let me read what the auditor general says in Annex A, 1:

> Drugs, medical supplies and also medical and dental fees were included as "food" in claims to which the federal government contributed. The irregular claims in this regard should be computed and the necessary refunds made to the federal government.

I would ask the minister whether the refund has been made as suggested by the auditor general.

Mr. GORDON: Adjustments and refunds are being constantly made, and while I have not the figures for this particular item I have no doubt that the refund has been made. Wherever it is found that there has been any departure from the agreement, or some little matter of that kind has perhaps not followed the exact terms of the agreement, we find that on bringing it to the attention of any of the provincial governments adjustments and refunds are made without difficulty.

Mr. VENIOT: I agree with the hon. gentleman and think he is quite correct in stating that when the attention of the provincial government is drawn to any misapplication, if I may use that term, of federal funds, the refund will be made and likely has been made in the past. But that is all the more reason for the stand I take to-night, that there have not been sufficient safeguards surrounding the expenditure of federal aid money, not only in the province of New Brunswick but in other provinces, because it is rife throughout the dominion. I am not attacking only the province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend from York-Sunbury says that I am trying to besmirch the reputation of that province. I am not attempting to besmirch its reputation at all, but I do deprecate the idea of allowing such a misuse of public funds to go on as revealed here in the report of the auditor general. At any rate, I have the courage of my convictions and stand in this house to denounce that sort of thing, and that is more than the hon. member for York-Sunbury can say, because he is scared that in denouncing misdemeanours of that kind he will be reflecting on a government he so loudly praises and to which he is so solidly attached that he cannot see any good in those differing from him in political opinion. That is the only reason that prompts me to expose the matter. I drew the attention of the government to the state of affairs in 1932 and warned them then against certain misdemeanours and certain misappropriations of money, not by the individual who wanted to boodle or graft but by the provinces and municipalities who were using the money in a way in which it should not have been used, so that it did not reach the unemployed whom it should have reached.

Let me give you an instance of how unemployment relief is administered. Here again I wish to impress upon the minister that in making agreements with the different provinces he should be careful to stipulate what agreements these provinces shall make with the municipalities, and that the federal government shall have a word to say as regards the manner in which the municipalities are to distribute federal unemployment relief, instead of leaving it entirely to the provinces to deal with the municipalities. In the example I am going to give I am speaking of a matter whereof I know. It became the practice in 1932 for them to go to a farmer and say, "You have lumber on your land. There are a lot of people who are too poor to buy wood and we want you to sell to us, the committee in charge of relief in this district, fifty or one hundred cords of wood. We will pay you fifty cents a cord as the wood stands. We will cut it and it will be hauled off your land." The farmer agrees to that and the wood is cut. The wood is not given to be hauled by the individual who really needs it for relief, but teams belonging to independent farmers are engaged to haul that wood at so much a cord. The cost of the wood when it reaches its destination amounts, including the fifty cents stumpage so-called, to $2.50 to $3 a cord to the municipal committee. The municipal committee, instead of distributing that wood to the poor and needy, sells it at so much a cord to some individual who undertakes to sell it to the public. He does not sell it to the unemployed because they have no money to pay for it, but when the municipal committee require wood they go to this individual and pay him $4 a cord for wood that they could have given to the needy person at a cost of $1.50 a cord. The federal government is asked to pay thirty-three and a third per cent of the cost of that class of relief work and the poor individual who is in need of wood does not get it until the municipality buys it back at the rate of $4 a cord from the individual to whom it had sold it at from $2.50 to $3 a cord. There is a great deal of wood needed among the poor people, especially if we have another winter like the one through which we are just passing. This shows that the minister should take particular care to give instructions to the provincial government that the agreements entered into between the provincial government and the municipalities shall, before becoming operative, be submitted to the Minister of Labour at Ottawa for his approval. If that system is adopted, the very misdemeanours, if I may so term them, to which I have just now referred, will be avoided.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where does that occur?

Mr. VENIOT: It occurs; that is all I say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In Gloucester?

Mr. VENIOT: No, it occurs in York.

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps at this juncture I might make some observations about the method that was pursued by the Department of Labour in connection with the disbursement of unemployment relief funds. It may be recalled that in 1922 we had a similar sort of situation to that experienced in 1930, and the then government outlined a plan of assistance from the federal government to the provinces. This will be revealed in an order in council dated January 25, 1922, P.C. 191. I will ask the consent of the committee to have this order in council spread upon the record. It reads:

P.C. 191

Certified copy of a report of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 25th January, 1922.

Privy Council
Canada

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 25th January, 1922, from the Prime Minister submitting the following observations with reference to the order in council of 7th October, 1921 (P.C. 3831), respecting unemployment relief.

1. The present administration, assuming office at the close of the year 1921, finds that a condition of unemployment beginning in the late months of 1920 and continuing throughout the year 1921 does not promise any material abatement during the early winter months of 1922.

2. Consideration has been given to the means which would seem best adapted to the relief of the distress resulting from severe unemployment conditions, and the provisions to this end of P.C. 3831 have been carefully noted.

3. The minister concurs in the view that the question of unemployment relief is fundamentally a municipal and provincial responsibility; that the abnormal economic and industrial conditions now existing and arising in a measure out of the late war alone afford justification for action on the part of the federal authorities; that federal action must therefore supplement municipal and provincial efforts, must be designed on lines permitting close and effective co-operation with and supervision by municipal and provincial authorities, and must be proportioned by the efforts of those authorities.

4. That municipal undertakings in the nature of public works are important factors in meeting unemployment conditions, but such undertakings cannot be proceeded with during the winter months save at a considerably increased cost, which is in many cases beyond the financial resources of the municipalities.

5. That, having these various points in mind, it is desirable that federal employment assistance and unemployment relief should be granted on the following basis:

(a) In the case of public works undertaken by a municipality during the winter months and specially with a view to the relief of unemployment in the district, the municipality will bear the normal cost and the federal government will bear one-half of the extra cost incurred by the prosecution of the work during the winter season, the estimate of the normal cost to be approved by officers of the federal Department of Public Works; the federal grant to be conditional on the province assuming responsibility for one-third of such excess expenditure.

(b) That where work cannot be provided, the federal government will refund to a municipality one-third of the disbursements made on account of unemployment relief, disbursed to others than those specified in paragraph (d) following and conditional on the participation on an equal basis by the province concerned.

(c) That where in certain provinces there are unorganized districts without municipal government in which unemployment or distress exists and the provincial government finds it necessary to administer a system of unemployment or distress relief, the federal government will reimburse the provincial government concerned to the extent of one-half of such disbursements for relief and for the administration of the unemployment or distress relief policy in the district.

(d) That in the case of unemployed former members of the Canadian or British forces, now in Canada, discharged as physically fit or not entitled to assistance by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment. the federal government will reimburse the municipal authorities to the extent of one-half the disbursements made for unemployment relief, the remaining quota to be contributed in equal parts by the province and municipality respectively.

6. It is to be noted that these regulations do not seek to meet the case of disabled members of the Canadian overseas forces and other classes of returned soldiers which fall within the jurisdiction of regulations administered by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; or of persons (where such exist) whose necessities do not clearly arise from inability to secure employment and with whose necessities the municipal authorities have been accustomed to deal.

7. It is the expectation of the federal authorities that the provisions herein will be interpreted broadly and generously by the municipalities and the provinces so that no resident of Canada willing and able to work and unable to secure employment shall lack food, clothing or shelter for himself or herself and dependants.

8. These provisions to continue in effect until the close of the present fiscal year.

The committee concur in the foregoing observations and recommendations and submit the same for approval accordingly.

(Sgd.) Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I would call particular attention to paragraph 7. Perhaps it will be remembered that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Veniot) who has just spoken, was a member of the government at that time.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not catch that. What was it?

Mr. GORDON: This was an order in council passed by the federal government on January 25, 1922. In order that proper safeguards might be thrown around the contribution of federal moneys under that order in council, the auditor general was consulted in the matter and he adopted a form of certificate wherein the municipal treasurer, the minister of labour or his deputy and the provincial treasurer would certify to the expenditure. With the consent of the committee I would like to have that certificate spread upon Hansard for the information of the members. It is as follows:

Form D 3
Civilian

The Dominion Government
In account with
The municipality of.. .. ..
Month.. .. .. ..192..

To unemployment relief disbursed by municipality:—
Number of applicants (married) given relief..
Number of dependants given relief.. .. .. ..

This account when certified by the provincial treasurer to be forwarded to the Department of Labour, Ottawa.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister stated that I was a member of the government in 1922. I was not.

Mr. GORDON: I thought the hon. member was a member of the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: I was a member of the government of New Brunswick in 1922. I thought the minister spoke of the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: The federal government under this order in council to which I have just made reference, and following the practice laid down by the auditor general at that time as disclosed in the certificate, disbursed to the provinces and to the municipalities moneys from the dominion treasury.

In 1930 after the passage of the first relief act the same question arose and the method to be employed was discussed by the director of unemployment relief with the auditor general. A form of certificate much more restrictive than the one which was employed in 1922 was adopted by the auditor general, and I would ask the consent of the committee to have this certificate spread upon Hansard. It is as follows:

(Crest)
Canada
Department of Labour
Unemployment Relief Act, 1930
Certificate of expenditure under section 8 of regulations (P.C. 2246)

The undersigned hereby certify that the amount of $ .. ..dollars .. ..cents is due to the province of .. .. by the dominion government in respect of (A).. .. ..

and broadly speaking the administration of the moneys of the taxpayers, municipal, provincial and federal, has been free from any sort of pilfering or looting such as suggested by some hon. members.

However, a time came when certain irregularities appeared, and the attention of the auditor general was drawn to them. It came to a head with respect to Port Alfred in Chicoutimi county. The director of unemployment relief notified the auditor general that he thought it desirable that a further investigation, outside of the then prevailing practice, should take place with respect to that municipality and some others that seemed to be in a similar condition. Now what happened? Apart perhaps from a test audit, nothing was done until September, 1932, when order in council P.C. 2163 was passed by the executive. With the leave of the committee I would like to put this upon the record. In giving directions to the auditor general the order in council states:

In view of the foregoing,—

That is, after reciting the necessity for further audit.

—the minister recommends that the auditor general be authorized to conduct such audit of provincial accounts, in connection with unemployment relief expenditures, as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury;

Then further on:

The minister further recommends that the auditor general be authorized to investigate the provincial systems of auditing municipal relief accounts, to the end that the dominion government may be satisfied that the municipal accounts put forward by the provinces are in accordance with the agreements entered into between the dominion government and the provinces.

That order in council was assented to on September 30, 1932. After the passage of that order in council the Labour department again called the attention of the auditor general to the necessity of carrying out the directions therein contained. I ask that the order in council be incorporated into the record, which order reads as follows:

The Relief Act, 1932
P.C. 2163

Certified to be a true copy of minute of a meeting of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 30th September, 1932.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 27th September, 1932, from the Minister of Labour, submitting as follows:

1. That parliament has enacted legislation dealing with relief which may be cited as

The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930,

The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931,

The Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1931,

The Relief Act, 1932.

2. That the auditor general has had a survey made in the offices of the Ontario government at Toronto, of the accounts, records, etc., of payments made to the province of Ontario under the agreements entered into under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and has advised the minister that his investigations indicate:

(a) The province does not receive sufficient proof of payments made under the act by municipalities.

(b) The province relies almost entirely upon the good faith of the officers of the municipalities for assurance that claims are made only for expenditures properly chargeable against the dominion.

(c) It appears that claims have already been presented and payments made thereon which may be open to question.

(d) In the case of expenditure where the proportion payable by the municipality is collected from private sources, the municipality is thereby exempt from payment of any portion of such expenditure.

3. That under date of April 20, 1932, the auditor general advised the minister that accounts submitted for payment based on agreements with the provinces under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, were in the approved form, certified by authorized officers of the provincial governments and officers of the Department of Labour, who passed them for payment after examination, and that this procedure was considered a sufficient safeguard for the payment of the federal government's share of the expenditure, and for that reason the auditor general was justified in taking no exception to the general principles under which the accounts were administered nor "until recently of the ultimate effects of certain interpretations of the regulations under which the moneys voted were to be paid."

4. That under date of July 4, 1932, the auditor general has submitted a report made by his officers dated June 27, 1932, being the result of an investigation made of the accounts and records of the Saskatchewan relief commission at Regina, and that in this report it is stated "The test audit made by me does not relieve the Department of Labour from making the detailed audit called for by Section 54 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, Chapter 178, R.S. 1927."

5. That under date of August 2, 1932, the auditor general has submitted a report dated July 30, 1932, being an investigation of unemployment relief payments in the province of Saskatchewan made outside of the area administered by the Relief Commission, or which were made in Saskatchewan prior to the date of the inception of the commission (August 25, 1931), the period covered by the test audit being from October 10, 1930 (the date on which the relief agreement under authority of the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, was signed) to April 30, 1932.

6. That at a conference between the minister, the auditor general and the commissioner of unemployment relief on September 6, 1932, the auditor general maintained that the Dominion government was responsible for the auditing of the provincial government's accounts but was of the view that the auditing of municipal accounts was the responsibility of the provinces.

7. That clause 6 of the agreements entered into with the provinces under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, provided that "The dominion shall pay to the province for remittance to any municipality such proportion of the cost of construction of municipal works and undertakings carried out to provide work for the unemployed as may be agreed upon between the province and the dominion. . . ."

8. That the auditor general has interpreted clause 6 of the agreements referred to in the preceding paragraph to exclude municipal works and undertakings if the municipality charge any part of the costs to persons or properties directly benefited and has suggested that a test audit be made "If the department cannot assure this office that no such amounts are included in the claims, and that they have checked the claims at the point of issue."

9. That clause 1 of the agreements entered into with the provinces under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, provides that "the dominion shall pay to the province for remittance to any municipality within the provincial territory such proportion of the expenditures of the municipality for direct relief . . . . as may be agreed upon between the province and the dominion."

10. That the auditor general has interpreted clause 1 of the agreement referred to in the preceding paragraph so as to exclude contribution in cases where the municipal contribution or part of the municipal contribution is provided by "private" subscription, including in this expression contributions made by local organizations, such as the Red Cross society.

11. That the form of certificate to be rendered by the province in connection with the submission of relief expenditures was submitted to the auditor general on October 29, 1930, and that the auditor general under date of November 5, 1930, stated "In reply to your letter of October 29, enclosing a form of certificate which it is proposed to send to the various provinces to be filled in as indicated thereon, with the particulars of all projects undertaken by the various provinces and municipalities claiming aid from the federal government under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, I am of opinion that if the particulars asked for thereon are carefully prepared and signed by the appropriate provincial officers, the information thus provided will be sufficient for my purpose."

12. That with only minor modifications made necessary by difference in arrangements with the provinces, similar forms of certificate continued to be received from the provinces under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and The Relief Act, 1932, and that such certificates, with their supporting statements of accounts, have been submitted to the auditor general and have been, since the inception of the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour, accepted by the auditor general; and that in due course cheques to the various provinces have been issued with the counter signature of the auditor general's representative.

13. That as a result of the auditor general's advice on November 5, 1930, that the certificates proposed would be sufficient for his purposes, it has not been deemed necessary to carry out any audit of the provincial and municipal records, and the audit of the unemployment relief branch has been confined to the checking of certified accounts as received from the provinces.

14. That the unemployment relief branch has relied upon the auditor general for any necessary additional audit as the staff of the branch does not include personnel necessary to carry out an audit in the field.

In view of the foregoing, the minister recommends that the auditor general be authorized to conduct such audit of provincial accounts, in connection with unemployment relief expenditures, as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury;

And that the commissioner of unemployment relief and the auditor general be authorized to accept from the provinces accounts rendered under clause 6 of the agreements under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and to provide for dominion contributions to such accounts irrespective of whether such accounts cover what are known as local improvement works to which the local proprietors will eventually contribute, or otherwise;

And that, further, the commissioner of unemployment relief and the auditor general be authorized to accept accounts from the provinces under clause 1 of the agreements entered into under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and to pass for payment the accounts for the dominion contribution to the expenditures reported by the provinces as having been made by the municipality, including in such municipal expenditures amounts voluntarily contributed by individuals, business firms, or associations, to the municipality, providing that such amounts have been utilized solely for relief purposes, and have been expended under the jurisdiction of the municipal authorities; and provided that such funds have not been raised by arbitrary deductions from wages payable to those engaged on relief work.

The minister further recomends that the auditor general be authorized to investigate the provincial systems of auditing municipal relief accounts, to the end that the dominion government may be satisfied that the municipal accounts put forward by the provinces are in accordance with the agreements entered into between the dominion government and the provinces.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

(Sgd.) E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Then, on May 31, 1933, the dominion director of unemployment relief received this letter from the auditor general:

Re: Port Alfred, Chicoutimi County

I have your letter of May 22, in which you request that I audit the accounts of relief expenditures rendered by the province in respect to the town of Port Alfred, and informing me that you are placing the municipality on the "stop-payment" list until such time as I report on the audit.

When I requested my chief investigator to inform you that my representatives were about to continue their investigations in Quebec, I had in mind that if there was some particular municipality that you thought should be investigated, I would include it among those which, in due course, I intended to examine.

Port Alfred might be one of these municipalities. Under present conditions, however, would it not be advisable to have the provincial auditor make a special local audit of the accounts of that municipality and report thereon before further federal payment may be made?

Bear in mind that this letter is dated May 31, 1933; the first order in council was in September, 1932, and this is the answer that comes from the auditor general to the Labour department. The letter continues:

That audits of certain municipalities should be made at your specific request, and that the making of payments should be contingent upon my report, would not only interfere with the independent functioning of the audit office, but might possibly work a hardship on the municipality concerned.

You will understand that, in the circumstances, I cannot assume the obligation of making an immediate audit of the municipality named.

Yours very truly,
Geo. Gonthier,
Auditor General.

That letter was directed to the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief and was referred to me; and in answer to it I wrote to the auditor general on June 7, 1933, in the following terms:

Re: Port Alfred, Chicoutimi County, P.Q.

The dominion commissioner of unemployment relief has brought to my attention his communication to you regarding the above, dated May 22, also your reply of May 31.

I observe that it is your view that the making of audits of certain municipalities at the request of this department would interfere with the independent functioning of the audit office and in your opinion "might possibly work a hardship on the municipality concerned."

I understand from the commissioner's letter of May 22, that your representative informed him that you were proceeding with an audit of accounts in certain municipalities and that you would like to have the names of municipalities suggested to you by the commissioner, whose views on this point would naturally be helpful, and I understand that it was in accordance with this request and in the spirit of cooperation that the commissioner suggested that an audit be carried out of the municipal accounts at Port Alfred.

I cannot agree that the submission of the name of this or any other municipality to you in reply to your request would interfere with the "independent functioning of the audit office," nor can I conceive why it could "possibly work a hardship on the municipality concerned." Indeed I would assume that your first concern would be for the interests of the federal government rather than for the municipality.

I observe your statement that in the circumstances you cannot assume the obligation of making an immediate audit of the municipality named. I do not know what circumstances you refer to other than that you refuse to make the audit because the commissioner has suggested it. As I have above stated, the suggestion was made at the request of your representative, and an audit which may be necessary should not be omitted because in your opinion it might possibly work a hardship on the municipality concerned, or for any other reason that I am aware of.

Yours truly,
W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour.

Then there is a reply dated June 23, 1933, from the auditor general. It is addressed to myself, and is as follows:

I am in receipt of your letter of June 6 regarding the audit of relief expenditure and of another of the 7th received in this office on the 19th, with special reference to the municipality of Port Alfred, P.Q.

I am naturally anxious to avoid any misunderstanding which might arise out of informal conversations and correspondence concerning the audit of a class of expenditure having its own special problems of administration and control. In the circumstances, and in order to avoid any doubt as to my intentions concerning cooperation, I am making a broad review of the whole question after which I shall write to you at greater length.

I sincerely hope that it may be possible to arrive at an acceptable solution of our problems consistent with the designedly limited duties and responsibilities of the auditor general as defined by statute and with the administrative limitations under which this office has been labouring for some time past.

Assuring you of my desire to assist in any way possible in coping with the great difficulties arising out of the administration of unemployment relief.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) Geo. Gonthier,
Auditor General.

On June 28, 1933, I replied to that letter in these terms:

I am in receipt of your letter of June 23 and note your anxiety to avoid any misunderstanding which might arise out of informal conversations and correspondence concerning the audit of relief expenditures. I must confess I do not altogether grasp what misunderstanding you have in mind which might occur in this regard. To my mind there would appear to be no ambiguity or ground for doubt as to the duties and obligations which devolve upon yourself and staff in this matter.

The terms of P.C. 2163 of September 30, 1932, are clear and devoid of any ambiguity. It contains specific instructions provided for in section 62 (g) of The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, being chapter 178 of the R.S.C. 1927, from which I quote as follows:

"The auditor general shall examine and audit, if required so to do by the Minister of Finance, and in accordance with any regulations which are prescribed for his guidance in that behalf by the treasury board, . . .

(g) any other public accounts which, . . . the treasury board directs him to examine and audit."

The disbursements under the consecutive relief acts having reached such proportions made it necessary, in the judgment of myself and colleagues, to pass the said order in council in which we have set out specific instructions to yourself as auditor general. From that order in council I quote two clauses, of which I am confident you have already taken full cognizance:

"The minister recommends that the auditor general be authorized to conduct such audit of provincial accounts, in connection with unemployment relief expenditures, as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury."

"The minister further recommends that the auditor general be authorized to investigate the provincial systems of auditing municipal relief accounts to the end that the dominion government may be satisfied that the municipal accounts put forward by the provinces are in accordance with the agreements entered into between the government and the provinces."

There can be no doubt as to the government's intent contained in these instructions, and I am at a complete loss to understand why there can exist in your mind any lack of comprehension as to their import. They call for you to conduct such audit of provincial accounts as you deem essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury. These instructions were given you in September, 1932, and now, nine months later, you advise the dominion commissioner that, owing to certain embarrassments which you fear it might cause some of the municipalities, you are loath to take the necessary steps by way of audit which would carry out those instructions.

With great diffidence and great reluctance I am compelled to state that your department has not complied with the expressed intention of the government in a matter of very vital and national importance. Ministers of the crown, particularly at a time like this, must of necessity rely upon the various departments of government which are charged with the responsibility of seeing that the policies of the government are carried out, and there is no department which should be more astute to recognize the necessity of activity, and be more zealous in its activity, than that of the auditor general, when the federal government is making contributions in vast sums out of the federal treasury to the provinces of Canada, who with their creatures, the municipalities, alone are the agents to expend the money so contributed.

I write this letter, as I have above stated, with the greatest reluctance but, in the light of our previous interviews and correspondence and the attitude you have taken, I am regretfully forced to the conclusion that you either are not seized of the national importance of conducting your audit in accordance with the instructions of the government as contained in P.C. 2163, or that you entertain views with respect to the same which are in conflict with the spirit and terms of the order in council, and have decided to adopt a course of your own fashioning.

Yours very truly,
W. A. Gordon.

Mr. GRAY: What was the reply from the auditor general?

Mr. GORDON: I do not believe there was a reply. This is the order in council to which the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) made reference on March 26 last. On that occasion he made statements, probably not with a desire to misrepresent in any way but purely through inadvertence. From his observations it would seem that action by the Dominion government was taken only on March 12, 1934. As a matter of fact action had been taken in the fall of 1930, and in each succeeding month the closest sort of check was made, as I have indicated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The fall of 1930?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, 1930.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister mean 1932?

Mr. GORDON: No, 1930.

Mr. GRAY: What is the date of the letter the minister has just read?

Mr. GORDON: The letters I have read will appear in Hansard.

Mr. GRAY: I should like to have the date, so that we may follow what is now being said.

Mr. GORDON: The last letter I read was dated June 28, 1933. When the right hon. gentleman opposite was speaking on March 26 last no doubt he believed that the first action taken by the government was taken on March 12, 1934. However, if one reads the order in council a little more carefully he will not labour under that misapprehension. It is as follows:

Whereas the Relief Act, 1932, empowers the governor general in council, notwithstanding the provisions of any statute of law, inter alia, to enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein, and also (in addition to such relief and other measures specified in the said act), to take all such other measures as might be deemed necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of the said act;

And whereas agreements having been entered into with the various provinces of Canada respecting relief measures therein under the authority of the Relief Act, 1932, and other measures of relief undertaken under the antecedent legislation respecting unemployment relief and need having arisen in consequence for the conduct of audits of provincial accounts relating to relief expenditures and the investigation of the provincial system of auditing municipal relief accounts, it was directed by order in council, dated September 30, 1932 (P.C. 2163), passed under the authority of the Relief Act, 1932, that:

Then it goes on to embody in the order in council of March 12, 1934, what was recited in the order in council passed over two years before. So if the right hon. leader of the opposition in making his observations a few nights ago had gone through the order in council passed on March 12 he would have seen there a clear and distinct reference to the earlier order in council to which I have made reference, and would not have fallen into the error which he did.

I do not want to detain the members of the committee but I want to say in fairness to the municipalities, in fairness to the provinces, in fairness to the Labour department and in fairness to the taxpayers of this country, that the federal Labour department has taken every reasonable step to see that the moneys provided by the taxpayers were applied for the purposes for which parliament enabled this government to make the moneys available. If the suggestion that the treasury has been looted goes out to the taxpayers it only adds to their anxieties, and I could not therefore refrain from shortly spreading on the record just what the situation is. I can only repeat that if there was looting then every little village council, every town and city council, every provincial government and the federal government are all looters together. I do not think anyone would care to subscribe to any such idea as that. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the members of this committee should have this record spread on Hansard in order that anxieties that may have arisen in the minds of the taxpayers of this country should be allayed to the extent at least that these official records disclose that the government has endeavoured to have audits made from the very beginning right down to date of such a kind and character as were approved of, as they were, by the auditor general.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After listening to what the minister has said I feel pretty sure that one is not wide of the mark in saying that it is a case of endeavouring to lock the door after the horse has been stolen. It is all very well for the minister to come along to-day and say, "We asked the auditor general to do this and that," when at the time these original agreements were being entered into the Prime Minister himself said on three or more occasions in this house, in answering the opposition when we were advocating the auditing of the accounts, that it would be an insult to ask the governments of the provinces to permit the accounts to be audited. I think the minister heard my statement the other day but perhaps the Prime Minister was not in when I read what the Prime Minister said at that time. His words were quite distinct. For example, at page 173 of Hansard of 1930 the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> Are we to be told, because two or three members of this house stand up and complain of a provincial legislature that therefore we are to insult that legislature by saying that we are to deal with their affairs and not our own? Are we to mind our business or their business?

And at page 175 the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> I will look further into the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition—

That was that great care should be taken to see that the accounts were audited.

> —but I cannot conceive how, under our constitution, any self respecting province would expect the dominion government to place upon it what I regard as an unenviable and unnecessary insult by saying:

This was the proposal in the form of a section that I had suggested should be included in any agreement made with the provinces:

> Where any moneys are expended under this act by way of contribution to provinces, municipalities or other bodies, the auditor general shall audit the expenditure made by the province, municipality or other body, and shall report thereon to parliament within thirty days after the commencement of the next session.

That was the clause which we suggested should go into the bill relating to the expenditure of public moneys for purposes of relief, and the Prime Minister himself said that it would be an insult to the provinces to insert any such clause. Again at page 164 the Prime Minister said:

> This parliament has no jurisdiction to interfere with the provinces and the municipalities in the expenditure of their moneys. If that were made a condition I think it would be regarded by the provinces as an insult.

As I pointed out at the time it was federal moneys that were referred to, not the moneys of the municipalities or the provinces, but money going out of the federal treasury, and the government could attach to the expenditure of that money any condition it pleased. It would not have interfered with the powers of the provinces or of the municipalities in the slightest degree. They did not have to take our money. It was, however, our duty to the public who had to pay the shot to see that with respect to any money to be spent there were adequate audits. I venture this prediction, that in the agreements which the minister entered into with the provinces it is not specifically set out that every dollar of public money from the federal treasury to be spent for purposes of relief shall be audited by a federal auditor. The minister reads correspondence between himself and the auditor general which took place after several millions of public moneys had been expended—

Mr. GORDON: No, it started in November 1930.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A great deal of money had been spent, as the minister well knows, within the very first year.

Mr. BENNETT: This was November, 1930.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After beginning to spend the money.

Mr. BENNETT: That is when we settled it with the auditor.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did the minister settle it with the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And with the municipalities?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the point. It was public money and it was the business of my right hon. friend and his colleagues in spending federal money to see that every bit of expenditure was audited down to the last payment. But as I say the minister reads correspondence with the auditor general asking him to do certain things which, with the staff he had, I presume it would have been to some extent physically impossible for the auditor general to do. What should have been done, as we suggested from the very first, was that the expenditure of these millions of dollars, now over one hundred million, should have been entrusted to a national commission which would have exercised careful supervision and none had auditors who would have reported to parliament. Then we should have had proper auditing.

To begin with, to expect the minister's department to deal with this whole question of unemployment relief was a mistake. The department was established to carry on business in a normal way in normal times, and there has never been, despite its increases, the staff necessary to begin to handle unemployment relief. The first Minister of Labour, as hon. members recall, worked as conscientiously as any minister could have done to carry out his duties, and with what result? He broke down completely and is now no longer here. It was impossible from the first that any minister could take on the task he did with the staff he had and attempt to do it satisfactorily, with due regard for the public interest. The mistake made was that the government did not at the outset grasp the significance of the unemployment problem. If they did, they never took the steps necessary to see that relief was properly administered. When next the Prime Minister made the statement that it would be an insult to the provinces to expect to have any auditing done, it was in the public mind inviting the expectation of the freest kind of distribution of public funds. It was not until after this that the minister corresponded with the auditor general and sought to put an impossible task upon him. The fact that the auditor general even by a cursory visit of his officials to different communities had no difficulty in unearthing the evidence which he did of waste on a colossal scale is conclusive proof of the inadequacy of the measures taken by the government, and the fact that such waste was possible at all can only reflect on the administration because they alone are responsible for it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very grateful for this opportunity to deal with this situation. The right hon. gentleman would have us believe that his anxiety for the public interest is so great that he must cry aloud to high heaven that money has been wasted and that the taxpayer has been defrauded. He practically charges theft against the provincial and municipal authorities. Let us see what are the facts. In 1930 when he suggested in this chamber that adequate provision was not being made to safeguard the public interest with respect to expenditures to which the dominion was contributing, we declined absolutely to deal with municipalities. There was no point of contact between the municipalities and this government except through the provincial governments. At that time we did not undertake by agreement or otherwise to do other than make a contribution to expenditures by the provincial authorities. When it was suggested that we should audit the accounts of the provinces I said that they being autonomous units, that would be little short of an insult. I had high authority for saying that. In 1922 the right hon. gentleman had to deal with the problem and he passed an order in council in which he pointed out the difficulties of the situation. I hold in my hand the form of certificate which was settled upon by his government, not with the provinces but with the municipalities to whom contributions were made. That certificate was to be signed by the municipal treasurer and, what minister does the committee think? It was not a commission, it was not a denial of responsible government; oh, no, we are going to have responsible government when we are in power, and have it through our ministers. But when we are in opposition we want a commission and thereby destroy the theory of responsible government. That is the view of the right hon. gentleman. The Minister of Labour, the Honourable Mr. Murdock, was to certify and the treasurer of the municipality was to sign. There is the form under which the provincial auditor then gave his certificate and our auditor paid.

I was so impressed with what was said in 1930 that before I left for England I gave certain instructions as to how I thought the matter should be looked after. The late Senator Robertson sought, through his deputy to safeguard the federal treasury in his dealings with the auditor general and the preparation of the provisions of the agreements which were made. In the correspondence we find a letter written by the auditor general to Mr. Ward. I ask the committee to note the date of this letter. It was dated November 5, 1930, before any considerable money had been spent. The letter reads in part:

In reply to your letter of the 29th ultimo—

It will be observed that that was October—

—enclosing a form of certificate which it is proposed to send to the various provinces to be filled in as indicated thereon with the particulars of all projects undertaken by the various provinces and municipalities claiming aid from the federal government under the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, 21 George V, chapter 1, I am of opinion that if the particulars asked for thereon are carefully prepared and signed by the appropriate provincial officers, the information thus provided will be sufficient for my purposes.

Pursuant to that a form of certificate was prepared in the fall of 1930 to meet the situation. This certificate reads:

(Crest)
Canada
Department of Labour
Unemployment Relief Act, 1930
Certificate of expenditure under section 8 of regulations (P.C. 2246)

The undersigned hereby certify that the amount of $ .. ..dollars .. ..cents is due to the province of .. .. by the dominion government in respect of (A).. .. ..

ister, not being able to get the certificates he was looking for for his own safety and the safety of the government, took it up with the auditor general, the person with whom he should take it up. I ask any hon. member to read that correspondence and tell the committee what he thinks of it. The auditor general was fearful that it might involve difficulty with the municipalities but he was reminded by the minister that his duty was to the dominion taxpayer and not to the municipality. That is what we complained of. Everything that could be done was done for the purpose of having the federal official appointed by law do his duty and protect the taxpayer in accordance with the terms of a certificate with which he said he was satisfied. He replied that he was fearful that it might involve difficulties with the municipalities.

Mr. GRAY: He is a servant of this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. GRAY: Why was it not brought to the attention of the house before?

Mr. BENNETT: It has been; the papers have been laid on the table. If the hon. gentleman will read them he will see exactly what they indicate. I have no quarrel with the auditor general but I have a quarrel with an official who, when asked for his views, outlines the method by which the work should be done and when it is done in accordance therewith and he is asked, re-asked and asked again to put this matter in such shape as will not leave any doubt, then files what he calls an audit and says that the officials of the municipalities and provinces are really thieves. That is his suggestion. I say that you have no right to say that the mayor of Fredericton, New Brunswick is a wrongdoer because he devoted a portion of the money which he expended to medical relief and then asked the dominion to pay a share. As soon as it was pointed out that that was wrong, he undid it. It is as wrong as it possibly could be to make that assertion.

The check which is being carried on in connection with these accounts by the minister and his department has been for the purpose of inducing the auditor general to do his duty. It is a nice mess that we have to face when the auditor general, over whom the government has no control, through these test audits and letters which he wrote, has made it appear that the government has failed in its duty when, in fact, the government has continued to ask him to do his duty and he has failed to do it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Did the right hon. gentleman not state in the house that it was not the duty of the government to have an audit of the provincial and municipal accounts?

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the kind of agreement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the formula that my hon. friend has read was followed, I cannot see anything particularly wrong with it. If the auditor should proceed against the will of the government, as expressed by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons, it would be a curious state o affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: That is his duty when he thinks he is right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My right hon. friend is straining the point to a very considerable degree to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not. I say, it is his duty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is my impression and I am entitled to it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is wholly wrong for the Prime Minister or any other minister to interfere with the auditor general, and I have made it my duty not to interfere with or to suggest to him what he should do, and the correspondence, if it is desired, will prove that conclusively. The Minister of Labour, in the submission he made to him with the approval of the government, indicates clearly the position which he took, namely, that you cannot blow hot and cold, that you cannot tell us what course to pursue one day and, when we pursue it, say it is wrong. If there is anything wrong in connection with this the wrong rests with the auditor general of Canada and not with us. What is more, when in 1930 I made the statement I did, it was a correct statement and one which I would repeat; but in consequence of the character of the agreements that were made, and the extension of our activities in the finding of money for direct relief and for work in the municipalities, we believed that it was desirable that the auditor general should exercise closer supervision. In consequence—I will say frankly—of what the right hon. gentleman said in 1930, I wondered if my view of this situation could by any possible chance be in error and if you will refer to what he did in 1922 under similar circumstances and compare his agreement with this, you will see in our certificate safeguards for the dominion which were not dreamed of in the certificate of 1922. His account was with the municipalities; ours was not, for we dealt with the provinces. We insisted upon their auditor giving a certificate that the money indicated had been spent and that the municipality had made its contribution, whereupon our obligation arose, under the agreement, to make our contribution in accordance with the terms of that agreement, which we did.

I have no reason to believe that the auditors of the various provinces are not honest men; I have no reason to believe that the certificates which they certify to as being correct are bogus certificates. But I am asked to believe that these certificates, signed as they are by the auditors of the respective provinces, are fraudulent. That is what I am asked to believe to-night and I decline to believe it. That errors may have arisen would be expected in an expenditure so vast, and wherever they have been detected and any injury has been suffered by the exchequer of Canada the wrong has been undone and the remedy made by the action of the provinces themselves. Now, those are the facts. Talk about locking the door after the horse is stolen! Why, it was the very fear I had, in consequence of the way in which the right hon. gentleman had spoken, that before I left these shores in October I asked that the Minister of Labour should give this matter more than ordinary attention, and the form of certificate as compared with the certificate issued in 1922, indicates the extent and character of the real care that was taken to prevent any difficulties arising on that score. And I say now, test audits or no test audits, that I do not believe that in the city of Fredericton, the mayor of which is a gentleman of the high character of Mr. Clark, or in any municipality in this country there has been a deliberate effort on the part of anyone to gouge the dominion taxpayer. I do not believe that the auditor of the province of Quebec or of Ontario or of Prince Edward Island or of New Brunswick or of Nova Scotia or the western provinces would sign a certificate for the purpose of fraudulently taking money from the dominion taxpayers, and that is what I am asked to believe; for there is the certificate, the form of which is such that if the auditor general felt that i was insufficient his duty was to point out to us wherein it might be changed. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) asks. why did I feel that there was any possible difficulty about this and that the auditor general should give it further attention. I will tell him why.

Mr. GRAY: A guilty conscience.

Mr. BENNETT: That is unworthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GRAY: I withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you. If he will ask me the reason why I will tell him at once. It is this. I was hearing stories—sometimes one would pick up a newspaper so indicating—that municipalities were trying to take what they should not out of the federal government. I was asked to agree to certain expenditures in connection with medical attention, to which the hon. member for Gloucester referred.

Mr. GRAY: We had evidence of it in our own province of Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I saw, too, criminal prosecutions taken, but these were prosecutions not involving our money in the first instance but involving provincial and municipal funds; because two dollars would be stolen—if you use that word with respect to it—from the provincial government and the municipality before one could be stolen from us. In other words, we had the assurance, the greatest assurance in our judgment, that in addition to the certificate of the auditor, fraud involved the depriving of the municipality of its funds and the province of its before our share could be taken.

Mr. NEILL: Not necessarily.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, under the agreement.

Mr. NEILL: The province could pad the dominion rolls without paying out anything improper as against itself.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly, and that is what the certificate points out, that the money must have been expended before our share was paid. So that before there could be any fraud practised against the dominion there must also be fraud practised against the province and the municipality. And if we took the certificate of the provincial auditor, and he in turn took the authority of the proper officer of the municipality, we had three safeguards: (1) This certificate, which is No. 1 so far as we are concerned; (2) The signature of the provincial auditor; and (3) The certificate given by the proper officer of the province pledging the fame and good name and reputation and honour of the province to the validity and justice of the claim.

Now I submit to the committee that inasmuch as it would be asking the dominion auditor to audit the accounts of all municipalities and provinces it would be putting upon him—and I repeat what I said in 1930—a burden which is not contemplated by the constitution; for all that he would have to be sure of would be the expenditure of our money. Now our money was not spent like other money. Our money was to be paid to the province to reimburse the province for expenditures actually made by them, or the municipalities, the creatures of the provinces; and when a certificate in that form was produced, certified to by an auditor, with the good name and fair reputation of the province behind it, the province itself signing, then I submit that this is the greatest possible safeguard you could have. And if test audits showed that the precautions taken by the auditor general to secure the Dominion of Canada's taxpayers from exploitation were inadequate, why did he not respond with some sort of suggestion in answer to all the inquiries made of him? That is my objection. There is the record, and he who runs may read.

We have no apology nor excuse to offer—neither one nor the other. In 1930, as soon as the act came into force, we took up with the dominion auditor, appointed by statute, not amenable to any government, the method that should be pursued for the purpose of safeguarding the public treasury against exploitation. The contributions made by the dominion were made not for the purpose of getting vouchers for work done here and there, but as contributions to work undertaken by the provinces and municipalities in discharging their constitutional duties. In every instance the papers that came in were checked and rechecked by the Department of Labour just as in 1922 for services of a similar character the checking was done by the late administration. When the documents were so checked, supported by the vouchers and by the certificates of the auditor of the province and an officer speaking for the good name, honour and reputation of the province, we felt safe. What is more, if it subsequently develops that there have been overpayments, we know quite well that there will be no difficulty in having such overpayments refunded because the security that comes to us by reason of the name of the province being attached to the document as well as the check of the auditor general renders it impossible for this country to be defrauded of a single cent, and every cent that investigation or audit indicates has been paid in excess of what is right, just and proper under the terms of the agreement, will be reimbursed to the treasury of Canada. About that there need be no possible doubt. In the meantime we anxiously await some suggestion from the auditor general, for whom it is very easy to produce the result of a test audit here or there; but with respect to the tens of millions of dollars that have been expended it will be found on analysis and investigation that the cases in which wrongdoing has been done wilfully or purposely by auditors of provinces, meaning that they must be parties to a conspiracy to defraud the taxpayers of Canada, or by municipalities, meaning that mayors of towns and cities have aided and abetted conspiracies for the purpose of defrauding the public, are very few, for I have no more right to assume that an auditor of a province or the mayor or chief magistrate of a municipality is derelict in his duty or fraudulently inclined or given to conspiracy than I would have that any dominion official under similar circumstances is not similarly inclined.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has apparently at last wakened up to the fact that the treasury has been looted and is doing his utmost to load the blame on to the shoulders of the auditor general, an officer of parliament who is not here to speak for himself.

Mr. BENNETT: He is to appear before the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I need not go further than my right hon. friend's own words this evening to show where the full responsibility rests. He has admitted that there has been need for more in the way of auditing and that money has been wasted.

Mr. BENNETT: I deny that statement positively.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend does not admit it even yet.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps he will give the house a special committee to investigate the expenditures of these moneys, and particularly the charge that the auditor general is responsible for what has occurred. We shall then have the whole matter investigated and find out where and how the public moneys have gone. If this is done, I venture to say that it will be one of the most shocking stories with which the country has ever been faced.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be no "valley of humiliation" so far as we are concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Prime Minister will kindly retain his seat while I am speaking, I shall be much obliged. I just wish to repeat that we need not go further than what the Prime Minister has said to-night to make quite clear where the whole responsibility rests for any overexpenditure or waste or stealing of public money there has been in connection with this $100,000,000 that has been voted for purposes of relief. In this regard it is important to bear in mind that the statement which the minister laid on the table the other day indicates that the sum of $110,000,000 has been spent out of the public treasury for the purposes of relief, distributed in the different ways the minister has described.

Mr. GORDON: That was in four years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, in four years by this government since it came into office. In addition to that there have been loans to the provinces amounting to $52,000,000 and guarantees of one kind or another to the extent of $111,000,000, making altogether something like $274,000,000 which this government has either spent or loaned or guaranteed in connection with unemployment relief. What does the Prime Minister say to-night? I took his words down at the time; he said: "We did not agree to deal with the municipalities." Whose fault was that? Was that the fault of the auditor general, or was it the responsibility of the Prime Minister and his government? Why did they not agree to deal with the municipalities?

Mr. BENNETT: Because it is improper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now my right hon. friend says: We did not do it because a previous government did not do it.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. The right hon. gentleman is wrong. Because the memorandum produced a moment ago was a receipt by a municipality I said that we did not deal with municipalities because it was improper to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I disagree entirely with the Prime Minister when he says that it would have been improper to do so. The government could deal with anybody it pleased, in any way it pleased. It was its duty in such a situation to see that the right method was taken to protect the public treasury. The Prime Minister said: We discovered there were certain certificates which were given by the provinces, which were accepted by a previous administration as evidence that the money given to the municipality was properly spent. He exhibited a photostat copy of a provincial certificate and said: Ours was like that, seeking to have it appear that in following the previous administration they were doing all that could properly be expected of them.

What were the facts in regard to the action taken by the previous administration? After the great war, when soldiers were being reestablished in civil life, large numbers of men were unemployed and the municipalities and provinces found it impossible to obtain occupations for many who were coming back from overseas. The then federal government, not the late Liberal government, but the previous Conservative or Unionist administration, followed by the Conservative administration of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, undertook to aid the provinces in assisting the municipalities in finding work for the unemployed, and adopted a system of voting sums of money as grants in aid to those provinces to further public works to enable unemployed to be put to work. When the change of government took place in December, 1921, we were faced with having to carry on this relief which had been introduced by the previous administration and we were unable to adopt a different system while the period of the fiscal year remained what it was. But as leader of the government of the day, I at once intimated to the provinces that we intended to discontinue this practice as soon as possible and that we felt the time had come when the provinces, if the municipalities needed aid, should find the ways and means themselves. I always took the position that if a province found that its business was in such shape that it could not meet its demands in relation to the needs of the municipalities, then the federal government would be ready to come to the assistance of that province, but without the province so stating in the first instance, we would expect the municipalities and the provinces to look after their own unemployed. What happened? In a very short time, instead of more and more money being paid out of the federal treasury on unemployment relief, payments ceased altogether, and during the ten years from the time that the Conservative administration started this system of paying out public money from the federal treasury to assist the provinces to help the municipalities, there was not a total of $2,000,000 spent. That was the position when the present administration took office. During the period we were in office the amount that was spent from the federal treasury was only a part of this; I am speaking from memory on that point, but I know that over the whole ten years the amount did not come to $2,000,000.

What took place at the time of the change of government? My right hon. friend in the campaign of 1930 stated in all parts of the country that the problem of unemployment in Canada was such that it was no longer merely a municipal problem, no longer a provincial problem; he said it was a national problem, and that if he were returned to power he was going to deal with it as a national problem and was going to call a special session of parliament for that purpose. Parliament was summoned to meet in September, 1930, to deal with the problem of unemployment. My right hon. friend brought in his measure of unemployment relief. What did he ask this house to do? To give him $2,000,000? No. He asked the house to vote him $20,000,000 for the purpose of unemployment relief. But, he said, in connection with this unemployment relief we are not going to ask for any audit of the accounts; we are going to pay this money over to the provinces, and when we get the receipt of the province that is all we shall expect. That is what he said to the country; that is what people in all parts of the dominion understood—that the federal government would have fulfilled its obligation when it voted sums of money and turned them over to the provinces and obtained the certificate of the province indicating that the money had been received and properly dealt with. I said at the time to the Prime Minister that the problem was a totally different one from what it had been theretofore; that we were facing a very critical situation, a depression likely to last for several years, and that it was advisable that at the outset he adopt measures which would ensure careful supervision and federal control over federal moneys. The Prime Minister says he asked the opposition to cooperate, and I then made the concrete suggestion that I have read to the committee to-night. The Prime Minister's reply was that to adopt such a course would be an insult. I said to the Prime Minister—I have not the words before me, but they will be found in the 1930 Hansard—that he would rue the day that he refused to provide for any kind of federal supervision over the expenditure of federal moneys. That day has now come. But it has not come to the extent that it is coming, with respect to this vast waste in the expenditure of public money.

Let me recall another instance to make clear what was said at the time. Knowing something about the Department of Labour and the extent to which it was equipped to carry on its own business without having additional obligations thrust upon it, I suggested to the Prime Minister that neither the Department of Labour nor any other department of government could begin to deal with the great national problem of unemployment as part of its ordinary routine business. I pointed out that the Department of Labour was not equipped for it; that its business was to carry on the work of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and of the Combines Investigation Act, to prepare for publication the Labour Gazette, and so on; that the time of every man of the staff and of the minister was already fully occupied, and that the situation was wholly analogous to what had arisen during the war when additional obligations were thrown on certain departments. I begged him to adopt the same policy with respect to unemployment relief as was adopted by the war administration with respect to the problems then arising, in setting up the food board, the imperial munitions board, the fuel board; and I suggested that in regard to unemployment relief we should have a national commission, just as in war time we had the national patriotic fund organization, broadly representative of the interests of capital and the interests of labour and organizations such as chambers of commerce and boards of trade, the Salvation Army, the National Council of Women, the Red Cross, and the like, that have to do with these great questions. I suggested that a representative body of that kind should be formed, given power under act of parliament, and made responsible to the government through the Minister of Labour for the way in which this relief should be carried out, coordinating the work of the provinces and the municipalities. But that idea was scoffed at. I pointed out further that that was precisely what was done by the government of the day with respect to one relatively small matter that arose during the war, namely the disaster at Halifax, when an explosion took place which destroyed a considerable amount of property and human life. In dealing with that disaster the government of the day did not leave it to a department to administer the sums of relief money involved, they appointed a relief commission for the purpose. That outlay was properly audited; every dollar was traced; the commission did its work satisfactorily. I suggested that if that was advisable in regard to the relatively small expenditure there involved, surely when we were faced with a great national problem involving the whole of Canada, one which might continue for a series of years, something of the kind ought to have been done. What was the answer? The answer was: The two things were not parallel; we were told a true parallel was to be found in what was done when Canada gave money to the Japanese at the time of the earthquake in that country. What we did then, it was pointed out, was to send the money to Japan through the auditor general's department; the auditor general was to get a certificate from the Japanese government that the money had been spent for the purpose for which it was sent, and it was not our business to look further into the matter to see how Japan had spent the money. A certificate from the Japanese government was all that was necessary. The Prime Minister said: That is what we are going to do with regard to the provinces. We propose to give them this money, to get their receipt in due form that the money has gone for the purpose for which it was intended, and that is as far as we are going to look. The auditor general, like every one else, was doubtless led to believe that that was all that he was to look into, and that I imagine is why the auditor general has taken the stand he has taken.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was said on the floor of the house by the Prime Minister himself that what the government intended was to see that a certificate was given by the governments of the provinces that they had received the money from the auditor general's department, and that these moneys had been properly spent, and that the auditor's functions did not go beyond that. That is all on record; we do not have to go into any secret correspondence or interviews that none of us have heard of until to-night to discover what the policy of the government was. It was stated on the floor of the house, and in the words that I have given. It was stated again to-night by the Prime Minister himself when he said: We did not agree to deal with municipalities. Do you wonder, then, Mr. Chairman, that the auditor general, after the Prime Minister may have reversed in secret, as he says he did, the attitude that he took in public, and gave the auditor general certain instructions, that the auditor general might feel that he could not go beyond what the Prime Minister had stated to parliament itself was all he was expected to do? Parliament had voted these moneys as moneys to be paid simply to the provinces. It was not the fault of the auditor general that the money was to go only to the provinces and as stated by the Prime Minister not to be traced any further.

The position we on this side took was that with relation to the expenditure of public money the government should be responsible to the last cent, responsible no matter where these moneys went, or whether or not they were mixed up with the moneys of the provinces or the municipalities. The government cannot get away from that at the present time. That was the whole cause of the battle at the beginning and has been in every session since—the government seeking to relieve itself of responsibility by saying: We are dealing only with the provinces; we have nothing to do with the municipalities. If that is the ground they have taken from the outset, which they now take, they cannot blame the auditor general for not going further. They say: We have never dealt with municipalities; we are dealing only with provinces. No wonder the auditor general replies that he should not be interfering in municipal affairs. Nevertheless as a servant of parliament it is the duty of the auditor general to the extent that he may find it possible and deem it necessary, to see where federal moneys are going, and evidently he has done his duty by making a few tests of different municipalities, with results that to-day are only too well known in all parts of the country.

No; the mistake is this, and it is wholly the responsibility of the government, that the government itself, while it assumed office on the distinct understanding that it intended to make the problem of unemployment relief a national problem and to deal with it as such, the moment it came into office reversed that position and said: We will not regard this as a national problem; we propose to regard it as a matter for the provinces and the municipalities, and it is the business of the provinces not our business to look after how moneys may be spent by municipalities. The government washed its hands of the whole business and just issued the cheques. That is the situation; no exception can be taken to the accurancy of what I have said. It is for that reason and that only that we have the shameful situation that is gradually coming to be known to the public to-day. I say to the Minister of Labour I do not believe that in any of the agreements he has had with the provinces he has included the clause that the auditor general of Canada should have the right and that it would be his duty or that of his officers to follow the expenditure of moneys to the last payment, and that the receipts would be expected from recipients of public money indicating the fact that money had been duly received by them, and that the federal government was giving this money only on one condition, namely, that it was to go for the support of those who are out of employment, and for them only; that it was not to go for the purchase of supplies, or for the payment of expenses of administration or towards materials used by contractors, or to replace federal or provincial outlays, but that it was to go simply for the relief of actual unemployment. I say that without that specific agreement with the provinces we could not expect anything else.

The Prime Minister has said to-night, "I believe the municipalities are honest; I believe the provinces are honest;" and so on. This afternoon the minister read us a statement about something which was supposed to be happening in British Columbia. He said, "Is this not the kind of thing common to both sides?" It was the very fact that everyone knew, human nature being what it is, that it was necessary to take the position which hon. members on this side took at the very outset with respect to the manner in which the expenditure of these public moneys was to be safeguarded. To tell the country that every dollar that the federal government was going to expend would be spent without any audit, so far as the federal treasury was concerned, was to invite all the kind of thing which is to be found in connection with officials who deal with public funds in a loose way. To hand over federal moneys raised by one body through taxation to be spent by other bodies having nothing to do with the raising of such moneys is fundamentally wrong in principle. That is another position which hon. members on this side asserted very strongly.

I should have concluded what I had begun to say a minute ago about the amount of money the government asked for at the first session. I have said that in the ten years preceding that session the total required towards the assistance of provinces and municipalities in connection with unemployment relief did not amount to $2,000,000. But the Prime Minister at the special session asked for $20,000,000 to extend over a period of only six months, namely, until the following March. I said to him at the time that he was asking for a sum of money far greater than he would require, and I believe he found difficulty in expending this large sum,—I know he did. But what did he do next session? He took another step which was inviting a still greater waste of public money. He took the step which the minister is now proposing to repeat and against which we protested on the occasion to which I am referring. On that occasion, he said. "We will not ask for any special amount, but will make our demands unlimited. In other words, we will ask for a blank cheque, and issue all the money we please." Knowing human nature I wonder if we could expect that the public money would be other than wasted when the government said, "Give us a blank cheque; we will not be satisfied with any fixed amount; we want power to spend all that we please," and when in addition the Prime Minister announced there would be no audit by the auditor general, because such audit would be an insult to the provinces.

It would be ridiculous not to expect the very thing that has happened. At each session hon. members on this side have drawn attention to the vicious character of that type of legislation, namely, of voting sums of money without any control by parliament or by its servants over the expenditures of those moneys. We have now before us only the fringe of what may be expected if an investigation into these matters is gone into. I say that after the Prime Minister's statement to-night about the auditor general, he owes it to this parliament to have a public investigation into the whole question of the expenditure of relief moneys, so as to give the auditor general a chance to come before hon. members of this house and explain his position. In that way we may be able to find out from the provinces, the municipalities and others just how this money has been spent, and why it was spent in the manner I have described.

This matter cannot be covered up by the government simply saying we adopted a certificate used by a previous administration. I pointed out that in taking office in 1921 the Liberal administration merely completed part of the work which had been undertaken by a previous administration, a work of assisting provinces and municipalities to re-establish men from overseas in positions of civil life. But we never adopted any emergency legislation such as this, which has now run for four years. If to-day the Prime Minister holds up a certificate and states, "This is what we have done; this is the certificate." I say it is not sufficient and it is not what should have been done to protect the public treasury.

I believe what has been said to-night gives the opposition more justification than ever, when we reach the clause in the bill which asks again for a blank cheque, to ask that the clause be amended, to read, "such sums of money as may be appropriated by this parliament." Those sums should be appropriated by parliament in specific terms, and we should expect them to be audited by the auditor general. And, similarly, I believe we have reason to expect the administration to meet the requests which we have been making as strongly as we could make them, namely, that this power now being sought to give to the government the power to pass under the heading of peace, order and good government any order in council it pleases, should be dropped from the bill. That is the section we are now discussing, and I hope the minister even yet will see his way clear to delete the section.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman will explain why he dealt with old age pensions just on the basis he did. I have had more scandals brought to my attention in connection with old age pensions than I have had in connection with the whole of unemployment relief. And he fathered it. Why? Why did he hand over all these moneys to the provinces? Why? Why did he not ask that there should be an audit such as he now asks for in these matters, at a time when he dealt with old age pensions? What are the frauds? What are the frauds that people are making? What about a man standing in a bank in western Canada during the last twenty-four months and finding a person cashing an old age pension cheque with one hand and cutting off coupons with the other? Why can the right hon. gentleman not be consistent? Why have we not a little of that milk of human kindness of which you so often talk? I say to the right hon. gentleman: why did he and his ministers and his government put forward the old age pensions in the form in which they did? Remember this, that the reason given now by the right hon. gentleman and his supporters was a reason which I thought was a fairly good one, that every time there was fraud, half of it fell upon the province. Now it would be seventy-five per cent against the dominion and twenty-five per cent against the province.

I just say in answer to everything that has been said to-night with respect to the administration in these matters that the reason we did not deal with the municipalities is that they are the creatures of the legislatures, and the contact between the federal government and the provincial government or outside institutions is with the provincial government. And every dollar, as it is claimed, and has been said in this house, that has been taken from the federal taxpayer means that two dollars were taken from the provincial or municipal taxpayer. Is that not some safeguard? Should it not be some safeguard? In view of what the right hon. gentleman has said, I cannot set up a committee to-morrow morning with regard to this matter, for as I observed the auditor general has to appear before a committee in another place for the purpose of making his statement with respect to public expenditures. And until that is complied with, I think it is sufficient for the moment. I see that he is to be examined by the Senate committee of which Senator Robinson is the head, touching public expenditures. It is all right, you see, when you start it, when it is on your initiative; but it is all wrong when we start it. We took steps that were never taken by our predecessors to safeguard the expenditures. But to say that there is a great scandal behind all this is a reflection on the honour and honesty of Canadians. It may well be that Canadians, as was said to-night, have been prosecuted for fraud in taking relief, but did hon. gentlemen observe that it was not fraud against the dominion, but fraud against the province or against the municipality? There is not a case in which there was any allegation of fraud against the dominion, because we did not deal with them individually. We dealt with the province, and if a province has defrauded us we will get the money back. To say that the Dominion government should follow down every individual payment by a province for relief directly or otherwise, I simply say I do not believe that would be the thought of any intelligent person engaged in any business. The local authorities, the municipalities first, and then the provinces, must deal with them.

I want to be perfectly frank and say that when the right hon. gentleman with his experience of nine years as Prime Minister made the statement that he did in 1930, I merely made my observations as a business man that I believed that if we had the certificates of the auditors of the provinces that would be ample for me, and that we should not follow the money into the hands of the provinces because these were grants in aid; and the statute so says. The right hon. gentleman himself so stated long prior to 1930.

I put this single consideration before the committee: Making as we believed adequate provision for the safeguarding of the expenditures of these moneys in the hands of the provinces, with a form of certificate which went at least three steps further than the former certificate to safeguard the federal treasury, and with the approval of the auditor general, I must say that after reading of these prosecutions I became very much concerned about the situation. The right hon. gentleman had had nine years of experience as Prime Minister, while I was speaking more from business experience; and when the house had risen, we had a gathering of the cabinet next morning—we were up all night—and I did request with all the earnestness I could that extraordinary care be taken to see that we would get the certificates so that we could feel safe with respect to the expenditures. The certificate will appear in Hansard to-morrow and will indicate I think that it is the safeguard that any ordinary business man would take with respect to matters of this kind.

I do still say to the members of this committee that no federal government can undertake to guarantee the honesty of every individual receiving relief. A case of fraud in obtaining a pension came up at Regina the other day. It was one of the earliest pensions, yet it was found that assistance had been given to a mother because of the loss of a child, and it turned out that she had some $12,000 although she had alleged that hers was a case of poverty. I saw it only in the newspapers, as I suppose other hon. gentlemen did. Steps were taken to have the money refunded to the crown. You have cases of that kind, and cases innumerable that I might mention in connection with old age pensions and other matters. But when we put into the hands of the provincial authority our proportion of the moneys under the agreement, and the provincial auditor certifies that the expenditures have been made and that the municipalities have complied with their obligations, then I do submit that if there has been fraud or irregularities we will get it out of the provinces; we will keep it out of any moneys that may be coming to them. There need be no question about that.

It is all right to say that the auditor general cannot speak for himself, but he seems to be able to write for himself, and after a few test audits, if under these circumstances he has made no answer to the request that was made by the Minister of Labour for the purpose of having the matter dealt with, what is the reason. Why did he make the observation he did about Port Alfred, that it might embarrass the municipality if he was asked to do it? I have a right to know; I do not know, and no one can get it from him.

When it is suggested that the auditor general took his cue from what might have been said in this parliament, the answer is that he was asked if a form of certificate prepared in exactly the opposite sense was satisfactory or not, and he replied, not indeed immediately but after taking some time, that it was satisfactory. Let us be fair about this matter. Under these circumstances, if the responsibility rests anywhere, then if it is not where I have indicated I cannot understand what responsibility means.

We have paid under the terms of agreements to the provinces, and not to municipalities, sums of money which were the subject matter of agreements, based upon payments being made for the same work in part by municipalities and in part by the provinces. In the city of Montreal case we have not yet received the certificate; the minister and his accountants have been waiting for months for the certificate that will enable them to make payments, and when we receive the certificate over the signature of a provincial auditor and a minister of the province we shall make the payments. Is there any other way in which you could carry out the very principles which the right hon. gentleman supported so strongly in this house prior to the election of 1930, namely, that the constitutional obligation was one thing, the national character of the disaster was another, and the national character of the disaster involved the granting of assistance to the provinces? Those sums of money we have paid to the provinces when and as certificates in the form I have indicated were produced to enable payments to be made.

With respect to the question of a limitation being placed upon the expenditures to be made, we did one year place a limitation, and I am bound to say that it was not as satisfactory as when there was no limitation, because, just as soon as it was apparent that there was a certain sum of money available for the purpose, the provinces combined and said: That is exactly the sum we want. It was not a combination open and apparent, but they would—shall I say?—adjust their difficulties so that they synchronized, to use a well-known word, with the amount of money available. We desire to make the amount available as small as possible, and if it is thought that that proposal will better serve the purpose in mind and the purpose set out in the bill, we will consider what amount might be provided.

I shall not deal further with the other matters referred to by the right hon. gentleman under peace, order and good government except to say that he said that I had omitted to deal with the position in connection with the president of the United States. That is perfectly true. I did not think it required any discussion in this house. The real truth is that the only difference between the United States and Canada is that in Canada the executive is the governor in council. That means that a majority of council must agree to a certain line of action being taken. The executive in the United States is one man, and one only. He signs, and that is the end of it. The safeguards here are first of all the number of the advisers in council. Secondly, the powers that were conferred upon the president of the United States were in some cases for two years. Other powers that were conferred upon him were without any time limit. Some were for a shorter period than two years. With respect to his power to make trade agreements the limit is three years. Other legislation is limited, some by a shorter term and some by a longer. But there is one clear distinction, the only one which need be considered in dealing with a matter of this kind, the executive of the United States is the president himself whereas the executive here is the governor in council. The governor in council means every member or the majority of the members of the council, the minority accepting the view of the majority in the action arrived at. That is the only difference, and the only matter which need be mentioned in reference to this question. That is so far as I can see it at the moment or so far as it affects the matter. The powers conferred upon the president are so far beyond the powers which it is suggested should be conferred on our executive that they are not in any sense in the same class.

I mention this because I said this afternoon that we regret that we cannot meet the views of the opposition and leave out the provision with respect to peace, order and good government. I should like to put this test, with which I think the right hon. gentleman will agree. Supposing in 1931, when we were asking for these powers, I had been asked a question similar to that asked this afternoon: "Why do we need it?" If I had said that I wanted it because I desired to restrict the export of gold and that England would go off the gold standard some time next September, hon. members would have laughed at me. I can give an illustration from my own experience. I happen to know that that summer a distinguished financier on this continent who was watching the trend of events cabled to a gentleman in London asking if in his opinion England would soon go off the gold standard. The gentleman in London cabled back that that was an absurd suggestion for him to make, and yet it happened in September. I use that merely by way of illustration.

There are other conditions which face the world at the moment and there is the talk which I deprecate greatly and which I fancy the right hon. gentleman deprecates more than I—the talk of war. I think no good purpose is served in the world at large by talking about war. I think it is a terrible thing and it should be terrible in the sense in which it is used. That is only my personal view. I know there is a statute which can be brought into force by proclamation but I think on reconsideration the members of this committee, when left to their own devices, would conclude that it is desirable in the national interest that the executive, which is the governor in council, should have the power to pass such orders in council as may be necessary for the peace, order and good government of the country. I shall not enlarge upon what I said this afternoon except to say that the seeking of this power obviously serves no personal interest. It cannot add to one's happiness but it makes one feel a little more certain that in the event of a crisis he has the machinery with which to protect the national life of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to follow the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the reverse order to that in which he spoke, taking up the last point first. He has just asked what he possibly could have done with regard to the export of gold if that question had been asked two years ago and where without disclosing his hand he could have obtained the legislation necessary to help to meet a situation of that kind. I would reply by saying that he did not need anything more than will be left in this bill if he agrees to strike out the very clause which he says it is necessary for him to retain, namely, the one giving the power, notwithstanding any statute or existing law, to pass orders in council under the heading of peace, order and good government. There would still remain this clause:

> —take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I ask the right hon. gentleman: Could anything be needed beyond that? If that is the purpose of the clause, what more could he needed? The section would still read:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

We are perfectly agreeable to having that provision in the section remain, and I submit that that is all the right hon. gentleman needs to have in order to deal with any financial situation or any situation affecting the credit of this country. In view of what the Prime Minister has just said, I submit that the other clause should not be permitted to remain.

The Prime Minister deprecates the mention of the word "war." I agree with him and I hope the time will never come when this parliament will have again to discuss war. But if it ever has to discuss war, I submit that is the time above all others when parliament should be called together and the decision as to the action to be taken not left to the governor in council. If the Prime Minister is retaining this clause which deals with peace, order and good government in order that he may have the power, notwithstanding any statute or law, to have this country participate in a war, there is a stronger reason than ever why the clause should be stricken out. I do not know that that is what is in his mind, but he has raised the question himself. I have no wish to discuss the question of war in this connection, but it has been discussed in this parliament at different times. My recollection is that a resolution was passed some sessions ago to the effect that in the event of the possibility of war parliament should be summoned before any forces of Canada were placed at the disposition of His Majesty to serve at any point outside of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in a statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister reminds me that that is in a statute, and that statute should be observed. But this clause states that notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law which includes the very statute just referred to, the governor in council may take whatever steps he deems necessary to deal with peace, order and good government. I submit that the Prime Minister has just given two additional reasons this evening why that power should not be left in the hands of the governor in council.

Let me come to another matter referred to by the Prime Minister. He said that the only difference between the executive of the United States and the executive of Canada was that the executive of the United States was one man while the executive of Canada was the majority of the ministers in council. If I wanted to refine the point I could remind the Prime Minister that under the British constitution the executive is one man. The sovereign is the executive, but in Canada as elsewhere in British countries, the king is advised by his ministers, of whom the Prime Minister is chief. The president of the United States is one man, but he also is surrounded by members of a cabinet and undoubtedly any major action he takes is in accordance with the views of the majority of his cabinet.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not necessarily, possibly, but I submit he would be very foolish if he did not act in accordance with the views of the majority of his cabinet, and I think he does on most occasions. However, the fundamental difference is not what the Prime Minister has said it is, the difference between one man and half a dozen. So far as the United States is concerned, the executive has no place in congress and cannot make his views known by discussion and argument, whereas under the British system the executive as represented by the ministry not only has its place in parliament, but is responsible to parliament for every act and must get its majority from parliament itself. The president of the United States may choose whom he wishes as his cabinet.

Mr. BENNETT: He has to get a majority in congress.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He has not to find seats for his ministers and is not responsible to his congress in the way in which a prime minister is here. If he wants to deal with any question he has to get the authority needed for the purpose from congress somehow, but he gets that without his having to discuss the why and wherefore of his policy on the floor of parliament as the Prime Minister must and is able to do. The situation is entirely different.

Mr. BENNETT: He reads a message, that is all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but my right hon. friend can come here and with his powers of debate and eloquence he can persuade his following to give him anything he wants. He can give his followers the reasons why he should get these particular powers—no one knows it better than he—and they will give him anything he wants. The president of the United States has not that power; he has to rely upon what congress will give him when it is in session. There is a complete difference between the two, so that if anything in the form of action required to meet an emergency is required, the president of necessity has to have when congress is not in session certain powers which the Prime Minister does not begin to need to have, for the simple reason that he can get whatever powers he likes, in advance of the prorogation of parliament, or if he wishes to bring parliament together at any moment he can do so immediately in order to get these powers.

Now to return to the other matter we were discussing, the question of relief, the Prime Minister again seeks to draw a herring across the trail. He asks, "With regard to old age pensions, why did you not make a different provision from the one you did? We were simply doing the same kind of thing in regard to unemployment relief as you did in regard to old age pensions." Well, I would say that if we made a mistake in regard to old age pensions that is no reason why he should make the same mistake.

Mr. BENNETT: But you did not say it was a mistake.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say that. I will answer my right hon. friend this way. The reason we dealt with old age pensions in the way we did was that the requirements of the British North America Act left the matter of old age pensions exclusively in the hands of the provinces under the head of property and civil rights.

Mr. BENNETT: And relief in the same way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that is where I do not agree with my right hon. friend; I say that it is not the same. There is nothing to support his statement. The right hon. gentleman said himself, during the campaign, that relief was a national problem; it was no longer provincial or municipal but was national. It was therefore for him to make it national, to be dealt with in that way, in view of the policy he declared. Moreover, when he spent money for purposes of relief he could attach to that expenditure any conditions he pleased. To show how far short of attaching such conditions—

Mr. BURY: Was not that true of old age pensions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not true of old age pensions.

Mr. BURY: Was it not true that the government could attach any conditions they wished in reference to that matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, there were restrictions because the question of old age pensions involved certain considerations respecting property and civil rights.

Mr. BURY: So does this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, this does not, and that is the difference. This is a sum of money which the government is spending for a specific purpose which it names.

Mr. BURY: And it involves civil rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just as the Prime Minister himself said, we could give money to Japan, and if we could give money to Japan we could give money to the governments of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. BURY: Old age pensions involved civil rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wants to make a speech he will have time to do so.

Mr. BURY: We don't want the committee misled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will never be misled by anything my hon. friend says. I should like if I might to continue without interruptions.

I wish to remind the Prime Minister of what was said in this very connection with respect to these grants in aid—and here may I say that the Prime Minister has been kind enough to observe that having occupied for a number of years the position which he now fills one gains a certain amount of experience, and I trust that this experience, by whomsoever it is obtained, will be of value in public life at all times. And out of that experience, when this country was faced with the problem of unemployment on a vast scale and the possibility of depression running over a period of years, with the likelihood of the provinces being unable to meet their various obligations, I urged at the very first session that these grants in aid to the provinces should be stopped pending the calling of a conference between the dominion and provincial governments to see whether it was not possible to have some arrangement made whereby the dominion could assume a large number of obligations for relief in its different forms—social insurance in its various aspects—taking them over as a national obligation and in return obtaining agreements from the provinces to amend their powers of taxation in some directions, or making concessions with respect to future subsidies. My hon. friends opposite will remember that I spoke over and over again about the inevitable consequences of continuing grants in aid at a time like this, pointing out that they meant that sooner or later the public treasury would be depleted beyond all expectation. I was hooted at by hon. gentlemen opposite for repeating this observation so often, but the force of it is coming home to them now when it is too late. I suggested then that we should seek an amendment to the British North America Act inasmuch as this question was likely to present itself with increasing urgency with time. I urged that we should at once take steps, in conference with the provinces, and by whatever course might be deemed necessary, to see whether the British North America Act could not be so amended as to give the federal government larger powers with respect to social and industrial legislation in order that we might have uniformity of laws throughout the dominion, the provinces being relieved of some obligations, having them made federal charges, and the provinces on their part foregoing, if that was equitable, their subsidies either in whole or in part. I made this suggestion with a view to bringing matters to such a point as to insure that the power raising taxation would be charged with the responsibility of its control and expenditure, instead of following the false principle of placing upon one government the obligation of raising taxes and allowing another government or series of governments and municipalities as well to spend the money, for the raising of which they had had no responsibility whatever.

On all these counts therefore it seems to me that the need is becoming stronger and stronger for compliance with the request made from this side of the house, even now at the eleventh hour, rather than that the present situation should continue, albeit for but a few months or a year, or whatever the period may be.

With reference to the auditor general's position, the Prime Minister says that he will consider the matter. I think we had better have the public accounts committee called together and have some of these matters gone into very fully there, so that we may find out how public moneys have been spent. It is high time the committee was called together. We might have the auditor general and others before the committee. I trust the Prime Minister will see that this is granted.

These I think were the main points referred to by my right hon. friend. I would add this, with respect to old age pensions, that the Liberal administration—and I presume the present administration is following the same course—did audit the accounts with respect to old age pensions so far as the provinces were concerned; they did have their own auditors and have always had supervision over the provincial governments' expenditures, and I believe that the auditor general has been free from time to time to make, and has actually made, test audits in regard thereto.

Mr. BENNETT: I should point out to the right hon. gentleman that what I said with respect to old age pensions is doubly true with respect to the harbour commissions. It was under the right hon. gentleman's government that $19,000,000 was expended in connection with a harbour bridge without any audit—and the less said about it the better—and that vast sums of money had been spent in the harbours of the dominion. I myself, sitting in the seat which the right hon. gentleman now occupies, pressed that in dealing with these matters provision should be made by which the auditor general could audit the reports. But there has been a singular lack of effort to audit these accounts, at least up to 1931, and the efforts I made indicated that nothing could be ascertained. And if you compare that, and the position in connection with expenditures under old age pensions, with the position in connection with relief, you will not have difficulty in drawing certain definite conclusions. I see no reason why the public accounts committee should not be called; in fact I shall be glad to assist in the committee being called to investigate any items in the auditor general's report which may be directed to the attention of that committee. Further, I observe that the auditor general has been summoned to appear before the Senate committee on public accounts. Obviously he cannot appear without the consent of this house, or should not, having regard to the provisions of our statute in that respect, and this house will assert those privileges of which hon. gentlemen opposite are so jealous. I assume that the house will at once be glad to avail itself of the opportunity which we will promote of dealing before the public accounts committee with any of these matters that are in the auditor general's report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the Prime Minister has just said about there being other public expenditures that are not being properly audited is, I think, only a further reason that now that the whole matter has come up for consideration and discussion in the way it has, we should seek to take immediately the steps that will prevent anything of this kind happening in the future. That is why we are stressing the matter as strongly as we are in regard to this particular measure. My right hon. friend will do me the justice, I believe, to say that at no time have I advocated any concealment of inquiries into public matters of any kind, but that I have stressed as strenuously as I could full supervision and control by the House of Commons and by its servant over all public expenditures. If there has been one thing above another that I have been emphasizing each year, it has been the necessity of that complete control on the part of the House of Commons and the auditor general over all expenditures of public money, especially in dealing with the relief situation which is an abnormal one. In handling matters in times of emergency there is greater need than at any other time that those safeguards should be exercised with the greatest possible care. For that reason I hope when the minister under the present legislation is making his agreements with the provinces, he will see to it that clauses are inserted which will ensure a more adequate following down the line of those public expenditures than has been the case heretofore and that every dollar of federal money goes, not to administration or to contractors or to pay for supplies, or to relieve provinces and municipalities of their own obligations, but to labour itself, a satisfactory certificate of payment being obtained in receipt thereof.

Mr. BENNETT: The certificate may be as incorrect as it is now alleged ours are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That can be followed up by federal officers. I should like to point this out to the Prime Minister: we are in the extraordinary situation that we have voted sums of money running to over $110,000,000 for expenditure on relief alone, and yet the house has no information as to the numbers of the unemployed. The Department of Labour has not this information. It has made all kinds of excuses and apologies for not having it. All it needed to have done was to require any province giving federal money to a municipality to obtain from that municipality a statement of the numbers of its unemployed. Those statements should be returnable periodically to the government and after being tabulated should be brought to the attention of this house. We have had from Premier Pattullo a statement that the number of unemployed in British Columbia to-day is 100,000. British Columbia has a population about one-nineteenth of the rest of Canada, so it would look as though, if that were the average for all the provinces according to population, the total number of unemployed would be about 1,500,000. I think, however, British Columbia relatively has a larger number of unemployed than the other provinces; but if figures are available, we ought to know.

Mr. GORDON: On what date was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the press of Saturday night there was a statement to the effect that there was something like 100,000 unemployed in British Columbia. If that province has been able to get those figures in so short a time, some of the other provinces ought to be able to get similar information. One very simple way to get the figures is to insert such a provision in the agreements entered into by the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid the statement in regard to the 100,000 unemployed is a guess. It may, however, have some reference to a matter to which I am going to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman to indicate how difficult it is to deal with the situation in the way he suggests. Shortly after the change of government in British Columbia my attention was directed to a press clipping in which a notice was given that certain works would go forward at a particular point. I will show it to the right hon. gentleman to-morrow. Membership in the Liberal association was a sine qua non.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was brought up this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not in then. That indicates one of the difficulties experienced in matters of this kind. I would like to show the right hon. gentleman some of the efforts that have been made in the imposition of conditions on the provinces and the difficulty that has been experienced in connection with those payments which have not to do with labour but have to do with matters connected with the credit and interest obligations of the provinces. The prospect seems much easier viewed from the outside than it is from within.

Mr. POULIOT: Let us consider Newfoundland. I have only one thing to place before the committee to-night, and it is this: Last year I asked the Minister of Finance about the grants to Newfoundland. He told me that the Dominion government had guaranteed to certain banks the interest payment amounting to several hundred thousand dollars. On that occasion the opposition blamed the government for guaranteeing Newfoundland loans. The Minister of Finance was at that time very eloquent, and finally during the world conference when this dominion was asked to renew the guarantee or to give an additional one to Newfoundland, it refused to do so, and quite rightly. Therefore, as was pointed out during the debate on the address, it was not the members of the opposition who were wasting the time of the house in that matter, but the Minister of Finance himself.

The other day my right hon. leader spoke about those guarantees and the Minister of Finance pointed out that no money was loaned to Newfoundland; that it was only a guarantee that was given by this government. Therefore I would like to know from them whether the guarantee which was given to Newfoundland last year amounts to very much. To what banks was that guarantee given, and is it still in existence? Has the government been released from all its obligations towards the creditors of Newfoundland? May I point out at the same time that at page 9 of Hansard of this year it will be seen that I asked the government for the production of the Amulree report on Newfoundland and that the Prime Minister said that in that report there was nothing of interest to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: For the information of the right hon. gentleman I will read what he said as reported at page 9 of Hansard:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was not proposed to table it. The report was not in any sense connected with the operations of this government. The government of Canada was asked to name a commissioner to sit with commissioners from Great Britain and Newfoundland. With that in mind Mr. Magrath was selected.

My idea in asking that was to know what had been found by those three gentlemen about Canada's obligation to the creditors of Newfoundland, and that was the only idea I had in view when I put the question. Therefore I will ask the government kindly to answer the questions that I have put and whether this is not the time to table that report which is just as interesting as that of Mr. Sutherland on the tobacco business.

Mr. BENNETT: The obligation of the dominion is represented by guarantees given to the chartered banks to the extent of $625,000. A half year's interest was being paid, and the British authorities said that they would guarantee or pay to the extent of one-half if we would the other. As the default of Newfoundland would have seriously affected our own securities, being trustee securities, we did so. The present position, since the commission has taken over, I am not in a position to state without verifying the facts. But that is the figure, $625,000.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman for the information he has just given. If he had agreed to the tabling of the Amulree report it would not have been necessary for me to ask him any questions to-night. Therefore I ask if he will kindly reconsider what he said at the begininng of the session, and let the members of the house see that report, part of which has been published by the financial papers. It is a report which is of interest to all of us.

Mr. BENNETT: I think copies of the report are in the library. I could not lay it on the table, because it is not a report that originated from any action taken by this house or this parliament. We have, I think, two or three copies, perhaps half a dozen; but surely there is a copy in the library. If there is not I will see that one of those we have is put there.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the Prime Minister if the guarantee or arrangement made for the building of Canada's legation at Toyko was made under the relief act, or in what way it was done?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is, no. The order in council was passed finally when I was not in the country. I promised the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that the papers would be brought down, and I thought it had been done already.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I made a motion for them.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that the minister to Japan himself advanced the money for the construction of the building, and is to be repaid as appropriations can be made for that purpose from time to time. In the meantime the interest on the money is not as much as would have been paid for rent. A high minded public service was rendered by the minister under an arrangement which merely contemplates his being repaid the money expended for construction in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that the financial transaction has been carried out by the Canadian minister himself, or was a guarantee given to him in respect of those expenditures?

Mr. BENNETT: It is covered by an agreement.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How was the loan arranged?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know that that was disclosed. He is a man of means; I am not sure even that he borrowed the money. He put up his own money; that is the short way to put.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to say a word before eleven o'clock. I hope the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that this matter be referred to the public accounts committee will be given effect to forthwith. This is a more serious matter than ordinary complaints made against a cabinet minister who is here to defend himself. The auditor general is an officer of this house, responsible only to us, and something very close to a charge of incompetence has been made against him, somewhat comparable to such a charge against the Speaker or the clerk of the house. I am wholly unwilling that the information I seek should be obtained in another house. We do not know what scope that investigation is going to take, nor can we be there to direct it along the lines of the charges made here. As regards the necessity of a thorough investigation, we must recall that the test made has been quite superficial; it was very slight, touching only the high spots here and there. For instance, in British Columbia I understand it consisted of a comparatively slight investigation of accounts for the year 1933. If the auditor had gone back to 1931 things might have been revealed that would make your hair stand on end. It will be remembered that in 1932 the relief situation there came into the hands of the Fordham commission, under which a very genuine attempt was made by the province and the dominion to run things on right lines, But if the examination had gone back to 1931 we have only to recall the charges made by the dominion government's man, McGeough, which have never been proved untrue, to realize the scope of the graft that I firmly believe would be revealed.

The Prime Minister dealt more than once with the idea that our safeguard was that if there was any graft, for every dollar of which the dominion was robbed there would be two dollars against the province and the municipality. But that is not so, because the province looked after the cities; in fact I think the cities for the most part ran their relief honestly and fairly. The province saw that the cities did not rob them. But who was to see that the province did not rob us? It is said that there was a provincial auditor, a very reliable man, but his duty was to see that the cities did not rob the province; he had no obligation to see that the province did not rob the dominion—I use the coarse word. I gave an illustration of how it could be done without any misconduct on the part of the city. Excessive charges were made for hire of government trucks and machinery, and expenditures of a capital nature were charged which should not have been shared by the dominion. Those are things in connection with which the province was not robbed, the city did not rob anyone, but we were robbed, inasmuch as we were asked to pay a share of accounts which, to put it plainly, were padded. For instance, gasoline was charged with the six or eight cents provincial tax added to the price, and we were asked to pay our share of that.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that wholly wrong?

Mr. NEILL: I do not think the dominion should pay a provincial tax on gas.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a question that was argued at great length. If anyone else had used it they would have had that revenue.

Mr. NEILL: Then I shall not use that as an illustration, but I shall use that of supervising employees being put in, and excessive charges made for trucks and machinery. I think it would be in the interests of the government and of this house if this thing were thoroughly investigated before the public accounts committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I have made some inquiry since I spoke. The difficulty of getting the public accounts committee together is that most of the members, I think twenty in all, are serving on the banking and commerce committee. The difficulty of getting a quorum, I am informed by the chief whip, has been very great. It is almost impossible, because of the interest taken in the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee. But I shall see what can be done.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 10, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) moved:

That the petition of Naomi William Lyman Robertson praying for a bill of divorce from John Morris Henry Robertson together with the report and the petition thereon be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92, 93 (3)a and 93c in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN LEGATION IN JAPAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table the documents asked for in the motions made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). There are four copies and the correspondence covers the language of both motions except with respect to plans and specifications, which after their approval were sent to Tokyo and have not been returned. It was because of the hope that they would be returned here sooner that the return was not filed earlier. It is now filed without the plans and specifications.

NEWFOUNDLAND REPORT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I mentioned yesterday that the report of the royal commission on Newfoundland was a document over which we had no jurisdiction. It was printed in England, in fact, but after the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) had made some observations in the early part of the session steps were taken to procure a few extra copies. I now table one copy, with a memorandum issued by the lords of the treasury. There are also being deposited in the library of parliament as many as perhaps twenty copies, and there are also a few copies available at the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and if any hon. member is particularly interested in securing a copy they will be furnished as long as they last. In the meantime this copy is being tabled for the edification of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

TARIFF BOARD

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULINGS ON POINTS OF LAW AND FIXING OF VALUES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There was a slight amendment made in the order in council passed with reference to the question submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the interpretation of certain sections of the Tariff Board Act. The description of the statute was incorrect, and it has been amended. As I laid on the table the original order in council, I now deposit a copy of this one.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver)

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I am sorry the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) is not in his seat. On the sixteenth of March while the house was in committee of supply I asked the minister this question:

> It is in connection with the sale of the rifle range on Lulu island in British Columbia. Has the range been sold and, if so, was it sold by tender?
> Hon. Donald M. Sutherland (Minister of National Defence): No, it has not been sold.
> Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): Have tenders been called for the sale of the range?
> Mr. Sutherland: No.

I hold in my hand a notice calling for tenders for the sale of this rifle range. I am sure the minister must have made his reply inadvertently, and perhaps he will take this as a notice to explain why the answer to my question was given as it was.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. MUNN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce which will be found at page 1933 of Hansard, in connection with the Sutherland report and in answer to my question the minister immediately said "No, it is not a fact." Then after several minutes, and after a discussion of other matters, the hon. minister modified his answer, but I find it printed in Hansard in one paragraph with his original answer. I would like to know if that is the usual custom.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If the hon. member is implying that I in any way suggested to Hansard what it should do I can tell him that I did not do anything of the sort. As a matter of fact I never change Hansard.

Mr. MUNN: I was not accusing the minister of changing Hansard. I asked if that was the usual custom.

HAMILTON POST OFFICE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Recently in a speech in the city of Hamilton the Prime Minister intimated that the government would build a post office there under the construction program of the dominion government. The sun is now shining on both sides of the fence, and I wonder if the Prime Minister could indicate to the house how soon we may expect an announcement of government policy in connection with this building program.

Mr. BENNETT: In due course the information will be supplied.

B. C. SALMON FISHERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): On March 13 I asked a question of the Minister of Fisheries regarding the orders in council which had been passed allowing seines to operate in the mouth of the Fraser river. I asked if the minister would consider the advisability of having those orders in council and other matters pertaining to fisheries placed before the fisheries committee. The minister replied on March 13 that he would be pleased to discuss this matter with his colleagues and inform me whether it was considered advisable or not. I ask him now whether he has considered that question.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No final decision has been arrived at as yet.

BONUSING OF PURE BRED STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) if it is the intention of his department to adopt a policy of bonusing pure bred sires.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): We have a number of policies for the encouragement of improvement in live stock and I should like the hon. member to be a little bit more specific.

Mr. VENIOT: My information is that on April 1 a bonus will be effective for pure bred bulls in Ontario and Quebec. If this is the case, I should like the minister to make this bonus applicable to New Brunswick.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If New Brunswick or any other province asks the government to cooperate upon the same terms as we have with Ontario and Quebec, we shall be glad to do so.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Monday, April 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.—Mr. Gordon.—Mr. Lennox in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lennox): The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amendment now before the committee is a relatively minor one and at the time it was introduced I said that I did not think we would take specific exception to it. I see no reason why it should not be passed. I could then put before the committee an amendment which really embodies that to which we are taking the strongest exception. Will the chairman please read the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Lennox): The amendment is that section 2 (a) be amended by adding after the word "province" in the fourth line thereof the following words, "and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to move the following amendment:

That the section be amended by striking out the words "to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada."

This is an amendment to subsection (b) of section 2 and is seconded by Mr. Stewart (Edmonton). I would point out that the original section contains the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may" do the things which are mentioned in the amendment. I am proposing by the amendment that this power should not be given to the governor in council particularly as other powers to be given the governor in council which will remain in the section are ample to cope with every conceivable situation.

Mr. BENNETT: How will the section read then?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the amendment is agreed to the section will read as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—

(a) Upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon,—enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein; grant financial assistance to any province and to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise; and in respect of such loans, advances and guarantees, may accept such security, enter into such agreements and generally do all such acts and things as the governor in council may deem necessary and expedient in the public interest;

(b) When parliament is not in session to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I feel certain the section, if left in that form, will be more than ample to meet any emergent condition which the Prime Minister or the government may ever be called upon to meet. I think these powers go much too far.

Mr. BENNETT: We cannot accept that amendment. It may be possible to meet one of the difficulties pointed out yesterday as to the meaning to be attached to the words

"notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law." I have spoken to my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), as to whether instead of the word "notwithstanding" we could insert the words "in addition to the powers conferred by any statute or law" dealing with matters affecting peace, order and good government in the country. There is some force to be attached to the criticism urged yesterday as to the meaning which might be put upon the word "notwithstanding." I do not think there would be a great difference as a matter of law but as that point was urged so strongly yesterday and if it clarifies in any sense the meaning of the section, we would be glad to change it. The amendment now proposed which provides for the elimination of any provision on the part of the executive to deal with matters affecting peace, order and good government, we cannot accept, for the reasons given yesterday. I thought at first that the amendment meant that these words would be retained but that the meaning would be modified in connection with the word "notwithstanding" but the right hon. gentleman proposes to eliminate these words entirely and we cannot accept his amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had hoped that the amendment would carry but if the Prime Minister takes the view he does, I assume it will not. I trust the Prime Minister will nevertheless make the modification which he has suggested and alter the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law" to read "in addition to the provisions of any statute or law." It would make only a slight difference; the clause would still be objectionable, but what is proposed would be a modification.

Mr. BENNETT: We will prepare an amendment along those lines. As the right hon. gentleman will observe, it will be necessary to retain these words in the first part of the section as there are statutes which do operate with respect to matters not concerned with peace, order and good government. These statutes refer to matters mentioned in that part of the section and the power to make agreements with the provinces to deal with those matters must be "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law." If the committee will permit this section to stand, the Minister of Justice and I will prepare an amendment which will eliminate the word "notwithstanding" in connection with peace, order and good government. If a meaning was to be given to this word, which I do not attach to it, it would mean the conferring of power far beyond that which is intended. It is intended that the power to be conferred shall be conferred under the construction given by the privy council to the words "peace, order and good government." For the benefit of the committee I may say that that power by the executive is somewhat restricted when parliament is not in session. But if you interpret the words, as the right hon. gentleman did yesterday, in the light of "notwithstanding", it would be open to the construction of conferring upon the executive powers entirely beyond any statutes that now exist, and notwithstanding them. We will remedy that, and the Minister of Justice will prepare an amendment to meet it. But the first part of it, namely, the power of making arrangements with the provinces, and matters of that kind, must be notwithstanding any other provision that may exist elsewhere; these specifically named provisions must be the overriding provisions in connection with the arrangements made between the dominion and the provinces, and the amendment which we will prepare will, I think, meet the difficulty to which attention has been directed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That amendment may help to meet the one particular point mentioned, but there will remain the all-important question whether the power to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government when parliament is not in session, in addition to any existing statute or law, should remain. I would suggest therefore that we continue the discussion on the main question rather than allow the section to stand. If, when it is disposed of, the other amendment is not ready, the section could then stand.

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire to make a slight explanation in view of what was said last night. In discussing the expenditures made for relief purposes during the years 1920-1930 I stated that the total expenditure had amounted to $10,000,000. I should have said that the total expenditure in that period amounted to some $2,000,000, and I should like to give to the house the exact expenditures, because it is an all-important point with respect to the auditing of the accounts for that period as contrasted with the significance of the auditing of the larger amounts which have been paid out since.

The following amounts were paid out in the years mentioned for relief purposes:

Year—	Amount
1920-21	$343,036 55
1921-22	500,000 00
1922-23	924,025 29
1923-24	4,273 83
1924-25	.....
1925-26	.....
1926-27	77,684 66
1927-28	.....

The total contributions by the federal government to unemployment relief during the years 1920-1930 inclusive was $1,849,020.33. May I say to the committee that after speaking last night I noticed that I had made that error, and in going over the Hansard notes, I made the correction, so that it would read that the total expenditure had not exceeded $2,000,000, which was the figure I ought to have used.

To touch upon another matter I would point out that the Minister of Labour yesterday cited from an order in council, the whole of which, he said, I had not given. He said he thought that I had omitted—quite unintentionally, he added—indicating that there had been audits prior to the passing of the item I was quoting from, namely, the order of March 12 of this year, being P.C. 222. I do not think the minister could have remembered or seen what I said during the previous discussion. Two or three times I referred to this order in council but I did not on each occasion go through the whole of it. I made clear the fact that there had been other audits on the occasion of my first reference. I have before me the discussion of March 22, 1934, from which I may read what I then quoted. I said on that occasion:

Let me read two clauses from the order in council:

"And whereas the audits and investigations which have been made and reported upon by the auditor general, in pursuance of the directions hereinbefore recited, have disclosed the necessity for a more extended audit of the accounts relating to relief expenditures if the interests of the dominion treasury are to be adequately safeguarded; . . . Now therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, is pleased in the exercise of the powers so conferred by the Relief Act, 1933, to order and doth hereby order and direct the auditor general to conduct such audit of provincial and municipal accounts in connection with unemployment relief expenditures as he deems essential to safeguard the interests of the dominion treasury."

In other words, I had that very circumstance in mind when I referred to the order in council, namely, not in any way to mislead the committee as to previous audits. But subsequently in the discussion, when dealing more hurriedly with other points, I did not refer again to the first part of the order in council. I thank the minister for saying that he felt at the time, in reference to what I had quoted, that he did not think I had intentionally sought to mislead the house.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What is the amount of the lien notes outstanding in Saskatchewan for direct relief, and what justification is there for holding these notes, when direct relief was administered in other provinces without the taking of notes?

Mr. GORDON: Any notes taken in Saskatchewan were taken by the provincial government. I do not know the amount of the notes, but I have taken up with the provincial government the question of any adjustment that will be made if these notes are paid. The hon. member is however quite right; so far as I am aware, notes were not taken in the other provinces in the way in which they were taken in Saskatchewan. I am advised that in many instances, particularly in the southern part of the province, or the so-called drought area, where people were not bankrupt in the sense that they had no liquid assets, but had merely fallen upon misadventure by reason of crop failures, they requested that the relief granted be treated as an advance and tendered their notes for the assistance given. I have not the total amount of these notes, but the province will make an adjustment with the dominion government as and when any of them are paid.

Mr. BOTHWELL: A part of these notes will be payable to the dominion government. Is it the intention of the dominion to accept that money or to refund it to the people who have executed the notes?

Mr. GORDON: If any of the notes are paid the total sum will be paid to the province of Saskatchewan and then an adjustment will be made as to any dominion portion of the notes, and that money will be refunded and will go into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Do I understand the minister to say that it will be refunded?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: To the persons who pay the money?

Mr. GORDON: Oh no; I am afraid I have not made myself clear. The money, if paid at all, will be paid by the person who was assisted through the agency of the dominion government and the government of the province of Saskatchewan. If and when any of these moneys are repaid then an adjustment will be made between the two governments and any other contributors concerned, such as the municipalities.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That does not answer the question. The position is this. The dominion has contributed a share of the moneys that went for direct relief in various provinces. In Saskatchewan the recipients of that direct relief in the rural areas were required to give notes. These notes were given to secure not only moneys advanced by the province but also moneys advanced by the dominion. When the recipient pays the note, the dominion government is entitled to an adjustment from the province and will get a part of the money. What justification can there be for the dominion holding that money from the individual in Saskatchewan, while the government receives nothing from the individual in any other province?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman is confusing two things as he did the other evening in connection with wheat and never withdrew his statement. The truth is that when the dominion paid the whole amount as it did in 1930 and 1931 in the territory that was completely devastated, the people living there, having property that had once been very valuable, suggested that they give notes. Why I do not know, but they did. That information was communicated to us and they did give notes. Latterly they have not been giving notes for direct relief. The extent of my knowledge—this is before the present minister took office—is that it was only in the territory in which the crop was completely destroyed that they gave notes. If they make payments of the notes, the money will be dealt with as may be thought desirable, but I do not think the hon. gentleman can make very much political capital out of it yet.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am not trying to make political capital out of it; I will satisfy the Prime Minister on that score, but I find in the auditor general's report that relief granted in Saskatchawan and secured by lien notes of relief applicants amounts to $216,065.78.

Mr. BENNETT: What year was that?

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: The period covered by the test audit was from October 10, 1930, to April 30, 1932. I do not know whether any lien notes have been taken since then and apparently the minister does not know. I asked him in the first place what the total amount of outstanding notes was and he says he does not know. Under that same item in the auditor general's report there is this:

> Recoveries. Cash received from cash sales and from repayments by relief applicants, $8,129.59.

Apparently some of those relief applicants have paid back the money they received by way of direct relief. What I want to know is why direct relief recipients in Saskatchewan in a devastated area such as we have there should be called upon to repay this direct relief assistance that they got, whereas relief recipients in any other part of Canada were not required to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer, as I said to the hon. gentleman, is very simple. The dominion was paying the whole amount in the devastated area; there was no contribution by municipalities nor by the province and the entire obligation having been assumed by the dominion, it was indicated that some of the people desired to give notes. The number is apparently not very large because according to the report which the hon. gentleman has just read the sum between September, 1930, and the spring of 1932 was about $216,000. I thought the amount was larger. The sum of $8,000 has been repaid. To answer the question categorically, the only reason that notes were taken was that a desire was expressed to give them in that devastated area where the people still had their land that at one time had been worth a great deal of money. There was a feeling among many of them that they did not desire to regard themselves as being persons receiving relief or charity, but rather getting a loan which they wished to pay back. The fact that some $8,000 have been repaid indicates that some persons desire to keep the faith they had in themselves by making this return of the money. In the other provinces in the other cases there was a threefold contribution by the municipalities, the province and the dominion. The dominion did not take notes nor was it suggested that it should. The dominion had nothing to do with the administration of the relief. The only place in which the dominion government has administered relief in this country since the depression came was in the devastated areas of Saskatchewan and for the reasons I have indicated a number of the people there gave notes at their own request and some have paid them off. In the other parts of the country the contribution was made by the dominion government to assist the provinces in the discharge of their duty and in every province at least in the west where they supplied seed grain, it will perhaps be recalled by the hon. gentleman that the statutes were amended to secure a lien with respect to seed that was supplied.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Just one more question. I am not speaking on behalf of any of those who received relief by way of seed grain; I am inquiring in connection with those who received this direct relief for food, clothing and shelter. I gather from the Prime Minister's remarks that this sum of around $216,000 would represent money that was advanced in toto by the federal government and not contributed to in any way by the province. Apparently if these notes are collected, whether by the province or not, the money will belong to the dominion. I have still to receive an answer as to what will be done with it. While some may have requested that they should have the opportunity of giving notes there were numbers who were not too anxious to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not paid.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The notes are still outstanding against them as a liability and they see no way of paying them.

While dealing with this particular section in regard to entering into agreements with the provinces respecting relief measures, may I say that we have had in Canada great difficulty in finding markets for our wheat. In that same area of Saskatchewan, I may call it the drought area, the farmers are finding great difficulty in getting seed and particularly feed for this year's operations. A few lines from a letter indicates just about what the situation is. This gentleman says:

> This season we have the additional labour of this grasshopper campaign so that the commission's allowance is about one-third of enough.

That is the commission's allowance for feed. Then he says:

> I threshed less wheat than I seeded last year.

Then he makes this suggestion:

> In our district there is enough low grade wheat of last year's crop in elevators to relieve the feed situation and the danger of it again finding its way into market could be overcome by grinding before delivery to farmers.

In other parts of his letter he suggests that the farmers in the district in which he lives will be happy to sign notes again if they can get feed to carry on their operations again this spring. He makes the suggestion that this low grade wheat of which the elevators there are full, might be used for the purpose of providing the required feed. I want to draw this matter to the minister's attention when we are considering granting relief to Saskatchewan.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would like to direct a question to either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour. During the time from 1930 to 1932, that the federal government was giving the entire relief, did all those who received relief give expression to the idea that they would like to pay it back and, if not, what percentage expressed the wish to pay it back?

Mr. GORDON: The department has not the records which would disclose the information asked for by the hon. gentleman. I do not know whether everyone expressed a desire to pay back the money granted to assist the people. I would be surprised if they did. But I would be pleased if the major portion of them did. The notes were taken by the province, as has been explained, and if the money is repaid there will be a refund to the dominion.

Mr. VALLANCE: From what source did the government get the information that the individuals receiving relief desired to pay it back? If the federal government, as stated by the Prime Minister, was paying 100 per cent, surely by reason of that fact the federal government would be in touch with the situation. Therefore I ask where they got the information that the individuals receiving the relief were desirous of paying it back.

Mr. GORDON: My recollection is that I was so informed by the Saskatchewan relief commission, who were administering the relief.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it may well be asked why we should take up time going over all this again. It has been gone over at least four times in this house, year after year, to my certain knowledge. I have not the papers with me, the minister has not, the matter was closed and ended twice, three times, four times; now we are at it again. I said that I sat at a conference in the government buildings at Regina. Certain representations were made, I do not carry the names of the people in my head but I think if hon. members will turn up Hansard they will find perhaps that I was then able to remember the names. It was a conference held with the government and certain representatives of those who lived in the devastated areas, and the suggestion was made that they thought it highly desirable that they should have opportunity to treat it not as charity but as a loan; and I said, Very well. After that it was so treated in some cases, not in all. Since then some $8,000 has been repaid, I was not aware of the figure until it was mentioned.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of what has happened since 1932, and the desire of these people to pay back that which they got for relief, and in view also of the fact that in no other province were notes or any promise given to pay back that which they got as relief, will the government now consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) that these notes be cancelled? Because, as I know, those people are in no position, nor will they be for many years to come, to pay those notes. I was rather surprised to learn that even $8,000 had been paid back. I think it would be a very nice gesture, if nothing else, on the part of this government to cancel these notes. I might remind the Prime Minister of this: On the first occasion when this matter was drawn to his attention, he will find, if he looks back over Hansard, that even he had no intimation or knowledge that they were giving notes at that time. In view of that and in view of what has happened since this relief was given and in view of the fact that the other provinces have all got the relief without promise to pay back, I ask the government now that these notes be cancelled.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I would not bother taking up further time were it not for the fact that the hon. gentleman's statement is hardly correct. Saskatchewan was the only province in which the dominion paid the whole of the relief within a limited area. I may say that the question as to what should happen with respect to any moneys received in repayment, has engaged the attention of the government on more than one occasion, but the sum received was so small that no action was taken. I am not sure whether or not in the last discussion that took place with the treasurer of Saskatchewan it was intimated that it might be desirable to cancel the notes; at any rate the question has been under discussion on several occasions. The situation in that area is entirely different from any other, that being the only part of Canada in which the relief was paid wholly by the dominion government, and no one has yet been able to say that those who gave these notes have now made up their minds that they desire to have the relief given treated as charity and not as a loan.

I can say at any rate that there is no intention on the part of the government to take any steps to enforce payment of notes. I say that to the hon. gentlemen. That was stated to the Saskatchewan government, I am not sure whether it was stated in this house or not, but both the hon. gentlemen can rest assured that no steps will be taken by the government to endeavour to collect the amounts. But the hon. gentleman must get it clear in his own mind that this is the only case of its kind that there is in Canada. It is the only part of Canada in which the dominion government assumed the total responsibility. Perhaps it will be recalled that on a certain day in July I intimated that a national disaster had occurred by reason of the destruction of the crops in that area, and we treated it as such. I do not know that any further assurance need be given that no one would think for a moment of taking any action to enforce payment, but in view of the difference of opinion entertained by some who received the benefits it would be a little difficult to make the statement that the hon. gentleman suggests should be made.

Mr. VALLANCE: I spent a few days in Saskatchewan within the last two weeks, and I know, and I think the Prime Minister realizes just as well as I do, the difficulty the farmers there—and in fact in all western Canada—are having to-day. If assurance were given by the government that these notes would not be collected I think many who now owe this money to the government or to the relief commission might find it easier to finance the putting in of their crop this year. I can assure the Prime Minister that it is not for any political reasons that we say what we are saying to-day, it is merely in the interests of those in the province who are attempting to carry on.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee to whom the notes are made payable?

Mr. GORDON: I am inclined to think that the notes are payable to the relief commission. That was a commission set up by the province of Saskatchewan at the request of the dominion government to supervise the carrying on of relief in that area that had suffered successive crop failures. The notes are payable either to the province or to that commission.

Mr. HEAPS: Have the dominion government themselves insisted on these notes being made in favour of the Saskatchewan relief commission or any other body? And do the government ask for a refund of their portion of any money collected by any of these public bodies that was paid out for relief?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman I think has still an erroneous understanding of the situation. No notes were given after the first year, as far as I have been able to ascertain; that is, by the end of 1931, outside of seed grain notes, none were given. The giving of the notes that were given came about in the way I have indicated. Relief is administered in Saskatchewan through the provincial administration by means of money received from the dominion, just as in all the other provinces, except in the devastated area during the first year, or down I think to 1931—perhaps the hon. gentlemen who have all these matters before them will be able to give me the accurate date. But the report of the auditor general refers only to the period in which certain moneys were received, namely, in 1932. I speak subject to correction but I believe that the only case in which notes were given with respect to relief were in the wholly devastated area, where the dominion government assumed the whole responsibility; and the reasons they were given are those which I have indicated. There is still a sense of pride among some of the recipients, to the extent that they have paid $8,000 to this government on account of the relief then received. My memory is that the notes were taken either in the name of the province or in the name of the relief commission, which of course was administering dominion relief. In order that it might be a proper commission we asked the province to appoint it, as we have no power to interfere with provincial matters, they appointed the commission at our instance and it has continued to function since then for the province with respect to provincial relief.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may continue along that line for a moment, my inquiry was a little wider than the answer given by the Prime Minister. I know that in some parts of the country notes were given by recipients of relief at the instigation of the municipal authorities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Saskatchewan is not the whole of Canada; there are other parts of the country as well. I know that in Winnipeg notes were given by these recipients of relief, and perhaps in some instances some money was returned by them after they had received a certain amount of relief from the local authorities. It was in respect of that form of relief that I was asking whether the dominion government was a party to the request that the recipients of relief should sign notes so that some day they might have to pay back what they had received by way of assistance. I know that in Winnipeg these notes were signed to a very large extent, and there was a great deal of complaint in regard to that practice. I presume, and indeed I am fairly sure, that the attention of the Minister of Labour was directed to this fact during the course of the discussion either last year or the year before. I feel that when a person is in a position to repay the money he has received, that is a very nice thing, but I think in ninety-five per cent of the cases the signing of notes simply means an added burden upon people who probably never will be able to pay back what they have received. I want to know if the dominion government was a party to the request that these notes be signed by those receiving public relief outside of certain areas in Saskatchewan, and whether the government has obtained any funds as a result of these notes having been signed.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is rather regrettable that we should get these things all mixed up. We were dealing with the province of Saskatchewan. In reply to what the Prime Minister has said may I say that I hold in my hand the appendix to the report, dated June 27, 1932, and headed Investigation of Saskatchewan Relief Commission. I turn over the page and I find a copy of the application for relief made to the Saskatchewan relief commission, at the foot of which I find the note which the applicant is required to sign. The note reads as follows:

I, ... the above named applicant, hereby faithfully promise and agree to pay to the Saskatchewan relief commission on behalf of His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada,—

I think this proves conclusively that this government has absolute control as to what should be done with these notes, which are payable to the commission on behalf of His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada.

—on or before the first day of November, A.D. 1933, the full value of all relief now or subsequently obtained by me from the Saskatchewan relief commission at the values or prices stated by the said commission.

I think my question was quite in order. Now that these notes are payable to the Saskatchewan relief commission on behalf of His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada, I believe this government has the power to say now what it proposes to do with these notes. And might I tell the government again, most emphatically, that we are not attempting to play any politics in this matter; just as much credit will go to the government as will go to those of us who are pressing for this action. If it were not that we are so well aware of the condition that exists out there to-day I do not think we would be pressing this matter, because we are in agreement with what the Prime Minister has said. There are many in western Canada who want to pay back one hundred cents on the dollar, in spite of what may be the opinion in eastern Canada. But in view of the fact that in some other portions of Canada those receiving relief have not been compelled—I will not say compelled —or asked to sign notes I think it would be a very fine gesture on the part of the government if they would now state that these notes will not be collected, so that these farmers may put in their crops this year without fear.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask the hon. member this question: If some of these borrowers have the desire to pay back what they have received, does he not think they should be permitted to do so? There are certain people who like to pay back what they borrow, and they should not be deprived of that right.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not wish to enter into any discussion with those who are not responsible for putting through this measure, but I will say to the hon. member that when these people said they would like to pay back this money they had some hope of being able to do so, because of the promises that were made by the Prime Minister previous to the last election. As a result of those promises they hoped that at some time during the administration of this government they would be able to pay back these amounts, but now they find themselves in a worse plight than they were when the promises were made. For these reasons I suggest that the government take this action.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations of the hon. gentleman are so wholly non-political and so disarming that I hasten to assure him that the government will give every possible consideration to what has been said. There is no intention of instituting any proceedings, he can tell his friends, to recover these amounts, but at the moment I am not going to make any statement in regard to cancelling these notes. Some of these people do not desire that they should be cancelled, and in addition some of them have sent in payments on account, without being asked to do so. So far as I know no person has been asked to pay a cent on these notes. What the hon. gentleman said a moment ago is quite correct; I was not aware that this action had been taken until I was informed that these notes had been given in this form. It came about as I have indicated, but it must not be forgotten that relief is given by municipalities, this being the only case in which the dominion has afforded all the relief. Notes are being taken by municipalities, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has stated, and some of these municipalities might be embarrassed if we took the action suggested by the hon. gentleman. The matter has been discussed by the Saskatchewan government; I think the hon. gentleman knows what has transpired in that regard. My memory is—I still speak subject to correction, because I have so many things to think of—that an assurance was given that no proceedings would be taken to collect these notes. I give that assurance to the hon. gentleman and to the house at the present moment, so that his friends need not fear, in putting in their crops, that if they succeed in getting a crop any proceedings will be taken to deplete their assets in regard to the notes which have been given. As a matter of fact they are not negotiable securities in their present form, and I think the assurance we have given the house to-day will have the desired effect in regard to those concerned.

Mr. HANBURY: When dealing with the provision in regard to peace, order and good government yesterday the Prime Minister referred particularly to the necessity of maintaining this particular clause because of certain actions that had been taken by certain provinces, particularly the province of British Columbia. His words in that connection were:

> These developments have created a situation far different from that we have had to meet at any time previously in this house.

Later I directed a question to the Prime Minister which he did not see fit to answer, the question being as to what action any provincial government could take, even under the enlarged powers which they have taken to themselves, that could in any way interfere with any federal statute. As I have said, the Prime Minister did not answer that question. Now I should like to direct it to the Minister of Labour, and ask him to give me that information.

Mr. BENNETT: A question of opinion is always a matter that is in no sense settled by the expression of one's views as against the views of somebody else. It need hardly be said to anyone who is familiar with the working of our constitution and the decisions under it that if the executive of the province is capable of exercising all the powers that the legislature can exercise under section 92 of the British North America Act, and can issue ordinances which have the effect of law, then the desirability of the dominion being in a position to take steps that may protect the federal interests goes without saying, and to legislate for peace, order and good government might conceivably be the only way in which it could be done. That is my view. That is the position which I present to the house as one of the not unimportant reasons why this legislation is sought. I merely mention it in passing as indicating a condition that was entirely different from the condition that prevailed a year ago. That provincial legislation, if in excess of provincial powers, may affect federal laws goes without saying because the books are full of cases in which that has happened. It happened in connection with a statute passed by the legislature of British Columbia regarding the sale of milk, and it was held by the privy council that the statute passed by the legislature was invalid because it encroached upon the federal power and was ultra vires of the provincial legislature. That was a statute that was published and was known to the federal authorities as a statute. If the province in the exercise of the power conferred upon the executive promulgates ordinances, this well may be the only way in which the federal power can be exercised because the ordinances, not being statutes, cannot be disallowed, and the only appropriate action would be under peace, order and good government.

Mr. HANBURY: The Prime Minister says that the federal government would be unable to disallow the ordinances, but it could of course disallow the whole Special Powers Act. The Prime Minister has given reasons with which I am not going to disagree altogether why it is perhaps advisable not to do that. The point I have in mind particularly is this. I cannot see what action the provincial government can take within the powers given to the province by confederation that would in any way interfere with the powers of the federal body. I think that is something that should be very clearly defined because it is quite evident from the actions of some of the provincial governments that they do not know it.

The Prime Minister, referring to-day to the amendment which he was prepared to consider, says that he wishes to retain the phrase "notwithstanding" and so forth, in connection with the relations of the federal government and the provinces. In that connection would it be reasonable to assume that notwithstanding any arrangements that have been made to subsidize provincial governments, under this legislation the government might change or alter in any way the amount of the subsidy now being received by a province?

Mr. BENNETT: That is an imperial statute, as perhaps the hon. gentleman knows. In addition to that, there has been a sanctity surrounding subsidies which has prevented the dominion from declining to pay provincial subsidies for the purpose of enabling debts due the dominion by the province to be liquidated. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that that situation did once exist. The point I desire to make, and I am trying to make it as clear as I can, although it is a lawyer's point, is that the provincial executive in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by that statute passed by the province does not pass statutes but promulgates ordinances, and such ordinances not being subject to disallowance under the provisions of the British North America Act might conceivably, as many provincial acts have, infringe upon the federal power, and in order that the federal power might be able to deal with that situation promptly—a particular case that I shall not mention is well in my mind—having no power of disallowance of an ordinance the use of this power might become imperative in the national interests. It might be very desirable to act quickly. But that is purely a legal point. I do not put it forward as a matter that should be seriously considered because I hope that none of the provinces would even attempt to exercise the power in such a way as to set at naught the whole system of the constitution. But one never knows what might happen in view of the statements that have been made, especially by the attorney general of the province, when inviting the federal government to disallow the statute. If the papers correctly reported his speech it is quite obvious that some power must be placed with the federal authority in order that it may maintain its position having regard to the fact that the maintenance of our national credit is a matter that is very important in the minds of all those who know anything of our business; and our efforts to do that when the province conceivably might, to put it that way, be aiming to prevent us doing it, makes the position one of great difficulty. I am not going to enlarge upon that situation. There it is. I have discussed with my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) the seriousness of the legal aspect of it. This is merely to take care of a contingency that may arise. I mention it now as I mentioned it yesterday as an illustration of one of the difficulties that has arisen.

Mr. HANBURY: So that there may be no doubt in my mind, would the Prime Minister consider this point? Conceivably an ordinance of a provincial government might involve some act that would be inconsistent wtih the powers granted to the province under the act of confederation. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I was endeavouring to make. Assume they pass an ordinance of the type or character of the Milk Act which was declared to be ultra vires; we would have no way of dealing with that under the constitution except under peace, order and good government, because it it not a statute; it is an ordinance which is not subject to disallowance like a statute is subject to disallowance within a certain period of time, after having been certified by the Secretary of State and gone forward to the Minister of Justice who makes a report upon it, and the statute is then disallowed or left to its operation, as we say. But having no power to disallow an ordinance, if there is not a clear understanding by the province of the limitations imposed by the constitution upon the exercise of the power, the executive might enact ordinances that not only were not within section 92 of the British North America Act, but which contravened section 91. It would not be the first time that has been done by legislatures. Almost every province at one time or another has passed a statute which the courts of the country have declared to be invalid. I am putting a case in which to await the decision of the courts might bring about a very grave disaster. It is a lawyer's point and one which unfortunately I cannot perhaps make very clear to my colleagues who are not of the legal profession. I am only pointing out a contingency which might arise, and which we are endeavouring to meet before it happens.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. NEILL: The Milk Act to which the Prime Minister referred was not disallowed by the federal government but was allowed to go in the natural course to meet its waterloo in the privy council. Could not that be allowed to happen with these possible ordinances?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but the distinction between the statute and an ordinance is at the basis of the whole argument I have made. In the one instance there is the exercise of powers conferred exclusively upon the provincial legislatures under section 92 of the British North America Act and the other case is that in which the legislature has delegated to the cabinet or the executive all the powers which the legislative assembly has and as the result of the orders in council being termed ordinances to leave them to the operation of the law. If they went as far as they conceivably could, my view of the statements that have been made would be that you should not wait that long to take the appropriate measures by the federal authority to deal with them. That is all I desire to say. I do not say that it will arise but I say that we desire to be placed in that position. I am not expecting that when they sit down and calmly consider the matter they will pass ordinances so at variance with constitutional practice, but if they do so, I should like to be in a position to correct the difficulty.

Mr. HANBURY: Would it be correct to say that the present provincial government in British Columbia had greater powers through their ability to promulgate ordinances than their parliament, which can act only through statutes?

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say no to that question, but I should like to say this, and I do not say it in any offensive way. Does the hon. gentleman not think it is highly desirable to protect this parliament in the exercise of its powers from usurpation by a delegated authority especially in the light of the fact that it has seen fit to disregard constitutional practices with respect to veto and matters of that kind by delegating—it is no longer delegation—by substituting for the assembly itself? Where any legislature confers these powers upon an executive that desires to take them, the federal authorities should place themselves in position where they can meet any difficulty that might arise. I have tried to make clear that I do not suggest that the government will do it, I only say that if it does I am going to be forearmed. That is the all-important thing. I have not suggested that legally the executive has greater powers than it has as a legislature. In my poor judgment and for what it may be worth a statute which confers these powers is illegal and the exercise of powers under an illegal statute might well be illegal. I must be able to protect the functions of this federal parliament from usurpation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A sort of competitive arming.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would it not be the logical thing for my hon. friend to disallow?

Mr. BENNETT: The British North America Act says that the statute may not reach us for one year and within that time all this harm may be done. Undoubtedly it would be logical to disallow a statute of that kind but ever since the days of Mr. Blake, parliament has declared time after time that the question of the validity or invalidity of a provincial statute should be left to the operation of the courts. I think that has been the rule with but two exceptions. One was the instance dealt with by my right hon. friend in connection with the gypsum lands in Cape Breton, in which case the provincial statute was disallowed, I think under the advice of Mr. Lapointe, as Minister of Justice. The other was in connection with a provision of the Companies Act, in which I think the advice was tendered by Sir Allen Aylesworth. The matter will have to be considered in due course when the statute is received, but it need not be received for a year. It has to be transmitted and that is an act over which we have no control.

An illustration used quite often is in connection with the Florence Mining Company. This was an Ontario statute and Sir Allen Aylesworth left it to its own operation and did not disallow. In that case a mining claim claimed by one man was declared by statute to be the property of another and it was provided that the one man should have no recourse to the courts. The case went to the privy council and although the committee may not be at all interested I might state that Sir Robert Finlay told me that he was doubtful as to the soundness of the decision. The decision was that the statute was within the legislative competence of the legislature, and its validity was upheld. The result was that by an act of the legislature of Ontario a mining claim was taken from one person and declared to be the property of another and as a result of that legislation he was declared to be unable to go into the courts for the purpose of asserting his claim. That legislation was held to be valid and the then Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, did not disallow it. He left it to the operation of the law although my memory is that he made a report which indicated that he thought it was very unsound. But he did not substitute his views for those of the legislature which had validly exercised its powers.

I could give the committee other instances but I hope I have indicated to hon. gentlemen some of the thoughts which are in our minds with relation to a matter of such serious moment as that to which I have directed attention.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A moment ago I made an interjection which I am not quite sure the Prime Minister heard. In connection with a discussion which was then taking place between the right hon. gentleman and an hon. member on this side, I stated that it might be competitive arming for legislative and executive powers. I should like to point out the force of that remark as it indicates where we can get to in matters of government once executives begin to take autocratic powers to themselves. The federal government at Ottawa has had this power to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government when parliament is not in session, and apparently that power has alarmed the provincial government. The provincial government has said: If we are going to have to bargain, we must have equally strong autocratic powers and be free to do what we wish. Notwithstanding all the laws and statutes, they took to themselves the power, when their legislature is not in session, to deal with such matters as the lieutenant governor in council deems best. Another province does the same thing, then another and another. Then the Prime Minister comes along and says to this house: Now that the provincial governments have taken these powers, I must be doubly sure of having authority to act with respect to peace, order and good government in case I have to disallow some of this legislation or if there is a dispute, to be able to meet it. It is a sort of competitive arming with respect to legislative and executive power. This is where we find ourselves when we depart from what parliament stands for, namely, a forum where matters can be settled, not as the result of an appeal to power, whether legislative or any other kind, but as the result of an appeal to reason. I think that is as strong an argument as can be put forward against the adoption of these powers which, when parliament is not in session, override the function which parliament itself is expected to perform.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with a situation existing at the present time in British Columbia. A number of men in the lumbering industry are on strike and many are being maintained on unemployment relief. An effort is being made through the promulgation of fair wages, hours and conditions of labour to bring about a minimum wage bill. If a minimum wage bill is adopted in the province and there are some who will not accept work when it is offered, I should like to know whether this government will furnish part of the funds necessary to maintain such men on relief.

Mr. GORDON: It is difficult for anyone to prophesy what might be done if certain events occurred, but I may say that in the situation outlined by the hon. member I would be a party to a contribution with a great deal of reluctance. If fair and proper wages are offered to a workman under proper conditions and such workman, able to work, refuses to do so, I should need a very great deal of persuasion before I would expend any of the taxpayers' money keeping him.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to have a little more assurance from the minister than he has already given. The premise of my statement was that the conditions were to be fair, while men continued to refuse to work and were being maintained by the state in that condition. The particular reason why something is necessary not only in British Columbia but throughout Canada is in my opinion that at the present time there is in Canada a very large body of agitators whose business it is to see that men do not work, regardless of conditions. I think there are men in Canada to-day going among the labouring men, and if these men had ideal conditions they would still be urged not to work, and the agitators would still stir up strife. I will not say that is the condition in British Columbia at the present time, but I do say that we should have from the minister a definite assurance that if necessary the conditions in British Columbia should be investigated and if those conditions are found to be fair then a definite statement should be made that no relief would be given these striking men.

Mr. GORDON: Let me answer the question this way. Relief might be given to men who would not work under the conditions the hon. member has outlined, but so far as this government is concerned, if the wages and conditions are reasonable and fair and a man who is able to work refuses, this government will certainly not contribute to his upkeep.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) should try to force the Minister of Labour to give an answer to a hypothetical question of that kind. There are difficulties as to who will be the final arbitrator on the question whether wages and conditions are fair or not. That is the difficulty in the British Columbia camps at the present time. The strikers have asked for a certain wage which they believe to be fair, but the logging operators are opposed to this. The question resolves itself into this: Who will be the final arbitrator as to whether the wages offered and the conditions that exist are fair or not? So long as we are under a system of private enterprise those who are going to have the final say in the matter will have to side with the private interests or they will have to side with those who must sell their labour. This is where the difficulty comes in, and I am not prepared to leave it even to the Minister of Labour to say whether the conditions are fair or not. I think the workers in industry have just as much right to have the case decided in their favour as to whether the conditions they ask for are fair or not in the premises. Do you not understand that in a class society you cannot have fairness and reasonableness except the reasonableness of the dominating class in that particular society?

Mr. HANBURY: I might undertake to act as Minister of Labour for the moment in answering the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Coming events cast their shadows behind.

Mr. HANBURY: I would point out to the hon. member for Vancouver South that we have a Department of Labour in British Columbia. That department hear representations from employees and employers, and on the representations made to them they decide what in their opinion are fair wages and conditions. That is the basis which I suggest to the Minister of Labour is the proper one on which to formulate a policy with reference to the giving of unemployment relief. In connection with the unemployment situation, has the government been giving consideration to the housing problem in the various cities and towns in Canada ?

Mr. GORDON: The government has given a great deal of consideration to housing construction and matters of that kind, but it will be borne in mind that the building of houses and works of that sort are purely provincial and municipal. There was of course in force at one time—and it might be regarded as in force again—what was known as the Housing Act of 1919. The experience of the various municipalities under that act, even when times were normal, was not altogether a happy one; I am not unacquainted with its provisions and also with the methods employed to get the money over to the builder of the houses, and so on. Yes, the government has given a great deal of consideration to that matter, not only here but in conjunction with representatives of the provinces. Nothing along that line has materialized, and I am not in a position to say that it will.

Mr. HANBURY: Probably this would be more apropos of expenditures of the government for the construction of public works, but I would suggest to the minister that the government give very serious consideration to the matter of housing in Canada, and in connection with the provinces and municipalities. The minister is no doubt thoroughly familiar with the very large number of people who are engaged in the construction business during a normal period, and as a matter of fact, if we were in a normal construction period, we should have very few unemployed in the dominion to-day. I think the minister will agree with that statement to some extent. I do not think that the construction of large public buildings will put to work as many people as would the construction of smaller homes and repairs. I suggest to the government that they consider loaning money to municipalities for the purpose of housing construction. At the present time, as the minister is aware, it is almost impossible to procure money under mortgage by virtue of the financial situation in Canada. If money were available under mortgage a great deal more construction would already be taking place. I suggest to the government that if they would see that money is made available at a low rate of interest to the provinces and the municipalities, for which money the municipalities particularly would become responsible, to encourage the construction of smaller houses and even repair and painting work, that would put many more people to work than would be the case through any general scheme of large building construction for federal or provincial purposes. I would be glad if the minister or the Prime Minister would give consideration to that suggestion when the bill in connection with public works is brought down.

Mr. GORDON: There is a good deal in what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has said, but it must again be borne in mind that this and the preceding government made it very clear that if we are going to preserve even a semblance of our constitution, we cannot deal directly with municipalities. If, however, it seems desirable, the matter might be approached from another angle, and I have no hesitation in assuring the hon. member that the suggestion will be given thought and consideration. But let me point this out with respect to the advancement of moneys on mortgages: from the investigations that I have made I hazard the opinion that the constant passing of moratorium laws by our provinces with no indication that those laws will not be extended, has perhaps done more to dry up the well of mortgage money than any other action taken by the provinces. I have no control over what the provinces may do, but I know personally of many people who would build and of many who would lend money, but they are fearful that the moment they lend on a mortgage some act like the moratoriums that have been passed by a number of provinces will be put into operation and their money will become tied up ad infinitum with no remedy or redress left to the lender. Those, however, are matters that will be given consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the governments themselves killed the building industry by the enormous interest rates paid by municipal, provincial and federal authorities a couple of years ago when money borrowed by municipalities cost as high as seven per cent. At that time we saw an immediate falling off in the building industry in this country. There was an example recently where Ontario raised, I think, some $40,000,000 at four and a half per cent, and the amount was over-subscribed in two hours. Why should it not be? Another example was in the city from which I come where they were able to borrow money a few weeks after much cheaper than the province itself could. If the federal government are to be wet nurses to the lenders of money we shall never get anywhere.

The development of the building industry in Great Britain is a clear indication of the absolute necessity of either lowering interest rates by legislation—and it will have to be done whether the government likes it or not—or setting in motion a policy whereby people can borrow money at low interest rates so as to press forward a building construction program that will provide homes for our Canadian people. What I am most concerned in at the moment is, of course, that in view of the fact that the government have announced their intention of launching a building program, it should be gone on with at the earliest possible opportunity. It is a fair observation to make to say that 95 per cent of the building tradesmen in this country are at present out of work. We are now reaching spring time and we have had no announcement from the government in connection with the intended building policy. We will drift along possibly until the fall—

Mr. BOUCHARD: The fall of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: There may be some truth in that. We will drift along possibly until the fall before the necessary machinery is set in motion to begin this building construction program. What I am most concerned about is that the government should hurry forward this building program so that the tradesmen connected with that industry will receive the benefit at the earliest possible moment in the spring of the year. It is a well known fact that 80 per cent of the money expended in buildings of any character goes directly in wages, and it would be far better that this program should be pressed forward with vigour than that we should continue to support on relief our building tradesmen and others in trades allied to that industry. There may be some quarrel as to the proper policy to adopt, whether it should be houses or large buildings, but in view of the fact that the government has apparently made up its mind as to what it is going to do, I see no reason in the world why the policy should not be pressed with vigour and why the opportunity of work for those men engaged in the industry should not be provided at the earliest possible moment. I thought the Prime Minister might have been able this afternoon to give some indication to the people engaged in the industry at what time, and I hope in the not distant future, they might expect some relief brought about by the setting in motion of the policy in question. The keystone of the building industry is interest rates and unless the situation is met in one way or the other I see no hope for the money flowing into the channels that provide the driving force for the building industry of this country.

I would like to ask the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister whether the anticipated building program is to be carried out in conjunction with this particular measure or whether a separate bill is to be brought down?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. BENNETT: It has already been indicated once in the house that there will be a separate measure.

Mr. MITCHELL: Might I ask the Prime Minister how soon we may anticipate that it will be brought down? I ask that in view of the anxiety of these men to get to work.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know how soon the hon. gentleman might anticipate it, but any reasonable anticipation that he may have I fancy will be realized in the not too distant future.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think the Prime Minister should try to be clever over a situation of this description. I quite appreciate the fact that most hon. members have very little worry so far as the next meal is concerned, but coming from a large industrial riding I know these men are anxious to get to work and the Prime Minister could easily have said: We anticipate bringing this bill down in a month or two months, instead of treating the matter with the levity he has shown.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The discussion has been interesting in connection with this very important matter, for I take it that there is before the house and the country no more important matter than the bill which we are now considering. While we may read of improved conditions, so far as I can discover, only the fringe has been touched in the way of improvement from one end of Canada to the other. We are now entering upon the fourth year in which the government of Canada and the provincial governments have to provide relief for a great many people. While I am heartily in accord with the granting of relief I am just as unalterably opposed to this bill as I have been to previous bills of the kind. In 1930 the government introduced a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for unemployment relief, and parliament gave them authority to spend that amount of money. True the government did not provide a program in relation to the expenditure proposed, as is usual in voting money under estimates, but it was well understood that the money was to be expended, through the agency of the provinces. I remind the government again that the moment they took office they turned right about face with respect to their promises to the electors, who were told by the Prime Minister and the Conservative candidates that unemployment in June 1930 had reached such proportions as to be beyond the competence of the provinces and the municipalities to deal with and had become a national question. The moment the government took office they were voted $20,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out their promises, and proceeded to spend it in the very manner that they had condemned when appealing for support—through the agency of the provinces. No elector in Canada believed for a moment that if the Conservative party were returned, as they were, the full responsibility for the administration of relief in Canada would not be assumed by the federal government. Not only that, but they said they would commence great public works, not in the name of the provinces but in the name of the federal government. But now when the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) tries to ascertain whether or not that long belated promise is to be fulfilled, he receives no assurance that speedy action will be taken.

We hear rumours around the corridors that a large program of building construction is to be launched by the federal government. Personally I hope this is true. I think the government made a tremendous mistake in making these spacious promises to the electors and then failing to carry them out. Then too, we have had ample demonstration yesterday and to-day that legislation of this kind always has an effect upon the originators of the legislation that was not expected. We have now two provinces in Canada emulating the actions of this government, taking drastic powers from the legislatures for the expenditure of money, and of course while our friends opposite think it is all right for the federal government to have such drastic powers, it is not so good when these powers are sought by the provincial governments.

One thing which is scarcely ever mentioned on the floor of this chamber, and which in my opinion contributes very largely to our present difficulties, is the action this government have taken in regard to fiscal matters. I do not say it was the only cause, because undoubtedly world conditions contributed in large measure to bringing about the present situation. Conditions are deplorable; no wonder the provinces are at the end of their tether. When one observes what this government have been forced to do in order to preserve the financial standing of the provinces, one begins to wonder what the end is to be. I do not care to be one of those who cry "wolf, wolf," but, having had some executive experience, having been thirteen years in this parliament, I have very grave doubts as to the ability of the Canadian people to meet the obligations they have assumed. Had a different fiscal policy been pursued by this government we would not be in the position in which we are to-day. I have never changed my mind about that. I am not going to refer to conditions that prevailed under a different fiscal policy, but I do say that an important factor in bringing about the conditions that exist to-day has been the fiscal policy of the government, their refusal to allow trade to take place in Canada, in order that they may protect a certain section, a certain class. I say that in all sincerity. Where do they find themselves to-day? They have ruined a major industry in Canada. We are in the unfortunate position that Canada's major industry has large accumulations of its products on hand that cannot be sold. Not only that, but the prices of its products have been ruinously low. Then on top of that, something for which the government is not responsible, there was the disastrous drought in the southern sections of the western provinces.

I am not going to complain about the action of the provinces in connection with the administration of relief. I believe the provincial premiers were justified in assuming that when this government took office they were going to administer relief and take the responsibility for it. I certainly thought so. Not only that, but on the public platform I argued that the only logical way in which relief could be administered was through the agency of the provinces. The electors, believing that the Conservatives, if given power, were going to assume this responsibility, cast their ballots for supporters of that party, and now hon. gentlemen opposite are in the seats of the mighty and have to take the responsibility. First the government throttled trade, brought it almost to the vanishing point; by embargoes and every device known to governments trade was prevented. What is the result? First, a diminution of revenues. Did their fiscal policy give employment in Canada? It did not. The very thing the Prime Minister deplored was done. I have his words before me—he said he was not going to stand for the dole; he was going to give work to every one who would work. He did not say the provinces were going to do it; he said: "I am going to do it if I am returned to office," and naturally everyone who was out of work expected him to keep that promise.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the hon. gentleman permit—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman will be given his chance when his time comes. Then we find that through the agency of the provinces and the municipalities $110,000,000 of federal government funds have been expended in addition to the provincial funds, not in giving work but in direct doles.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no, be accurate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I would like to know where the work took place. I have the figures here as far as work is concerned. But let us say that at least three quarters of it was expended in doles or direct relief in all the municipalities in Canada, in addition to the expenditures for work, which appear on another page and to which I shall refer later. That was the response to the statement given to the electors which I for one believed was intended to be fulfilled—that work was to be provided and not doles; but up to the present, almost four years having elapsed, with the single exception of the relief camps, which are practically the same thing, we have had for the most part nothing but doles or direct relief. Now it is announced that we are to have a building program, so that this promise is about to be kept.

In addition, let me say this; let us give credit where credit is due. Let us give credit to the government for having accepted the responsibility they said they would accept in connection with granting $22,000,000 for relief in the province of Saskatchewan, under their own control and administered by their own organization. Whether or not they get the money back; whether or not it is ever returned to them, the need was great and could not be attributed to any action of theirs. In my opinion they are to be commended for what they did on that occasion. But to what condition did they bring the provinces? The provinces found themselves unable to finance themselves because of economic conditions throughout the country. I do not say the provinces were wise in their administrative methods; I do not say they were warranted in making the expenditures they did make or in incurring the liabilities they did incur, but at all events they did what everyone else was doing at that time. They did spend money that perhaps would have been better left unspent; they did incur obligations that I am sure every provincial official devoutly wishes to-day had not been incurred. But, because of economic conditions in this country which I say are at least fifty per cent attributable to the policies of this government, the provinces find themselves in their present unfortunate position. The Prime Minister takes the ground that we must have sound money in Canada and that we must pay our debts. Paying our debts is a laudable thing; no one desires to disregard that obligation, but those provinces were not in a position to pay their debts.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL: To what provinces does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The western provinces found themselves in the position that they could not pay their debts, and we have to come to their rescue. So we find vast sums of money being loaned to the provinces in order to carry them over this difficult period.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The western provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) Quite right; I do not refer to the eastern provinces at all. But I say again that this government cannot escape responsibility in this connection. You cannot have two hundred million bushels of wheat in the elevators of western Canada and be able to pay your debts; I think that goes without saying. You cannot have the markets closed against your live stock and pay your debts. This government has done nothing in the way of seeking wider markets except through the agency of the imperial agreements, and even that ray of hope seems to be dimming when we see the reports in the press from day to day as to the attitude of the British government with respect to those agreements so far as they apply to live stock and live stock products. Even that avenue seems to be closing, and the outlook seems extremely dark when the one ray of hope we had in connection with an assured market for our live stock and live stock products seems about to vanish at any moment.

I am not going to deal with the provisions of another bill that will be up for discussion later, but let me say that since this government took office we have had nothing but restriction all along the line. We have had no attempts to open the channels of trade; we have done nothing to try to relieve the railway situation or the shipping situation. All avenues of business that would give employment are being closed day by day. I notice that the report of the bureau of statistics states that this year fourteen thousand more cars were loaded and moved than was the case last year, which was the zero year in transportation. That is encouraging, but the hope it holds out is so small and so meagre that it does not give very much encouragement for the future, and now that the agriculturists of this country are on the verge of bankruptcy we are going to do something to relieve them. I had better not touch upon that, however, because that is another question. I simply say, in the light of what the Prime Minister stated in his pre-election promises and in the light of the results that there has been no promise fulfilled up to date except the promise to increase the tariff, and that has been implemented one hundred per cent. That promise was kept, with the disastrous results that we have seen and that are shown from time to time by statistics which are released by the government.

I do not know that this government can criticize provincial governments very much for the position in which they find themselves. I do not know that the provincial governments have gone into debt any faster than this government is going into debt. This government said it would accept the responsibility. It has accepted the responsibility for thirty per cent of the expenditure in regard to relief, with the exception of the $22,000,000 and some other amounts that have been expended directly. The situation of the provinces and municipalities to-day is such that I do not wonder that the Prime Minister wants very drastic provisions retained in this act in order that he may deal with the situation. I am very much afraid that from a financial standpoint he will have to continue to deal with it as long as the finances of the dominion government will stand it. We must stop somewhere, however. Despite the statement that we hear from time to time that we are to spend a large sum in the construction of public buildings this year I do not believe this will relieve the situation at all. The situation never will be relieved until men get work. To me it seems useless to talk about the extension of credit, the wider circulation of money and all the other panaceas that are offered; if men do not have the privilege of working and earning a livelihood then we will continue to have depression and hard times in this country. No government can assume the responsibility of keeping a large proportion of its people on the payroll of the government; that is out of the question. If fiscal policies are to prevail that will prevent men from getting work and prevent businesses from expanding, the present condition will continue until a change is brought about.

I was rather astounded the other night when the minister in charge of this bill gave us a resumé of the actions that have been taken under the provisions of this act, altogether outside the purview of relief. When we find authorized under this provision advances of $15,000,000 odd to Beauharnois, advances to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation of Nova Scotia for the production of fifty thousand tons of steel rails, and advances to the Algoma Steel Corporation for the production of thirty thousand tons of steel rails—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Does my hon. friend object to that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I absolutely do because the parliament of Canada was never consulted about it. Advances were made to the Algoma Steel Corporation of $660,000 for the production of thirty thousand tons of steel rails, and guarantees were given to the banks in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway of sixty million dollars, also advances to the government of Newfoundland —all done under the provisions of this legislation. I may be pardoned for saying that I do not know what obligation Canada had to Newfoundland, and particularly what obligation that would require action to be taken under this measure. This bill, Mr. Chairman, is just as vicious in taking from parliament its authority over expenditures as all the preceding measures. The Prime Minister pointed out yesterday that this provision was invoked when Great Britain went off the gold standard, to prohibit the export of gold from this country, but outside of that there have been very few instances in which the drastic powers conferred by this section have been invoked. Now we are told that because two of the provinces have taken advantage of a situation similar to the situation indicated by this government, it becomes necessary to retain these drastic powers so that the dominion government may be in a position to deal with them. It is a vicious circle that is widening all the time, as was pointed out by my leader this afternoon. It is the same vicious circle that we see extending throughout the world to-day and which is bound sooner or later, unless we do something to counteract it, to create a war which we shall all deplore. Restriction of trading, restriction piled upon restriction, with consequent unemployment everywhere until we have a condition of affairs that sooner or later will lead to revolution. But when the time comes when we are unable to continue this sort of thing and are unable to borrow money—we have not touched the fringe of the difficulty yet—I want to know what the people of this country, highly civilized as we claim to be, will do then. What will happen to us? That is something which I trust will never come about, but I do say that ten millions of people, and after all it is our people who constitute the real wealth of this country, cannot shoulder this burden much longer.

Something must be done to bring about a cure or the consequences will be disastrous indeed.

May I say that I have made some examination into the report of the gentleman who under the control of the auditor general audited the accounts in the province of Alberta. I do not see very much wrong with those accounts. I have not very much to complain of.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a couple of errors that might easily be corrected.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But I do say this, because I want to be perfectly fair in my statement, that the federal government should either accept the word of the province through its auditors or do even now, late in the day as it is, what I always felt they were going to do, namely, take the whole responsibility for relief under a minister of the crown or under a commission which would have complete control of the expenditures. I for one felt that that was the intention of the government and I have not hesitated to say so upon every occasion when the matter came up for discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that some of the provinces do not agree to our taking it over.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I knew that before the right hon. gentleman spoke. I knew it would be resented by the provinces. I am simply pointing out what my right hon. friend himself said when he appealed to the electorate of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I stated at all. Produce it; read it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have my right hon. friend's words before me. In speaking in Montreal on July 18, 1930, he said:

> Canada is now in a critical condition. Unemployment exists on a scale never before known in the history of this country. All this by reason of the policies of the Ottawa government.

Again, speaking in Montreal on June 27, he said:

> Unemployment has become a national problem in Canada. It is the direct result of nine years of unsound economic policies applied by Liberals under Premier King, and the King government cannot escape the charge of having neglected to realize that the first duty of the Canadian government is to provide work for Canadians.

Again, in Calgary on June 13, he said:

> I am convinced this unemployment has now ceased to be local and provincial and has become national in its importance. It has reached far beyond the narrow confines of Calgary or Alberta and is stretching into the broad confines of our dominion. I will not permit this country with my voice or vote to ever become committed to the dole system. I will not permit those to share in any benefits that may accrue unless they are willing to work, if they are fit to work, and my duty is to provide them with work to do. . . . There are great national works that may be undertaken in times of stress and strain. . . . They will be undertaken, and I propose that parliament shall formulate a definite plan for permanent relief, and that parliament shall deal with this national problem and provide amelioration for the conditions in order that next winter the Canadian people may not be facing the crisis that is upon us without having a remedy at hand.

I do not think I need to read any more, but I have here a great many statements of a similar character that were made by the right hon. gentleman. I say, as I have said on former occasions, that I assumed the right hon. gentleman meant what he said when he used those words.

Mr. BENNETT: So he did. I said it was a national problem, and so it was.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A national problem, and you were going to provide work.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And not doles.

Mr. BENNETT: We did not provide the doles. The provinces provide the doles.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a terrible admission. I wonder what my right hon. friend would have said to my leader if he had been sitting over there and made any such reply as that. I have sat in those seats opposite and listened to "red-blooded" Canadian talk and all sorts of criticism, and I have often wondered as I have sat in my seat on this side what the right hon. the Prime Minister would have said if he had been sitting over here and we had been over there.

An hon. MEMBER: You are glad you are not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Had we been over there Canada would not have been in the deporable condition in which she is today, and we would not be in the position of having to find excuses for failing to carry out a program such as my right hon. friend enunciated, not at a convention, but from every platform in Canada when he was speaking as the responsible head of his party.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Not a five cent piece for the unemployed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Doles for the unemployed, when work was to be provided for them. And to-day we are asked to give the government a blank cheque to assist in giving more doles. We are to be asked to vote large sums of money for the purpose of starting public works, and when public works were started by this government they were started in camps administered by the Minister of National Defence. Do you call that pay for work? I am not complaining but if hon. gentlemen think that they have carried out their promises, they are welcome to all the comfort they can get out of that. So far as I am concerned I propose to state here and tell the people in the country exactly what you did and then ask them how far they think you have carried out your promises.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What about the $20,000,000 for the unemployed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What about it?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You voted against it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is once when hon. members opposite had the courage of their convictions and brought down a stated amount and gave parliament an opportunity to decide upon it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You voted against it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But you are not doing that to-day; you are asking for a blank cheque and all sorts of arbitrary power to deal with this matter. You are asking us to support you in this and to be parties to the usurpation of the powers of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: You are wrong.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But we refuse to do it. As long as I have the honour of occupying a seat in this chamber I shall continue to refuse to do it. I am opposed to the provisions of this bill; I am not opposed to the assistance which will be rendered under it through the agencies of the provinces, but I am opposed to the method by which it is done. That is the objection I want to register. The statements which hon. gentlemen have made in connection with having carried out their promises are the most lame and lamentable that any government has ever presented to parliament. May I say with all vehemence that you cannot escape a fair share of the responsibility for the condition of things to-day by persisting in a fiscal policy which is absolutely ruinous to a large portion of Canada. These are the things I want to say on this occasion and possibly I will repeat them later when another bill is up for consideration. The vicious circle keeps ever widening. As I stated a few moments ago, because the government finds agriculture in the deplorable condition in which it is to-day it is seeking to ameliorate that condition by bringing about another which is just as vicious as some of the fiscal policies which it has put into force and which have brought about ruinous results to Canada.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: Let us clear the air a little. Are we considering the amendment of the right hon. the leader of the opposition or the one which we propose?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We propose to let our amendment stand; the one offered by the government does not help the situation at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we will vote upon that amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: During the discussion yesterday afternoon I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a number of questions, and in answer to one of them he stated that so far as he was aware there had been no application by the government of Ontario for a contribution toward the works to be carried on in that province. I should like to know if that statement applies to the other provinces.

Mr. GORDON: When the hon. member asked me the question I believe he was referring to a newspaper report in connection with some works which the government of Ontario had stated that they intended to commence. I was asked if the provincial government had approached this government for a contribution towards the works referred to in the press, and I replied in the negative. The obvious reason for our having received no request from Ontario is the fact that we have no authority to enter into any agreement, this authority having lapsed through the effluxion of time. The provinces are well aware that the statute expired on March 31. If this legislation goes through and the provinces find they are not able to carry on, I have no doubt that they will confer with the dominion, but we have had no inquiries other than the general discussions which took place at the dominion-provincial conference. Those discussions had no reference to specific works which might be carried on this summer. I do not know that I can add anything to what I have said. Outside of what appeared in the press, and I did not know it was in the press until the hon. gentleman referred to it, I do not know of any program contemplated by the province.

Mr. HEENAN: Is there not an agreement or an understanding between the federal government and the government of Ontario, or the other provincial governments, with respect to the completion of the highway known as the trans-Canada highway? Does this agreement run for only one year or is it continuous? The largest portion of this highway traverses Ontario, and I should like to know if there is not an agreement or understanding that the government will continue to contribute fifty per cent, or forty to sixty, or some such percentage, until it is completed?

Mr. GORDON: The agreements are made from year to year in harmony with the provisions of the various relief acts. The acts expire at the end of each year according to their terms, and any agreements made thereunder expire concurrently. There is no agreement with any province respecting any works because it is obvious that we have no authority to enter into an agreement until this parliament gives us that authority.

Mr. HEENAN: That is not what I mean. I realize that the agreement expired on March 31, but this government has made a specific promise that it will contribute fifty per cent of the cost and I should like to know if there is some understanding that that contribution will be continued until the highway is completed. Let me put it in another way. The Prime Minister and his candidates promised that a national highway would be built with funds from the federal exchequer. Apparently they abandoned that idea and offered to make a contribution to the provinces of fifty per cent of the cost. Is there not an agreement that this contribution will be continued until the highway is completed?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot add anything to what I have said already. There is no agreement because there is no authority to make one. Those provinces that find that they cannot get along without assistance from the dominion undoubtedly will approach the dominion with a view to entering into an agreement to take care of the matters to which the hon. member has directed attention, as well as other matters. But at the present time there is no agreement, there is no understanding, because so far as the government is concerned it would be highly improper to have an understanding or an agreement without any authority for entering into one.

Mr. HEENAN: I suppose we shall have to take that just as it is, but once again I submit that it places members in a strange predicament to find themselves voting for a blank cheque to be given to the government when they can get no information as to what is intended. The government made specific promises to the people before they came into power. They cajoled them into voting for this administration, and when my hon. friends got into power they refused to tell the electors what they would do. They will not even give any information to the elected representatives of the people as to what they contemplate. If there is one thing more than another that should open the eyes of members of this house it is the answer which the Prime Minister gave to the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell). The Prime Minister went to Hamilton and, surrounded by his friends, he got into that sort of humour that I suppose most of us get into at one time or another, though perhaps not with the same spirit as some of us, and he promised the city of Hamilton a building. There are hundreds if not thousands of workmen in Hamilton represented by my good friend from East Hamilton—and he is a very good representative too—and when the hon. gentleman stands on the floor of this house and inquires of the Minister of Labour or of the Prime Minister when it is proposed to start that work what answer does he receive from the right hon. gentleman? He receives one of the most flippant answers ever given in parliament since I have been a member of this house. The hon. gentleman can presuppose this, or he can imagine that, in the hope that some day his expectations may be realized. Is that the sort of answer that should be made by a government who are asking this parliament for a blank cheque?

I cannot see how the government can take this position after four years. There might be an excuse the first year or even the second year; they might say then, "We don't know what will arise; we cannot tell what each province may require." But after four years, surely they ought to be able to inform the members of this house just what the government of Ontario, for instance, or other provinces will want. They ought to be able to tell us, after the discussions they have had, whether certain work is to be undertaken in northern Ontario, or in Nova Scotia, or in the province of Quebec, as the case may be, and that as soon as this bill passes they expect to ask for so many millions. They should have some conception of what money is going to be expended and the use to which it will be put. If I were inclined to vote against this measure for any reason whatever, that reason would be the answer which the Prime Minister has just given to the hon. member for East Hamilton. The hon. gentleman has been a very courteous member; he has not been like myself, critical of this government, but has tried to save the government from the mess they got into over the titles question. Well, here is one of the most courteous members of this house rising and asking a question which vitally concerns the workmen of Hamilton: Are they going to be able to save the titles to their little homes? That is the question, and the Prime Minister gives, as I say, the most flippant answer, the sort of answer he would give to a schoolboy.

Yesterday in the course of his remarks the Prime Minister tried to make excuses for the government for the manner in which the federal moneys have been expended, and he compared what the government had done with the Liberal government's attitude towards old age pensions. What a terrible predicament the Prime Minister and the government must find themselves in when they begin to talk about old age pensions and to compare that question with unemployment relief! We made an agreement with the provinces, under authority of an act of parliament, to pay fifty per cent to any province participating in the scheme for the payment of pensions to persons over seventy.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Seventy-five per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: I am speaking about the time we were in power. The only difference is that we carried out our promise and you are carrying out yours only twenty-five per cent. The provincial government has full control over the administration of old age pensions—not the municipalities, not unorganized districts, not contractors. The provincial governments are responsible. The Prime Minister yesterday referred to fraudulent cases that had occurred under the old age pensions scheme, and he likened it to the terrible calamity we have now in connection with the expenditures of federal money. Can you imagine the Prime Minister and the government in such straits? Of course, in connection with old age pensions as well as under the Workmen's Compensation Act and the Mothers' Allowance Act, you will find instances here and there where someone probably gets the benefit of the act when he is not entitled thereto, but I do not suppose that in the whole of Canada there are more than twelve cases; yet the Prime Minister compares that to the expenditure in connection with unemployment relief.

Let me say this, that under the old age pensions legislation the accountant of the Labour department persistently checked up the various provinces, and while it is true that he discovered here and there someone that was not entitled to pension, the province concerned immediately made an adjustment. On the other hand, he found a good many people who were entitled to pension and whom the provinces had denied, and in a great many instances there was an adjustment in this direction. But when hon. gentlemen talk about old age pensions I cannot help observing at this particular time that Ontario through their commissioner is chiselling, whether the Minister of Labour knows it or not, many of the aged people of that province out of their old age pensions. I have several letters, one in particular from a Conservative, a man who was born a Conservative and who I suppose will die one. This man got $20 a month when he reached the age of seventy. That is what the law allows. When his wife attained the age of seventy she also was entitled under the act to $20 per month. And remember, that is the law; it is not what some politician or some commission may say, but it is the law. But the commission in Ontario wrote to this aged couple a letter in which they stated, "Now that you are both receiving the benefit of the old age pension, $30 ought to be sufficient for the two of you." That is chiselling aged people, who are on the brink of the grave, out of $10 a month that is theirs by law. So far as the Prime Minister is concerned, who promised especially in Nova Scotia that one hundred per cent of old age pensions would be paid by the federal government, the less the right hon. gentleman says about old age pensions the better.

I think the Minister of Labour placed on Hansard the record of what the former Liberal government did in 1922 with respect to the administration of unemployment relief. I was not in the House of Commons at that time; I was in the legislature, so I can speak only by the records, but he will find that the system that was in vogue in 1922 was instituted by a good Conservative government in October, 1921. That Conservative government initiated the making of agreements not with the provinces but with the municipalities. Now the present Prime Minister says that they were all wrong; that constitutionally they had no right to make those agreements with the municipalities, that the action taken was unconstitutional, but nevertheless the government that was defeated in 1921 instituted in October of that year the practice of making agreements with the municipalities. The agreement was extended to some extent since then. At that time it was, I believe, speaking from memory, one-third of the excess cost over normal of works that were done in the winter time. The provision was that this excess cost would be estimated by the dominion government engineers, and this was done. I know from the records, because I had to settle up a good many of those cases even after 1926, that the dominion engineers refused the claims in many instances. For example, some municipalities had put down shovelling snow as excess construction work and there were many other cases of that kind. Those were all checked up by the auditor general and there is no suggestion whatever that through those years there was anything wrong.

I want again to refer the Minister of Labour to our discussion of yesterday. I know the limitations of the authority of the minister with respect to wages and all that kind of thing, and I am not going to ask him to do anything that I feel I could not do myself were I in that office. But in this particular case provincial governments are, as they have done before, asking the Minister of Labour for contributions to enable them to carry on certain works. While the minister has no jurisdiction in setting wages in the provinces except on dominion works, he has now the jurisdiction to say: "We will give you those contributions on certain conditions," and one of the conditions could be that they pay prevailing rates of wages, or fair wages, or some kind of wages that the minister himself, after consulting with his officers, might determine. He has that power. We do not need to give money away if we do not want to do so, and if we give it away we can give it under any conditions we like to impose.

As I said yesterday, when the bill was first introduced in the house at the special session of 1930, this government gave a specific pledge. I think the hon. member who gave the pledge for the government was the Minister of Justice, who has just left the chamber. We pointed out to him the resolution that was passed in 1900 providing that any contract for works undertaken by anyone with a contribution from this government should include a fair and reasonable rate of wages provision. In 1930 we passed in this chamber another act providing for eight hours a day and fair rates of wages for government work. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister, if I remember aright, specifically stated, in answer to some of us on this side, that those provinces which were carrying on relief work would have to comply with that resolution and that policy. If that be true, how does it come about that the Ontario government—and I am speaking only about the province in which I reside and about which I know something—with that provision in their agreement and with those regulations to govern them on highway work, dropped the wages of their labourers from thirty-five cents to thirty cents, then from thirty cents down to $5 a month and their board, then raised it to $10 a month and their board, until now, after three years and after some of us have gone through the country shaming that government into action, they have decided all at once to give twenty-five cents an hour? How is it that the Minister of Labour for Canada has not some say in the matter? That is what puzzles me. So far as I can see, the only good to be accomplished by talking on the floor of the House of Commons or outside is to awaken the public to what is going on. I am certain I am not going to get the Minister of Labour, or the hon. member (Mr. Macdougall) who is sitting behind him just now, to agree with me on all points; or if they do, they will not say so. However, I thank the hon. member for Inverness for agreeing with me for once. I do not speak in the house in the hope of getting the Prime Minister to become a Liberal; I speak in order that the public may understand the treatment that is accorded to the people in northern Ontario and the mishandling and bungling of everything in which the Ontario government has ever taken part. I am appealing to the Minister of Labour to take a hand in this matter and to see that the Ontario government do the right thing. I can recall in 1923 when I was given an acclamation in Ontario—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The hon. member will never get one again.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not want it again; I want to fight, because the next morning everybody in the street told me he gave me the acclamation. On that occasion there were only two of us who got acclamations. The then member for Kingston, Mr. W. F. Nickle, the only democrat the Conservative party ever had, the man who told the people of Great Britain that we did not want any more titles in this country, and I, were the only two who got acclamations. The Conservatives were so pleased with the work I had done in the four previous years that they did not run a man against me. What happened? The Ferguson government came into power and the highway and road work was shut down overnight, just like the crack of a whip. I knew what was in their minds, but I tried to make excuses for them. I went through my district for six months saying: Be patient; wait till this government find their feet; they will not leave these miles of road leading into the bush, leading to nowhere; give them time. But I found out that it was a designed plot; they were going to tell the people that they had elected a labour man and to show them that as long as they did not elect a man who would support the Conservative, or the Ferguson, government—because it was never really a Conservative government—they were going to persecute the district. I then went to Hamilton where my hon. friend lives and I made a speech there pointing out that the Ontario government was persecuting a district because I was elected. I went to the head of the lakes and made a similar speech and to Winnipeg and made a similar speech there. And the people, even Conservatives—because there are some good Conservatives; they are pretty hard to find nowadays, but there are some if you look for them—asked the Ontario government: What is all this about? The result was that the Minister of Lands and Forests hied him in a private car to my constituency and put hundreds of men to work—I would not like to say thousands—and then he went to Toronto and said to the newspaper men: "What an awful liar that man Heenan is; I have more men working in his riding than in any other part of Ontario." So we are speaking here not only because we feel that some time we might touch a sympathetic chord in the heart of the government, but more particularly to let the people of Ontario and of Canada know just what is going on so that they will ask the government whether this is true or not. We ask the Minister of Labour to give us some help, because he is at the head of the department that is supposed to do that. There is only one department of the government of Canada charged with caring for labour, and the officers and the minister of that department ought to have a labour psychology. I agree that there is a limitation to his authority, but we ought at least to have that outlook on life from that department. When we speak about wages we ought to have the sympathetic help of the minister; he ought to stand in this house and say that if the Ontario government does not increase the wages of these men, we will not give them any further assistance, while if they do increase wages we shall give all the assistance we can consistent with the amount of money we have to spend. In our constituency we had to hold mass meetings of Conservatives, Liberals, Labour, United Farmers of Ontario and everything else in order to get any consideration from the Ontario government for districts for which no Conservative is sitting. I admit that conditions are better now in that regard; they could not allow people to starve to death, because that would attract attention and the rest of Ontario would suffer. But what I am trying to do is to get the assistance of this government and especially of the Minister of Labour. Labour men, Mr. Hutchinson, the member for Kenora in the legislature and a good many others, and I, have been pounding away at the Ontario government for the last three years about the wages they are paying in the camps in northern Ontario, $5 a month in the summer and $10 in the winter. At last after we had called attention for three years to this scandal, the government of Ontario on the eve of an election come out and say they are going to pay twenty-five cents an hour. Of course there will be a lot chiselled off that; they take 50 cents a month for the doctor and so on; they whittle it down so that a man will have about $8 a week. Many of them are married men. Suppose they have a house of which the rent is $15 or $20 a month, and at the end of the month they have $32 to send to their families! I have attended the funerals of some of these men; I have been in their homes when they have been called in from highway work on account of their children being sick through lack of nutrition, or because they were not able to clothe them and send them to school. I have seen some of those men die—they probably would have died anyhow, but I think the Ontario government's scale of pay hastened it somewhat. Now after two or three years, on the eve of an election we have got the Ontario government actually to say to them, not from concern for the working men but in order to try to get a few more votes: "We have defrauded you men out of your wages for three years; now we are going to give you back the money that we kept out of your pocket, in the hope that you will vote to put is into power again so that we may sink this province further into debt and increase the taxation of the people." That is the situation in the province of Ontario. I have here for the information of the minister a statement made by the Minister of Lands and Forests himself in his own constituency. Speaking in Orillia on February 2, he said:

"I don't consider $10 a month is any wage."

He will not agree that it is even slave wages.

These camps were undertaken to take care of as many idle young men as possible and to give them good board. We give them $10 a month as an allowance and we couldn't give them any more.

In February Mr. Finlayson said: "We cannot give them any more," but now on the eve of an election he says he can give them twenty-five cents an hour. I want to know where the money is coming from. How is it they are in a better position now than when Mr. Finlayson made this statement? I think we are entitled to know this. Mr. Finlayson was one who along with Hon. Charles McCrea and Hon. Howard Ferguson and Hon. George S. Henry and many others took leave from their provincial duties during the last federal election to go up and down the province of Ontario, saying what? Saying that the fact that there was unemployment in Ontario was due to the fiscal policies of the Liberal government at Ottawa. Now after nearly four years see what Mr. Finlayson says:

Defending the government in regard to present economic conditions the speaker described the depression as an aftermath of war.

Then another minister of the crown in Ontario went to Fort Frances and added insult to injury. Hon. Charles McCrea at Fort Frances last fall said in effect—I have his statement from the local paper, edited by the local Conservative member, so it must be a correct report: "Some will say that the present depression, the troubles we are passing through, were caused by the government at Ottawa or the government in Toronto, but any of you who read or think or exercise ordinary intelligence and sense will know that neither the government at Ottawa nor the provincial government in Toronto is responsible, but that the great war was the cause." That is what gentlemen went about saying. Some of my hon. friends on the other side—I have a lot of good friends there, and hope I shall always keep them—may think that some of us criticize them unduly, but it is because of such trickery as that that we do it. I do not mind losing or winning a football match or a cricket match or an election, but let us do it in a sportsmanlike way; let us not go round blowing about what we are going to do and promising the people what the Prime Minister and members of the provincial government promised they would do, and then four years afterwards insult the people by saying that if they use common sense or intelligence they will know that we were only trying to deceive or fool them three or four years ago. That is the effect of Mr. McCrea's words.

I want to ask the Minister of Labour now whether he will not insist that some of this money that the government of Ontario has hoarded or has borrowed—I understand they borrowed $40,000,000 recently—will be used to give these men who have been working on the highways their back pay, the money of which they have been robbed. That should be done, instead of increasing their wages now at the eleventh hour, prior to an election. It is their due. These men have been working; they have not been having a good time, as some of the newspapers would have us believe. The foremen have been led to compete against each other to see how many yards of dirt they can move and they, in turn, have had to work their men. They have been firing men because they were not able or willing to work in competition with others. These men have been doing laborious work in the interests of the state, and the state now says, "We do not require these fellows at all; we are just putting them away up there in the bush."

I understand some question has been raised with regard to the one cent cheque to which I referred yesterday; I understand that the newspaper in Vancouver that published a photograph of this cheque now denies it. I am going to make the statement again, so that it will be understood. The picture of the cheque appears on page 20 of the Vancouver Daily Province of Wednesday, August 16, 1933.

Mr. GOTT: It is cheap trash for a provincial election, and you will not get to first base with it.

Mr. HEENAN: I was going to say to the minister, "Render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's; render unto Gott that which is Gott's." That would be about a nickel, or a cent.

Mr. GOTT: You have put that on record about four times.

Mr. HEENAN: And you would not understand it if I put it on record again. Every time you squeeze an onion it makes your eyes water. This cheque for one cent was issued by the northern development branch of the province of Ontario and was sent to the editor of the Vancouver Daily Province by the man who received it. This man's name is C. Caesar; the cheque was issued on the Canadian Bank of Commerce at Minden, Ontario, and the photograph is headed by the words, "One Month—One Cent." Below the photograph the editor of the newspaper has this to say:

After clothing issued to C. Caesar, worker at camp No. 9, Hall Lake, Minden, Ontario, had been half paid for, he received the cheque shown above for his month's wages. It is a moot question how many dollars will be expended in bookkeeping for the next two or three years carrying this cheque entry forward as an outstanding item, as its owner has requested its return so he may frame it as a souvenir to show to his grandchildren.

I presume he wants to show his grandchildren how the Ontario government paid their workers in 1933. I have other cheques here that have not been cashed.

Mr. GOTT: It costs the country more than one cent to have the hon. member speak. It is a waste of time.

Mr. HEENAN: Perhaps that is what my hon. friend thinks, and I cannot blame him if he does think so. Sometimes I wonder if I do much good, but I will say to my hon. friend that he never opens his mouth without giving a grunt like a pig, and that he never rises on the floor of this house except to interfere or heckle. If he were in some parts of the country—

Mr. GOTT: I will stand up now to say that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River ought to be ashamed of himself.

Mr. HEENAN: I am, because I am talking to you. Every time I talk to my hon. friend I am ashamed of myself.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Macdonald, Cape Breton): All this conversation is entirely out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I want to be decent, but I can never be decent when I am speaking to that hon. gentleman.

Mr. GOTT: We know what to expect.

Mr. HEENAN: If the chairman cannot keep that hon. gentleman quiet I will try to do it myself.

Mr. GOTT: You would have a fine time.

Mr. HEENAN: All you would have to do would be to give him a little pin prick and he would burst like a bubble. It may be that I am not doing any good, but at least I have awakened some of our editors to the fact that conditions are not what they should be. I have here the Ottawa Citizen of February 10, 1934, from which I am going to read just one sentence. Referring to my remarks in connection with the one cent cheque the Citizen has this to say:

When Russia has been discussed at Ottawa, there have been contemptuous references to the "slave labour" of that country. At least we ought to set our own house in order before indulging again in such audacious hypocrisy.

Mr. POULIOT: This is much more interesting than Ferguson's five cent speeches.

Mr. HEENAN: So notwithstanding the fact that some hon. members may think I am not doing much good, I think perhaps I am doing some good in drawing these matters to the attention of the public. At least I am doing this much good, if my hon. friend can understand it; I have been working on this for over three years, and finally the Ontario government have announced that the wages of the men will be increased to twenty-five cents.

Mr. GOTT: I listen to and understand anything that is sensible.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Gobeil in the chair

On section 2—agreements with provinces.

Mr. HEENAN: While the minister is waiting for his deputy I want to say a few words by way of concluding my remarks. If the province of Ontario enters into an agreement with the federal government, as undoubtedly the minister expects, I would ask him to see to it that the policy enunciated by this government that fair wages shall be paid on all public works to which contributions are made by this government is carried out. I trust that the minister will insist upon that at this particular time at any rate, even although he has failed to do so in the past.

There is another matter. I recall that when the Prime Minister was speaking on the relief bill in 1930 he enunciated a policy of undertaking works for the purpose of supplying work and wages. I think we have got away from the wages end of that policy. It is true that the regulations provided that men in the community in which the work was to be undertaken would be supplied with work, and settlers and others located along the line of the highways would get the benefit of such work. I would urge upon the minister, and at the same time make an appeal to him, that this government has a duty to perform and that is to see that that policy is carried out. In our district, and I think it applies throughout northern Ontario although I can speak more particularly for the district of Rainy River and Kenora, a great many settlers live during the winter by cutting pulpwood for pulp and paper mills. These mills have been closed down until recently and the settlers have not had the same opportunity to make a living during the winter time. It was expected that the camps would obtain their supplies of vegetables and meats from the settlers along the highway, but the provincial government let a contract to the firm of Crawley and McCracken. We were unable to have these contractors purchase their vegetables and meats from the settlers residing along the highway. The member for Kenora in the legislature went to the government about the matter but they referred him to the contractors. The contractors stated that they could buy only meats which had gone through a certain inspection. The matter was then referred to me and I took it up with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). I must give him credit for doing his share, and I am glad there is one member of the cabinet to whom I can throw a bouquet. I received a telegram from Doctor Grisdale, the deputy minister, under date of December 11, 1931, reading as follows:

Am advised by Mr. Fairbairn, deputy minister agriculture, Toronto, that agreement with Crawley and McCracken who have contract to board labour specifies that food shall be good and wholesome. There is no mention of meat inspection. We are ready put man at Dryden or any other place supervise hog slaughterings and issue certificates wholesomeness of product. Please advise with whom we might make contact in order speed up necessary arrangements.

That was in 1931 when there was a plentiful supply of hogs in that particular district. Notwithstanding the fact that this government was making a contribution to the Ontario government, we could not get this contracting firm to purchase supplies from the farmers in that part of the country. I am safe in saying that hundreds and possibly thousands of bushels of potatoes which these settlers had been encouraged to grow in the belief that they would be purchased as supplies for the camps, rotted in the cellars, while potatoes were purchased in Winnipeg and from eastern points.

There is no doubt that if this matter is brought to the attention of the Ontario government they will claim it has been rectified, but I should like to tell the committee how it has been rectified. The Minister of Lands and Forests made a trip through northern Ontario accompanied by Premier Henry and other members of the cabinet. When this matter was brought to his attention by the local member, as well as by settlers in that part of the country, he got up on a public platform and made the announcement that henceforth he would see to it that the contractors purchased potatoes and other vegetables from the settlers in that part of the country. But that promise was never put into practice. The Ontario government is on the eve of an election and the Conservative candidate does not even live in the riding; he lives in the riding of Fort William. This gentleman has placed an advertisement in the papers to the effect that he has made an arrangement with Crawley and McCracken whereby they will purchase their supplies for the camps from the farmers in that vicinity. This is playing politics with unemployment relief, something which the Prime Minister promised would not be done. It is all right for the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) to stand up on the floor of this house, as he did the other evening, and say that in connection with all works with which he had anything to do he would give the benefit to his friends and not to his enemies—incidentally, I notice the papers took him to task editorially for making that statement—but I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) will not take a similar position.

My last appeal to the minister, on this occasion at least, is to ask him to see that these provisions are included in the contract. But a contract is not considered by the Ontario government to be worth very much; they would break a contract to-morrow if they thought it would enhance their political prestige. That is the experience I have had for fifteen or sixteen years. I would much rather say something nice about them, but I cannot find anything nice to say. I appeal to the Minister of Labour to see to it that contractors who are receiving federal money comply with the announced policy of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to this debate hoping to hear some constructive policy announced by the government to deal with the unemployment problem, but I think it is fair to say that up to the moment the only policy announced is purely negative. It is in direct contradiction of the claims made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and other members of the government when they went around the country in 1930. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has given examples of the wages paid in the camps up in his part of the country. When the government contribute funds to an enterprise or undertaking, in my judgment they have a direct responsibility to see that a fair rate of wages is paid. I do not think it is fair to the unemployed or to the employed that these men working on a constructive undertaking should be asked to work for $10 a month. In some instances the result has been that a man has received as little as one cent at the end of the month. If these men were placed in the camps simply to be fed, there might be some excuse, but they are taking part in a national enterprise, the construction of a highway from one end of this dominion to the other, and I do not think the government should employ men at a wage scale which no private employer would stoop to pay.

We have another example offered us in the 18,000 civil servants receiving less than $1,000 per year who are to have the ten per cent deduction returned to them. It looks to me as though the committee now investigating mass buying should investigate the wages paid by this government as well as those paid by private employers. Perhaps hon. members should not be unmindful of the fact that many within the compass of that 18,000 are postmasters and that this is a strategic move in view of the nearness of an election.

I have listened with keen interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in connection with the policies of the Conservative government of Ontario in this crisis. There is to be an increase in relief. I have no objection to this; I believe it should have been done long ago, but it is passing strange that on the eve of an election a provincial government should find it necessary to increase relief payments which practically come out of the federal treasury. The workers in these road camps, under this policy, are to have their wages increased to twenty-five cents an hour. It is a pity we cannot have an election every week or so; we should all become rich under those conditions. This afternoon I got a rather stinging reply because I asked when the government expected to be able to put into motion the building policy it had in mind. I hope that is not going to be a purely political policy in view of the forthcoming election. In 1930 it was, "We will cure unemployment or perish in the attempt"; in 1934 the policy is, "Give the electors what they want so that we can get back into power". It is so obvious to even the casual observer that this is the background of the policy.

During the supper hour I was reading a periodical which brings out very clearly the direct responsibility of the government in connection with the payment of wages in any undertaking under their control. The article which I read was an open letter to the Prime Minister in the January number of Chatelaine. It discusses a family, husband and wife and four children. The husband had been out of work for two years but through the assistance given them by their friends they have been able to remain off relief. Eventually this man got a job in one of the camps at a salary of $39.50 a month. The family budget was given as follows: Rent, $12; fuel, $7; light, $1.50; milk, $6; and expenses for the husband's clothes and at the camp, $3.50; drugs, $1, or $31 in all. That left $8.50 to feed and clothe a family of five under their conditions. I will not draw any inferences regarding what has happened in other countries; they have to work out their own destiny their own way. We however have a direct responsibility in relation to a vital question such as this.

Under the widow's pension legislation of the province this family would have been entitled, if the husband were dead, to allowances equivalent to $58.50 per month, so that the family would have been better off had the husband and father passed to the great beyond than they are while he is trying to make a contribution to the building-up of the country. Had he been an invalid—he would have been treated as a child—he would have received $67.05 per month. In my judgment this shows very clearly the responsibility of any governmental agency in the employment of men who after all are their fellow Canadians.

I should like to have seen the government bring down something very definite instead of giving us a reiteration of the policy of the dole —because we might as well be frank about it—which has been in existence during the last three or four years. I should like to have seen them move in the direction of getting rid of some of the slum districts in the larger centres. I should like to have seen them expand a building program to provide houses for the people of the country. One could quote figures showing the real shortage that exists at the moment. In my city rents are increasing because of the contraction of available houses owing to the depression. I think the government has a direct responsibility in that regard, just as much of a responsibility to the average man and woman in the street as it shows in its policy in connection with one or two big undertakings which have been assisted. I do not say this critically but by way of comparison; for if it is sound and logical to come to the assistance of one form of organization which the government feels necessary to the life of the dominion, I think it is just as essential that the government should come to the assistance of those who find themselves in a position such as I have indicated, over which they have no control.

I must therefore express my disappointment in the attitude of the government with regard to unemployment. I cannot say that I wholly agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the view he takes of the blank cheque aspect of the legislation. I would give the government any kind of cheque if only they would implement the promises they made in the last election. I think the Canadian people are all of one mind on that point. I am mindful of the fears of the leader of the opposition, but I would point this out. Liberty is not merely a right; it has been obtained by fighting and sacrifice. It is an asset that has been dearly won by the Anglo-Saxon people and it can be maintained in a democracy only if the citizens are willing to grant the state the powers they think necessary in an emergency of this description. I believe you have to choose between that and a dictatorship. I do not believe anything can be done under a dictatorship that cannot be done in a democracy, and I am of the opinion that when the history of this period is written it will be found that those countries who observed most closely the spirit of democratic institutions will be those that will have passed through this trial and will most successfully cope with the inevitable problems that will confront them then. I believe that sincerely. At the same time, I do not think that we should deny those who have the responsibility of leadership and government the freedom to lead, though I think that responsibility should be definite and for a fixed period. I think this also, that you must retain control over those charged with responsibility; you must leave yourself the right, I might almost say the divine right, to change them. I have never held the opinion that we should permit legislative medicine to be prescribed for us. I think it can be safely said that this House of Commons is a pretty fair cross-section of the Canadian people. What I like about democracy is that it is so human; it is a system of government in which you suffer for your own sins. If you elect the wrong kind of people, you suffer accordingly.

Mr. YOUNG: We are finding that out.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is part of the penalty. I believe that this government will suffer for its legislative sins at the next election. But I do not think there is any argument in the matter of giving the Prime Minister and the executive the right to make a quick change to meet an emergency should one arise. I agree with the Prime Minister that in every country there should be a forum where men can speak the truth as they see it notwithstanding the fact that ninety-nine per cent of the people may disagree with them. Last summer I had a very practical experience of that, and I will close with this observation which, too, is very human. I went to Russia, where one can sense the oppression, the censorship; and I visited Poland, where I had promised to make a speech to the people of my political outlook. When I got there I found that fifty per cent of the members of the House of Commons of radical outlook were in gaol, and I did not make the speech. I went on to the next stop, Berlin, where most of the fellows of my political complexion, trade unionists and so on, were either in concentration camps or in gaol, and I was told not to ask the questions I thought I should ask. When I went to the next stop, London, England, I could have stood outside Buckingham palace and told them where they could get off at, and they would have simply laughed at me. In this hour of trial that object lesson was worth something; it exemplifies the true spirit of Anglo-Saxon liberty; it exemplifies the real driving force of our civilization. I would like those in this country who feel that the right method to adopt is suppression, to take a leaf out of the book whence our institutions sprang.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Might I ask the minister for some explanation regarding the amount of $110,198,272.92 which appears under the heading of "Recapitulation of Dominion Disbursements under Relief Legislation?" I see, for instance, that under the heading of "Department of the Interior, including the Yukon," the expenditures are as follows:

Year—	Amount
1930	$ 56,994 66
1931	876,125 73
1932	660,185 84
1933	1,139,203 18
Total	$2,732,509 41

Can the minister give the committee some explanation of the expenditures under these various items, in what provinces the money was spent and for what purpose?

Mr. GORDON: In the four western provinces, in the national parks of Canada which are administered by the Department of the Interior, certain camps were established to take care mainly of the floating population, and each succeeding year to the extent that those camps were taken advantage of, the amount has increased. Perhaps hon. members will remember that in 1931, yes, in 1930, it got to be a habit for people to take advantage of all sorts of transportation, sometimes riding in freight cars and on the rods, sometimes hitch-hiking in trucks and so on, to go from place to place and concentrate here and there, until the problem arose, particularly with the four western provinces, of taking care of those people. I think complaints were made in the house at that time and the plan was evolved, in so far as the western provinces were concerned, that the organization of the Department of the Interior could be used in order to provide subsistence camps in the national parks to take care of that floating population. Hon. members will likewise remember that the Department of National Defence also took part in the organization and carrying on of camps where these people could be housed, taken care of and do some work on dominion projects. That work has also been carried on, and a few weeks ago in the house when the estimates of the Department of National Defence were under review, I believe complete information was given to the committee as to the work which was done. That, shortly, accounts for the expenditures to which the hon. member has made reference.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister has mentioned the national parks in various parts of the dominion, but this item includes the Yukon. What was done there? Is there a national park there? Are the people travelling or staying in that part of the country?

Mr. GORDON: The contribution that was made to the Yukon was in the form of public works and direct relief. The administration was in the hands of the gold commissioner for the Yukon.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How many people in the Yukon territory received relief?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the population of the Yukon?

Mr. GORDON: The population of the Yukon, that is, if you confine it to the electoral riding, is something under 2,000, probably between 1,800 and 2,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister cannot tell us how much was spent there for direct relief?

Mr. GORDON: Under the 1930 act, $20,000 was spent on works in the Yukon. Under the 1931 act I have not the figures showing the Yukon separately. The expenditure of the Department of the Interior is joined with that of the Yukon, and I am sorry I am not able to separate the figures in order to apprise the hon. member of the exact amount spent in the Yukon proper.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister the figures for 1932 and 1933?

Mr. GORDON: I do not think anything was spent there in 1932 or last year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Besides direct relief, what kind of works were carried on in that territory?

Mr. GORDON: Apart from direct relief the work was chiefly road work, bridges, culverts and work of that kind.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How much was spent for those works, roads, culverts and bridges?

Mr. GORDON: I am sorry I have not the figures of that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister be in a position to give the information?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And also if there was any money spent for direct relief.

Mr. GORDON: Yes I can get details of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy) is now in his seat. As I understand it, the relief work in the parks is being carried on under his supervision. I was in Jasper park last summer and had the pleasure of driving over a very nice piece of new highway that will open up a considerable portion of the park. What I am chiefly interested in, however, and what I think the citizens of Jasper are interested in, is the continuation of the highway to connect with the national highway projected through to the coast. I think it is correct to say that the projected highway between Lake Louise and Jasper will take considerable time to build, and in my opinion it would be much more serviceable and would meet the public demand very much better if work were concentrated on the highway going through to the coast. I understand—and I got this information from a statement in one of the newspapers, I think the Calgary Albertan—that there is some sixty-six miles of the Big Bend road construction still to be completed, and that the part undertaken by the dominion government under the parks branch from Golden westward is almost completed; indeed if my information is correct more money has been spent upon it than was contemplated. But it seems to me that when large sums are being spent on relief projects it would be wisdom on the part of the government to concentrate on the completion of this highway, giving an all-Canadian highway through to the coast. I think that should be done first. I say that because it was rather a pet project of my own when I was in charge of the department, and now that we are spending large sums of money on projects of this kind, and will continue to do so, surely it is advisable to have an all-Canadian highway to the coast constructed before we extend very much farther the highways within the park boundaries.

Then on the completion of that, or contemporaneous with it, it seems to me that any work done in Jasper should be directed to extending the road down to connect with that highway, in order that people in the northern sections of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta might have a highway through to the coast by way of Jasper park. The construction of a highway over the summit I would not consider nearly as necessary as the completion of these highways. I know that my hon. friend the member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) is also very much interested in this project. I trust that future expenditures will be confined to these two projects, at any rate until they are completed or until such time as it is not necessary to find employment for a great number of young homeless men.

Mr. GORDON: That work is under way, and there is a concentration of men working on both of the highways to which reference has been made. The dominion government undertook to build the east leg of the Big Bend road up to Canoe river, the province of British Columbia undertaking to build the westerly leg from Revelstoke to Canoe river. But at the present time, owing to the financial condition of the province of British Columbia, the federal Department of the Interior is continuing the work on the east leg, and the Department of National Defence is concentrating on the westerly leg of the road. I think some very useful work is being done there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the Department of National Defence are working on the British Columbia end?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Were they working there all last summer?

Mr. BENNETT: Since the fall, I think. I speak subject to correction.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has stated, certain of these works, namely the eastern leg of the Big Bend highway and a certain amount of work on the section between Donald and Golden, were carried on during the season of 1933 by the Department of the Interior. Under the agreement entered into during the time the hon. member himself was Minister of the Interior the Dominion government undertook to construct that part of the highway known as the Big Bend highway from Donald north to Canoe river, the province of British Columbia obligating itself to build the highway north from Revelstoke joining the Dominion government's portion of the road at Canoe river. Work on that project was continued for some three years, I think under the regular parks appropriation, by the dominion on the eastern leg, and last year the work was continued under the unemployment relief scheme on which were engaged single, homeless men. In addition to that the Department of National Defence, under the agreement entered into by the dominion with British Columbia, used single homeless men on construction work on the western leg of that same highway. The eastern leg has been completed to within about twenty-eight to thirty miles of Canoe river. In giving these figures I do not wish to be taken as speaking with absolute accuracy because I have not the figures before me, but they are approximately correct.

The hon. member has also mentioned the road between Golden and Donald. May I point out that that portion of the road is not a dominion responsibility under the agreement; it is a provincial road. But under an arrangement made between the Department of the Interior and the Department of National Defence the Department of the Interior did use a certain number of single homeless men on that road during the season of 1933. While a certain amount of work was accomplished both on the Big Bend section and on the Golden-Donald section, not as much was accomplished as anticipated owing to lack of men. That is, we did not obtain the services of the number of men anticipated.

The hon. member for West Edmonton has also spoken of the road in Jasper park, asking that work be done upon the road which proceeds from the eastern boundary of the park west through the townsite of Jasper. The road from the eastern boundary of the park to the Jasper townsite and for a certain number of miles westward is an all-weather highway. As the hon. member knows, the road from Edmonton to the eastern boundary of Jasper park is not entirely an all-weather highway. The road of which I am now speaking is a provincial road, going from Edmonton to the eastern boundary of Jasper park. A goodly number of miles of that road cannot be classed as all weather highway, though it is a fairly passable road. The hon. member urges that the Dominion government continue that road westward through Jasper park in order to connect up with the Big Bend highway, I take it, at Canoe river, but may I point out that from the western boundary of Jasper park to Canoe river no work has been done, according to my information, and there is no road there. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. BENNETT: A tote road to Kamloops.

Mr. MURPHY: But not a road that could be described as a highway or a tourist road in any sense of the word. Until these two sections, namely the section between Edmonton and the eastern boundary of the park and the section between the western boundary and Canoe river are put in passable condition it would not seem to be of very great advantage to the dominion to push the road through to the western boundary of Jasper park. We have been utilizing the services of single homeless men in Jasper park for many purposes, such as establishing tourist camp sites and building and improving the highways within the park itself which are used by tourists and others.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to my hon. friend, while he is on that question, that last summer I travelled over some twenty-five miles of very fair new highway which I presume, and as a matter of fact I know, was to connect with the projected road from Lake Louise to Jasper. All I am urging is that this remain in abeyance until we have through highways to the coast, that this construction be discontinued until the highways are completed.

Mr. BENNETT: That would give connection through to the coast from Edmonton.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But my right hon. friend must realize that if you travel by way of Lake Louise rather than by the shorter route you must go a great deal out of your way. I can speak only from the information I have obtained from the engineers, and while I admit at once that the reconnaissance surveys north to Canoe river were somewhat indefinite, yet if my information is correct you must go over a summit of six thousand feet coming from Lake Louise, so this will not be of very much use as a motor highway during the summer months. Many years ago in the Crowsnest pass, where the summit is over 5,200 feet, we had the road open only about one month in the year, and my hon. friend knows quite well that in the vicinity of Lake Louise we frequently must remove a tremendous amount of snow before the existing roads are passable. If my memory serve me rightly, however, the greatest elevation if you travel to the coast by way of Jasper is 3,400 feet. Of course that is not true of the southern highway, but the southern highway is so much nearer completion that I would urge its completion first, at the same time continuing to project the road over an easy summit and connecting it up with the highway that is being completed by the southern route. That is all I am urging. I have no particular objection to seeing this road completed in the years to come; in the last two or three years a good deal of expenditure has been made in connection with it, but I do urge that before further expenditure is made upon that road both the other highways be completed in order that people may have access to the coast over Canadian territory.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for West Edmonton must admit that the dominion has carried out, and in fact more than carried out its undertaking with the province of British Columbia in constructing the Big Bend highway. As I said a few moments ago, in constructing the eastern leg of that road we are now within some twenty-eight miles of Canoe river, and that is the portion of the road which the dominion obligated itself to complete. As a matter of fact the western leg, which the province of British Columbia agreed to construct, is very far from completion. When I said a moment ago that the dominion has done more than it obligated itself to do, that was made possible only by the work the dominion is carrying on in providing employment for single homeless men. Under that scheme the Department of National Defence did construct last summer several miles of road on the western leg, and by an arrangement with that department the dominion government, through the Department of the Interior, constructed a certain part of the road between Donald and Golden, which is a purely provincial responsibility. Therefore I do not think the dominion government can be charged with any laxity in pushing the all-Canadian highway westward to the Pacific coast. As a matter of fact, had the province of British Columbia completed the work in accordance with the terms of the agreement, by the end of the present year there would be an all weather road through to the coast. So while the hon. gentleman urges that the dominion should make greater efforts to complete this road I think it can be said that the dominion has made very great progress, since they have done more than under the agreement they obligated themselves to do. Further may I point out that while the hon. member urges the completion of the Edmonton-Jasper highway westward, that portion of the road between the western boundary of Jasper Park and Canoe river is a provincial responsibility.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Part of it would not be if Mount Robson were added to the park.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a large "if" there; if such and such were done it would be a different matter. That portion of the road from the western boundary of Jasper park to Canoe river is a provincial responsibility practically in toto, and while the hon. member urges the completion of a national highway through to the coast I have endeavoured to point out to him that the dominion has made very great efforts to push forward a road to completion in order to give the people of Canada access to the coast. The hon. member also mentions the work that has been done under the unemployment relief scheme in the construction of a road from Lake Louise to Jasper, and I am very happy to state that over fifty miles of that road has been constructed by means of relief labour. I have travelled over it from Lake Louise north and from the Jasper end south.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How many miles have been constructed from Lake Louise north?

Mr. MURPHY: Some twenty odd miles, and a greater number of miles at the other end.

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty-four and twenty-six miles.

Mr. MURPHY: That is approximately correct, and I may say that this road will be one of the most scenic roads in Canada. That, of course, is a purely dominion responsibility, because that road lies within Banff and Jasper park. Upon its completion it will provide an outlet for the people of Edmonton and others in the northern parts on which to travel to the coast. True, it is a different route from that which the hon. member advocates, but surely it is not contended that the dominion should be expected to carry on the construction of two transcontinental highways through the Rockies to the coast. One transcontinental highway should serve the purpose. But if another road is desired and the province see fit to connect up Canoe river eastward to the boundary of Jasper park, well and good. That would provide an alternative route.

While on the subject of the work done in our national parks under the relief scheme I would point out that we have carried on work not only in Jasper and Banff but in the other parks, for instance, at Waterton in southern Alberta, a certain amount in Yoho park and a considerable amount in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, and in Riding Mountain park in my own province of Manitoba.

May I here pay tribute to those who have had charge of that work? It has been my privilege on more than one occasion to visit the work that has been done, and I can say that the roads that have been built are up to the park standard. They have been well built. The other works that have been carried on, such as underbrushing to prevent forest fires, the construction of trails and of certain needed buildings and bridges and other works too numerous to mention, are all a credit I think to those who have been in charge of the work. It will be a permanent asset to the people of this country.

I have visited the camps in all of these parks with the exception of Yoho, and so far as I could judge on a visit which was not advertised in advance, with no one knowing that I was coming with the exception of my party, the men were contented. They were well housed, well clothed, and well fed. There was a big difference in their appearance and in their morale when they came out in the spring than when they entered those camps in the fall of the year. I may have something more to say on this subject, Mr. Chairman, on another occasion if it seems advisable.

Mr. HEENAN: May I ask the Minister of the Interior what rate of pay the men received on that work?

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend asks what wages were paid on that work. Wages as such have never been considered as being paid. These men were placed there on a sustenance basis. They were given their food and their shelter, and their clothing and equipment to fit them for their work. In addition, they were given an allowance of twenty cents a day, which was given not as wages but to enable them to provide themselves with certain necessaries such as shaving equipment, toilet articles, tooth brushes, soap, towels and so forth, and tobacco. The twenty cents a day was not paid to these men as a wage. They were there simply on a sustenance basis. It had been pointed out to the dominion government that through no fault of their own these unemployed men did not belong to any particular municipality, and therefore not being considered a charge upon any particular municipality it was contended that they were a dominion responsibility. The dominion through the Department of the Interior and the Department of National Defence have been taking care of a good many thousands of men falling within that category. But again I wish to emphasize that it has never been my understanding that these men were working on a wage basis. It was a matter of sustenance and sustenance alone.

Mr. HEENAN: That brings me to another question, and I am glad that the minister has been so frank in his answer. The Ontario government took the same position in regard to their camps, but they have recently issued a statement that from the first of April they are going to pay wages to the extent of twenty-five cents an hour. Might I ask if this government intends to follow the example of the Ontario government in the work that is being done in the national parks under the Minister of the Interior and in connection with the air fields under the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. MURPHY: I take it that the policy of the government will be made known by the Prime Minister in due season. I am not prepared to make a statement on that point.

Mr. HEENAN: So long as the matter is still under consideration and the answer is not definitely no, I am satisfied to wait. But I should have thought that a time like this when the government is asking for a blank cheque would be a good opportunity to make an announcement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I thank the Minister of the Interior very much for his very full explanation of the improvements being carried on in the parks. I will agree at once with his statement that the work is well done because I have some knowledge of the personnel that is still carrying on there.

The Minister of the Interior seems to feel that British Columbia should not be given greater assistance. As I understood the program carried on throughout Canada, the Department of National Defence has undertaken the responsibility of taking care of the unmarried men at camps which they have established all over the country. If I am not mistaken there was a camp of these men under the Department of National Defence on the highway leading to Banff inside the park area.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one near here.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I merely mentioned that fact in passing. This national highway was a pet scheme of my own when I was Minister of the Interior. I was extremely anxious that we should have an all-Canadian route. True I was not as anxious about the northern portion as I was to complete the southern portion, because with its completion we would at least have one highway on which we could go through to the coast without passing through American territory. But as Jasper developed and as the provincial government began to project their highway to Jasper, in 1926 I had the very definite promise of that provincial government that within one year they would have completed their highway to the park; they would not have it all gravelled, not an all-weather highway, but they would have a highway reaching the eastern boundary of Jasper park. With that understanding, as Minister of the Interior I secured a vote in the House of Commons here for the purpose of taking up the ties on the abandoned grade and constructing a road from the town of Jasper to the eastern boundary. I regret very much that the provincial government did not carry out their part of the agreement. So far as I know there is still a small mileage that is not an all-weather highway from Edmonton into the park, but I am not finding fault with anybody. All I am urging now is that inasmuch as the federal government for relief purposes have camps on highways all across Canada under the Department of National Defence—

Mr. BENNETT: Other classes of work as well.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking now primarily of highways. It is not likely that the British Columbia government will complete that sixty-six odd miles for some years to come. They may do so, but judging from the statement of their provincial treasurer the province is not going to be in a very healthy condition financially to undertake works of this kind, and I should like to see work on that piece of highway concentrated under the Department of National Defence in order that it may be completed. Instead of concentrating on the highway leading from Lake Louise to Jasper, which runs in a southeasterly direction, I think the minister should concentrate on getting to the edge of the park. Then if the highway is to go on, the Department of National Defence might carry on to connect with the southern highway. I am finding no fault with what the minister or the department has done because I have seen the work and I agree with the minister when he states it is well done. The northern section of the highway from Jasper to Lake Louise will be valuable as a scenic route for tourists because it passes many beautiful lakes and does not have to go over any great height of land, such as is the case in the southern end. It will be valuable to that extent and certainly the work has not been wasted. I contend that before any further work is done on that particular piece of highway, there should be concentration on the other.

Mr. BENNETT: The representatives of the Edmonton board of trade and chamber of commerce called on me when I was last in the west and we resumed a conversation which we had had some years before in connection with this work. The provincial government was unable to complete the highway west to the eastern boundary of Jasper park. We gave assistance and men were actually encamped on the line west of Edson. However, winter came on and it was not possible to continue with the work. I think the hon. gentleman knows exactly what happened—a snowstorm came up and it was impossible to carry on. It is the intention to assist the provincial authorities as far as possible to complete the line into Jasper park. From Jasper park west it has been completed by the federal government. Some years ago when we were carrying on relief measures, representatives from the Edmonton district concluded that it was desirable to cut that road through to lake Louise in order to enable people coming in from the south to reach Jasper and go back by way of Edmonton and those coming in from Saskatchewan and the north to go south and then return on the other highway, in other words, make a round trip of it. The road which has been cut through is said by those well able to judge to be the most beautiful road in western Canada, but I am not in position to state just how accurate that statement is. I do not think it is fair for the hon. gentleman to suggest that any government, under existing conditions, should undertake the construction of a highway from the western boundary of Jasper park to Canoe river or Kamloops. There is a tote road down there and the reconnaissance survey indicates that the construction of a highway would cost a very substantial sum of money. That money would have to be found by the province and the province is not in position to find it. British Columbia agreed in a written contract to complete this part of the highway up to the western boundary of Riding Mountain park. That work has not been done but the government is assisting in the completion of that line. So far as it may be possible to do so, the work will be carried on and a highway completed to permit a continuous journey through Banff national park, past Canoe river and down to the coast. The cost of the work on the British Columbia side was somewhat greater than was anticipated when this house confirmed the agreement some years ago. Nevertheless, to the extent that it may be possible to do so an endeavour will be made to complete the line through to the coast even though by so doing we will be discharging obligations undertaken by British Columbia.

May I say a word with respect to the sustenance employment given to these men working in the parks, Riding Mountain, Banff and other places. They are told that whenever an opportunity for permanent employment offers they are free to leave the camps. An effort is being made constantly to provide them with employment at suitable wages. In many instances this has been successful and the number of camps has become less than it was when they were first started.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) will be good enough to amplify the statement he made just before six o'clock as to the future relations between the federal and provincial governments in so far as the relief of unemployment is concerned. A few days before the Easter recess he stated in answer to a question asked by me that it was the intention of the government to invite the provinces to a conference in Ottawa with a view to establishing a new system of direct relief. He made the positive statement that the federal government was to call the provinces to this conference, but just before six o'clock he left the committee under the impression that only those provinces which could not find their way clear to provide for unemployment would be called to Ottawa in conference. That statement is a direct contradiction of what he said before the Easter recess. I might as well tell him that the statement he made before the recess received fairly wide publication. I have received many letters asking when this famous conference was to take place but the only answer I was able to give was that given to me by the minister. The minister told the committee that the western provinces already had been called into conference and I should like to know if it is the intention of the government to call other provinces, for instance Quebec, into conference as soon as possible after the Easter recess.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think there need be any confusion in the mind of anyone in connection with the relationship between the dominion and the provinces. If a province can get along and discharge its own constitutional responsibilities, I hope that province will not come to Ottawa seeking money simply because some other province less fortunately situated financially has had to appeal to the federal government to supplement its own efforts in looking after its own constitutional responsibilities. That is the thought that I intended to convey. I hope that some of the provinces may be able to take care of at least the greater share of their relief requirements without help from the federal authorities. They may not be able to do this one hundred per cent, but they may be able to do more than they have been able to do in the last two or three years. These are matters which will have to be discussed by this government with the representatives of those provinces which acknowledge their inability to discharge their constitutional functions.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What government is going to take the first step to ascertain if a province needs further direct relief? In the past the federal government took the initial step. For my own information I should like to know if the federal government is going to continue to take the first step to ascertain whether the provinces are able to carry their own burdens or whether they will require assistance from the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: May I assure the hon. gentleman that until this legislation is passed the provinces will have to look after themselves. What action is to be taken will be determined by the time it takes to pass this legislation.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I might tell my right hon. friend that I said, after this legislation is passed.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish to discuss the question mentioned by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and of which the minister has knowledge. Last week Mr. Finlayson stated that work on the trans-Canada highway would be started west of the town of Hearst. This is a message that has been received with great joy in my section of the country and also in the riding represented by the Minister of Labour, and I should like to receive from the minister an assurance that the government of Ontario has approached him in this matter in his capacity as head of the unemployment relief administration.

There is one question which is of very great importance to our section and it is this. Construction of the highway west of Hearst is a problem that must have been studied carefully during the last three years—that is, the routing of the road. If the road swings back immediately south of Hearst it will have no significance to our section from the point of view of tourist traffic. The routing of the road west of Hearst should go westerly following the National Transcontinental highway for a considerable distance, at least as far west as Nakina. I draw this to the attention of the minister because I think he is familiar with the situation so far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned, and I think that sufficient time has been given the provincial government to study the proper routing of the road.

I should be glad if the minister could tell the committee that what Mr. Finlayson has said will be carried out in the course of the summer, and that the work will be started very soon in the spring.

There is another matter which is discussed a good deal in our section of the country, and that is the land-bonusing scheme. I believe the impression has been created in northern Ontario that the scheme will be financed partly by the federal government and partly by the treasury of Ontario, and this is one of the best ways whereby to remedy the dire situation that exists among our settlers in northern Ontario. It may be suggested that such promises are made only in anticipation of an election, but I do not take it in that sense. I am sure that if this promise were implemented it would provide an excellent way of improving the condition of our settlers, and the beneficial results would be reflected not only throughout Ontario but in the whole of Canada.

Another matter in which I know the department is interested is the back to the land movement. I would point out to the minister that this year most of the people settled under the scheme in northern Ontario will find it absolutely impossible out of the $10 a month that they receive, or, to be precise, out of the $200 they get yearly for three years, to supply themselves with the necessary seed grain. This being so, I think that everyone will realize at once that unless the necessary seed is given them free the people who have settled under the back to the land movement will find it utterly impossible to get along this season, because they cannot provide seed for themselves this year. It is true that some of these people have been operating under the scheme for the last two years, and some settled last year. The question may be asked: How is it that these new settlers did not find it possible to grow sufficient grain to supply their own requirements for the coming season? Well, the answer will suggest itself to anyone who is at all familiar with the climatic conditions that prevailed last summer in that part of the country. The conditions were such last year on account of the drought that practically no grain could be grown on the land by these people, and that should convince the committee and the minister that it would be impossible for these people, out of the $200 they receive under the tripartite arrangement, the contributors being the municipal, provincial and federal authorities, to provide sufficient funds to buy the necessary seed grain. I believe that the government of Ontario led the settlers in my own section of northern Ontario as a whole to understand that they would be supplied with seed this spring. Now, I do not believe in giving a wrong impression of any situation, but I am bound to say to the minister that in my section not five per cent of the settlers will be in a position this spring to buy seed grain, and I know that if the grain is not given them free most of the area ploughed last fall will remain uncultivated. It will be absolutely impossible for these people to put the ground under crop, and from that statement the committee will realize that the situation will be aggravated next fall; it will be worse than it is this spring. I do not know how far the federal authority will go in supplying the seed grain to the settlers who have been on these farms a number of years, but I do know that under the back to the land scheme the government will have to find funds sufficient to supply with seed for the coming spring the new men placed under the direct policy of the federal government.

Reverting to the important question of the trans-Canada highway, I must repeat the statement I made a few moments ago that when that message on the subject was delivered by Mr. Finlayson it was received with considerable enthusiasm in my own section of the country. In view of the fact that the federal government is contributing fifty per cent of the money spent on the trans-Canada highway, I think it should have something to say in regard to the routing of this highway, and we fervently hope that, in the light of the knowledge and experience of the present federal Minister of Labour, the routing will be one that will satisfy our section. I will not take up the time of the committee reading several editorials that have appeared in the Northern Tribune of Kapuskasing and in the Cochrane Northland Post, but it is pointed out in these articles that it would be deplorable if the government did not push the route westward following the Canadian National line as far as Nakina, then branching off with the other branch of the trans-Canada highway from the southern section of northern Ontario and eventually connecting direct with Winnipeg. If the road were constructed immediately south of the town of Hearst, following the Algoma Central and giving direct communication with Sault Ste. Marie, that would not provide a solution of the problem from our point of view, because it would not give the communication to which we are entitled. I should like the minister therefore to be kind enough to answer the three questions I have submitted to him.

Mr. GORDON: Replying to the first question about the routing of the trans-Canada highway, I have not read in the press any announcement that Mr. Finlayson may have made, but I have no doubt that it was made as the hon. member has said. However, the routing of the trans-Canada highway throughout the various provinces is a matter which is of course entirely within the judgment of the provinces, and the federal authority has been in the past from time to time formally notified of the terms of any order in council designating any particular stretch of what has been euphoniously called the trans-Canada highway. That official notification the federal government has not yet received; I suppose we shall receive it in due course.

With respect to the bonusing of settlers, that is a purely provincial matter. I do not share the gloomy view which my hon. friend from North Timiskaming seems to hold of the position of the farmer and the settler in Timiskaming—indeed—it is probably to be regretted he has painted the picture as he has. I think I am as well acquainted as any other person with the farmers and settlers in that county, and while they have had their difficulties, I have seen years when the difficulties were immeasurably more trying than they have been in the last four or even in the last ten years. They have through the clay belt adopted methods of farming that perhaps have placed them in the forefront of agricultural activities in Canada. They have no trouble in holding up their end at any of the agricultural fairs. They have a large mining market at hand of which they take advantage; they are organized in a cooperative sense to sell their vegetables and all the other products of the farm and to put them up in an attractive way for those big mining markets, and I certainly do not share with my hon. friend the picture he paints of the farmer and settler in Timiskaming.

With respect to seed grain, that is another purely provincial matter, and I am informed that at no time have the federal government advanced money directly to the farmers for seed grain. They have for many years past at times lent money to some of the provinces which in turn have supplied seed grain to those unable to procure it for themselves. If in certain localities or with certain individuals the condition is as the hon. member for North Timiskaming has stated, then the proper course would be to call the attention of the provincial authorities to that situation, because in spite of what has been said here, I still have enough confidence in the provincial authorities of Ontario to feel that they will take care of a situation like that and not see worthy settlers unable to put in a crop because of their not being able to finance the purchase of seed grain.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish to enlarge slightly on what the minister has said. First of all, as regards the routing of the trans-Canada highway, I knew this was a provincial matter, but in view of the fact, as I stated a few moments ago, that fifty per cent of the money is being raised by the federal government, I thought we should have some say as to the routing of the road so that it would not be run where it would be of no use or would not fulfil the purpose for which it was built. The only reason I brought the matter to the attention of the minister was that he is familiar with the exact situation. In our section we maintain, and rightly so, that if that routing goes directly south of the town of Hearst it would not be satisfactory and it could not be called part of the trans-Canada highway. Surely the minister must have some jurisdiction in the matter when at least fifty per cent of the money spent for that particular purpose is being given by the central authorities, and as he is also familiar with our section of the country, whatever he may say in an advisory way will certainly be listened to, as coming from a man acquainted with the situation.

As regards the settlers, I do not want the impression to be created that I was desirous of painting a very gloomy picture, but I must tell the minister that in my section most of the farmers are settlers, the majority of them trying to emerge or graduate from the settler into the farmer class. This is not the case in the riding which the minister represents because it has been in existence for a longer period of time and there most of the settlers have already graduated from the settler into the farmer class. It is true that we have local markets, but it is also true that, for several reasons which I intend to mention when the agriculture estimates are under discussion, we cannot take full advantage of those local or regional markets in our section of the country. The minister well knows through the reports made to the provincial government that, take for instance, west of the town of Cochrane in the Hearst, Kapuskasing and Cochrane district—and this does not apply so forcibly to Matheson, Ramore and Val Gagné—nearly ninety per cent of the farmers and settlers have been on direct relief for the last two years, and were it not for that relief most of them would have found it impossible to live on their holdings. I fully appreciate the fact that the distribution of seed grain is a matter coming primarily under provincial jurisdiction, but the fact is also that we must have a certain amount of responsibility when we contribute fifty per cent of the money spent on direct relief. On that score again I believe the minister could give help in an advisory capacity by allowing at least quite a number of the settlers on their new holdings to have free seed grain for this year. It is all very well to say that in the past they were supplied with seed grain, but it was not free. This year I had the experience of having some settlers come to my home who, on account of liens against them for seed grain supplied a few years ago, had had their farm holdings cancelled. Some of them who had lived on their farms for fifteen or twenty years lost their holdings. The government was no doubt right in taking back the crown land because the settlers had had a long period of time to repay those amounts, but if another such loan is made to the settlers many of them will find themselves in the same position; their holdings will be cancelled and threats will be held over their heads for years and years, so that eventually they will become discouraged in their calling. This is not giving a gloomy picture of the situation; it is bringing to the attention of the country a problem which we should not be afraid to tackle. With the minister's knowledge of conditions in his and my sections of the country, his personal influence should be used so that there will be no lack of seed grain to cultivate this year all the acreage that is tillable.

Mr. GRAY: Perhaps the minister has given the answer before, but we in Ontario would be interested in knowing how many settlers have been placed in northern Ontario under the land settlement scheme. Perhaps he could give the information by years under that scheme by which the municipality contributes $200, the province $200 and the dominion a like amount.

Mr. GORDON: I gave the details before, but I will give them again. In Ontario there were 362 heads of families with 1,471 dependents settled on 27,400 acres. Is that the information the hon. member wants?

Mr. GRAY: Yes. How many of those people have been returned to their municipalities?

Mr. GORDON: I think none of those has been returned. Those are the ones at present on their locations. There were some who were returned to the municipalities.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. GRAY: That is the information I would like.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know the exact number, but the percentage is very small. Of course there are bound to be some who will not succeed.

Mr. GRAY: Does the minister suggest that they are making a success of the venture?

Mr. GORDON: That is what our reports state. I saw an exhaustive report made by the Reverend J. C. Cochrane who has had an extensive experience in colonization work throughout that part of northern Ontario. His report was made public and I think published subsequently by the Ontario government. I had an opportunity to read it, and I depend a great deal on anything the Reverend Mr. Cochrane would say, knowing him as I do and knowing his experience in opening up land for settlement there, and his close contact with and interest in the settlers in the early stages of establishing their farms and getting their buildings in shape and developing their holdings. Although he makes some criticisms, I would say that of all the so-called colonization schemes that have been inaugurated in the past there is none that has been as successful as this one of colonization at home, although as I said some people got past the choosing committees who really had little chance from the beginning to succeed. They were returned to the municipalities from which they came. Of course we must expect some failures.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I have no desire to prolong this debate, but I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the special conditions which prevail in rural municipalities adjacent to industrial centres. Many people who have drifted into such areas are in need of relief or on relief, but the rural organization in some instances is not in a position to fulfil all the requirements of this plan. I have several such municipalities in mind. I know of one in which unhappily there has been malnutrition, and insufficiency of clothing. The situation, of course, is that in these rural municipalities the farmers are really not in a position to meet the special requirements of these people who have drifted across their borders and do not properly belong to the municipality in which they happen to be.

While on my feet may I say that I thought the minister was just a little ungenerous the other day when he referred to the lack of sympathy, if you like, from this side of the house, and seemed to suggest that we do not appreciate the improvement that has taken place in conditions. May I say for myself that I have been reading the barometer as carefully as I could, and I have been calling off improvement wherever I saw it. I believe sincerely that we are pulling out of this depression. But one thing that our people must have is confidence, and most of all must they have confidence in government—which applies not only to Canada but to all countries. Now, unusual legislation does not inspire confidence. I think if it were not for the unusual privileges that the government ask I should vote for this bill. I should like to vote for it. But I should like the minister to consider whether all the unusual clauses are required. I should like him to consider the effect that such legislation has on the public mind. People cannot contract with confidence so long as they are told that unusual conditions exist, that emergent measures are required. And if they cannot contract with confidence they cannot employ labour, they cannot pay wages, they cannot look forward to buying and selling in the ordinary way. I would have the minister consider these matters, because it seems to me that in an attempt to meet one set of conditions the government may bring about another set of conditions entirely different from what they may have expected.

Mr. REID: The minister in answer to a question said the other evening that some reforestation work was being done in some of the provinces. I would like to ask if any reforestation work is being done in British Columbia, either under his department or any other department of the government. The reason I ask is that while the minister may say that it is up to the provinces to carry on this work, I think he or the government would be well advised to consider a national scheme. Surely we are not going to stand by and see our forests depleted; and under the modern system of logging they are not only being depleted but are being severely injured from the point of view of future growth. Surely we are not going to leave nothing but debts to the coming generation. I know of no finer national undertaking that might emanate from this administration than some scheme of reforestation in the provinces suitable for that purpose. Most countries to-day are doing a certain amount of reforestation work. I need scarcely name them—Great Britain particularly is doing it; so is France, and so is the United States. Here is work that is useful, work from which the coming generation will receive benefit.

I have here the report of the auditor general, and would like to ask the minister if the auditor general in his investigations in British Columbia went as far back as in the case of the other provinces.

Mr. GORDON: In answer to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) let me say that I appreciate his observations with respect to legislation of an unusual character. There is no question that that is one of the risks attendant upon emergent conditions, and perhaps I might say emergent legislation. Much thought has been given to the question of the powers asked for in this legislation. Some of those powers I should like to think could be abandoned, but I do not believe that they should be abandoned this year. However, as the hon. member will note, some that were found in last year's legislation have been omitted in this year's legislation; for instance that with respect to guarantees, advances, and so forth, to public bodies, does not appear in this year's bill. I regret that we have to differ as to the necessity for the various powers contained in the bill. I believe that they are necessary for this coming year. I hope that before the year is out we shall have made further progress, and I agree with the hon. member when he says that in his judgment we are pulling through. I believe we are; there are evidences of it. It may take some time for this country and for the whole trade of the world to become substantially readjusted and to get the channels of trade open, because one country cannot do it alone. That is the difficulty Canada has had to face. No one wanted to take any action, governmental or otherwise, that would prevent the free exchange of goods so far as that is humanly possible. But when you find your country in the midst of a national and international tariff war it is sheer folly to think that, if you are to survive, you need not take such action, for a time at least, as will maintain your industries and your agriculture, certainly not as actively as they would be under different conditions, but at least preserving their integrity pending some better understanding among the nations of the world.

With respect to the other question to which the hon. member directed my attention, on a number of occasions similar situations have been brought to my notice. I have no doubt that from time to time the provincial governments are notified in such cases. I have drawn the matter to the attention of provincial governments on a number of occasions, and I should be glad indeed if the hon. member would let me have the name of the municipality in which the condition exists. I will draw the matter to the attention of the provincial authorities, and I believe they would hasten to take such action as might be necessary to put such people beyond any danger of malnutrition or anything of the kind.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I shall gladly take advantage of the offer of the minister, and I appreciate his kindness.

Mr. REID: I was not particularly complaining about the malnutrition of the youth of the land. The minister is perhaps well aware that British Columbia is doing its full share in the work of reforestation, but the minister also knows that British Columbia, together with the other provinces, is carrying an excessive load in regard to unemployment. It is not a matter of suggesting something to the provinces or pointing out something; my suggestion is that the dominion government join in a national scheme of reforestation in cooperation with the various provinces. Some of the provinces are carrying on this work, including British Columbia, but perhaps it is not being pursued to the extent it should be during the present economic distress.

Now I would ask the minister if, in his report, the auditor general went back as far in regard to British Columbia as he did in regard to the other provinces. I should like to know just how far back his investigation extended.

Mr. GORDON: I have not the report of the auditor general before me, but it is available; I tabled it myself. I would respectfully ask the hon. member to avail himself of that report; I do not have it here or I should be glad to give the information. With respect to reforestation may I tell my hon. friend that the government has been doing reforestation throughout Canada, wherever there are federally owned lands adapted to that work. Up to date some millions of trees have been set out through the agency of the departments of the Interior and National Defence. I am thoroughly in agreement with the hon. member for New Westminster when he says this is a useful and desirable work; perhaps in some respects no better work could be carried on. The Dominion government is well aware of the desirability of continuing this work.

Mr. REID: In the report that has been laid on the table I notice in the statement of amounts refunded by the provinces under the various relief acts that British Columbia made one refund of $23,955.26, and below I see another item of $11,955.87. I do not see any refund for 1931, and in that connection I should like to direct the minister's attention to a statement made in the report with regard to expenditures made in British Columbia in 1931, I believe. In this report it is stated that investigations have been instituted by the Department of Labour, and I am going to ask the minister if he will be good enough either to investigate the situation to which I am going to refer or to make a statement to the committee now, because I think the matter is very important. According to the auditor general's report I find that an amount charged for supplies, totalling $72,524.36, practically disappeared. I do not think this measure should go through until something is done in this connection. I am going to suggest to this government that an investigation be launched and that, if possible, the officials responsible for the disappearance of these supplies should be indicted. I read from page 40 of the report:

> Unissued stores charged to "material account" and not distributed—$72,524.36: Although the provincial inventory showed these materials ("purchased from unemployment relief funds") as on hand at November 30, 1931, that is, after the relief program was discontinued, no credit for unissued stores appears to have been passed to joint account.

This is the significant part:

> The ultimate disposal of these stores was not traced during the investigation.

I believe they should be traced; I believe the department should send an official to British Columbia to find out where these stores went. This is part of the steal that took place in 1931, to which I directed the attention of the government when I was making some suggestions in connection with the misappropriation of funds by the provincial government during that year. I am going to ask the minister what he is going to do about these stores that disappeared.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, following the auditor general's report there was a refund from the province of British Columbia amounting to $23,956.26. Then by reason of the investigation, if you like to call it that, or the adjustments made direct through the Department of Labour a further refund of $11,955.87 was made. Questions of adjustments, refunds and matters of that character are constantly under way with the staff we have, and I will make a special effort to look into the matter the hon. member has drawn to my attention.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask a question before the discussion closes. Is the federal government sympathetic to the announcement of the Ontario government that relief allowances are to be increased by twenty-five per cent? Will the federal grant to the provincial government be increased automatically?

Mr. GORDON: I have not seen, nor have I been notified, what the Ontario government is doing, but, as I indicated before, any contribution that may be made by the federal government to the province of Ontario will have to be the subject matter of an agreement between the two governments after and if this legislation passes through parliament, and the authority to enter into such an agreement is vested in the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: It would be fair to say then that up to the moment it is not a part of the policy of the federal government but merely a declaration by the government of Ontario on its own behalf?

Mr. GORDON: Of course no province can adopt a course that will involve the dominion treasury without the matter first being discussed and agreed upon. While it may seem that there has been a very large amount of money spent from the federal treasury, if we had contributed all the money that all the provinces wanted I am afraid the picture would indeed be a romantic one.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the government considered increasing the direct relief or any relief owing to the increase in the cost of living over the past few months?

Mr. GORDON: So far as direct relief is concerned—and in passing I am glad to observe that the hon. member for Vancouver South recognizes that very desirable condition of affairs, namely that there has been a rise in commodity price levels—the federal government has not up to date under the various agreements dictated to the municipalities or to the provinces what they should supply or the quantity. The question the hon. member has raised will be the subject of consideration because it is obvious that it could not be determined in a moment, having, as it has, its own complexities.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Following up the question asked by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset) might I ask if consideration has been given to continuing direct relief for the provinces? The government had conferences with the provinces in the month of January before the session opened and I should like to know if any agreement or understanding was reached at those conferences between this government and the provinces as to the continuation of direct relief, and if so, for how long a period.

Mr. GORDON: At the dominion-provincial conference in the early part of this year many phases of relief matters were discussed at great length. There was considerable diversity of opinion among the various provinces, though not in an acrimonious way, with respect to what their responsibilities and burdens might be during the remainder of the winter and into the spring and early summer. Certain reports were made by the various provincial representatives giving their viewpoints, but no agreement was entered into as to the continuation of dominion contributions. It was merely a recitation of the views of the provincial premiers and representatives as to what the future would disclose with respect to the necessity of taking care of those who were unable to take care of themselves.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was not the opinion expressed by this government that direct relief would be discontinued after April 1, or some other date?

Mr. GORDON: That hope was expressed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Do I understand that there is going to be another conference between the provinces to settle this very question of direct relief?

Mr. GORDON: I thought I had made it clear a while ago that if this legislation passes and any of the provinces is unable to carry its responsibilities, then the dominion will have to avail itself of this legislation to assist such provinces; but it will have to be made clear that they are unable to do it themselves.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then do I understand it will be up to the provinces to come and ask the government to help them in the matter of direct relief?

Mr. GORDON: We are not going to force it on them.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No. It will be up to the provinces to come to this government and ask to be helped in carrying on direct relief.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, they have done that each year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Going back to the subject that I brought up a little while ago, and which apparently caused a lot of other members to speak upon it, I should like to ask for information regarding the Department of the Interior and the administration of the Yukon territory. The minister, if I remember aright, said that in that part of the country there is a population of from 1,800 to 2,000 people, and that the amount of $20,000 odd was spent in the year 1930 for the relief of those people. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and the country at large the fact that this parliament is being asked to spend for the fiscal year 1934-35 very large sums of money for that part of the country. At page 11 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1935, I find an item of $9,500 for the Yukon territory, for miscellaneous expenditure, including salaries and allowances of court officers, and so on. Then on page 13 there is an item of $9,000 for the Yukon territory for the salary of the judge of the territorial court. Then at page 50 there is the sum of $102,000 for the following items under the heading of Government of the Yukon territory:

Salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, including surveys, $42,000.

Grant to Yukon council for local purposes, the construction and maintenance of roads and such other expenditures as the commissioner is authorized to expend by and with the advice and consent of the council or any committee thereof; and the accounts with respect to such expenditure shall be subject to examination and audit by the auditor general as provided by section 22, chapter 215, revised statutes, 1927, $60,000—Total, $102,000.

Then at page 58 under the heading of Public Works, chargeable to collection of revenue, there is an item in vote 255 of $108,000 for the Yukon system, main line telegraph and telephone lines. Last year that item was $116,500. We are being called upon to vote in the main estimates all these various sums to look after a population which the minister told us was between 1,800 and 2,000. I submit that the cost of government is too great for a population of that size and for the revenue which the government is deriving from that part of the country. I was astounded this afternoon when the minister stated that some $20,000 had been paid out in direct relief during 1930 for the small population in the Yukon. In spite of this we are called upon year after year to vote money for the construction of roads and other purposes. There cannot be many people in that part of the country who are out of work, because the whole population is only between 1,800 and 2,000. Apparently nearly everyone, both old and young, has been given direct relief. These great expenditures are one of the causes why the people are exasperated. They see this duplication of government services and realize that we are over-governed and spending too much money for the administration of a small part of the country. When the redistribution bill was up last year I referred to this matter and directed attention to the fact that a member of this house represented a very small population. The territory he represented might be large in area but the population did not compare with that of the district I represent, which amounts to over 55,000. I believe the administration of the Yukon costs more each year than is spent in the district which I represent. Last year and the year before when we were discussing the estimates for public telephone and telegraph services I asked for a vote to repair the telegraph line running from Saguenay to Newfoundland. This has been carried on each year little by little, we have a vote of $15,000 one year and then perhaps $25,000. That is all we can get but yet this other district with such a small population is able to get the large amounts which I have mentioned. The expenditures which have been made should be scrutinized fully. We should have full details of the people who have been on direct relief. Considering the small population of the Yukon, everyone must be either an official of the government or else working for the contractors building these roads. I am surprised to hear that we have to spend $20,000 for the relief of such a small population, when in addition large sums of money are voted every year for the maintenance and support of the government which they have up there.

Mr. MICHAUD: Another angle to this question has been brought to my attention by statements accredited to the premier of New Brunswick which appear in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John of April 9. In my opinion the premier has not been correctly reported. The dispatch reads:

Commenting upon matters discussed at Ottawa, the premier stated: "Among other matters, we took up the question of the agricultural school to be established at the Fredericton experimental station and the training of single men in the relief camp at Sunbury in woods operations. It is being brought to my attention," he continued, "that a number of the younger men, who came of age recently, know little or nothing of the lumber industry and would have difficulty in obtaining employment in the woods.

I requested the military department to appoint supervisors to train these young men in the cutting and peeling of pulpwood and the cutting of long lumber while they are preparing the military range. This the department has promised to undertake."

This must be a misquotation because I cannot understand the premier or anyone else in New Brunswick asking the Department of National Defence to train young men for the peeling of pulpwood and other lumbering operations. The main problem which we have to face in that part of the country is the giving of employment to men who have spent their lives in lumbering operations. If such representations have been made to the government, I would ask the minister to consult with the representatives from that province who sit to the right of the Speaker before undertaking the expenditure of money to train young men for the peeling of pulpwood and the cutting of lumber. The unemployment problem is acute in New Brunswick and many men who have spent their lives in lumbering have not been able to adapt themselves to other callings. I know the minister will say that unemployment is a matter which must be treated locally, but I contend that it should be treated nationally. Some of the provinces and most of the municipalities cannot afford to spend any more money to take care of their unemployed. Their credit has been exhausted and thus this matter becomes a national problem and should be viewed in that light. Instead of training young men to peel pulpwood and cut lumber they should be trained along other lines. As long as they remain in lumbering operations they will always be on the unemployed list and will have to be taken care of by the public. Instead of spending money in this way, it should be spent to help these young men establish themselves on the land. If there is to be cooperation between the dominion and the government of New Brunswick, the provincial government could well afford to supply the land while the dominion government could undertake to provide for the erection of houses and barns and the providing of the necessary agricultural machinery. If this were done within two or three years these men would become taxpayers. They would be able to support not only themselves but their families and would no longer be a charge upon the community. Unless some plan of this kind is adopted the unemployment problem will not be solved, and I do not think that the solution will be found in any amount of money that may be spent for temporary work such as road building, road repairs, training men in camps, building military ranges, peeling pulpwood, sawing lumber, and so on. That is not the solution of the problem, and I submit to the Minister of Labour that in some of the conferences which he may have in the future with representatives of the provinces he should advance the proposition of trying to solve the problem permanently by means of proposals which I am sure his supporters in this house will strongly approve, and which I have no doubt would bring an end to the situation which is acute and which cannot be in any way remedied by the methods now being followed.

Mr. YOUNG: I notice in the statement of disbursements in connection with relief legislation the sum of $10,663,000 for the Saskatchewan relief commission. Is this all the money that the Saskatchewan relief commission spent?

Mr. GORDON: In 1931 the Saskatchewan relief commission received $5,372,971.30; under the 1932 legislation, $4,459,919.11; under the 1933 legislation, $830,269.16, making a total of $10,663,159.57.

Mr. YOUNG: On the next page we find a summary of loans and advances outstanding, including the Saskatchewan relief commission, $22,579,078.16. Does that $22,000,000 owing to the government by the commission include the $10,663,000 odd?

Mr. GORDON: As well as the $10,000,000 which represented moneys disbursed by the Saskatchewan commission, loans were made to the province and to the relief commission. I have not before me the details showing how it is divided, but before this measure goes through I will get a detailed statement.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood, at the time the commission was set up, that the federal government would furnish all the money they spent. Here is $10,000,000 odd furnished by the federal government and spent by the commission, and we find in addition to that that they borrowed some from the government. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: I shall have to look into these figures to make sure that the information is correct.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister also look into the amount collected by the commission and ascertain how much has been returned? I understand that for the past two falls the commission has been making vigorous efforts to collect the notes they took from the farmers when they granted relief, and I should like to know how much was collected and how much was returned to the federal government. Can the minister get that?

Mr. GORDON: That was the subject of quite a long discussion this afternoon when the hon. member was not in his place, and the amount is on Hansard. In round figures, the notes amounted to slightly over $200,000 and the amounts refunded amount to slightly over $8,000.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister means that the amount collected was slightly over $200,000.

Mr. GORDON: No, the amount of the notes.

Mr. YOUNG: Oh, it was more than that. They took notes for all they granted. The first year they operated they took notes in advance for everything. The notes were signed in blank when they made application for relief and covered everything they were to get.

Mr. GORDON: I shall have to go into the figures. I took the figures from what was read out of the auditor general's statement by an hon. member who was discussing it at the time. However, I shall look into it and get a statement.

Mr. GRAY: The minister has said on different occasions, certainly when speaking in the house on Wednesday, March 8, and again this evening, that this bill No. 42 omits the provision contained in the 1933 act with respect generally to the right to loan or advance or guarantee the payment of money by any public or corporate body. In the last few weeks we have had specific reference to the advance guaranteed to the Canadian Pacific of the sum of $60,000,000. I take issue with the minister on the question whether or not this bill does in fact ensure the limitation which he has told us it provides, and I would ask him to consider seriously making a positive statement to the house on the question. We should like to know definitely whether or not such power will be exercised. Section 2 begins:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may . . .

I understand that the Prime Minister's amendment reads "in addition to." Quite frankly, I think that if anything he has added to rather than taken from the powers sought, though I doubt that it makes any great difference whether he says "notwithstanding" or "in addition to." But whether we read it "notwithstanding" or "in addition to," the section will read, in subsection (b):

> When parliament is not in session, to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

In the discussions which have taken place in connection with the advance or guarantee made to the Canadian Pacific Railway of some $60,000,000, we have been led to believe that that advance or guarantee was made for the specific purpose of maintaining the credit of the Dominion of Canada. I submit to the minister that under Bill No. 42 as at present drafted, the government still has that power and that unless we have from the minister, as a representative of the government, an assurance that such power will not be exercised, they can still proceed to make such guarantees as they have in the past and at the next session of parliament come before the house and state that they were made in order to preserve the credit and integrity of the dominion or of some province. The minister, not internationally but by his repeated assertions that this clause has been amended, has permitted an erroneous impression to go throughout Canada that the government can no longer make those guarantees. I submit with great respect both to the minister and to the Prime Minister, who has made a similar statement, that the government still have that power if they wish to exercise it.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I wonder whether, according to the provisions of this section, the government is really in earnest when it requests parliament to sanction the expenditure of unlimited amounts for a purely political purpose.

Hon. members opposite have stated and repeated that we were on the road to prosperity. Last year, a fixed amount was voted to relieve unemployment, while, to-day, the house is requested to sanction an unlimited amount. On the eve of a general election, the government should be more scrupulous and not insist that it be granted such powers which would permit it to distribute political favours in any province it pleases.

According to the report submitted to the house, we find that the government has expended, this year, in Ontario, the sum of $7,753,625.54 and in Quebec, $2,524,402.98. I do not think that there are more unemployed in Ontario than in Quebec; however, the government has, perhaps, more political friends in Ontario. As to public works submitted for the approval of the dominion government, the department was rather reluctant in accepting those proposed by Quebec and it thought fit to curtail them. That is why, we, from Quebec, should feel more reluctant in accepting this section which is inserted in order to favour the government's friends and, thereby derive political advantages.

The other day, I crticized the government for not having acted in a regular way and carried out the distribution of funds more justly. I note that the government has not mended its ways for it still persists in requesting unrestricted powers so as to expend the relief funds rightly or wrongly.

I, therefore, am opposed to this section and I think the government should be more considerate of the rights of this house and should state the amount to be appropriated for the relief of unemployment. With what experience we have had we should drop the dole system and replace it by public works which would raise the morale of workers and, thereby, enhance the public wealth of the provinces and Canada.

The government should be more considerate of the rights and prerogatives of parliament and the constitution and should only request the house to vote definite amounts. It is no excuse, because an extraordinary crisis prevails, to set aside parliamentary rights. I strongly resent these unconstitutional methods and request the government to be respectful of the rights and privileges of this house.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): As in British Columbia!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I am not concerned with other provinces. sir; however, I think that the government have been too lavish, and have not been sufficiently sparing in their political favours; they have not lived up to their obligations nor have they submitted to the house the necessary measures not only to carry out the pledges made by them, in 1930, but also to acquit themselves as Canadian citizens should. The time has arrived for the government to display some human feelings, to carry out its duty and consider the hardships from which we suffer, moreover, to find a remedy.

I shall not further insist. The government must bring down a measure to solve the problems of this crisis. During the 1930 election, members opposite insisted that the solution of the crisis fell to the lot of the Dominion government rather than that of the provinces. To-day, with amazing boldness, they deny all their statements made during the 1930 election. To excuse themselves, they contend that the crisis is world wide and simply ask the people to trust the government, an incompetent and inert administration—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): They should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —which appropriates only a few million dollars to relieve unemployment, while setting aside in the estimates, an equal amount for public works. It is high time for the government to show that they are well disposed towards the people, the workmen and the poor. It is high time, I state, to check this revolutionary spirit which has begun to show itself. According to hon. members opposite, this section is unnecessary, however, since they wish to have it passed, it simply proves their lack of sincerity.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I think I can agree with most of the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis). He is right in recalling the promises made by the government a few years ago, and more especially in 1930 when this government was supposed to settle all the ills and troubles and problems of the country, to give to the workingmen six days' work a week and to the farmers large profits for the things they produce on their farms. We now have to consider this bill, which is to reenact legislation put before the house by this government in the years 1932, 1933 and 1934. When we look at the results that have been achieved under this measure we really do not think that the government has any reason to be proud of them. There is still unemployment in all parts of this country; in the province of Quebec from which I come, in Ontario, in the western provinces and in the maritimes. We are told to-day that this legislation is absolutely necessary, that it was necessary before the month of April—and we were taken to task by the government because this legislation was not renewed before the first of April. The legislation was not renewed, and up to the present time we do not find that things are going so badly as we were told they would. We have before us the consequences of the operation of this act, resulting in an expenditure of $110,198,272. I started to scrutinize the expenditure item by item and asked the government for some explanation, but although these figures have been placed on the table of the house for the attention and consideration of the members, when we asked the minister this evening for certain explanations with reference to large amounts such as the one I started to discuss concerning the Department of the Interior, amounting to over $2,000,000, it appears that there are yet some figures not within the minister's reach. I do not want to be unfair to him; he is not now in his seat—it may be that he has gone to look for some of the information that has been asked by hon. members on this side. The reason this bill is put before the house at this time is that the government wants to have another chance to settle the problems which it undertook to settle in 1930. For this purpose the government comes to us and asks us to renew legislation which we have been enacting for the last three years, to give them blanc seing, a blank cheque as it was called when this legislation was introduced, permitting the government to do all that it thinks best in the interests of the community in order to relieve unemployment throughout the country. I for one think that in view of what the government has achieved in past years under this legislation they should not be entrusted with this blank cheque. We criticized this legislation when it was first introduced, and we oppose it now for the reasons which have been pointed out by my hon. leader and other members of this party including the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) who spoke this evening. We hear from people all over the land who speak on behalf of the government that things are going a little bit better. One thing the people need to-day is confidence, and I think this is reactionary legislation the effect of which is to weaken confidence, at a time when the government should be doing everything it can to encourage people to start works that may give more employment and more bread and butter to the population. This afternoon in the banking and commerce committee a most important witness, Mr. Jackson Dodds, said that more trade is the cure for our ills and problems. This government may bring in all kinds of legislation, but they will not be able to achieve their end and settle the problems of this country and bring back prosperity as long as these provisions remain on the statute book.

I have some further remarks to make, but I think some other hon. members want to take part in the discussion.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, a while ago the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) asked for figures concerning the Yukon. The amount in the estimates for this year is $102,000. In former years the amounts for similar purposes were as follows:

1930-31	225,500
1931-32	185,500
1932-33	162,500
1933-34	115,000

So hon. members will see that the estimates for the Yukon have been reduced from $225,500 in 1930-31 to $102,000 this year. With respect to the sums that were allotted in connection with relief I am told, although I am not acquainted with that locality, that there was a great deal of distress among the elderly prospectors and the Indians. The money was devoted partly to direct relief and partly to relief by way of work on roads, bridges and so on. In the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay last year the Dominion government, having had representations made to it that people needed relief, approved of thirty-five schedules covering works aggregating some $207,800.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Gobeil): Shall the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition carry?

Mr. GORDON: With respect to the question raised by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) of course I cannot agree that this legislation does not take away from the government rights which they had under the legislation of last year. If one examines section 2 (a) it will be seen that it gives the governor in council power, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, to enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein and to grant assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise. If reference is made to the legislation of last year hon. members will see that these words followed:

—loan, or advance money, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

Those words are deleted from the legislation of this year, and in my opinion the language of the section that follows is not broad enough to permit, and I think is not capable of any interpretation that would permit, the governor in council to make such guarantees to public bodies or corporations. As the Prime Minister has said, the words "peace, order and good government" have been interpreted on a number of occasions down through the years by the judicial committee of the privy council, and with the deletion of the specific words to which I have made reference my opinion is that the remainder of the section would not invest the governor in council with the right to make guarantees to public bodies and corporations.

Mr. GRAY: I do not like to interrupt the minister, but will he make special reference to the sentence on page 2 of the bill beginning with the words "and at all times."

Mr. GORDON: That is section 2, subsection (b); the sentence reads:

—and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I am not at all prepared to agree that this section is capable of any interpretation that would invest the governor in council with authority to guarantee public bodies, corporations, and so on, as was done under the legislation of last year.

Progress reported.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

FELICITATIONS EXTENDED TO MR. SPEAKER AND THE SERGEANT AT ARMS

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, before the hands of the clock reach eleven, and the labours of the day having been concluded, with the unamious consent of the house may I be permitted on behalf of the members in this section of the chamber, and I hope on behalf of all members of the House of Commons, to extend to you and the members of your family on this, your natal day, our hearty greetings and best wishes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOTT: We realize, sir, that for some time your health has been impaired, which has made the dispatch of your duties the more arduous and strenuous. With our congratulations we couple our fondest hopes that you may experience a steady, speedy and complete return to your former health and vigour, which permitted you to serve your country both at home and abroad with credit to yourself and honour to all who possess the privilege of your acquaintance and friendship.

May we ask you, sir, to convey to the Sergeant at Arms, Major M. F. Gregg, V.C., our felicitations and congratulations also, since I learned that to-day is the anniversary of his birth as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 11, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house a petition from the municipal council of St. Vallier, county of Bellechasse, requesting that no tax be levied on leaf tobacco.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS, OFFICIALS IN RECEIPT OF PENSIONS

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. What officials in the headquarters and in the unit staffs of the Department of Pensions and National Health are in receipt of pension at the present time?
2. What is the amount of pension in each case?

BURLINGTON CHANNEL BRIDGE EMPLOYEES

Mr. WILSON:

1. What are the names and addresses of men employed on the Burlington channel bridge?
2. What hours do they work and what wages do they receive?
3. Is the eight-hour day in force on this bridge?
4. What wages are paid for similar work on the Welland canal bridges?
5. Is the eight-hour day in effect on the Welland canal bridges?
6. Are the applicants for positions examined by employees of the public works department or by the civil service commission?

PINK SALMON CATCH

Mr. REID:

1. How many pink salmon were caught in district No. 1, British Columbia, after September 16, 1933: (a) by gill nets; (b) by seines?
2. What was the total number of cases of pink salmon canned after September 16, 1933, from fish caught in district No. 1, British Columbia, and (a) how many of these have been inspected; (b) how many were classed as second quality; (c) how many were classified as inferior to second quality?
3. What was the total number of pink salmon exported to the United States from the said district No. 1, during the season of 1933, and on what dates were such shipments made?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. JOSEPH DE LEVIS, QUE., MAIL SERVICE

Mr. BOULANGER:

For a copy of all records and documents, including petitions, requests, recommendations, tenders, counter-petitions and protests, with respect to the establishment of a rural mail service at Lauzon, Saint-Joseph de Levis, Harlaka, and Beaumont, with the branch post office of Saint-Joseph de Levis as a starting point, and with respect to the closing of the post office at Beaumont.

Mr. BENNETT: There are no dates mentioned in this motion and perhaps the hon. gentleman could indicate the period.

Mr. BOULANGER: The Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is aware of the service about which I am asking information.

Motion agreed to.

CHILD WELFARE WORK

Mr. SPENCER:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between any person or persons and the Department of National Health or any other department of the government, relating to the division of child welfare work, and also a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the different departments of the government respecting the same question.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will agree to strike out all the words after the word "work" in the fourth line, the motion will be quite satisfactory. It has not been the practice to produce inter-departmental communications as they are usually of a personal character between the ministers and their officials.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SUPPLIES TO UNEMPLOYMENT CAMP AT SPENCE'S BRIDGE

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

For a copy of all invoices of meats and packing house products, supplied by the contractor to the unemployment headquarters camp at Spence's Bridge, British Columbia, between September 1, 1933, and December 1, 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: The same rule prevails with respect to this motion as has prevailed with respect to similar motions; these documents will be produced to the extent to which the department is able to secure them.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA, 1934

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I placed a question on the order paper with regard to the number of copies of "Canada, 1934" which had been printed. I have received two answers to this question. One is from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the effect that 13,000 copies in English and 4,500 copies in French had been printed, a total of 17,500 copies. Another return was made by the King's Printer to the effect that there were 2,300 copies in English and 60 copies in French, a total of 2,360 copies. Could the minister explain the discrepancy in these figures?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I cannot give an explanation offhand but I shall make inquiries and let my hon. friend know.

TREATY WITH POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I have received a communication which indicates that a treaty may be entered into with Poland. If this is a fact, the fur shippers would like to make certain representations in this connection.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Obviously I could not give any information in this form but the remarks of my hon. friend will be noted. When it is proper to make a statement on the matter, one will be made. If my hon. friend has any representations which he would like to make we shall be very pleased to receive them.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. GRAY: When the house adjourned last evening the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) was answering an argument which had been raised earlier in the evening. The suggestion had been made that certain words which appeared in the 1933 act had been omitted from the 1934 bill, namely:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,— > (a)—loan or advance money to or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking;

Section 2, subsection (v) of the present bill reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may,—
> (b) When parliament is not in session, to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada;

Then I would emphasize these particular words:

> —and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof.

I submit that these words, broad in their meaning, can give to the governor in council the power to guarantee payments in the same way as the guarantee was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway last year, and as evidence of that I suggest that we should look at the order in council, prepared by the Prime Minister himself, granting the guarantee to the Canadian Pacific. First I would ask hon. members to observe the wording of clause (b) of section 2, especially the words I have just quoted, and compare them with the language of clause 9 of the order in council as drafted by the Prime Minister, reading as follows:

> That the said railway company is a public corporation carrying on its operations not only in Canada but in other parts of the world; and, in the opinion of the ministers, under present disturbed economic conditions, it is desirable to prevent default by the said railway company in discharging its said capital obligations and indebtedness as they mature, and in the public interest, to grant the request of the said railway company as a measure for the protection and maintenance of the credit and financial position of Canada.

I ask the committee to note the similarity between the wording of clause (b) of the present section we are considering and the basis of the guarantee as drafted in the order in council. The Prime Minister repeated, in his evidence before the banking and commerce committee, that he gave the guarantee because he believed it to be in the national interest, and he said further, "What I then did I would do to-morrow." I submit that under this section as we now have it he could do the very thing he did in granting the guarantee to the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said further that there cannot be any opinion as to an act of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: What is that?

Mr. GRAY: I will read the whole thing:

Q. We want the facts.
A. The facts are on the record.
Q. No, there are some facts that are only matters of both opinion and of verbal conversation.
A. There cannot be any opinion as to an act of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAY: I submit that, learned in the law as he is, he must know that the whole legal profession makes a large part of its living by interpreting acts of parliament. I suggest to him that there may be a difference of opinion as to what he may consider the effect of this measure we are now asked to pass upon, namely, bill 42, because if he is correctly reported he evidently believes there can be no opinion as to this act. In order that there may not be any doubt as to the powers that are being granted under this section, and in view of the promises which have been made, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Hanbury:

That section 2 of the said bill be amended by adding thereto, as clause (c), the following words:

(c) "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the governor in council to loan, or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking."

Mr. BENNETT: It will be necessary, before taking up this proposed amendment, first to dispose of the amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Last night I submitted certain questions to the Minister of Labour who is in charge of this bill. He is not here to-day, but possibly I may get the information.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Labour is detained in his house on the advice of his physician and I am endeavouring to take his place. If it was asserted, as apparently it was, that he was staying away to avoid giving the information—because that is the inference from the hon. member's statement—

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did not mean that. I was asking him questions last night and as he is not here to-day I will proceed with the questions. In the statement supplied to members regarding this legislation we have under the heading, Recapitulation of Dominion Disbursements, and under the Department of Agriculture, an amount in 1931 of $6,999.79 and in 1932, $3,000. What are these amounts? Were they special grants given for special purposes, and in what proportion were they allotted?

Mr. BENNETT: While the information is being looked up I may say, speaking from memory, that the money was for the purpose of fitting up ships with deck accommodation to carry cattle across the ocean. It was a contribution towards that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I see on this same sheet of paper an item with regard to the agricultural stabilization fund, under the act of 1933, an amount of $35,145.71. I should like to have an explanation of these various amounts. Last year in the debate on the budget we heard a good deal about this famous stabilization legislation which was to help the farmers and other exporters of products of the land. Was this money paid in virtue of the act passed last year, and how much was given to each province?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member's anxiety to prolong the debate is certainly very ingenious. This question has already been asked in the house by way of application for a return. At the last session of parliament the government undertook to stabilize the pound at $4.60. It was then intimated that the pound might probably go beyond that value and therefore the sum payable under this stabilization provision would be very small. As a matter of fact the pound very shortly after began to move up and the sum total paid under the provision was $35,145.71. I stated in my place last year that this would be charged against the relief appropriation for the year, and that was done. I am very happy to think that the movement upward of the pound obviated the necessity of a larger sum being paid.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How were these amounts paid? Were they paid to the exporters, and what are the names of the persons who received the benefit?

Mr. BENNETT: The return will gratify the hon. gentleman's very laudable curiosity in that regard. They were not paid to the provinces but to the persons who made the exports under the terms fixed by the regulations, which were published and indicated to the house.

Mr. FACTOR: In the statement of disbursements there were two items in the 1930 and 1931 acts of $500,000 each on account of the board of railway commissioners. I presume those were the amounts granted to the board for the elimination of grade crossings. Why have those grants not been continued for 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: Those items refer to something that should not now be discussed before the committee. We are at present dealing with 1934 legislation. The 1930 legislation and the disbursements under it were discussed in 1931, and just why the time of parliament should now be taken up except for an obvious purpose for discussing the expenditure in 1930 is something I am sure the hon. member will be able to answer to his constituents. The appropriation was made in 1930 to the grade crossing fund and the next year a similar sum was appropriated. Those who are familiar with the operation of that fund will realize that there is still a deficiency in it; in fact it would require a very substantial sum of money to make good the amount needed to meet the demands upon the fund under legislation passed by parliament in previous years. There are pending before the board of railway commissioners applications for a very large number of grade crossings. I thought my memory was good enough to state the number, but I cannot do so at the moment. It is not improbable that something will have to be done to add to that fund this year. For instance, in Hamilton just before the advent to power of this government, certain recommendations with respect to level crossings were made and later the then Minister of Labour, the late Senator Robertson, after conferences with the city and the railway authorities, undertook that certain grade crossings would be assisted, and they have been completed, but the money that is payable to the city and the railway company under the provisions of the agreement has not yet been paid. This matter covered some of the payments that were made under the direction of the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. BROWN: There is a matter that I would like to draw to the attention of the government and that I hope will receive consideration when funds being provided by this legislation are being disbursed. I have already on more than one occasion indicated the situation that prevails in one part of my constituency and extending also into that of the hon. member for Souris. I would likewise like to direct attention to a resolution that came into my hands this morning and that was passed at a meeting of the reeves of four municipalities, as follows:

At a meeting of the reeves of the municipalities of Pembina, Louise, Roblin and Turtle Mountain, held at Killarney on the 6th day of April, 1934, it was resolved that we hereby request the government of the province of Manitoba to petition the federal government to give the same consideration to these municipalities in regard to the payment of freight charges on feed, fodder and seed as that given to the area known as Manitoba drought area "A" as given by privy council order No. 2384.

I would like to say a word in regard to this particular area. Those who are familiar with the situation will know that in the extreme southwestern part of Manitoba there is a large area that has suffered very severely from drought. The area of which I speak is not nearly so extensive but at the same time it is one that has suffered severely and from neither the provincial nor the federal government has assistance come to which I think that particular section is entitled. Because the area is somewhat smaller it was excluded from the arrangements that were made between the two governments in regard to the extreme southwest of the province. But this area of which I speak suffered very severely, not only last year but for two or three preceding years. As regards one part of this area, perhaps the Prime Minister will remember that I called it to his attention a year or two ago when I requested that the customs charges on the importation of feed should be reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Potatoes first.

Mr. BROWN: No, I did not get consideration as regards potatoes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but I say that attention was directed to potatoes.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, but that is another case. I dealt with feed in a preceding session and I may say that the same area received consideration from the previous government. The Prime Minister has referred to potatoes. I think his party friends in that particular section of the country would like to forget about potatoes because, now that the matter has been mentioned, I may say that it was one of the grossest failures on the part of the present government to give relief that would have cost nothing. I shall, however, not discuss that question at the moment.

The district to which I referred is a section of country included in the area represented by these reeves that for two years, one under the preceding government and one under this government, received aid through the foregoing of the customs duties. This area, not only the Pembina district, but further west, Louise, Robin, Argyle, has suffered very severely. I had occasion to call attention to that fact twice when I mentioned the great disaster that overtook them because of the mortality among their horses. I think I mentioned that sixty-nine, as I am credibly informed, had died in one township. All that this resolution asks is that consideration should be given to the question of freight charges which were reduced to the benefit of the area further west. In the letter accompanying the resolution the writer indicates that they have the assurance that the provincial government will make such an application. I would like to have an assurance that if the provincial government makes that application, the federal government will deal with it in the same way as it dealt with what is referred to as drought area "A" in southwestern Manitoba. Last fall I took pains to drive through all this district and I found conditions there deplorable indeed, and if there is any section of the country that is entitled to whatever assistance can be given by either this or the provincial government, I shall be only too happy to press its case with all the vigour I can.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Lisgar is of course aware of the fact that each succeeding year representatives of the provincial authorities have presented to the federal government claims for consideration, and those have been sometimes for the payment of freight, of feed, sometimes to move cattle from one area to another, sometimes to pay freight charges for the transport of household effects and the family itself from the south to the north; but in every case it has been a matter of discussion and consideration between the federal and provincial authorities. As the matter stands now, until this legislation is enacted no agreements of any kind can be made between the provinces and the dominion. Several matters such as that to which the hon. member refers are being pressed upon the minister from Saskatchewan and one or two from Alberta. What the hon. member has said with respect to the southwestern section of Manitoba is known to the government, not only by reason of the representations made in the house by himself and others, but also by reason of the fact that the department's communications with the provincial government have pointed out the crop failures in that particular section, which in a previous year, but not last year, if my memory serves me aright, extended, as the hon. gentleman knows, far into Saskatchewan. Last year I think there was a crop in the Saskatchewan area, but not in that area in Manitoba, to which he refers. All these matters, I assure the hon. gentleman, will receive the most careful consideration of the minister and the government if they have any authority to deal with them. Until this statute passes they have no such authority, either to grant assistance or to refuse; they can merely advise, as I have been doing, that until the legislation is enacted they have no power to enter into any agreement.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. YOUNG: Last night when the Minister of Labour was in his seat I asked him a couple of questions which he was unable to answer but said he would get the information. One was in relation to the $22,579,000 loaned to Saskatchewan, part of it to the Saskatchewan relief commission. The minister was going to find how much of it was loaned to the commission and for what purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not loaned to the commission. The loans were made to the province of Saskatchewan. That item includes the expenditures made by the relief commission and the moneys loaned to the province on its treasury bills. The division is as follows:

Province..	$13,987,119 84
Relief commission..	8,591,958 32
	$22,579,078 16

Mr. YOUNG: On the previous page it states that the money spent by the commissioners, was $10,752,533. Is that in addition to this $8,591,000?

Mr. BENNETT: No, there is no relation between the two items. The first item to which attention was directed is the money expended after July, 1931, when I brought to the attention of the house the shocking condition of devastation that existed in that area, which I ventured to suggest as a national calamity called for national effort. The expenditure I have just read is the expenditure made by that commission to take care of a burden that the dominion assumed in its entirety.

Mr. YOUNG: But there was no commission in 1931, it was not set up until the fall of that year.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes, we set up a commission to take care of that situation. But the commission that was set up later took care of the administration of the matter from the standpoint of the province as well. The hon. gentleman will recall the circumstances. The commission dealt with relief in its entirety, during the winter succeeding the July in which I made the statement. I have told the hon. gentleman more than once that at one time there were over 300,000 men, women and children receiving relief in that area, an almost incredibly large number of people to be receiving relief in that particular area. The hon. gentleman will recall further that I pointed out to him that the commission took charge of that entire matter. Then the province availed itself of the commission to discharge its obligations, the Red Cross looking after the distribution of clothing. Our advances to enable the province to function, as distinguished from loans, include that $22,000,000. I fancy the hon. gentleman has seen the orders in council, because they were tabled here during the years in which the expenditures were made.

Mr. YOUNG: What I want to get clear is whether or not all the money spent by the relief commission in area A, that is the area in which the commission took full charge of the relief, was furnished by the federal government, and if any of it is being collected from the province.

Mr. BENNETT: The sums expended under the arrangement by which the federal government assumed entire responsibility will not be collected from the province or anyone else, except to the extent to which some persons desiring to treat the moneys received as loans and not as gifts may make payments as mentioned by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) yesterday. I believe some $8,000 has been received, and I stated yesterday, and I desire again to state, that no proceedings will be taken to collect any money that has thus been given. It was stated in this chamber, with the unanimous approval of the house, that this was a national calamity in regard to which the central power should assume responsibility for the entire expenditures.

The other amount consists of items that represent our proportion of expenditures under the agreements made with Saskatchewan. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. YOUNG: Then there is still another item of $6,757,904.23 for relief expended in Saskatchewan. Through what channels was that spent?

Mr. BENNETT: That stands in the same position as expenditures made through the federal government in other provinces. That share of our expenditure is not recoverable.

In view of what the hon. gentleman has said, I think, he does not quite follow the matter in its entirety. I shall endeavour to make it clear. First, as to the expenditure made by the federal government, that was solely federal expenditure. That applied to the province of Saskatchewan only because of the devastation that drought and other natural causes had effected in what was a populous and rich area, but in which there had been a crop failure for three successive years, and subsequently, I believe it is fair to say, in a considerable portion for a fourth consecutive year. We discharge the whole obligation for relief in that area, under circumstances known I am sure to the hon. member for Weyburn. Secondly, there is the relief granted by the Dominion of Canada in accordance with the agreement made with the provinces, including Saskatchewan, the federal share of which is indicated in the returns that have been filed. Thirdly, there are loans made to the province of Saskatchewan as stated in the returns: (a) for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their relief operations; (b) for the purpose of enabling them to make grants to municipalities which otherwise are unable to pay their obligations, and (c) for the purpose of enabling them to discharge their functions as a government with respect to interest on their obligations, with respect to maturities which had to be met, and with respect to other provincial expenditures, including seed grain, which was one of the purposes for which advances were made by the federal government. Have I made it clear to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, I thank the Prime Minister. There was another question last night that I directed to the Minister of Labour in regard to the notes taken and amounts collected on those notes by the relief commission. He stated that the total of the notes was something over $200,000 and the amounts collected $8,000. I said I did not think those figures could be correct. I find on looking up the report of the auditor general that these figures apply only to the unorganized area and not to the eighty-odd municipalities under relief.

Mr. BENNETT: The deputy informs me he sent a telegram for the purpose of verifying the information concerning that and has not received a reply. But the face total of the notes I would think is larger than $272,000.

Mr. YOUNG: Immensely larger.

Mr. BENNETT: From what I know of the notes given by those who accepted relief in this area I think the sum is much larger than that. That is just my memory. The repayments as indicated here are something like $8,000 I think.

Mr. YOUNG: No, repayments only from the unorganized territory, not in the whole area of the dried out district.

Mr. BENNETT: They have telegraphed for that figure. The repayments of which there is record, as disclosed here amount to $8,000. The other figure will be given as soon as received; it is not available at the moment.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think possibly the misunderstanding arose yesterday through the fact that in the auditor general's report the only reference we can find to lien notes is in connection with the unorganized territory. In his report he shows immense sums charged to recipients, but makes no reference to the fact that lien notes have been taken. The figures we were dealing with yesterday we find apply only to unorganized territory, and refer to the lien notes taken from recipients in that area.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Swift Current, if I may say so without being offensive, is perhaps confusing two matters. Lien notes were given with respect to feed and seed and that sort of thing; ordinary notes such as were mentioned by the hon. gentleman himself yesterday were given for general relief. They could not be lien notes under any circumstances, because the food and things of that kind had disappeared. With respect to seed and that sort of thing these lien notes were given, but that was a provincial matter. I should like to clarify that, because the hon. member for South Battleford dealt with it yesterday. A number of people receiving direct relief from the dominion, when it assumed complete responsibility for relief, gave notes to the commission for the crown in the right of the dominion; that is the first point. Those were not lien notes; they were just ordinary notes similar to the note that was read yesterday, under which they undertook to repay.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Promissory notes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, ordinary promissory notes. In the next place, some of those people have made payments, which have gone into the consolidated fund. In some of the other provinces small sums have been refunded as well. I think I gave the committee an illustration last year of an old lady who sent in a very small sum of money because she desired to treat the assistance received as an advance and not as a gift. I think I mentioned that last year, but the amount so refunded is so insignificant as to be not worthy of mention in connection with a matter of this kind.

I think I should go a step further and say that the notes for hay, feed and seed were of a special character which the provincial legislation dealt with in a definite and specific manner. Under those notes—and I think it will be recalled that some hon. gentlemen directed attention to this fact last year—they took possession of the crop before anyone else could get it. I think some hon. gentlemen opposite directed attention to that fact. That was under the provisions of a provincial statute which dealt with the matter of advances for the purposes indicated, with respect to which the dominion has nothing to do.

Mr. GERSHAW: Mention of the Saskatchewan relief commission brings up a problem which has been very widely discussed in the eastern portion of Alberta, where the people feel they have a very great grievance. As the Prime Minister knows, the constituency of Medicine Hat runs adjacent to the Saskatchewan boundary for two hundred miles. To the east of the boundary relief is administered by a commission, who send men to the various districts and who seem to hand out relief in a sympathetic and almost a generous manner. This is done, of course, because the people in that section have suffered four successive crop failures largely due to the dry winds and drought. But these dry winds do not stop at the interprovincial boundary line; year after year they have also destroyed the crops on the Alberta side of the boundary. In Alberta relief is administered in a very different way. People found that not only were their crops destroyed but their garden crops were failures as well. Some of those who had trucks went to the neighbouring irrigation districts and brought back large loads of fresh vegetables which they distributed free of charge to the people. People in other provinces also generously supplied fresh vegetables to these districts free of cost, and that was greatly appreciated. The people in those districts, however, find difficulty in getting ordinary relief. In that whole strip of country, which is thirty miles wide, there are only two police officers. The people do not have automobiles; they must walk or drive their horses twelve or fifteen miles to find a police officer, and often when they get there he is not at home. Then the officer has to go back with them and investigate the case, and sometimes these officers are hard boiled. If they see chickens or cattle on the farm they feel that the man is not destitute and should not get relief. So these people feel they have a grievance, because just across the boundary they see relief administered in a more generous manner.

The merchants of the district also have a complaint. They get very few relief orders. I was talking to a merchant in the Saskatchewan area who said he had two hundred customers, of whom one hundred and ten bring in relief orders, so the people there are thoroughly convinced that there is discrimination in respect to relief as between the two provinces. As the Prime Minister has said, the dominion does not expect to get any money back; usually the province does not expect to get money back, but we find that the municipalities and the improvement districts are trying to get these people to work for their relief. No one objects very much to that, but what relief is given is deducted from the allowances in the improvement districts. I know that this is largely a provincial matter, but according to my information the province has applied to have a relief commission for the eastern part of Alberta, and I hope to convince the minister of the necessity of reviewing the situation in this district.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Medicine Hat is not correctly informed as to an effort having been made by the province to appoint a commission in the eastern area of Alberta. The fact is that there is always the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman refers where an imaginary line divides people. I could give some striking illustrations in the older world, and they are not lacking on this continent, where that condition has brought about invidious references to these facts. The truth is that the dominion undertook the responsibility with respect to the area in Saskatchewan, and the province of Alberta set up its own commission. The Alberta relief commission was appointed by order in council dated December 2, 1932, consisting of Mr. A. A. MacKenzie, of Edmonton, as chairman, Colonel G. E. Sanders, of Calgary, and Mr. Robert Livingstone, of Lethbridge. That order in council was passed at the instance, shall I say, of the federal government; it is their commission, and it is regarded as one of the best commissions functioning in the country. The Saskatchewan relief commission is composed of Mr. Henry Black, chairman; Mr. C. B. Daniel, general manager; Mr. W. G. Yule, Mr. A. E. Whitmore, Mr. H. A. Mumms, Mrs. Pearl Johnson, and Mr. Oliver J. Dean, secretary. In Manitoba, Mr. MacNamara, of the Department of Public Works, was secretary dealing with the matter, and in British Columbia, Mr. Griffith was administrator of the unemployment relief branch.

The representations which have been made by the hon. gentleman would be very proper representations to be made to the province of Alberta. I say to this committee very frankly that the dominion was not unwilling to assume the entire responsibility for administration and everything else in those provinces, and take it over as a dominion matter, but you have to deal with provinces who are not at the moment prepared to forego their autonomy and leave the administration of these matters in the hands of an outside authority. If the representations which the hon. gentleman has made now are successfully made to the government of the province of Alberta the matter will receive every consideration from the federal government as, if and when the request is made.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, the observations made by the Prime Minister with regard to the division of authority as between the provincial and federal governments impels me to say what I had intended to say at some other time. It seems to me that all the efforts in connection with relief in the last few years, and as contemplated under the bill now before the committee, have been predicated upon the assumption that this is an emergency only. I should like to venture the opinion that while relieving the distress of the unemployed is an emergency in an aggravated form, unemployment has become and will continue to be a more or less permanent factor. One would hope that as the years go by and as we return to a condition of normalcy, as one statesman of the United States called it, there would not be as great a degree of unemployment; that perhaps through the sharing of work, and for other reasons, nearly everybody will have employment. I believe, however, that for some years to come there will continue to be what one might term an irreducible minimum of unemployment, and that that has to be dealt with.

The point I wish to make is this, that if the government has not yet taken any steps in the matter it might very well now, either by the appointment of a commission, or of themselves, make investigations looking to the solution of the problem of providing for the permanently unemployed. The government itself and all hon. members in the house, regardless of their political affiliations, have expressed themselves as being in favour of a form of unemployment insurance. I believe it was two sessions ago the Prime Minister said that unemployment insurance was a very difficult matter with which to deal, and that a good deal of time would be required to ascertain all the implications of unemployment insurance. He believed investigations would need to be made so that any legislation brought in would operate properly, under certain actuarial conditions, and so forth. But it seems to me that if the government could see its way clear to appoint a commission, if you like—and one hesitates to advocate the appointment of a commission, because there seems to be a great deal of public antagonism towards the adoption of such a course—it might consider the question from this point of view, namely, that nearly all these social problems ought, in a sense, to be coordinated under one federal control or, at least, under some sort of reasonable system. It might become possible that with unemployment insurance legislation there could be coordinated such things as workmen's compensation, widows' allowances, insurance for ill health, old age pensions, and poor relief. Then, combined with the investigations into the possibility of coordinating these services under federal control, there would of course arise the necessity of dealing with the provinces, because I appreciate that in this connection there is the question of invading their jurisdiction. The Prime Minister has spoken about the difficulty presented by the fact that the provinces are in control of some of these activities. I rise only to say that the government would do well to consider this suggestion, because in the future time might be saved if they at once appointed a commission for the purpose of investigating these matters. There would be many other features besides the ones I have mentioned. For instance, the commission could report to the government as to what form the unemployment insurance should take, whether it should be contributory or non-contributory —although the government is already on record in that connection—as to the proportion which should be paid by employer and employee; as to the proportion which should be paid by federal, provincial and municipal governments, and where the money should come from to make the payments—by special tax, or some other method. I am making these references in a more or less indirect way, and have not been particularly definite. I believe, however, there is merit in the suggestion that the government might now take steps to make these investigations so that at the earliest possible moment a definite scientific system, if we may call it that, could be evolved and enacted into law at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of social services to be rendered to the people of a country by its government is one which has engaged the attention of peoples for nearly half a century. The burden placed upon governments has increased so greatly that the taxation necessarily imposed to meet the demands is, in some of the provinces, nearly as great as was their whole taxation at the time they came into being. Mothers' allowances, health insurance and old age pensions —and then, of course, there is the Workmen's Compensation Act, which I had intended to deal with separately, because it is more than a social service—all these are administered by the provinces. It will be recalled that the Workmen's Compensation Act is the embodiment of a principle, which principle is that an assessment must be made against industry for the purpose of providing a fund to meet the damage effected by industry to those employed in it. I have used the word "damage" rather than any other word, because actions which used to be taken in the courts were taken to recover damages for injuries. This act provides that a fixed sum shall be taken from industry every month for the purpose of creating a fund to satisfy the claims of those employed in the industry of a particular province. The consumer pays that tax.

Secondly, health insurance, which is part of the modern social insurance of Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, involves the payment of a sum based upon actuarial computations as to the period of illnesses of individuals, to enable a fixed sum per week to be paid, after a given period of illness, to those who are employed in industry. That is largely paid by the consumer. Now we come to old age pensions, and we find that in this country it is paid seventy-five per cent by the federal power and twenty-five per cent by the provincial power, that it is a sum payable to those who have reached the age of seventy years, and that it is paid to the extent of $20 per month. Those payments are made by the consumers, in the form of taxation. Then, lastly, there are mothers' benefits, or benefits which are created by statute to enable those who are deprived of the assistance of their husbands to maintain their children and enable them to give—and I shall use very broad terms—such training as will be sufficient to fit the children for life's struggles. That also is paid by the provinces and involves an obligation being placed upon the taxpayers.

Those are forms of benefit which are paid directly or indirectly by the state to those engaged in industry, to those who have attained a given age or to others who have been deprived of a breadwinner. Then, of course, there is the ordinary, normal relief, which is an obligation placed upon the provinces, and in turn upon the municipalities. In the budgets of every province one could find year after year, long before the years 1929 or 1930, provision for indigents or for the poor, administered—and I am looking at the hon. member for Vancouver Centre—in remote communities such as those in British Columbia, where municipal institutions had not been set up, by the gold commissioner, and administered in the older provinces by municipal councils. This is indigent relief, or poor relief.

There were in this dominion before the depression set in an average of 143,000 people who had to be cared for, during the period they were unable to work, either by the savings they had made or by contributions made by the taxpayers. The hon. member for North Waterloo has pointed out that the number is now much larger. Undoubtedly it is much larger, not solely because of the depression but because of circumstances to which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred only the other day. This is the age of machinery; four men are now doing the work that seven did in 1920. The result is that you have to seek employment for that surplus population. For instance, take the everyday business of life which any one of us can recall from the days when we were ten years of age. We see year after year a lessening of the number employed in providing services for our comfort, for our convenience, and shall we say for our pleasure as well.

The hon. gentleman should keep in mind the fact that during all the period through which we have passed an effort has been made to collect such information as would enable us to have a picture of the situation, and we have that picture in a fairly complete way. It will be recalled that in the census we set up special inquiries for the purpose of giving us some idea of what was the situation throughout Canada. We have the reports of trades unions, and we have the reports of the establishments of industry giving us the number of people employed, the capacity for employment, and the extent to which that capacity has been taken up during the months which have passed. I say with all deference to the committee that that is a fairly simple thing. It requires patience and time and effort, but there is no difficulty in getting it if you take the time and have the patience to do it. That information has been fairly well secured in this country and we have it in fair shape.

However, when you come to deal with the problem of the creation of facilities to meet that situation you are confronted at once with divided jurisdiction. The provinces have exclusive legislative control over the matters mentioned in section 92 of the British North America Act. Unless there is agreement by them all, you will have a situation such as you have to-day with respect to old age pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Could not the question of jurisdiction be reviewed?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has anticipated what I was going to say. I do not intend this afternoon to enter into a discussion of this matter, because obviously it is neither the time nor the place to do it. But I do say to the committee that there is not the slightest doubt in the world that unless there is a rearrangement of the powers of this parliament and the legislatures of the provinces, in the very nature of things the problem cannot be dealt with. May I say to the hon. gentleman that a commission is not necessary.

Mr. EULER: That was only a suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: If I have the jurisdiction, I need nothing further in the way of information. I say that very frankly because we have spent enormous effort and considerable time and patience to see that that is available. All I can usefully say to this committee is that I hold a very strong opinion as to the necessity of an early revision of the provisions of the British North America Act. I am not unmindful of the fact, and I trust the committee will always keep this in mind, that sometimes there is an inclination on the part of many of us to be intolerant because of the views expressed by those who do not agree with us as to the desirability or necessity of amending that statute. I should like to remind the committee of what I am sure is in its mind always, that the British North America Act represents a compromise, and compromises are always difficult to change without the consent of all those whose interests may be affected. Every member of this committee recognizes that difficulty. I need not go into it at any length, beyond stating that we recognize the difficulty and any steps we may take towards its solution will be taken in such a way as not to strain the mechanism of our existing machinery. When we have accomplished that we will be enabled to embark upon those improvements in our legislation which the circumstances clearly necessitate.

My attention has been directed to the fact that I said that before the depression period there were 143,000 who had to be taken care of, but I might state that that number does not include dependents. If we reckoned the way we do now, the number would be somewhere in excess of 400,000. The information given to me by those who make it their business to study this matter and report upon it as carefully as possible is that 143,000 would be an underestimate. I should have indicated that the 143,000 included only earners and not their dependents.

I am grateful to the hon. member for bringing up this matter, but it is clearly not a matter which we should endeavour to discuss under this measure. I have before me the recommendations which the provinces arrived at with the dominion last spring. I say very frankly to the committee that I had hoped we might be able to dispense with a relief measure this year. At the meeting in January the provinces indicated their views in these words:

> That until such time as the large numbers of unemployed throughout Canada have been substantially absorbed, either by improved industrial employment or by federal works, federal assistance to the provinces should be continued on the basis of the provinces dealing with present economic conditions by the distribution of direct relief as provided in the existing agreement between the dominion and the provinces.

That is the conclusion at which the provinces arrived. I have explained how we dealt with these matters. At the conference we stated what the situation was, and each premier made a statement as to the situation in his province. They then retired for the purpose of considering how they could best deal with the difficulties which confronted them, and that is the recommendation they made. It was unanimous, but they expressed the hope, in common with ourselves, that conditions would obviate the expenditure of large sums for relief.

I should like the committee to know that there is a very distinct improvement in this country. I will admit that in the country west of the great lakes it is less apparent than it is in the east. Shorn of their great reservoir of earnings by reason of a lack of profits, the millions of dollars which are normally available for business are no longer available. That means a diminution of purchasing power, and until there is an improvement in agriculture, in prices and otherwise, it is quite apparent that the general improvement must be delayed. However, in the camps maintained by the Department of National Defence where, as I explained yesterday, the men may leave to take positions in agriculture, industry or otherwise, the number has diminished by substantially 9,000. One industry has reported that during February it had the largest production of any month in its history, and it has been in existence almost since confederation. The same thing has happened in connection with another business. Another significant and striking fact, and one which fills us with the spirit of hope and optimism, is the increase in the production of electrical energy. I always regard these figures as an important factor, electrical energy being used to the extent it is in almost every form of industrial activity in Canada. More kilowatts of electrical energy were produced in February than in any month in the history of Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: Could the right hon. gentleman state how much electrical energy was exported?

Mr. BENNETT: There have been no new customers beyond those mentioned in the order in council produced a few days ago. My memory is that the quantity exported has not changed materially over a period of years. I usually carry these matters in my mind, but for the moment I cannot recall whether there were seven or ten; at any rate, there was a limited number of customers and they have been given permission to purchase and the producing company to sell electricity or gas in this country—natural gas in the far west and electricity in the east—for I think a matter of fifteen years or thereabouts, perhaps a little longer. There has been no substantial change in the matter since then.

Mr. NEILL: Might not the increased consumption of electricity be due to the abandonment of steam rather than to increased industry?

Mr. BENNETT: It well might be, but the fact is that that usually is gradual, and the striking figures with respect to electricity give one at least some cause for hope. Take the harbour of Halifax, which is one of the finest in the world; the business transacted in that harbour during the month of March was greater than in any year in the history of the port, and that is in itself a striking record.

Mr. FACTOR: Why ask for all these extraordinary powers, then?

Mr. BENNETT: A Daniel come to judgment, O most noble Daniel! Perhaps I should not apply the Merchant of Venice's figure of speech, but one hearing that observation is almost inclined to do so; even some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues see the force of it. I merely answer the questions put to me by hon. gentlemen, indicating that we had hoped we might avoid dealing with the matter as we have. The provinces thought otherwise, and after discussing it with them fully we have introduced the measure now before the house. Far from having failed to realize what the hon. member for North Waterloo has referred to, we have endeavoured to accumulate and have accumulated all the information necessary to deal with the problems of social betterment. But we have not yet approached the problem of an amendment to the British North America Act. That is in the offing, and I suppose that in the course of human events, and when an indulgent and grateful electorate have honoured us with their support, we may be able to make such changes as may be necessary.

Mr. EULER: I have no intention of carrying the discussion further at the moment. I brought the matter up merely because of my desire that what is done in an emergency should also be dealt with in a permanent manner, because it will be a continuing emergency, if you care to put it that way. My suggestion of a commission was merely to secure information which the Prime Minister says has already been secured. I am rather surprised to hear that. I realize also the difficulty with regard to conflicting jurisdiction between the provinces and the dominion. I realize that, and that was one of my reasons for bringing the matter up. I am glad I brought it up if only for the fact that we have got from the Prime Minister a statement that he believes the British North America Act should be amended.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, while accepting as a fact the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with the improvement of business in this country, could he explain why the government, according to the provisions of section 2, desires unlimited powers to relieve the unemployed? Could he not state the amount necessary to end this crisis from which we are suffering for the last three years? Are the requests which he received—either from provinces, municipalities and private or public companies—so numerous that it is impossible for him to state the amount necessary to solve this problem? I wish to inquire from the right hon. Prime Minister whether he can supply us with a list—I do not ask for a complete one, but at least of some of the requests which the government has received heretofor.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend knows that I follow him with a little difficulty; I can follow the meaning that attaches to a few of his words and from that, with the help of my friends, I can understand the whole. If I were to produce all the demands made upon us by all companies, municipalities and communities, then I might be within the words of Scripture, in saying that so many books could be written about them that they would be beyond the mind of man to remember. The truth is that we have been inundated with requests for assistance with regard to everything and when we have referred them to the province that usually has been the end of it, for reasons which I think are fairly obvious, especially to my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay. Under those circumstances I feel I can add nothing to what I have said.

Mr. VENIOT: In connection with the remarks of the Prime Minister touching the exportation of electricity, did I understand him to say that there were some orders in council laid on the table?

Mr. BENNETT: The orders in council are referred to every year in the departmental report indicating the extent to which exportation has been permitted, and I think you will find in the trade and commerce report the reference to them.

Mr. VENIOT: Another question. The Prime Minister, referring to the census returns and the number of unemployed, mentioned 143,000 as reported by the census returns. Was not that, as reported by the census returns, the average for the previous ten years?

Mr. BENNETT: It was not a census return at all and I did not say it was. The only difficulty is that the hon. gentleman is wrong on two counts: first of all it was not a census return, and I did not say it was. I said that the average reported by the statistical department—

Mr. VENIOT: They got it from the census of 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the average for a period of years was 143,000.

Mr. VENIOT: I was not so far astray as the Prime Minister suggests, because the census returns contain a definite statement. They say that they find there were 140,000 or 141,000 of unemployed on an average for the previous ten years. That is what the census returns say, and the statistical department no doubt got their information from those returns.

Mr. BENNETT: The report to which I referred was prepared by the Department of Labour for 1920-29, and on the basis of information received there was indicated an average of 143,000.

Mr. POWER: I should like to obtain some information from the minister with respect to an order in council dealing with a guarantee to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. I have the order in council before me, but I fear very much there must have been a previous one. This is order in council P.C. 1229, as follows:

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General on the 28th June, 1933.

The committee of the privy council have had before them a joint report, dated 21st June, 1933, from the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Labour, representing:

That, in order to assist in the relief of the existing unemployment situation in Nova Scotia, an arrangement was made under date of May 25, 1932, with the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Limited, to manufacture steel rails amounting to 15,000 gross tons at $46 per ton, to be delivered f.o.b. cars at Sydney on March 1, 1933, up to which date there were to be no extra charges, but after March 1, 1933, the government agreed to pay the interest charges on the value of such rails unless previous to that time the Canadian National Railways had taken over the rails.

The question which I should like to ask is: Was an order in council passed prior to this one authorizing the agreement, or was this an agreement made between the Canadian National Railways and the steel company?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I know there was no previous order in council. The matter was discussed between the president of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation and the Minister of Labour, and in 1934, that is this year, the matter was again discussed, because the order in council refers to a 30,000-ton rail order received from the Canadian National Railways and the guarantee was given to the Bank of Montreal in respect to the same. Is that the one?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. POWER: Probably the Prime Minister misunderstood me. He is referring to the Algoma Steel?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POWER: I am referring now to the Dominion Steel and Coal order. In the order in council there is a reference to an agreement entered into between, I assume, the government or probably the Canadian National Railways and the Dominion Steel and Coal. I would like to know something with respect to that arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT: The agreement was made between the railway company and the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. The memorandum of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation is as follows:

The action taken by the federal government in aid of the imperilled coal and steel industries of Nova Scotia during recent years has included transportation subventions linking up rail and water movements in the navigation season; assisted rail movement in the winter; encouragement to the use of Canadian coal in coke ovens; both in regard to metallurgical coke and domestic coke supplanting imported anthracite; and release of orders for steel rails as an unemployment measure.

The results of this coordinated action of the government have been more stimulating and beneficial than the most optimistic anticipation. The steel plant in Sydney, because of the backlog to its operations given by a 50,000-ton rail order given in the spring of 1933, has been enabled to quote successfully on two rail orders from South Africa, and to obtain substantial orders for export to Great Britain of wire nails, rods and billets.

The direct result of the rail order has been to enable the Sydney steel plant to work on a 50 per cent basis over a period that it is hoped may extend into the summer of 1934. The activity of the steel plant thus made possible has required greater coal consumption, and is on the eve of being reflected in ore and limestone production in Newfoundland, thereby favourably affecting Canadian exports of a general nature to Newfoundland by increasing the purchasing ability of the island. The wisdom of the action of the government taken in aid of the distressed coal mining industry of Nova Scotia has been equally demonstrated by the results in increasing employment.

Coal mining is the life of Nova Scotia. One-quarter of its population, as actual workers, or as the dependants of workers, obtain their livelihood within the province through the mining and transportation of coal, through supplying of mine materials, and in the allied steel industry which is built upon local coal supply. There are other numerous workers beyond the boundaries of Nova Scotia whose livelihood is gained by the handling and distribution of Nova Scotia coal; the benefits of Nova Scotia coal mining in respect to employment being felt throughout all eastern Canada.

A substantial part of the provincial revenue comes from coal royalties.

Then after discussing the assistance given by coal subventions, he proceeds:

Side by side with this condition in Nova Scotia, coal of non-Canadian origin—the employment from its production benefiting other countries—was being imported into eastern Canada to the extent of 8,000,000 tons of bituminous quality annually, identical in its uses and grade with Nova Scotia coal.

The cost of production of coal in Nova Scotia was increased to a crippling extent by operation of mines at less than half normal rate. The competitive ability of Nova Scotia coal was becoming smaller all the time as the financial resources of employers and workers became exhausted.

The existence of the coal mining industry, which is almost the same thing as the commercial and industrial health of Nova Scotia, was gravely imperilled.

In these imperative circumstances the granting of transportation subventions enabling Canadians to use Nova Scotia coal instead of imported coal was no less than the plain duty of the federal government. As a result coal mining in Nova Scotia has been kept in being, and the use of Nova Scotia coal has been extended to areas formerly exclusively supplied by imported coal, where it has proved to be at least as good quality and as suitable for all kinds of purposes as imported bituminous coal.

The expenditure on subventions has avoided much greater expenditure in necessary workers' relief, has averted calamitous commercial collapse of employing corporations and bankruptcy of municipalities. The assistance given has necessarily been proportionate to the need. The scheme of the coal subventions has in mind the lessening of expenditures as business recovery proceeds. The assistance so far given, based on a need that it is hoped is lessening, has certainly averted conditions requiring such great assistance as to be beyond the powers of government.

Taking all the attendant circumstances into consideration, the action of the government in encouraging the use of Canadian coal by Canadian consumers was plain common sense and has been abundantly justified by what it has accomplished.

I read the whole of that because it covers both the question of subventions in regard to coal and the order for rails.

Mr. POWER: Who was that from?

Mr. BENNETT: From the president of the corporation, Sir Newton Moore; it is in his memorandum to the government.

Mr. POWER: I do not think the Prime Minister understood my question. My question is: What arrangement was entered into by the government or by the Canadian National Railways in 1932? The order in council speaks of an arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT: The order of June 2?

Mr. POWER: This is order in council P.C. No. 1229, dated June 28, 1933, and it refers to an arrangement made under date of May 25, 1932, with the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Limited, to manufacture steel rails amounting to 15,000 gross tons at $46 per ton to be delivered on March 1, 1933. I would like to get some information as to the nature of that arrangement and who were the parties to it.

Mr. BENNETT: Prior to the passing of the order in council, to which the hon. gentleman has referred and which authorizes payment, an order in council was passed guaranteeing to the bank the sum of money that represented the cost of the rails. The arrangement referred to is between the railway company and the steel company whereby the rails were to be rolled to a certain specification and all the particulars that the railway company required. Then the government on June 2, being a few days after the arrangement was made for the purchase of the rails, guaranteed the account to the bank to the extent of $1,100,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To one bank or several?

Mr. BENNETT: There were three banks: the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank and the Bank of Commerce. Then the order in council to which the hon. member has referred was passed for the purpose of authorizing the department to make the payments.

Mr. POWER: Can the Prime Minister give the number and date of that order in council?

Mr. BENNETT: P.C. 1076, June 2, 1933.

Mr. POWER: May I ask that it be produced?

Mr. BENNETT: I am informed that it has been tabled.

Mr. POWER: This order to which I now refer is one, I take it, authorizing the payment of interest only.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it was order number 1229 of June 28, 1933, authorizing payment:

Out of the consolidated revenue fund in accordance with the provisions of The Relief Act, 1933, to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited of the amount or amounts of interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum upon the value of the quantity of rails rolled, as per the inspection certificates, the said quantities to be valued at $45.25 per gross ton for No. 1 rails and $45.25 less 5 per cent for No. 2 rails, such interest to be paid to Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited in respect of the balance of the value of rails that may at any time after March 1, 1933, be outstanding for settlement by the Canadian National Railways in respect of tonnage remaining to be taken over by the Canadian National Railways.

The ministers observe that the quantities certified to in the inspection reports are estimated quantities which are subject to verification upon final weighing of the rails as and when to be taken over by the Canadian National Railways, and that final settlement will be based upon the quantities ascertained through actual weighing at the time of final taking over.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if the original order in council number 1076 of 1932—

Mr. BENNETT: No, 1933.

Mr. POWER: Of June 2?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POWER: —was passed under the Relief Act of 1933 which provided that guarantees could be given to corporations?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POWER: But prior to the passing of that act a contract must have been entered into between the government and the steel company, because reference is made to an arrangement made under date of May 25, 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: That arrangement was between the railway company and the steel company, not with the government.

Mr. POWER: Does this amount of $1,100,000 become a liability of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. BENNETT: It is a liability of the Canadian National Railways, and it stands for payment as the rails are taken into use. In the meantime, under the provisions of the order in council to which I have just referred, interest payments were made. Then the rails have to be paid for as they are taken into service by the railway company.

Mr. POWER: Referring now to another order in council, P.C. 1285, passed and approved on June 28, 1933, it is rather long to recite but it deals with a guarantee by the government to the Bank of Montreal of an amount of $660,000 to provide for the manufacture by the Algoma Steel Company of 30,000 tons of rails for the use of the Canadian National Railways. May I ask the minister to give some details of that order in council?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is aware that the Soo mill manufactures rails, and has supplied rails in large quantities to the Michigan Central and other American roads operating in Canada as well as to the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National. As a large number of persons were unemployed at the Soo, an order was sought from the railway company. If the railway company required rails they thought they should have part of the order. The government was then asked whether if the railway company ordered rails the government would give a guarantee to enable operations to be carried on. I suppose it is within the knowledge of this committee that the Algoma Steel Company was in the hands of receivers. Therefore the assistance which I have mentioned was sought. The letter which was written to the minister states:

> Our rail mill started on the 30,000 ton unemployment order December 4th and has been operating on single turn in order to distribute the work as much as possible. The order is about one-half rolled and will run to the first week in March.
> The operation of the rail mill on this unemployment order has not only restored employment to rail mill employees but has enabled us to secure orders for other material to operate the two merchant mills through the winter. We now have approximately 1,600 men employed, and a payroll of $150,000 per month.
> During last summer we had in Sault Ste. Marie over 1,500 families on relief and this would have been increased materially this winter had it not been for the steel plant operation.

That letter is dated January 26, 1934. It is from one of the receivers, the operating receiver.

That is a case in which an arrangement was made between the railway company and the rolling mill, and the rails that were supplied will be taken possession of and paid for as required. I think some of them have been recently shipped into service. The guarantee was given because the company, being in the hands of receivers, could not secure the necessary capital without having some assurance that these rails would be paid for.

Mr. POWER: By whom was that letter signed?

Mr. BENNETT: The present receiver, Mr. Franz. He is one of the receivers and managers. The names given on the letter paper are: W. C. Franz, Sir W. E. Stavert and John A. McPhail, receivers and managers.

Mr. POWER: Had the plant been closed for any length of time before this?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in a position to say definitely, I think it had not been operating for some time.

Mr. POWER: The member for the constituency is standing right behind you.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): The Algoma Steel mill at Sault Ste. Marie had not been operated except part time for probably the past three or four years; I think during the years 1932 and 1933 not more than three months. They had a considerable quantity of raw material, iron ore and coal and limestone, as outlined in the order in council. As stated by the Prime Minister, they were in the hands of receivers. The bank was not anxious to advance money to enable this raw material to be manufactured into steel rails, and so the government were approached. As a matter of fact they were approached by representatives of the city of Sault Ste. Marie, not by the company. They were asked if they would guarantee a sufficient portion of the cost of manufacturing these rails to take care of the wages of the men and the cost of such raw material as it might be necessary to purchase. It was done as an unemployment relief proposition entirely. Sault Ste. Marie, as my hon. friend probably knows, has a population of about 23,000 or 24,000 people, 75 per cent of whom are dependent, either directly or indirectly, on the operation of that steel mill for their living. Over 2,000 men are ordinarily employed in the mill. The great majority of these men have been living there for many years. Many of them had their own homes, some of them not entirely paid for. As a result of the mill not operating at all steadily during the past few years these men were unable to find work, unable to provide for their families, and many of them were on relief. As stated in the letter from Mr. Franz, there were some 1,552 families receiving direct relief in the Soo last summer. It was stated by the relief committee, as well as by the mayor, that that number would be undoubtedly increased to much over 2,000 families unless work were provided. After the arrangement was made and the mill put in operation about three months employment was given in the rolling of the rails and approximately another month in getting the mills in shape for operation. This meant about four months of operation, at about $150,000 per month in wages. In other words at least $500,000 was distributed in wages as a result of the order, and instead of there being 1,552 families on relief, as there were last summer, the number fell to something like 640. The saving in direct relief, estimating 1,000 families for four months at $25 per month per family, would be about $100,000. Even if the government had to pay the interest on this guarantee for a period of three years it would not amount to as much as the saving in relief, but I do not expect that the government will have to pay interest for anything like that period of time because, as the Prime Minister has stated, already delivery has been taken of a portion of the rails. When the Canadian National take delivery they pay for the rails; the money is deposited in the bank and to that extent the guarantee of the government is reduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Can the hon. member tell me what quantity has been delivered to the Canadian National?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): I do not know the exact tonnage that is carried on a railway car, but eighty carloads have been shipped.

Mr. POWER: To what point in the country did they go?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): My information is that they went to western Ontario, in the vicinity of London, where the Canadian National have need of replacements.

Mr. POWER: I have been given to understand lately that, because of the pooling arrangements that have been made, a great many railway lines are being given up. If I did not misunderstand the statement made by Judge Fullerton only a few days ago, on some of these lines the pooling will be permanent, so I suppose eventually the rails in use will be torn up. I am therefore asking myself the reason for the urgent need of rolling more rails at this particular time and particularly of charging the Canadian National with them, when in some districts, such as my own, the Canadian National rails are being abandoned altogether. According to my recollection of the deliberations of the railway committee for the past few years, these rails are good; in fact they are practically new. I stand to be corrected, but it seems to me that on several occasions the late Sir Henry Thornton stated that one of his great problems was to replace the sixty pound rails with rails weighing eighty pounds and up to one hundred pounds, but that he had carried out that replacement to a considerable extent throughout Canada, and in fact the operation was almost complete. If that were so I fail to see, with all due respect to my hon. friend from West Algoma, and without in any way criticizing him for having endeavoured to do his best to provide employment for the unemployed in his constituency by reopening a mill which had been abandoned for three or four years—

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): Not abandoned.

Mr. POWER: Well, a mill which had been in the hands of a receiver and had not been operating for three or four years. I rather fail to see the justification for the government guaranteeing a transaction such as this and forcing the rails on the Canadian National, which, as I remember it from last year, was to be kept entirely free from political influence, either sectional or local. That was why we appointed all these trustees. I remember at that time pointing out to the members of this house that the difficulty under which the Canadian National had laboured in the past had not been due to petty political pressure but had been due to large demands from large sections or provinces, and that there was nothing to prevent the Canadian National trustees from submitting to such sectional pressure, that nothing in the act we passed last year could bring about that result. Of course I was told that the views I then expressed were altogether without foundation, but now we find that we have unloaded on the Canadian National fifty thousand tons of rails from Nova Scotia and thirty thousand tons of rails from the Algoma Steel Company. I fail to see what justification exists for these orders in council from the standpoint of looking after our greatest problem, namely the Canadian National Railways, and I should be glad to have that explained to me.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Coming from the city of Sydney and having a fairly intimate knowledge of this transaction I want to say that nothing this government has done can be justified quite as easily as the action taken in this connection. There is no doubt at all, as every person who uses the Canadian National knows, that rails must be replaced. There is need of replacements in the eastern section now, and it was simply a matter of justice and good business for this government to agree to guarantee the payment to the banks of the money which was advanced to supply those rails. The effect of these orders has been to transport a large section of the industrial east from the depths of despair to a fair measure of prosperity at the present time. The steel company at Sydney was not operating; true, the fires had not been put out but it was just lingering on. Delegations not only from the steel company but composed of representative men from all parts of the county of Cape Breton came here and laid their case before the government, showing them that the rails were needed and what would be the effect of such an order. The result, so far as the city of Sydney is concerned, where we had fifty per cent of the people on relief, was to take at least seventy per cent of those people off relief, and these rail orders have also affected the production of coal, with the result that to-day our mines in Cape Breton are being operated to a greater extent, considering the time of year, than has been the case during the past ten years. The steel company is employing perhaps seventy per cent of the men it formerly employed, and in the city of Sydney relief distribution has fallen to perhaps twenty-five or thirty per cent of what it was three years ago. I would suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that when they discuss a matter such as this they do so having in mind the Canadian point of view.

Mr. POWER: The Canadian National point of view.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Simply because these rails come from one or two parts of Canada is no indication that there is not equally as great an effect upon the western portion of our country. This is one country, and the lines separating the provinces are purely imaginary. If the province of Alberta prospers, the province of Nova Scotia prospers, and vice versa. I have no desire to criticize the managements of the Canadian National Railways who held office in days gone by. It is true, as one railway man has said, that they spent money like drunken sailors. We are now suffering for it. But if the fact remains that the Canadian National Railways must in a certain number of years have their rails relaid I say that the mills in Canada should be allowed to furnish them. Because of this increased work relief which would otherwise be necessary is rendered unnecessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask a question regarding the guarantees. What number of tons of steel were actually delivered to the Canadian National Railways first, from the fifty thousand tons ordered from the Dominion Steel Works, and secondly from the thirty thousand tons to be delivered by the Algoma Steel Corporation?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member will realize that this is not information the government receives. The accounts we had to pay with respect to interest were entirely outside the question of deliveries, and I am not in a position to give information as to the quantities delivered. I do know, however—and when I say I know I should add that I have been informed—that a part of the Soo order has been placed on track.

I should like to say this: I cannot think that any good purpose is being served—with one exception and if that is the purpose I am perfectly willing that the discussion should continue, namely, that of prolonging the discussion—by dealing with matters in a discussion of this bill in the way we have been dealing with them this afternoon. To assert that we were endeavouring to force rails upon the Canadian National Railways is, in my judgment, rather—shall I say—insulting to the intelligence of the committee.

Mr. POWER: I don't mind what the right hon. gentleman says; go ahead; shoot.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall not reply to the hon. member in kind; I think perhaps he can deal with his own condition. But I do desire to say this, that the trustees were not appointed until January of this year, and that these transactions were those of last year. The transaction supplying rails to the Canadian National Railways was one carried on between the railway company and the mills. But the mills could not carry on, so far as the financial position was concerned, without assistance from the government in the manner indicated. To suggest that this government was endeavouring to force the Canadian National Railways to buy rails at the "Soo" when it has already put into track something like 2,500 tons of them is not, I suggest, quite what should be said with respect to a matter of this kind. Everyone who is familiar with modern railroading knows that the heavy engines used on both railroads in Canada have necessitated the relaying of track. The old 60-pound steel has been changed not only to 80-pound, but to 105-pound sections. And the old 56-pound rail, which was laid on the Canadian Pacific railway when I went west, was a rail produced by Krupps in Germany and by the Barrow firm. I believe there is not now between Vancouver and Montreal a single rail on the main line which does not bear the name of a Canadian mill. Of course on the American end of the Canadian National Railways' line to Chicago, Canadian rails are not laid. Heavy rails put in place in consequence of heavy motive power have cost a great deal of money, and the lighter weight rails have been taken out of track and put into branch lines.

I understand—and I want to be very careful about this because I am not definitely informed—but I understand that the 2,500 tons of rails which have already left the "Soo" have been put in the London section of the Canadian National Railways which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is on the main line to Chicago, a line on which heavy motive power has been used necessitating a rail section much heavier than the old rails before used. I do assure the committee that no effort was made to induce the Canadian National Railways, as a matter of politics or otherwise, to order rails they did not want. The answer is that if in March of 1934, 2,500 tons had been taken out for the purpose of placing in tracks, one will readily realize that the rails were needed. For instance, to my knowledge, from a statement made by one of the officials, the "Soo" mills are now continuing to roll rails for the Canadian Pacific Railway, which also requires replacements. Those who are familiar with the strain upon rails brought about by modern highspeed trains, and the efforts which have been made to secure rails which will withstand the tremendous pressure of high speed and heavy loads, will know that the railway companies are always, shall I say hungry, for new rails. The only question is that of holding them down, so far as possible from spending unnecessarily in rail purchases.

If there is anything in this transaction which should not have been done I should like to know what it is. I was here when at least one contract was completed, and I know of nothing that any business man would not have done. As a matter of fact the transaction saved money. To be perfectly frank about it, that is the fact: It saved us money. In other words the interest we pay was less than the sum we would have been obligated to pay under direct relief measures for the community in question. The prices paid for rails were the standard prices prevailing at that time. I think that if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look up rail prices he will find there was no addition to the ordinary prices for rails of a similar type.

Mr. POWER: I shall not endeavour to follow the right hon. gentleman in a discussion of his dissertation of an hour's duration. He has indicated that my few questions on a matter of public importance, namely, as to why the country had undertaken to guarantee large sums of money, were more or less insulting to the intelligence of the committee. That, I think, is a matter which should be left to the judgment of the committee.

The point is this: Here are certain orders for rails. If the Canadian National Railways needed rails they could give their order to any Tom, Dick or Harry who could go to the rail market and have them rolled. I doubt very much whether there was any necessity for a government guarantee. The point I make is as to whether or not there was any necessity for a guarantee.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): How many rail mills are there in Canada?

Mr. POWER: Probably two. I have no doubt, however, that if the Canadian National Railways, without any governmental intervention, had given an order for rails, either of the steel companies mentioned would have been only too glad to accept. I am under the impression that for many years the Dominion Iron and Steel Company did business with the national railways.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation could not finance the rails.

Mr. POWER: I understand an order was given to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation by the Canadian National Railways before the government guaranteed payment. I may be wrong in that statement but I am subject to correction. As I understand it, there were two orders and in the case of one of them I cannot understand why the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation could not finance an order for twenty, thirty or forty thousand tons of rails. It seems to me that any bank would be only too glad to finance an order from the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Unfortunately the banks refused to do it.

Mr. POWER: In the case of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, apparently the order was completed before the government intervened. The order in council reads:

> That in order to assist in the relief of the existing unemployment situation in Nova Scotia, an arrangement was made under date of May 25, 1932, with the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Limited, to manufacture steel rails amounting to 15,000 gross tons at $46 per ton, to be delivered d.o.b. cars at Sydney on cars March 1, 1933.

My information is—I am subject to correction—that that order in council was not passed until June, 1933, three months after the order was supposed to be completed. A moment ago the minister stated that the order in council was number P.C. 1076, dated June 2, 1933, for $1,100,000. The work on this order was commenced on May 25, 1932, and apparently delivery was made sometime in March, 1933, prior to the guarantee. If the company were able to pay their men and purchase their ore from a foreign country in both cases, they must have been in funds or have received assistance from someone. If the Canadian National Railways really needed the rails it seems to me that there would have been no difficulty in the railway company financing the order instead of the government giving a guarantee. It is for these reasons that I am making my inquiries this afternoon.

[Mr. T. E. Simpson.]

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the difficulty of the hon. gentleman can be explained. He has not allowed for the fact that the rolling mills were not in a position financially to carry a loan from the banks until such time as delivery was to be made. In other words, the delivery was enlarged far beyond the period of time that it is usual for the purpose of getting money. I do not think it is necessary to go into the financial position of the companies. One of them was in the hands of receivers and the banks had advanced all that they cared to advance. I suggested that they might get a further advance on receivers' certificates but that was found not to be practicable. The order in council was passed in the form in which it is because the advances made by the banks were quite substantial and they were thus able to know that the money advanced for wages would be repaid.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that the ore was purchased in a foreign country. The fact is that there was on hand a substantial quantity of ore, limestone, and the other commodities which go into the production of steel. This applied both to the company at Sault Ste. Marie and the one at Sydney, although the position at Sydney was not perhaps just the same as at Sault Ste. Marie. I do not think I am discussing the private business of the company when I say that the banks felt that under the then existing economic conditions they had advanced all the money that they should advance. If they were going to make payments against the production of rails which would not be paid for immediately, during the time between the completion of production and the time the rails were taken by the purchasers to put on the track they would find themselves with substantial moneys locked up under conditions with which they did not care to deal. Hence it is that this arrangement was made.

As far as the forcing of rails on the Canadian National Railways is concerned, I appeal to any hon. gentleman who has sat on the committee to state if he has not found that the difficulty is to prevent rails being required by the railway. The flattening out of rails by the heavy high speed steel trains and motive power has necessitated the laying of new rails, and all members who have sat on the select committee—I observe one of them in front of me now—will realize that what I say is correct. The general manager and president of the railway has always stated that he is compelled to put in heavy rails, not because he wants to but because he could not prevent it.

The reason this guarantee was given was the lapse of time between the date of the completion of the order and the uncertainty as to when the railway company would take possession of the rails to put them on the track. They required financial assistance and it was given to them in this manner.

Mr. POWER: The financial assistance was not really necessary in order to permit them to begin operations. From the statement of the Prime Minister I understand that both companies had large quantities of raw materials on hand. With an order in their possession and large stocks of raw materials on hand there would be a strong argument against the necessity of a guarantee. I have sat on the special committee ever since it has been inaugurated—I sat on that committee even before the right hon. gentleman came into the house—and I know as well as the Prime Minister that there has always been a demand for rails. But I know also that there has been a preaching in this house and throughout the country day in and day out for the cutting to the bone of expenditures on the Canadian National Railways. I know also that lines are being abandoned right and left, trains are being pooled, and men are being thrown out of work. We are told we must not put too much pressure on the Canadian National Railways, and it seems incomprehensible that we should order rails in advance. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, the government is to pay interest during the time which elapses from the completion of the contract and the time the rails are taken by the company. In one order in council arrangement is made for the payment of $13,000 in interest and in the other there is an arrangement between the corporation and the bank. Order in council, P.C. 1285, which deals with the Algoma Steel Corporation, reads:

> That the corporation and the said bank will give to the dominion government such assurances as may be requisite to provide that fifty per cent of the rails manufactured under the terms of this proposal shall be earmarked and held as security against advances made under the dominion's guarantee to the bank and upon payment being made for the said rails by the railway company, in whole or in part, the money paid therefor to the bank by the railway company shall effectually release the dominion government from the guarantee to the extent of such payment.

So that there was a kind of joint arrangement there, as I understand it. I do not intend to proceed very much further with the matter; I simply want to make myself clear. I think I am within my rights in inquiring into the reasons which brought about the guaranteeing of such large sums to the banks, who have been stating in the public press and elsewhere that they had any amount of money to lend to good borrowers, and I know of no better borrower than a man who has a government order in his pocket; I have never heard of any better borrower anywhere throughout the country. It has been almost an axiom that a person who had an order from the government could go to any bank and, by transferring the order, obtain the money to carry it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I asked the Prime Minister a sensible question in regard to the amount that had already been delivered to the Canadian National Railways, of the order of 50,000 tons in one instance and 30,000 in the other. That question I think has a distinct bearing on the actual necessity for meeting the demands made by the railway company, and this committee is only doing its duty when it inquires into the matter. We have here $111,000,000 which this government has guaranteed under the relief legislation. The select standing committee on banking and commerce has already been investigating two of these major items, one the $60,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the guarantees to Canadian Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited. In addition, there are some provincial guarantees. There is a guarantee of over $15,000,000 to Beauharnois.

Mr. BENNETT: Half of the recent issue made the other day goes to reduce that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was going to ask about that. The next two major guarantees are $1,100,000 to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation and $660,000 to the Algoma Steel Corporation for the production, respectively, of 50,000 and 30,000 tons. Surely this committee is entitled to know the exact situation in regard to each of these guarantees, and I suggest that if the information is not available in detail, the railway committee during the present session could find out how many tons of these steel rails have been delivered in each case—that is, from the Dominion Steel in Nova Scotia and from the Algoma company. Next, we should like to know what requests were made by the Canadian National Railways as to their requirements for steel rails and, further, whether these rails are required immediately by the Canadian National system. We are entitled to that information, and it seems to me that the right hon. gentleman took an improper course in trying to castigate my colleague and, inferentially, the whole committee, for asking sensible questions in the public interest. I repeat, we are entitled to know, and if we cannot get the information now we can get it later on. In the first place, how much has been delivered by the Nova Scotia company?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: All.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is the first time we have received a reply to that part of the question. In the second place, how much has been delivered by the Algoma company to the Canadian National Railways? Further, following what has been said by my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), I should like to know how much of the proportion of the rail tonnage delivered to the Canadian National by the Nova Scotia company has already been used by the railways up to the present time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I cannot answer that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The committee should have that information, because we want to know what necessity there is for the company utilizing these rails at the present time, or whether the rails were ordered in advance by the Canadian National Railways. My colleague pointed out the stringency that has prevailed throughout the country and the unemployment condition which has necessitated the introduction of the bill now before the committee, and if very substantial orders have been given for steel rails in advance of actual requirements—I do not know whether that is so—then I suggest very seriously that it is a question that merits investigation by the railway committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not in any sense object to furnishing such information as the government had, but I did say to the hon. gentleman, and I think he must have heard me, that the government had no information as to the extent to which the rails had been used. I tried to make that abundantly clear. In addition to that, I have only to say that the whole transaction was based upon the assumption that the rails were not immediately required. I said so very early this afternoon, and that is the reason the government entered into the transaction at all. Because of the fact that the rails were to be used in the future and that the company producing them had to make immediate payments, and inasmuch as it would not be paid for until some time in the future, they would not be reimbursed unless they got the money from the banks for the sums necessarily expended for production of the rails. The extract read with respect to a portion of the rails referred to the fact that the bank had the security of the raw material, that is, the ore and the limestone, and when the ore and limestone became steel the bank wanted to make it perfectly clear that they did not thereby, in the finished product, lose the lien they had under the Bank Act with respect to the raw material. That is a commonplace with those of us who practise law; it is provided for in the Bank Act itself.

The government has not from day to day asked the extent to which rails have been delivered. I cannot say to-day whether at the Sault they have delivered 2,500 or 2,600 tons, nor where they have delivered them. My colleague from Inverness intimates that delivery has been taken of the whole of the production at Sydney. I was not aware of that fact myself. The extent to which the rails are delivered will of course vary from day to day while delivery is being taken. The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Simpson) pointed out that a trainload of some eighty cars of rails had, he understood, gone to the London division. That I estimate would be between 2,500 and 3,000 tons of rails—he informs me that about 4,000 tons have been taken. I suppose the amount changes. I should like to impress once more upon the committee the fact that all that was involved in the transaction was a guarantee to enable the producers of the rails to finance a transaction for which they would not be paid until the future. That is the story.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we have had a very interesting discussion on a most important subject, not only this afternoon but during the last few days. I have been trying to make up my mind as to exactly what action I should take with regard to the very large guarantees that have been given for the different purposes outlined in the memorandum I have before me and representing the sum of $96,582,000. There is an old saying in Scotland that there should be no step bairns in the family, which means that everyone should be treated alike, and for the moment I am not complaining seriously either about the guarantee to the Algoma company or about the guarantee to the Dominion Steel and Coal company. I am not clear as to whether these guarantees were necessary in the interests either of the country or of the people living in the different districts concerned. With regard to the Dominion Steel and Coal company however I think I am right in saying that two orders were given. One order was given direct by the Canadian National Railways to the company, and no question of having the amount guaranteed by the government was considered either when the order was given or for some time after. I do not know how good the Prime Minister's memory is, but if he will tax it he will recall, as I am sure my hon. friend from Cape Breton South will, the circumstances under which the second order was given. It was given, if I remember aright, some time either in May or June, 1933.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On the eve of an election.

Mr. DUFF: We do not do things like that in Nova Scotia. Perhaps my hon. friend from Cape Breton South had something to do with the premier of Nova Scotia at that time in getting that order. There is no doubt that the Canadian National Railways did not then need the rails; there was no demand on their part for this order and while I say to my hon. friend that it is quite possible and no doubt was possible that by the giving of this order many people in the city and vicinity of Sydney benefited, nevertheless there is no question in my mind that there was another motive in giving the second order and guaranteeing the amounts of both orders, and that was the forthcoming election in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What about the steel workers who were out of work and starving there?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend did not quite catch all I said; perhaps my voice did not carry. I said that the steel workers did benefit by the order and I am not complaining very much about that. All I am saying is that the second order and the guarantee of both orders were done only when the Nova Scotia government was in extremis and it was necessary to give an order to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation so that the premier of Nova Scotia might be elected at that time in his own constituency.

In view of the fact that this government has guaranteed $1,100,000 to the banks for the cost of these rails manufactured by the Dominion Steel and Coal Company; in view of the fact that the government has guaranteed $660,000 to the Algoma Steel Company, and in view of the further fact that another railway enters into these guarantees —and I am not complaining very much about that; all I want is fair play and I hope the hon. member for Inverness, the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Cumberland before we get through will see that fair play is given.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Fair play for the steel workers.

Mr. DUFF: And also for other people whom I will mention in a moment.

In addition to those two amounts I have stated, another railway enters into this guarantee to the extent of not $1,100,000 for the steel workers in Sydney or $660,000 for the steel workers in Algoma, but $60,000,000. Again I say that at the moment I am not quite clear whether I should very strenuously object to this. The Prime Minister and his colleagues must have known the importance of the matter and I suppose they gave it very serious consideration before giving those guarantees to the banks.

Let me, however, go a little further. For instance, Manitoba gets a guarantee of $12,000,000 and Beauharnois one of $15,000,000. Hon. members will remember all the fuss we had in the house about Beauharnois, yet this government, after hon. members sitting opposite had made all that fuss, guaranteed $15,000,000 of the credit of the country to that terrible Beauharnois corporation.

Let me go a little further. The government are not even satisfied with guaranteeing money in Canada; they go outside the country. I am glad, of course, they went to my native land when they did so to make guarantees on the credit of Canada. They guaranteed the Newfoundland government the tidy sum of $625,000. Good, splendid business, no doubt, but nevertheless that large sum was guaranteed.

Let me go a little further. British Columbia gets a guarantee of $626,000; Manitoba one of nearly $6,000,000, and I notice included among these guarantees is an amount of $15,000,000, the heading being:

> Prime Minister's estimate of maximum amount of guarantee given chartered banks for advances to Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited.

My information is that this $15,000,000 is the estimate of loss at the moment on this transaction and not the guarantee to the banks at all. My information is that instead of $15,000,000, the banks have been guaranteed nearly $150,000,000 in connection with this transaction in each of the last four years.

In this country there are people other than steel workers and farmers. There are fishermen who are just as important as other people. What has the government done for our fishermen in the last three or four years? It is quite true that several delegations came to Ottawa in order to save the industry, but did the Prime Minister give a guarantee of $60,000,000 to the fishermen? Did he guarantee the banks on their behalf? Oh, no. He could guarantee the western farmers or give them advances and take notes from them for binder twine, seed grain and everything else, but when the fishermen of Nova Scotia came here and wanted a small pittance to save a great industry, this government turned them down flat.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What is the attitude of the hon. member on the beam trawler question?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend knows my attitude on the beam trawler question.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Nobody does.

Mr. DUFF: He cannot draw a red herring across the trail. In spite of the fact that delegations from the great province of Nova Scotia came here in order to save an industry which is now practically on its last legs—and I doubt if it will ever recover—this government turned them down flat. In spite of the fact that at that time they were guaranteeing $60,000,000, $10,000,000 and $150,000,000 to the railways, wheat pools and so on, the government did not give the fishermen one dollar. This clause in this bill, entitled an act respecting relief measures, gives the government power to guarantee or advance moneys for certain purposes. I am not going to ask for $1,000,000 or $100,000, but I have on my desk a telegram from the mayor of Canso. My hon. friends opposite from Nova Scotia know what a prosperous town and community was Canso five or six years ago and they know perhaps nearly as well as I do the deplorable condition in which that town has been in the last year or two.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: As a result of Liberal policy.

Mr. DUFF: I hear my hon. friend interject "As a result of Liberal policy." I am not discussing politics at all and I have tried to keep away from it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. DUFF: I hope my reference to the fact that the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation was given an order on the eve of an election does not lead my hon. friends to believe that I was talking politics. As, however, I said a moment ago, no matter who is to blame for the situation in Canso, it may be the beam trawler as my hon. friend suggests—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Is it?

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. DUFF: I am not saying it is; I say it may be. Probably the Prime Minister would like to get through by six o'clock, without entering on a discussion of steam trawlers. May I say that there is a deplorable condition existing in this town and vicinity, which is purely a fishing section of the province of Nova Scotia. I have a telegram from the mayor of Canso in which he says:

> Owing to present adverse condition majority of fishermen in Canso are unable to equip themselves for fishing. Therefore this council—

Meaning the town council.

> —urges the federal government under the proposed marketing and credit legislation to establish a fund of not less than—

You will be surprised when I mention the small amount.

> —$15,000 to be applied immediately through a system of loans to bona fide fishermen in Canso for the purchase and equipment of boats and fishing gear. As season is about to open immediate action is imperative. In this manner only can our fishermen once more become self-supporting.

I say to the Prime Minister that this matter can be very easily handled, especially in view of the fact that his government has been guaranteeing such large amounts to different institutions in this country. The matter can be handled in exactly the same way as were the amounts given for binder twine and seed grain. All the Prime Minister has to do is to tell the general manager of the Bank of Montreal—I mention the Bank of Montreal because they are the only bank having an agency in Canso—to-morrow morning that his government will guarantee $15,000 for the fishermen of Canso to buy equipment for their boats, and fishing gear. I am sure every fisherman will be glad to sign a note for the amount he requires. I am sorry to say that the financial position of the town of Canso is such that it cannot guarantee the bank. That is all the Prime Minister has to do, and he has done it before; there is a precedent for it. As he said in his remarks a short time ago when stating the reason he gave the guarantee for the Algoma Steel Corporation and the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, it is not only a matter of the employment directly given to the men in the rail mills; the money which comes into circulation from the rolling of these rails is spread over perhaps the whole of Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia and the locality in which the mill is situated, and goes into the manufacturing centres as well. The Prime Minister knows enough about the fishing business to know that if the small sum of $15,000 is guaranteed by his government to the Bank of Montreal, hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of fish will be caught by the fishermen of Nova Scotia, with the result that these people and their families will be able to live during the summer, and a great many other people all over Nova Scotia, wholesale grocers, hardware men and manufacturers of all kinds of material, will benefit thereby. Therefore in view of the fact that this precedent has been established, that hundreds of millions have been guaranteed to different industries, I strongly recommend that this plea of mine for the fishermen of Canso be dealt with immediately so that these men can get their boats and gear ready to start fishing some time this month.

Mr. BENNETT: The non-political observations of the gallant admiral have filled us all with admiration, and I have extracted a modicum of enjoyment from them, as I usually do. The difficulty I see is this: I would suggest to him the desirability of having his fishermen friends communicate with the government and not with him. I merely suggest that.

Mr. DUFF: I happen to be the member for Antigonish-Guysborough, and that is why they communicate with me.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I would suggest that they communicate with the government.

Mr. DUFF: They might be turned down.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that they let the Prime Minister know about it. They have chosen a most unfortunate medium of communication.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not shown that perspicuity which is the usual characteristic of fishermen as I know them. Having selected the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough to whom to send the telegram they apparently did not attach much importance to it, or they would have sent it to someone who had power to deal with it. I would suggest that it is desirable that they send a telegram either to the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister or communicate with the premier of their province. I always held in high regard the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I have read of Capton Kettle and of the exploits of many of the distinguished figures of fiction and of history, but I have never found anything that excelled the stories I have listened to from the hon. gentleman. But this afternoon he seems to have exceeded anything he ever tried before, because he has communicated to us that he has been the chosen, the elect of the fishermen themselves to present their claim at the bar of the House of Commons—where there is not one—for the purpose of making known their immediate wants. Now just let me say this: if the province of Nova Scotia will deal with the fishing difficulty exactly as Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba dealt with their difficulties, namely start with the unit, that is with themselves, and from that to the provincial government, and have the provincial government ask the dominion government if they will assist them in discharging this very pleasant avocation, the most serious consideration will be given by this government to every suggestion that may be made in that regard. But that can be done only when we have the power to do it, and at present we have not any such power. Some ten days ago the power lapsed, and until such time as this parliament again confers the power we shall not be able to help the fishermen of Canso either through the government at Halifax or otherwise.

I do not desire to traverse the ground that has been so fully covered on previous occasions as to all these guarantees. I suppose one will have to discuss them many times hereafter and give explanations many, many times, but I think I can summarize all I have to say in a single sentence—

Mr. BROWN: Oh, no, no!

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to note that my hon. friend from Lisgar is so pleased to listen to me that he hopes I shall not limit my statement to a single sentence. His anxiety to be instructed is so great and his craving for knowledge so sincere that I shall endeavour to satisfy that want which is always so apparent. May I merely indicate this, that if in the national interest the executive of the day decides to take certain action I do not think it serves any useful purpose to suggest that their motives are improper, because peradventure they have as high a conception of their duty as those who criticize them. If in the discharge of their duties they make mistakes, all people make mistakes, they are fallible; but they exercise their judgment to the best of their ability in the national interest and while they are here they will continue to do so. If the province of Nova Scotia in consequence of representations made to it by the fishermen of Canso request this government to deal with the fishermen of Canso as it dealt with those who required binder twine or seed grain or any other assistance, it will receive exactly the same measure of consideration as was dealt out to those others. In the meantime I only hope the hon. gentleman will now give evidence of the faith that is in him by enabling us to get this legislation one step further advanced for that purpose.

Mr. DUFF: I am sure we have listened with interest to the jocular remarks of the Prime Minister on this very important and serious subject concerning the fishermen of Canso, and when the fishermen of Canso read of it in the Halifax papers or in their own paper to-morrow evening they will appreciate the way in which the Prime Minister has handled this question as presented by me. It may be true, of course, that I am an unfortunate medium through which to present this request to the government, but I may say that I received the telegram only to-day. I have not kept it in a pigeon hole; I have not been discourteous even to the government, and it was only after I received the telegram this morning that I realized that I would have an opportunity to-day to lay this matter before not only the Prime Minister, who likes to deal with these big questions himself, and his cabinet, but also before parliament. I consider, sir, that I have done only my plain duty this afternoon in reading this telegram from the mayor of Canso and taking up this matter with the government.

A few moments ago the right hon. gentleman spoke of insulting the intelligence of this committee. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman that he has insulted not only the intelligence of this committee but also my constituents in the town of Canso, and I resent it very much. I may be an unfortunate medium, as I said before, but there are several other unfortunate mediums in this house. I refer to my hon. friend from Cape Breton South. He was unfortunate, of course, in having to come to the Prime Minister to ask for help for his constituents, but from the guarantees which the government gave the different banks in and around Sydney it would seem to be proved conclusively that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister dealt with the matter, so far as the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation was concerned, from a political point of view, and he is trying to deal with the matter I am bringing up this afternoon in the same way. The same thing applies to the chief whip of the Conservative party, the hon. member for West Algoma; he was also an unfortunate medium, but he had better luck. It may be all right for the Prime Minister to say that this matter should be taken up by the provincial government; let me say that the provincial government is doing something already, not directly for the fishermen of Canso but for the fishing industry in the town of Canso. I can say also, without boasting, that in order to help along the fishermen of Canso I purchased 1,200,000 pounds of fish in 1932 which I did not need and almost 1,000,000 pounds in 1933. I did not make a dollar on that fish; I bought it in order to help out the fishermen.

Mr. POWER: No guarantee?

Mr. DUFF: With no guarantee at all, and I got the money from the Bank of Montreal without even an endorsement. Now I say, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion it is not quite fair for the Prime Minister to say he is going to wait until the provincial government approaches him in connection with this matter. Surely he did not wait for the provincial government to approach him when he gave a guarantee for $60,000,000 in connection with the Canadian Pacific. In a number of other instances he did not wait for the provincial governments to approach him, so why should he wait when I lay this matter before the government, the committee and the house? Therefore I say he is only putting off this matter. It is important to the people in my constituency but it is only a small matter to the government; it amounts only to a guarantee of $15,000, and in my opinion before the snow flies next fall the fishermen of Canso will have paid this money back. My suggestion is that notes be taken for the amount and placed in the Bank of Montreal, and all the government would have to do would be to guarantee that amount.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: How about the fishermen in Nova Scotia generally?

Mr. DUFF: I thought perhaps my hon. friend from Inverness would speak, and I did not want to butt into his territory; I thought he would want to talk about his own fishermen. I thought the hon. member for Cumberland would want to say something, and that the hon. member for Cape Breton South would advocate the condition of his fishermen when he was talking about the steel company. I am sure my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg will back me up in what I say, because he was a member of the delegation which waited upon this government two years ago asking for some assistance, which request was turned down. My hon. friend knows the condition of that great fleet which operated out of Lunenburg county ten or fifteen years ago. It is a shame and a disgrace that, because of the lack of a few dollars or a small guarantee a few years ago, this great fleet has been reduced from one hundred and fifty to twenty-five sail. I say this is no time for delay. This is a serious matter. These men want to get to work, to earn some money for their wives and children, and I say to my right hon. friend: Never mind the red tape; cut the red tape, and arrange with the bank that the $15,000 or whatever is necessary may be forthcoming to those fishermen so they may earn their living.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust the hon. gentleman knows that this government has no power to give a guarantee. That power lapsed at midnight on March 31.

Mr. HANBURY: That is a quibble.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a quibble, and I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark. That is the fact; we have no power to give a guarantee for a five dollar bill.

Mr. VENIOT: You will have, when this bill goes through.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUFF: Will you give a guarantee then, please?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I will answer that too. The hon. member for West Lambton very properly pointed out that there has been withdrawn from the bill the power to make guarantees to private enterprises, and no such power is conferred upon this government with respect to any body except a province. When this bill is enacted and the provincial legislature asks for such a guarantee, it may become the subject matter of the terms of an agreement, just as binder twine and seed grain are dealt with in the western provinces. The government does not guarantee seed grain for the farmer, nor does it guarantee him in connection with binder twine, directly. This is what it does: it deals with the province that passes the legislation. The words to which I have referred were taken out of this statute this year because of the criticism offered with respect to them. To-night there is no power in the executive government of Canada to give a guarantee to the Bank of Montreal or any other bank for $15,000 or for any other sum with respect to fishermen or anyone else except through a provincial government.

Mr. NEILL: I have much pleasure in supporting the plea presented by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough on behalf of those fishermen who have suffered the loss of their gear. In doing so I am heaping coals of fire upon his head, because I remember the attitude of the Nova Scotians a few days ago when I was pleading for a fair deal for the British Columbia fishermen in the allocation of a certain grant.

The Prime Minister has said, and quite properly, that at the present moment he has no funds and no authority with which to make this grant, but I suggest that he has a place from which he can get the necessary funds; I refer to the amount of $160,000 already voted for the development of deep sea fisheries in Canada. That is a sum which is voted every year, and it is available now.

Mr. BENNETT: Only two-twelfths of that sum is available, and that is for the maritime provinces.

Mr. NEILL: This matter is in the maritimes and the Prime Minister can use the two-twelfths available. While I am not good at mental arithmetic I think two-twelfths of $160,000 would more than provide the amount for which my hon. friend is asking. I make this further point, because it may be said by hon. members from Nova Scotia that this money should be spent as it has been spent in the past, in miserable little handouts of a dollar a ton to this boat or $2.75 to that fisherman. Several reports have been made in connection with the maritime fishermen; in fact they get altogether too much attention as compared to those in British Columbia. The last report, I think, was made by a firm called Cockfield, Brown and Company, or some such name, and if I remember rightly it cost the government of Canada $10,000, which was about $9,000 more than it was worth. One of the recommendations it contained was that this $160,000 granted annually, which has been frittered away in the manner I have just indicated, as they admitted, should be used in a way more calculated to promote the interests of the fishermen. Here is a case where that money could be profitably used; the Prime Minister says he has not the money and has not the authority to guarantee it, but under that act of 1882 he has the authority, the power and the cash available to-day. By using it in this way he would be doing some real, practical good to the fishermen of Nova Scotia—I am asking for nothing for the fishermen of British Columbia at the moment—instead of having the money frittered away as it has been in the past.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge whatever of the merits of the question which has been brought up by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, but after listening to the Prime Minister reply to the request of the hon. member I venture to say that he has made statements, when he reads them to-morrow in Hansard, he will very much regret.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you.

Mr. EULER: Surely he has not laid down this principle—if one may so describe that which he has said to-day—that the member for a constituency has no right to make representations in parliament and to the Prime Minister as to the grievances of his constituents.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not make any such statement.

Mr. EULER: I gathered that, most distinctly.

Mr. BENNETT: You usually do gather distinctly, but that is not what I said.

Mr. EULER: I did not interrupt my right hon. friend. If I am wrong I am ready to receive any explanation he may wish to make. But I have this impression of what the Prime Minister said in reply to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, namely that he was the unfortunate selection—unhappy medium if you like—to represent the views of his constituents.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. EULER: And, if no one else does it, I wish to protest against the idea that any hon. member of this House of Commons cannot make any representation he may wish, at any time, with regard to his constituents. If I have misinterpreted what the Prime Minister said, I should like to have his explanation.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only does the hon. member entirely misinterpret what I said, but if he will take the trouble to read in Hansard what I said, he will find that what I said I shall be glad to repeat.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I associate myself with the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough in connection with his request for the fishermen in his constituency. I did not receive any telegram, myself, from the people in my district asking for assistance or support. I, also, may be the unhappy intermediary or medium to lay requests at the door of the government. I do know however that I have had occasion now and then to lay requests before the government for certain public works to be done in my county, and that those requests have on some occasions been turned down apparently on account of the fact that I was asking for far too much. I feel, as does the hon. member for North Waterloo, that one cannot but be a little apprehensive of the remarks which have been made by the Prime Minister; he left the impression that when hon. members on this side of the house make representations or ask for something from the government they are going to be told that they are unhappy mediums, in a representative capacity, and not the proper people to bring requests to the floor of this parliament from the constituents who elected them to act as their representatives, and to deal with the matters appertaining to their respective counties or districts.

There is another matter I should like to stress. I know that certain requests were to be made to this government and petitions to be signed. Apparently a certain man in my constituency was to be in charge of the patronage, and a petition was sent to him for presentation to the government. I was asked to sign it, and refused to do so for the simple reason, as described by the hon. members for North Waterloo and Antigonish-Guysborough, that the elected member of the House of Commons, whether he be on the opposition side, the government side, or belong to an independent group, is as much a member as is any other member in the house, and is entitled, when he receives a request, to lay it before the government, before hon. members in the house, before the whole country, before any minister of the crown or any other government official.

Mr. McINTOSH: And also ask any question he may wish.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, and ask any question pertaining to a matter before the house. I did not continue the discussion I began this afternoon because I knew some other hon. members wished to speak. I must say, however, that I did not like what the Prime Minister said when I was speaking about the stabilization fund. If I remember correctly he said that I had an ingenious way of delaying matters.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We are not. Mr. Chairman, I wish to protest once more against that statement. If we have not the right to put questions, and to exercise our judgment in asking reasons why expenditures have been made and guarantees given, I should like to know why we have not such right. We have asked the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister for a detailed explanation as to why the guarantees were given. When we present certain requests to the house we are told that we are the unhappy mediums, and that we are not the proper persons to act between our constituents and the government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has said that I was ingenious in delaying matters. Last night we did not delay matters. Who delayed last night? We were ready to vote on the amendment, but at that time the Minister of Labour delayed his own bill, and spoke until eleven o'clock. I say that it is most unfair for hon. members on this side of the house to be told that we are simply delaying matters. The government have made a mess of affairs, even with the powers and authorities with which they have been clothed for the last three years. That fact is brought very forcibly to our notice every time we turn to the estimates.

I suggest that I am entitled, as is the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and the hon. member for North Waterloo, or in fact any other hon. member, to appear in this chamber and make statements. To-morrow I shall have one or two further questions to ask in connection with these matters, and other hon. members on this side of the house will have questions to put.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There will be a few discussions, as there have been to-day. When the bill becomes law we will be able to say to our constituents and to the people at large that we have not shirked our duty, and that we have been able to show where, in the administration of the laws the government has enacted, it has failed.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 12, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

DEATH OF LORD ABERDEEN

ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY LADY ABERDEEN OF MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have a communication to make to the house. Pursuant to your wishes I conveyed to Lady Aberdeen the sympathy of the house expressed in this chamber on the passing of her husband, the late Lord Aberdeen, former Governor General of Canada, and have received from her the following reply:

House of Cromar, Tarland, Aberdeenshire,
April 3, 1934.

Dear Mr. Speaker:

I beg you to accept yourself and to convey to the members of the Canadian House of Commons the most grateful thanks of my family and myself for the message of understanding sympathy which you have been good enough to convey to me on their behalf.

We are very sensible of the high honour paid to my late husband by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition and the leader of the Progressive party, all speaking so appreciatively of Lord Aberdeen's character and career, and I only wish he could himself have read the report of their speeches and heard of the unanimous resolution passed. He had a very deep love for Canada and it would indeed have been a joy to him to know that he was thus remembered by the House of Commons.

I can only beg you to believe that Lord Aberdeen's family and friends do most keenly appreciate this signal mark of honour and affection.

Yours very sincerely,
Ishbel Aberdeen and Temair.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fifth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

PETITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Mégantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house a petition from the municipal council of St. Pierre-Baptiste, county of Megantic, protesting against a tax of 20 cents being levied on leaf tobacco.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. Is the south bank of the Beauharnois canal showing signs of erosion?
2. What will be the cost of the reconstruction of this bank?
3. Is the government undertaking any inquiry into the Jacques Cartier Company which last year was said to control approximately one million shares of Beauharnois Power common stock?

4. If so, will such report be tabled?

Mr. MANION: The answer to Nos. 1 and 2 of this question is no. The third and fourth questions the hon. gentleman might perhaps submit as a separate pair of questions, because they deal with another side of the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question will be redrafted.

STABILIZATION FUND

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. How much money was paid out of the agricultural stabilization fund, established in 1933, to exporters to Great Britain and Northern Ireland?

2. How much money was paid out of such fund to the exporters of each of the approved commodities mentioned in clause 2 of the regulations respecting such fund, approved by order in council of June 2, 1933, P.C. 973?

3. On what date in 1933 did the pound sterling become worth $4.60 or more in Canadian money?

4. During what period in 1933 were there exports from Canada by shippers who received payments out of such fund in respect of such exports?

Mr. RHODES:

1. $36,040.18.

2.

Cheese	$ 5,451 85
Bacon and hams	24,021 03
Cattle	3,988 54
Eggs	409 80
Canned lobsters	2,010 57
Canned salmon	158 39

3. June 20, 1933.

4. Exports on or after May 1, 1933, in respect of which sterling proceeds were transmitted on or after that date at less than the stabilized rate, were eligible.

CANADA, 1934

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I reply to a query yesterday by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). The explanation of the point raised is this. When returns are called for affecting more than one department, the two departments or more affected send their replies to the Secretary of State and then they are tabled. In this instance, the Secretary of State tabled the reply, but the figures were of two departments, and all that is necessary is to add the two together. I will accommodate my hon. friend by doing that now. Bureau of Statistics: 13,000 in English and 4,500 in French; King's Printer, 2,300 in English and 60 in French, or a total of 15,300 in English and 4,560 in French. Those retained by the King's Printer are for sale upon demand.

OTTAWA AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I hold in my hand a dispatch published in the Toronto Mail and Empire under date April 9. Part of it is from London, England, dated April 8, and part from Ottawa under the same date. The heading is:

Imperial pacts causing concern. British leaders hint privileges may be curtailed.

I do not suppose Your Honour would permit me to read the whole dispatch.

An hon. MEMBER: We have all read it.

Mr. SANDERSON: With the permission of the Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member proceed with his question.

Mr. SANDERSON: The statement from London, under date April 8, reads in part:

Both Stanley Baldwin and Walter Elliot, Minister of Agriculture, have recently hinted the privileges the dominions enjoy in the British market may be curtailed.

One paragraph in the dispatch from Ottawa under the same date reads:

Some changes have already been made in the trade agreement by mutual consent and it is quite possible that further cooperation along that line may be necessary.

My question is this: What changes have been made by mutual consent in the agreements of the Ottawa conference?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Ottawa agreements provided for the variation of the terms of contract by mutual consent, as is usual in all cases of that character. The changes that were agreed upon were indicated at the last budget; others doubtless will be indicated at the next budget. Any changes that have been made have been indicated to the house, except possibly some questions of administration, which are only matters that arise from day to day. But any changes are matters that have been communicated to the house through the appropriate and proper channels. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will recall that with respect to a part of the agreement it continued for a period of three years only; the Australian agreement continues for two years, that is until 1934, and a portion of our agreement terminates in 1935. It is that, presumably, to which reference was made and having regard to the attitude taken with respect to the agreements by the hon. gentleman and those who surround him, anything that would bring about their abrogation or termination would, I suppose, fill him with the greatest joy.

Mr. SANDERSON: On a question of privilege I object to the remarks of the Prime Minister. He has no right to make them. He has no right to impute to me or any other hon. member what he tried to impute and I submit that he should withdraw the remarks.

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to the recorded vote of the hon. gentleman with respect to the Ottawa agreements.

Mr. McINTOSH: How about the right hon. gentleman's own vote?

INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): In the Mail and Empire of yesterday there is a heading in big block letters:

Manion predicts interest rate cut on loans, mortgages.

Then in the press dispatch I find the following:

Hon. R. J. Manion, Minister of Railways, told South Oxford electors here to-night, "I may say that I believe in a short time this reduction will be an accomplished fact."

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has a statement to make to the house in connection with that declaration of the minister.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The predictions of any member of the administration are predictions which he makes based upon his general idea of what the government desires to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about collective cabinet responsibility?

Mr. BENNETT: Not with respect to predictions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We knew that long ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member should know. He was a member of a government once for a short time and tried that. That is all that has to be said with respect to that.

PASSAMAQUODDY BAY DAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Marine and Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau). It may be that the report to which I am going to refer was tabled while I was ill for a day or two. I have not, however, seen the report. I see by the press that a report on Passamaquoddy bay investigation in connection with the construction of the dam there has been submitted to the United States congress. Has the minister received any report from the commission and if he has received it, will he table it?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I am not aware of any report made to my department to date, but I shall make inquiries.

Mr. VENIOT: The report has been made to the United States congress and a statement to that effect has appeared in the press. I understand the report condemns the construction of the dam. In the interest of fisheries in Passamaquoddy bay and bay of Fundy, we should have some report or a copy of that report submitted to the parliament of Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): My memory is that the Department of External Affairs tabled a copy of the report some days ago.

Mr. VENIOT: Could the minister tell me under what heading that report was tabled?

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to say to the hon. gentleman that the report is being printed. I recall now that it was not in printed form. The French translation has not been completed, but as soon as that has been done the report will be printed and laid on the table.

TOLLS ON MONTREAL BRIDGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, a delegation comprising farmers and other citizens from the surroundings of Montreal, interviewed the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) in order to request him to reduce the tolls on the Victoria and Montreal Harbour bridges. I was invited to join this delegation but owing to illness, I was prevented doing so. I wish to inquire of the hon. minister, who no doubt has taken the matter into consideration, whether a favourable reply can be expected soon in connection with this request and the resolutions adopted by the various counties interested.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, I think, quite a representative delegation comprising citizens of the south shore, mayors and councillors of the various municipalities, met at the government's offices, in Montreal. I had the pleasure of receiving this delegation and listening to their request. I wish to state to the hon. member that this question does not only concern my department but also the Department of Railways and Canals. I promised that their request would be considered by the government. I have already communicated with the other department interested and I trust that a reply will soon be forthcoming.

COMMUTERS CANADA-UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): I would like to ask the government to inform us with regard to the attitude they have taken or the representations they have made in view of the legislation being promoted in the United States congress to prevent Canadians seeking employment across the border, and whether, if the United States government persists in its attitude, retaliatory measures will be taken by Canada.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter to which the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska refers is one which has been brought to the attention of the government from many sources. For instance, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) at present beside me has been pressing the matter upon our attention and members for the Essex constituencies as well as those concerned who live in western constituencies bordering on the United States have also been bringing the matter to our notice. The legislation that has been introduced into congress is similar in terms to legislation that has frequently been introduced there. It has not, however, been enacted heretofore. Whether the present legislation will or will not be enacted is something about which it is impossible for the government to make a statement. There are large numbers of people living in Canada who work in the United States and likewise there are large numbers of people who live in the United States who work in Canada. Heretofore the spirit of good neighbourliness that has characterized the relations between the two countries and to which the president made reference a few days ago has enabled those who live in Canada to cross the border from day to day to work in the United States and those who live in the United States to cross the border from day to day to work in Canada. The government has, of course, taken notice of the legislation and through the appropriate channels made to the United States authorities such representations as were thought desirable. It will be time enough to determine what action should be taken by Canada should the legislation to which the hon. member refers become law. I can make no further statement than I have just made with respect to the matter except to assure the hon. member and all those who are concerned, that the government is fully seized of the seriousness of the situation and has made to the United States government as strong representations as are possible under the circumstances.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): With reference to the matter of Canadians employed on the American side of the international boundary and Americans employed on the Canadian side, might I ask the Prime Minister if it is not a fact that under the Ashburton treaty there is a special arrangement relating to residents of the St. John river district?

Mr. BENNETT: Whether it was under that treaty I am not prepared to say at the moment, but the matter was a subject of special discussion. I shall ascertain in which document it is and make a statement to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. VENIOT: I think it is 1814.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, in to-day's papers there is a dispatch from Washington dated April 11, entitled:

Arthur Cutten Facing Charge of Conspiracy Alleged by United States Secretary of Agriculture to Have Made False Reports to Manipulate Grain Prices

That dispatch is very interesting. It refers to wheat business in the United States. It says that according to the American authorities the said Cutten:

"conspired and colluded" with firms and persons on the Chicago board of trade "to conceal his trading and position in the market" and to so "make inaccurate, incorrect and false reports of his position in the market."

I shall ask the government first, if that Arthur Cutten is the same Arthur Cutten whose name appears in Hansard of February 26, 1934, at page 933 in the debate on the bill of the Small Loan Company of Canada and is the man referred to by the hon. Minister of Justice as head of the well known Cutten family of Guelph. My second question is, did the said Cutten do anything in Canada of the kind complained of by the American government according to the dispatch I have just quoted?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure it must be within the sense of this committee that these questions have no relevance to this relief act. I desire to place myself entirely in the hands of the committee in endeavouring to assist in the passing of this legislation, but if one is to be confronted with questions of this kind is it possible to conduct legislation at all? The matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman is one which can easily be considered when the house is in committee on the private bill to which reference has been made, but I cannot see its relevance to this bill, and I ask you so to rule.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I shall not insist any more about it except to say that the man was given a certificate of virtue—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. A point of order has been taken by the Prime Minister that the hon. gentleman should not discuss this question at this time.

Mr. POULIOT: And the chair has not given judgment.

The CHAIRMAN: I thought the hon. gentleman was speaking to the point of order. On the question now raised I shall have to rule him out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Before you give your ruling permit me to explain. That man, according to the press, has been manipulating grain markets in Chicago, and I wondered if he had been doing the same thing in Canada when the government was guaranteeing wheat loans. This is most relevant to the matter we are now discussing, because those guarantees were given under the blank cheque legislation. There is an obvious connection between the manipulation of grain by Cutten in Chicago and what might have been done here. We do not know what has been done here. I do not know, no one knows—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Does the hon. gentleman speak of his personal knowledge or of what he has read?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, most of our knowledge comes from the press, because the government does not say much. If we had not the press we would be very poorly informed, although I am very thankful to the right hon. Prime Minister for having tabled the Amulree report the other day.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. member was referring to the American press.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not making any distinction between the Canadian and the American press. I am discussing the blank cheque legislation. Remember, Mr. Chairman, we are all glad to see you in the chair. I shall tell you why. It is because you have a real sense of humour. You have so much of it you could give a little of it to the government. But now I see the Prime Minister is smiling. When he smiles he is an altogether different man. When he frowns his eyebrows—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: The shouts of order remind me of something that comes to us from across the boundary, of negro spirituals. The preacher starts to say something, then he gets enthused and the audience shouts the louder with him and then someone faints or drops outside the church and they restore him with buckets of water. That is what should be done to those who are so noisy on the other side of the house.

But, sir, this is a serious business. The government have been trading in wheat and steel, and so on. I wonder why the government offices are not transferred to the market square. There are two or three days in the week for marketing. I would like to deal with those gentlemen, I wonder if they would be disposed to give credit to an individual, I would like to be as well connected with them as the Algoma Steel Corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway and Mr. McFarland. However, leaving negro spirituals, let us come to the blank cheque. What I do not understand in that legislation is the mystery of it. Everything is done in the fashion of the magic rope in India. The fakir burns some wood, there is a cloud of smoke, then the rope hangs straight up in the cloud and he does all sorts of magic in that cloud of smoke.

Will the government follow the wonderful example of the Hindoo fakir. Some small guarantees have been given by the government, in the name of the country at large, to the steel corporations in Ontario and Nova Scotia as well as to other corporations, but this is what I find most extraordinary. We heard a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to Beauharnois; they found it a very bad proposition, and they destroyed the credit of that corporation. Then, after having done so, they supplied it with crutches to the extent of $15,000,000, by way of guarantee.

Unfortunately I have not the gift of ubiquity; yesterday I was unable to be in the house because I was attending the meetings of a committee, so I did not have an opportunity of listening to the debate. On reading Hansard this morning, however, I was delighted to see how hon. gentlemen on this side of the house pointed out the absurdity of this legislation. I should like to compliment all who took part in that debate, but I would particularly mention my good friend from Antigonish-Guysborough. First he spoke with a smile; then he brought facts to the house to which there was no answer. It is sad not to receive an answer when such important matters are discussed, but after reading what took place yesterday may I say that I fully agree with the well founded remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough who asked that the government guarantee loans to the fishermen of his constituency to the extent of $15,000. The right hon. Prime Minister thought the hon. member was not perhaps a happy medium. Medium is another word that is used in connection with spiritualism, but it is just a word, like protoplasm. A member is not a magician; a member cannot make bad things look good, as the government attempts to do. It is our duty to secure from the government information which we supply to our constituents, and that information must be accurate. The member elected from each constituency is the connecting link between that constituency and the government. Very often the suggestions that come from this side of the house are disregarded by the government; the government have that power, but when they take the trouble to consider the real needs of the nation they are forced to admit that the members on this side of the house, who do not pretend to be infallible, are earnest in their desire to promote the welfare of our country.

I am not surprised, sir, that my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough was unsuccessful in presenting the request of his electors to the government, because I know that some requests that have been made to the federal government by the provincial government of Quebec have been disregarded. The other day I mentioned the case of the poor settlers of Saint-Emile d'Auclair, Saint-Elzear and Packington. An inspector was sent to those parishes by the department, and he made a report saying that those people should not have the relief works asked for by the Quebec government. After a further investigation, however, and after the parish priest had come to the government with tears in his eyes and described the real condition of those poor people, the eyes and heart of the Minister of Labour were opened. In other places, however, the government did not reconsider its decision and did not approve of the relief works which had been asked for by the Quebec government. What was the explanation given by the government? He stated that in connection with the last two parishes they had received a list of the unemployed in a letter which bore no date or signature and which did not contain a covering letter, but that the department had a confidential report from the inspector in this connection. If the report was confidential in regard to the members of the opposition it was not in any way confidential in regard to the minister, because it came to him from one of his employees. The minister should have looked into the matter; he should have paid attention to it. He should have sent reliable men as inspectors, who would give him a true picture of the situation. I have received tens and hundreds of letters from those people complaining of their dire distress, and I wonder how it is possible for the poor people of this country, who have not an opportunity to present their case to the government, to be heard by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I have often told the government that they are wrongly informed, that they obtain their information from interested parties. Those who could tell the true facts are not those who flatter; they are those who stand silent. Those who come to the government are those who flatter in an endeavour to obtain something from the government, and they paint false pictures of the conditions that exist. They deceive the government for their own benefit. This is being done now, and this is why I complain so much. I regret that when we do our duty as defenders of the rights and privileges of these poor people we can get no answer from the government. The report is called confidential, and it must be a contagious confidence which spreads like a disease because every paper filed next to such confidential report of an inspector is also called confidential. The word "confidential" is spread through the whole file, and it is impossible to get any information. I have said very often in this House of Commons, and I shall now repeat, that I will not accuse any hon. member of the government of having a stone where in the normal human body we find a heart. I believe they are generous. They are good natured and average men. I regret however that they are wrongly informed, and at times I am sure they are afraid to face the facts. They act like a man who is condemned to death because of illness, a man who is afraid to see his doctor for fear he will be told, "My friend draw up your will; you will die within a few hours." The government is afraid of that and they will not listen to those who are their good friends and who are willing to tell them when they are mistaken, and give them a chance to change their policy.

The stand I now take is not taken selfishly, but is taken on behalf of my people. Unfortunately however those who take that stand are found only on this side of the house. I regret very much that the case of those settlers has not been considered by the government.

Mr. SPENCE: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member from Toronto is rich.

Mr. SPENCE: You claim to be perfect, yourself.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is rich; he is well off. Everyone knows that, and I do not blame him for it. The unfortunate fact is, however, that he is so rich he does not understand other people being poor. He knows nothing about the settlers I have described time and again in this house.

Mr. GOTT: Very well off, intellectually.

Mr. POULIOT: I see some hon. members opposite laughing when I describe these cases. When I return to my constituency I will tell the people who have no shoes, no warm clothes to wear in the winter time, no food, only shelter rain and snow can get through, that when I was describing their very sad cases to the government I saw some gentlemen who are not suffering in the same way, men who are wealthy and supporters of the government, laughing at what I was saying when I took opportunity to defend them in the Canadian parliament.

Mr. GOTT: They won't believe it.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I am here to do my duty. When the government does not answer there is always some heckler who interrupts anyone who is speaking earnestly and for the public good. I speak because I believe it to be my duty, and at great sacrifice. This is no joke. Every one of us takes pains to study in order that he may learn something. Some are born wrapped in an encyclopaedia of general knowledge—which could be called otherwise, but are not wise at all. I will admit that it is useless to speak, but I have said what I wanted to say, and when I see the government guaranteeing millions of dollars to huge companies, private enterprises, steel companies, Newfoundland and so on, I feel I must speak for the settlers in my constituency as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough spoke for the fishermen in his. These people live far from Ottawa, and they have no means with which to travel here and to expose their troubles to the government. They cannot get the ear of the government because of the noise made by those who do not understand their troubles, their miseries and their distress.

I shall not insist upon an answer to what I have said about the settlers, because I know I shall receive none. However as the Prime Minister was good enough to supply me with a copy of the Amulree report I shall ask him if the Canadian government has been released from the guarantees given to Newfoundland, and if following that release Canada will have anything to say in the future for the guarantee which has been given to the banks on behalf of Newfoundland. No answer?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: We are waiting for an answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment; shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DUFF: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go on.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, may I ask who is running this government; is it the hon. member for York-Sunbury or the ministers who occupy the front benches? If it is the ministers I suggest that the hon. member ought to keep quiet. He may not be serious but hon. members on this side of the house are discussing a very serious matter, and I must object to his remarks.

Mr. SPENCE: Don't be too serious.

Mr. DUFF: I am not. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate you upon the fact that your health is so improved that you are able to resume your duties as chairman of this committee. I am sure I appreciate the courtesy with which you dealt with the first part of the remarks delivered by the hon. member for Témiscouata, in which he referred to a gentleman named Cutten whose name appeared in to-day's press. It may be possible, sir, that in the past few months you have not been able to follow discussions which took place within the precincts of this House of Commons. It seems to me that in view of those discussions and in view of the fact that a very important witness was brought before a committee of this house to deal with guarantees to the farm relief authorities, the hon. member for Témiscouata was quite right in bringing the matter before the committee. As far as I am concerned I have no objection to Mr. Cutten selling either physical wheat, margins or futures, or wheat known by any other term, and if he made a great deal of money by selling that wheat to somebody, jolly good luck to him as far as I am concerned. But I do say that in view of the fact that this government guaranteed a very large sum of money the amount of which we have not been able to obtain either in this committee or in another committee of this house—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I desire to point out to this committee that there are rules governing debate in this house, noted mostly perhaps for not being observed, but one of them is this, that a matter being before a committee of this house is not a subject for discussion in this committee or in this house until that committee has made its report. The hon. member is now proceeding to discuss what took place in a committee and is referring to the discussions that took place there.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood that the committee had made its report.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the committee is still sitting—the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We have disposed of that matter.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me. None of those matters has been disposed of. They all stand in the same position. There is no report from the banking and commerce committee, and if we are to pursue this course the rules might as well not exist.

Mr. DUFF: On the point of order raised by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, I agree the rules should be observed, and have tried to keep myself within the rules of the house in this discussion. Perhaps we all break the rules sometimes to a greater or less degree. The Prime Minister's remark reminds me of the answer that Priscilla made to John Alden, "Speak for yourself, John." I have endeavoured to keep within the rules of this house so far as I possibly could, and in referring to this matter I was very careful to keep as far away as possible, in my references to what was being done in another part of this house, from breaking the rules. But I think I may be allowed to say that certain facts have been brought out in a committee of this house by one important witness who appeared before it. The public has the evidence given before that committee, and I therefore claim it is no longer a private matter because every man in Canada can get a copy of that evidence and see exactly what was said by that witness. Therefore I submit to you, sir, as the Deputy Speaker of this house and the chairman of this committee, that I am quite within my rights in discussing this matter so long as I do not transgress the rules of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we might as well have the matter disposed of, Mr. Chairman. The rule is that matters that are referred to committees to be dealt with shall not be discussed in this chamber until the report of the committee has been made, and on that report discussion can take place. That is the rule. The other day one hon. gentleman observed that he was getting very near the edge of breaking the rule and he reformed his speech accordingly. There is no doubt what the rule has been, and if we have rules here for the conduct of debate in this chamber we should follow them. There is the other ground of the irrelevancy of the discussion that is taking place to the relief measure before us, and if hon. members desire to discuss matters so wholly extraneous I might as well say now what I was going to say presently, that it is quite obvious that the purpose of the opposition is not to proceed with this measure during the absence of the leader of the opposition. The discussions that have taken place and the speeches that have been made have latterly been a repetition, and with no reference to the clause under consideration at all. If that is the course which the opposition desires to pursue I shall follow the other course and adjourn the discussion until such time as the leader of the opposition returns, and thus save several thousands of dollars of public money per day by taking up other matters of public business. It is quite obvious that an effort is being made to prevent this matter being dealt with at all. This is the eighth day I think on which this matter has been discussed, and people who have nothing to do with it, newspapers and others, are beginning to remark upon what this discussion means. Rather than see public money wasted I am prepared to move the committee up and afford the opportunity for estimates and other business of the house to be proceeded with. I think that would be preferable to having a repetition of this and other matters that have been discussed put on Hansard.

Mr. DUFF: It does not make any difference who the leader is on this side because every one of us over here is equal, which is more than can be said for some of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. GOTT: I would ask my hon. friend if he compares himself with the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. DUFF: In answer to the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott), may I pay him the compliment of saying that in some respects I compare myself even with him.

Mr. GOTT: Not in all respects.

Mr. DUFF: No. On the point of order raised by the Prime Minister, and before he moves that the committee rise for the reason given, which of course he should not have given, because in the first place he does not know what is in the mind of the leader of the opposition or in the minds of members on this side of the house or whether we have had any instruction from our leader to proceed with this bill or not, may I say that we are not sycophants on this side of the house. There is no one-man leadership or domination over here. We have our own views and we express them for ourselves. The Prime Minister should never have used the expression that we are blocking this legislation or that for several days we have been dealing with something that is not in the public interest. So far as I am personally concerned I brought up an entirely new matter yesterday that had not been discussed before, and that I had a perfect right to do as a member of this assembly elected by the intelligent electors of Nova Scotia, and I am not going to allow the Prime Minister or anybody else on that side or on this side of the house to interfere with my rights as a member of this house.

Again on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the Prime Minister evidently is not very anxious to have discussed the guarantees which this government gave. The public, however, are very anxious to get the information. I have been trying for the last month to find out what was the amount of the guarantee which the government gave to the Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited or John I. McFarland, and it is quite evident that so far as the government is concerned they have something to cover up or we would have had that information.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. DUFF: Very well then, let us have the information. If the government does not want to give the information I can give myself, within a million dollars, the amount of the guarantee which this dominion gave to the banks of this country to carry on the business in which in 1930 John I. McFarland was interested. The amount was about $150,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. member was going to speak on the point of order.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Let me go a step further. As far as the Cutten matter is concerned, in which you intervened, Mr. Chairman, in a very courteous manner, I understand that this wheat which Cutten was selling in Chicago was sold to Mr. McFarland, and that the government was guaranteeing the money which was paying for that wheat.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not permissible to discuss facts which are before a committee of this house until that committee has made its report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, on March 27 of this year, at page 1901 of Hansard, the figure of $15,000,000 was given by the Prime Minister as the outside liability under this very guarantee which is being discussed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I submit that my hon. friend is quite within his rights in discussing that statement made by the Prime Minister seeing that it is contained in the Hansard of the present session at page 1901.

The CHAIRMAN: No doubt, if the hon. member confines himself to that.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the standing orders of this house of 1927. The rules of debate are set out at pages 16 to 21 inclusive and on part of page 22. I would ask you, sir, to be good enough to look at the book and refresh your memory. I see it just in front of you and it is closed.

The CHAIRMAN: My mind is open.

Mr. POULIOT: The first rule, No. 34, is not relevant to the point under discussion, nor is rule 35, nor rule 36, nor rule 37, nor rule 38, nor rule 39, nor rule 40—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member please quote the rule that is relevant.

Mr. POULIOT: Nor rule 40, nor rule 41, nor rule 42, nor rule 43, and that is the last one. Therefore in that book, which contains our own regulations governing the conduct of debates in this house there is nothing at all to prevent the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough from discussing the question which he was considering. You have in your hand a book that costs much more than the standing orders of the house, because it costs $10—I am speaking of the authority you have in your hand.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: This other book which I have quoted contains the regulations passed by this house governing the way in which debates should be carried on, and there is absolutely nothing in the standing orders to prevent an hon. member from speaking about legislation that is before the house. Has the matter been submitted to another committee of the house to prevent free discussion of it by members of this house? That is a most important question and, as there is not a single standing order which prevents the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough from saying anything he thinks fit about that very matter, I do not see how anyone can take advantage of what is being done either in England or in any other country, where the rules governing their legislative houses are different from our own, in order to impose upon us a regulation which does not exist in this house. I do not see therefore, no matter what author may be quoted, how you, Mr. Chairman, can prevent the hon. member from discussing anything which is relevant to the present debate. If there is one standing order which would preclude the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough from discussing the matter in question, I will fully respect your decision; otherwise it will be impossible for me to understand your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member for Témiscouata will understand my ruling, which is this. Under standing order 41, with respect to decorum in debate, it is provided in 303:

> Until a committee reports, it is irregular to refer to its proceedings in debate in the house.

I will not quote the whole rule. I would refer the hon. member to 666 as well.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. POULIOT: That is Beauchesne.

The CHAIRMAN: Not only Beauchesne but common sense.

Mr. POULIOT: Beauchesne is right?

The CHAIRMAN: Order; the hon. member must at least respect his county and his name. I certainly will not curtail discussion by any hon. member of any aspect of the legislation before the house, but at the same time I am bound to abide by the rules of the house, according to which no hon. member may refer specifically to any matter which is now before a committee and on which such committee is going to report, when full discussion will be allowed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I agree entirely with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as far as it goes, but the hon. member was not referring to proceedings before the committee. We are entitled to refer to information which we have received with regard to any transaction, though such transaction may be under discussion before any select committee of the house, but we may not comment on any particular evidence given before the banking and commerce committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree with the hon. member on that point. Any hon. member discussing this legislation may quote any information, whether or not that information has also been given before the select committee, so long as the information quoted comes from some other source than the committee itself. But what is under consideration by that committee cannot be discussed in this house until the committee has made its report.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then how can you expect this house to grant another blank cheque until all the expenditures have been accounted for under the last? So long as the wheat agreement guarantee has not been accounted for and the total amount of this guarantee stated by the government, we are justified in demanding it so that the aggregate of the guarantees may be known.

Mr. DUFF: I am pleased to hear your decision, Mr. Chairman. So far as I am concerned, I do not want to go against the well-established rules of the house, but I think I am in order in mentioning the Cutten matter. Various statements are being made in the country, and it seems to me that it is the duty of the government to clear the matter up and to show what at any particular time was the gross amount of guarantees for which they were responsible. As I said a moment ago, my only interest so far as the Cutten matter is concerned is this, that owing to the guarantee given Mr. McFarland by the government, Mr. Cutten in Chicago sold wheat to Mr. McFarland, and he had to use money from the guarantee which the dominion gave to him. In making that statement I think I have said sufficient for my purpose.

I wish to refer to another matter. I have tried always to speak in this house only when I have something to say which, in my judgment at any rate, is in the interests of my constituency or of other parts of Canada.

Mr. GOTT: That is where you differ from the member for Témiscouata.

Mr. DUFF: Yesterday, in discussing this relief measure, I directed the attention of the committee to the fact that from one part of my constituency I had received a telegram asking that the government arrange to give them a small amount of $15,000 for certain purposes in connection with fisheries, and in his reply the Prime Minister, as reported at page 2059 of Hansard, column 2, used these words:

> But that can be done only when we have the power to do it, and at present we have not any such power. Some ten days ago the power lapsed, and until such time as this parliament again confers the power we shall not be able to help the fishermen of Canso either through the government at Halifax or otherwise.

Of course, that statement was quite correct, but from other statements made either in this house or on the public platform or in private conversation one can sometimes draw different conclusions. Now, there are some people in this house who have fairly good memories. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister on his good memory although some times he errs just as we do. But yesterday he made the statement that he could not guarantee this relief to the fishermen of Canso because there was at the moment no act of parliament. All I asked yesterday was that the fishermen of Canso be treated like other people in this country, like the western producers or John I. McFarland or whatever name you want to give to the organization which he headed to which this government gave a guarantee, the amount of which we do not know but which ran into not tens of millions of dollars, but in my opinion, over $100,000,000. What was the position of the government and the country in regard to that guarantee? Did the Prime Minister or his government have at that time any legislation to deal with the matter? If there was no such legislation—and in a minute I am going to prove that there was none—why cannot the government deal with the fishermen of Canso as they did with the Wheat Producers Limited, John I. McFarland and those associated with him? Let me read order in council P.C. 2238 as follows:

> Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 12th September, 1931.

The order in council goes on:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 11th September, 1931, from the Minister of Finance, recommending that, in pursuance of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and of an undertaking on behalf of the government—

Listen to this, Mr. Chairman.

> —made before the session of parliament at which the said act was passed, to implement by legislation the recommendation hereinafter set out, the governor in council guarantee repayment to the chartered banks hereinafter mentioned:
> The Bank of Montreal,
> The Bank of Nova Scotia,
> The Bank of Toronto,
> The Canadian Bank of Commerce,
> The Royal Bank of Canada,
> The Dominion Bank,
> The Imperial Bank of Canada,
> of the amounts of money advanced by them to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, hereinafter called "Wheat Producers," and interest thereon until repayment as agreed between the said banks and Wheat Producers in connection with and incidental to the marketing of the wheat and other grains grown in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta in the year 1930 and delivered to or in process of delivery to Wheat Producers, and including advances for purchases of wheat or other grains deemed necessary by Wheat Producers to secure the advantageous sale of such grains already delivered to or to be delivered to Producers.

The agreement was made with Mr. John I. McFarland who took over the management and selling of the wheat in November, 1930, and no legislation was passed at that time. This house was not in session then, and when the government gave guarantees to the banks to the extent of tens of millions of dollars there was no legislation passed, yet this government itself, six or eight months before the act was passed in 1931, gave to Mr. John I. McFarland and the banks, power to sell that wheat on a guarantee of the government. The Prime Minister was mistaken when he tried to argue that nothing could be done for the fishermen of Canso even to the extent of the small amount of $15,000 because at that time there was no statute on the books, whereas the government in September, 1931, passed an order in council in which it distinctly admits making an undertaking on its own behalf before the session of parliament of 1931. Surely, therefore, the Prime Minister and the government cannot give as a reason for not looking after the interests of the fishermen of Canso, that we are delaying this legislation or that none exists. Consequently the point of his remarks was not well taken and I again appeal to him on behalf of the fishermen of Canso that there is no reason, if the government can make a deal which means a guarantee of tens of millions or perhaps $100,000,000 to certain people, it cannot guarantee a small amount to the fishermen of Canso.

Mr. BENNETT: The committee doubtless has observed that the telegram which was sent by the mayor of Canso to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough did not ask for a guarantee; it was a request for assistance under the marketing legislation. It states:

> Owing to present adverse condition majority of fishermen in Canso are unable to equip themselves for fishing. Therefore this council urges the federal government under the proposed marketing and credit legislation to establish a fund of not less than $15,000 to be applied immediately through a system of loans to bona fide fishermen in Canso for the purchase and equipment of boats and fishing gear. As season is about to open immediate action is imperative. In this manner only can our fishermen once more become self-supporting.

Yesterday I pointed this out, at which the hon. member seemed to take some offence, that the telegram might better have been sent to the Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister or another appropriate minister if it was desired to have it dealt with, and while I do not think the hon. gentleman took serious offence, he took offence at what I said during the progress of the discussion. Now I point out to him and to the committee that the suggestion was for assistance under the marketing legislation and not for a guarantee. When yesterday I pointed out that we had no power to give the guarantee I had in mind two things: first, that the legislation of last year contained provisions whereby the government could give a guarantee and this year the legislation does not do so, because the provision was so strenuously opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite that it was deliberately omitted from the legislation by the minister. In order to make the matter doubly sure, the hon. member for West Lambton, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, moved this amendment yesterday:

> Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the governor in council to loan, or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

[Mr. Duff.]

So that not only did hon. gentlemen opposite desire that no further guarantees should be given, but when the explanation was made that these words had been deliberately left out of this year's legislation, the hon. member for West Lambton with the aid of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard desired to have the committee add to the legislation a proviso that no guarantee could be given under any circumstances to anybody except the provisions with relation to provinces, which provisions were contained in another section. Therefore perhaps the committee as a whole will realize that no government could give such a guarantee as that which is sought nor give any undertaking to give a guarantee in view of the fact that it had deliberately omitted from the proposed legislation the provision relating to guarantees.

There is just one observation which the hon. member made which I submit to the committee is a very serious one. He has alleged that in consequence of something that appears in the newspapers, there was collusion—that is what it amounts to—between the cooperative wheat sellers' organization and Mr. Cutten at Chicago and that money was used by Canadians for the purpose of buying Mr. Cutten's wheat.

Mr. DUFF: If the Prime Minister will allow me, I said that there was a report.

Mr. BENNETT: Any man who in parliament makes a statement of that kind must accept the responsibility for making it.

Mr. DUFF: I am willing to accept it.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to say something more about the matter, and that is this: The government is not responsible for the information not being given. The government told the committees, they told this house that it was free to do what it thought best, and by a majority which did not include government supporters alone but men who knew something about the business as distinguished from those who did not it concluded that the information should not be forthcoming. I ask the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and those who cheer his sentiments, do they desire to destroy western agriculture and drive the farmers of that country into bankruptcy? Is that their object? Is that the reason he makes these attacks? Why is it he stands in this house and becomes the mouthpiece of those who make attacks against western agriculture?

Mr. DUPUIS: To do justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it for the purpose of getting some measure of support from those who come from the great eastern provinces that they are now condemning the government because it is trying to help western Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: We hear the voice of the hon. gentleman next to the member for Antigonish-Guysborough saying it is in the name of justice. The greatest peril that ever came to the Canadian agriculturist! The government is endeavouring to do the best it can to safeguard that interest, the interest upon which western Canada has prospered in years gone by, which by its purchasing power kept the factories of the east going. Now are these gentlemen going to raise this cry against the west in its time of peril, its time of difficulty, its time of stress; are they going to appeal to sectional and other prejudice for the purpose of carrying out any such policy? I appeal to the members of this committee, those who know and understand what happened, who know that the government left it a perfectly open question for the members to determine as they saw fit, and that the committee decided as it did in the light of the knowledge they had as to what was best for the country under the circumstances. It is little credit to any hon. member to raise that issue in the way in which they have endeavoured to raise it in this case. Of course the west has had large benefits from the relief measures. Why? Because there we have a small number of people inhabiting a vast area, who produced more wealth per capita for Canada than any pioneer people in the world. That is the real truth, if you want to know the real truth. Everyone who takes the trouble to analyze the statistics realizes the great amount of new wealth that has been produced on the western plains between the head of the lakes and the mountains during the last ten years; new wealth coming into being year by year, not taking five or six years to produce but produced between the spring and the fall, which had such a tremendous effect on this country that now the drying up of this source of production has been felt in every part of this dominion. Everyone knows that, but here we have the cry raised that what we are trying to do is to deprive someone of something for the purpose of giving it to someone else. If the figures are looked at it will be seen that under the agreement made every part of this country has had the same treatment. In the older parts of the country the necessity has not been so great as in the new. Why should an old and long-settled country be asking the federal government to make contributions for the purposes of relief? It is in the new, the pioneer country that this necessity has arisen.

Mr. DUPUIS: What about Montreal?

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. gentleman mentioned the word Montreal. The city of Montreal has had as great a measure of relief as any other city in Canada, the only difference is that until this morning the accounts from the city of Montreal had not been received since those for the month of July of last year. Who is to blame for that? Let the hon. gentleman mutter "Montreal" as much as he pleases but let him know the facts before he makes his statement. If the city of Montreal presents its accounts as other communities have it will be dealt with in just the same way and just as rapidly. But only this morning the accounts of the city of Montreal were brought in in part for relief from the month of July up to the month of November. And then they blame this government! They cry that the west is receiving some assistance and mutter that Montreal is neglected, and another mutters "justice."

An hon. MEMBER: Prejudice towards the east!

Mr. BENNETT: There it is you see. All I can say is that as long as this government lasts it will give the same measure of consideration to every part of Canada as to all parts of Canada, and that measure will be the measure of necessity, for relief is based on necessity. That is what it was based upon, and on that basis it will continue to be administered. As long as we make contributions to the provinces to aid them in the discharge of their duties, just so long must necessity be the measure of the extent of the relief. All I can say is that the sentiment expressed by some of the members of this house is not the sentiment of the people of the communities from whence they come, for last year not ten, not fifteen, not twenty, but I believe it went up to something between one and two hundred carloads of produce went from eastern Canada to the west to help them in their need.

Mr. VENIOT: And would go again.

Mr. BENNETT: And as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) says it would go again. That is the position if the occasion arises. The government has acted in no spirit of discrimination but on the principle of giving to every province of the confederation the measure of assistance needed, the measure of it being the necessity of the community itself as expressed to the government through the province. And the fishermen of Canso send a telegram asking support, but do not send it to the government, and the member does not come to the government for any assistance but standing in his place in the house in the middle of a debate, a partisan debate, urges that that is not the way the west does it. Those in the west present their case not for political reasons but for the purpose of having assistance and aid given, and expecting to receive it, as they have, not to make political capital out of their necessity, their sorrows and their sufferings, but for the purpose of getting some assistance given to them to tide them over the difficulties in which they find themselves. Was that telegram communicated to the government, was it shown to the government, was it shown to the minister, was it shown to anyone who had any power to deal with the matter? It asked that something be done under the marketing act which is not yet law. Those who sat in this chamber yesterday and heard the attack made and the manner in which it was made will realize just how much of the effort was to help the fishermen and how much to make political capital out of the incident. And the country is not slow to judge in matters of that kind. It is perfectly obvious from what transpired in this chamber yesterday and for eight days before that, with the second section of the bill still under consideration, that the opposition are endeavouring to delay the passing of this legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all!

Mr. BENNETT: I have no objection to their delaying it, none whatever.

Mr. HANBURY: That is unfair.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. gentleman say that what transpired in this house yesterday and to-day was not by design? Will he say the hon. gentleman beside him was not a party to it?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I was not.

Mr. BENNETT: I know better.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have the right to say what I have to say in the house, and you have no right to say it is designed to delay.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HANBURY: The right hon. gentleman cannot be responsible for every member on his side, and we cannot be responsible for every member on this side.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish hon. members would listen—

Mr. VENIOT: I ask that the Prime Minister, if he reflects on me in the words he has used, will withdraw them. He has attributed to the opposition a design to block the passage of this bill. I do not think he can attribute a design to any member of this committee to block it.

Mr. BENNETT: I was very careful not to use the word "block" or the word "obstruct." Both of those words I did not use. I said "to delay."

Mr. VENIOT: You said "designed to delay."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, exactly, and that is in order.

Mr. DUPUIS: It is not right.

Mr. BENNETT: The words used in England are "dilatory tactics."

Mr. DUBOIS: As the word "humbug."

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I do not know any better example of it than the hon. gentleman. I can see nothing in this country quite equal to it. That is well known to all who have had the privilege of hearing his observations this afternoon. All you had to do was to watch the debate yesterday.

Mr. VENIOT: I want the point of order decided.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the point?

Mr. VENIOT: The Prime Minister said that we on this side of the house designed to prevent the passage of this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say that, I said "delay." That is parliamentary.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, delay. Now, sir, if I understand the English language that amounts to what is mentioned on page 98 of the rules and forms as "factious opposition." When you attribute to a member or to the opposition as a body the design to delay the passage of the bill it can amount to nothing else than factious opposition, and under rule 298, which appears at page 97 of Beauchesne, that term is not permissible.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, occasions may arise when it may be necessary, in the opinion of any hon. member, to delay the passage of any measure. That is within his rights, and there is nothing unparliamentary in stating that the intention or design of the hon. member is to do so. It is unparliamentary to charge obstruction.

Mr. VENIOT: It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Factious opposition is not the design to delay at all. I submit that the statement by the Prime Minister is entirely parliamentary, Mr. Chairman, and I ask you so to rule.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am one of those who have been quiet as a mouse both yesterday and to-day, and I do not think those remarks could apply to me. I wanted to ask something in regard to this very matter brought up by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. For many years I happened to be a member of a government which gave guarantees to the farmers, but we did not hide them under our hats.

Mr. VENIOT: We are discussing a point of order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am talking now; you had your chance. What is the point of order?

Mr. VENIOT: On the point of order may I be permitted—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member can speak twice on a point of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Where is the rule that prevents me from doing so?

The CHAIRMAN: There is a rule which states that an hon. member may speak only once to a point of order.

Mr. VENIOT: We are in committee now.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, but we are not in committee on the point of order.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that on a point of order you have the same jurisdiction as though you were in the Speaker's chair, so to speak, but I do not think I can be prevented from replying to the Minister of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection to hearing the hon. gentleman if the committee consents.

Mr. VENIOT: If in your opinion, Mr. Chairman, I am not permitted to reply I bow to your ruling.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is the rule, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. VENIOT: If in the opinion of the chairman of this committee I am infringing the rules of the house I accept the ruling, and I do not want the consent of the committee to go on.

The CHAIRMAN: May I say further that for my own information I should be only too happy to hear the hon. gentleman, because I want to form my opinion on the point of order and I must understand it clearly, because there seems to be very little difference between the Prime Minister and the hon. gentleman in regard to the words used. So I will listen to the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. VENIOT: I take it, sir, that under rule 298, which appears at page 97 of Beauchesne, the expressions there set out have been ruled unparliamentary in the British House of Commons, which ruling applies here as well. The first expression I find is "factious opposition." While the Prime Minister did not use the words "factious opposition" he did say there was a design evident on the part of the opposition to delay the passage of this bill.

Mr. SPENCE: Is that not true?

Mr. VENIOT: Those were the words he used. Now I hear a voice from the other side asking if that is not so. I wish to protest that it is not so and that the words "design to delay the passage of this bill" amount to obstruction; they amount to more than that, and come under the heading of factious opposition. I do not agree with the Minister of Justice, although perhaps I should say that he ought to be a better authority on the interpretation of the English language than I am. I cannot agree with him, however. I will say that he is in a better position to interpret a legal term than I am, but I will not play second fiddle to him in the interpretation of the English language. Therefore I take it that the words "design to delay the passage of this bill" come within the class of expressions which have been ruled objectionable and unparliamentary, as laid down in the section I have quoted.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is this: Sometimes it may be not only the right but the duty of any hon. member to delay, obstruct or stop any measure which he may think bad for the future welfare of the country, and at certain times he may be entitled to use the term "obstruction." The rule on which I am bound to base my decision is this, that you cannot impute motives to any hon. member. At the same time, however, I think it is only fair to say that all sides of the house may criticize any attitude taken by any hon. member, so long as that is done in parliamentary language, and in my opinion it is not unparliamentary to say that a member, or some members, or an opposition, or a government party, have designed to delay any legislation. I might add that sometimes it might be a good thing if they did.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I thoroughly agree with the ruling you have just given. Speaking for myself certainly I am endeavouring to delay this measure for the reason that I am absolutely and bitterly opposed to two most vicious principles contained in this legislation. In my humble way I want to impress upon the country the vicious nature of the legislation that now is being piloted through the house by the Prime Minister. But so far as actual delay is concerned I want to bring to the attention of the right hon. gentleman the fact that at 10.45 o'clock on Tuesday night in this chamber the official opposition were prepared to vote upon the amendment which had been moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition, but because the right hon. gentleman and his Minister of Labour did not have at that time enough members behind them to sustain them in the position they had taken we saw what were really blocking tactics of the worst kind.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "blocking" is not parliamentary.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will withdraw it, in deference to my right hon. friend, and in deference to the classical vocabulary of the right hon. gentleman I will say that the Minister of Labour adopted tactics which were designed to delay the passage of this bill which we are now considering. I would also tell the right hon. gentleman, who virtually accuses the opposition of using blocking tactics, though actually his words were "using tactics designed to delay," that if he removes from this bill, in the first place, the clause dealing with peace, order and good government and if he inserts in section 4, in the second place, an amendment which we intend to propose to the effect that no money shall be expended by this government except such as may be appropriated by this parliament, the bill will very soon go through. If the Prime Minister will do what was done by the government themselves in 1932 and remove from the bill the reference to peace, order and good government, and if he will return to this parliament its fundamental right to control taxation and expenditure, this bill will go through and receive third reading in thirty minutes, so far as we are concerned.

[The Chairman.]

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am bitterly opposed to legislation based upon peace, order and good government. Our attitude has been consistent, sir, in this house since 1930. In 1932 I moved an amendment along the same lines, and I should like to place it on record again now. I moved:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved:

1. That this house has been from the commencement of the session and continues to be ready and willing to consider and vote without delay any money or grant, submitted and asked for by the government for relieving distress and providing employment throughout Canada.

In the second place, and this is our position this afternoon, the amendment stated:

2. That this house cannot surrender the rights of the people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, to maintain direct control over matters of taxation and expenditure, nor vest in the governor in council or in any other body absolute and despotic powers under the guise of dealing with peace, order and good government, particularly while parliament is in session.

That was our attitude in 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, and that is where we stand in 1934. We say to the government to-day that we are prepared to vote all the moneys necessary at this moment to provide relief, providing these moneys are properly voted. As far as I am personally concerned I am conscientiously opposed—and I hope hon. members will accept my sincerity—to the clause relating to peace, order and good government in this legislation. I am opposed to depriving parliament of control over public expenditures. I say we have been acting within our rights in delaying this legislation, in order that the country may be impressed with the serious nature of the legislation which the Prime Minister, because of the regrettable absence of the Minister of Labour, is at the present time trying to compel us to accept without proper, due and mature consideration. With all respect and kindly deference to my right hon. friend I say that he himself, by his personal demeanor yesterday and to-day, has been responsible for a great deal of delay. I wish to make that statement in the kindliest manner, and to add that the right hon. gentleman himself provoked antagonism and unnecessary discussion in the piloting of this measure through the House of Commons. For that reason I regret that his genial colleague, the Minister of Labour, is indisposed. I do wish to impress upon the right hon. gentleman however that I do not believe he is in a position to lecture hon. members on this side of the house who have conscientious and deep-rooted objections to the main provisions of the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to cover that which has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, other than to state that I concur in his statements. I do point out to the Prime Minister, in the most kindly spirit, that this legislation is thoroughly obnoxious to hon. members on this side of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: For four years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, for four years, and if it had been twenty years our position would be just the same. May I say to the Prime Minister that because of the absence of the leader of the opposition there is no desire to delay the legislation. May I add that there are a number of hon. members on this side of the house who still desire to speak upon the measure. So far as I am concerned I should hope we might conclude discussion of the bill this afternoon, but when the right hon. gentleman imputes to us the motive of delaying the measure I state that he is entirely beside the mark.

May I say here and now that while I was absent yesterday and cannot speak as to the discussion which took place then, I do know that three or four hon. members on this side of the house were very anxious to discuss the guarantees. I presume they did so, although I have not yet read Hansard to ascertain whether or not they spoke. There are some further matters touched upon in the measure concerning which, as we proceed, hon. members will desire to speak. The discussion may have wandered somewhat far afield, but we do resent very strongly any imputation that we have used obstructionist methods, if you wish to use the extreme term, and that we have unnecessarily delayed the passage of the measure. This is one of the most important bills the House of Commons will be asked to consider. Let me repeat what I said a few days ago—and may I add that upon that occasion I had waited twenty-four hours before I had an opportunity to speak. Other hon. members were anxious to express themselves, and of course my remarks were delayed.

May I repeat that we are just as anxious as is the government to grant relief where such relief is required. I should like to express myself as strongly as has my colleague by stating that we object to the provisions contained in the bill. We always have objected, and as opposition members it is our duty to object as strongly, as is humanly possible, to those features in the legislation which we do not like—and we intend to do it. The delay has not been caused by the absence of the leader of the opposition, because I wish to make it perfectly clear that I believe hon. members on this side of the house have discussed clause 2 as much as they have desired. We wish however to discuss clause 3 in connection with which the Prime Miinster has presented an amendment. We are anxious to proceed with the legislation, because we do not want to stay here any longer than is necessary. But we do intend to remain until we have had the opportunity of presenting our views to the House of Commons, and we will not be deterred from our purpose by anything which may be said by any hon. member of the government or by its leader. I make these statements in the kindliest spirit, and say that we are ready to go on and vote upon our amendment, and then proceed with the amendment presented by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for West Edmonton for the statement he has made. I do think it is quite unfair to say that an effort was not made yesterday to answer every reasonable question asked and to do so in the best possible temper. There was nothing said yesterday which was not responsive to a question asked and I leave it to any hon. member who sat in the committee to state whether or not the replies were not made in the best possible temper. Therefore I say that the particular criticism is unwarranted.

The amendment now before the committee is one offered by the leader of the opposition upon which, I understand, we will vote. I indicated that I purposed at least to some extent to meet the views of the opposition by striking out subsection (b) of section 2 and making a new paragraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will come subsequently.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, when we dispose of this matter I shall make that motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some further references to my statements of yesterday concerning the stabilization fund. Yesterday the Prime Minister said in answer to a question of mine:

The return will gratify the hon. gentleman's very laudable curiosity in that regard. They were not paid to the provinces but to the persons who made the exports under the terms fixed by the regulations, which were published and indicated to the house.

In connection with my question as to how this $35,145.71 was appropriated I have consulted Hansard for the present year, and at page 237, February 5, I find the following question asked by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) and answers thereto:

Agricultural Stabilization Fund

Mr. MacLean:

How much money was paid by the government of Canada under the agricultural stabilization fund, for each of the agricultural products entitled to aid from this fund, for each month of 1933?

Mr. Rhodes:

Payments to date by commodities (statistics not kept by months of shipments):

Cheese	$ 5,437 33
Bacon and hams	9,006 41
Cattle	3,779 41
Eggs	409 80
Canned lobsters	1,559 27
Canned salmon	158 39
	$ 20,350 61
Administration expenses	217 82
Total to date	$ 20,568 43

I should like to find out the difference between the $35,145.71 and the $20,568.43 mentioned here, and also the names of the persons about which the right hon. gentleman spoke yesterday when he said that payments were made to the persons who made exports.

Mr. BENNETT: The figures I gave yesterday, now repeated, namely, the thirty-five thousand odd represent the amount to date. The figures given on February 5, represented the sums paid to that date. The difference between the two sums represents the amount paid between those two dates. Obviously I have not the names of the persons to whom payments were made, but I shall endeavour to secure them from the Department of Finance, and table them. I do not know whether or not they are available, but I believe they are. They are not paid to provinces.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When I put that question I was not trying to delay matters at all or to make trouble. I was simply trying to get some valuable information.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman complains that the suggestion was as to the ingenuity of the method adopted to drag out the proceedings. I only suggested that if we were ready to vote on Tuesday night why did we wait all day yesterday?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did not have time on Tuesday night to put that question.

Mr. BENNETT: Secondly, I would point out that if the pairs were observed the government would have had a majority of fifteen at that time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If the pairs had been observed; but sometimes members forget all about them in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: If they were observed the government would have had a majority of fifteen.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I had no conference with the chief whip on the government side and I was not approached to take a vote on that night. The debate was carried on until eleven o'clock by the Minister of Labour himself.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let us take the vote now.

Mr. DONNELLY: Before the vote is taken I just wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the condition in which people in the dried-out area in Saskatchewan find themselves at the present time. The relief commission in the province of Saskatchewan furnished the farmers in that dried-out area with seed sufficient to sow their land, and I also understand that they have supplied those farmers who are using horses with feed for their horses to enable them to put in their crop. In the same manner those farmers who are using tractors instead of horses are being supplied with oil and fuel to enable them to put in their crop, but the difficulty is that while they have the seed and the power many of the farmers are needing repairs for their machinery, and it is almost impossible for them to get them, and therefore impossible to put in their crop. They have made representations to the municipalities, and the municipalities have made representations to the provincial government or to the commission, but there has been no decision yet as to what is to be done with regard to these repairs. I know that the Prime Minister will tell me that it is the duty of the Saskatchewan government to take up this matter with the commission, but I would urge him to bring this matter, which is of very great importance, to the attention of the Saskatchewan government or of the commission and see if something cannot be done soon to get these machinery repairs in order that the farmers may put in their crops.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Amendment negatived, on division.

Mr. BENNETT: I move, Mr. Chairman:

That section 2 of the bill be amended by striking out sub-paragraph (b) and by inserting in the said bill as section 3 thereof the following:

"3. In addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof."

The effect of that is that instead of saying "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may," we say "in addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session," and so forth. It strikes out those words at which offence was taken on the ground that they seemed to be too broad.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that the purport of the amendment moved by the Prime Minister is to leave section 2 (a) of the bill exactly as it is and to delete section 2 (b), and add a new section 3, so that the words which commence section 2 "notwthstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may" are changed to "in addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law," and so forth. I did not happen to be in the house when the matter was being debated the other day, when I think it was indicated from this side of the house that the words as now submitted by the Prime Minister are preferable to the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law." But as far as I can presently see, the words now used in the amendment are almost as wide in their scope as the language previously objected to. Looking up Hansard I observe that the objection was that with the very extraordinary powers taken under this legislation the administration might override the provisions of any statute. I think the resolution of parliament which was subsequently embodied in a statute with regard to Canada entering a possible or contingent war was quoted and it was suggested that the present legislation might override such statute or resolution. I personally must state that I am distinctly opposed to the amendment now moved although I think it is slightly less sweeping than the section as it now stands in the bill, but there is nothing in the amendment that removes in the slightest degree our fundamental objection to the clauses referring to peace, order and good government. The powers which the administration are taking in this amendment to take all such measures which may be deemed necessary, "in addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law" now upon the books are as wide as they were in the legislation of other years in regard to peace, order and good government, and the same deep-rooted and fundamental objection which we took to the previous legislation applies to the amendment now submitted, although I am prepared to admit that it is not now so obnoxious as it was with the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have just voted against the deletion of the words "peace, order and good government" in section 2 (b). Do I understand that they will still remain in the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but not at the place where they now are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Nothing has been done to remove them from where they now are?

Mr. BENNETT: My amendment proposes to strike out all of sub-paragraph (b) and substitute a new section 3. The effect I think was clearly stated by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre just a moment ago. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the effect of it is to leave in the provisions with respect to peace, order and good government, but to eliminate those provisions which seem to contemplate the possibility of orders in council overriding all existing statutory provisions of the dominion.

Mr. HANBURY: I just wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister and members opposite to these words which were spoken in this house on Tuesday of this week:

Does the hon. gentleman not think it is highly desirable to protect this parliament in the exercise of its powers from usurpation by a delegated authority?

That is the point we on this side are making in connection with this particular feature of the bill. I wish to call the attention of hon. members on the government side of the house to the fact that these words were used in this house on Tuesday of this week by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. DUPUIS: I want to say a few words before this amendment carries. I do not want to be too long because hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Chairman, would try to lead the house and the country to believe that we are intentionally trying to delay the passage of this legislation which is coming to the rescue of the needy. The Prime Minister a few minutes ago, replying to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, said that we on this side of the house were opposed to relief and to whatever has been done for the western provinces; he said that we wanted to raise prejudices and to divide east from west. As no one has answered this implication, which is absolutely wrong, may I be allowed to say for myself and, if I may do so, in the name of the province from which I come, that we from the province of Quebec are always glad to see this government come to the rescue of the western provinces, and have always approved of what has been done in that regard. As far as I can recollect we have never objected in this house to any legislation intended to assist the needy in the west, but we do object to having two ways of doing it. We object to two measures. The Prime Minister raised his voice in protest against an interruption of mine in regard to Montreal. He said, "We received only yesterday the report from the Montreal relief people." May I say to him, with all due respect, that he is not in a position to say that we are responsible for any delays in administration, in bookkeeping in the large centres of Canada.

What I intended to say on behalf of Montreal and of the eastern provinces was this. What we want is an opportunity to work, not to beg our bread as direct relief compels the people to do. The people want work, and if I said that enough had not been done for Montreal I had in mind the fact that prior to 1930 the Liberal government had voted $50,000,000 to build a central station in Montreal, and that as soon as this government came into power, owing to the advice, not of representatives of the west, not of the mayor of Toronto or of the mayor of Vancouver, but on the advice of a revengeful citizen of Montreal, who was then mayor of that city, this government stopped the spending of this $50,000,000 for the construction of that central station, which would have given work to hundreds, yes, thousands of people in Montreal who are now starving. There are works of different kinds that might have been done in Montreal, and help in other directions might have been given to our province and other eastern provinces, which this government has not carried out. That is all we are complaining about, and I say that the Prime Minister has no right to take advantage of a situation like this to make political capital out of it, if I may use his words, and to try to say to the western people, "You see the Liberal opposition from the eastern provinces are angry at my government for having come to the rescue of you people in the west." He has no right to take this attitude and I protest very strongly against it; he should give us justice. We may be very small in his eyes, but we are the representatives of the people, and we come from a province the intentions of the people of which are, to say the least, just as good as those of the right hon. representative of Calgary.

The Prime Minister also complains that we are intentionally delaying this legislation. As far as that goes, I fully concur in what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said. We support this bill, but we contend that it places in the hands of the government very drastic powers. Let me ask the government this question. If they are so anxious to help the needy and the unemployed, and knowing as they do that we object to the provision with respect to peace, order and good government, and have objected to it for the past four years, then they cannot plead ignorance of our attitude to this legislation so far as that particular provision is concerned. That being so, may I ask the Prime Minister why this bill was not introduced earlier in the session. Some weeks ago the Secretary of State brought in a bill entitled an act respecting a Bureau for Translations. Mind you, that was a very pressing piece of legislation, apparently, from his point of view, so pressing that the government did not want to wait a single day to have it passed. We spent a week objecting to certain principles it contained, and week after week went by in the discussion of legislation that was not pressing at all. Instead of bringing down that legislation, why did not the Prime Minister introduce this relief bill long ago? The government brought down this bill just before the Easter recess, though the Prime Minister knew perfectly well that we on this side of the house would object to the provision with regard to peace, order and good government. They brought in the legislation practically at the close of the fiscal year, though they knew that they could not have it passed in such order; yet, with all that knowledge they delayed its introduction. When they offer the arguments against us on this side which they have made with regard to the delay in the passing of this bill one is reminded of the tactics of an enemy during war. When they are trying to take a certain point in the opposing territory they make a screen of captive old people and children so that they will not be fired at.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down if you can't speak.

Mr. DUPUIS: Hon. gentlemen to the right of you, Mr. Chairman, have not much charity for the people of French origin.

Mr. MANION: Nonsense.

Mr. DUPUIS: Then why should they object if I do not find the proper words to use? I am trying to do my best, speaking in one of the legal languages of the country. I am trying my best to be understood by all members of this house, but if on occasion I do not at once employ the proper word I am heckled from all parts of the other side. That is not fair. I have been accustomed to meeting numbers of English speaking people; I have spent three years at McGill university; I have known people of English origin, and the impression that I have of their fair play I do not want hon. gentlemen opposite to destroy. Let them give me fair play; I am trying to do my best. I do not even ask them to speak French although they know very well it is of great advantage to know both languages.

I say in conclusion that the government has no excuse whatever for bringing down this legislation just at the end of the fiscal year when they knew that we would object to the peace, order and good government provision, otherwise called the "blank cheque." They have no excuse for creating prejudice in favour of the west against the east when they know that not only are the people of the east glad to help the people in the west where we have relatives and friends, but the eastern provinces contribute, and are glad to, a large share of the money that is spent for the benefit of the western people.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would like to ask the Prime Minister for some information in regard to the amount which has been spent under the relief legislation in Ontario. I note from the sheet that I hold in my hand that the amounts are as follows:

Act—	Amount
1930	$ 4,692,650 50
1931	11,119,811 86
1932	7,810,208 16
1933	7,753,625 54
	$31,376,296 06

I can understand the amount being smaller in 1930 than in 1931, but in 1932 the amount was about $3,500,000 under the 1931 amount. Was there less unemployment then in Ontario, or what caused the difference between the two years?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will remember that in the first year there was an appropriation of $20,000,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not asking about the first year.

Mr. BENNETT: In that year there was an allocation of the money among the provinces and the total expenditure was under $20,000,000, around $18,700,000. In the next and the succeeding year the contributions were based on the amounts the several provinces were willing themselves to expend. Perhaps the hon. member will recall that the municipalities and the provinces expended certain sums of money. Then there was laid down a principle applying to all the provinces whereby the dominion made contributions in terms of the expenditures of the provinces and the municipalities. That is the reason that item is so very large, for instance in the case of Ontario, because the expenditures were based upon what the municipalities and the province spent.

While I am on my feet may I say to the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville that he is entirely in error in his statement with respect to the attitude taken by the mayor of Montreal in connection with the Canadian National expenditure. He had nothing to do with it in any way, shape or form, directly or indirectly.

Mr. DUPUIS: It was published in the newspapers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that he was opposed to it was well known, but he had nothing whatever to do with the action taken with respect to the matter. But if he had, apparently he has been vindicated for he received the largest majority a previously defeated mayor has ever received.

Mr. DUPUIS: He did not get it on that question.

Mr. BENNETT: I only point out that that is the result. Let me go one step further with respect to the matter. The hon. member has referred specifically to the city of Montreal. I desire to repeat for his information that the city makes its report to the province and from the province we receive the accounts. All the other cities of Canada, without, I think, a single exception, have sent in their accounts at the most thirty or forty days after the expiration of the month; but for some reason, not yesterday but this morning the accounts of the city of Montreal with respect to only the months of August, September, October and November in part were received at the office of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. DUPUIS: When the Prime Minister received that report was he informed as to the cause of the delay? Because many sections of Montreal relay their reports one after another to the city hall. I was informed in Quebec city that the provincial government was awaiting returns by certain sections in Montreal to the city hall there, after which those returns have to be sent to Quebec for approval.

Mr. BENNETT: That may well be. I am not saying what the cause of the delay was between the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. As a matter of fact we have been asking for these accounts and I shall tell the hon. member why. It will be observed that the expenditures charged against Quebec for 1933 are only about $2,500,000. We know there are many millions of dollars more to be paid and we have been anxious to get the account. Let me go further. For some reason that I cannot say except that it be the way in which the accounts are kept, this government has not been able to receive until today the accounts with respect to the city of Montreal for any month later than last July. The result has been just what I have said. The city of Montreal is clamouring for money and it must look to the government at Quebec as between itself and that government why the accounts have not been rendered.

The other evening I pointed out that the form of certificate which we exact is one which the provincial auditor and the province will sign. When that is signed in that form and sent to us we try to get the cheque out with the least possible delay, just as soon as the accounts are checked over. I am informed that the accounts received by the department this morning were six or seven inches thick and they began only with the month of August last. Why this delay should happen is not for me to explain, but it is for me to say to the hon. gentleman that when he makes the statement he does about equal justice, we expect promptness on the part of those whose duty it is to discharge their obligation without endeavouring to put the blame where it does not belong. Just as soon as the accounts are received they are dealt with promptly, and Montreal is the only city in Canada from which we have not received the accounts through the province within a reasonable time after the expenditures have been made.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUPUIS: I just want to conclude this question by saying that when I spoke of equal justice I did not have in mind any undue delays on the part of his government with regard to direct relief; I had in mind what I have already stated—help to the unemployed, and in divers fields of activities and forms. May I say that in our province of Quebec, and perhaps I shall not be wrong if I say in Ontario also, the situation of the farmers is in some cases just as bad as that of our friends in the west. But nothing has been done for the Quebec people, although during the last election promises were made that paradise on earth should come to us. I hate to recall those promises, but the farmers of Quebec are in such need that they are just as much entitled to help as our friends in the west, yet nothing has been done for them. That is what I was saying a few moments ago; we want equal justice. The credit of our farmers is absolutely destroyed; their products remain unsold on their farms. I will not discuss the tariff question now; I just state the situation as it is. Farm after farm is being sold by the sheriff or abandoned, yet our farmers could have been rescued or helped by this government—there is no excuse for this government not helping them by a guarantee in some way or another of their mortgages. But nothing has been done. The farm loan board created by this parliament to lend money to the farmer offers unacceptable conditions, and a rate so high that the farmers cannot take advantage of it. This government knew when they came into power that they must do something for the farmers, and not only the western farmers. I repeat that I am not jealous of what the government has done for the west; they were right in doing it; it was good policy to help them in the difficulties they were facing owing to the decline in the export market for wheat. But while they have done so much for the west, what have they done for the east? Have they brought into this house a single piece of legislation to help the Quebec farmer? Take for instance dairy produce, butter, cheese; was any premium paid for butter as promised during the last election? Not a single cent; not a word of legislation was brought before this house. When a resolution designed to help the farmers was introduced two or three years ago the resolution was killed; it was talked out. I believe it was the hon. member for St. John-Iberville (Mr. Rheaume) who brought in a resolution to come to the rescue of the farmers who were to lose their cows owing to tuberculosis. Well, you had hon. members on the other side speaking against this resolution, and that is all we heard from the government. What if we did as some hon. members did in 1930, when the hon. member for Haldimand and two or three of his friends came into our province before the election and allowed the newspapers to describe them as delegates from the government? Mind you, it was then a Liberal government. They let the public think that they were representatives of the government, of the agriculture committee; they came into our province and into my riding and made an investigation concerning the awful state of the farmer. Of course I do not blame them, but they brought with them my good friend Gustave Monette—I suppose the right hon. gentleman remembers that name—to interpret for them. As the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Jean) suggests, that name is in the public accounts, and I am glad for him because he is a good lawyer if he is not a good loser.

Mr. BENNETT: He wins mostly, I understand.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You are a good winner.

Mr. DUPUIS: Of course I had to smile, but my smile did not last long when I heard that Mr. Bennett was in power. I was saying that if we had the—I should not say effrontery, but if we had the audacity to make a pilgrimage into Ontario to conduct an investigation in the county of Haldimand or other counties in Ontario into the condition of the farmers we should find innumerable farmers in a state of starvation who would beg us to help them out. But we would not presume to do such a thing; we let this government go and find out for themselves. We will let the members of this cabinet find out at the next general election. The people of Ontario will soon be able to say, as will the people of Quebec and the whole country if the way this government had administered this country is satisfactory to them.

So in conclusion I say again that the right hon. gentleman should not mix up questions. I know he is very bright—and may I say that sometimes my hon. friends on this side of the house do not like me when I try to do justice to an opponent, to a political enemy, if I may use that word, although it is a little strong. But I like to render justice to whom justice is due, and so although some of my friends do not like me to say it, I shall say that I admire the Prime Minister's way of speaking. He makes a very nice speech; sometimes he is almost too sophisticated, but he puts things in such a charming way. For some time he has charmed the people of this country, but I believe his charms are fading. This country is awaiting the call, is anxious to have this government call upon the people for their judgment. So I say that this government would do better if it did not insist upon the retention of the peace, order and good government clause in the proposed legislation. We are all ready to vote for the bill with that clause omitted, because we are just as anxious as hon. members on the other side to help the unemployed and the needy.

Mr. NEILL: Coming back to the business of the committee, I wonder if the Prime Minister would give to my ignorant lay mind an explanation of a small matter. The original section reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may—

Take certain drastic powers as regards peace, order and good government, etc. The amendment he now proposes to introduce reads:

> In addition to the provisions of any statute the governor in council may—

Take these power, etc. This is what puzzles me: if the measures that are to be taken in addition to these statutes are subject to the statutes and circumscribed by them it seems to me the ordinary laws will govern and the section will be wholly negative. If on the other hand they go beyond the existing statutes what is the need of the amendment, because it will be exactly the same as though the words "notwithstanding the provisions" were included. Does the Prime Minister follow me?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I follow the hon. gentleman perfectly. I pointed out the other day that the difference is purely a difference to the lay mind rather than to the legal mind, but hon. gentlemen opposite seem to prefer that the section should provide that the exercise of the powers with respect to peace, order and good government, if exercised, should be supplementary to existing legislation. I do not think it was intended that this construction should be placed upon it, but as they read it it meant that under the powers with respect to peace, order and good government there might be an entire and utter disregard of any existing legislation, instead of being in addition to it.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any real difference?

Mr. BENNETT: I ventured to say the other day that I thought the difference was more imaginary than real as a matter of legal construction, but hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to prefer the clause in that form, and I desire to meet their wishes. That was all.

Mr. NEILL: Then we are wasting time, are we not?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think so.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the Prime Minister for some further information. According to the figures furnished us, in the three years 1931, 1932 and 1933 there was expended by the Department of National Defence $4,683,496.90, and of that total $4,189,389.34 was expended in 1933. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, if he can give me the information, how much of that money was spent in Ontario.

Before the right hon. gentleman answers I want to ask another question, for the sake of information, in regard to the Department of Railways and Canals. We are told that this department spent $1,772,725.74 in 1931, and I should like to know how that money was spent. Was it for the purchase of ties, rails or other materials, or what was it used for?

Before I take my seat I should like to ask the Prime Minister in regard to the loans to the provinces, which are given in the summary as follows:

Manitoba	$10,286,774 34
Saskatchewan— (Including Saskatchewan relief commission)	22,579,078 16
Alberta	10,229,859 63
British Columbia	7,384,332 63
Canadian Pacific Railway Company	2,447,222 71
	$52,927,267 47

I should like to get this information from the Prime Minister, if he would be good enough to give it to the committee: Do the loans to the provinces bear interest and, if so, what is the rate of interest? I should like to ask also whether, when these moneys were advanced to the different provinces, those loans were made on the security of the notes of the provinces or how the loans were made, and whether any security was given.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I should like to ask the Prime Minister also in regard to the loan of $2,447,222.71 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether this loan bears interest and, if so, at what rate.

Mr. BENNETT: All the questions that have been asked by my hon. friend are answered in the orders in council that have been tabled, but I will endeavour to answer them again. I think this is at least the fourth time this year that these questions have been asked.

Mr. SANDERSON: The Prime Minister does not object to answering them, does he?

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the slightest, only I think perhaps it is not desirable that Hansard should be cumbered up by answering the same questions half a dozen times. The orders in council were tabled for the purpose of enabling hon. members to have this information.

With respect to the loans to the Canadian Pacific, they are covered by two orders in council. They were advances made for the purpose of enabling the shops to be kept open during the Christmas season. With respect to one advance no interest was charged, nor was interest to be charged; the principal was to be repaid. This was done instead of carrying on relief, and the amount saved, anticipating that the principal would be repaid in a reasonable time, is considerable as against paying direct relief to the number of people involved. The second loan bears interest and is repayable when the Canadian Pacific is in a position to pay it which, under present conditions, would seem to be reasonably within sight.

The provinces all have agreed to pay interest. The advances are evidenced by treasury bills. At first the rate was 5½ per cent; then it was 5 per cent, and I am not sure that it is not a little lower now. The rate always represents the rate at which the dominion may be able to borrow the money, plus some small fraction of a per cent which may be necessary for the purpose of paying the cost of taking care of the matter. There is no security on a treasury bill given the dominion, any more than there is with respect to a treasury bill given by the dominion or by any province. There is no form of security that the province could give except evidence of their indebtedness by a treasury bill. The amounts expended by the Canadian Pacific—

Mr. SANDERSON: If the Prime Minister will permit me to interrupt before he gets to the Canadian Pacific, will he tell me if there are any arrears of interest due from the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Some of the provinces have been unable to pay, and my memory is that they have capitalized their obligations by furnishing treasury bills for the interest as it fell due. It is self-bearing interest, which of course means compound interest, but to the extent of their ability the provinces have discharged their interest obligations.

The amount mentioned with respect to the railways has been the subject matter of much discussion in the house. The money was spent for ties; there was some work given with respect to a subway which I mentioned the other day, and some extra work was undertaken on the Welland canal that was not within the appropriation for the completion of the canal. Those were the items which, in the aggregate, comprised something over $2,000,000.

Then with respect to the question my hon. friend asked dealing with the camps under the Department of National Defence, I cannot give all the details that are asked. These camps were an experiment in 1932; in 1933 they became very widely established all over Canada, and I suppose the hon. gentleman has read what was said by a distinguished ex-minister of Great Britain as to the way in which that work was conducted, and the credit which he gave to Major General McNaughton, who is in charge of those undertakings. I cannot say at the moment how many camps are being operated in Ontario; if the hon. gentleman had mentioned the matter yesterday I would have obtained the information. I believe I can secure during the dinner recess figures showing the number of men in the camps in each of the provinces, but I cannot give the information now. I can state, roughly, that at one time the number was about 21,000, but because some of the men have been leaving and going into industry it has become smaller. General McNaughton informed me yesterday that the number who had left the camps to take positions amounted, in the aggregate, to 9,000 men. These men have left camps and taken more permanent work. That is one of the conditions under which they are employed. If they desire to leave they are at liberty to do so, because the money they have received is not by way of wages but rather to enable them to obtain some of the comforts of life, and they are provided with food and clothing. Those who are in a position to speak—and I do not regard myself as an authority—and the people who have inspected the camps, have spoken in commendation of them.

Mr. SANDERSON: When the Prime Minister is getting that information I wonder if he would ascertain how much of the four million odd was spent in Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member so desires, I shall get that information some time before the third reading of the bill. As I understand it I am to secure for him, first, a statement showing the amount expended in Ontario under the national defence relief camps; second, a statement of the number of camps throughout Canada and where they are located; and, third, so far as possible the number of men in the camps.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In the information supplied by the Minister of Labour I find under the heading "1931 act" a disbursement by the Department of Public Works of $1,726,732.64, and under the 1932 act a disbursement of $6,904.43. May we obtain information as to what money was expended, and how it was expended, for these various public works, and what kind of public works were carried on as relief measures?

Mr. BENNETT: May I say, in fairness, if the hon. gentleman desires that information, that those are the figures for 1930 and 1931. Accounts were filed and reports tabled, in which every detail was shown. Every detail for 1933 is in the printed report, and I hold in my hand a report for the year 1931 which, at pages 60 and 61, give details of public works expenditure.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The right hon. gentleman has answered questions concerning other years, and I wanted to get the information.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason I answered the questions with respect to the national defence camps was because the report in connection therewith has not yet been tabled. The report concerning 1931 expenditures was tabled long ago.

Mr. HANBURY: Mr. Chairman, yesterday the hon. member for West Lambton moved an amendment to the clause to which the Prime Minister himself has now moved an amendment. Consequently I wish now to move a subamendment to the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we should deal with one amendment at a time. As soon as this is disposed of, the hon. member could move it.

Mr. HANBURY: It is the Prime Minister's amendment that we propose to amend.

Mr. BENNETT: It is an addition to it.

Mr. HANBURY: Yes, an addition to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amendment moved by the Prime Minister disposes of the present subsection (b), as it exists, and the amendment of the hon. member for West Lambton would be the new subsection (b) of what would be the new section 2.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amendment now moved will be the new section 3. There is a slight anomaly in the amendment now moved in that it destroys subsection (b) and creates another section. It would be easier to delete subsection (b) and insert the new section 3, because some of us prefer the words "in addition to" to the words "notwithstanding the provisions of." At the same time we are opposed to the amendment because it includes the words "peace, order and good government."

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member will agree that it had to be framed so as to offer some substitute. Voting for this, as section 3, does not in any sense imply that an hon. member does not oppose subsection (b) of section 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There will be no objection to going back to section 2 and moving the subamendment.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not at all.

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. member for West Lambton made reference yesterday, in giving his reasons for the amendment, to the ability of the governor in council to take any action it might consider advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion. I believe that phrase is now in the amendment before the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: The new subsection 3 will cover it.

Mr. HANBURY: The new subsection 3 is what we are considering at the present time. Consequently the amendment I have to submit would be an addition to the proposed new section 3 now being considered by this committee. I therefore move:

That section 3 of the said bill be amended by adding thereto, as clause (b) the following words:

(b) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the governor in council to loan, or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No; we have taken the words from the statute.

Amendment negatived on division.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is now on the amendment of the Prime Minister. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say at the outset that I have not been following this debate very closely, because my mind was pre-occupied with what, to me, is a more important measure, namely, the natural products marketing legislation. However, I am also interested in this very important matter, and wish to associate myself with hon. members on this side of the house who, thus far, have conducted the debate. One point I wished particularly to make, and that is the total aggregate of guarantees given under the guise of relief legislation. From what I have heard in this house on various occasions I am familiar with several of them and particularly one given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for $60,000,000, and another given to the Beauharnois enterprise. I stated last year that without such guarantee the Beauharnois enterprise would have been only a junk pile. I am not particularly opposed to the guarantees, but I do object to the arbitrary manner in which they are being given, the secrecy with which arrangements are carried out, and the very limited control parliament has over such expenditures. I had risen to make these remarks some time ago when a point of order, which I thought had been disposed of, was being considered. I have had some experience, myself, in a small or provincial way, in connection with government guarantees, not of this nature perhaps but guarantees of farmers' enterprises in the west—a line of cooperative elevators in Saskatchewan, for example, in connection with which a guarantee was given. Capital expenditures have been advanced and a line of trading credit was given, but there was no attempt to keep it secret or under your hat, as is being done in connection with this wheat guarantee under the cover of relief legislation. How am I going to get the aggregate of all these guarantees when one of the important ones, wheat, is withheld?

I do not think I am open to the objection of being factious in my desire to get this information. I have taken this attitude for the last two years that parliament should know what amount of money is involved with regard to this wheat guarantee. Information of this kind was constantly forthcoming from month to month from Washington in the press dispatches with respect to similar guarantees in that country. There was no attempt to keep the information from their public, and why it should be done here is a question we are asking ourselves, unless the government can give good reasons why the information should be withheld. The only reason so far given is that there is a danger that it would adversely affect the price of wheat if the public knew how much wheat Mr. McFarland was holding in one form or another. But we are not asking for the amount of wheat. Like some of my colleagues I have been desirous of getting the amount and limit of that guarantee. Otherwise I do not know the aggregate guarantees that have been given under the Relief Act. I know in a general way that there has been about $110,000,000 given for real relief in one direction and another, but we know nothing as to the amount of this wheat guarantee and the extent of the annual line of credit.

I would appeal to the Prime Minister himself. I was for a short time as an onlooker in the banking committee and I heard members from the government side taking the ground that that information should be given. It was a guarantee given by the government of a trading account of Mr. McFarland's. It was public money and credit behind that line of credit, and naturally it was a matter of public interest all over Canada because the whole of Canada is behind and possibly involved in that guarantee. It may be urged that we cannot press for this information because the question is being considered by the banking committee but how can we justify giving the government another blank cheque until the previous one is fully accounted for? That is what gets me. That is not taking a pernickity attitude at all or quibbling. If any employee of a business firm is given a sum of money for his expense account when he comes back at the end of his trip he has to account for his expense money before he gets another advance for expenses. And so with this. Each blank cheque should be fully, not partly, accounted for before the government comes to us and asks for another.

Before I say any more, will the Prime Minister tell me where I am wrong in that attitude? Is it unreasonable? I have not, as I said before, been endeavouring to block this legislation at all. I want to get out of here as quickly as possible. There is an election coming in Saskatchewan, and I say quite frankly I want to be in that. I have a very strong desire to get home for that and for other purposes, and I would like to be able to tell my people what all this row is about, and what this blank cheque was used for. I thought that this blank cheque method and the provisions regarding "peace, order and good government" were finished with. In addressing public meetings I do not want to have to dwell on all these details as to why some guaranteed amounts were freely given by the government while the wheat guarantee was refused. I could tell them quickly if I had the total amount, if I could say it was four hundred millions or some other amount in round figures. That could be done in half a minute. But if I have to explain that there is an amount in question that is being withheld by the government they will want an explanation of what it is all about and I do not know yet myself. But rest assured that as long as that information is withheld everybody will put his own interpretation on why it is withheld. I do not want to impute motives or anything like that but when the government takes this extraordinary attitude you are bound to come to the conclusion that it is for reasons that have not been revealed to the house. That is only human nature ,and nobody can be accused of doing anything wrong in making such deductions. I have been in government circles a long while and I have been accustomed to people coming to me with wonderful designs, plans for patents, schemes for this that and the other thing but almost invariably when you inquire into the cause of all their anxiety and interest you find that frequently they want a loan or a job of some kind in connection therewith. In short, they have some axe to grind in most cases.

Now in the case of this wheat guarantee the government persists in refusing to tell us the amount of it. Hon. members will probably each draw their own conclusions as to why this information is being withheld may do far more injustice and far more damage to the government and no particular credit to ourselves in drawing on our imaginations as to what might be the reason. But you cannot prevent that from happening because the extraordinary course being pursued by the government of withholding something that as a matter of fact the government should have no hesitation whatever in giving because it would not have one particle of effect on the price of wheat.

Let me refer to some of the circumstances in connection with the guarantee of the co-operative elevators in Saskatchewan back in 1910. Instead of concealing the amount we actually boasted of it, especially at election times, and said: "There is what we have done up and above board to promote the cause of the farmer"—and not one dollar was lost in guaranteeing that line of credit for the co-operative elevators in Saskatchewan.

The CHAIRMAN: It is almost six o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the very apparent desire to rediscuss this matter which has been already twice this afternoon set out in its entirety I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Motion agreed to, on division.

Progress reported.

Mr. BENNETT: We will take supply, agriculture, after eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Fruit, including grant of $4,500 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $425,053.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My first word will be to congratulate the minister on retaining the grant to the horticultural council. I am not even going to ask him why he has retained that grant and eliminated the one to the national dairy council, but possibly he will give us a synopsis of what the situation is on the western fruit front, the eastern fruit front and the central fruit front, with regard to pests. Have new insect pests been infecting the fruit of the country and have old ones been surmounted? Any news of interest to the committee will be welcome, and if the minister will give us this information it may save a lot of questions. He might also tell us whether there is any danger looming up in the offing of the likelihood of the British government applying a quota to our apples or other fruit. If the minister would start with that he could then glide on to the other question with regard to the pest situation, and the quality standing of our fruit. I am also interested in how he is getting on with the inspectional work in the maritimes, which was not an easy matter at the start. Under his administration it has been considerably improved I understand. Shipping point inspection has always been sound, and while the maritimes took it up reluctantly I think it has made great progress.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): There has been no official intimation that any restriction will be placed upon the shipment of our fruit to the United Kingdom, and no new injurious insects have made their appearance during the past year. Perhaps in this connection the most important work has been that done in Ontario and Nova Scotia through the formation of combined advisory committees—that is, committees formed by officials in the provincial departments together with the officials in the federal department and those outside either department—to make a survey and decide the best plan of action to reduce infestation by the apple maggot. Both provinces have been one hundred per cent behind this campaign, and the results of the campaign in both Nova Scotia and Ontario have been, I am very glad to say, much more satisfactory than even the most optimistic expected in view of the very great infestation that has taken place in the provinces affected.

As the hon. member for Melville stated, there has been cooperation between the government of Nova Scotia and the federal government with respect to orchard inspection for apple maggot infestation, which for some time had caused a good deal of concern and irritation. There is now enforced shipping point inspection for apples for export, and the fruit growers are fully alive to the necessity of enforced and rigorous inspection of all kinds, especially in connection with fruit for export.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I suggest to my hon. friend that until we can get outside inspectors to do the inspection in these various districts, including the maritimes, we shall always have some difficulty in getting exact and reliable inspection. Whether it be in regard to school inspectors, or bank inspectors or railway agents, the head men of each such institution usually find it advisable to change inspectors around. During my experience with the maritimes, and with other places as well but particularly the maritimes, I found that they were intensely wedded to the idea of local inspectors for each constituency, and it was almost a sacrilege to suggest that anyone outside should come in and inspect apples —I am speaking of about ten years ago. I was glad to note some betterment, though not to the extent that I should like to have seen. Local influences are very strong in support of having local men, and so long as that continues it will be very difficult to obtain proper inspection of fruit, because of the tendency to be a little easy with neighbours. That however can be overcome very largely when they get it into their heads that the certificate of the government behind any product must be lived up to or it is not worth the paper it is written on. In the early days our wheat certificates had not the value they acquired later on. Of course, the certificates always had a fair value, but they must have a proven value, backed by a number of years' experience on the part of buyers, and once the buyers are fully confident that the certificates are bona fide and that the article in question is up to the standard certified to, the certificate is of inestimable value in selling the product. I am not saying that the maritimes are worse than others in this prospect anywhere else, but they have not become quite familiar with the idea and advantage of outside inspectors. A consignment of potatoes and apples was once shipped up to the old fruit branch building here and examined—the fruit commissioner sitting in front of the minister will recall the time—and when the barrels were opened and inspected, it was a holy terror, what they contained. That day, I hope, has gone by, and if the inspection is further tightened up there will not be a recurrence of such an experience.

In 1928 I was at Covent Garden in London, the most wonderful horticultural market I have ever seen, and they knew much more about Canadian apples than I did. They knew all about the British Columbia apples and about the determination of the fruit growers there to live up to standard. They also spoke highly of the Ontario apple and were delighted also with the maritime apples, as to quality, which could not be better; but, oh dear, they were disappointed about the packing, and those buyers stated candidly they wanted to know what was in the barrels before they would do any bidding on them in the auction rooms.

I am speaking candidly but I hope not harshly; but unless the inspection of fruit is followed up continuously and outside inspection employed the ones who are putting up a good pack are disposed to become indifferent if the others are not doing the same. I make these suggestions believing that great progress is being made, but it should be accelerated, because in this day of overabundance it is becoming harder and harder to sell a poor product, while on the other hand there is always a great advantage in selling a good product, because it helps greatly to sell itself.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What the hon. member has said is very true about local pressure being brought to bear upon inspectors who are appointed locally. I believe what has had a good deal to do with the change in attitude in this connection has been realization on the part of fruit growers of the importance, especially in connection with export, of a very thorough and rigid inspection. In Nova Scotia in particular a very definite effort is being made to improve the quality of the pack with especially good results. As the hon. member has said, one of the chief criticisms of Nova Scotia apples for export has been in connection with the quality of the pack. In view of what has been said and of the difficulty in many cases in the work of inspection, it would be interesting to the committee to receive a condensed summary of the inspections. In the whole dominion during the past year the paid inspections numbered 26,681, the reinspections asked for numbering 245, or a percentage of all inspections of .92 per cent. After reinspection by other inspectors reversals in certificates were only 16 or a percentage of the total inspections of .06, which I think is the finest compliment we can pay to the thoroughness of the work of our fruit inspectors.

Mr. RYERSON: Is there a charge for that inspection?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RYERSON: Why should there be a charge for the inspection of fruit when as regards almost every other commodity such as meat, bacon and so on, the inspections are given free of charge? It has always been a wonder to me why there should be this charge for fruit inspections.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reason for the charge for fruit inspection is that it was at first instituted at the request of the growers themselves and it has been continued or extended from time to time, at the request of the industry. There are other products the inspection of which has to be paid for: grains, grass seeds, hay, turnips, potatoes, grapes, tomatoes. These inspections also are made at the request of the producers. Personally, I feel the tendency is toward paid inspection for all these products, the industry feeling that if they pay they will have a better claim to ask for further and more specific inspection for the commodity as they realize the importance of the inspectional work.

Mr. RYERSON: Why should that not apply to meat inspection in the same way?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe it should and perhaps in a very reasonable time it will.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I caught the remarks of the minister aright, but I understood him to be expressing satisfaction with the work of the inspection staff in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to say in all sincerity that if the minister thinks the inspection of fruit in Nova Scotia as carried on by his department is or has been satisfactory, he is making a very great mistake. I have discussed this matter a great deal lately with fruit growers in Nova Scotia. Many of the troubles of the fruit industry there are due to the incompleteness and inefficiency of the fruit inspection. Of course when I say that the packing and grading of apples in Nova Scotia are not what they should be, I know I am to some extent reflecting upon the packers and shippers themselves, but at the same time that is no excuse for the unevenness, lack of uniformity, of the inspection of fruit in that province. During the past season there was a very heavy crop, between two and three million barrels being grown in Nova Scotia, most of which were of course exported to Great Britain; and in conversation with buyers of apples I have been struck with the necessity that exists for improvement in the inspection of fruit in that province. I should like the minister to take this matter very seriously into consideration. This is perhaps the only time in the last two or three years that I have spoken about inspection, because what is called one hundred per cent inspection was put into force only in the fall of 1930 and the fruit growers and shippers in Nova Scotia have been disposed to give the system a fair trial to see whether it would work out. But members of the committee will realize that there has been a great change in the system since compulsory inspection was adopted. Before 1930 prosecutions were possible; penalties were imposed upon fruit growers and packers who did not comply with the grading regulations. But under the system under which all fruit for export must receive an inspection certificate, the mere granting of the certificate is prima facie evidence and, I think, conclusive proof, that the apples are properly packed, and if I am correctly informed no prosecutions take place at the present time because the inspectors are not supposed to pass the fruit unless it is packed up to standard. There is no question that there has been passed by inspectors a great deal of fruit which does not comply with the grading regulations. If the minister thinks, as his remarks would indicate, that the inspection has resulted in the fruit all being packed up to standard in that province, he is very much mistaken. I feel constrained to express myself as forcibly as I can upon this subject. The easy thing to do would be to say that we are doing very well in the packing of our fruit in Nova Scotia, and the majority of the fruit packers are doing very well, but there is a minority in that province that are not complying with the law. Some of them are not trying to comply with the law, and some of them, due to the great pressure of work during the past heavy season, did not comply with the law, putting, for example, 800 barrels of apples over a grader in a day when 400 barrels should be the limit, or a warehouse handling 200,000 barrels of apples in a season when it ought to try to handle only 100,000 barrels. These conditions lead to even the most honest warehouse foremen and managers turning out packs of fruit which are below grade. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture with the greatest possible earnestness to consider very carefully the improvement, by any method that his fruit branch may advise, of the inspection services at least in Nova Scotia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate very much the fact that the hon. member who has just spoken comes from a fruit growing and, in particular, an apple growing district. I find difficulty, however, in being able to understand the sweeping statements that he has made, in view of the fact that fruit growers especially those who pay for their inspections are, because of that, not at all hesitant or backward, so far as we have found them, in laying complaints about poor inspection. Last year's crop was practically double that of previous years. The number of barrels from Nova Scotia was as follows:

	Barrels
1930	1,172,000
1931	1,427,000
1932	1,054,000

The number of barrels therefore in 1933 was more than double the number in 1932, which no doubt taxed our inspectors to the utmost. Some difficulty was experienced in enforcing the regulations, but there has been no official complaint received from the fruit growing bodies of Nova Scotia, and if this has been known to the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) for some time I cannot help feeling that it is regrettable that it was not brought to the attention of the department sooner.

Mr. ILSLEY: The season closed only recently, and one has to get a picture of the cumulative effect, and find out just what has happened on the English market. One thing that brought the matter to my attention was a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture in Nova Scotia on his return from the United Kingdom in February. While he did not expressly go into the question of the pack, anybody reading that speech and following it closely could not fail to realize the great regret he had that our apples as opened up on the British market had not been better graded and packed. It may be that I should have gone to the minister with this complaint before, but I must say that it was never borne in upon me as it was during the last two or three weeks, when I discussed the matter with a great many growers and shippers in Nova Scotia. There is a feeling on the part of the people engaged in the business there that they want a stern, rigid and thorough inspection of apples, and that they did not have it during the past season. In saying that I am not attacking all the inspectors; many of them have been doing the best they could; the trouble may be, as the minister says, due to the great size of the crop. But provision must be made for these heavy crops in future and more attention given to inspection by the department.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate very much the fact that this desire for a rigid inspection is evidenced by the fruit growers of Nova Scotia, because it is a very healthy sign. On the other hand I am still at a loss to understand, having regard to the hundred per cent effort on the part of the province and the federal department of agriculture to work in cooperation, why the Minister of Agriculture for the province has not communicated with the federal department with a view to planning a more rigid inspection. Doubtless however he will do so in the near future so that every preparation may be made to remedy any weakness in the inspection service.

Sir EUGENE FISET: May I ask if this vote covers the salary of both fruit and vegetable inspectors?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Both.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then I would call the attention of the minister to the fact—and I think he knows about it—that at the present time in the counties of Témiscouata, Rimouski and part of Matane there is no inspector of fruit and vegetables owing to the death of inspector Desrosiers? I have received numerous letters from cooperative societies in these counties asking me to try to ascertain from the department when a new inspector will be appointed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that following the death of Mr. Desrosiers and until a successor could be appointed one of our inspectors from Montreal was sent to that district immediately to carry on the work temporarily, until steps could be gone through to appoint a successor.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have been informed that this inspector was there not permanently but just now and then. Of course I suppose it is a matter of political patronage. The inspector we had was one of the best qualified inspectors, and I quite realize that the minister finds it difficult to get a well qualified inspector owing to the fact that the man appointed must be able to speak both French and English. I have submitted to the minister the name of a well qualified man, who by the way, belongs to the Conservative party; therefore from a political point of view there should be no objection. I hope the minister will take action to appoint a permanent inspector as soon as possible.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of course the appointments are made by the civil service commission.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the minister if he has printed and promulgated the regulations under the Fruit and Honey Act passed about three weeks ago?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not yet.

Mr. NEILL: It will be remembered that he said they were "being drafted now and will be submitted at the earliest possible date after the bill passes."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They will first be submitted to the growers themselves. They are in shape now to be sent out for their approval at the beginning of next week.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the minister give us a list of the fruits and vegetables included in this item, and say what was the total production for each and the total consumption in Canada?

Mr. GAGNON: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUPUIS: I understand my hon. friend from Dorchester is answering for the minister with his laugh, but I hope the minister will not consider that that is satisfactory.

Mr. GAGNON: My laugh was because the question is foolish.

Mr. DUPUIS: I beg your pardon? Of course I do not like to make any theatrical scene here, but the hon. member is not what I thought he was. He says that the question is foolish. I hope he will withdraw that right now without the obligation being enforced by the chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPOTTON: "Infantile" might have been a better word.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the minister allow me to ask that the very pretentious member for Dorchester put himself on the level of his pretensions to be polite at least? I ask him to withdraw, otherwise I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to oblige him to withdraw. We are not in a barn here, we are in the House of Commons, the most solemn assembly in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. GAGNON: If the hon. gentleman wishes to ask me a question I think he ought to obey the elementary laws of decency. He said I was a most pretentious member. If he wishes to withdraw that remark—

Mr. DUPUIS: I am sorry to disturb the committee with this nonsense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, "hear, hear." The nonsense is from your right, Mr. Chairman. How could an hon. member with the pretensions of the hon. member for Dorchester say to one of his colleagues, on whichever side he might be, that he puts a foolish question when I am trying to help the committee to settle a question that is of importance to agriculture? So if my hon. friend forces me to do it I am putting a point of order: I submit that the remark of the hon. member for Dorchester was unparliamentary and that he should withdraw it.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. GAGNON: I will leave that to your judgment, Mr. Chairman. I understand the hon. member is asking the Minister of Agriculture to give the full list of all fruits and vegetables produced in Canada, with figures of production and consumption. He might have forgotten one detail; probably he wanted to ask the number of fruit inspectors, but he did not say so. So I submit that an hon. member who asks such a question is not serious; in my humble opinion it is a foolish question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: On a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville has raised a point of order, and I suggest that it would be desirable for the hon. member for Dorchester to withdraw the word "foolish."

Mr. GAGNON: I gladly submit to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, all the information requested is not available. I should be glad to give the information I have, though I feel that it might be more satisfactory if I were to look at the question in Hansard, and then I should be glad to supply the hon. gentleman with all the information available.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would it be possible to obtain from the minister also the consumption in Montreal and the importation from other provinces? If I put a proper question at the proper time could the minister tell me, for instance, the consumption of potatoes in Montreal and the quantity imported from other provinces or other countries, and could I obtain the same information with regard to other fruits and vegetables? Is it possible for this department to give me that information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not accurately. We could tell the number of carloads arriving at that point, but if there is any information that we can give after we see the question in Hansard we shall be very glad to supply it.

Mr. DUPUIS: I thank the minister. Now I should like to know whether there are inspectors stationed at the public markets to check the classification of fruits and vegetables and, if so, whether the minister was able to appoint citizens of the province of Quebec able to speak both languages. I understand that last year there were many cases of, I will not say, the abuse of power, but where the rules and regulations were drastically applied by inspectors who could not explain themselves in the French language. I made complaints, not because I have any prejudice against any citizens of this country but because it was a case of public necessity. Let me give an illustration. An inspector is stationed at the Bonsecours market in Montreal, and he checks up a farmer who has not classified his potatoes properly. The inspector speaks only English and the farmer speaks only French. The farmer may think the inspector is talking about the weather instead of about potatoes. I am only speaking from the practical point of view, and I should like to know if the minister can tell me that this year the inspectors will be able to make themselves understood in both languages in regard to this classification of fruit and vegetables, of which I am in favour so long as it is carried on in a spirit of cooperation.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have a very full appreciation of the importance of inspectors engaged in this work, in which they have to give reasons for their actions, being able to express themselves clearly in either English or French. As I said before, the appointments are made by the civil service commission, though sometimes we have to send additional inspectors to cooperate with and assist the bilingual inspectors at certain points. In this connection every effort is made to see that the inspector will be able to make himself understood in both languages. Should there be any criticism in this connection, though the appointments are made through the civil service commission, I should be very glad to bring the matter to their attention and to do everything possible to correct the situation.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am very grateful for these remarks by the minister. I should like to remind hon. members that if they had an inspector on the Toronto market who tried to talk with the farmers in French I am sure they would not endure that situation for very long, and I would not blame them. Last year, if I am not mistaken, the inspector in charge of the Bonsecours market in Montreal was a gentleman named Robinson.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He was the district inspector.

Mr. DUPUIS: He was the one who applied the law; he was the one who had our farmers arrested and brought before the criminal courts for having forgotten to put cards on the bags of potatoes stating the grade of the contents. I remember that I represented those farmers several times, sometimes half a dozen, sometimes more and sometimes less, and the penalty was $10 and costs for having forgotten to put their names and the grades on the bags of potatoes. I tried to induce the inspector in charge to have the cases postponed, but he absolutely refused to do so. The cases came before Hon. Amedée Monet, and I asked for a delay of one week so that I could confer with the Montreal minister, the Minister of Marine, who, may I say in passing, was kind enough to take up this matter and bring it to the attention of the ministry. The inspector in charge, however, absolutely refused to agree to a delay or postponement, because the offence was so great. I said to Judge Monet, "A moment ago a man accused of manslaughter was granted a postponement of fifteen days. I wonder if the chief inspector considers that the failure to attach a card showing the grade is as serious an offence as that of manslaughter." It was only after that remark to the judge that I obtained a postponement to enable me to communicate with the Minister of Agriculture, whom I know to be a gentleman and one who wishes to give justice to those to whom justice is due. I said to the Minister of Marine that I wanted him to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, because I was sure he would not allow such a condition to exist. What occurred? I remember on one occasion I met an inspector who was able to speak both languages, and I was told by him, "I would be ready to be lenient in a first offence but the chief inspector said, 'Let those Frenchmen pay their fines; that is all they deserve'." So I protested and said to the chief inspector, "You must remember that we are all citizens of this country; we are British subjects, and we do not deserve the treatment you are giving us." He protested and denied what he had said. I would not name the inspector, because he asked me not to name him because he might lose his job. I say that if that chief inspector had spoken both languages probably he would have understood the intentions of the farmers, and he would not have been so drastic and have imposed such severe penalties for such a trivial offence as the one of which the farmer was accused.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The statement made by the hon. member with reference to the inspector making such a statement about his French compatriots is indeed a very serious one. I do not think it would be fair to the staff that that statement should be allowed to stand on the record without having evidence to substantiate it. I can assure the hon. member that if such evidence is submitted to the department there will be no delay in removing the responsible official. In view of the fact that a board sits and is responsible for the selections made I cannot credit the suggestion that such a thing could occur. Reference has been made to the fact that the district inspector would not be lenient, and that the work had to be proceeded with. I hesitate to say what I am about to say but I believe no hon. member can take objection to my statement that the department of agriculture of the province of Quebec has approached us in connection with making a greater effort towards rigid inspection and compliance with the regulations. We appreciate the attitude of the provincial department. They have appointed twenty-one men to cooperate with our men. Up to this time it has been the policy of the federal inspectors not to prosecute on a first offence.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is what they did last year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: I suppose on this occasion they were setting a good example.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We believe that in a first offence, especially where the people involved are not to any great extent engaged in trade, we should not prosecute, except in those cases where the offences are deliberate. In very close cooperation with the provincial department of agriculture and the provincial government, we are endeavouring to carry out their wishes, and to do a service which they feel is most essential to the improvement of the marketing of their own products. I should again like to remind the hon. member, however, that in fairness to the staff of inspectors evidence should be submitted to prove beyond doubt the accusations which have been made because, in my estimation, nothing could be more regrettable.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, I did not make the statement with a view to forcing a man out of his job.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He should not be on the job.

Mr. DUPUIS: At the time of the occurrence I settled the matter with the gentleman in question, and I know that he did not repeat his statement. Of course, if at that time I had been narrow minded enough to proceed I would have had to consider that if the statement had been made it was made only after a very heated discussion. Nevertheless, I am broadminded enough not to throw a man out of work because of an imprudent word uttered under abnormal circumstances. The consequences, as I have said, would have been to throw the chief inspector out of employment, and the gentleman who gave me the information would have been faced with a similar difficulty. I thought the consequences were too heavy to make a complaint. People often come to my law office and ask me to sue for damages occasioned by similar utterances. Probably some man will call his neighbour a thief, or will make some other unfortunate reference. I always advise these people to forget their grievances, when the utterances complained of are made under circumstances such as I have described, in which people lose their tempers.

I raise the question only with this in view, that I believe the minister should put at the head of the department in Montreal a citizen of that city or one of the province of Quebec who speaks both languages fluently. The gentleman might be of Scottish descent, a condition which would be most acceptable. Then he might be of English stock, which might be just as good an arrangement. In fact, the person appointed could be of any race, provided he could speak both languages fluently. That is the condition I should like to see imposed. I believe if my suggestion were accepted it would be beneficial to the department and to the farmers concerned, but I do not blame the provincial government for asking the cooperation of the federal authorities. May I say that I am speaking particularly on behalf of the farmers of Laprairie and Napierville who are intensive producers of vegetables, and who are anxious to cooperate with the government in the classification of their products. I believe if prudent steps are taken no difficulty will be experienced with the farmers in my constituency, and if, as has been explained by the minister, the department now notify the farmer before taking proceedings I believe conditions will be satisfactory.

I said last year to the chief inspector, "Why do you not send a notice to the farmer in the first instance? Why do you go after these farmers as thieves in the night would do without first sending them a notice?" I must say that I did not see on the market any of the inspectors named by the provincial department of agriculture, although some may now be operating. At the particular time about which I speak there were no provincial inspectors. But if the provincial officials are at fault I would be just as ready to blame them. I am a Liberal, but not Liberal enough to swallow any unjust practices, even if they come from Liberals. I ask for justice, and that is all. Even if the inspector at fault had been nominated by the provincial government I would rise and protest against his action, because we are looking for justice and I believe that on both sides there is the intention to help the farmer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the inspectors being appointed by the provincial government I hope I made no statement that would lead anyone to think that I was even implying that this inspector was one of the provincial government appointments. The only point I was trying to make was to show the effort and concern on the part of the provincial government that this whole matter of inspection should be tightened up and to assist in that they had appointed twenty-one inspectors. I must differ however, with the hon. member when he says the punishment would be too severe. I do not think it is so much a matter of the punishment being too severe as whether or not the man is qualified for his job. If the statement attributed to him was made I do not think he is qualified for the job, and even at this time I think steps should be taken to remove him.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to bring to the notice of the minister a matter of which he has perhaps full knowledge, and that is in regard to the apple bearing trees especially of western and central Ontario. My information is that owing to the abnormal sub-zero weather of last winter about fifty per cent of the apple trees have been killed. Has the minister any information in regard to that? I want it to be thoroughly understood, Mr. Chairman, that in bringing this matter before the minister I do not blame the government for this destruction. The government gets blamed for very many things without that. I am mentioning the matter because I thought the minister might have some statement to make.

Mr. BOUCHARD: The government made no promises about the trees.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid it is all too true that the sub-zero weather on a number of successive days has been very injurious to the apple trees not only of western Ontario but of eastern Ontario. There are those who feel not only that this year's fruit crop will be very seriously affected, if not in some cases wiped out one hundred per cent, but that the apple trees themselves because of the particular time at which the sub-zero temperatures came, will be killed. But I think it is too early yet to make a statement such as that. Our people have investigated the bark of the trees to the cambium layer, and their investigations have shown them that in some instances it has almost been destroyed, that this layer adjoining the bark through which the sap passes is injured and the bark can be pulled off readily by the hand. But personally I think it is too early to make any estimate of the lasting damage that may have been done to the apple tree. Certainly, however, there has been very serious injury.

Mr. SANDERSON: I suppose I may take it from the minister's remarks that he and his department are fully aware of the situation and have it under consideration, and that they will consider it in the light of how the interests of the apple growers may be affected.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand that there has also been some injury to the apple trees in Nova Scotia but not to anything like the same extent as in Ontario. Would the minister care to say anything about the extent of the damage in Nova Scotia? I know that officers of the department are making a survey with a view to getting definite information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There has also beer some injury in Nova Scotia, but as I stated of Ontario I do not think anyone is in a position yet to say definitely how far-reaching in quantity or lasting in damage the injury has been.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are there any reported instances of trees being killed outright in Nova Scotia as in Ontario?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We do not think anyone is in a position yet to say definitely that a tree has been killed outright.

Mr. MacLEAN: Coming back to the question of inspectors, I would like to know if it is the policy of the department to have the fee for the carload inspection of table-stock potatoes pay for the cost of that service. I understand that the fee for inspection at the present time is five dollars per carload. The reason I raise this question is that in our province, as the minister knows, the potato industry is a very important one, and last season was a very hard one for handling potatoes and keeping them free from frost. A request was made especially in the larger towns that a full time inspector of table-stock potatoes be employed. We took this matter up with the department and with the head of the branch and we were told that because of the policy of economy that was being followed in every branch of the government they could not see their way clear to appoint a full time inspector at Summerside. The difficulty there was that each day potatoes were being taken in from the farmers at a great many different points and it was impossible for the man in the warehouse to tell whether the potatoes were touched with frost or not. A request therefore was made that a full time inspector be appointed who could go from warehouse to warehouse and from point to point and test out the potatoes to see if they were free from frost. I regret that the department could not see its way to do this, and the result was that only when a carload was ready were the inspector's services called in. I would ask the minister if it is the policy of the department to endeavour to have the five-dollar fee pay for the cost of the inspection service, or is the department contributing anything over and above that fee to the cost of the service.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The fee charged does not cover the inspection, and there is no effort being made at the present time to charge a fee that would cover the cost of inspection. The request for a full time inspector to which the hon. member for Prince has referred came towards the end of the season when there was very little work to be done. Consideration is being given to the advisability of having a resident inspector, not a full time inspector, who could be called upon to make an inspection when any person desired it, and who would be paid for the actual time that he took in making it. We will bear in mind for the future the observations that the hon. member has just made in reference to this matter.

Mr. MacLEAN: I thank the minister for his explanation, but I would point out that the inspector at Summerside was practically compelled to give his services to the different warehouses and at the different points where potatoes were being taken in, and I regret to say that he received nothing for those services. He lived in the town of Summerside and I do not think he refused his services to any warehouse or at any point where potatoes were being taken in, but the difficulty was that he was compelled to give his services free, the only service that he was paid for being the car inspection service. I bring the matter to the minister's attention because it was brought very forcibly to my attention by the large shippers there, who felt that this man gave them a service which they did not feel they should pay for, as it was a government inspection, and which the government felt they could not pay for because they were paying him on a carload inspection basis.

Sir EUGENE FISET: With regard to seasonal inspectors, has the minister received any recommendation from the government of Quebec looking towards the employment during the season, while students are studying in our agricultural colleges, such as the one at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere and at Rimouski? If so, at what time should these applications for such work be sent to the department, and are they to be sent direct to the federal department or through the provincial government?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that there has been no request from the provincial government. We do receive requests or suggestions and we ask the agricultural colleges which the students attend to give us a statement indicating their estimate of the students, based on their work in college and their attitude towards the work, as an assistance to us in making selections.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then the application must come direct to the department at Ottawa.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: This vote includes an item of $4,500 to the Canadian horticultural council. What is this council and why is it entitled to the money?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should remember that, because I have answered it once or twice each year for the hon. member. They gather information and combine the requests, the advice and the suggestions from the fruit industry from one end of the dominion to the other, those actually engaged in production and in the trade. In connection with the administration of the Department of Agriculture we have found them very helpful in giving us further contact and a further picture of the problems of the fruit growers. They are always willing to give us any assistance, and through them we feel that we are getting more directly into touch with the trade than we could through our own department.

Mr. YOUNG: That is rather enlightening; we grant $4,500 to certain people to tell us what they want. Has the minister taken any steps to find out whether or not this organization has ceased its political activities?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should appreciate it very much, if the hon. member feels that they have political activities, if he would tell us whether these activities are C.C.F., Liberal or Conservative. As far as I am personally concerned I have never at any time had any reason to believe that they were politically minded. They are representative of the trade and, I believe, absolutely non-political. I know that they have not at all been hesitant in criticizing and in offering suggestions as to the improvement of the administration at times during the present term of office of this government, but I cannot too emphatically state that as far as my observations go there has not been the slightest tendency on their part towards anything political.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps the minister has forgotten that a couple of years ago the fruit growers of Ontario withdrew from the organization because they said that the council had turned it into a political organization through their political activities. A few years ago there used to be a similar grant, somewhat larger, to the dairy council, and that was withdrawn because they were politically active. The dairymen objected to this at the beginning, but now I understand they do not want to have the grant back because, they say, they feel themselves freer and better off without the money. Has the minister approached the horticultural council to find out whether they too believe that they would be better off without this grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Did the hon. member say that the grant was withdrawn from the dairy council because they were political?

Mr. YOUNG: I understand so.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. The grant was withdrawn, I believe, during the present administration's tenure of office, and that had nothing to do with the withdrawal, because I did not feel at any time that that body ever was any more political than the horticultural council. With reference to the remark that the producers of Ontario withdrew from the membership of the horticultural council for political reasons, it came to my attention some two or three years ago that the Canadian horticultural council was not representative of Ontario and I made very careful inquiries; for it is because we feel that they are representative that we attach so much importance to their advice and opinions and, more or less, guidance; and the information I gathered was that the body set up independently of the Canadian horticultural council was not the actual commercial producers of fruit but rather the amateurs in gardening and in other phases of horticulture.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, etc., also grant of $17,010 to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $393,200.

Mr. SANDERSON: What does the vote mean by fertilizer control?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This vote is for this particular branch of the department and for payment of officials, and for the administration of the Fertilizer Act. In addition, some of the money is used to defray one-third of the freight, up to fifty cents a ton, on lime fertilizer in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and in the maritimes, the provinces included paying their share of it. A check is also made as to the composition of the fertilizer to see that it is up to standard .

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the minister aware that the price of fertilizer has gone up considerably in the last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand it has, yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Can the minister explain why?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that it is due partly to the increased cost of production and also the increased cost of raw materials imported. I must confess I have not looked into the matter.

Mr. SANDERSON: My information is that as soon as this government increased the tariff on fertilizer coming from the United States the Canadian producers or manufacturers of fertilizers increased their price. Has the minister any knowledge of that?

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member is somewhat mistaken with regard to the price of fertilizer. When I was at home at Easter I got my price list from our potato growers' association. I happen to have in my room the price list for last year. I took the trouble to compare the two, and while ammonia is $2 a ton dearer, the other three ingredients, potash, phosphate and soda, are from $3 to $5 a ton cheaper than they were last year. That is in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am going only on the information that I get from the farmers in my constituency and from the minister tonight. In the face of the information which I have and the information which the minister has given the committee to-night that there has been an increase in the price, the situation in Prince Edward Island may be local, but I am speaking of the farmers of Ontario and in particular of western Ontario.

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member must not forget that I am a farmer and a buyer of fertilizer.

Mr. SANDERSON: Has the hon. member any more information than the minister has on the matter?

Mr. MYERS: I imagine I might have because I buy fertilizer and I do not think the minister does.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am pleased to say that as regards my farming operations the soil is fertile enough that it does not require fertilizer. But there is no difference of opinion. I understood the hon. member for South Perth, when he raised the question of increased cost of fertilizer, to refer to his locality—

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —and I understand in that locality there has been a slight increase in the cost.

Mr. SANDERSON: I well remember, and I think hon. members and the country will remember, that when the increased tariff was put on fertilizer, the Prime Minister stated in regard to not merely fertilizer but everything, that if he and the government found after this increased protection was given that manufacturers in Canada raised their prices, the tariff would be taken off. I ask the minister to look into the matter because my information is that there was a substantial increase in the price of fertilizer to the farmers of western Ontario following the increase in the tariff on fertilizer coming into this country. Will the minister look into that?

Mr. MYERS: Does the hon. member for South Perth not know that there is absolutely no tariff on the ingredients that enter into the fertilizer mixture? We can import acid phosphate, potash, soda and ammonia without any tariff at all. When they are imported and mixed in Canada, they enter free of duty. There is a duty on ready mixed fertilizer coming into the country, but there is very little of that coming in. There is surely not one tariff in Perth and another in Prince Edward Island; the tariff must be the same.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. SANDERSON: I quite agree with my hon. friend that the tariff is the same, but I think he and I are at cross purposes.

Mr. MYERS: Not at all.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not pretend to know anything about the price of fertilizer in Prince Edward Island, and I do not think he knows anything about the price in Ontario.

Mr. MYERS: But the tariff would be the same in Ontario and Prince Edward Island; it is free.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes, but the price is different, and I am well aware of the fact that the farmers in my constituency have paid more for their fertilizer since the tariff was raised on fertilizer coming into Canada.

Mr. MYERS: But there is no tariff on fertilizer coming in.

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes, there is.

Mr. MYERS: There is on ready mixed fertilizer but not on the ingredients.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend is mistaken. There is no tariff on each ingredient, but there is on the manufactured commodity, that is the fertilizer ready to put on the ground.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member for Queens tell us what the tariff is on the mixed fertilizer and what is the cost of mixing it?

Mr. MYERS: I understand the tariff on mixed fertilizer is ten per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the cost of mixing the ingredients?

Mr. MYERS: I suppose they would be mixed in a plant at a cost of roughly $1.50 a ton. The farmers in Prince Edward Island are possibly a little ahead of those in Ontario. We do not believe in using a ready mixed fertilizer that carries in it a filler which is worth absolutely nothing. We import the ingredients and we mix them ourselves. In this way we get the genuine article and we pay no tariff.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member say that the ten per cent tariff does not more than pay for the mixing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say that if it more than paid for the mixing, mixing stations would be established here.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I think the minister could clear up this question if he were kind enough to tell us how much fertilizer was imported in the form of the ingredients and how much in the compounded form. Then we would know what quantity was imported in the simple form of phosphate or nitrate or potash and how much was imported in the compound form of mixed fertilizer, and what duties were paid last year on the importation of mixed fertilizer. This information is very important.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not the information before me, but I shall be glad to take note of this as a question and to supply the information as far as it is possible for us to do so. I am sure at least the majority of hon. members who have spoken have been sufficiently engaged in business to realize that the matter of a rise in price requires careful consideration before we could decide whether it was due to any one particular factor.

Mr. MacLEAN: I can scarcely agree with the hon. member for Queens—

Mr. MYERS: I would not expect it of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MacLEAN: —that the fertilizer does not cost us a little more in Prince Edward Island since the ten per cent tariff was imposed. My hon. friend will agree that large potato growers import the ingredients and do the mixing themselves, but he and the committee must not forget that throughout Prince Edward Island and the rest of the maritimes there is a very large proportion of small farmers who cannot go to the trouble of buying the different ingredients and mixing them themselves and who have to buy the ready mixed fertilizer on which they pay a duty of ten per cent. If I had time to go to my room I could produce figures to prove what I am saying. A large quantity of mixed fertilizer is brought in every year, and I think the minister, before his estimates go through, should give us the information. The point I wish to make is that the smaller farmer, the man who is least able to pay this ten per cent duty, is the man who is compelled under the present arrangement to pay it. As we all know, under the former Liberal administration fertilizer was put on the free list and everyone could import it in any form he chose. The farmers in my province could order a car or a steamer load of mixed fertilizer from any part of the world, bring it in there and unload it free of duty, but under present conditions they are forced to do the mixing themselves or to pay the ten per cent duty. I am not sure, but I think some of the ingredients also carry a duty. The hon. member for Queens might be able to give us that information. I believe some of them cannot at present be imported free of duty. The point I want to emphasize is that the man who is least able to pay is the one who has to pay the increased price.

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member for Prince is so politically minded, as has been mentioned before, that he can hardly get away from politics.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Be fair.

Mr. MYERS: I am very fair.

An hon. MEMBER: He is liberal minded.

Mr. MYERS: I may inform the hon. member that in making the statement that there is a tariff on some of the ingredients he is absolutely wrong. There is no tariff on acid phosphate, ammonia, soda or potash. There is a ten per cent tariff on ready mixed fertilizer, but as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned my information is that we have not imported a bag of ready mixed fertilizer in the last three years. We have a mixing plant in Prince Edward Island and the ingredients are brought in and mixed there. The hon. member said if he had time to go to his room he would be able to show that fertilizer —I think he was speaking of mixed fertilizer —was dearer this year than last.

Mr. MacLEAN: I did not say that.

Mr. MYERS: Then I misunderstood. I want to inform the hon. member that I have figures from the potato growers' association of Prince Edward Island for 1933 and 1934 for 4-8-8 and 4-8-10 and 4-8-12 ready mixed fertilizer, and in every case they are from $1 to $3 a ton less in price this year than last. Probably he has those figures himself.

Mr. MacLEAN: The argument of my hon. friend is not very strong, because raw material used in any manufacturing industry at the present time is away down in price, and therefore the price of the product should be less. Does my hon. friend contend that we, in Prince Edward Island, are in a position, with potatoes selling last year at six cents a bushel, to pay a higher price for fertilizer than we were when fertilizer was coming in free and potatoes were selling at $1 a bushel? The whole difficulty is that the price of mixed fertilizer has not been reduced to the point that it should be, considering that the raw material can be brought in for almost half the price it cost a few years ago, as is the case with the raw material for almost every other manufacturing industry. So my hon.

friend does not get very far with that argument. But Prince Edward Island is not the only place on the map that uses fertilizer. If the hon. gentleman looks up the returns he will find that there are imported into Canada large quantities of mixed fertilizer on which a ten per cent duty is paid, and if he is not paying it other farmers throughout Canada are.

Mr. MYERS: I am glad the hon. member for Prince agrees with me on this, that the price of fertilizer is lower this year in Prince Edward Island than it was last year. He differs from his colleague the hon. member for South Perth in that regard. So I am glad that for once I have the support of the hon. member for Prince, something I very seldom get.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As I stated before, I think any business man, before making a sweeping statement, should realize that many factors would have to be looked into before he could be satisfied as to what particular cause led to an increase in price. The argument of some hon. members opposite is that the price has increased due to the putting on of a tariff by this government. Following that argument further, how is it that fertilizer is now from $3 to $5 a ton cheaper than it was when this government came into power? I do not say it was the putting on of the tariff that caused the reduction, but it certainly would go to show that it has not increased the price. We have given the assurance that the matter will be looked into, and any information which has been asked for that can be brought down we shall gladly furnish.

Mr. BROWN: When the minister is getting that will he also get information as to the price of the ingredients?—because that is one essential factor that must enter into the problem.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the point I tried to make.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Queens, who seems to be familiar with the situation, told us that there is a mixing plant on Prince Edward Island. Could he tell us the output of that plant and the number of men employed? Then we will know how much that plant is costing us.

Mr. MYERS: I have not the total output. They employ about twenty men.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that the cost of mixing the fertilizer is in the neighbourhood of $1.50 a ton, and that before the tariff was put on there were no mixing plants to any extent, on Prince Edward Island in particular. Therefore the protection given has led to the establishment of mixing plants, which in turn has perhaps been one of the chief factors in reducing the cost. But as I said, all the information that we can gather in this connection will be brought down.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the minister tell us the price at which it sells?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends on the grade.

Mr. YOUNG: Say a standard grade.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of what fertilizer?

Mr. YOUNG: Well, the kind they mix in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member and I are both quite a way from home.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I suggest that he give the one that costs $1.50 a ton to mix?

Mr. MYERS: They all cost the same to mix.

Mr. VALLANCE: So that the cheap fertilizer costs just as much to mix as the most expensive? While that is being hunted up may I ask the minister another question? I notice there is a $50,000 decrease in this vote. Would the minister mind separating these items and telling us how much is given to each of the purposes included under item 42?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

Office supplies, $9,000.
Publications and stationery, $14,490.
Travelling, headquarters staff, $6,000.
Subventions to provincial agencies covering part of the cost for promotional work to provide assistance with seed fairs and seed distribution, $39,000.
Market reporting and extension service, $1,000.
Development of domestic and export markets for seeds, feeding stuffs and fertilizers, $1,500.
Organization of feeding stuffs and hay and straw standardization, $2,000.
Administering the Inspection and Sale Act, special commodities, binder twine, etc., $500.

Laboratory and Inspection Services

Maritime provinces, $26,980.
Quebec, $38,301.
Eastern Ontario, $22,865.
Western Ontario, $56,914.
Manitoba, $36,998.
Saskatchewan, $37,691.
Alberta and British Columbia, $42,951.
Chemical laboratory, Ottawa, and analytical fees to outside chemists, $10,000.
Grant to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $17,010.
Reestablishing the quality of export wheat in former drought areas and continuing the distribution of forage crop seed in the prairie provinces, $30,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would like to ask now, in view of this $50,000 decrease, what services are going to be curtailed or eliminated, if any?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is really no service being curtailed. There is a lesser demand for inspection services, but all demands I believe are met. There are certain economies in connection with travelling expenses and laboratory work; we are doing more of our own work since setting up the laboratory in the building previously occupied by the national research council. One of the chief items in the reduction is the decrease in travelling expense by supplying the cars with gas and oil and garage services. That has reduced that item to 1·9 cents a mile in certain cases, I believe.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not know whether I am in order, but in going through the estimates I find under details of civil government in agriculture that the services of certain individuals are being eliminated this year. That does not show in this vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right.

Mr. VALLANCE: It is unfortunate that we cannot discuss the civil government vote while we are discussing the departmental vote. For instance, under the previous item, "fruit, including grant of $4,500 to Canadian Horticultural Council," I find in the civil government list that the position of chief of the fruit markets division is being eliminated this year, though it existed last year. I am not blaming the present government, but I merely say that it seems that the civil government for each department might be discussed while the departmental estimates are under consideration. When we come back to civil government we will start all this discussion again, and we will consider the reason for the elimination of the chief of the fruit markets division. I realize that this item has nothing to do with civil government, but when the civil government estimates are up for discussion we will have simply a reiteration of what has been said to-night.

Mr. LUCAS: I should like to ask the minister if any of this amount voted for seed, feed and fertilizer control is applied to the prairie provinces. No doubt the minister is aware that in the last few years many experiments have been carried on in connection with the use of fertilizer in the growing of grain, and I wonder if the minister has any information as to what progress is being made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The provinces are consulted, in reference to a part of this vote which is in the nature of subventions, as to what undertakings they think would best serve them respectively. In the west there have been very few requests in connection with fertilizer; apparently they feel that they have other uses for any subventions that might be given under this vote. In Alberta our work in connection with fertilizers consists of examining the composition of the many different brands of fertilizer offered for sale so that the farmer may know whether or not he is getting the fertilizer best suited to his district and whether what he gets corresponds with that is advertised in connection with that particular brand of fertilizer.

Mr. VALLANCE: Just before the item passes I should like to get a little further information from the minister. When he was itemizing this amount of $393,200 I thought I heard him say that it included travelling expenses.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is of the headquarters staff.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does that include the expenses of your chief inspectors?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then under what vote is the expense account of the chiefs of divisions, such as the chief of the fruit markets division?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): His expenses would come out of the headquarters staff expenses.

Mr. VALLANCE: So that we are now privileged to discuss his expenses but not his salary; is that so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would ask the minister if he does not think it would be far better, in the interests of the committee and also, I would say, in the interests of a minister administering a department of government, to have these things lumped together? When this item passes we will have voted the expenses of this individual; then we must turn to civil government to vote his salary. It seems to me it should be the other way round; we should vote his salary first and then vote his expense account, because his expense account is of no use if he does not get his salary.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This vote does not include salaries of the headquarters staff.

Mr. VALLANCE I realize that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I realize the force of what the hon. member has said.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is not the minister mistaken? In the civil government vote you have first of all the salaries and secondly the contingencies, and in the contingencies is included the travelling expenses of the headquarters staff. In this item is included the salary of the staff outside of your headquarters staff and the travelling expenses of those officials.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like some information with regard to the assistance given the various provinces in regard to seed. Last year or the year before I directed a question to the minister with regard to seed that was required in a certain part of my county, and at that time I think the minister stated that it was not within the province of his department to supply seed unless it was absolutely required, and at the request of the province. Was any such request made and was any such assistance given in cooperation with any provincial government?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When I stated that seed was furnished only at the request of the provincial government my reply had reference to commercial seed, so to speak. Under this item no assistance is given by way of supplying commercial seed to farmers in drought areas, or farmers who cannot purchase seed themselves; so far as I know this government never has supplied seed in that way to the farmers of any province. This vote is divided in several ways. A certain amount is given each province, to be used by the province, together with its own money, to assist in improving the seed in that province, for example. In the west they wish to use that subvention in order to get better seed in the drought area, which in the past was one of our best sources of supply for good seed. The provinces have felt that this is the most important work to be done with this money, and they have asked that the subvention to those provinces should be used to furnish a better and purer supply of seed for those areas. So we pay the freight on carload and less than carload lots of pure seed from the northern districts to assist the people in the south to get that seed at a lower cost. For example, after the harvest last fall, following a survey, all the pure Marquis and Reward seed that was available was kept on hand and, with the assistance of this subvention, was sent to the south. This is not done in connection with commercial seed, however. In the eastern provinces they feel that the best contribution we can make towards the improvement of their seed is to use this money to assist in the purchase of small seed cleaning plants. I believe the division is much on a set basis. I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. CASGRAIN: For what purpose is the grant of $17,010 given to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association? Is that a similar association to the horticultural council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, it has to be used in a different way The Canadian Registered Seed Growers' Association conduct the registering of the pure seed grain, grasses and so on, throughout the dominion. It is to assist them in carrying out that work that this money is used. It rebounds to the benefit of all farmers in all provinces of the dominion, and brings about a uniform standard. If a farmer in Quebec wishes to have a variety of pure registered seed from British Columbia, for instance, he knows the exact quality of seed he is getting. He would not know however if there were separate legislation in each province. Their work is along the line of the Canadian National Live Stock Records Association.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They have a branch in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, they operate in each province.

Mr. VALLANCE: To what extent is the federal seed branch being utilized in the west, where so much seed is necessary in the drought stricken areas?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that the whole staff has been placed at the services of the province to inspect all grain being shipped for seed.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the fact that the chief of the branch is sitting in front of the minister I should like to know if there has been any difficulty in the finding of necessary seed of good quality to take care of the demands of the western provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, there has been, and especially in connection with seed oats.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who has charge of distribution, the province or the dominion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The relief commission.

Mr. DONNELLY: There has been a great deal of complaint about the handing out of seed. Farmers who have seed in elevators close to their farms have been obliged to drive thirty or forty miles to get seed. They cannot understand why this is necessary. They are given an order to go to another town a long distance away despite the fact that there is plenty of seed right in their own elevator.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have no information regarding that condition, and I cannot think that the circumstances described by the hon. member can be general, because the funds of those in charge of the work are a matter of serious consideration. I should think the condition described would add to the cost. However, we have had no complaints along this line.

Mr. DONNELLY: I can assure the minister that I am speaking correctly. I know of instances where men have had to drive twenty or thirty miles to other towns in order to obtain seed when, as a matter of fact, there has been seed in the elevator of their own home town. They are unable to understand why they are put to this inconvenience.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Shall the item carry?

Mr. YOUNG: No, not yet. A few moments ago I asked the minister to tell me the prices at which fertilizer sold. Although he was unable to give me the information I have obtained it from another source. I understand it is worth from $22 to $25 a ton and the duty is ten per cent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What fertilizer?

Mr. YOUNG: The fertilizer used in the growing of potatoes in Prince Edward Island; I do not know the technical name of it. These are the prevailing prices. The duty is from $2 to $2.25 per ton and we are told the mixing costs $1.50 per ton. None of it is imported in the mixed state. It is mixed on the island in an establishment maintaining a staff of about twenty men. While the cost of mixing is $1.50 per ton the additional cost to the farmer is $2 per ton which means that we are taking $2 out of the pockets of the potato growers and giving only $1.50 to labour.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to follow up the remarks of the hon. member for Willow Bunch. Is all the seed that is purchased by the relief commission inspected by the dominion seed branch?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It has been impossible to inspect all the seed in the small country elevators. Of course as the hon. member knows all the grain bought for seed is cleaned as well as possible but it is impossible to inspect all the wheat in some of the small country elevators. However the whole time of the staff is devoted to that work and we have increased the number on the staff. Every reasonable effort is being made to ensure clean seed.

Mr. VALLANCE: During the recess I was in the west, and as a result of what I saw I should like to substantiate the remarks of the hon. member for Willow Bunch. In the community from which I come quite extensive quantities of good seed were available, yet seed was brought in from the north-eastern section of the province. The minister will know as well as I do that there are some portions of the northern section of the province which are not as free of weeds as are the prairies, especially that part of the prairie which lies within my own constituency, and it is regrettable that such a large volume of wild oats, sow thistle and Canadian thistle should be permitted to get into the prairie country. It may not be difficult to deal with these menaces once they are established, but every effort should be made to prevent them from invading those portions of the provinces where they exist only to a very limited extent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that oats purchased for seed are cleaned and shipped out. In connection with driving great distances I can say only this that I have difficulty in understanding why the condition complained of should exist. My understanding is that the relief commission works through the municipalities, and as the municipal officials consist chiefly of farmers I should think they would have a keen appreciation of their responsibility in connection with bringing in unclean seed. I have no doubt however that the hon. member is speaking from knowledge, owing to the fact that he has only recently returned from that section of the country. We are giving every possible assistance to ensure that clean seed is made available.

Mr. VALLANCE: In order to be quite fair I shall give the minister a concrete illustration. I should like to state however that I do not blame the relief commission. It is because of the fact that many farmers want only 60, 70 or possibly 150 bushels of seed. A portion of the municipality of Luseland is adjacent to the village of Superb. To-day there are oats available in that village. The farmers in that section wonder why they cannot get oats from the village instead of travelling eighteen or twenty miles to Luseland. I appreciate the position of the minister and the difficulties with which the relief commission are faced in connection with handling this huge problem. I believe however that the difficulty is accentuated because of the fact that people living down in the southwest section may have to go to the northeast in order to get seed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of their own municipality?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, of their own municipality. In fairness to the minister and to the commission may I say that that seems to be the great difficulty.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which some time ago was placed before his department, namely, that of the sealing of seed oats shipped out of our province. For a number of years we have been shipping under seal seed oats to the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. This seal was affixed by an official of the department. A few years ago the Department of Agriculture compelled our farmers to put their oats up in this manner, and required the sealing of the sacks. For some reason this year they have been refused the privilege of having their sacks sealed and have had to ship out their grain with the sacks unsealed to the same people they have been shipping to in former years. This has created some suspicion in the minds of the farmers who have been buying seed for a great many years, and our business men find it hard to do business in the way they formerly did. I should like to know from the minister what pressure was brought to bear on the department to change this practice and withdraw from our farmers the privilege of having their seed grain sealed in sacks as formerly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Formerly, when it was necessary to seal the sack, that was an assurance to those who were buying the seed that the grain in that sack was from a seed crop that had been field inspected and designated as pure as to variety. I believe that due to pressure from farmers and perhaps some of the seed houses in Prince Edward Island, and the enthusiasm of one of our seed inspectors in that locality, it was felt that the community could perhaps best be served by sealing what looked to be and was clean commercial seed, but without any guarantee as to the variety. They wished that to be sealed, and with a certificate given, I believe. Many people thought it meant that it was practically the same as registered seed.

So far as pressure being brought to bear on the government to make the change is concerned, as soon as this matter was brought to my attention—I cannot say how it was brought to my attention—I thought that it was not to the advantage of the farmers in Prince Edward Island, who have a decided advantage in being more or less isolated as they are, and I thought it would be a very simple thing for them to develop a supply of perhaps one hundred per cent pure seed that no other province could. Because of that I myself took the responsibility of doing away with sealing and of giving a certificate for commercial grain that was clean but whose purity we could not certify without growing it, and instead to give a certificate under seal only for pure field inspected grain. Here again I must reiterate that the farmers of Prince Edward Island have a very great advantage and opportunity, and I am sure that they will give full support to the policy of endeavouring to develop their registered seed grain almost one hundred per cent.

Mr. MacLEAN: It is quite true that they have developed to a great extent the growing of pure seed and that they have followed the field inspection service very closely. There is a large quantity of field inspected grain which is ready for shipment every year. But this was another matter apart altogether from the field inspected grain. It was a privilege that the farmers had when they brought in Banner oats, even if they could not certify that it was field inspected. The practice of affixing the seal was approved by the dealers. I would ask the minister if there have been any complaints from the receivers of this grain in the different provinces, that it was not true to its name, or why was the practice discontinued?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not recall whether or not there were any complaints from the receivers of the grain, but the information given to me when the matter first came to my attention was that Prince Edward Island had shipped in the amount of registered pure seed grain that they were growing, that they had not as high a percentage of pure registered grain as they had had before this practice crept in. The hon. member states that a farmer brings in a bag of clean Banner oats. We feel quite certain that in a great many cases they were not Banner oats although they were sealed as Banner oats, and because there was no assurance that the farmer was getting what he thought he was getting, and that Prince Edward Island was losing the opportunity, situated as it is, to have almost one hundred per cent pure variety of grain at practically no additional cost to themselves, I took the responsibility for the action.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, at the session of parliament which was called to ratify the treaty resulting from the Imperial Economic Conference agreements, the government boasted and took credit for all the advantages which we would derive from such a treaty with Great Britain. We were told that the government, by granting a preference to Great Britain on chemical fertilizers imported into Canada, was rendering a very great service to the farming class. We protested at the time because the tariff was also being increased on chemical fertilizers imported from the United States. I simply wish to give to the house the list for the fiscal year 1933 of the products imported from the United States and the United Kingdom. As you may note, in most cases, the British preference granted on the various ingredients which enter into the composition of chemical fertilizers served absolutely no purpose, because none were imported from Great Britain.

Let us take, for instance bone dust, charred bone and bone ash. We imported from the United States 26,437 cwts. of this ingredient and from the United Kingdom, 4,352 cwts. We imported from the United States 631,385 cwts. of phosphate rock while none were imported from the United Kingdom. We imported from the United States 1,640 cwts. of kainite or German potash salts and German mineral potash, while none came from the United Kingdom. We imported from the United States 347 cwts. of cyanamide of lime or lime nitrogen, while none was imported from Great Britain. We imported from the United States 6,413 cwts. of muriate of potash, while none was imported from Great Britain. Take as another instance, nitrate of soda. We imported from the United States 282,079 cwts. while we only imported from the United Kingdom 103 cwts.

I have a longer list; however, I shall dispense from reading it to the house. I simply wish to point out the fact that the Imperial Economic Conference agreements have been of no benefit to us so far as chemical fertilizers, unless it be an increase in their prices, because we increased the duty on the ingredients imported from the United States and, in most cases, all these ingredients are imported from that country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understood the hon. member to say that a tariff has been placed on the ingredients, imported from the United States and other countries, which are used in this country to make fertilizer. My information is that no duty has been placed on such ingredients.

Mr. FAFARD: What about mixed fertilizer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, but not on the ingredients used to make fertilizer.

Mr. FAFARD: There are many ingredients that are not imported.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member asking how many ingredients are imported?

Mr. FAFARD: I know; that was what I stated in my remarks, which were based on an answer given by the government in the house.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is supposed to be good, but sometimes they miss the mark.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Last session or the session before, the government, I suppose, was grateful to the opposition for the remarks that they made against the tariff on nitrate of soda. A little later, in the course of the following session—I think it was last year—I ventured to ask whether this question had been settled with the British government. We had a definite promise from the genial Minister of Finance that he would take this matter up with that government, and the only information I could secure was that it had been settled to the entire satisfaction of the farmers. That was not a very satisfactory answer. May I get a definite statement from the minister to-night? Has the question been finally settled, when, and on what basis? Are there still any duties on nitrate of soda? Quite often, looking up the bluebooks, you will find that nitrate of soda does not usually come under the head of fertilizers. There are many ingredients entering into the manufacture of fertilizer and into the mixing of the product, which ingredients are not included under the distinct head of fertilizer. Will the minister inform me definitely whether the tariff has been entirely removed from nitrate of soda?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that there is no tariff on nitrate of soda.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say a little while ago that the distribution of seed was in the hands of the municipalities. I think he must be misinformed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said the relief commission, and I understood they cooperated with the municipalities.

Mr. DONNELLY: The man who requires seed goes to the municipality and puts in his order with them, and the municipality then make up the order and send it to the commission. The order is sent back to the man telling him where to go to get his seed, and this is where the mix-up occurs; the man has to go to a distant town to get the seed. However, the question I want to ask the minister is this. Is the seed sold by grade or is it all sold at one price? Are there grades—No. 1 northern, No. 2 northern, No. 3 northern, and so on? Of the seed wheat handed out, some of it is grade 1 northern and some grade 3 and grade 4. Some of it is a very poor variety. How are the prices arrived at for the different grades?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question. My impression is that so far as wheat is concerned, outside of registered seed, it is sold on the commercial grading of the wheat by the relief commission, but I have no definite information. I cannot say how the wheat is graded.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): I do not wish, sir, to detain the house; however, the agricultural situation is most deplorable at present. Glancing over the agricultural appropriations during the years this government has been in office, I note with regret that they show a decrease of more than $3,292,658.12. Taking into consideration the years of hardship through which we are passing, it strikes me that we should not have decreased but rather increased subsidies for the Department of Agriculture. Thus, in 1931, we find a decrease of about $375,000; in 1932, an increase of $414,000; in 1933, a decrease of more than $2,000,000, and in 1934 a decrease of nearly $391,000, while in 1935 in the estimates under consideration, we note a further decrease of more than $850,000.

I am aware that it may be a difficult task for the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to convince his leader that large votes are necessary to carry on the work of his department; however, such a large decrease in the course of five years is altogether uncalled for, especially at a time when a back to the land movement is advocated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As the hon. member has stated, there has been a very considerable reduction in the estimates for this department, but it has been made possible to a great extent by reorganization and the reduction of expenses and not by any depreciation in services. On top of that there have been formulated policies that have given to the farmers, to a considerable degree, benefits which previously they had not enjoyed, particularly with respect to live stock. But in the reduction of the estimates, the test we have always kept before us has been that it should not mean a reduction in services which would in any way have a depressing or an injurious effect on the farmers or their agriculture.

Mr. FAFARD: Then the minister approves of this very considerable reduction in his own estimates.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. FAFARD: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am rather disappointed in the minister for making that claim. I find after a little figuring, looking up the estimates of 1930-31, that this vote was then in round figures $573,000 whereas now it is $393,000 a difference of $180,000. Well, there is not a minister in the government whom I have ever heard claim that such a reduction could be made without adversely affecting the services of his department. The other day the Minister of the Interior, whose estimates were cut badly, did not claim that the services were not impaired. The Minister of Agriculture must know these services are impaired to a considerable extent; he must be a wizard in administration if with two-thirds of the money formerly appropriated he can still get three-thirds of the service. No one knows better than his staff that that is impossible. The minister is doing himself an injustice when he makes such a statement, because I do not believe it is given to normal man to be able to cut off one-third of the cost of administering this or any other branch and still give the same service. If that can be done, then my hon. friend should be continued where he is indefinitely, because money is extremely scarce and we want to get the service. If that can be done and if he can demonstrate that to the country, he is a hero that we do not run across every day, and I shall be the first to pay him this tribute; but I cannot accept his statement and I know his staff cannot accept it. He is not being fair to himself in making such a claim. Take the grant to the seed growers' association which has been reduced by $4,000. Let him ask them what they think about it and whether they are doing the same work with $17,000 that they were formerly doing with $21,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I stated on a previous occasion that the standard for these estimates was that there should not be any reduction in services that would materially affect in a damaging way the farmers. Let us take the item under discussion. The hon. member for Melville has stated what the reduction has been in the last three years. One item alone, that of the registered seed growers' pool in Moose Jaw, in the appropriation to which the hon. member refers was a very considerable amount for the year. I have not before me what the payment was, but my recollection is that it was somewhere in the vicinity of $50,000. That is a very large item in accounting for the decrease in the vote. Another item of decrease in this particular vote is, as the hon. member knows, that due to the succession of crop failures in western Canada, there has been a considerable decrease in the demand for services for grain inspection which was perhaps one of the greatest services in agriculture in the western provinces prior to the crop failures. Similarly in different parts of the dominion there has been a decrease in the demand for inspectional services. On top of that, as I stated somewhat earlier in the evening, we have made very considerable reductions in travelling expenses and by doing our own laboratory work for the inspection of fertilizer, feeds and so on, by taking over a building that had formerly been occupied by the national research council. I have no hesitation in saying that with this decrease in the vote the services that are given to the farmers or to agriculture are still very efficient.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has saved the situation by now claiming that there has been no material reduction. I like that term much better; it was the one he used last year. That is a very safe, flexible term to use and the hon. gentleman can get by with it; but I do not like the statement that there is no reduction in services, because nobody accepts it.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I do not quite agree, sir, with the hon. minister in connection with the tuberculine test. If my memory serves me right when the discussion on the agricultural estimates took place, about this time, last year, I requested that these tests be continued in the county of St. John's-Iberville. The hon. minister replied that they would be carried out, probably at the beginning of the year. Last autumn, in October or November these tests were begun in my county and ceased about the middle of November, the excuse given was that there was no veterinary surgeon.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): The same excuse was given to me.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): There are veterinary surgeons in the county of St. John's-Iberville just as there are in the county of Brome-Missisquoi, who are well qualified to carry out this work and would be very willing to act for the department of agriculture. These tests should have been continued last autumn, because it is unfair that farmers should not be reimbursed for the outlay due to the wintering of their cattle. May I point out to the hon. minister that the most auspicious time for these tests is from the end of August to mid-winter. If these tests are carried out during the entire year, it certainly is not to the advantage of the farmer who has been put to considerable expense in wintering his cattle. It is unfair to deprive him of his cattle in the spring when he might derive some benefit from them.

I note that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) is interpreting my remarks to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I would kindly request him to insist that the minister carry out these tests in the autumn instead of in the spring.

Again this year, there has been a decrease of $144,000....

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It will always continue as long as they are in office.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The hon. minister contends that the number of tuberculosis cattle has decreased. I shall take his word for it, however, on the other hand, the tests were in the past carried out every year in the county of St. John's-Iberville. Very large amounts were expended in the eastern townships to rid the herds of diseased cattle, and I am convinced that the money would have been uselessly expended had not these tests been continued systematically. I think that it is over three years since tests have been carried out in the county of St. John's-Iberville. I do not know whether the county of Brome-Missisquoi has been similarly dealt with. At all events, I trust that the hon. minister will consider my remarks in the proper light, because my intention is not to criticize but simply to obtain justice for the farmers of my county.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I want to join with the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville in what he has said. I do not know whether we are still on this item for seed, feed and fertilizer control, but I find there is a decrease in the estimate and like the hon. member for Melville and the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville I want, on behalf of the farming community I have the honour to represent, to protest against these decreases year by year. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville spoke about the test in his constituency and I have a similar complaint to bring before the government this year. I do not know whether the test was carried on in my constituency last year, but I had occasion again last year to make the same representation that I made the year before, and have done every year I have been in the house, in 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 since the present government came into power. In 1929 there was a zone formed in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay to be operated with the county of Chicoutimi. The district was organized and the tests were made and carried out thoroughly in the county of Chicoutimi but were not carried out in my riding last year at this time as far as I remember, and when I was in my riding recently I do not think I had any evidence from the people who spoke to me that these tests had been made. I should like to know why they were not made. Last year when I was speaking on the same subject—

Mr. DUPRE: Will the hon. member allow me to interrupt? We do not want to insist, but I understand we are discussing now item 42, which is seed, feed and fertilizer control. I am afraid this question is very far from the item under discussion.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville spoke about it.

Mr. DUPRE: It is very far from the item under consideration.

Mr. CASGRAIN: All right; I shall start over again in a few minutes. Then we will be in a position to get the information later on.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): While on this item would the minister give us some information in regard to crested wheat grass? A couple of years ago in the agriculture committee he told us something that to me was rather interesting with regard to that grass. I saw a small patch of it growing last summer in a very dry district in my constituency and it appeared to me that it was quite successful there. Has the minister any information to give in that regard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think it is a safe statement to make that the hope for crested wheat grass and what it will accomplish is even greater than I stated to the committee a year ago, and I recall that in that statement I was quite enthusiastic. As the hon. member has indicated, especially in districts where there is a great lack of moisture, crested wheat grass is particularly suitable. Even in our Manyberries station, where there is a considerable area that had been abandoned by farmers on account of lack of moisture, experiments have been made with crested wheat grass, brome, sweet clover, western rye grass and some other grasses, comparing them as to the growth they make with a limited amount of moisture. In those experiments crested wheat grass showed itself much superior to the other grasses. One noticeable thing about these plots was that in the crested wheat grass plot there were practically no weeds; its tendency to absorb the moisture was so great that there was not sufficient moisture left for the weeds to make headway. Another advantage of this grass is that it is a cool weather grass as well as a dry season grass; when the snow goes off in the spring it is as green as it is perhaps at any time of the year. Also it is a very palatable grass, and it has a high yield of seed. In the fall when the cool weather comes on it seems to take new life, because it is particularly adaptable to cool weather and remains green and maintains a fine growth until covered by snow. Another important characteristic that it has, especially important in very dry areas, is that when even western rye grass will not withstand the drought and can be easily knocked out by the roots, and brome grass withers and often dies, the crested wheat grass seems to become dormant, but responds to the very slightest degree of moisture. One of the hardest tests that crested wheat grass has experienced was in a seeding that took place on the lawn of Professor Harrington in Saskatoon. He had a cement sidewalk running through his lawn, both sides of which were seeded with crested wheat grass, particularly the fairway strain, which is one of our most likely strains for fairways on golf courses and for laying down sod in western Canada. It is a strain that is rich in foliage and spreads more than some of the other strains of crested wheat grass. One side was watered and protected, on the other side the children of Professor Harrington and his neighbours played and it became almost like a pavement. Then towards the middle of August it also was watered and protected, and it responded very quickly, and before the winter set in showed an excellent growth.

It has always been realized by those interested in diversified farming, particularly in the west, that the need was for a domestic grass. We believe that in almost every respect crested wheat grass will meet that need, not only in the dry areas, but it also stands up well in the northern areas. At the Indian Head forestry station some years ago two pounds I believe were seeded, very sparsely, and there were threshed from this patch 1,320 pounds of seed. That also is another very important characterictic of this grass, its high yield. Another most important feature is that you can allow the seed of crested wheat grass to mature and then cut and thresh it and the stalks of the grass still remain green and palatable, unlike western rye and other grasses of that nature which if allowed to ripen in the least become woody and dusty and not palatable.

Mr. BROWN: As far as the experiments have gone would the minister advise using it with a nurse crop or by itself?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends a good deal upon the locality. I would say that while of course any grass does better if seeded with a nurse crop, in the locality where the home of the hon. member for Lisgar is it would not be necessary in a normal season to use a nurse crop with crested wheat grass. It germinates very readily; it has a quick growth and it does not need to be seeded to any great depth; the shallower it is seeded the better. In that district in the normal season I would say that a nurse crop is not at all necessary. Sow it early.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I thank the minister for that explanation, because I have been greatly interested in crested wheat grass. I think it was two years ago I made inquiry and found the seed was not available. I wonder if it is available at the present time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Commercial quality seed is available in considerable quantities. There comes to my mind a gentleman who has made a fine success of growing this grass in Alberta, Mr. Moore of Bindloss. I purchased considerable seed from him last year for my own farm, and it was very satisfactory as was also the price. A selected strain like the fairway strain is not so plentiful; there is a limited supply, and the present price is fifty cents a pound.

Mr. BROWN: I think it can be got at the university at Saskatoon.

Mr. GERSHAW: Will the department have any seed of that grass for sale?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The department is always a source of inquiry for grass seed. It has a list of those who have grasses for sale. I can give that information, or if the hon. member would have his correspondent write to the central experimental farm at Ottawa they would put him in touch with anyone who wanted the grass. If he himself knows anyone who has a supply for sale and will give that information to the central experimental farm I believe there is a big demand for it this year.

Mr. VALLANCE: I had a note to ask about this crested wheat grass and how much seed was available. It seems to me that on an occasion such as this we should avail ourselves of the opportunity to discuss with the minister just such things as this. Another prominent and I think useful seed has been developed, although it is only in its infancy as yet. I had the honour and privilege, I may say, yesterday or the day before of discussing this with the minister, and it just goes to show what you can do when you have a minister in charge of a department with the work of which he is very familiar. On his own farm to-day the minister has available a quantity of seed oats, and I think it would be interesting to have him tell us about these oats. They are a new or at least an outstanding variety of the hulless oat known as the Laurel, and in the discussion I had with the minister he was kind enough to promise to deliver some of these oats to my farm. It would be interesting to many of us if the minister would say a few words with regard to this variety, as to how well adapted it is for use as feed and for what other purposes it may be used.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I had known the hon. member was going to say this I think I would have quoted him a lower price on the oats. Work has been carried on for a number of years in different countries, including the United Kingdom, the United States and particularly in Canada, in the development of the hulless oat. The difficulty has been in getting a strong enough straw and in getting an oat that would give a sufficiently high yield. It is believed now that these difficulties have been pretty well met by the oat mentioned by my hon. friend, the Laurel variety of hulless oat. It is particularly strong in the straw and yet not too coarse to be used for green feed for horses, cattle and calves. Since it is a hulless oat it makes better feed, especially for cattle, than oats having the hulls on, and those who are engaged in live stock farming will realize the wastage in feeding oats with hulls without crushing them, particularly in regard to cattle. That is one of the chief advantages of hulless oats as a green feed. Horses are particularly fond of it, and our experience has been that they do better on it than on other forms of green feed we have used. The yield is not quite as high as in the case of such oats as Gopher, Banner and Victory, yet it is quite a high yield; with a normal crop it runs to fifty, sixty or perhaps seventy bushels per acre, and a measured bushel of a good sample of hulless oats should weigh in the neighbourhood of fifty pounds. It is an early maturing variety and, contrary to what one would expect, the oats cling to the straw when it is quite ripe.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I just ask a question suggested by my good friend from Vancouver Centre. He would like the minister to tell us if the new variety is good for oatmeal.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am glad that question has come up. One of the great advantages of the hulless oat is that it has been made use of for some time by homesteaders. It is particularly adapted to the making of porridge by soaking without even having it ground. It is grown by homesteaders, pioneers in outlying districts, because of that quality, and for the reason that it has no hulls it is very suitable for feeding young pigs.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice that part of this vote is for grants to seed fairs. Can the minister tell us what seed fairs receive these grants, and how much they receive?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some of this money goes to each province for seed fairs. I am sorry we have not a list of the seed fairs receiving grants. I should be glad to send that list to my hon. friend, showing the grants paid in all the provinces or just in the province of Saskatchewan, if that would satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Item agreed to.

Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions, $1,518,302.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the minister explain the reason for the decrease in this item?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the reorganization of this branch a saving of something like $300,000 has been made chiefly by combining six branches into three and consolidating the services so that officials have a freer hand to do work which is not so closely defined as hitherto has been the case. There has been practically no reduction of service except in connection with cow testing, which is different from R.O.P. testing. The provinces agreed that they should undertake cow testing, which gave us an opportunity to make further efforts in connection with R.O.P. testing. We have had many comments to the effect that this reorganization has improved the services given.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has there been any decrease in the amount allotted to the province of Quebec for fairs and exhibitions due to the reduction in the item?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the grant is the same as it was last year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How much does the province of Quebec receive under this vote for fairs?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A very large share in comparison with the other provinces. I have not the figures before me.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the minister any idea how much is paid out of this vote for exhibitions and fairs in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not the total, but I can get the amount for each fair and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice this item includes assistance to fairs and exhibitions. This is rather a large item, and I wonder if the minister could tell us just how this money is to be spent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The vote is made up as follows:

Field services	$540,084
Market services	256,684
Poultry services	266,797
General services	175,237
Exhibitions	279,500

Mr. VALLANCE: At this point would the minister give the committee some information with regard to the regional fairs that were brought into existence by the minister during his administration, particularly as to how they were received?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We tried out the policy of regional fairs at first by having one fair in each province and the results were satisfactory. The following year we allotted the grant to a different fair in each province. The satisfaction expressed especially by farmers was such that last year we offered regional grants to all so-called class B fairs except in cases where such interfered with provincial plans. As I said before the farmers felt that the fairs had had a very good effect in stimulating people other than professional show people to exhibit.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is it the intention of the department to increase the regional fairs this year or to maintain or curtail them?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not the intention of the department to curtail them but on the whole to leave them as they were last year.

Mr. VALLANCE: With the same grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. In one or two isolated districts it may be possible that there may be additional regional fairs.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I should like to know if there will be any change this year in the grants for class B fairs in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. LUCAS: How many of these regional fairs are there in Alberta?

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the minister enumerate the fairs, and tell us where they are held?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are as follows:

New Brunswick:
Woodstock, Fredericton, Chatham.
Quebec:
Quebec regional, St. Hyacinthe.
Ontario:
Leamington, Port Arthur, Lindsay.
Manitoba:
Carman, Dauphin, Portage la Prairie.
Saskatchewan:
Lloydminster, Melfort, North Battleford, Prince, Albert, Weyburn, Yorkton, Estevan.
Alberta:
Lethbridge, Red Deer, Vegreville, Vermilion, Camrose.
British Columbia:
Chilliwack, Armstrong, Kamloops.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister an extract from the March 12th issue of the publication L'Action Catholique. My translation is as follows:

One or our readers sent us a copy of the following letter which he received from one of the government services:

"February 25, 1934.

Dear Sir:

We have received your letter of the 13th instant, asking for a French copy of our report.

We regret to inform you that owing to the expense and lack of funds we no longer publish our report in French.

Yours truly,
Canadian National Live Stock Records.
W. Brant, Accountant."

Would the minister give an explanation in this matter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Canadian National Live Stock Records is not part of the federal Department of Agriculture. Originally each breeding association had its own registration. It was felt after some time that by a combination of their efforts they could give a cheaper and better service. With that in mind practically all the breeders have so combined. The Holstein breeders are not included; they continue to operate their own bureau and have their own registration office. The letter to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Kamouraska does not apply to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Do they not receive a grant?

Mr. DUPRE: May I add a word? If the hon. member would look at a later edition of the same publication he would see therein a letter addressed by Mr. Charles Fremont confirming my colleague's statement, pointing out that the federal government had nothing whatsoever to do with their activities, and stating further that the only reason for not issuing any more French copies was that they had no funds.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I do not find fault with that. But if the Canadian National Live Stock Records Association is receiving an increased grant from the government they may be in a position to have the French copy published. However I have no criticism to offer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should be glad to discuss this matter with the Canadian National Live Stock Records Association. I know that the hon. member who has just spoken is deeply interested in agriculture and has special influence with some of the breeders' associations of the province of Quebec which would benefit from printing the publications in the French language. I should hope that between the two of us, even with their depleted finances, it might be possible to have the copies printed in French, because I heartily agree that the publication would be beneficial to the French farmers who, in recent years, particularly, have shown great interest in the improvement of their live stock.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures —Mr. Gordon—Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that we are now proceeding with the relief legislation. I suppose it will be a relief to the government when we have finished with it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, it will be a relief to me, and I believe to all of us. I shall not speak very long. As a matter of fact I do not know why we are again in committee on this measure at this time of night.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall explain. When this afternoon I moved the house out of committee on the measure, so that we might proceed with supply, I stated, in response to the Speaker's usual question, "When shall the committee sit again?" that it would sit this day. I therefore have moved the house into committee, and unless the committee desires to adopt the amendment I shall move it up again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a little late in the day, but I suppose we may as well put in full time. At six o'clock I had begun to make some observations. I did not give the right hon. gentleman much chance to reply, but I feel like asking him if he considered my proposals good ones. I do not know whether he listened to them or not.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could not see for the life of me why he could not give the amount of the line of credit that the government had guaranteed Mr. McFarland in connection with the handling of his wheat activities on the Winnipeg grain exchange. The information will be quite incomplete if that item is left out. We want the total. That is what I am after. I want to be able to say: The government spent $110,000,000 for relief and two or three hundred million, whatever it is, under the same act, under the guise of relief. The excuse for not giving information regarding the guarantee is that it would hurt the price of wheat. Of course I would not want to hurt the price of wheat. It is bad enough now. But what possible effect can disclosing the amount of this guarantee have on the price of wheat? What was the line of credit that was given up to the end of the last grain year, the first of August say? Was it the same all through? How much of it was used? I am not wanting to get at the amount of wheat held by Mr. McFarland. That is not the point at all. We pretty nearly know that, and it does not make any difference.

I want to assure the Prime Minister that I have often used this guarantee, in speaking to the people of the west, as an indication that the government was desirous of helping the farmer, although I had some grave doubts as to its advantage, for the simple reason that to the extent it kept up the price and kept our price out of line with competing countries, to that extent we frequently lost sales, because when your price is out of line with competing countries then they will get the sales. In looking for something this government has done I have used that guarantee both out in the west and in this house and said that the government should be given some credit for desiring at least to improve conditions. Why then cannot we be given the amount and extent of this guarantee? Other guarantees have been given by other governments and there has been no hesitation in stating the amounts. Our own government in Saskatchewan as already indicated, guaranteed a line of credit for the co-operative elevators and published the amount freely. From Washington from month to month we got at least the amount of the guarantees that were made a few years ago for a similar purpose. Why should that information be concealed here? I think what I am urging is as much in the interests of the government as of anybody else. As I say, I have used this guarantee as one of the few things which this government has done on behalf of the grain market. Even if it did not affect the price much if any, their intentions were good. Why this concealment? Why this star chamber method of doing business? Why this hole-in-the-corner method in regard to finance?

The government has taken the ground that we should cultivate better ethics in business. The Prime Minister's colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), in discussing the question before the committee on mass buying and in his Toronto speech, took the ground that the chain stores and the mail order houses had departed from what was the proper thing in business ethics. But what are we to say of this kind of business ethics, using the credit of the country on behalf of a guarantee for promoting better marketing, and doing it in this clandestine manner? Is that good business ethics? Would it be in anybody else but the government? Would it be good business ethics for a private member of this house not to report candidly in his private business affairs to the shareholders or the people whose money was involved? I plead with the Prime Minister. It is not his usual practice to do business in a slithery way like this, and it is not the teaching and preaching of the government. It is not what they are out to inculcate in the minds of the people of Canada through the Stevens committee. They are practically merely saying: Do not do as I do, but do as I say. I want to know if it is out of order to press too hard for this information simply because the matter has been before the banking committee. Actually the matter was settled in the banking committee although that committee has not yet formally reported to the house. It was decided in the committee not to ask for the information, but having the Prime Minister of Canada now before us I plead with him to give us this information I am asking for. It is for himself to decide, but if he does not tell us I am afraid his blood will have to be on his own head; it will not be my fault because I have been asking for the information for several years.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 13, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the second report of the select standing committee on standing orders and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

INTRODUCTION IN SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister, in reference to the anouncement made in the other place yesterday, whether it is the intention of the government from now on to have all private bills introduced in the Senate.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I gave notice last evening, which appears in the votes and proceedings to-day. When the matter is reached, the hon. gentleman will observe, from a reading of it, what the proposals are.

COMMUTERS CANADA—UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) asked whether or not, under the provisions of the Ashburton treaty, certain privileges were conferred upon residents of the Saint John district that bordered United States territory. I am of the opinion that he referred to article 3 of the Ashburton-Webster treaty of 1842, which provides for the movement of forest products along and through the river Saint John in the territory of Canada and the United States, and provides that residents of either country may follow, so to speak, these products as they pass down the river Saint John and its tributaries, through the state of Maine into New Brunswick or through New Brunswick into the state of Maine, as the case may be. It has no bearing on the border commuters' question. It is article 3 of the Ashburton-Webster treaty of 1842.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PURCHASE OF PROPERTIES IN CITY OF WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Railways. Perhaps I may say in explanation that some time ago, years in fact, the Canadian National Railways purchased certain lines in the city of Winnipeg, in Fort Rouge, for the purpose of extending the railway yards. Persistent rumours are in circulation that certain evils have taken place. On account of the depression which set in at about that time the railway did not go on with the yards, and the properties were left in the hands of the real estate firm which made the purchase, namely, Harris & Chisholm. It is now rumoured, firstly, that an excessive price was paid for these properties, secondly, that the expenses in connection with the handling of them were padded to a very decided extent, and thirdly that rents are collected on the properties that are not turned in to the railway at all in some instances, and that greater rents are collected than are turned in to the railway. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if he has any knowledge of this matter, and if not, would he in the national interest have the matter looked into.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I have no knowledge of the matter referred to, and in view of the statement made by the hon. member I shall gladly have it looked into.

BRANCH LINE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Railways. A short time ago the minister said he would make a statement in connection with branch line construction in Canada. I think he intimated that he would make it when the estimates were up. I wonder if he can make any definite statement in that respect to-day?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): I cannot do that. What I really meant to say, if I did not put it in those words, was that when the estimates of the national railways are under consideration by the special committee, that whole matter can be discussed. If the hon. gentleman is not a member of that committee no doubt he will nevertheless have opportunity to put his questions to the officers of the railway at that time.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: On the subamendment moved by Mr. Hanbury.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that was disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by the Prime Minister. Those in favour will say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

[Mr. Howden.]

The CHAIRMAN: Those against will say "no."

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the ayes have it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On division.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried on division.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour of the amendment please rise.

Some hon. members having risen:

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, what is the vote about?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment of the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You may be explaining it, but we cannot hear one word in this corner.

The CHAIRMAN: Those against the amendment kindly rise.

Mr. GARDINER: Will you please read the amendment so that we will know what we are voting for. The amendment has not been read yet.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, they desire to have the amendment read, and it has not been read since this house convened. May the amendment be read so that they will know what they are voting on?

The CHAIRMAN: Well, the vote will have to be taken all over again.

Mr. BENNETT: All right, the amendment has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN: It is the amendment to section 2 moved by the Prime Minister:

That section 2 of the bill be amended by striking out sub-paragraph (b) and by inserting in the said bill as section 3 thereof the following:

"3. In addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof."

Do you want me to read it in French?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Those in favour of the amendment will kindly rise.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Pairs count.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do pairs count?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Amendment agreed to on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the section as amended carried?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Same division.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Again I must protest Mr. Chairman, We cannot hear in this corner what you are saying. It may be difficult for the chairman to speak loudly enough, but we have reasonably good hearing and it is impossible for us intelligently to follow the business of this house—

Mr. YOUNG: Just follow your leader.

Mr. BENNETT: They are probably a little better off than the opposition, which has none.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say it is impossible for us to know what is going on, and I think it is due to the members in this corner that they shall be able to follow intelligently the business of this house.

The CHAIRMAN: I am trying to maintain order, but I cannot guarantee that the hon. members in that corner will intelligently follow what is going on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I respectfully protest against such flippancy on the part of the chairman. I am serious in saying that we in this corner cannot possibly understand what the chairman is saying and cannot intelligently follow the debates. I insist that if we are to vote on these questions the question must be put in such a way as to be audible to members in this corner.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, Mr. Chairman, that you have recently been ill. Will the clerk assistant read the question? I entirely agree that the hon. gentleman, not as leader of his group, but as a member of this chamber, has a right to hear everything that transpires.

The Clerk Assistant: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order. What is the section as amended? I understand the effect of the amendment moved by the Prime Minister, on which we have just voted, is to delete subsection (b) and insert in the bill a new subsection. There is no section before the committee now, as I understand, we have done both in one vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Precisely. The section is not amended; a new section is substituted for it, in order to remove the difficulty of the words that precede the operative words of section 2, "notwithstanding the provisions." They disappear in section 3, and the present section 3 which we now consider will be number 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The chairman put the question "Shall the section as amended pass?" That question cannot be put. We have already passed a new section 3.

The CHAIRMAN: But section 2 is not carried yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Exactly, but the chairman put the motion, "Shall the section as amended carry"? That motion should not have been put; we have already passed the new section 3.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 2 is not carried as yet; we must go back to section 2. Shall section 2 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: As amended.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this section is carried, sir, I should like to ask one question. This morning I received bulletin No. 9, in regard to unemployed wage earners, issued by the bureau of statistics. Very often in this house I have advocated the classification of the unemployed. In this bulletin there is a partial classification according to their trades and so forth, and I should like to ask the government if it is intended to proceed with this classification or to discuss the matter at the next interprovincial conference in order that the provinces may assist in the work.

I am asking a very sensible question. I do not believe the problem of unemployment ever will be solved unless there is a classification of the unemployed. This can be done; it has been done in part by the bureau of statistics, and I am asking the government if it is the intention to proceed with that classification with the assistance of the provinces. If that is not possible I should like to hear the government say so, but until they do say so I believe it can be done. The Winnipeg Free Press, a great western paper, published an editorial some weeks ago in regard to this matter. I should like to stress the importance of this classification and I should like to know if the government are ready to proceed with that work.

Mr. BENNETT: The government has done everything it reasonably could do, in cooperation with the provinces and otherwise, to classify the unemployed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand that we are now considering section 2 from which subsection (b) is deleted. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose that is so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Should not an amendment have been moved to change the lettering of the subsections?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under our rules the law clerk does that. The numbering and lettering of sections and subsections is the duty of the law clerk.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to on division.

On section 3—Further powers of governor in council.

The CHAIRMAN: This is now section 4.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the only difference between this section this year and the section last year is the deletion this year of the subsection reading:

Assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of the products of field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

Otherwise it is the same section?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think that is correct. I thought for a moment the hon. gentleman said this was the only change in the act, but of course there are other changes. The provision with respect to guarantees disappears from the act, and there is some little change in the language of section 3, which contained the provisions to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Now I may reply to the hon. member for South Perth, who asked three questions yesterday. The return I have is rather long, and I can do one of two things; I can either read it and place it on Hansard or hand it to the hon. gentleman. The expenditures are brought down to March 31, as known and estimated; that is, all the accounts up to that date have not been received, but the estimate of the departmental officials has been added to the returns. The projects begin with No. 8, and perhaps the hon. gentleman desires that I should read the return.

Mr. SANDERSON: How long is it? Perhaps it would be better to put it on Hansard.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BENNETT: It contains six pages. I can answer one question which my hon. friend asked, as to the camps in Ontario. They are as follows:

	Strength
Diver, Ontario	88
Gillies, Ontario	46
Pagwa	77
Nakina	89
Kowkash	58
Lamaune	87
Wagaming	100

The total expenditure, including money actually expended and as estimated, amounts to $2,629,990. If it will serve the hon. gentleman's purpose I will send the report to him or I can put it on Hansard, as he desires.

Mr. SANDERSON: Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to put it on Hansard, and I want to thank the right hon. gentleman for his kindness in giving me this information.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, subsection (a) of this section reads:

(a) Provide for special relief, works and undertakings under control and direction of the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior.

We have been given to understand that the government contemplate endeavouring to relieve unemployment by embarking upon an extensive program of public works. Is it the intention of the government to submit that program of public works to this house for approval before they embark upon it?

Mr. BENNETT: I explained to the hon. gentleman some days ago that it was the intention to do so.

Mr. VENIOT: Before this new section 4 is adopted I should like to take the time of the committee to make a few remarks. I spoke on this bill on its introduction, and I should not be inclined to speak again were it not for certain statements and arguments advanced by the right hon. Prime Minister.

First let me say that the reference to an attempt on the part of the opposition to raise a sectional cry and to turn the east against the west should not have been made by the right hon. gentleman, I think, until he had first given serious consideration to what was done by his own party in 1930. If ever there was an attempt to turn the east against the west it was made by certain Conservative candidates in the election of 1930 when they criticized what was commonly known at the time as the Dunning budget. True, that criticism was not made on the floor of this house, but it was made during the election campaign. I hold in my hand a press report of a speech delivered in Montreal. It is as follows:

The real aim of the budget—

The Dunning budget.

—is to open markets for the wheat produced by the western provinces, but wheat is not the only industry in Canada. The man who gives $10 of labour in manufactures is doing as much in Canada as the man who produces ten bushels of wheat in the west. We have made sacrifices for these western provinces, and I give credit to the ministers of these provinces for what they obtained from the government, but I ask the representatives of Quebec what they have obtained for our population.

Then he goes on to state:

Mr. Dunning always thinks in terms of wheat. He has never had much else to think about. The entire wheat crop of Canada has never yet reached $500,000,000 in total value in any year. Yet the gross annual value of the products of the factories of the island of Montreal alone is approximately $575,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Who said that?

Mr. VENIOT: I am asked who said that. The press reports that the statement was made by Mr. Cahan, who now occupies the portfolio of Secretary of State.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the matter with it?

Mr. VENIOT: I am asked what is the matter with it. Because hon. members on this side of the house have referred to the aid given to distressed western farmers, they have been accused of raising a sectional cry and of attempting to turn the east against the west. If ever there was a more determined attempt made to turn the east against the west than is to be found in the speech I have just read, I should like to see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. VENIOT: Why appeal to the people on the island of Montreal in the way this appeal was made? Why did he refer to the west receiving the benefits under the Dunning budget, if he had not in mind opening the eyes of people in the east to what the government of the day may have been doing for the western farmers?

While I am on that point let me say this to the right hon. Prime Minister. I believe I speak for every Liberal member when I say that we on this side of the house have no fault to find with the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: —for aiding the distressed western farmers. And when I appeal to the government to think of what they might be able to do to relieve the distress in the maritime provinces, and especially in certain sections, I do so at the risk of being told that I am the unfortunate medium expressing their wishes. I believe I am expressing the sentiments of every hon. member from the maritime provinces on either side of the house when I state that we were only too glad, when an appeal came from the distressed districts of western Canada, to do our utmost, despite the distressed circumstances under which we in the maritimes lived, to send our quota of help to those unfortunate farmers in the west. I wish to add my word of praise of the good people of the maritime provinces who generously, considering the depressed condition of affairs in their provinces, contributed carload after carload of produce and clothes which were sent to western Canada. We are prepared to do that again. If this government desires to ask the House of Commons for $1,000, $100,000, $1,000,000 or $20,000,000, any sum which in their opinion is necessary to relieve the distressed districts of western Canada, hon. members on this side of the house without hesitation will vote the money. We know about those distressed conditions in western Canada; we know that they have suffered from drought and from the grasshopper plagues. However, notwithstanding the sympathy we may feel for those people and notwithstanding the fact that we are prepared to help them with our votes, we from eastern Canada are not prevented from appealing to the government and pointing out to them the unfortunate conditions in our respective sections of the maritime provinces. And so I wish to join with the right hon. member for Antigonish—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: —the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) in his appeal to the government. On this occasion I do not appeal for aid for the Canso fishermen; he has done that nobly and well. I appeal to the government to consider the situation existing in northern New Brunswick, including the counties of Westmorland, Kent, Northumberland, Gloucester and Restigouche. I appeal to the government on behalf of the fishing industry and interests of those counties. May I say to the Prime Minister that what the drought and grasshopper plague has been to the farmers of western Canada, the numerous storms of unprecedented fury which have prevailed along the north Atlantic coast have been to the fishermen of those counties. Storm after storm has destroyed many ships. Fishing gear has been destroyed to a point where the men are not able to prepare themselves as they should be prepared for this spring's fishing operations. Not only have the storms destroyed the fishing gear, but in many cases the fishermen have been prevented from catching a quantity of fish sufficient to enable them to live through the winter months.

No doubt I will be told that this matter should be presented to the provincial government, so that they in turn may appeal to the federal authorities. May I say that if there were a slight amendment to the new section 4 of the bill no such process would be necessary. Under the new section 4 power is provided to give special relief, and such relief is placed under the jurisdiction of the departments of National Defence and the Interior. I suggest that the section might go a little farther, and that the Prime Minister might consider an amendment providing that special relief be within the control of the Department of Marine or the Department of Fisheries. As I understand the bill, if the section passes in its present form the two departments mentioned will not be competent to look after the needs of fishermen. I do suggest that the Department of Marine or the Department of Fisheries should be included in the section to work on behalf of the fishermen. In order to meet the situation I have described the government should name a special commission, if you like, composed of the Deputy Minister of Fisheries, an officer from the department which he would choose to act with him, and that the two should choose a representative of the fishermen in the counties I have named or, if they thought it better, the whole province. On their report the government of the day will act, having authority under section 4 to do so and provide the relief that is necessary. I am not now, Mr. Chairman, as has been charged by hon. gentlemen opposite against speakers on this side, speaking for political effect. There is no need for me to do that. I am speaking because I know the conditions under which the fishing industry is labouring in those counties, and I am making this appeal to the parliament of Canada and laying before it the conditions that exist in the districts I have mentioned simply because I think it is my duty to do so. Because I am speaking on this particular clause after having already spoken on the bill when it first came up, I may be accused of attempting to delay its passage. I do not care whether that accusation is hurled across the floor at me or not. I feel it is my duty to appeal to parliament on behalf of these people, and I repeat that I am making this appeal solely because I consider it to be my duty.

I have here certain statistics which I wish to submit to the house and to base thereon certain questions. The right hon. the Prime Minister in his statement the other day told us that there had been a considerable industrial movement for the better in this dominion. True I will admit that there has been some improvement in some of the industrial centres, but how are we to reconcile the Prime Minister's statement with the figures I shall now give? I find that in January 1933, there were 258,298 heads of families receiving relief in this country, and that that number increased in January 1934 to 260,157. There is certainly no evidence there of an improvement in the unemployment situation in Canada.

I do not wish to take up very much more of the time of this committee but I should like to refer once more to the statement that has been made that we are attempting to arouse the east against the west. The Prime Minister in his statement the other day said that aid given to the west was measured by the necessity that existed. We are quite satisfied with that. But may he not also cause to be inquired into the necessity that exists for the aid that I am now asking for the fishing industry in the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will not that aid be given under the Marketing Act?

Mr. VENIOT: That act is not yet in force, and I am not going to discuss it at the moment. I shall be glad to discuss it when it is before the house. So far as I have read it, I do not think there is any clause in the marketing bill to meet the situation I have described, although I may be mistaken.

I think the Prime Minister is quite correct when he says that aid should be given according to the measure of the necessity that exists. I approve of that stand, and I wish that same principle to be applied to the necessities of the fishermen of the province of New Brunswick in the sections I have named. Why should we in the east oppose aid to the distressed farmers of the west? We in the maritimes have numerous relatives living in the west. Some of the first pioneers in western Canada came from the maritime provinces. Some of the brightest men and women, some of the best business heads, some of those who are now shining stars in western Canada came from the maritime provinces. Our own blood is there, and we who have remained in eastern Canada have looked with longing eyes for the return of our friends. We would like them to return and stay with us, but at least we hope they will return and visit us. Numerous communications that we have received from our relatives in the west have placed before us in no uncertain way the hardships which they are undergoing. So we are in a position to appreciate the situation in the west, and we are only too anxious, especially those of us who have relatives out there, to do our best to help them out, and one of the best things we in eastern Canada can do to help those in the west is to vote a sufficient sum of money in this parliament to see that those in the west especially in those districts distressed by drouth and the grasshopper plague will be carried through their present difficulties.

Mr. YOUNG: There is one other question I would like to ask in regard to the new section 4 (a).

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on clause 2 of the bill. It is not carried yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to, on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Next is clause 3, now clause 4.

Mr. YOUNG: If I understand paragraph (a) aright it gives the government power to undertake, in addition to the public works program which is to be submitted to the house, any other works under the direction of the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior. Is that correct?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that last year under the act then passed we dealt in a special section with the operations in the national parks. This is intended to continue that. During the last few months the Department of National Defence has been carrying on certain works, and as I indicated yesterday the conditions under which the men worked involved their leaving for settled employment when it offered. This clause is to enable the operations in the parks and those carried on by the National Defence department to be continued. They will be separate and distinct from general relief work and are referred to as special relief works. A few evenings ago the Minister of the Interior indicated the character of the works carried on in the national parks, very necessary work that perhaps otherwise could not be done for a long time under a general appropriation; and the work that is being done under the Department of National Defence I need not dwell upon. The special public works undertakings that will be dealt with in a bill are works along the line of the suggestions that were made by the construction association and other industrial groups throughout the country during the last few months, with which I dare say the hon. gentleman is familiar.

Mr. YOUNG: That is to say, there will be no other works undertaken under this section except such as just now described by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Relief works in the parks and those under the Department of National Defence. I would not like the hon. gentleman to think for a moment that I have put a construction upon the extent or character of the works that may be done under this clause for I am not in a position to do so, but there are relief works within the parks and relief works carried on along the lines of those now being carried on by the Department of National Defence; for instance, the work at Lac Seul, where a very large number of men is employed for the purpose of clearing up all that area within the provisions of international agreements covering that area.

Mr. HANBURY: As I understand it, these works will be carried on by the single, unemployed under the control of the two departments mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be too narrow a construction for me to put upon the operations. In the parks some of the permanent residents engaged in roadmaking are those who have been residing in the parks for some years. It will not be limited entirely to the single, unemployed and homeless men but in a broad and general way that is the purpose of the class of work to be carried on by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HANBURY: I should like to say a word or two in connection with the single, unemployed men. I think the Prime Minister and all hon. members will agree that a more or less mental condition is arising in the case of these men which is not in the best interests of the country. Would it not be possible to do a certain amount of educational work among these men? I think this would be of practical advantage to Canada. At the present time we are importing very large quantities of oil and I think every hon. member believes that at some place in Canada there must be large reservoirs of oil which have yet to be discovered. I suggest that some education in geology should be given to some of these unemployed single men in order to fit them to search the country for oil fields. They could be maintained just as easily in that work as they could be in these camps.

I should like to make a further suggestion as to the teaching of geology so that they might be able to investigate the minerals of Canada and, within a reasonable time, probably bring into production larger quantities of gold which has acquired such a great value in the markets of the world. I make these suggestions to the Prime Minister not so much for the practical value they may be to Canada as for the value they may be to some of these men.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is aware that arrangements were made last year whereby single men and some with families could carry on operations in the gold-bearing streams of British Columbia. In some instances, although not always, they were able to wash out sufficient gold to make it worth their while. In any event, considerable compensation was received for the efforts made. Under the agreement made with British Columbia, some assistance was given in the first instance, as was also the case with Alberta. In the nothern part of that province there have been evidences of traces of gold in the sands of the rivers. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember that near Edmonton quite a substantial quantity of gold was washed in the days that are gone.

The hon. gentleman has mentioned a matter that has given us a great deal of thought, the extent to which the idle might be usefully employed in exploring for minerals. However, I am bound to say that the investigations appear to indicate that this is rather an expensive process. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to look into the figures, but the fact is that even with the large amounts of gold produced by our mines, the amount received for that gold is very little more than the amount which has been expended during the years in the endeavour to find that which unfortunately in many cases did not exist.

The oil question is perhaps the most difficult. For instance, the amount expended in Alberta in seeking oil—I speak subject to correction—is between eight and ten million dollars. So far all that has been produced is the wet naphtha south of Calgary and some small traces of crude petroleum. The Fort Norman field is too far north at the moment to yield to successful commercial exploitation.

The product is used for the fueling of aeroplanes at that particular point, a small skimming plant having been erected to purify and refine the crude oil. I have no desire to trespass upon the time of the committee, but this matter is of great personal interest. I hope we may be able to do something in that direction but our experiments thus far, beyond what I have indicated, are not such as to warrant any great hopes in this regard.

I am pleased to be able to inform the hon. members of this committee that the Frontier college has been doing substantial work in these camps in the way of education. The other evening I read with great interest a report from one of these camps and it quite heartened me to think that the young men had taken such an interest in education. I am referring to the camps conducted by the National Defence department, and I should have liked to have had this report to read to the hon. gentleman. It is really quite interesting and encouraging. These young men are endeavouring to improve their positions and the wastrels do not seem to stay in the camps very long because they are not encouraged to remain by that class of young men which has taken control in most of the camps. It is an encouraging sign that such conditions have been brought about as to warrant the encomium pronounced upon General McNaughton by Sir Arthur Steel-Maitland, who was Minister of Labour in Great Britain for some years. There has been some measure of organization with respect to self-education and I assure my hon. friend that should the camps have to continue that feature of the work will not be overlooked. The fact is that out of 20,000 odd men, some 7,000 have found permanent employment and this would seem to indicate that industry is absorbing at least some of those who were in these camps.

Turning for a moment to the observations of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). I think he will recall that what I said yesterday was in consequence of complaints which had been made as to the lack of justice, on the one hand, and unfairness, on the other. There were two statements made by different hon. members and it was in consequence of those statements that I made the observations I did. So far as the fishermen are concerned, the mass buying committee, if I may use that term—it got me into trouble in one case I believe—

Mr. HANBURY: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I see that the hon. gentleman has read the joke. This committee is considering the matter and at the present time I think is receiving evidence in connection with the position of the fishing industry in the maritime provinces in order to see what may be done in connection with the prices received for the catch and the spread between those prices and the prices paid by the consumer. I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that when I made the observation to which he has referred, I was referring only to the fact—the newspapers have made jocular reference to this—that the representations that have been made to the federal government in connection with all these matters have not been made by the industries themselves nor the classes affected but by the governments of the provinces. Where we have received communications from industries affected by the efforts that we were making, attention has at once been directed to the necessity of these matters being presented by the government, they being the only authority with whom we had contact and with whom we had entered into agreement. Some assistance was given last year in the hon. gentleman's county with respect to hake fishing.

Mr. VENIOT: How much?

Mr. BENNETT: This assistance was given in the counties of Charlotte, St. John, Kent, Restigouche and Gloucester and amounted to some $8,000.

Mr. VENIOT: That was not given as assistance to the hake fishing industry. It was given for the purpose of buying from the fishermen to relieve the distress among the poor people in the different sections in the county of Gloucester. It was not a bonus or help to the hake fishermen in Gloucester.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that assistance was given to the industry to the extent of $8,000 by agreement with the government of New Brunswick, and in the same way exactly as provisions were made with respect to seed grain. In connection with matters in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, so far as the fishing industry is concerned, or in British Columbia or in connection with the internal fisheries such as we have on lake Winnipeg and in northern parts of Alberta, any representations that are made by the governments of these provinces will be carefully considered and if the case is such as merits favourable consideration such consideration will be given to it. I can say that at least with great certainty.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish to say a few words with regard to an important movement that comes under this question we are discussing. I refer to the back to the land movement. The other evening the Minister of Labour gave an answer to the effect that most of the people settled under this movement have been doing well, and it is true that the failures are not the rule but rather the exception. Nevertheless, I should like to impress certain facts on the Prime Minister. This scheme is intended to last for a period of three years only, and everyone familiar with the agricultural situation—and this applies as forcibly to my own section of the country as to any other rural part of Canada—knows that at the end of the three years, or on the completion of the plan, the people who will have been placed under this scheme on new holdings will find themselves in the same position as in the initial year. This plan has been in operation for the last two years so that at the end of next fall the people on the land at the present moment will find it absolutely impossible to remain in their present occupation.

I would urge very strongly on the Prime Minister as well as on this committee the necessity of extending this scheme instead of having an iron-bound rule confined to three years. I submit that it should be more flexible; it should extend over a longer period. I am directly interested in this question for the excellent reason that there are more people placed on the land in my own constituency than in any other section of Canada. Nearly 250 families have been located under the scheme in northern Ontario, and for that reason I make this urgent appeal to the Prime Minister. I think that every member of this committee will readily visualize the situation that will face these families at the end of the three-year plan. Everyone knows that it is absolutely impossible for the families to do more than barely live with the $200 they receive under the tripartite agreement; it is simply impossible for them to make any provision to take care of the future. Consequently these people will find themselves on the completion of the plan in the same position as that in which they were in the initial year. I know that the government is fully aware of the situation, and I know that the Minister of Labour in particular is familiar with all the circumstances inasmuch as a good many of these families have been settled in his own constituency.

I read this morning with a good deal of interest an article published in the Ottawa Citizen entitled The New Settler. I gather that the city council was asked to vote the sum of $3,000 for the purpose of sending fifteen families to settle under the back to the land movement, but the city fathers claimed that they were saving the sum of $6,000 a year, and the article in question contended that this was not a way to encourage a back to the land movement. In my opinion this article, well written, should appeal to the government. For that reason I again appeal to the government and more particularly to the Prime Minister, the same kind of appeal I made two weeks ago last Monday, namely, to enlarge the back to the land movement so as to make it acceptable to young farmers and settlers in this country. Their fathers are absolutely unable to provide them with farms and I think the scheme should be extended to meet their case. I have no doubt that the government is sincere in its attitude towards this matter.

I can speak quite freely with regard to this problem inasmuch as I have always given the government my approval ever since the back to the land movement was inaugurated, and I suggest that this would be one of the most tangible ways in which the government could manifest its sincerity in connection with this wonderful scheme, which in my opinion would go a long way towards restoring equilibrium between urban and rural centres. I would ask the Prime Minister to say something which would leave with the committee the impression at any rate that the scheme will be extended over a longer period than three years, because I think that, for the reasons I have enumerated, this is absolutely necessary, regardless of any objections that may be made in some sections of the country to having it become a purely federal matter. Notwithstanding this objection I do submit that at least it should be made provincial and federal only. I know for a fact that in our own section most of the districts are still unorganized, and although there are dozens, yes, hundreds of young people who would like to come under the scheme, they find it impossible because their own municipalities have not sufficient means to contribute the $200 required.

I am personally convinced that this is a step in the right direction. It deals with the question from a proper angle, and it is one of the greatest movements the government has inaugurated. At the same time, after the experience of the last three years, I think the government must see the absolute necessity of extending the scheme, so as to apply to the rural and urban populations generally. In view of the exigencies of the situation I think the government should make it not only three years but five years, and I make that suggestion believing in the absolute sincerity of the Prime Minister. I think that he will give this request the attention it deserves. May I put a direct question to the right hon. gentleman? Is it the intention of the government to extend this scheme at the very least to four years as an emergency measure?

Mr. BENNETT: The provincial governments speak for themselves. I am always glad to hear the hon. gentleman make observations, but in this instance he is dealing with a matter wholly within the jurisdiction, in the first instance, of the provincial governments, and to their representations we give every consideration. At the conference we had in January the provincial governments made their representations, and thus far it is only fair to say that the provisions made by the federal government have not wholly been met so far as settlers are concerned.

There is only one other thing to remark and that is this: Lands belonging to the crown belong to the crown in right of the provinces and the federal government is no longer, except in the Northwest Territories, in a position to deal with these areas. All these matters are matters of representation made by the governments of the provinces, and to their requests as made, and to their representations as presented we will give and have given most sympathetic consideration.

Mr. BRADETTE: I certainly appreciate the words of the Prime Minister, but in this matter under discussion the lead has been given by the central government. We are all aware of the fact that the back to the land policy was adopted by the present government with the sanction of all the groups in this house. I believe that in this case the lead should again be given by the federal government. I am aware of the fact that the land belongs in most cases to the province, but we cannot get away from the fact that the back to the land policy has been inaugurated by this government and followed by the provinces, and if in this instance it is to be enlarged it will have to be by the central authority.

Mr. MacLEAN: I would like to bring some matters to the attention of the Prime Minister. From a return brought down in the house on March 22 it may be observed that the province of Prince Edward Island received only $72,920 of unemployment relief in the four year period. We are very proud of this record, we are glad to see that Prince Edward Island has got along with less relief money than any other province. The amount is so small that the comparisons are striking. I think it figures out only at about $3.70 per capita for the population of Prince Edward Island whereas for British Columbia we find that it is $13 or $14 per head. Now this clause that we are considering is to provide for special relief works and undertakings. In the speech from the throne at the opening of the legislature of Prince Edward Island this year mention was made of a public highway, part I suppose of the trans-Canada highway. The different speakers emphasized the fact that this work was to be gone on with this season. We welcome the news, and we hope that this govenrment will be able to assist in that work. One of the questions I would like to ask is whether in the construction of this trans-Canada highway half the expense has to be borne by the province, or is the federal government as in some other sections of the dominion bearing all the cost of this work?

Mr. BENNETT: It has always been a matter of satisfaction I think to everyone that the province of Prince Edward Island had no such necessity as many of the other provinces had. The total expenditure on relief there I think is about $3.20 per head. The necessity of course was very limited. In truth the maritime provinces have shown up very excellently in the present depression.

As far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned, it will perhaps be within the memory of the hon. gentleman, if he will take the trouble to look at the report that was made by the Minister of Labour, that the government was to ask the several provinces to pass orders in council dedicating certain highways already existent as part of the trans-Canada highway. Upon these highways certain expenditures were made by the federal government to bring them up to a certain standard. Obviously there is no way of getting from Prince Edward Island to the mainland except by ferry, but they presented a case that some assistance should be given towards highways that traverse that province where gravel is difficult to obtain and where a highway that would be useful for motors would involve an expense almost prohibitive to a population so limited. The government agreed that when the proposals were settled between the province and the dominion it would bear a portion of the expenditure. It was proposed to send an engineer down to make an investigation as to what would be the most suitable highway to utilize for the purpose mentioned, but the engineers being otherwise engaged have not been able to go yet although I expect that within the next ten days one will do so.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for that information. It leads to another question. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, the province is connected with the mainland by the car ferry.

Mr. BENNETT: This has nothing to do with relief.

Mr. MacLEAN: We look upon that steamer as an interprovincial bridge. I think we are justified in so doing. We have been advocating every year that the charge for carrying automobiles across on that car ferry should be reduced to the very lowest point and that it should be treated as an interprovincial bridge and prohibitive tolls should not be charged for carrying automobiles. At the present time the charge for carrying autos on that ferry is $7 return. In addition each passenger in the car has to pay a fare, even the chaffeur has to pay the regular fare in addition to the $7 for the car. Now if Prince Edward Island is to be included in the trans-Canada highway, every facility should be given to link up that province with the rest of the highway and make it possible not only for the people of Prince Edward Island but of the whole dominion to use that ferry. I have a clipping in my hand reporting the Prime Minister, speaking at Ormstown, Quebec, on June 29, as saying that he favoured dominion assistance towards a bridge across the St. Lawrence at Lachine, but not a toll bridge, which would prevent farmers getting their produce to the market cheaply. In these days when trucks are such an important means of conveyance, if there was a moderate rate on that ferry large amounts of produce could be moved by truck from our province as in the case of other provinces. I know that this is a matter that comes under the jurisdiction of the board of railway commissioners and the railway directors, and possibly it is out of order here, but when we come to this question of the trans-Canada highway, which is a very important factor, every facility should be offered on that car ferry to link Prince Edward Island up with the rest of the dominion. If on the old boat, with which automobiles had to be loaded on flat cars and then shunted onto the car ferry, they could carry them for $7 each, under the new conditions, when they can drive on and drive off without any labour on the part of the operating crew, I think the fares should be reduced.

Another point is that the passengers going over get a return ticket good for only thirty days, whereas the ticket for the car is good for ninety days, so that there is often a serious mixup when the times comes for them to return. If they have overstayed their thirty days the return tickets for the passengers are no good and they have to take new tickets, even though they go back within the ninety days allowed for their car. All those are matters that we have had up with the railway, and I am sorry to say that they have not made the adjustment that we think they should. I hope someone will convey to the Minister of Railways the fact that we have brought this matter up, so that he will read in Hansard the presentation that has been made.

Mr. HACKETT: This relief act provides means for coming to the assistance of people who have not the opportunity of earning a livelihood for themselves. I think that the act in its application this year will be restricted to the industrial populations of our large cities. In the past it has applied to areas which have been stricken with pest, tempest and other visitations in no way attributable to the depression. What does the government intend to do to assist, in some permanent way, those vast lumps of humanity that have come together in the industrial centres? The other day someone said in the house that fifty-two per cent of the entire population of Canada is now urban dwelling; someone else said that Mr. Taschereau has stated that seventy per cent of the populaton of Quebec now lives in the cities and towns and someone else said that from eighty to ninety per cent of the entire growth of this country between 1921 and 1931 went into the cities. We know that the international exchange of goods is being carried on with increasing difficulty. Is it reasonable to anticipate that even with renewed industrial activity there will be sufficient industrial work to absorb and give gainful employment to our industrial population? Does it not behoove us at this time to seek some permanent solution of the difficulties which confront us? In Montreal last month over 240,000 people were fed from the public purse. How long can that condition go on? How long can twenty-nine per cent of the population of a great city such as Montreal be maintained by money either borrowed on the public credit or raised by taxation? I for one fear that it cannot go on very much longer. While I realize the constitutional difficulties that stand in the way of action by the federal government, and while I understand that the full burden of remedial activity and legislation may rest primarily upon the municipalities, cities and provinces, yet wherever the initiative lies the peril is common to us all. This country, and in fact any modern country, cannot persist and endure if its cities are bankrupt, and our cities, great and prosperous as they have been, cannot persist under this burden placed upon them by the inactivity and the inability of such a substantial percentage of the population to earn a livelihood.

Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that a way must be found whereby these people who are earning nothing and who are being fed by the state may at least be put in a position to grow their own food and provide for the essentials of existence. "Back to the land" is a slogan. It is extremely difficult to go back and undo a life's work. But it is well to remember that probably a great many of the unemployed in the cities came from the land. It is said that between eight thousand and nine thousand heads of families in Montreal are on the list already awaiting transportation to some place in the province where they can make agriculture their chief occupation. Many of these people, for reasons good or bad, abandoned the land. It is said that ten thousand heads of families in Montreal are less than ten years off the land. If that be true, ten thousand heads of families, if they were confronted with the necessity, and many of them, perhaps, if they were afforded the opportunity, could go back to the land and at least provide for themselves and those for whom they are responsible.

I said the other day that I did not advocate sending these people to the hinterland, to the fringe of civilization and beyond. While I am sure the minister has laboured valiantly in his attempt to get people to go back to the land, only a few families have benefitted by his policy. I believe it is not feasible to send great numbers of people into the wilderness. Pioneering is a profession and one does not qualify for pioneering in a factory town. But there are large areas of available land in organized districts where there are churches, schools, highways, electrical service and so on, districts in which the land, because it has been abandoned, is very cheap. In those districts plots of ten, fifteen or twenty acres could be made available to those people, who would not feel that by moving to those districts from the cities they were sacrificing all opportunity for the advancement and education of their children, and all possibility of communion with their fellowmen. The families who have been transported to the extreme north and northwest received something like $600, which is paid in two years, I believe. A substantial portion of this amount is consumed in transportation charges, and the balance is used up in providing those things which to some extent are provided already in the settled districts.

This is my suggestion, Mr. Chairman: In all the large centres there are social services in active operation. These agencies can make available to competent authority detailed information concerning almost any family in any of these large centres. On very short notice they can tell what people by training, aptitude or longing are proper candidates for this type of existence on the land, within striking distance of the industrial centres. It is said that we are to spend large sums of money on public works. I ask the committee what form of public work could be more advantageous to the country at large than permanently rehabilitating a large element of our population, which is now festering in inactivity in the cities, upon small tracts of land where at least they can provide themselves with fuel and food and without much difficulty, I believe, with all the necessities of life. The land throughout many of the old parishes is cheap to-day because farming as a business is not a paying vocation. Everybody on the land in the province of Quebec is free from any fear of hunger or peril from the elements. Many people on the land in that province are land poor. Land could be obtained from them at very low prices. I believe that a very substantial percentage of the farming population in old Quebec would be willing to part with some of their land for some small consideration which would enable them to pay taxes and to have a little ready money for their own immediate necessities.

I should like to know that at the beginning of this season the proper authorities would be invited to collaborate in a definite scheme to dissolve the masses of inert population who, for several years, have been unable to do for themselves that which every self-respecting Canadian citizen should at least want to do for himself, namely, earn his own livelihood. It is only a few years ago that the men and women who came to this country had absolutely nothing but the soil, their courage and their physical strength to apply to it.

Mr. BOUCHARD: And no taxes.

Mr. HACKETT: That may be true; there were no taxes then. But to-day there is offered a very large quid for their quo: good roads, means of education, freedom from fear of attack from any enemy and the elements. I do not think that taxes should be an insuperable source of worry to them.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) only a few moments ago made reference to education. He thought it would be well to send some of the unemployed youth into schools that they might learn something of the methods useful in searching for gold or other minerals. I am of the opinion that a very radical change must be made in the education of the Canadian people, and that some day that change will come about. At the present time if a person hazards any criticism of our educational system he is immediately castigated. The fact remains however that careers in the city, and especially the intellectual careers, are overcrowded. Metallurgy, electricity, mechanics and chemistry have become gods on whose altars children have for years been yielded up as offerings by deluded parents. The time has come when we must look to rural careers as an outlet for natural increase of our population. There are great openings in the rural centres, great openings which have been left void for two or three generations. That is one of the reasons for the difficulties now experienced on the land. Nearly everybody who had youth, energy, talent or ability left the land, with the result that to a large extent the land has been left in the possession of the aged, the impotent and the indolent. That observation may be turned against the person who utters it, and it may be described as an impolitic utterance. It might be interpreted to mean that one is inclined to scoff at those living in the rural sections of the country. Far from it. The statement is made in the hope that it may give to the rural sections new blood; they need the assistance of those who are condemned to inactivity in the cities. I believe that if the surplus population of the cities could be moved towards the country there would be generated an activity on the soil which would bring relief and a solution to many of our fiscal difficulties and economic problems. It would reestablish equilibrium in our population; it would give back a measure of prosperity to the countryside itself by sending back to it some of the youth and enthusiasm which for the last twenty or twenty-five years have been drifting unswervingly and constantly towards the cities.

I am therefore hopeful that in any plan of public works which may be evolved the possibility of rehabilitating the countryside and of sending people back where they can earn a livelihood will not be entirely overlooked. I trust that the constitutional objection may be overcome by a generous attempt on the part of all concerned to overcome it, and by a realization of the great peril in which the integrity of Canada stands, if it be not overcome.

Mr. MARCIL: Some weeks ago when the Prime Minister moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into price spreads the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg asked that it be extended to fisheries. I immediately supported his contention. A few moments ago the Prime Minister said that some assistance has been given to the fisheries of the maritime provinces, and that conditions there are being inquired into. I should like to know if something has been done regarding the fisheries of the province of Quebec which, at the present time, are in a very bad state.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to hear from the minister whether anything has been done regarding fisheries in Quebec. I understand an investigation is being made into the fisheries of the maritime provinces, and that some assistance has been given there. I should like to know if something can be done for Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: I used the word maritime as applying to Quebec as well because Quebec is usually refered to by many of us at least as being a maritime province. When we speak of the lower provinces we say "the three maritime provinces." What I have said with regard to fisheries has equal application to the whole of that part of Canada producing fish, and even to the internal part producing fish from the lakes.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Stanstead that the hon. member for North Timiskaming is correct in his suggestion that as soon as the present Minister of Labour took office in 1930 he was of the opinion that some effort should be made to move men back to the land. Two plans have been formulated. One is the plan under which the federal government itself takes responsibility for the transaction when the arrangements have been made for the land that may be available for that purpose. The other is purely a relief measure. There has never been any constitutional difficulty. There has been no trouble on that score, and if the city of Montreal through the province of Quebec puts before the government proposals looking towards the absorption on the land of a number of residents of the city of Montreal the matter will undoubtedly receive most careful consideration. I am not going to discuss the sociological problem that is involved by the overcrowding of our cities, but a few months ago I heard a minister of the crown in Great Britain say that in Great Britain now there are a million men who would never work. That was the position that had come about there by reason of the conditions to which the hon. member for Stanstead has just referred. The machine age has increased to a great extent the number of people who are unemployed. Some people are of the opinion that the machine age would add to the number who would find employment, but in the aggregate, on balance, I believe that is not the opinion that is held to-day. I saw the other day an estimate that in the United States it was believed that forty per cent of the farming population would have to cease farming. That struck me as an amazing statement.

Mr. BRADETTE: Through restrictions on farming?

Mr. BENNETT: Because production was of such a character, it was said, that it would be necessary that forty per cent of the farming population should cease to carry on farming.

Whether a great movement of the people back to the soil, living there for the purpose of supplying their mere necessities, assisted by the state to the extent that may be necessary to enable them to become established, is capable of solving that problem is a question about which I express no opinion at the moment, but I do say that the government has given for the last three years, and will continue to give during this year, with the assistance of this legislation, such support to the joint efforts of cities and communities created by provincial legislatures and provincial authorities to make possible as large a movement of men qualified to make a success of living on the land as it is within reason to do. But I do not think that you can move ten thousand individuals from the cities to the land and undertake the work indicated by the hon. member for Stanstead unless we rearrange our whole theory of society. If we come to the conclusion that we will embark on some measure of socialization, one can understand a measure of that kind possibly becoming effective, but under our present conditions I am of the opinion that it could only be done as it is being done, by selection and with extreme care; and the assistance required to secure establishment may have to be continued, as has been stated here this afternoon, beyond the three years for a very considerable period.

On the other hand, an equilibrium between production and consumption and consumption and production may come about sooner than we can realize. My own view is that it can only come about by an expansion of international trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: On that you are perfectly right.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, no one has done quite as much to bring it about in this country as I have, but there are those like the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) whose idea of international trade and improved international trade—

Mr. McINTOSH: Freer trade.

Mr. BENNETT: —consists in merely permitting his own country to practise a virtue which others do not, and thereby become the victim of the virtue practised. That seems to be the theory on which so many of my hon. friends opposite dwell. I confess I cannot understand it. I cannot understand how any Canadian citizen would suggest that ten and a half millions of people should make it easier for other people to supply the wants of Canadians than the Canadians themselves, and how thereby you can add to the wealth of Canadians when you are depriving them of the means of livelihood which they now enjoy. That is an amazing suggestion. My hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) smiles at the thought. He can readily appreciate how you could make it easier to sell the manufactured products produced in his riding by removing any imposts or duties, thereby giving employment to Czechoslovakia and closing the factories in his own district. It is a delightful thing to contemplate! It is one of those things that few Canadian citizens are ready to agree to, and when it is suggested that we do it, I can only say that I am not one of those who are prepared to do it. So far as I am concerned I never propose to do it.

But I am prepared to cooperate with the other nations of the world in doing our part as a small proportion, ten and a half millions of people, of a total population of about seventeen hundred million people; but to become the victims of our own virtue is not exactly what I contemplate doing. I can assure the hon. gentleman that when he applauds so warmly the thought of improved international trade, the kind of trade that he has in mind and the kind of international trade I have in mind are entirely different. I am thinking of international trade based upon fair play for my own country compared with the treatment we accord to other countries, and not of making Canada just a dumping ground for the products of other lands. I have digressed from my observations, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of dealing with that phase.

My hon. friend from Prince (Mr. MacLean) dealt with a car ferry which he said was a floating bridge that travelled by night—

Mr. DUFF: Ships that sail in the night.

Mr. BENNETT: That pass in the night, and he said that an unjust government insisted upon collecting a fare from the chauffeur as well as from other persons who passed on this floating bridge. Just why a chauffeur should be exempt from a fare any more than any other passenger I have been unable to understand. While my knowledge of Scripture is not quite all it should be, I thought while he was speaking I could recall a verse in the Bible, and so I sent for it, and these are the words:

> But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord, and went down to Joppa; and he found a ship going to Tarshish: so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord.

Mr. DUFF: That is not sacrilege, is it?

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is merely that Jonah paid his fare. There are even members of parliament who do not emulate Jonah in that regard. Just why a chauffeur should not pay his fare when the passenger does, I am unable to understand. As far back as four thousand years or thereabouts we are told that when Jonah went down to Tarshish he paid his fare before he went.

Mr. POULIOT: He did not pay his fare when he was in the whale.

Mr. BENNETT: But he did not ask for his fare back because of an interrupted journey.

These services cannot be carried on for nothing. Even a bridge has to be maintained and repairs would be necessary. If the charges are exorbitant—I cannot express an opinion as to whether they are—they are those imposed by the railway company and not by the government. Like every representative of the island, the hon. member has pressed this claim very strongly. A few days ago Doctor MacMillan, the premier of Prince Edward Island, presented some arguments with great strength and backed up with much material to show that the rates were excessive. The Department of Railways and Canals does not now deal with rates but the railway company has been asked on more than one occasion to look into the matter. They are of the opinion that the traffic does not warrant a reduction in the rates but it may well be that when the attractions of the island are better understood, and they are very great, the pressure of traffic will be such as to bring about a reduction in the charges imposed for the services rendered.

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to complete the remarks which I commenced a moment ago. I understood that the Prime Minister included maritime Quebec when he used the general term, maritime provinces. I am very glad to hear this because at the present time the fisheries of Quebec are facing great difficulties. A conflict in jurisdiction has arisen through the transfer of the fisheries to the government of Quebec. A movement has been started by the Union des Cultivateurs Catholique, the Catholic Farmers' Union. I have received over one hundred petitions asking that there should be cooperation between the two governments in connection with the maritime fisheries of Quebec. These petitions have been received from all parts of the province. I read yesterday in the papers that the Minister of Fisheries in Quebec, Hon. Mr. LaFerté, complains that he has been unable to secure the cooperation of the Dominion government for the development of these fisheries. He asks that the fisheries be placed on the same basis as agriculture and that there be cooperation between the dominion and provincial governments in order that the fisheries may be helped. As everyone knows, the fisheries of Quebec are the oldest in the country. This coming July we are celebrating in Gaspé the four hundredth anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier and the planting of the cross of Christ on this country. This is a testimonial which should not be overlooked and I hope the government will not neglect anything it can do for the inhabitants of Gaspé, one of the most interesting and picturesque parts of Quebec.

The Prime Minister has given us a very interesting view of the conditions under which we are living to-day. From the slight experience of over a third of a century in this parliament I have come to the conclusion that this country was settled by the people going on the land. That is as old as civilization itself. The cities are merely artificial outgrowths of the country districts; the country has to provide for the existence of the city. Any program of public works which may last six months, a year or even two or three years will give only temporary relief to the unemployed. The real solution to the difficulty is to get our people back on the land. The settlers of Quebec, of Ontario and the other provinces of Canada were put on the land. We have some evidence in the Gaspe peninsula of what can be done. Three or four municipalities have been opened up and nearly a thousand people have been placed on the land. This has been done largely through the efforts of Monseigneur Ross, the Bishop of Gaspe, assisted by the provincial government.

I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) when he says that there is a large overgrowth of population in Montreal which must be provided for. I knew Montreal when it had less than 200,000 people whereas to-day it has a population of over a million. The island of Montreal lacks but 37,000 people to have half the population of the entire province of Quebec. The solution to our problem is not by manufacturing, which is only an artificial means. The primary industry of this country in the past, at the present and in the future has been, is and will be agriculture. Agriculture is the backbone of the country. During the war many were attracted to the city. Common labourers were able to earn $15 per day in the munitions shops and people were attracted by the automobile, by the moving pictures and by the fallacious modern civilization which we now have in the cities. These people must go back to the land. If they do not go back, their sons must.

I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) before me. He was a witness, as was I, of the efforts made thirty or forty years ago by that valiant pioneer of civilization, curé Labelle of St. Jerome. This man opened up the district north of Montreal and created thirty, forty or fifty parishes. He came to the assistance of the citizens of Montreal during the winter of 1874. Navigation had failed to bring in the necessary fuel, starvation was at its doors but one day he came into the city at the head of two hundred teams loaded with firewood for the relief of the poor. He was one of the pioneers of Canada and that is the position to which we must go back.

The Prime Minister occupies to-day a very unique position. He is gifted as any other man in this chamber is gifted. At the present time he can exercise an influence which will be overwhelming. When he evolves his great policy to settle our present difficulties I hope he will not spend money just for the sake of spending money; I hope he will not provide only temporary relief for a year or two years hence but will arrive at the correct solution. The pioneers of Ontario, Quebec and the whole of Canada came from the land. The traditions must not be forgotten. Canada is an agricultural country before all else. We have four great industries, and agriculture is the first. That industry must not be overlooked in any scheme evolved. I hope the Prime Minister will not overlook the suggestion made by the hon. member for Stanstead. At the present time there is the incredible number of 45,000 families receiving relief in the city of Montreal. The total number on relief would aggregate probably a quarter of a million, one-fourth the population of one of the most prosperous cities on this continent. But for the winters, Montreal would have long since passed New York. It is now one of the leading cities on this continent. It is a great cosmopolitan city, situated a thousand miles from the sea and inhabited by the flower of both our great races. Things are in such shape that the authorities are desperate and only two or three days ago the citizens arose and by a majority of 53,000 asked for a change. A change for what? They asked for an opportunity to earn their bread, they were seeking a way out of the stagnation in which they find themselves at the present time. I am not blaming one municipal, provincial or dominion government more than the other, it is a question with which all governments must deal. The permanent solution will be found only by placing the people on the land. The Postmaster General could give the committee an idea of how northern Quebec was settled. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier completed the Transcontinental railway he had in view the opening up of northern Ontario and Quebec, that part of the country which is to-day the most promising of all Canada. Mining in northern Ontario is to-day attracting the attention of the world and in this respect Quebec is following in the footsteps of Ontario. We must go back to the land, and it would be an excellent thing for any statesmen or government to bring about understanding and cooperation because we must all stand together. We are passing through a national crisis at the present time, a crisis which calls for our best efforts and we should agree to work together. In all humility I suggest to the Prime Minister that in bringing down this measure he should not overlook the importance of going back to the land. That is the first duty that rests upon the government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not at this time desire to discuss either rural or urban questions, nor do I desire to discuss in all its ramifications the very serious problem that confronts the fishermen of the maritimes. I do not think that the committee of the house is the proper place in which to do that, but I intend to discuss the whole question in all its bearing when the budget is introduced and when a full dress debate, which will be worthy of the problem, is in progress. There is, however, one question in regard to which I should be glad if the Prime Minister would give me some information. This afternoon we have heard a good deal about the trans-Canada highway and if it is a fair question at the moment—for I do not know whether he has the information—I would ask the Prime Minister the number of miles of highway that were constructed under the trans-Canada highway program. I ask this question for a special reason. In a joint debate that took place between the hon. gentleman who is now premier of Nova Scotia and myself in 1930 that gentleman made the statement, before 7,000 people, that the program would mean merely the construction of six miles of highway in northern Ontario. I desire to get that information in order to find out how many miles of highway throughout Canada have been constructed under that program.

Mr. BENNETT: At the end of the year, as far as I can ascertain, the following mileage had been completed on the trans-Canada highway:

Province	Mileage	Cost
Nova Scotia Miles improved or constructed	59	$ 2,094,384
New Brunswick	65	459,635
Quebec	35	150,366
Ontario	830	7,742,158
Manitoba	45½	655,108
Saskatchewan	17½	67,367
Alberta	145	336,310
British Columbia	160	868,891
Total	1,357	$12,374,219

The abnormal cost in Nova Scotia arises from the inclusion in that case of the elimination of four level crossings, and construction of bridges, surveys, clearing of right of way, improving grade and alignment, crusher operations, surfacing comprise the balance of the expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many miles are yet to be built before the project is completed in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not that information in detail but the hon. gentleman will recall that there are six miles in British Columbia that have to be completed between Canoe river and the west end of the park. This line is fairly complete across Alberta and Saskatchewan into Manitoba and from Manitoba to Kenora, and between Kenora and Fort William the work is being pressed forward rather rapidly; then it strikes north and there is a section incomplete. But from Montreal to North Bay the road is practically completed. From North Bay it is in a fair state of completion, and in the maritimes the roads set aside as trans-Canada highway have been improved to trans-Canada standards at the cost I have indicated. So that practically from Nova Scotia to British Columbia there is a relatively small mileage that is not included in what is called the trans-Canada highway. Part of this information was given to my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) the other evening.

Mr. BRADETTE: What distinction will be observed legally in the name of the trans-Canada highway, which will be recognized by the provinces and the federal government? Toronto will have its highway which will be part of the trans-Canada converging at North Bay with the road from Ottawa.

Mr BENNETT: So far as we are concerned, as I endeavoured to explain in 1931, it is the roads that were set aside by the province by order in council as part of the continuous highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. On page 5 of the report for 1931, issued in 1932, these words appear:

> The expression trans-Canada highways means, in relation to the province, such provincial highways affording a continuous route connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces as may be designated by the province and approved by the dominion.

Mr. DUFF: I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) on the excellent address he delivered this afternoon. As the representative of that important constituency in the province of Quebec he will, I am sure, be congratulated by everyone who has heard him or will read his address either in the newspapers or in Hansard to-morrow. Everyone will congratulate him, and thank him for the seriousness with which he approached the subject and the excellent way in which he delivered himself. As I sat here, however, I was wondering whether he would not be accused of delaying the passage of this bill. Perhaps he is a "fortunate medium" inasmuch as he sits behind the Prime Minister, while I am an unfortunate medium because I sit opposite. In your absence a few days ago, Mr. Chairman, we were told that we were delaying the passage of this measure, and for that reason I was rather surprised when the hon. gentleman spoke that the Prime Minister did not get up and say something to him, as he did to me the day before yesterday. Perhaps the Prime Minister, after giving this matter further consideration, has come to the conclusion that possibly his words the other day were rather hasty when he spoke as he did of members of parliament who have been sent here from different constituencies from the Atlantic to the Pacific to express their views on this and other important matters.

Now, we have been accused of delaying this legislation, but as my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) said the other night, the first delay that was occasioned was not attributable to members on this side of the house but to the genial Minister of Labour, a gentleman who is respected by every man in this parliament irrespective of his politics, a man who was in a courteous manner trying to pilot the bill through the house, giving members of the committee every consideration and all information they asked for in reply to questions they put to him. And now, sir, we have another gentleman delaying this legislation, not one of those sitting on your left, sir, not even sitting behind the Prime Minister, but no less a person than the Prime Minister himself, who accused me and members sitting on this side of delaying this legislation. He is the greatest sinner of all. What did he do? In order to prepare the way for himself yesterday afternoon, he deliberately accused us of delaying the legislation. He practically told me if I did not sit down he would ask the committee to rise and he would not go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why?

Mr. DUFF: I shall tell you in a moment. When six o'clock came every one here was rather happy, and of course after I got through there was not very much trouble; other members were very decent about it. My hon. friend the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 2090.

> In view of the very apparent desire to rediscuss this matter which has been already twice this afternoon set out in its entirety, I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Then he goes on to say:

> We will take supply, agriculture, after eight o'clock.

[Mr. Duff.]

Why was it necessary to take agriculture after eight o'clock? Why did not the Prime Minister, if he was so anxious to get this legislation through, come back to this committee and go on with this bill? Let me tell you the reason. It shows he was not so anxious to get this legislation through, because from eight to nine o'clock my right hon. friend—as he had a perfect right to do of course, but he should not try to make us believe that he is more virtuous, more sincere, more righteous than others—tried to make out in righteous indignation that we were delaying. But consideration of the bill was deferred by him in order that he might speak over the radio to the people of South Oxford. Deliberately, in my opinion—perhaps that word is not parliamentary, so I shall withdraw it—he asked this committee to rise and report progress at six o'clock so that he could speak to the electors of South Oxford from eight o'clock until nine.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap stuff.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend want to cheer those remarks? Now since I am on my feet I would like also to refer to another matter. The Prime Minister is a great constitutional lawyer, and he plays politics just as many hours of the day as I do. But in my opinion he would also make a pretty good actor, because in trying to answer my remarks yesterday when I referred to a certain important matter which I felt in the interests of the public should be discussed in this house and particulars given, my right hon. friend instead of giving the information, said this:

> I ask the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and those who cheer his sentiments, do they desire to destroy western agriculture and drive the farmers of that country into bankruptcy? Is that their object? Is that the reason he makes these attacks? Why is it he stands in this house and becomes the mouthpiece of those who make attacks against western agriculture?

Now let me say first that I was never the mouthpiece of anybody, Mackenzie and Mann or anyone else. I remember the right hon. gentleman saying that the present leader of the Senate was the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann. I was never a gramophone in my life, and with all my faults, and God knows I have many, no one will accuse me of being a hypocrite or a pharisee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Or a good Samaritan.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I am a good Samaritan. My right hon. friend went on and tried to make out that we on this side, and myself in particular, were against the west. What did he say?

> Now are these gentlemen going to raise this cry against the west in its time of peril, its time of difficulty, its time of stress; are they going to appeal to sectional and other prejudice for the purpose of carrying out any such policy?

And again:

> It is little credit to any hon. member to raise that issue in the way in which they have endeavoured to raise it in this case.

Then finally he gets a little softer in his mood, and says:

> All I can say is that the sentiment expressed by some of the members of this house is not the sentiment of the people of the communities from whence they come,—

That is referring, Mr. Chairman, to the very intelligent people who elected me to represent them in this house.

> —for last year not ten, not fifteen, not twenty, but I believe it went up to something between one and two hundred carloads of produce went from eastern Canada to the west to help them in their need.

That last statement is quite true, Mr. Chairman, and I think my constituency and the county which is represented by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) in which I reside, the county of my adoption, of my home, as well as other counties in the maritime provinces, did what they could to help the distress not only in western Canada but also in other parts of this great country. My right hon. friend can write his cheque for a larger amount than I can—where I give my mite I have no objection to my right hon. friend giving the larger amount that he can give—but it does not lie in his mouth to say that I or any other hon. member is against the western provinces. Let me say to my right hon. friend that I am just as much interested in the welfare and prosperity of the west as he is. And, Mr. Chairman, from an economic standpoint I have proved it. Not only in this house, not only in the country, but in connection with manufacturing plants in which I have shares in certain cities I have never failed to demonstrate my belief in the policy which in my opinion is best for the western provinces, the policy of low tariffs and if possible free trade. I have always said that. It is true of course that my right hon. friend in the last general election went up and down the prairies and the west telling the people that he was going to make tariffs fight for them, was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. And what is the result as far as the western provinces are concerned? Look at the money that this country has had to spend for relief in the west as well as in the industrial centres in the maritimes and elsewhere. My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Macdonald), who looks very stern, will remember what the right hon. Prime Minister said in his city, that he was going to end unemployment; no dole, no conferences, but he was going to end unemployment. What has been the result in the last three or four years?

Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton): He did as much as any man living could do.

Mr. DUFF: That is quite true. But what I am complaining about is that the Prime Minister went up and down this country saying he was going to end unemployment. He did not tell the people of Sydney and Glace Bay that he would do as much as any other man. Oh, no. He was going to be a superman. I will take no second place to the Prime Minister or anyone else in this country as far as my goodwill concerning the western provinces is concerned. Let me go a little further. Of course I do not want to delay the committee. My right hon. friend rather objected to my demand—no I should not use that word—my request—on behalf of some of my constituents that certain relief should be given to them in the form of a small advance of $15,000 to buy fishing gear and equip their boats. I am glad to see in the house this afternoon my good friend the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short), a gentleman who for years gave of his substance, of his time, of his ability, trying to do something for the fishermen of Nova Scotia and for the town of Canso. My hon. friend knows as well as I do exactly the condition of Canso. If I am an unhappy medium—and I am sorry for it of course in a way—perhaps my good friend the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis would be a happy medium to place before the Prime Minister and the government the needs of the people of Canso as to this $15,000.

The Prime Minister took several stands on the matter I brought before him. First he said the mayor of Canso should not have communicated with me. I think perhaps there are as many Conservatives on the Canso town council as there are Liberals, or perhaps more; if I am not mistaken a very prominent Conservative in Canso is a member of that council and no doubt had something to do with sending this telegram. Then the Prime Minister stated that the mayor of Canso did not really expect to get this money under the relief bill which we are now discussing. Well, sir, with all due respect to the mayor of Canso, he is living in the eastern part of Nova Scotia. No doubt he saw in the newspapers that the marketing bill had been introduced in this parliament and, without having the bill before him and without realizing that in the bill there is no provision for advancing money to fishermen, farmers or anyone else, the mayor and town council of Canso thought that under this bill they could get relief for their fellow townsmen and the fishermen of that district. My right hon. friend made use of that fact and said the mayor of Canso, in sending the telegram, had asked that the money be granted under that act. As far as I am concerned, and I believe I speak for the mayor, the town council and the fishermen of Canso, I do not care under what legislation this relief is granted; I do not care under what act of parliament or what order in council this small sum of $15,000 is advanced in order to permit the fishermen to buy their gear and equip their boats. As I said yesterday, sir, this government took action in another very important matter, and let me say here that I never criticized the government for having given that guarantee. I only said that there should be no step bairns in our family, that all should be treated alike. If in connection with another matter millions of dollars could be guaranteed I said there was no reason why a small sum like $15,000 should not be guaranteed by the government of this country for the fishermen of Canso. I do not criticize my right hon. friend for having given that other guarantee, although I think he is open to criticism; from the fact that the government do not want to give full information it would seem that there must be something they want to cover up.

In the other case, let me remind the right hon. gentleman, no law was required; the guarantee was given eight months before the act was passed by this house. There was no statute which permitted the guarantee in that case, but even after the act was passed another month or more elapsed, if I remember correctly, before the order in council was passed making it legal. As I said a moment ago I do not object to that; I only say that if this government were willing and anxious to do something for the fishermen of Canso they would not need to wait for this legislation. My right hon. friend said this could not be done in any case because we were delaying this legislation. I say that either under this or some other statute, whether by way of guarantee or by way of relief, this government can do something for the fishermen with regard to this $15,000. This clause now under consideration states that the government may take all such other measures as may be deemed necessary or advisable in order to carry out the provisions of the statute.

This afternoon my right hon. friend comes along and says that this request should be made by the provincial government. Perhaps I am not as familiar with the law as I should be; perhaps I am not as familiar as I should be with the manner in which relief was granted to the municipalities and towns last year and the year before, but if my understanding is correct the federal government paid one-third, the provincial government one-third and the municipality or town one-third of the cost. My right hon. friend says the provincial government should take up this matter. I happen to be the representative of the people of Antigonish and Guysborough in this parliament, but my right hon. friend wants the people to go over my head, because I happen to be an unfortunate medium. I want to say to the Prime Minister, before I write the provincial government to-morrow morning or telegraph them to-night, if I have the money in my pocket—

An hon. MEMBER: Send it collect.

Mr. DUFF: No, I will borrow it from you. I say before I do that I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that in their present financial position, due to the fact that they have had to expend large sums of money for relief and to the further fact that taxes have not been coming in as they should, the town of Canso cannot raise their share of this amount. So I say this is a special occasion; this is a special request, and so far as I am concerned if the Prime Minister wants to take credit for it, or if he wants any member of his cabinet to take credit for it, well and good. All I say is that the mayor of Canso and the town council thought I was the proper person through whom they should make this appeal, and they should not be criticized for thinking so.

My right hon. friend complained again that I should have taken up the matter with the ministry instead of bringing it before parliament. I explained the situation the other day, when I said I only received the telegram two or three hours before this bill came up for discussion. Again I say that I was perfectly justified, as the representative of the counties of Antigonish and Guysborough, in bringing this matter to the attention of the government from my place on the floor of parliament. So, not wishing to delay this committee further, I say to the Prime Minister that he should not ask the provincial government to go about this in the ordinary way; he should pass a special order in council or make some special arrangement by which, at the earliest possible moment, either before or after this legislation passes, the government arrange that these fishermen will receive this small sum of $15,000, for which they are willing to give notes and which they expect to be able to pay back in the fall. All they want is to have the Bank of Montreal guaranteed in the meantime so that they may be ready when the season comes along to attend to their work in order to provide for their families and take them off relief.

Mr. YOUNG: In reply to the remarks of the Prime Minister a few moments ago in regard to our idea of improving world trade I might say that the Liberal idea of improving world trade is to sell our surplus products in the world's markets at the highest price the world is willing to pay, while his idea of improving world trade is to sell our products in the world's markets at the lowest price the world is willing to pay. The things we export are paid for by the things we import. When the Prime Minister and his government say, "We will not allow other countries to send goods to Canada except at certain advanced prices" he is simply saying to our people, "We will not allow you to accept the price for your exports that the world is willing to pay; you must sell for a lower price." It is true that the Prime Minister says he is willing to negotiate with other countries in regard to lowering tariff barriers. When he proceeded to increase his tariff barriers he did not wait to negotiate with other countries; he went ahead without consulting them.

Mr. BENNETT: They had already done so; they had prohibitive tariffs.

Mr. YOUNG: No country had gone to the lengths the Prime Minister went. I do not know of any country that amended its customs act to say, "You shall not sell goods in our country unless you are making a profit on them." That is the way the tariff reads now. I do not know of any country that so framed its customs laws as to guarantee the profits of foreign manufacturers, regardless of our own manufacturers. It seems to me that if all the people in Canada were in a position to buy all their requirements in the way of houses, furniture, food, education, entertainment, and the conveniences of civilization, there would be an abundance of employment for everybody, and plenty with which to supply them. The reason our people cannot buy all these things is that those who sell on the export market cannot get sufficient for their exports to enable them to buy the articles they require.

As for the machine age being responsible for unemployment I have only this to say: When one considers the vast need which exists in Canada, in practically every house across the country, for so many modern conveniences and necessities of life, and when you consider that the appetite of man—

Mr. BOUCHARD: And woman.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and woman,—for goods of all kinds and descriptions is insatiable, one cannot say that the market is saturated simply because some machinist has come along and made it easier to produce a given article with less labour. When a labour-saving machine is installed to produce a given article at a lower cost the result should be that the machine would make it possible to put that article in the hands of more people. It would result not in less but in greater employment in the industry affected, because owing to its cheaper selling price more people would buy it. But when the advantage of the labour-saving machine is not passed on to the consumer in the form of lower prices, but is appropriated by one individual or one group of individuals to their own selfish use, it then results in less employment in the industry because there is no increased demand for the product. I believe the remedy is to be found not in reducing the use of modern machinery but rather in encouraging it, and seeing that the advantage brought about by modern inventions is passed on to the consumer, in the form of lower prices. It is the duty of the government to take whatever steps are necessary to see that those advantages are passed on. There is not much hope, true, so long as the government believes in high prices.

I have a suggestion to make to the government in regard to its expenditures on relief work. I never was enamoured of nor could I become enthusiastic about an extensive public works policy as a means of relieving unemployment. I have two reasons: in the first place, those public works must of necessity be located in a few places. The unemployment in Canada is so widespread that the employment given by the creation of those works would be too far away from most of the people needing work to help them very much. The second reason is that public works of that description almost invariably saddle us later on with large maintenance costs. They will be a burden on the taxpayers for years to come, and we cannot increase the purchasing power of our people by increasing their taxation. Rather, we will reduce it. This type of public works is more inclined to increase unemployment than to relieve it.

A suggestion has been made to me which I place before the government for its consideration. It is this: I walk down the streets of this city and I see scores, yes hundreds of houses which ought to be first-class dwelling houses for years to come, and would be first-class if the owners were able to keep them in repair. But because the owners have not the money required for repairs those houses are falling into disrepair. They will soon be uninhabitable. I go into the rural sections of the country and I find hundreds of houses, outbuildings and fences in the same bad condition, all falling to pieces because the owners have not the money to keep them in repair. If we have to tax ourselves for the relief of unemployment would it not be the better part of wisdom to spend the money so raised in such a way that it will be most widely diffused, and will not saddle us with any maintenance cost? Would it not be wise to advance money to people for the improvement of their homes, so that they may make the necessary repairs? Would it not be wise to let the farmers have money to repair their fences, their outbuildings, and make other necessary expenditures, and in that way spread the money over the widest possible area and give employment in the most remote corners of the country as well as in the larger centres of population? By so doing we would avoid the necessity of saddling the government with maintenance costs in later years. I submit that suggestion to the government in all good faith, and in the hope that they will give it consideration.

Mr. BROWN: I listened with a good deal of interest to the eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), and to those of the highly-respected member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), both of whom spoke of the return to the land as a solution for our great problems. I wish I could become as enthusiastic about that solution as are these two hon. gentlemen. I realize, as all hon. members must realize, that as a temporary measure many might be put in a position whereby they could earn sustenance. However it is difficult for me to see that the return of large numbers of people to the land, particularly through the use of the compulsory methods which have been described, would meet the problem. It has been suggested that the farmer should go back to the use of primitive methods and that, as in pioneer days, the farm should become a self-contained unit. I am ready to concede that if farmers to-day are content to live as did their pioneer forefathers, perhaps they may continue to live on the land and provide from it the bare necessities of life. But I do not think we could expect nor have we the right to expect that the rural population should be compelled to deny themselves all the privileges, conveniences and comforts enjoyed by the city dwellers. I do not think we have any right to expect that the farmers should be content with less of the good things of life than are enjoyed by people in the cities. I would make the suggestion to the hon. member for Stanstead—and I should not like to make it to the venerable member for Bonaventure—that he is yet a comparatively young man and, as some of the rest of us have done, he might set an example by going back to the land and showing the people how they can live on it and enjoy the comforts and conveniences which he now enjoys in the city. If the hon. member for Stanstead left Montreal, that city would lose a good lawyer, but the country would gain a man of capacity and intelligence, and one who would be able to use his intelligence to show how this problem can be solved.

No, Mr. Chairman, the farm problem is not to be solved in that way. It seems to me there are certain inevitable difficulties under which a farmer must live. Perhaps in the very nature of things he cannot expect all the conveniences enjoyed in the city. But recognizing, as many of us do, that there are certain inevitable and natural handicaps from which the farmer must continue to suffer, would it not seem to be an act of wisdom for the government, instead of raising artificial barriers, instead of increasing by tariffs and other means the artificial obstacles with which we have to contend, to remove these artificial barriers so as to make the natural difficulties less difficult for us to overcome. That is just where those who represent the school of thought to which I belong differ from those who represent the school of thought of the Prime Minister. One reason I could give strong support to many of the measures adopted by the preceding administration was that they did attempt to do at least something, probably not as much as I should like to have seen them do, to make it possible for us to secure the implements of production at a cost lower than that at which it is possible to procure them when they have to be purchased in the face of high tariffs. That at least is doing something to remove the natural handicap under which the farmers labour. Again I invite the hon. member for Stanstead to put his theories into practice and show us how farmers can earn not merely a bare subsistence on the land but sufficient to put themselves in a position to enjoy what other members of the community enjoy in the way of modern inventions. I had a man say to me, "By spring you will find me the fattest and the raggedest man in the country." He simply meant that on the farm he had plenty to eat but that the prices at which he was able to sell his produce were not sufficient to enable him to clothe himself properly. Another man said to me in a jocular way, "I wish this depression would end. I am tired of eating turkey." It is true that there are exceptional circumstances in the west at the present time but the difficulty in most cases is not that the farmers have not sufficient to eat but that they cannot dispose of their surplus at a price that will enable them to buy clothing and the other necessaries and conveniences that every civilized man has a right to expect. I wish I could see the problem as simple as the hon. member for Stanstead and the hon. member for Bonaventure see it, but it is beset with infinitely greater difficulties than they seem to see.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I wish I could see this problem as simple as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) sees it, or the members mentioned by the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Brown), or the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who made a remark to which I shall refer a little later.

The hon. member for Stanstead stated that the farmers were dependent upon the cities. That may be so in the east, but it is not so in the west. Cities like Edmonton or Calgary are certainly exceptions to the rule. In Alberta generally, excluding Edmonton and Calgary, the farmers can live without the cities, but certainly the cities, neither Edmonton nor Calgary, and so forth, can live without the farmers of the west. So the hon. member's argument does not hold water so far as Alberta is concerned.

What we are suffering from is a lack of balance between town and country, between the rural and urban parts. I was in Detroit the other day and saw a beautiful Chrysler car marked $495, and you have to pay $1,000 for the same car in any automobile establishment in Ottawa. I felt pretty badly about that because I certainly would like to have such a car for $495.

Mr. MORAND: My hon. friend is surely not serious in suggesting that there is a difference of about $600 for the same car.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I certainly am serious. It makes a big difference to me and to any farmers or labourers in Canada.

Mr. MORAND: It might, if it were a fact. Does my hon. friend seriously say that the same car costs $1,000 in Ottawa?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Yes. I was offered a car in Detroit for $495, a Chrysler coach. I saw the price marked on it.

What I think is the trouble to-day is the lack of balance between city and country, between the price the farmer gets for his produce and the price he has to pay for the manufactured articles he buys. No one would quarrel with fifty cent wheat if you could buy a suit for $15 or $18 as you could fifteen or twenty years ago. Under such conditions fifty cents would be a very good price for wheat. So I think it is up to any government to-day to try to bring about a better balance between agricultural and manufacturing prices so that the farmer in the west may be able to buy his necessaries far more cheaply then he can to-day.

The hon. member for Weyburn twitted the Prime Minister for his lack of negotiations with foreign countries, and at the time it came to my recollection that Germany, Italy and France shut down on our wheat during the regime of the present leader of the opposition. My hon. friend from Weyburn spoke with great energy of greater international trade and how to bring it about, and suggested that one way would be by negotiation, but certainly the leader of the opposition, when he was Prime Minister, failed to retain the market for our wheat in Germany, Italy and France when those countries shut down on our wheat during his regime. Does the hon. member think that by negotiation to-day we can force Germany or Italy or France to buy our surplus wheat?

Mr. YOUNG: Would you rather try blasting?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I do not know just what the hon. member means by blasting, but if he thinks by negotiation he can force Germany, Italy and France to buy our wheat he is sadly mistaken. They refused to buy our wheat at any price, and the people in those countries to-day are compelled to pay $1.25 and $1.50 a bushel when they could certainly buy wheat more cheaply from Canada. Such being the fact the Liberal opposition certainly have turned out to be very poor negotiators.

Mr. YOUNG: Did my hon. friend notice what the French delegate said at the wheat conference the other day?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I say that these countries shut down on our wheat during the regime of the present leader of the opposition, and what are you going to do now? Are you going to send an army over to Germany or Italy or France and at the point of the bayonet and with cannons demand that they buy our grain?

Mr. YOUNG: Who suggested that?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am just asking for information.

Mr. YOUNG: You are the only man who ever thought of that.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: It is a fact that these markets were closed to us years ago, and there is no use denying that before the farmers of the west who are very seriously concerned about this matter.

The hon. member for Weyburn made one remark with which I agree when he said that the world is an economic unit. There is no doubt in my mind about that, and what should be done to-day I think is that the European house should be set in order. They should form of themselves the united states of Europe, taking in all countries on that continent on a basis of equality. That would preclude tariffs and big armaments. We would like to get a market over there. The prosperity of Europe is our prosperity. But certainly we lost that market four or five years ago, and no effort was made at that time so far as I know to maintain that market for us by negotiation, which the hon. member suggests is such a very valuable way of maintaining and improving markets. Something must be done to get that European market for us. Their prosperity is our prosperity, and unless we can regain that market it is hardly likely that we shall see prosperity in the Canadian west so far as the farmer is concerned.

Mr. McINTOSH: I have listened to this debate all afternoon, and I have been intensely interested in certain parts of it. I have listened to the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Luchkovich) give his ideas with regard to international trade. He admits that the world is the ultimate economic and trading unit. If he admits that, then he admits a real case. After that, it is just a matter of getting the required international cooperation and that can be done by international negotiations and not otherwise. To say that in one part of the world the markets are closed and must remain closed indefinitely, to my mind is not stating the case fairly at all. One may want to negotiate with a man in one frame of mind and he may not desire to negotiate with you when in another frame of mind or another mood. It is the same with nations. A few years ago certain nations had a false conception of international trade and international prosperity and they did close down on our wheat. The consequence is that some think that because they did that, that condition must remain forever. But I am not one of those. I believe that with the right party in power, with the right leadership, with the right determination, with the right conviction and with the right desire to build up world trade, this can be done.

Further, I believe that Canada should be the first nation to give a lead in this regard. Canada should set a lead as far as taking action with regard to the pulling down of tariffs and making a start in the restoration of the world trade which we have lost. Until we do that, we are going to have unemployment. Until we do that, we are going to suffer a lack of trade. Until we do that, we are not going to advance financially and industrially. It is a simple matter. The hon. member for Weyburn explained that all we have to do is to exchange our wheat for industrial products. If we show a willingness to take imports for exports, the job can be done. There is no doubt about that at all. If we are not willing to do that, then we will remain inactive. If we try to live within ourselves, our financial and commercial condition will gradually become worse.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Did not hon. gentlemen have a chance to do that and did they not fail to take it?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, we had a chance and we took advantage of our chance. Our total trade in 1929 was over $2,600,000,000 while to-day it is less than $1,000,000,000.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am referring to the wheat market.

Mr. McINTOSH: And I am answering your question with regard to the wheat market. We did not lose the wheat market by any means.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Wheat was still selling at $1.20 when we went out of power.

Mr. McINTOSH: Because we lost a little trade as far as our wheat market was concerned is no proof that we lost the world market as it is lost to-day. There is no getting away from the serious effect of this high tariff question. Time and again Canada has tried this policy of higher tariffs, and it has always failed. The only tariff that will work in this country is one that is fair and not prohibitive, a tariff for revenue purposes and one that will be fair to the west, to industrial Ontario and Quebec and to the maritimes. Without a tariff of that kind we cannot improve conditions in this country. We certainly must recognize the fact that the world is the ultimate trading and economic unit. We have to face that problem and do our best to solve it. If we do that, other nations will be glad to meet us and gradually our trading and financial conditions will improve.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) said this afternoon that we have lumps of unemployed humanity in all our large industrial centres. That is an important admission by an hon. member to the right of the Speaker, and an hon. member supporting the government, that we have millions of unemployed, industrially and agriculturally, in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes it is. I will admit that the hon. member was dealing largely with Montreal and other large centres, but the fact remains that we have a great number of unemployed in our villages, in our towns, in our cities, and for that matter, on our land. The hon. member stated that in order to give these people gainful employment all we would have to do would be to transport them back to the land, that a settlement policy would permanently solve this problem. That may be a very nice way of looking at the question, but it will not solve the problem. The problem of the men and women on the land is a continuous problem; the problem of the men and women in the cities is a continuous problem, and these problems cannot be solved by any cheap act of transportation. The hon. member stated that for many of those in the towns and cities no opportunities, professional and otherwise, were open and that something had to be done. Later on he said that the yeomanry, the farmers of Canada, were slowly deteriorating. If that is the case and the agricultural population of Canada are going down hill and are slowly deteriorating, if they are not measuring up to the problems of our agricultural and national life, if they are not making progress, then surely there is an argument for the government to act, to do its best to modify its high tariff policy and thereby give to these people the opportunity which they seek.

I was rather surprised to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) admit this afternoon that because we are living in a machine age, we shall always have unemployment. I do not believe that statement. We are living in a machine age and if we do not keep up to date with the development of the machine and the production of machinery, if we do not keep up to date with our tariff policies, our financial policies, and our trade policies, if we do not keep those policies sane and progressive, then of course we will have unemployment. But if we measure our national policies in terms of the machine and act accordingly, instead of unemployment we will have employment and instead of starvation, prosperity.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NEILL

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to correct an error in the press.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to address the house on any subject it would be well for him to wait until private bills are disposed of. That is the order of business now before the house.

Mr. NEILL: Is not a question of privilege always in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member speaking to a question of privilege?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, and it will not take me more than one minute. The Montreal Daily Star of April 12 quotes me as saying:

> The Prime Minister has made statements which, when he reads them to-morrow in Hansard, he will very much regret.

I did not make that remark at all. I have regrets of my own to worry about without bothering about anybody else's.

PRIVATE BILLS

GERTRUDE ETHEL MOSGROVE ROAST

The house in committee on Bill No. 44, for the relief of Gertrude Ethel Mosgrove Roast.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. NEILL: Don't you think, Mr. Chairman, we ought at least to see the bill? It is not on the file.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): If the hon. gentleman will look at his file he will see that it is letter G of the Senate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: These bills are not on the file.

Mr. LAWSON: Hon. members are looking at House of Commons bills.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): These Senate bills do not appear to have been filed. I have not seen them and do not know what they are about. I do not suppose it is very important, but it seems strange that we should transact the business of the house in this way.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite right. We cannot proceed with the business unless the bills are printed; that is quite obvious.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The bills are printed; hon. gentleman will find them on the files.

Mr. HANBURY: Some of the Senate bills are on the file, but these particular bills are not.

Mr. McINTOSH: Therefore we cannot proceed.

Mr. BENNETT: Stand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The only relief bill on the file is No. 42.

Mr. McINTOSH: And that is no relief.

Mr. VALLANCE: In fairness to the pages who file the bills, I think there was a suggestion from some members that they did not want to be bothered with them. That should be stated in fairness to the boys who file the bills.

Mr. BENNETT: What the hon. gentleman says is correct; the filing of the bills has nothing to do with whether we should proceed with them or not. If they are printed and distributed—and apparently they are, because they are being brought in from the distribution room—that is the end of it. There is no rule with respect to putting them on the files, but there is a rule regarding their distribution. If they have not been distributed, they should not be proceeded with.

Mr. McINTOSH: The distribution system is wrong anyway.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hackett): The bills having now been distributed we will proceed.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[The Chairman.]

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 45 for the relief of Clara Dingman Freeman—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 46, for the relief of Marguerite Pearl Hopper—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 47, for the relief of Sadye Harris Rosenberg—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 48, for the relief of Eva Brabant Paradis—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 49, for the relief of Williamina Muir Briggs—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

SECOND READING

Bill No. 43 to incorporate Personal Finance Corporation—Mr. Hackett.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 42 respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Willis in the chair.

Mr. McINTOSH: I shall not take long to conclude my remarks. When the committee rose at six o'clock I had touched on two or three points, one of them the question of international trade. I was rather surprised this afternoon when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) took a stand identical with that which the government has taken for the last four years on this important question; presumably the hon. gentleman feels it his duty to support the government of the day in its prohibitive tariff policy and is inclined to think that there is no longer an external market, that it has vanished, that we ought to forget about it and apply ourselves assiduously to the development of the home market and the home market alone. That is neolithic nationalism, and he supports it. That is the type of narrow nationalism that in the end will ruin Canada if persisted in. I dissociate myself from that view. I care not who puts it forth, whether it be from the opposite side of the house or from some of the Tories to our left.

In concluding my remarks on that question may I say that I believe it the duty of every loyal citizen of Canada to persist in trying to get an opportunity for Canada once more to trade with the whole world; not with part of it, a half, or a quarter, or any other fraction of it, but the entire trading world. Let us measure ourselves up to that great international possibility and problem, and if we mean business and are in earnest we can certainly make progress. All this idle talk about dumping amounts to nothing, it is just an argument to uphold prohibitive protection and have our Canadian people endure further sacrifices.

Secondly, I dealt in a brief way with the question brought before the house by the hon. member for Stanstead, that is the transportation of great masses of unemployed from the industrial centres to the hinterland of this dominion. I said that problem is not as easy as it looks, that it is a continuous, never-ending problem, not simply a problem of cheap transportation. I want to follow up the observations made by the hon. member for Stanstead and bring before the committee a problem pertaining to the constituency of North Battleford.

Before doing that may I just say a word on a point of view presented to the committee by the Prime Minister. I got the idea from his remarks that he thinks that because we are living in the machine age we have got to bow down before this problem of unemployment and accept it. I differ entirely from that conception of national life. I say that unemployment is something that we can overcome if we take the initiative and adopt rational trade and financial policies in Canada. I would not say that we must put an embargo on inventive genius, on initiative; briefly, that we must fight the machine. We have got to cooperate with the machine. We are living in a machine age, and unless our financial and trade policies go hand in hand with machine production we are not going to get very far. Our trade and financial policies will have to be progressive, they will have to be sound, they will have to be advanced. If we initiate policies of that kind, I believe that our problem of unemployment will gradually and surely disappear.

My last remarks will deal with a problem pertaining to one of the new and developing parts of the Canadian northwest. That problem is in reality a railway problem. I have brought it before the house on former occasions and will bring it before the house again and again until it is solved. May I say I have listened to this debate and I have heard hon. members say that we ought to have a policy of reforestation. That is all right, we need that. There is nothing wrong with reforestation activities, whether in the form of relief or of an ordinary government undertaking. Then it is said that we must have highways, we must have an all-Canadian highway from ocean to ocean to open up Canada. I have no fault to find with that policy, and I have no great fault to find with the government for the support it has given to a national highway during the last four dismal years. We have also had statements made with regard to a new public works program. I understand that program will be brought down later. Further we have had put before us the relief work that is going on in our national parks under the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior. And we have had the question of land settlement and the development of natural resources, the seeking for oil and gas and gold and the building of our national prosperity.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the problem with which I should like to deal for a few moments is associated with the problem mentioned by the hon. member for Stanstead. After we get the people on the land; after we place them on the soil in undeveloped areas where there are no railway facilities, then another problem arises. That problem is to give railway accommodation to those settlers on the land, many of whom are on relief. In the area to which I want to refer for a moment we have a population of approximately ten thousand people located in the upper end of northwestern Saskatchewan, approximately one hundred miles northwest of North Battleford, on the way to Edmonton, and northwest to the Pacific ocean. This population is confined largely to townships 57, 58, 59, 60, 61 and 62 and to ranges 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 and 26. Some statistical information was gathered and forwarded to me with regard to that area. In it there are 96,320 poultry, 3,302 horses, 7,666 cattle, 5,145 swine, a population ranging from eight thousand to ten thousand, 19,360 acres of land under cultivation and 382,500 acres available for cultivation. In 1931 there were 345 settlers who went into that district; in 1932 there were 134 and in 1933 between 50 and 100. Some of these settlers are on relief, but they are out there on the land to grapple for themselves with the problem of making a living. In my opinion, in order to enable these settlers to get off relief, it would be a very wise move on the part of the government to take a forward step and provide them with the railway accommodation they need so badly.

May I say to the Prime Minister that in this area we have seventy miles of right of way graded ready for the steel. Surely it would not take very much money to put steel on this seventy miles of grading in order to help these people who are doing their best to open up that new part of the country, to cooperate with the government by keeping off relief and to carve out homes for themselves in this new section of the province. Many of these people, I may say, came from the dried out areas of southern Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. They came north to a wooded, mixed farming area possessing great possibilities for farmers, to make a living for themselves and those who are dear to them.

I have brought this matter to the attention of the house on other occasions, and I have much pleasure in bringing it before the government again in the hope that if the government intend to carry on a relief program this summer they might consider as part of that program the laying of steel on the seventy miles of grading in order to connect that part of the country with North Battleford and Edmonton. In addition there are about forty or fifty miles of that entire line remaining ungraded. If the steel could be laid for the seventy miles already graded and if the other forty or fifty miles could be graded I am satisfied that such a relief project would be very popular among the farmers and business men of that part of the province, and I am sure the government would get due consideration for whatever action it took.

I do not want to make this part of my observations in any way political. I have taken up this matter with the Minister of Railways, who has intimated that a statement will be made in the special railway committee and that he will make a statement in the house later on, but I did not feel that I should let pass this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the committee once more, since other questions of much less importance have been brought before the committee for the consideration of hon. members.

It seems difficult to get any exact information as to the intentions of the government. I have interrogated the Minister of Railways on more than one occasion, without result. I do not say that he does not want to give me the information; perhaps it is impossible for him to secure it, but it is easy to understand the point of view of these people living so far from any railway accommodation. They want to know whether anything will be done this year, and the only way they can find out is for the government to state its intentions with regard to laying steel on this seventy miles of grade and with regard to the grading of the forty or fifty miles remaining. These people are from eighteen to seventy miles from a railway; those in the north are anywhere from thirty to seventy miles from a railway. They must bring in and ship out all their goods by truck, and they feel that this adds to the cost of living. They are satisfied that there is plenty of business in that area, taking into consideration what they buy and what they sell, to pay for a branch line railway, and I believe they are right. I believe the potential business in that area is sufficient to pay for the line, so that the citizens of Canada will not have to pay a cent for the railway accommodation sought. I believe the development of the district will be ample to repay to the exchequer of Canada every dollar expended on the completion of this line.

I think that is all I have to say for the present, Mr. Chairman, except for one other point. Not only is it difficult to get information from the government; it seems impossible to get information even when one takes up the matter with the officials of the Canadian National. I took up this matter with the president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. S. J. Hungerford, to whom I addressed three questions. The first was as follows:

> There are seventy miles of Canadian National grade ready for steel from St. Walburg north. Will there be anything done in the way of putting steel on this grade in 1933? That is a question that should be answered one way or the other without delay.

How was that for a straight question? I think it was as plain and as straightforward as it could be. Now, I put another question, and my second question was this:

> There is a grading of forty or fifty miles to be done on this same road in order to complete the grade to Edmonton. Will there be anything done on this grade this year? That is another question that concerns thousands of settlers in that area of the province —men and women who are fighting anew for a chance to live, many without relief.

That is question No. 2 which I put to Mr. Hungerford. Surely that is a straightforward and pointed question which should have been answered. Then, question No. 3, and the last one which I put to Mr. Hungerford, was as follows:

> On the Spruce Lake-Frenchman's Butte division of the Canadian National Railways farther south there is a stretch of road between Frenchman's Butte and Elk Point in Alberta not yet graded. Will there be anything done in the way of grading or construction in 1934?

Surely the third question is as pointed and as direct as were the other two.

Now then, how did President Hungerford answer these three direct and non-controversial questions? How did he answer these three questions pertaining to the development of a large area of the North Battleford federal constituency, three questions concerning the welfare of ten thousand people, three questions affecting the families of thousands of settlers who came from the southern part of the province or from other areas in Alberta and Manitoba to carve out a living for themselves in that northern area of northwestern Canada? Here is the way he answered. I might say I took up the same three questions with Mr. Fullerton, and the answer I received from him was about the same as the information contained in the reply from President Hungerford. President Hungerford's reply dated March 28, 1934, was simply this:

Dear Mr. McIntosh:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 23rd with regard to branch line construction work in western Canada.

I understand that a similar communication was addressed to the chairman of the trustees and that he has sent you an answer to the inquiry.

Yours faithfully,
S. J. Hungerford,
President.

Well, he sent me a reply, but there is no information in it. Consequently I say it is no reply at all. So far as information is concerned, it was practically a negative reply. And so, without making the matter controversial I thought it was my duty as a member for that riding, to bring once more before the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals, once more before the attention of the Prime Minister of Canada and once more before the attention of the government of the country, the problem of railway development in that particular part of Saskatchewan. This matter has been hanging fire for four years, and nothing has been done. The grade is there,—at least, it ought to be there, although I understand it is gradually disappearing. The ties are there, and I suggest it would be an easy matter to get at least some secondhand steel to put on this seventy miles of road in order to facilitate the bringing into and sending out of goods from that splendid stretch of country known as "The Northland."

With these remarks, then, I shall say no more but will ask the Prime Minister to give every possible consideration to what I might term this miniature railway problem of northwestern Saskatchewan. If he can make it a part of the relief program which the government intends to bring down during the coming summer, I believe such action would redound not only to the welfare of the government but also to the good name of all concerned, and to the prosperity and happiness of these ten thousand toiling people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Willis): Does the section carry?

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to say one or two words to the Prime Minister about a very limited portion of section 3 in the bill which now becomes section 4. Subsection (a) is as follows:

Provide for special relief, works and undertakings under control and direction of the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior.

This afternoon the hon. member for Gloucester was speaking about the fishing industry, and I did not get clearly in my mind whether the Prime Minister contemplated making any provision under this section for small works in various communities around the coast. The wording of the subsection is "provide for special relief." It would seem to be not for special relief works, but for special relief, and to provide "works and undertakings under control and direction of the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior."

The point about which I am concerned is this: I understand that there is a very limited vote for public works. When the estimates for the Department of Public Works were before the committee I brought the matter to the attention of the minister of that department, and he thought that out of the general vote there might be some opportunity to make small expenditures for works around the coast such as boat landings, breakwaters and works of that type. There was a sort of intimation, at least I gathered the impression, that out of the relief votes there would be something for facilities of this kind. I am disappointed to find that what is now section 4 apparently eliminates that possibility. I concur in the view expressed this afternoon by an hon. member who spoke as to the desirability of decentralizing rather than centralizing this matter of relief work. I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that the public works which are to be included in the program to be brought down later will be public works of considerable magnitude in certain centres. I feel that there would be a great opportunity to provide employment and relief in isolated communities by the erection of small works to provide facilities for fishermen. This afternoon an hon. member on this side spoke about improving houses. I am not dealing particularly with that suggestion, but I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he does not think it desirable to introduce into this section some provision under which for special relief purposes small works in the nature of breakwaters, boat landings, wharves, boat shelters and so on could be undertaken.

I am thinking particularly of the fishing communities. If I may, I should like to give an instance of what I mean. Only this afternoon I signed a letter addressed to the Minister of Public Works asking him to consider recommending a very small work, something which would not involve much money but which would provide cooperation with the enterprise of fishermen in the particular section to which I referred. That is a case, Mr. Prime Minister, if I may address you through the chairman, where the lobster fishermen today have to drag their traps down the beach to low water mark and wait until the tide comes in before they can put the traps into their boats. Coming back in with either freight, fish or mail, a boat of any size has to send a small boat ashore and drag it up on the beach fifteen, twenty or thirty feet. The coast is not protected; seaweed is entirely gone from it, which makes it open to storms. For that reason some protection is needed. This facility may cost a couple of thousands of dollars, and is in a community where employment is very much needed. It is in a community the people of which have tried to work out their own salvation. There are ten boats there now, and I believe two or three more are being built. Then, there are other places along the shore where the same kind of work might be done.

I am not asking the Prime Minister to construct works which are not needed, but I am asking him, if he can see his way clear, to combine relief with provisions for facilities for those enterprising fishermen, whereby they will be allowed to help themselves and avoid being on the dole. I have called the Prime Minister's attention to this particular section, because I think it might be changed so as to include this type of work.

Then, further, only this afternoon I spoke to the Minister of Marine to ascertain the respective jurisdictions as between him and the Minister of Public Works. I believe that wharves, breakwaters and landing places of this type are constructed by the Minister of Public Works, but are under the control and direction of the Minister of Marine.

Mr. BENNETT: After they are finished.

Mr. RALSTON: Therefore the words "control and direction" found in section 4 (a) would apply, if the Prime Minister could see fit to insert the words "Department of Marine" or "Department of Fisheries."

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman I am sure has a very clear understanding of the difficulties of expanding this measure in the way he indicates, for I do not know how many hundreds of places would claim to be treated exactly as he has indicated that we should treat a given place at an expenditure of $2,000. The hon. gentleman will recall that last year it was thought by hon. gentlemen opposite that I should state to the committee that we would not use this relief measure for public works, it being thought that we might improperly use relief moneys in that sense.

I suppose the hon. gentleman realizes that the Department of the Interior comes into the matter because of the fact that it has control of the national parks, and with respect to the expenditures by the National Defence department they are for works that have some remote or near relation to that department in connection with airways and matters of the kind. It was thought that it was very desirable to have this work undertaken when the opportunity offered. Of course, both these departments have organizations for dealing with these particular works, as perhaps the hon. gentleman knows. He certainly knows with respect to one department, and he also knows that the Department of the Interior does carry on parks works every year which necessitates this very class of work being done.

My mind not long since was travelling apparently along the same lines as that of the hon. gentleman. I thought possibly a scheme of general repairs and painting might offer employment to the unemployed in communities which would not otherwise be affected, but the Minister of Public Works had already anticipated that last year in connection with repairs for various public undertakings, and he has also some provision for this year. I think it will be found as we proceed that there is a provision in this statute that is broad enough to permit this to be done. I want to put this to the hon. gentleman, who I feel sure will see our difficulty. For the federal government to engage in constructing all the little—if I might use that word—undertakings that would be sought to be constructed would be an almost impossible position. I can tell the hon. gentleman I know something of that from dire experience. But whatever can be done to remedy the difficulties along the coast to which he refers I think will be done, and rather than expand this bill, when the measure for dealing with public works and undertakings is being considered I shall try to add to it an appropriation that might be useful for effecting the objects to which reference has been made.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate the assurance of the Prime Minister and the way in which he has received my suggestion. He will remember that the first year there was a certain number of projects under the relief vote, and I do not think he will find that much difficulty was experienced with regard to undue pressure. There was a good deal of proper discrimination shown in connection with these projects and I do not think the department was altogether flooded with applications of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is a list of them for the second year, 1931.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the Prime Minister will find that while there may have been quite a number of such projects the amount in dollars was comparatively small compared with some of the large votes that are being made. I know that in the endeavour the Prime Minister is going to make in regard to the Public Works vote he appreciates the fact that it is desirable to help people help themselves, and that is what this proposal does.

Mr. BENNETT: About $2,500,000 was the sum involved in 1931.

Mr. RALSTON: For all of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: For public works, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is very moderate.

Mr. DUFF: I regret that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. It is quite true as he says that under the relief measure two or three years ago certain of the relief moneys were spent for public works, for repairs to breakwaters and wharves and for new ventures, and my information is that with regard to these expenditures in Nova Scotia that method was very unsatisfactory. We do not want to lose control altogether in this parliament of the voting of public moneys, and if it is the intention of the government to spend moneys for wharves or breakwaters or for other public purposes in Nova Scotia or any other part of Canada, in my opinion the amounts required should be specifically set out in the supplementary estimates, or if the Prime Minister and the government think better, a special bill could be brought in voting a lump sum of money, and attached to the bill there should be a schedule giving the places where the money was to be spent, and the amounts. I think I voice the sentiments of the people of Canada generally as well as my own when I say that I do not like this idea which has prevailed in the past of spending money under the Relief Act without parliament or the public knowing anything about it. While I agree with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that there are a great many places where the expenditure of this money would be advisable in the interests of the country in order to encourage fishermen and others to prosecute their calling, I think it should be done in an orderly and proper manner. Any measures with respect to peace, order and good government should be passed by this parliament and not by the executive after parliament rises, and further, under this relief measure money should not be spent as it has been in the past by the Minister of Public Works.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—4 (now section 5)—Payments out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think, Mr. Chairman, you have before you an amendment to this section. I gave notice of it this afternoon—that section 5 be amended by inserting the words, "and appropriated by parliament" after the word "necessary" in line 16. If hon. members will look at the present section, the old section 4 of the bill as we have it before us, they will see that it reads:

> The governor in council may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of this act.

The corresponding section in the act of last year reads as follows:

> The governor in council may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as may be necessary for all or any of the purposes of this act, but the amount paid for direct relief for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1934, shall not exceed the sum of twenty million dollars.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the limitation in regard to the amount to be spent for relief has been eliminated. This is the section that gives the governor in council blank cheque powers in regard to expenditures. The house will recall, that ever since the first bill was brought down by the present administration in 1930 we on this side took objection to giving the administration powers for the uncontrolled expenditure of public money. The committee will recall that in 1930, at the short session, we passed an appropriation of $20,000,000, and in the 1931 legislation for the first time two new features were introduced into the relief legislation: first the provision relating to peace, order and good government, to which I shall refer in a few moments, and secondly the blank cheque feature. At that time I well recall, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Quebec East, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) took exception on high ground to this parliament abdicating its control over expenditure.

May I say that of all the relief bills of 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, this bill of 1934 gives to the administration more extensive powers than any of the previous four. In order to keep the record straight may I once again place upon the pages of Hansard a quotation from a high constitutional authority on the power of parliament and its proper control over expenditures. This authority was quoted frequently by the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition. I quote from page 159 of The Procedure of the House of Commons by Redlich, as follows:

But there is something more to say. The fundamental principle just referred to secures only one of the great functions of parliament with regard to money matters. Soon after the great change made at the end of the seventeenth century, political experience showed that a second principle must be established before the foundations of parliamentary government could be regarded as secure. It was necessary to gain for the commons full and unrestricted control over the destination of the money spent, to enable parliament to check its application and to see that expenditure corresponded to the grants made. The working out of this principle led by degrees to the present financial apparatus of the House of Commons. The form of a bill of supply and the division or parliamentary business between the two money committees of the whole house had long been in existence. But from 1688 onwards the development of law and practice in finance procedure took a new turn: The old framework was retained, but a new spirit was breathed into all the forms of financial management, especially those relating to the expenditure of the state, and the administration of the moneys placed at the disposal of the government. The complete realization of the idea of parliamentary control reacted upon the whole organization of financial administration, just as the vast extension of the latter determined the way in which the great past of modern parliamentary government—direct parliamentary control over the whole of the national finances—reached its present shape. The result of the whole process has been to establish in actual fact the vital principle of modern parliamentary government—that of the full sovereignty of the nation's representatives in disposing of the financial burdens borne by their constituents.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Is there anything in the constitutional practice evolved during the years in the parliament of Great Britain or of any of the British nations which lays it down that the majority of the elected representatives of a free people are not capable of delegating to the executive the power over taxation and expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I appreciate fully the suggestion contained in the interruption of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), but may I say to him that in the whole history of the development of British and Canadian parliamentary institutions, the essential feature of the growing power of democracy has been the greater power exercised through control by the peoples' members over finance and expenditures. In order to illustrate my point further—

Mr. McINTOSH: The people must rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They used to. I desire to quote from another great authority. Colonel A. J. V. Durell in his book entitled The Principles and Practice of the System of Control over Parliamentary Grants states on page 2:

The bedrock on which the English system if built—

The English system is the British and Canadian systems.

—is the principle of the maintenance by parliament of control over the grants which it makes.

The following is to be found on page 3—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: But not by the minority of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By all the members of parliament provided they are properly carrying out the functions which they are here to carry out and not abrogating to any executive council, without any restraint or control, full and unrestrained powers over the expenditures of the country.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not partyism.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The author states on page 3:

The most ancient, as well as the most valued, prerogative of the House of Commons is the right of supreme control over taxation, to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary. The prohibition of raising taxes without parliamentary authority would be nugatory if the proceeds, even of legal taxes, could be expended at the will of the sovereign. The right, therefore, of appropriation was a logical consequence of the right of levying supplies. "The chain of historical evidence undeniably proves that a previous and stringent appropriation, often minute and specific, has formed an essential part of the British constitution." Though the practice of appropriating supplies, in a general sense, is of early origin, that of appropriating them to the specific purposes for which they were granted did not become an established usage until the revolution, when the principle that "the grant of supply, and the control of public expenditure in conformity therewith, belongs inalienably to parliament, and preeminently to the House of Commons" was formally incorporated amongst the maxims of the constitution.

I have just two more brief quotations to make and I shall have finished with my authorities. The next is from the same author and reads:

The power of appropriation drew with it the necessity for estimates being regularly laid before the House of Commons, and by exposing the management of the public revenues, has given the house not only a real and effective control over an essential branch of the executive administration, but in some measures made parliament a partaker in it. Appropriation alone is, however, of little avail if no provision is made for securing compliance with it. The right of appropriation must be accompanied by the right of parliament to satisfy itself as to the expenditure of the money on the services for which it has been voted.

The last quotation from page 9 is as follows:

The supreme control of the Commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which those grants are spent. This second right must be inseparable from the first if the control over the grants is to be effective; but it is a right which was not claimed nor enforced by the House of Commons until long after the right of control over supply had been established.

So much for the old section 4, new section 5, which constitutes the worst feature of the bill, next to the section upon which the committee voted this afternoon. While I do not intend to make any argument upon that section, this being the same debate I am entitled to refer to the vote. The amendment moved by the Prime Minister is as follows:

That section 2 of the bill be amended by striking out subparagraph (b) and by inserting in the said bill as section 3 thereof the following:

"3. In addition to the powers conferred under the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may, when parliament is not in session take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to maintain, within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada; and at all times to take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect and maintain the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof."

May I remind this house that in 1932 I moved the following amendment:

1. That this house has been from the commencement of the session and continues to be ready and willing to consider and vote without delay any money or grant, submitted and asked for by the government for relieving distress and providing employment throughout Canada.

2. That this house cannot surrender the rights of the people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, to maintain direct control over matters of taxation and expenditure, nor vest in the governor in council or in any other body absolute and despotic powers under the guise of dealing with peace, order and good government, particularly while parliament is in session.

My hon. friends to my left voted in condemnation of the usurpation of parliamentary authority by this administration. The following gentlemen voted in favour of my amendment: Messrs. Gardiner, Garland (Bow River), Heaps, MacInnis, Mitchell, Speakman and Spencer.

I desire to congratulate the Prime Minister upon the new allies he received this afternoon in the policies he has adopted and the powers he has assumed with regard to the functions to be performed under peace, order and good government. Let me tell my hon. friends to my left what they voted for this afternoon. From time to time they have introduced into this parliament a resolution for the repeal of section 98 of the criminal code. Should the Prime Minister, during the course of his duties next year, see fit to add to the powers which he is now given under section 98 of the criminal code, with the support of the C.C.F. party in this house he can go the extreme limit in carrying out these powers, because those gentlemen all voted for him this afternoon.

Let me say this to my right hon. friend. Hon. gentlemen may smile, but they repudiated this afternoon everything they have stood for in the last four years. Let me put this to the Prime Minister: We trust there will not be any strike or labour disturbance in Canada in the next few months, but supposing such a thing happened; well, the Prime Minister under the section passed this afternoon might choose in his high office to take the extraordinary powers given him, and he can say that he does so with the support of the C.C.F., because he can point to the fact that the C.C.F. members who voted had given him its support one hundred per cent. Those hon. gentlemen cannot therefore criticize or condemn any action the right hon. gentleman may take in that regard. Suppose there is a dispute in regard to wages: the Prime Minister can take certain drastic powers under this section dealing with peace, order and good government, and he has the support not only of his own followers but of those gentlemen who call themselves the C.C.F., and who by their vote this afternoon have endorsed the right hon. gentleman. They are supposed to represent labour, but they have absolutely reversed and repudiated their position of a few years ago, and given to the executive council of the nation complete and unrestrained powers to go beyond parliamentary authority in dealing with the situation for the next year. Personally, I am proud, prouder than ever to-day, to belong to the great minority in this parliament. I do not want to use the language of exaggeration, but I believe that Canada to-day is, with respect to her liberties, like Rachael weeping for her children because they are not; and the only ones who stood up this afternoon, this gallant minority, in defence of liberty in this land and in parliament were the members of the Liberal party.

I commiserate with Canada upon this new alliance. Here we have a would-be dictatorship of the proletariat in the corner becoming allied with the dictatorship of autocracy and reaction represented by the government. But so far as we are concerned we condemn this measure not only because of its iniquitous provisions, the clause dealing with peace, order and good government, but because of the unlimited, unrestrained powers given to the administration, in which they are supported by the socialists of the house. We condemn the measure because of its extreme features. Let me tell the government something. I speak here to-night with a humble voice on behalf of the liberties of Canada, and I say that the battle for personal liberty, for political liberty and for constitutional liberty will have to be fought once again in Canada. My right hon. friend may find it easy to take a light hold of these powers of autocracy, but some day very soon the people will demand that parliament once again resume control of the powers that are being relinquished in regard to taxation, expenditures and finance.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rather think my dramatic friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) spoke a little out of turn. When he referred to Rachael weeping for her children, I wondered whether he was thinking of Pattullo and his peace, order and good government legislation in British Columbia. The bill there may not be exactly the same sort of bill as this one, but as regards the assumption of authority it goes this bill fifty per cent better.

Let me make quite clear what our action this afternoon amounts to. During the last week, or possibly the last ten days, the official opposition, led by their right hon. leader, have been drawing attention to the words in the bill, in section 2:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law the governor in council may—

The Prime Minister a few days ago said that he felt there was some merit in the opposition of the Liberal party in objecting to that sweeping word "notwithstanding" and that he would take steps to modify it, and for that purpose he brought in the amendment voted on to-day. Surely when we have a bill before the house and, by some modification of it, the government can improve it we are entitled to vote for the amendment. My hon. friend objects to this, however. He wants to make the bill as bad as possible so that he will have something to speak about. Let me tell him this: We are satisfied that the bill will pass anyway, and since it will pass in any event we want it to be as satisfactory as possible. That is the difference between ourselves and the Liberal opposition. When the bill comes before the house for the final vote the hon. gentleman will find at least one socialist member in this house voting against it.

What has my hon. friend's party done in British Columbia? The hon. gentleman worked hard for that party during the election—mighty hard indeed. He was in British Columbia during the Easter recess and I did not hear him say anything in opposition to the powers assumed by the British Columbia government. Let us see what powers are given by the Special Powers Act. Section 2 provides:

To the full extent to which the powers of the legislature extend thereto, and notwithstanding the provisions of any public or private act of the legislature, the lieutenant-governor in council shall have power to do and to authorize within the province such acts and things and to make and promulgate from time to time such ordinances as he may by reason or in anticipation—

He is not obliged to wait for something to happen; he can anticipate it.

—of any condition, or for the purpose of any matter referred to in the preamble or in this section, consider necessary or advisable in relation to the matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

Now let us see what they can do—and considering the past history of the Liberal party, this is rather dangerous legislation. When we consider how that party dealt with Beauharnois, this legislation is something which the people of British Columbia may well view with alarm. These are some of the powers they have taken:

(1) The reservation, preservation, management, development, sale, and disposition of the natural resources of the province,—

Just imagine leaving the natural resources of the province in the custody of the Liberal party.

—including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, all lands, forests, waters, oil, natural gas—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre has a monopoly of at least a part of that.

—mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the province.

Could anything be more sweeping than that? Yet my hon. friend has not spoken a word in protest against it, though he was in British Columbia and could have done so. And he could have done so in this house. But no; what he condemns in the group in this corner here is a very good thing in British Columbia. But not only that; my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) wanted to go further. He wanted the Minister of Labour to adopt the principle that, when the lumber workers, for example, did not accept the conditions laid down by that government, they should be starved into submission so that they would have to go to work. I said the other day that I was surprised that he should advocate such a thing. In looking over the 1931 Hansard I see that he was going to bring about prosperity by reducing wages all around. Well, I should not have been surprised.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the hon. gentleman referring to me?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, no. I was referring to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. You have not got that far yet.

Before this bill is finally passed we shall have another word, but as we know it is going to pass anyway—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: —we want to make it as good a bill as possible. When the bill comes up for its final vote I, at least, will be found voting against it.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I have often wondered why it is that some of our hon. friends to the right, when they are in a tight corner, generally call us Tories. Even a rat will fight, when it is cornered, but the hon. members to the right of us will not fight nor will they answer argument with legitimate argument. I have had the long finger of scorn pointed at me by both the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), and instead of answering by argument our very valid argument in regard to negotiations with Germany, France and Italy, in both cases they have referred to us as Tories.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: You have no argument to answer.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Well, for the benefit of the hon. member for North Battleford may I point out that in 1930 every Conservative in my district voted for the Liberal party, which may or may not be a compliment to the Liberal party. My opponent in that election wrote a public letter in which he thanked all the Conservatives in the Vegreville district for voting for the Liberal party—

Mr. McINTOSH: But they will all support you in the next election.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: —which may mean some relationship between the two older parties for all I know. Now the hon. members for Vancouver Centre and North Battleford drew a red herring across the path of the argument submitted by myself. They trot out the old constitutional question when the people ask for bread and work. Both these hon. members have referred on other occasions to international trade, but they have not answered my argument to-day; they have proposed no method by which that international trade is going to be brought back to Canada. If the Liberal party happens to be fortunate enough to be elected in 1934 or 1935—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No chance.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: —I do not care if they introduce the provision concerning peace, order and good government or not, if they get the German, the French and the Italian market by introducing those words into the legislation before us.

Mr. McINTOSH: What has that impossible statement got to do with the point at issue?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Well many Liberal members on this side have spoken of negotiations. But as far as 1930 is concerned all I have to say is that the Liberals have turned out to be a pretty poor flock of negotiators, because it was under them that we lost this very valuable market for our agricultural products, especially wheat. Now I am not afraid of names. I have been called a rascal, a scoundrel, and a Tory, but I have not yet been called a Liberal, which may or may not be "the most unkindest cut of all." I do not see why hon. members to our right should try to draw a red herring across the path of the valid argument that we have submitted. Every time they get into a tight corner they inevitably flaunt this old constitutional question in the face of the committee instead of suggesting something that will help the farmer and the labourer to get out of the difficulties in which they now find themselves. I believe in the doctrine of the economic unity of the universe just as much as any man in this house, and I believe in low tariffs just as much as any hon. members to my right.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not vote for them?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: When you get into power why do you not lower the tariffs? Why not do something about it? Why don't you practise what you preach?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was the lowest since confederation.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The reason the Liberal party was defeated in 1930 was that they were trying to be an imitation of the Conservative party, and the people of Canada wanted the real thing, not an imitation. I am not going to make any prophecy with regard to the election of 1935—

Some hon. MEMBERS: 1934.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Or 1934, I do not care which it is, but as far as I am concerned I am prepared to run in an election tomorrow.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Don't be in such a hurry.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The people of this country can no longer be fooled with tariff talk. They know that ever since confederation the tariff has been a football between both the old parties, and they are not going to be fooled by that again. What they want, as I have already said, is a real low tariff, not the tariff we got under the Dunning budget, which was nothing but an imitation of the tariffs introduced since confederation by what the hon. member over yonder would call the Tory party. Now, sticks and stones may break my bones, but names will never hurt me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee very long—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Luchkovich.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But may I say that I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that this is another of the very obnoxious provisions of this bill. I am not going to say a word about my hon. friends to the left; I am leaving their justification to themselves. If they are satisfied with their action we must be satisfied. I regret, along with my hon. friends on this side, of course, the apparent slipping that appears to be going on among them. It does not do much good to say you are a devout adherent of lower tariffs when you continue to vote for higher ones.

Mr. MANION: You ought to know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to my hon. friends that I have been here a good number of years and I am quite prepared to justify my vote on the tariff on all occasions. But for heaven's sake, don't let my hon. friend go around the country supplementing the statement made by hon. gentlemen in the corner that the Liberal party did not lower tariffs. He can say that undoubtedly the Conservative party did increase them.

Mr. ROBINSON: That is what we were elected for.

Mr. MANION: How much did you lower them on furniture?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not like to state how much the Conservative party increased the tariff.

Mr. MANION: How much did you increase it on furniture?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all.

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, to 42 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, we did not. We increased it on steel, if that is any comfort to my hon. friend. But we are not going to get very far with an argument on tariffs, so perhaps we shall leave that until the budget comes.

I want to voice my opposition to the provisions of this particular section which is now section 5. I wish to support everything my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre said about the provisions of this section. It is a usurpation of the powers of parliament by the executive, and as long as I continue to be a member of the House of Commons I shall vote and work against any such provision being placed in any statute. The executive are supposed to carry out the will of parliament, but here the executive ask parliament to give them power to spend money willy-nilly in any way they see fit. I am going to say in the same breath that I am not finding any particular fault with what the government have done under this legislation; it is the principle of the thing. I am not raising my voice against the actions taken by the government under this bill. I do not know what they want the power for; I never could understand why they required it. They have had four years of experience in dealing with this matter and they can say to within $5,000,000 how much money they are going to require. If they would put that in the statute; if they would say they required $100,000,000, for example, to carry out the provisions of this statute this year, they would get that amount. But when they say they are not going to state the sum, that they want us to give them carte blanche to spend any amount in any way they deem fit and necessary, I say the principle is wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: Prior to an election.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not particularly exercised about an election; I have that much confidence in the government. I do not think they would abuse the privilege for which they are asking, but I do say the principle of the thing is absolutely wrong and that this power should not be granted by any parliament that has any respect for itself.

I am going to say this also, Mr. Chairman: I believe the day will come when the members of the government, as well as the members of the Conservative party in Canada, will regret having taken this action. They are regretting it already. Just the other evening the leader of the government voiced the opinion that because similar action had been taken in two of the provinces he had grave doubts whether he would not require all the powers contained in this statute for the purpose of counteracting what might be done. The example is being followed, and the men who introduced and stood behind this thing are beginning to be nervous in view of the results that are apparent all over Canada. I say in the most vehement manner possible that I disapprove of this provision, this blank cheque which we are asked to give to the executive to spend as they see fit.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They have a majority of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate that a majority of the members of the House of Commons will pass this bill; the members of the Conservative party will support it to a man, and they are the majority. But minorities have some rights; at least we have the rights of free speech and free expression of opinion in this house, and we propose to exercise them.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): You can abuse them, too.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I challenge any hon. gentleman on the other side of the house to say that I have abused my privileges. Since this bill was introduced I have taken up only about fifteen minutes of the time of the committee, but nothing will deter me from expressing my opinion as forcibly as I can upon any question in regard to which I feel as strongly as I feel in regard to the matter now under consideration. There are two provisions in this bill which are thoroughly obnoxious to me, the one dealing with peace, order and good government and the other dealing with this blank cheque, which gives to the executive powers which should not be given by any parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose tonight to traverse the ground that has been so often traversed, nor do I propose to enter into any elaborate argument as to why these provisions to which reference has been made are included in the legislation under consideration. I shall content myself by saying that in our very sincere conviction it is essential, perhaps at this time more than any other, that the words "peace, order and good government" should appear in this legislation; if it were not for that conviction they would not appear. I had hoped that it would not be necessary to use them, but I have convinced myself that I should be failing in my duty to this country and to the position which I occupy if they were not there. Therefore they are includued in the legislation. And if this afternoon hon. gentlemen who sit opposite and to the right supported the legislation to which reference has been made, I take it they did so because there is no case in which it has been alleged that there has been any abuse of this power by this government. No one has suggested that at any time during the four years that will have elapsed by March next there has been, on the part of this government, any usurpation of power, any abuse of authority or any effort to do other than utilize in the interests of the country the powers conferred by this parliament upon the executive.

I shall deal very briefly with the question of the limitation that it is alleged should be inserted in the bill as to the amount that might be expended for the purposes provided by the measure. In the first place the bill provides that the money must be expended in a given way. I hesitate to say to the committee what I am about to say, but the truth is, a democracy being what it is, that every time you put in a measure a provision that the sum to be expended shall not exceed a given amount, at that very moment those who would be beneficiaries under the legislation immediately begin to claim their share of that amount. I say that with hesitancy, but unfortunately it is true.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Not just now; when I conclude I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. DUPUIS: I was just going to refer to the $20,000,000; it was not all spent.

Mr. BENNETT: And the claim to a share of the amount, generally based upon a population basis, unfortunately, creates a situation in which the test is no longer necessity but ability to get. Perhaps hon. members of this house may question that statement, but if they will make some investigations they will find that what I have said is exactly correct.

Then let us go one step further. The executive is being clothed with power to spend money for the purposes indicated, and it is true that the sum to be spent is not mentioned. It is not as though this were something unusual in this parliament. I need not again give the instances I have in mind, but the government of which the hon. member for West Edmonton was a distinguished member gave to the same executive, the same governor in council as is mentioned in this bill, authority, for instance, to guarantee the bonds to secure the money to construct the harbour bridge in Montreal, without mentioning any sum whatever in the bill. The result was that nineteen and a half million dollars were expended on that bridge and every year the people of Canada are taxed to secure the money to pay the interest on that amount.

Mr. YOUNG: You should take warning from that.

Mr. BENNETT: That was a public undertaking which was being constructed, where it was possible to ascertain with reasonable certainty the amount required. Here you have an uncertain condition. You have a situation which I hope and believe will be greatly improved as the months go by, but I say to this committee very frankly that it is my very sincere conviction that if we stated in this bill a given sum of money, every province would claim what it regarded as its share of that money to be expended for the purposes mentioned in the bill. I speak now not from guess work but from experience. If I ask this house to grant this power I say again to the committee that when they talk of usurpation of power and dictatorship, they would only have to endeavour to discharge the duties that have rested upon the executive during the last few years to realize the necessity for powers being conferred upon it to enable it to deal with any situation that may arise. And further, the very fact the power is there has had tremendous effect in enabling matters to be disposed of. Now, as Canadians we are all more or less familiar with business as it is done in the common, ordinary, everyday run of life. We are a cross section of the country. We know perfectly well that there is nothing quite so bad as to hold out the sign of something to get and create a competition for the getting of it on the basis that competition arises in connection with a democracy. Everyone of us knows that; there is not one of us who does not know it. I ask the committee just to apply their ordinary, everyday, run-of-mine judgment to this transaction, and to realize what we are endeavouring to do. Dear only knows we do not wish to add further cares to the ones we already have, or seek authority to do something which we believe is not in the interests of the country. Will the committee not realize that in endeavouring to discharge our duties we have thought only of the welfare of Canada, and not our personal welfare.

Sometimes I hear hon. members in this chamber talk as though members of the government derived some satisfaction or happiness from working eighteen hours a day, when in fact one might just as well be free of it all. I say to this house sincerely that I did hope it would not be essential to put a provision of this kind in the bill. It would not be fair for me to disclose to hon. members all the information which comes to one, or to this office—not to the man but to the office—from all parts of the world. I realize that the great experiments being conducted in various parts of the world have placed upon this country, situated as it is—because geography is a fact which we cannot change—terrific and at times almost terrifying responsibilities.

When I heard my friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) declaim, I could almost fancy I heard myself. I am fair enough to him to say that I thoroughly appreciate the position which he has taken; for there is nothing which he has said touching freedom, liberty or control that is new to me. There is nothing that he has said in that regard in which I do not entirely concur. But when applied to these particular facts or circumstances, and the conditions which exist today, we must realize that when Professor Redlich, that eminent Austrian, developed his statements from historic conditions surrounding expenditures of public money in Great Britain, he then was not dealing with a world depression. He was not dealing with a world distressed; he was not dealing with universal chaos in economic affairs. He was dealing with the orderly, commonplace conduct of public business. And when Colonel Durell wrote his book and placed before his readers the historic aspect of the development of parliamentary control over public expenditures, with particular reference to the control of the House of Commons over such expenditures, he was not dealing with a condition where thousands of men and women were looking to the state for sustenance, for food, for clothing, or for support. He was not dealing with the congregation of people in great cities who had no employment. He was dealing with the orderly conduct of human affairs as they had been developed under our parliamentary institutions. And if I say to this chamber that it is my profound conviction that the extraordinary conditions which the world has seen develop during the past few years have not passed, I go further; notwithstanding the inherent right of hon. members to criticize everything done by the government, they will at least admit that there is no evidence of any abuse of authority, of any usurpation of power for the sake of power, or of any effort being made at any time by this executive or any member of this government to do anything other than what was honestly and earnestly believed to be in the interests of this young dominion.

It is on that ground that I put to the committee the overwhelming necessity imposed upon us of seeking this legislation again. I say frankly to this committee that if I could bring my mind to the belief that it was not necessary to ask parliament to confer upon the executive for the next eleven months—because the act expires on March 31, 1935—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With the qualification contained in section 10.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, those are qualifications with respect to expenditures which have to be paid because obligations were created. I thank the hon. member for bringing that to my attention. I think it would be fair to say that if I did not believe it were essential to ask this chamber to accept the legislation for eleven months, I certainly would not ask for it.

To be vilified, to be held up to execration and abuse, is not a thing a man should seek who is endeavouring to serve the public. If by properly eliminating the legislation I could escape it, does it not appear to hon. members that I would do so? But because I cannot do that, and because I should be failing in my duty to my country if I were to do it, these clauses are in the bill. I ask the committee to believe that nothing but an overwhelming sense of duty and of obligation has induced us to place them there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask a question before we leave this subject? Is it not a fact that in the agreements with the provinces no limitation is placed upon the provinces with respect to their expenditures? Are there limitations placed in the agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: No agreement with a province becomes effective until it has been approved by this government. And the estimate of the expenditure involved under it is always present, with the agreement itself. No blank authorization to spend unmentioned sums is conferred upon a province.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is, I am right in assuming that before the provinces may make any expenditures under the relief agreements, there must be an agreement for a fixed and definite sum with each province before expenditure takes place.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said a moment ago that the exact sum is not mentioned. But an estimate is made when the application for approval of the expenditure is sent to the federal government. May I repeat the statement I made, lest it be misunderstood: In connection with direct relief there is not a limit placed upon the dollars which can be expended. The necessity is the measure of expenditure with respect to direct relief. I should like to make that point sufficiently clear. That is, if the provincial authorities caring for the necessitous poor at point A expend certain sums of money on each, we make a fixed contribution of a percentage or fractional part, and the exact sum which may be expended, of course, cannot be determined. But the character of relief which is to be afforded is imposed by a condition in the agreement that is made. Is that clear?

Mr. NEILL: May I suggest something which may solve what appears to be rapidly approaching a deadlock? The time cannot be very far removed when the government may consider instituting closure, and I do not know that an extended discussion of this matter would do any of us any great good in the minds of the people. Parliamentary institutions are on trial in a sense if we cannot bring this matter to a head before very long. The Prime Minister has said that in his official position, information comes to him from all parts of the world and all parts of the country, and we have no reason to doubt his word, which makes it imperative for him to insist on inserting, much against his will, these words relating to peace, order and good government, and what they involve. If that is the case, and we will assume for the moment that it is, and I admit that for obvious reasons he cannot make this information known to the house and the country at large, why cannot he do what I have known to be done in other countries—call in the leaders of the two opposition parties, honourable men who can be trusted, and explain to them at least the reasons that actuate him in inserting these words? Then if they could go back to their followers convinced that the attitude of the government was one of necessity, the difficulty would be ended. I submit that that has been done before, and it might well be done in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say to the hon. gentleman that if a crisis should develop I certainly would not hesitate. On more than one occasion I have endeavoured to make known what I conceived to be of interest, but I think it is only fair to say that the leader of the official opposition—I am sorry he is not present at the moment—holds so very strong an opinion in this matter, expressed probably in the terms used by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, that I feel he would not regard any reason I advanced as being sufficient for the purpose the hon. gentleman has indicated. I think that is a fair statement of it in connection with what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In order that we may get on with the bill I may say that the official opposition have only one more amendment to be disposed of.

Mr. DUFF: Before the amendment is put, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention this year to arrange for public works being undertaken in different parts of the country under this act, or does the government intend to bring down a special bill for that purpose, or to place votes in the supplementary estimates for the different undertakings?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. BENNETT: Twice to-day I have said that the government proposed to introduce a bill dealing with public works, and that a schedule would be attached to it indicating what the proposed works were. I did not hold out any hope that there would be large appropriations covering small items, and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was quite correct in what he said with respect to that; but I did say in answer to a question that I would consider whether special provision might not be made to deal with items of the character he mentioned.

Mr. DUFF: My reason for bringing this matter up, Mr. Chairman, is this: Under the relief measure of two years ago certain sums of money were handed over to the Public Works department for different expenditures, and the Minister of Public Works, instead of calling for tenders in cases where the amount involved greatly exceeded $5,000, gave these works out to certain persons in the different provinces without calling for tenders at all. While the Prime Minister has told us that there has been no talk of scandals or undue pressure in connection with the money spent under the Relief Act, I would point out to him that it is in the interests of the country that the provision in the Public Works Act should be observed, namely, section 36 of chapter 166, part 2 of the statutes of 1927, which specifically provides that except in cases "of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest" tenders shall be called for in the case of all works over $5,000. If it is the intention of the government to give to the Minister of Public Works, as was done two or three years ago, certain sums of money to be spent on relief undertakings, the Prime Minister should instruct the Minister of Public Works to call for tenders whenever the amount involved is over $5,000. I know of a number of cases where there was no pressing emergency, and where the Minister of Public Works gave these moneys to certain persons and they were not spent for relief purposes at all. People who were not in need of relief, men in good circumstances, were made foremen of the works and supplied timber to carry on the work. If moneys are to be voted under this act the government should be very careful to see that all of the moneys spent go direct to the people who are in need of relief and who want to get work or to supply timber in connection with these works. I would ask the Prime Minister to see that that is done.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the committee I would point out that he has apparently overlooked one clause of that act which says that when the officers of the Public Works department certify that in their opinion the works can be executed more expeditiously and economically by days' work than by calling for tenders, it may be done in that way. Obviously there are certain works for which it is very difficult to prepare specifications and call for tenders in advance, and it is only in cases of that kind that works exceeding $5,000 are done by days' work, or possibly in some cases under the Unemployment Relief Act where it was possible to give a larger measure of employment by doing the work by day labour rather than by contract. Of course when a contract is awarded the contractor decides who shall be employed, and although in some cases the works done by days' work did exceed $5,000 the work was done in that way in places where there was considerable unemployment and where it was possible to rotate men who were in need of work. I can assure my hon. friend that the spirit and intention of the Public Works Act has been respected, and whenever it has been departed from it was either for the reason that the work could not be done expeditiously and economically by contract, or because the circumstances were such that there was special need for relieving unemployment.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot agree with the Minister of Public Works, because I know of cases where the work would have been done much more expeditiously and economically if tenders had been called for, and not only that, but more men would have been employed had the work been given out by contract. The minister could very well have inserted in the contract, if he was afraid that the contractor would not give work to certain people, that the work should be divided among the people in the community who were in need of work. It is all very well for the minister to try to put this on the shoulders of his officials and say that they advised him that these works could be done more expeditiously by days' labour than by contract, but I know differently, and I say that he cannot blame the officials of his department. These amounts were spent and the advice was given to the officials and they were told what to do by the minister in the head office here at Ottawa. All I say to the Prime Minister is that if any moneys are to be spent under this Relief Act for public works, tenders should be called for instead of the work being done as it has been done in the past by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend has said either too much or too little. I ask him to give me now the work that he refers to which he says was done in this irregular way, and I will investigate. I assure him that no instructions were given by me in any way in conflict with the Public Works Act.

Mr. DUFF: I quite agree with the minister that no instructions were given by him in conflict with the Public Works Act, but you can drive a horse and cart through that act if you want to; you can read it seventeen different ways, and that is the way lawyers draft bills. I say to the minister that I know of different cases but I am not going to give him the information. Let him go down and examine the files. I know of one instance where they had two foremen, one at $7 per day and one at $6.

Mr. BENNETT: Where was that?

Mr. DUFF: Let the minister go down and examine the files. There is another case where he paid 15 cents per foot for logs and 6 cents for poles.

Mr. BENNETT: Where was that?

Mr. DUFF: I ask the minister to find out where it was.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Say where it was.

Mr. DUFF: The minister knows where it was.

Mr. CANTLEY: You are making the charge; why do you not substantiate it?

Mr. DUFF: When the public accounts committee meets I will make the charges. Let the minister produce the files then; that is the time to do it, not now.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is the second time my hon. friend has made this statement. On the previous occasion I pressed him just as hard as I could, and I do so now, to tell me the place where this work was carried on. Will he tell me the constituency in which it was carried on?

Mr. DUFF: When the public accounts committee meets I shall be delighted to produce the information. All I am doing now is to ask the Prime Minister not to repeat in this bill what happened two years ago when money was passed over to the Minister of Public Works to do certain repairs and to construct certain works in Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will my hon. friend give me the name of the foreman?

Mr. DUFF: No; go and look at your files and find out.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How can I go through all the files to find out?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I ask my hon. friend to confer a favour and enable me to investigate this matter to see if there is any further action which should be taken. I ask him to give me sufficient information to do this. If he is not prepared to do it now, will he write me a letter?

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend can look over the returns which I asked for last year. There were not very many.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There were a good many last year.

Mr. DUFF: Not by me.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, a good many.

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will my hon. friend write me a letter giving me such information as will help me to trace this matter or to identify it?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has charged the Minister of Public Works with having done certain things. The minister has asked him for the name of the constituency, and if he cannot give that; for the name of the work and the name of the foreman, but the answer he has received is "go and look at the files".

Mr. DUFF: I did not do the work.

Mr. BENNETT: Most hon. members of this house are at least fairminded. I have always found them thus, although the bitterness of their criticism of myself is not always fair. Let hon. members just reverse the conditions; put one of you in as Minister of Public Works. If a member on this side made a charge and then you, as minister, asked for the name of the foreman, of the work or of the constituency, would you not expect an answer? He who asserts must prove. A charge is made but the only answer given is "go and look at your files." Is that fair?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read the amendment.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): It is moved by Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre, seconded by Mr. Casgrain, that section 5 be amended by inserting the words "and appropriated by parliament" after the word "necessary" in line 16.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) negatived on division.

Section 4 (now section 5) agreed to on division.

Section 5 (now section 6) agreed to on division.

Section 6 (now section 7) agreed to on division.

Section 7 (now section 8) agreed to on division.

Section 8 (now section 9) agreed to on division.

On section 9 (now section 10)—Payment of delayed accounts in excess of amount authorized.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is a new section?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. This is to meet a situation which developed in the case of Montreal, for instance, and I trust my mentioning this will not cause any unnecessary discussion. In this case the accounts were received yesterday, which is several days after March 31.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is retroactive in effect?

Mr. BENNETT: It is to cover a situation of that kind. Yesterday we received the accounts only down to July and we have not as yet received the remainder.

Section agreed to.

On section 10 (now section 11)—Duration of act.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): An amendment is moved by Mr. Ralston, seconded by Mr. Stewart (West Edmonton), that section 10 be amended by striking out all the words which follow the words "March, 1935" to the end of the section.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sponsoring this amendment. Could the Prime Minister give the committee an explanation for the proposal that a liability incurred before March 31 but not paid shall be authorized by this bill rather than follow the usual practice of the audit act? The fiscal year expires on March 31 and that act makes provision by order in council, not by governor general's warrant, for the extension for two months of the time of payment of all liabilities incurred before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BENNETT: A specific case arose a year ago, and upon consultation with the Department of Justice it was found that there was grave doubt as to our ability to deal with the situation unless we included the provisions of section 9. Section 10 deals with the actual conditions of this year's work. We were hoping that this would be the end of this form of legislation and this provision would enable the government to clean up the situation in the manner I have indicated. Having regard to our experience last year in connection with expenditures for which we did not get vouchers, it was thought desirable to deal with it in this way.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister will remember the discussion which took place in 1931 when a special vote was brought down for capital requirements of the Canadian National Railways. At that time the Prime Minister had a provision in the bill to this effect:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, this appropriation shall not lapse before May 31, 1931.

He proposed to incorporate in the bill permission to extend payments under it over a period of two months after the end of the fiscal year. His attention was directed to this matter by the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) who, from his long departmental experience, was very familiar with the audit act. After considering the matter, the Prime Minister moved to strike out that clause. I do not know that I recall the exact words of the hon. member for Rimouski, but his argument was to the effect that this was a grave invasion of a very important principle which had been laid down in connection with capital expenditures. Section 49 of the act says that the bell rings and the fiscal year closes on March 31, and that all bills shall be in at that time. However, in order that the public service may not suffer there is a provision in the same section which says that for two months afterwards the governor in council may, by order in council, pay accounts for expenditures which have been incurred prior to the end of the fiscal year; in other words, two months' leeway is given. I ask the Prime Minister if he cannot see his way clear to accept the amendment now proposed in connection with this measure in order to preserve that principle. When the Canadian National bill to which I have referred was under consideration in 1931, the Prime Minister gave as a reason for the insertion of this clause the fact that it was a very special matter and that the advice given by the auditors was that it was desirable. He said it was for that reason and no other that the clause was inserted. At page 517 of Hansard of March, 1931, he is reported as having made this statement:

> This is not our money for the purpose of expending it as we please.

In other words, the fund was specially earmarked for the purpose of expenditures for the Canadian National Railways. This, on the other hand, is a general fund earmarked for relief purposes, but without the limitation of a specific amount, and it may be devoted to a variety of purposes. So that the special nature of the funds in connection with the bill with which we are dealing to-night is not nearly so pronounced as it was in connection with the Canadian National bill of 1931. He proceeds:

> It is required to meet specific deficits in the operation of the railway; and their audit is made, not ours. All we do is to pass it out of our hands under the circumstances to which I have alluded. I desire, inasmuch as it may be difficult under present conditions to raise the sum of money required in a moment or two, that we and the railway company both should have an extension of time until the 31st of May in which to deal with the matter. It is unusual, I admit. It has been done only once before, but that was on an occasion somewhat similar to this. If the committee thinks that the public interest is not being as well served in this way as in some other, I am content; but it might result in the sum of money not being made available at all.

Now that we have had relief bills for two years without this provision, I would ask the Prime Minister seriously to consider accepting the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: We could not accept the amendment the hon. gentleman has offered without dislocating the whole machinery, unless we got in the accounts a little more rapidly than we have. I shall be quite content, if it will meet the wishes of the opposition, to add these words, after the words "revenue fund":

> —at any time prior to the first day of July, 1935.

That gives a little longer than two months; it gives to the end of June—April, May and June—in which to clean up the situation. I think the hon. gentleman will realize, having regard to the difficulties of getting the accounts straightened out, audited and vouched, that it might take that time, and if it will meet the situation I suggest that the amendment be accepted.

Mr. RALSTON: How will it work out?

Mr. BENNETT: The section will read:

This act shall expire on the 31st day of March, 1935, but any obligation or liability incurred or created under the authority of this act prior to the 31st day of March, 1935, together with any liability for expenditures after that date for projects required to be completed in order to preserve the value of work already done may be paid and discharged out of the consolidated revenue fund at any time prior to the first day of July, 1935.

In other words, that extends the time, so that instead of two months as indicated in the Audit Act, it will be three months, having regard to the very special difficulties that have to be met in connection with some of these matters. I am content to do this if it will expedite the transaction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The objection is that it gives an extension of three months to the activities.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. The fiscal year ends on March 31 and this amendment extends the time for three months.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it extends only the time for payment of obligations.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But you have still embodied in the clause works that may be continued.

Mr. BENNETT: Only for one purpose, but they have to be paid for within that time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My objection is just as serious to the amendment as it is to the section as it stands.

Mr. BENNETT: Frankly, I do not think my hon. friend has followed the purport of my suggestions. I am prepared to limit that section to three months. The hon. gentleman said two, which is the general provision of the Audit Act. For instance, when the budget is delivered we can only make an estimate of revenues and expenditures up to March 31, because the accounts come in for the next two months, in order to clean up the transactions for the fiscal year. I suggest that we be allowed the extra month, having regard to the kind of business this is, and dealing as we are with municipalities, direct relief and matters of that kind, and our experience in Montreal and other places, though perhaps not to the same extent. Under the circumstances I think I am warranted in making this suggestion.

The only other question, then, in regard to which the hon. gentleman has any difficulty is that we may create further liabilities with respect to projects that require to be completed in order to preserve the value of the work, but they would have to be paid for also. I am making provision for payment by the first of July.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am still opposed to it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am prepared to provide that payment for everything mentioned in section 10 shall be made prior to the first day of July, 1935.

Mr. RALSTON: With all deference to the Prime Minister, and realizing that he is endeavouring to meet us, I submit that the compromise which he proposes is not worth while. For the extension of the extra month it is not worth while violating the principle laid down by the Audit Act, which has been observed by parliament with the single exception to which reference has been made. The Prime Minister is asking us in this particular bill not only to extend the powers with respect to peace, order and good government, not only to grant a blank cheque, but to amend the Audit Act as well. I submit that the matter ought to be left as it is. These accounts should be in by the end of May. I appreciate his endeavour to meet us but it is the principle of the thing and not the length of time. I submit that the Audit Act should be the governing act so far as the payment of government liabilities is concerned, and we know that under the general act all accounts must be in if the federal government takes the responsibility of passing orders in council.

Amendment (Mr. Ralston) negatived on division.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that after the word "fund" in the last line but one of the section all the words to the end of the section be stricken out and that there be substituted the following words:

At any time prior to the first day of July, 1935.

Mr. NEILL: Does the Prime Minister not think that the section still needs the words proposed to be struck out?

Mr. BENNETT: With the language that precedes those words they are not necessary.

Amendment (Mr. Bennett) agreed to on division.

Section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): Shall the preamble carry?

Mr. BENNETT: There are two lines added to what was there last year, about the Department of National Defence and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. HEENAN: On this section I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that this is the fifth bill of this nature that has been introduced in parliament, if he does not think it is about time we should try to get together with the provinces for the purpose of amending the British North America Act so that the federal parliament can deal with its own expenditures and the provinces deal with theirs. I have observed that many of the newspapers in Canada to-day that were opposed to social services such as old age pensions, unemployment insurance and matters of that kind are now advocating that the British North America Act should be changed so as to permit the federal government to carry on certain services. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister state the other evening that he now sees the necessity of amending that act so that the government can deal with social problems. I cannot see now very much to hinder such amendment: the people of Canada are in favour of it, the newspapers seem to be in favour of it, the Prime Minister is in favour of it, and the leader of the official opposition placed himself on record in favour of it in two or three statements which I shall quote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are the nine provinces in favour of it?

Mr. HEENAN: I shall speak about that in a minute or two. The leader of the opposition said on March 13, 1930:

If the provinces themselves are not able to meet the obligations it was hoped they would be able to meet when there was a division of jurisdiction between the provinces and the federal government, then the way to meet that situation is by revising the subsidies that are to be paid to the provinces. Let us have a general revision of the subsidies, and let us make an allotment to the several provinces in the form of subsidies to which each will be entitled as a matter of right and as a matter of law, not something for which they will have to look to the federal treasury for a term of years, and which comes to them as a matter of grace.

That will be found at page 580 of Hansard for March 13, 1930. Then again on May 26, 1931; at page 1966, he is reported as having said:

The time I think has arrived when this matter should be made the subject of a conference concerned with a financial readjustment between the dominion and the provinces. If it does appear that the provinces are entitled to something more than the subsidies as fixed at the present time, by all means let the subsidies be revised and an increased amount given. A step which might serve the purpose equally well, and possibly even better, would be for this federal government to take over some of the services which at present are being left to the provinces.

Again on July 23, 1931, at page 4102 of Hansard:

I have no objection to any just increase which might result from proper revision of the subsidies, but I would point out to my hon. friend that before having the country go further into debt, before imposing more in the way of taxation upon the people, it would be advisable for the government to call a dominion-provincial conference and review the different services which are being carried on by the different administrations, take into account all grants which have been made in the past and now are being made to the provinces by the federal administration and see if it is not possible to make some definite arrangement whereby the provinces on their part and the dominion on its part will themselves thereafter raise all that is necessary for the carrying out of the particular services which may be assigned to them. If the provinces have not a sufficient latitude in the way of fields of taxation, then more latitude should be given.

Again at page 4120 of Hansard the right hon. leader of the opposition is reported as having said:

. . . I again appeal to the ministry, although I know my words will not be hearkened to, to consider whether the time has not come when we ought to call the provinces into conference to find out, where there is any doubt, what services should be carried on by the provinces, what services should be carried on by the dominion, what is a fair adjustment of financial arrangements between them, what are the sources of revenue and taxation for each of them to have. If as a result of that conference it is decided that the British North America Act should be amended so that the federal parliament shall take over in its entirety the work of industrial and technical education in all parts of Canada, I shall be prepared to support a recommendation of that kind.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) a moment ago asked me if the provinces had agreed. I do not know. I do not know because I have not been in the confidence of the government. The government have called a few dominion-provincial conferences, but little has been made public as to what occurred at those conferences except a statement once in a while from the government benches that we cannot do thus and so until the provinces agree. Surely if ever any government of Canada had a mandate from the people to amend the British North America Act, or at least to do things even to that extent, this government has. Hon. gentlemen who are now members of this government went out and told the people that they would do these things if they were elected. In my opinion that mandate is of more force and effect than that which any British parliament, any mother of parliaments, can give. I consider that the government have a mandate, especially since they asked for it. The time is long past for any further delay in the taking of steps to secure an amendment to the British North America Act to enable the government to carry on necessary social services such as old age pensions, workmen's compensation, unemployment, health insurance and all these matters. The official opposition has through its leader put itself on record as favourable to it, I know that the Liberal party in the province of Ontario are in favour of it, because they have had it in their platform for three or four years. Steps should be taken, especially after our experience of the last four years, to secure an amendment of the British North America Act so that the federal government can keep control over its own finances and take charge of all these social services.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned to this committee the other day in answer to observations made by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that I was of the opinion that the constitution would have to be amended in order to enable matters affecting social services to be dealt with by the federal power. I suggest to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) that he communicate with the leader of his party in the province of Quebec. I hold in my hand a newspaper in which already, as a result of the very few observations I made the other evening, we see on the front page in large headlines:

Bennett would revise the constitution.
Taschereau defends the rights of the provinces.

Then there is a picture of the Prime Minister, under which it says:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada, who signified his intention to make amendments to the constitution of Canada for the purpose of dealing with social measures.

Then there is a picture of Mr. Taschereau, the premier of Quebec; —who has constituted himself the new champion of provincial autonomy and is opposed to any changes in the Canadian constitution without a conference between Ottawa and the provinces, and the unanimous consent of all the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which paper is that?

Mr. BENNETT: This is the Sherbrooke Tribune of April 12, and similar statements appeared in other newspapers in Quebec. With the best of intentions I commend to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River the very pleasant task of spending the recess in converting to his principles the premier of Quebec, and I doubt not that after he has laboured with that gentleman long and arduously he will have induced him to believe that these amendments are necessary. I leave that task to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HEENAN: If I were to use the words of the right hon. Prime Minister probably I would say, as was said from the platform in 1930, that I will not prescribe until I am called in.

Mr. BENNETT: You have been a volunteer prescriber.

Mr. HEENAN: There is also the fact that I talk a little Gaelic; I am not so sure that Premier Taschereau would understand that, and I know I would not understand his French, so I think probably the Prime Minister would make a better job of it.

I realize that there is something in what the Prime Minister says; I realize that if we wait here until we get the nine provinces to agree to the amendment of the British North America Act it never will be amended. I recall a conference I attended here in 1927, when not only Premier Taschereau and his government but the government of Nova Scotia as well were unalterably opposed to changing the British North America Act. At that time the government of Nova Scotia was headed by the late Premier Harrington and was represented here by the present Minister of Finance. The province of Ontario, represented by the present attorney general, Hon. Mr. Price, and my old friend Hon. Howard Ferguson, was opposed also. So here we are boxed up, as it were. To-night the Prime Minister advanced the best argument that I have heard as to why the act should be amended. The right hon. gentleman said that if we state a definite amount in this bill the provinces will clamour for what they think is coming to them; even if they need only $2,000,000 if there is $20,000,000 to be divided they will want their share. I think the Prime Minister was right in that argument; I agree with him, and that is just another reason why we in this federal parliament should take care to see to it, when we are spending money, that we spend our own money over which we have control.

There is another course that occurs to me. If these provinces are in the financial position they say they are in, and I have no doubt that is the fact; if they come to this government for aid why could not the government make it a part of the bargain that the British North America Act should be changed in order to allow the federal government to administer many of these things on their own account? I make that suggestion to the Prime Minister in good faith; I believe that could be done. I do not believe the present Prime Minister, the present government or any government of any other political stripe ever will be able to induce the nine provinces to agree to the amendment of the British North America Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We got them to agree to a uniform companies act.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, they will form companies, but when it is a question of legislating with regard to fair wages, old age pensions, shorter working days and so on it is a different thing altogether. I am not going to take up the time of the committee further. I make this suggestion, and by this time I should think the Prime Minister would be convinced that we should have control of our own money. If we have to give it to the provinces then let us give it to them under proper conditions so that we can control it ourselves.

Mr. HANBURY: Before this bill is reported may I say that I think the discussion introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is quite interesting. I refer to the questions of the amendment of the constitution. I have no desire to embarrass the Prime Minister at all, but in view of the interest that has been shown in this subject from one end of Canada to the other during the past month or so I would inquire of the Prime Minister if he cares to say whether he considers that any amendment could be made that is not unanimous.

Mr. BENNETT: Two answers could be given to that question; one is the political answer and the other is the legal answer. The legal answer is that if this parliament—and that means both houses—adopts a resolution embodying a petition to the sovereign for the enactment of legislation by the parliament at Westminster amending the British North America Act, under the statute of Westminster such legislation would be enacted accordingly. I referred to the political argument the other day. The constitution of Canada is a compromise, and the extent to which variations of that constitution should be effected, if they impinge upon the rights of the provinces that were the original partners to the confederation pact, is a matter that would require careful consideration, in my judgment, looking to the future as it might be affected by any breach in the harmony that would be involved by making amendments that did not meet with the approval of all the provinces.

Preamble agreed to on division.

Title agreed to on division.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the bill is reported I should like to correct one error into which some of my hon. friends fell. When I moved the house into committee last night just before eleven o'clock I did so because, when I moved the committee up earlier in the day, I stated that it would meet again that day, and in order that the rules might be kept I had to move the house again into committee and move it up at once. That was not done in consequence of any action taken by the opposition. I should like to free the opposition from any blame that may attach in relation to that phase of the matter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We were not taking any.

Mr. BENNETT: That condition never arises, but I noticed the press expressed that opinion. There is one other thing; with regard to the address over the radio last evening it lasted only until half past eight. It was because my hon. friend pursued the course that he did with respect to a matter that I had endeavoured to explain three times that it was thought that if we delayed discussion a better opportunity might be afforded for disposing of the matter than would be the case if we then proceeded. If we had been in a position to go on my hon. friend the Minister of Justice would have taken up that phase of the question.

Bill reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Monday, April 16, 1934

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland) moved:

That the petition of Lucy Doris Cannon praying for a bill of divorce from Edward Frederick Cannon, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville) moved:

That the petition of Annie Rosner praying for a bill of divorce from Solomon Rosner, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

HOSPITAL SWEEPSTAKES

On the order:

Bill No. 56 (Letter A of the Senate), intituled: "An Act with respect to Hospital Sweepstakes."

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that it is not indicated that the bill is in charge of any particular member of the house. In view of the fact that the government proposes to leave the matter entirely to the members, without any indication of the government's view with respect to what action should be taken, it might be well to set a day for the discussion of this bill. A day next week might be agreed upon, if some hon. member becomes sponsor for the bill.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed that Mr. Fraser of Cariboo sponsors the bill.

Order stands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

COMMUTERS CANADA-UNITED STATES

Mr. ROBINSON:

1. How many persons residing in Canada commute daily for work in the United States, and what is the total amount of their yearly wages?

2. How many persons residing in the United States commute for daily employment in Canada, and what is the total amount of the yearly salaries paid to them?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this question it is impossible for the government to give a correct answer. We have no means of ascertaining the information sought. We have communicated with our representative in Washington for the purpose of bringing the matter to the attention of the American government as mentioned the other day, but the question itself cannot be answered.

Question dropped.

RAW TOBACCO IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. GOTT:

1. How much raw leaf tobacco was imported from the United States of America during the fiscal years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934?

2. How much tobacco was exported from Canada during the foregoing years?

3. What was the production of tobacco in Canada during the foregoing years?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Canada's imports of raw leaf tobacco from the United States for the years ended March 31, 1920 to 1933, and for the eleven months ended February 28, 1933 and 1934, were:

TOBACCO IN BOND

Mr. GOTT:

1. How much raw leaf tobacco was there in bond in Canada as at March 31, 1934?
2. How much United States tobacco was there in bond in Canada as at the same date?
3. How many tobacco manufacturers had raw leaf tobacco in bond or storage in Canada as at the same date?
4. How much has each company?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

1. 5,366,295 standard pounds of foreign raw leaf tobacco were reported as being in manufacturers' warehouses, in Canada, on the 31st of March, 1934.

2. Information not available as separate statistics are not maintained in the department at Ottawa as to the amount of United States tobacco in bond.

[Mr. Gott.]

3. 36.

4. The private business of individuals or corporations would be disclosed if such information were given and this would be contrary to the established practice of the Department of National Revenue.

PUBLIC DEBT OF CANADA

Mr. FONTAINE:

What was the amount of the public debt of Canada at the close of the fiscal year March 31, 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: This question will be answered in the budget and full particulars will then be given.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES OF PENSION AGE

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. Are there any Canadian National railway employees eligible for pension still at work?

2. If so, how many are there?

3. Are said employees working at the request of the railway officials?

4. How many Canadian National railway employees not eligible for pension, that is, having started to work after forty years of age, have reached the retiring age and are still working?

Mr. MANION: This inquiry was referred to Honourable C. P. Fullerton, chairman of the board of trustees, Canadian National Railways, who has replied that the information requested concerns details of railway administration which are not considered to be of public interest.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MUNICIPAL DEBT DEFAULT

Mr. COOTE:

What amount of municipal bonded debt has been defaulted during the years 1931, 1932, and 1933 in each of the provinces of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The government has no means at its disposal to obtain the answer to this question that are not as easily available to the hon. gentleman himself. It involves writing to the appropriate authorities for the purpose of ascertaining anything beyond what may be ascertained by the bureau of statistics, which does not undertake to guarantee that the information received is complete.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the government will allow it to pass on the understanding that the information given shall be such as is in possession of the bureau?

Mr. BENNETT: If it stands as an order for return perhaps that will meet the situation.

RESTORATION OF TEN PER CENT SALARY DEDUCTION

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. By the return of the 10 per cent salary deduction, how many individuals in the following categories of government service will be benefited: (a) revenue postmasters; (b) part time collectors of customs; (c) lighthouse keepers; (d) wharfingers; (e) charwomen; (f) seasonal or part time labourers; (g) lockmen; (h) bridgemen on canals?

2. What were the total salaries paid to each of the above categories during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933?

3. How many employees of the government service in the enumerated classes, or in classified positions under the Civil Service Act will benefit by the return of the 10 per cent salary deduction—giving the number in each class or grade?

4. What were the total salaries paid to the above employees during the years 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933?

EXCISE TAX ON CIGARETTES

Mr. GOTT:

1. What is the present excise tax on cigarettes?

2. (a) When was present rate of excise set; (b) what was it prior to that?

3. How much revenue was raised from excise on cigarettes each year from 1912 (fiscal year), until March 31, 1934?

4. How many cigarettes were consumed in Canada each year from 1912 to 1934?

5. (a) How many cigarettes were legally imported into Canada during the foregoing years; (b) from where did they come?

6. What is the import duty on cigarettes?

EXCISE TAX ON CIGARS

Mr. GOTT:

1. How many cigars were produced in Canada during the fiscal years ending March 31, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934?

2. How is the excise tax levied on cigars?

3. What was the revenue each year during the aforementioned years?

4. What was the total revenue in each of these years from the tobacco industry—all branches enumerated?

PRODUCTION AND IMPORTATION OF ONIONS

Mr. GOTT:

1. How many bags of onions were grown in Canada during the past ten years?

2. What is the rate of duty on onions imported: (a) from the United States; (b) from other countries?

3. How many onions were imported into Canada during the past ten years, and from where?

4. How many onions were exported from Canada, and to where?

5. How many acres of onions were grown in Canada each year since 1921?

SEIZURES AND SALES OF AUTOMOBILES BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. How many automobiles were seized and sold by the Department of National Revenue, from 1926 to 1930?

2. What price was paid for each of such automobiles?

3. Who were the tenderers?

4. Of what make were such automobiles?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE AND W. H. SPROULE, VANCOUVER, B.C.

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or other documents, exchanged between the hon. Minister of Justice or any person in the Department of Justice and Mr. W. H. Sproule, of Vancouver, British Columbia.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are some letters on the file of the Justice department referred to in this motion, but these letters refer only to some of the private affairs of a judge in British Columbia. The public interest is in no way concerned, therefore the government does not propose to produce these letters.

Motion dropped.

INDIAN AGENCY, PIERREVILLE, QUÉ.

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Boucher):

For a copy of all accounts, vouchers, bills, lists of payments, receipts, letters and correspondence, respecting item: medical care $1,268.35, hospital charges $3,862.10, and relief $12,028.04 mentioned in the auditor general's report for the year ending March 31, 1933, under the caption of Indian agency, Pierreville, Quebec; also a statement giving particulars with respect to names and addresses, amounts paid, and showing to whom and for whom they were paid.

POSTMASTERS—YAMASKA COUNTY

Mr. BRASSET (for Mr. Boucher):

For a copy of all letters and correspondence between the Postmaster General, the deputy Postmaster General or any official of the Post Office Department, and any person, since August 1, 1930, to date, respecting the postmasters of the following post offices in the county of Yamaska; Pierreville, St-Zephirin de Courval, St-Elphege, St-Francois du Lac, St-Gerard, Yamaska-West, Notre Dame de Pierreville, La Visitation, St-David, St-Guillaume, the dismissal of said postmasters, and their substitutes or successors.

REVENUE POST OFFICES

Mr. VALLANCE:

For a return showing: (1) A list of post offices having revenue of $1,500 to $10,000 (on which salaries are determined), showing revenue for each of the years 1931-32, 1932-33 and 1933-34; (2) casual or automatic pay cuts suffered by each of the postmasters in these offices for each year (exclusive of the 10 per cent deduction).

[Mr. Laflèche.]

JEAN AMEDEE MOTUT

Mr. TOTZKE:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government, relating to the dismissal of Jean Amedée Motut, postmaster at Hoey in the province of Saskatchewan, and the appointment of his successor.

INDIAN RESERVATION—POINTE BLEUE

Mr. DUGUAY:

For a copy of all correspondence and communications exchanged between the provincial government of Quebec, and the federal Department of Indian Affairs, from 1930 to date, respecting the Indian reservation of Pointe Bleue, county of Lake St-John.

NEW MASSETT, B.C., WHARF

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Public Works and any person or persons, relating to a claim made against the government for lumber lost through collapse of the wharf at New Massett, British Columbia, in 1918.

PETITE RIVIERE AU RENARD

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all pay lists, in connection with works carried out at the wharf of Petite Rivière au Renard, county of Gaspé, during the years 1931 and 1932; also a copy of vouchers respecting purchases of lumber, iron, and other materials in connection therewith.

RIVIERE AU RENARD

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all pay lists, in connection with repairs carried out at the wharf of Rivière au Renard, county of Gaspé, during the year 1933; also a copy of vouchers respecting purchases of lumber and other materials in connection therewith.

SAINT LOUIS, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports of investigation and other documents, relating to the dismissal of the postmaster at Saint Louis, Kent county, New Brunswick.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position now to advise us as to the further legislation that is likely to be brought down this session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I propose to make a statement to-morrow with respect to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In his statement to-morrow will my right hon. friend be able to indicate when the bill with respect to the Elections Act, in particular, will be introduced?

Mr. BENNETT: It is in a forward state of preparation. We have not had a chance to consider it yet, because it has not been completed.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

BILL IN TERMS GENERALLY OF RELIEF ACT, 1933, WITH PROVISION RESPECTING DELAYED RELIEF ACCOUNTS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 42, respecting relief measures.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house for third reading has been discussed in committee at considerable length, and one or two very slight modifications have been made by the government as a result of representations which have been made from this side of the house. But while the changes in the nature of modifications have at least improved the bill from the point of view of the emphasis to be placed upon the alleged meaning of one or two of the amended clauses, to all intents and purposes, the bill itself remains precisely as it was at the time it was introduced in regard to the powers it gives to the administration, powers which violate the fundamental principles of parliamentary procedure and practice and which are contrary to constitutional usage and right in matters of government. For that reason we must continue to oppose the bill as it stands. Therefore, I am going to propose that before the bill is read the third time, it should be referred back to the committee for further consideration in regard to these objectionable phases.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion has served to bring out only one or two additional reasons, from the point of view of the government, as to why these autocratic powers should be reserved to the executive at this time. They are reasons, however, which go to show why the powers should not be given to the government, rather than reasons which should persuade this house to grant the powers requested. One reason that was alleged was that in the United States the executive has been given very considerable powers under recent legislation passed in that country. I dealt with that matter the other day, so I will simply say in further reference to it that in precedents of government I think this house would do well to follow the example of the British parliament rather than the example of the government of the United States. While undoubtedly the government of the United States may under the constitution of that country require certain powers to deal with their own problems, and while they may be right and efficient in what they are doing, our constitution is very different in essential particulars. So far as matters of government are concerned, no country having parliamentary institutions is in a better position to lead others in a right direction than is the British parliament in matters of procedure and practice, and I think we would be much better off and on much sounder ground in every way if where a departure is to be made we cite in this House of Commons British precedent rather than precedent borrowed from the United States.

A second reason that was urged by the Prime Minister as to why these powers should be retained was that some of the provincial executives have taken to themselves additional powers; that they have taken away from their legislatures certain powers of legislation and have given to themselves powers undreamed of heretofore. The government has taken exception to powers being taken in that fashion by the provincial executives. I submit that any criticism to be directed against provincial executives in that regard is equally applicable to everything the present administration is seeking to do, and has done in the past, of a like character. Fundamentally it is a matter of principle, and that principle applies equally to the federal administration and to provincial administrations. I would go a step further and say that in my opinion the argument that additional powers should be given the executive here because additional powers have been taken by provincial executives, in order thereby to give to the federal executive more in the way of bargaining power, is nothing more nor less than contending for the right of competitive arming between federal and provincial governments with respect to executive and legislative power. To endeavour to meet any dominion-provincial problem in that spirit is only going to aggravate the situation and to divide the country on great issues, rather than help to keep it united. If a province exceeds its power, or if it attempts to do anything unconstitutional, the proper method of redress is appeal to the courts, and that method of redress is always present.

Moreover, the federal parliament always has the authority to provide such legislation as may be necessary to deal with any given situation. But to give to the executive authority, simply by the might of its power, to control a situation where it comes into conflict with the executive of a province is to begin a species of legislative and executive warfare which in times like the present will make for more in the way of trouble and unrest, and away from the spirit of unity and good-will which is so essential to a solution of all national, as well as international problems.

The third reason to which the Prime Minister alluded, but which he did not discuss at length, was the possibility in some parts of the world not only of great unrest but even of war. He intimated that where there was such a possibility there was an additional reason why the executive should have exceptional powers. May I repeat what I said the other day, that if there is a possibility of that kind there is all the more reason why we should adhere strictly to the principles laid down in that legislation which already governs with respect to the defence of Canada, and which states what may and what may not be done by the executive at a time of war. There is on the statute books an act of parliament relating to the possibility of war, to all the emergencies which may arise in connection with the necessity for defence and for peace and order, whether it be against a foreign power or with respect to an insurrection or trouble within our own borders. The powers there given to the government are, I believe, ample in every particular to meet any situation which may arise. They have been drafted in the light of all considerations which should be taken into account at times of stress, and they do help to preserve the liberties and the rights of the people of the country against any possible action which might be taken with the best of intention perhaps but, nevertheless, without the exercise of the best judgment.

I would say that if there is any such danger as the Prime Minister described, or if the Prime Minister and the government feel that the legislation with respect to the defence of the country is not ample to meet such a situation, let them propose an amendment to the acts relating to national defence, and the maintenance of peace, and of law and order in the country. Let them give to this House of Commons the reasons why the existing acts should be modified and additional powers given to the executive in that connection. But do not let them at a time like this, and under the guise of dealing with relief, legislate that in addition to the provisions of any existing act, the government may have further powers than those already set forth in existing legislation and the exercise of which may have very serious consequences indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is another very strong reason why this house should oppose as strenuously as possible any move to give additional power to the executive, and to a corresponding degree deprive this House of Commons of its rights in matters of legislation and in the control of taxation and public expenditure. We have been giving those powers under the alleged reason that they have been necessary to meet emergent situations. But the giving of them has become part of the common practice. These relief measures are furnishing precedents for other legislation some of which has already been introduced in this House of Commons, and for legislation which may continue to be introduced in subsequent sessions. Such legislation goes still farther in the way of depriving the House of Commons of the control it should have in legislative matters and the control of taxation and expenditure.

Possibly later to-day, or later in the present week another bill will come up for discussion on second reading, namely, that which has to do with the great problem of marketing. When we reach that bill, I believe it will be discovered that the very principles I have referred to as being violated in this legislation are being equally set at naught in its provisions. There again, it will be found that parliament is being deprived of its right to determine exactly what the laws are to be; that this power and duty is being given to the executives or to other bodies not yet in existence. The rights of parliament in many particulars are not only to be turned over to the executive but may even be parted with by the executive and given to groups of individuals not on the basis of representation of the community as a whole but simply because of their belonging to particular occupations or trades or callings. These groups, rather than parliament, are to be the persons to make the laws. which are to govern, and with respect to the violation of which penalties are to be inflicted. And what is still more amazing, and I refer to it in connection with this legislation, is that the measure as introduced goes the length of preventing anyone who believes himself to be thereby aggrieved and to be deprived of his rights from having any redress in a court of law. When we come to the point where legislative bodies and the courts are no longer security for the rights and liberties of the people, we must realize that the ship of state has drifted pretty far from its moorings, and is in a rather dangerous position, especially at a time of great unrest, such as the present. I believe much effort is needed to bring about more in the way of social justice, more in the way of equitable distribution of wealth, and to secure legislation for the common good, but I believe all of that will be best effected by directing the thought, motive and purpose behind the measures needed to effect these great ends through the channels of our parliamentary institutions, as established and framed in the interests of the great body of the people as a whole. I believe all that is needed can be done more effectively, and in a manner better suited to preserve the rights of all, if it is done in accordance with the known traditions and practices of parliament, as we have understood them in the past, rather than by having parliament divest itself of those rights, and handing them over to untried bodies which are not in any sense of the word representative of the people, either in the communities in which they are to function or in the country as a whole.

I should like to repeat that any bill which gives to the executive blanket authority to legislate with respect to any class of subjects usurps and is completely subversive of the rights and powers of this House of Commons and of parliament. This measure, containing that subversive principle, is one which in its present form we cannot support, and which, in that particular as well as in others, should be amended.

Another point to which we take objection is that by accepting this legislation we would be parting with the control which at all times parliament should have over expenditures and taxation. Where a blank cheque is given an administration, one cannot say that there remains any longer that kind of control which this House of Commons should have over every dollar spent out of the public treasury. All the other proposed expenditures of parliament have been brought before the House of Commons in the form of estimates containing votes for specific purposes and of definite amounts, in each case the expenditures being limited to the period of one year. That time limit is imposed in order that it may be necessary to bring parliament together within the year, to ensure that what is needed by way of revenue will be secured in plenty of time. We are now getting to the point where, under such legislation as that now before us, if the government so desired they could perpetuate its effect more or less indefinitely. The very principles for which men fought at the time of the Long Parliament are the principles which are now at stake. The fact that the government does not intend to use the powers given it in the manner indicated in the measure is not of importance. It is not the intention, but what the statute says which is of importance. No one has emphasized that fact oftener than has the Prime Minister. This statute says that the government may pass whatever orders in council it pleases for the purpose of maintaining peace, order and good government. Under this statute, were there no other safeguard, the government could, claiming the times to be a period of unrest, take to itself the power to prolong the period before which a general election could take place, because it could say: It is not desirable to bring on a general election in such a period of unrest, and therefore under the authority which has been given to us by parliament we will extend the time of parliament for another year. That is indicative of what we are giving the administration to-day in the way of power, and I say that that kind of power should not be given to an administration at any time, for any reason.

But in addition to that, the government has power now and under this legislation will continue to have power to take from the consolidated revenue the moneys of the country under blanket authority, and to pay out the same by filling in the blank cheque to the amounts desired. There is no necessity, with that power existing, and granted power to extend the life of parliament, why parliament should be called together at all, so long as revenues continue to roll into the public treasury. The mere fact that such a condition can be even suggested is quite sufficient reason why this parliament of Canada should not allow the ship of state to drift to that extent from the moorings which alone can secure the safety and the liberty of the people of this country.

Let me go a step further. This measure also contains, and I do not think enough stress has been laid upon this point in the course of the discussion here, a clause which to all intents and purposes sets aside the very functions which the courts of the land are supposed to exercise in protecting the rights and liberties of the people. Not only does it say that the governor in council may make whatever laws he pleases with respect to certain matters, but he may the next day after he has made any such law, repeal and revoke it, and after such repeal and revocation may go on to enact another measure in a diametrically opposite direction, and no redress can be had by the person who has been injured under the previous legislation. That surely is taking away the last right and the last liberty of the individual. Let me read the section:

All orders and regulations of the governor in council made hereunder shall have the force of law and may be varied, extended or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation; but if any order or regulation is varied, extended or revoked, neither the previous operation thereof nor anything duly done thereunder shall be affected thereby, nor shall any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued, accruing or incurred thereunder be affected by any such variation, extension or revocation.

It is one thing to enact a provision of the kind in relation to a known statute, but quite another thing to permit powers of a kind with respect to an unknown order of the governor in council. I venture to say that if this House of Commons was asked to append to a statute a clause that, notwithstanding anything the statute said, it could be altered at pleasure and that there would be no redress for those who might come under its changed provisions, notwithstanding they had suffered ill consequences, you could not persuade the house to put through any such legislation. But what is being done here, is not that parliament is attempting to do anything of that sort while parliament is in session, but we are being asked to give to the governor in council when parliament is not in session the right to do those things which we would not countenance for one minute while parliament was in session. I say, Mr. Speaker, that legislation of the kind, particularly when forming a precedent for further legislation of a similar character, should not be countenanced for one minute by the House of Commons.

There is a further reason why this bill in particular should not be allowed to pass in the form in which it is without something more in the way of control of public expenditures being provided for. Since the legislation was introduced we have had placed upon the table of this house special reports by the auditor general of the results of tests that have been made by his officers into the manner in which public money has been wasted on a colossal scale through the absence of a proper audit of expenditures in connection with relief. That colossal waste has arisen, as has already been indicated, from the lack of a proper, or adequate, and, in many cases, any audit, and from the lack of adequate provision with regard to the safeguarding of the public treasury in the expenditure of federal money. In spite of all that, and notwithstanding that we have had all this waste and danger made perfectly obvious and clear to the members of the house, there is not even another clause added to this bill to protect further relief expenditures, or to secure an adequate auditing of these expenditures.

With all these special reports before us that disclose wherein relief moneys have been used by provinces and by municipalities, not for relief but for purposes of administration, moneys spent out to be accounted for only by padded payrolls, moneys paid out and receipts taken for twenty different payments in the handwriting of one person, with relief money spent for gasoline, for taxation and other things of the kind—I say that, when all of this has been laid before us by the auditor general himself, it does seem that something more by way of protection of the public treasury should be provided.

Just here may I make a statement which will help perhaps to put a phase of this matter in its true light. I notice that in some parts of the country the statement is being made that members of the opposition, and in particular myself, have made certain charges against certain municipalities—for example, I saw a Calgary paper which said that I had charged that the municipality of Calgary had done such and such a thing—and a similar statement was made with reference to the ex-Postmaster General that he had made charges against a certain municipality in New Brunswick. I wish to point out that everything that has been said in this connection from this side of the house, far from being a charge, has been simply in the nature of quotation, supplemented by words to make perfectly obvious and plain the statements that have come from the auditor general of Canada. It is the auditor general of Canada who has stated that this waste has taken place and who has given specific instances. We have not made charges. We are simply saying: Here is the auditor general, the public servant of parliament whose duty it is to report to parliament on matters of the kind, and he has reported thus and so, and his reports give these appalling statements of what has actually taken place.

Not only did the auditor general direct attention to the waste of public money in these special reports; in his own annual reports to parliament, I notice that he also more than once directed the attention of parliament and of the government to the inadequacy of the audit, and to the waste of public money that was taking place. For instance, in his report for the year ending March 31, 1932, which was not laid on the table until 1933 the auditor general says at page xxiv of the introduction:

In addition, test audits, surveys and investigations, of necessity limited in number on account of the small staff at my disposal for that purpose, were carried out in connection with provincial and municipal relief accounts. Offices in five of the provinces have been visited, viz.: Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan. In the course of these surveys and/or investigations, which are ultimately to be carried out in all provinces, comments on which were communicated to the honourable the Minister of Labour, and also, for his information, to the honourable the Minister of Finance, my investigators found that some provincial audits and methods of controlling relief expenditure were either inadequate or insufficiently effective to ensure that all disbursements were made in accordance with the provisions of the acts, the agreements between the provincial and federal governments, and the regulations and directions concerning the relief administration.

So as early as March 31, 1932, we have the auditor general stating in his annual report to parliament that he had advised both the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance that the provincial systems of audits were not sufficient to protect the moneys which the provinces were spending, some of it their own money but that reported on, in particular, the federal moneys, and that as a consequence waste was taking place.

The auditor general's report for the year ending March 31, 1933, the one that was tabled this year, contains a reiteration of the same sort of thing. At page xxiii of the introduction the auditor general says:

The provincial audits in most cases—

In most cases, mark you:

—were found to be inadequate and not sufficiently protective against loss or waste of money. These audits were not in all cases conducted by the provincial auditors. An impartial audit of the relief expenditures was however conducted by some of the provincial auditors who also carried out local audits of the municipalities' relief accounts.

All the statements of expenditures received in this office were certified by the respective provincial auditors, in the form required by the Department of Labour.

One of the principal obstacles to the introduction of uniform and efficient methods of administering unemployment relief in all provinces was the insufficiency of directions and regulations, particularly regarding the administration of direct relief by the municipalities of the various provinces. For this reason, there has developed throughout the provinces a great variety of systems, some of them unsatisfactory, of dealing with these expenditures, with the result that the relief moneys were not in all cases sufficiently safeguarded and that waste, abuses, duplication of payments, et cetera, frequently occurred.

When we have the auditor general directing the attention of parliament to the fact that waste, abuses and duplication of expenditures frequently occur, and that these have resulted because there have not been proper directions as to how these moneys were to be expended and how expenditures were to be supervised, surely when this has been brought to the attention of the government in all the different reports, as well as the other reports which have been tabled, before this bill passes this House of Commons there should be included in it a provision which will serve adequately to protect the public treasury with respect to the moneys to be paid out hereafter. This is the last opportunity that we will have to protect the expenditures to be made for the period of another year under this measure. I ask hon. members: Is it right to assume for one moment that these abuses, that this waste and abuses and duplications and the rest of it which has been emphasized so strongly by the auditor general in his reports will not continue unless there is an express provision which will safeguard expenditure of public moneys in the way in which it ought to be safeguarded? It is a most astonishing thing not only that the facts are as I have described them but that members of the ministry should apparently be seeking to mislead the public with regard to the actual control that we have had. That is a strong statement to make, but I should like to read a paragraph of a report of a speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) made in Ingersoll on April 13 which more than amply justifies it. This report appeared in the Toronto Globe of April 14, but the same report appeared in other papers. What did the minister say with regard to the question of the expenditure of public moneys in the way of relief? The report reads:

Mr. King's Wednesday evening charge that the government had unconstitutionally taken and distributed millions of dollars for relief purposes was replied to by Mr. Stevens.

"Every single item was brought before parliament," said the speaker, "and was laid on the table."

Mr. BENNETT: That is right; that is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says, "that is true." I confess then that I am at a loss to understand the English language.

Mr. BENNETT: It is like reading Donald Sutherland's report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says that it is true. We have now, with the Prime Minister's words in addition, got all that we need to present the truth of the situation to the electorate. The Prime Minister of Canada as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that every single item was brought before parliament and was laid on the table. The report continues:

"If he had wanted, Mr. King could have brought before the public accounts committee any one of the items that were piled probably ten feet deep over the three-year period of our administration."

I wonder that the Prime Minister does not say, "hear, hear" to that.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the orders in council would be nearly that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The orders in council did not contain the items.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they did; they contained the authorization for the payment of the amounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a great difference between moneys paid out by order in council and moneys appropriated by parliament in itemized form, and that is the whole point of the exception we have been taking to the large sums of money which have been paid out without being itemized. That has been the whole tenor of the criticism from the outset from this side of the house with respect to these expenditures, that they differed from all other kinds of expenditure of public moneys in that the expenditure was not itemized and as such was not subject to the control of parliament. The bill passed at the first session contained a provision that the government should be allowed to expend up to $20,000,000. That was a definite sum in a round figure. But there was no itemizing of the services on and for which that $20,000,000 was to be expended; nothing was said as to how much was to go to one province or how much to another, nothing was said as to what was to go to public works or where public works were to be carried out, nothing was said as to what was to go for other objects, either relief camps or direct relief; it was just a lump sum of $20,000,000 to be spent. Last session an amount was fixed as a maximum, but, with that exception, the different acts have simply set forth that moneys could be taken out of the consolidated revenue of the country to any amount. There was no itemizing of expenditures, no appropriations on the basis of estimates. I say that that was entirely wrong, and it is deceiving the public, and saying what is untrue, when a statement is made that there has been control so far as this House of Commons or this parliament is concerned over the items of expenditure in connection with relief. The truth of the matter is that there has been no control at all. To be told what has already been spent is not to control expenditure. We have only begun to appreciate the colossal waste as a result of the indifference and lack of care and control on the part of the government over these public moneys.

Sometimes a debate of the character which we have had if it effects no other end serves to bring out declarations which otherwise might not have been made. I must say that I was gratified when I read that the Prime Minister had said on Wednesday or Thursday that he was of the opinion that the British North America Act ought to be amended and that social services in the different provinces ought to be taken over and administered by the federal government. This is what we of the Liberal party have been urging all along should be done. If hon. members will read over the discussion which took place in the house during the special session and the sessions of 1931, 1932, and 1933 they will see that with regard to unemployment relief, old age pensions, technical education and other grants in aid, I urged very strongly that there should be conferences between the dominion and the provinces with a view to bringing about financial readjustments whereby there might be turned over to the federal authority the control of social services. I urged that, with this end in view, subsidies should be readjusted in a manner that would be equitable, always adhering to the fundamental principle upon which the compromise of confederation was brought about. Hon. gentlemen laughed at the suggestion. Grants in aid to technical education was one specific case where I emphatically stated that before the government went ahead and appropriated further grants in aid, I thought that they should find out in what position the provinces and the dominion were for the carrying on of technical education, and whether it would not be better to have some of the social services, insurance against unemployment, old age pensions and the like handled as a national scheme rather than having them dealt with by the provinces in different ways, or by some of them not at all.

In connection with old age pensions we had the Prime Minister saying in 1930 that there would be a one hundred per cent expenditure on the part of the federal government—one of the numerous promises that have never been carried out. I stated that I thought the federal government ought to have the administration of the whole of that act. This was just a part of what is known as social service legislation. I thought that there ought to be a nation-wide scheme and national policy laid down and carried out with respect to insurance against unemployment as well as with regard to old age pensions.

The suggestion from this side has been that any relief scheme, under which millions of dollars were to be spent, should be administered by a national commission broadly representative of all parts and interests in the country; that this commission could gather information and report to parliament and thus help to lay a foundation for the changes in the British North America Act which might be necessary in order to bring about a proper national control of the great problem of unemployment, that the problem might be dealt with by national rather than provincial means.

Mr. DUPRE: The right hon. gentleman's views do not seem to agree with those expressed by the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, premier of Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad to hear my hon. friend say that here. It is exactly what he and others have been trying to do; they have been trying, by implications, in this matter to raise a prejudice against the province of Quebec.

Mr. MANION: Nonsense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are trying to bring that about in different parts of the country by having it assumed that the province of Quebec is not going to be favourable to the amending of the British North America Act for any purpose. May I say at once to my hon. friend that I think he rose a little too soon that time; as he does very often, he let the cat out of the bag, and I do not think his speaking as he did has pleased the Prime Minister any too well. Now, however, we know the situation. The ministry opposite are desirous of having it appear that Quebec is not favourable to an amendment to the British North America Act, and that for that reason it will probably not be possible to get an amendment through under Liberal auspices. May I say this to my hon. friend: If he looks at to-day's paper he will find that the Conservative leader in Quebec has taken exactly the same stand as has Mr. Taschereau with respect to maintaining provincial autonomy in that province, so that so far as the question of provincial autonomy is concerned there is no doubt in the world that Quebec in that particular like every other province in Canada is properly jealous of its rights. An amendment to the British North America Act that will be injurious to their autonomy is one thing; an amendment that will serve the interests of the provinces without prejudicing their autonomy is quite another. Where hon. gentlemen opposite make their mistake is in assuming that there will be any opposition to an amendment to the act which will help to relieve the provinces, including Quebec, of some of their burdens, and at the same time relieve the dominion of some of its burdens by avoiding overlapping in matters of taxation, and expenditures of public moneys as is inevitable where one government raises public moneys and hands them over to other governments to spend. That obviously is not doing good to anyone but is doing injury to all.

As regards an amendment to the British North America Act which would deprive the minority in any province of any right which it has, I believe that every province would be justified in opposing to the limit any such amendment. So far as this side of the house is concerned I am quite sure that any effort made in this country to deprive a minority of rights and privileges secured to it by the British North America Act would be strenuously opposed. But an amendment to the British North America Act which does not work any injury to any minority, but rather helps to relieve a majority as well as a minority of a burden it otherwise would have to bear, would be one which should very easily be brought about. If my right hon. friend had done what we suggested in this particular and appointed a national commission to administer relief and to advise him as to what legislation was necessary in order to make more effective a national scheme of unemployment insurance, old age pensions and other social services, he would not have to say what he says now, that the country will have to wait until the election is over before anything is done. He should in the existing situation have had the amendment made over two years ago. The British North America Act should have been amended in a manner that would have satisfied the provinces as well as the dominion. The fact that the Prime Minister has come to recognize that a change is necessary shows some progress, but it required a pretty strong stand and repeated urging on this side before he saw fit to make his statement. I have referred to what I said two, three and four years ago and Hansard will speak for itself in that particular. I shall read to the house what I said as recently as Monday last, a week ago to-day, and which I think caused my right hon. friend, the leader of the government, to make the statement he did on Wednesday.

Mr. BENNETT: What nonsense! I have not even read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps someone has told him about it.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The right hon. member flatters himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are certainly at last in this happy position that if the Liberal party should at any time be entrusted with authority and seek to have the act amended in order to enable a great national scheme of unemployment insurance or other social insurance plan to be federally administered, the Conservative party through its leader will be committed to that course, and we shall be relieved of that much in the way of opposition. We shall be able to go forward with the endorsement of the present Prime Minister of all that in that particular has been said on this side.

Mr. BENNETT: He has not endorsed what has been said on the other side; he has made his own statement. Do not try the Sutherland report over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend will hear all he wants to hear about South Oxford to-night. After six o'clock to-night he will be silent about South Oxford for the rest of his life.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he will continue to expose just what was done at South Oxford and he will do it in a few minutes too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he has the desire to speak, we shall hear from him before six o'clock, because he certainly won't want to say much about South Oxford after that time.

As regards the endorsation by the Prime Minister of what was said from this side, may I read to the house what I said last Monday? I believe it was on Wednesday that the Prime Minister made the statement he would favour an amendment to the British North America Act which would lead to these social services being administered under a national scheme. On April 9, 1934, that is on Monday of last week, as reported in Hansard at page 1983, it will be seen that I made the following statement:

> I urged at the very first session that these grants in aid to the provinces should be stopped pending the calling of a conference between the dominion and provincial governments to see whether it was not possible to have some arrangement made whereby the dominion could assume a large number of obligations for relief in its different forms—social insurance in its various aspects—taking them over as a national obligation and in return obtaining agreements from the provinces to amend their powers of taxation in some directions, or making concessions with respect to future subsidies. My hon. friends opposite will remember that I spoke over and over again about the inevitable consequences of continuing grants in aid at a time like this, pointing out that they meant that sooner or later the public treasury would be depleted beyond all expectation. I was hooted at by hon. gentlemen opposite for repeating this observation so often, but the force of it is coming home to them now when it is too late. I suggested then that we should seek an amendment to the British North America Act inasmuch as this question was likely to present itself with increasing urgency with time. I urged that we should at once take steps, in conference with the provinces, and by whatever course might be deemed necessary, to see whether the British North America Act could not be so amended as to give the federal government larger powers with respect to social and industrial legislation in order that we might have uniformity of laws throughout the dominion, the provinces being relieved of some obligations, having them made federal charges, and the provinces on their part foregoing, if that was equitable, their subsidies either in whole or in part.

Could any declaration be clearer than that? I have made it in different forms during the last four years, and I made it specifically in this house on Monday last. Now the Prime Minister comes along with a statement as though the government were responsible for a policy which would lead to the British North America Act being amended in order that Canada might have a plan of national social service legislation that would serve to bring about more in the way of uniformity among the laws of the country and less in the way of expenditure of public money for the services that are being rendered. At any rate that much of good has come out of the discussion. The rest of it, so far as anything done by hon. gentlemen opposite is concerned, has been only to help to maintain this power of independence of parliament on the part of the executive, instead of seeking to have the executive continue to be as at all times it should be, responsible to the House of Commons and through the House of Commons to the people. In the circumstances I desire to conclude what I have to say by moving:

> That the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instruction that they have power to amend it by eliminating from it the clause which gives to the governor in council the power, when parliament is not in session to pass orders in council under the provision respecting peace, order and good government, and by eliminating from it such provisions as tend to deprive the House of Commons of its due control over the expenditure of public moneys and taxation.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to traverse at length the observations of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King). I have only to say with respect to what I said in connection with the British North America Act I but repeated what I had said years ago, not last week, nor the week before nor the year before. While it may sooth the vanity of the right hon. gentleman to believe that his observations brought about the statement that I made, I can assure him that what I said was in reply to observations of the right hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I merely stated what it is well known I have stated on several occasions. I think it was rather lacking in a sense of high responsibility for the right hon. gentleman to say that an effort has been made to create prejudice against the province of Quebec. The truth is that the premier of Quebec, following right after the statement that I made in this house, attacked my observations, and in the paper that I read the other evening, the Tribune, a French paper, published in Sherbrooke, the attacks were made against myself and the government because we had suggested that the act should be amended. Under the portrait of Premier Taschereau printed in that paper he was held out as being the champion, the defender, of the rights of his country, the protector of the rights of minorities, while in the statement made by myself in the house I was particularly careful to deal with that very point. I merely mention that because it does seem to me to be unworthy of one occupying the high position the hon. gentleman does, one who has been a Prime Minister of this country, to suggest that in the statement made in this house, which every member of the house heard, an effort is being made to create prejudice against the province of Quebec.

May I go a step further? The right hon. gentleman before he left office called a conference of the premiers of the provinces to discuss the amendment of the British North America Act; and a report was made, which is to be found in yonder library, and it will be found there that the result of his efforts was nothing, absolutely nil. He accomplished not a thing. That record may be read by anyone who desires to read it. The conference was abortive. And the reason was obvious.

Coming into office directly after, when the question of relief became an all-absorbing one, we discussed, as has been known to every member of this house, the question whether or not the federal government or the several provinces should be responsible for the administration of relief. And the several provinces disclaimed any intention to permit the federal power to exercise administrative privileges within their jurisdiction. And it is known in every province in Canada that while some of the provinces were not unwilling that such power should be entrusted to the federal authorities and that there should be a centralized administration of relief, there were others who as strongly insisted that it should not be so. And those others were the most powerful in point of population and wealth in the confederacy. So at that time we did not think, nor do I now, that in a time of distress and depression it would be possible to bring about a successful conference for amendment of the British North America Act when such an attempt failed in quiet times. I think almost every member of this house will agree that that is so. There is nothing new in the statement that the British North America Act should be amended, nor in the statement that I have said it should be amended. My saying so dates back to years before I came to this chamber. I had hoped that at the conference that the right hon. gentleman held when he occupied the position of Prime Minister he would have been able to bring about an agreement as to what the changes should be. But I say to him now, and I say to this house what every member of the house must know, that a federal commission could not function throughout this dominion unless the provinces were willing that it should, and the provinces were not and are not willing. Year after year they have stated that they desire to conduct their own relief measures in their own way, and they have done so. But the devastation wrought in Saskatchewan by nature necessitated federal relief on a very substantial scale, and other provinces were given financial aid for their own purposes and other purposes because if we helped one we should help the other. In other words their contention has been that wherever relief is necessary—and of that they are the sole judges under the constitution—it is the concern of the municipalities first, then the provinces; and the dominion, because of the magnitude of the obligations, makes grants in aid. There could be no national commission administering relief in Canada unless all the provinces were agreed. And the provinces, I repeat, have not agreed, although we were willing to undertake the responsibility. There were some provinces that were anxious that we should, but unless all were agreed, it was impossible. And the right hon. gentleman found at conferences he held in this city with the provinces to bring about amendments to the British North America Act that he could not and did not succeed. Where in quiet times it was impossible to succeed I suggest that in times of great depression no one would undertake to bring a contentious matter such as that into the realm of discussion with respect to matters of relief.

Secondly, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is reported to have said that all the expenditures were laid on the table of this house and that the details have always been available to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not have before me what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The statement is here.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is marked in red at the bottom of that page.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is reported as saying that:

> . . . every single item was brought before parliament and was laid on the table. If he had wanted, Mr. King could have brought before the public accounts committee any one of the items that were piled probably ten feet deep. . . .

I hold in my hand the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief of March 1, 1932, and in that are all the details of the expenditures that were made by the federal government or to which they contributed, page after page, that was laid on the table of this house in 1932. I hold in my hand the report for 1933, the details are there, all the expenditures that were made, in great detail too, giving it by months in this case, month after month. Here is the original of 1930. There in those three reports are the details of federal expenditures and the works to which the moneys of this country were applied in connection with relief measures in detail. To that is to be added that the orders in council that have been laid upon the table of the house have contained a statement of the sums which were taken from the consolidated fund on the authority of the orders in council, for no money can be withdrawn from the consolidated fund except through these orders in council. Every one of them has been laid upon the table. So that with these three reports—I think there is a later one for this year, not yet laid upon the table—with these reports and the orders in council you have a complete record of federal expenditures in connection with unemployment relief.

Mr. EULER: Do the reports to which my right hon. friend refers include not only the expenditures made directly out of the federal treasury on federal works but do they also include details of expenditures made to which the federal government contributed through the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Just to show that at least one distinguished member of this house has not given much attention to these matters let me refer to the statement having to do with the province of Ontario, at page 38. I find the heading, "Municipal Works," and there are four columns giving the municipal, provincial and federal proportions and showing the total expenditure. Here are the statements as to each individual work.

Mr. EULER: Not in detail.

Mr. BENNETT: The same detail that occurs in every other statement made to this house. The schedule number is shown, and I find all the different headings; provincial works, trans-Canada highway, Manitoba municipal works, and so on. There are pages of these municipal works, giving all these details. The point that was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was this, that had the right hon. gentleman desired to bring the public accounts committee together of course that committee would have dealt with all these matters, but that committee has never been called into session since these relief measures were begun.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was asked for the other night.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, and I agreed to the request made by the right hon. gentleman. When I was in opposition the public accounts committee, if called into session at all, was called at the instance of the opposition. The opposition is the body that investigates. Have they investigated a single expenditure? Have they called the public accounts committee together? Have they taken any of the steps that by the constitution are provided? Have they taken the steps indicated under the authority of Colonel Durell and of Redlich? The public accounts committee is the committee to deal with this matter. When I hear the right hon. gentleman cry aloud, in the name of freedom and of liberty, I recall the words of the great poet:

> And freedom shrieked—as Kosciusko fell!

Notwithstanding all that, my right hon. friend has not seen fit to do more than just talk; that is all. He never even suggested that the committee should meet to deal with these matters. I do say, sir, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was absolutely right when he said, "Here are the details" and these details are fuller than is usual with respect to expenditures of this kind. The schedule number is given in each instance, and the orders in council under which the sum totals were paid have been filed in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my right hon. friend for the moment? He referred to Durell and Redlich in the matter of the control by parliament of expenditures. What Redlich and Durell say is that parliament should insist on itemized amounts at the time moneys are being appropriated and before the expenditures are made. That is the only real control parliament can have.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I used to say to the right hon. gentleman about the Montreal harbour bridge. It is passing strange how interested he becomes in these academic applications of principles when he is out of power. It is passing strange how he neglects them when he is in office. It is passing strange that he should talk about a blank cheque to-day when he took from parliament a blank cheque under which more than $19,000,000 was spent, without anything being indicated as to how large the amount was to be when he took the cheque. Why this sudden conversion? Have we converted him by what we have done and said so that he realizes the necessity now of relying upon parliamentary control in dealing with these matters? I could name many other instances which occurred when he was in office; there is nothing new about this method. Whenever he wanted to do it in connection with railways he did so. What about the three steamships built on the Pacific coast, the three steamers about which the Minister of Railways said he did not know the money was to be spent for that purpose? What about the order in council for the hotel that was to be built in Vancouver, in connection with which the expenditure has amounted to twice the sum contemplated by the order in council, which was cancelled? What about these things? "Consistency, thou art a jewel." When I hear, in that perfervid oratory of the right hon. gentleman, talk about the departure from principles and the injury done to the body politic, and how future generations will rise up with these precedents to the great danger of democracy I ask who, for nine years, taught democracy the lesson? Look at that harbour bridge in Montreal. When the Minister of Finance delivers his budget address he will show that one of the reasons for putting a tax upon the Canadian people was to find half a million dollars for that bridge, after giving credit for the amounts received from the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. Was there any talk then about Durell? Were there any observations then about Redlich? Were any statements made then about the necessity of putting in the measure the sum of money to be spent? And what is more there never has been the audit that was provided for in this case.

These are facts to which I direct attention; that was fact No. 2, and now I proceed to deal with fact No. 3. It is said that the blank cheque is detrimental to the interests of the country as a whole. The other evening I explained that any statement in a bill that a minimum sum of money is available is but an invitation to the provinces to see to it that the whole of that sum is expended. I did not expect then to receive approval from such a high source as the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), who stated that this was the most powerful argument that could be made against stating a specific sum, and that he wholly agreed, that this was his view also. Most thoughtful men believe this is so. So far as peace, order and good government is concerned, I merely point out in regard to this matter that it has been discussed and re-discussed and that everything has been said about it that could be said. The right hon. gentleman has been even reading his own speeches to this house lest we forget what was said on previous occasions. This afternoon we heard him read the speech he made on Monday last, only a week ago. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) read three of these speeches by the right hon. gentleman the other night, so altogether it seems to me that Hansard will well preserve all that might be usefully said with respect to this matter.

Now I should like to say a word with respect to the audit. The right hon. gentleman has said that the auditor general made certain test audits, on the strength of which he wrote letters. I say, as I said in the house the other evening, that the facts do not warrant the allegations made by that gentleman; I say that frankly. Here is the document upon which the Minister of Labour was supposed to act, in part; it is the report of the Department of Labour on direct relief expenditures in the province of Ontario.

Exhibit A is the report to the Minister of Finance dated December 27, 1933, and signed by Georges Gonthier, auditor general. I find here a report to the auditor general from Edmund E. Stockton, dated August 15, 1933. Mr. Stockton was named by the auditor general as his representative to make the investigation in Ontario. Mr. Stockton made the investigation; he made his report on August 15, 1933, and so little did the auditor general regard the irregularities that he sent it to the Minister of Finance on the 27th day of December, 1933. That was the nervous anxiety he felt for the body politic in the expenditure of public money; the report was not transmitted to the Minister of Finance until December 27. Then I turn to the report itself; I think it might be well to look at it, because some parts of it are very important. These audits were made by Mr. Stockton in the following communities:

Almonte	Orillia
Arnprior	Oshawa
Barrie	Perth
Belleville	Peterborough
Bowmanville	Pembroke
Brampton	Port Hope
Brockville	Prescott
Carleton Place	Preston
Cobourg	Refrew
Cornwall	Smith's Falls
Galt	Stratford
Guelph	Trenton
Kitchener	Waterloo
Lindsay	Whitby.

After going into the accounts of these municipalities and pointing out some minor improvement, these are the closing words of his report, which appear at page 4:

> Subject to the above observations I am of the opinion that in the municipalities visited the inspection and audit by provincial inspectors is sufficient to safeguard the interests of the federal treasury.

Those were his words. Then, the last paragraph:

> I desire to express my appreciation of the courtesy extended to me by the various provincial and municipal officials and others whom I interviewed during my visits to the offices mentioned in this report.
>
> Respectfully submitted,
> Edmund E. Stockton.

He goes on to describe the methods which have been adopted, and to show what was being done by the inspectors to ascertain whether or not expenditures were in proper form. That was the summary he made.

Now, I put this to the House of Commons again: The auditors of the provinces in my judgment are men of reputation and of honour, and I have no reason to believe that the municipal authorities are other than men of honour. The provinces being responsible for the expenditures, in the sense of having undertaken by agreement to supply us with certificates signed by provincial auditors and by the provinces themselves, I still believe that the federal exchequer was properly protected. And if it had not been, as I indicated the other evening, the provinces must refund us the money. The auditor general's letters have been very sweeping in their statements, and he will have to endeavour to justify them before the public accounts committee. If they are not different from what I have seen he will have great difficulty in doing it. That is the other side of the question. Why have we had delays in receiving accounts from the province of Quebec? Why did we not receive any accounts from July until only the other morning? Why? Because the province of Quebec has an auditor who was not willing to certify accounts until he was satisfied they were correct. He has not certified accounts which he did not believe were correct. That was the reason for the delay,—because he had to satisfy himself. He knew he was pledging himself, his reputation and his name to this particular matter. There is the story. All I can say is this, that to assert there has been negligence requires greater proof than I, at least, have seen evidence of. If there is one thing in the world I have endeavoured to be particularly careful about, it has been the administration of the finances of this country. When I say that in every instance a certificate was prepared we provided that there should be a certificate by the auditor of the province, and signed by the province, I believed that we had taken all the steps which were necessary. It may well be that there may be some deception here and there. I suppose it is within the memory of hon. members in this house that even in the Dominion of Canada auditors have been deceived extending over a period of years, and that the offender was at last found out. There is no promise of infallibility either in connection with the man who spends money or the man who checks the expenditure of money. All one can do is to ascertain the extent to which sound business rules have prevailed. Where there were expenditures made by the municipalities and certified to by the provincial auditor, that the total expenditure was x and the share of the dominion was y, and where we paid y because of the certificate given by the auditor of the province, it would be difficult to say that in that step there was any fraud or negligence, or a disregard of ordinary business rules. It may well be, as shown in connection with the prosecutions carried on in the province of Ontario, and one or two other provinces, that there were individuals who endeavoured deliberately to defraud the country. But the fraud was on the municipalities and the provinces, and when the provinces found it out they took the necessary steps to expose it. So far as our accounts are concerned adjustments immediately followed, because we are in the happy position of being able to retain moneys which by investigation it is found have been improperly paid to the provinces, it being remembered that the cheque of the dominion goes to the provinces and not to the municipalities. Therefore, as between the provinces and ourselves, any difficulty of that kind can be overcome.

There is another matter to which I was rather surprised the right hon. gentleman referred. He read from section 7 of the bill now before the house, and if he had taken the trouble to look at the interpretation act he would have found that the section in this measure is that found in all such statutes. It merely provides that anything which has been done by regulation, before it has been repealed shall not be vitiated by reason of the repeal. It is a standing rule of interpretation in our statutes. The section is as follows:

All orders and regulations of the governor in council made hereunder shall have the force of law and may be varied, extended or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation; but if any order or regulation is varied, extended or revoked, neither the previous operation thereof nor anything duly done thereunder shall be affected thereby, nor shall any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued, accruing or incurred thereunder be affected by any such variation, extention or revocation.

It is true that the right hon. gentleman is not a member of the legal profession, but he has had a wide experience, and he graduated in law. He knows well, or should know, that that provision is found in the revised statutes of our country, and is a rule in interpretation which has statutory force and effect. It has to be included in all matters of this kind. Wherever a statute provides that regulations shall be made under its provisions, this clause is inserted to protect those who act under the regulation before it has been either amended, revoked or altered. That is all there is to it.

But, much as was my surprise that the right hon. gentleman should make such observations as he did with respect to section 7, I confess I cannot understand why he should have suggested to this House of Commons the possibility that under the provision for peace, order and good government we could extend the lifetime of parliament. Who knows better than he does that that is in the British North America Act; who knows better than he does that that is an imperial statute; who knows better than he does that a delegated power conferred upon an executive can never be higher than the power granted to the parliament which confers it. As this parliament itself could not extend its lifetime, except under the provisions set forth in the British North America Act, it did seem to me to be playing rather small politics to suggest to the people of Canada that under the provision for peace, order and good government this government could extend the lifetime of parliament. I think that careful—shall I say thoughtful—people who read that statement will place a great discount on everything which the right hon. gentleman has said. For it cannot be suggested that anything is added by way of argument when one suggests something which every hon. member in this house knows cannot be done by this parliament itself, much less by the executive, under a delegated power.

Then the other suggestion was that we had taken the power to disallow provincial legislation, under the grant of power to legislate for peace, order and good government. There again it must be obvious to even the most thoughtless member—if there are any, and I trust there are not—that it would not be possible for us to exercise any such power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made no reference to disallowing.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was suggested; I did not say the suggestion was made by the right hon. gentleman. The power of disallowance is in the British North America Act itself, and that statute stands until it is amended by the power which created or enacted it. We cannot amend it; we cannot alter it; we cannot repeal it. The power that is there conferred is a power that this legislation does not touch, nor does this legislation touch any power which is in the constitution to be exercised by the parliament at Westminster, nor does it touch any powers that are conferred by the constitution exclusively upon the legislatures. What it does is, within narrower limits than those suggested by some hon. gentlemen, to confer upon the executive the power to make regulations for the peace, order and good government of the country under conditions in which it may seem necessary to the executive to exercise such power. But those powers as defined by the privy council are much less broad than some hon. gentlemen have suggested. I cannot in the very nature of things make a legal argument to this house showing that the limitations imposed upon the words are far greater than would occur to the ordinary individual not trained in the interpretation of the constitution. If hon. gentlemen are interested they will find that they are the opening words of section 91 of the British North America Act itself so far as the power is concerned, and the enumeration of the powers in section 91 is an enumeration of powers that does not limit the generality of the terms of the general power conferred. The jurisdiction conferred upon the executive by this parliament under peace, order and good government is, as I have said, under the decisions of the privy council a rather restricted jurisdiction. But it is sufficient to serve our purposes in the event of any untoward circumstances requiring the exercise of such power.

The other matters that were referred to I think have been sufficiently dealt with in what has already been said in other years with respect to this legislation. I repeat, this legislation is not sought for any purpose other than the public good. I repeat, parliament is being asked to confer authority upon the executive peradventure it might be required. If necessary it is there.

I am not going to follow the example of the right hon. gentleman and discuss the marketing bill which stands for second reading to-day. But this I will say, that in all the legislation that was passed during the nine years the right hon. gentleman was in office, wherever it became essential or necessary to clothe the executive with power to make either regulations or rules or to do any acts that might be essential for the well-being of the country, that power will be found conferred upon the executive. No hon. member can tell me that there is any difference between conferring an unlimited power upon a harbour commission to guarantee bonds for the construction of a bridge and the conferring of power by the parliament of Canada upon the executive to take necessary action to provide relief for Canadians who are in necessitous circumstances. The principle is the same. Then why not frankly admit it and say: The principle is the same but we think that this power may peradventure be abused.

I said the other evening, and I say now, that no hon. gentleman can point to a single abuse of that power nor to any usurpation of authority nor to any deprivation of rights nor to any effort, successful or unsuccessful, on the part of the executive to do any act or thing except for the good of this dominion—not one; and I repeat that, in order that there may be no misapprehension with respect to the matter.

I have spoken at greater length than I anticipated but when one realizes the unreality of a discussion such as this, realizes that all these things that are now being condemned were once being done by the right hon. gentleman who now condemns them and that he would have to do them again to-morrow if he were similarly situated, that all these high heroics and histrionic efforts are, shall I say, but a passing phase of the work of an opposition that regards it as its sole duty at all times to oppose, when it is suggested that because of something said in this house last week this government or myself have learned something—I am always learning something, Mr. Speaker, and I trust that I always shall as long as I live—but with no desire to cast aspersions on the right hon. gentleman at all, I say to him that I have not learned anything from him with respect to matters of this kind. I say that without intending offence. When he suggests that because of something he said in the house last week I have changed my mind, the chances are that because he said it my mind would be more likely to remain just where it was. He should not betray his anger and annoyance because there are others who have as advanced thoughts as himself—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say changed his mind; I said cleared his mind.

Mr. BENNETT: —and because others may have thought of these things even before he did. He should not think he has a copyright on ideas and a patent on expressions, and I suggest to thim that he be tolerant enough to believe that there are others who sometimes think and have views and opinions; and because others have thought and concluded and expressed their conclusions, if they agree with his own it does not follow that they have come about by reason of listening to what he said. That is what he asks this house to believe, but I think it would be placing too great a strain upon the credulity of the house and the country to believe it. With that I shall leave this matter, Mr. Speaker, believing that it is more important to get the third reading of the measure than to discuss further the heroics of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have had very little to say with respect to the measure now before the house. I do not desire to detain the house on the third reading of this bill but I should like in a word to make the position of some of us clear with regard to our votes upon it.

This is a case in which one might perhaps almost be justified in giving either an affirmative or a negative vote. We are anxious to have a very large measure of relief, the largest measure of relief possible, and for that reason we might very well welcome a bill of this character.

Further, I have not been tremendously impressed by some of the arguments advanced by the official opposition. I do not desire to discuss to-day the question of democracy. In my judgment democracy does not necessarily mean that every measure must be submitted to parliament or to the people. Democracy in my opinion is not at all inconsistent with prompt and efficient action on the part of the executive. But I have to oppose this bill because I believe it is hopelessly inadequate as a relief measure. After all these years, when the government have had full opportunity of working out some constructive scheme, we are still simply being asked to acquiesce in the general idea that the administration is going to do something about the situation. When the measure was first introduced I pointed out that we had had no definite intimation as to what the government proposed to do with regard to a program of public works. I think we ought to have had that at the very beginning of this session. No hint of it is contained in this measure.

Further, we have had before us for many years the promise that there would be some kind of unemployment insurance scheme during the lifetime of this administration. There is nothing whatever contained in this measure with regard to that.

We have had this present government denouncing the dole and yet itself resorting to one of the worst forms of the dole that I have ever heard of, a dole that is absolutely insufficient to provide for the needs of large numbers of Canadian families in this country. I receive daily the most pathetic letters asking that something should be done to help to prevent the breaking up of homes and to give adequate food to the children of the citizens of this country. I do not consider that the measure now before us provides that kind of thing and because I feel it is inadequate, I cannot vote in favour of it.

I object to having these wide powers for peace, order and good government interjected into a relief measure. If we were facing a great emergency it might be necessary for the government to assert certain of the powers which it has under the British North America Act, but I protest once more against a government taking powers of this kind under a relief measure. For these reasons, some of us will have to vote against the bill although we are most heartily in favour of a relief measure.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in whose name Bill No. 42, respecting relief, stands has moved that the bill be now read a third time. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has moved an amendment that it be sent back to the committee. Before a vote is taken I should like to take a few moments in making an explanation to the Minister of Labour of something which occurred in this chamber a few days ago when the bill was being discussed in committee. At that time I had received word from my constituents asking me, as a member of parliament, to bring before the government the need of certain relief for which they were asking. I desire to assure the Minister of Labour that in doing this I did not intend any discourtesy either to him or to any member of the ministry. My constituents who were represented by the mayor and town council of Canso also did not intend that there should be any discourtesy towards the Minister of Labour or the members of the government. It was pointed out that this matter should have been brought to the attention of the ministry direct and in order to show that the town council of Canso were considerate in the way they brought forward this matter, I should like to read a dispatch which appeared in the Halifax Herald of April 13, 1934. This is dated Canso, April 12, and reads:

> A special meeting of town council was held Tuesday to decide what action would be taken to help fishermen obtain gear. After considerable discussion, a resolution was passed that the federal government be asked to establish a fund of not less than $15,000 under the proposed marketing and credit legislation, through a system of loans for purchase and equipment of boats. Copies of the telegrams were sent to Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance; William Duff, M.P. for Antigonish-Guysborough and William A. Found, Deputy Minister of Fisheries.

In addition to my receiving the telegram which I read to the committee, according to this dispatch the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who is the minister from Nova Scotia, received a similar telegram as did the deputy minister of fisheries. No doubt that latter gentleman passed on the telegram he received to his minister, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau). In addition to my receiving this information, it was forwarded to members of the government which I think proves conclusively that the mayor and town council of Canso did not intend any discourtesy in the manner in which they brought up this matter. The dispatch continues:

Yesterday Mayor Croucher received a reply from Mr. Rhodes pointing out that there is at present no legislation and no vote available which would enable the requested assistance to be rendered by the federal government and suggesting that as the matter appeared to be urgent the council approach the provincial government.

It is not my purpose at this time to discuss whether this should be done by the federal or by the provincial government, my only purpose being to show the Minister of Labour that no discourtesy to him or to any other member of the ministry was intended by the town council. In connection with the criticism of the manner in which I brought up this matter, I should like to read a telegram which I received on Saturday morning and which I think proves conclusively that as far as my constituents are concerned they think that I did the right and proper thing in bringing up this matter when the relief measure was under discussion.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: We all admit that.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) admits that and he agrees with what the mayor has to say. The telegram is addressed to me and reads:

Canso appreciates your championship our cause. Herewith copy message sent to premier to-night. "Canso resents implication that presentation our case unfortunate as reported in daily press. Matter was presented to Honourable E. N. Rhodes, deputy minister of fisheries, and to William Duff our representative and feel Mr. Rhodes should have informed house to this effect. This is matter in which politics should play no part."

The telegram ends with the word "regards," which I presume is intended for myself, and is signed by L. R. Croucher, Mayor of Canso. With this explanation I hope it will be realized that in bringing this matter to the attention of parliament I was doing only my plain duty to my constituents.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested this afternoon in listening to the definition given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) of the constitutional rights of the dominion and the provinces. I was interested also in the answers which the Prime Minister gave on Friday evening to a question put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury). It should not be forgotten that the dominion is the creation of the provinces. There never would have been a dominion government and we would not be now sitting in this house if the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had not agreed upon our creation. The powers which we exercise here were exercised formerly by the provincial governments—our powers are delegated powers. Quebec has been mentioned and I would say that the rights of that province are common to all provinces.

The greatest fights since confederation have been carried on by the English-speaking provinces. The warrior bold and the great champion of provincial rights was Sir Oliver Mowat who downed Sir John A. Macdonald in connection with many bills with regard to provincial rights. Who forgets the great fight carried on by Manitoba with regard to its educational rights? Who forgets the great fight carried on by New Brunswick on that same question? It is strange, but it happens that in this country the greatest fights we have had have been on the educational question. The population of Canada is composed mainly of two of the leading races of the world. Without Quebec there never would have been a confederation because Quebec, being situated in the middle, immedately between the maritime provinces and Ontario, consented to confederation, and in doing so gave up many rights. When Quebec consented to confederation it was in full possession of its powers, but it abrogated many of them in the hope and with the promise made to Sir George Etienne Cartier, Sir Etienne Paschal Taché, leaders of the Conservative party in power at that time, to Antoine Aimé Dorion, to the Fourniers and the others, that not only the letter but the spirit of the law would be respected. I am proud to be able to say that to-day it is the boast of my province that it has carried out that undertaking of confederation not only to the letter but in the spirit also. If anybody wishes to be informed on that point, let him go to Quebec and inquire of the English-speaking citizens of that province; let him inquire of the Council of Public Instruction, the Protestant section, how the educational law is being carried out there and he will find in Quebec a breadth of view which I hope will some day prevail in every province.

Let us remember that we are Canadians. We are all proud of the country from which we sprang. Those who came from French stock have nothing to be ashamed of nor have those of British extraction. While we have had in this country men from all races, the French Canadian has played his part, not only in establishing this dominion but in its constitutional development; in the parliamentary field no man has ever surpassed those who have been produced by the French Canadian people. Of course Quebec was then a minority; it is a minority still and when questions arise as to amending bargains, constitutions, contracts, because the terms of confederation after all constitute a contract, it is only fair and reasonable that the people who will be primarily affected do not want to consent to any radical changes without knowing what they mean. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) say to-day that this is not the time, when the country is in the position it is, to undertake to bring about those changes in a haphazard fashion or merely for the purpose of bringing them about. If you want to do anything in this or any parliament, the legislation which you may introduce must be backed by public opinion. If we had had the same cooperation at the beginning of the war as we had later we would have avoided many unfortunate happenings. War was thrust upon us by Germany; we did not seek it. I was not elected in 1911 to go to war with Germany; I had no mandate from my constituents to send one, two, three or half a dozen contingents overseas, but we had no choice; we were at war. Canada was a British possession and had Britain been defeated, the German warships could have ascended the St. Lawrence and laid in destruction every town and village in our province. We had to face the ordeal as it existed.

Canada, like all other countries, especially like all confederations, will survive only if there is mutual give and take. If we want our rights respected we must respect those of others and I am glad to know the feeling of the leaders of the two great parties in this house and even of the third leader, because the leader of the C.C.F. has spoken along the same lines, in regard to tinkering with the constitution. The constitution has been amended on several occasions, and I have been in the house when amendments have been made. That was done by consent. Many amendments to the British North America Act are to be found in the statutes, but they were probably agreed to by the dominion and the provinces themselves; there was no trouble about that. The people of any province, when a matter is brought to their attention and it is shown to be necessary in the public interest, will consent to an amendment. The constitution, of course, is not the laws of the Medes and Persians; it can be amended, but it can be amended only with the consent of the provinces because it was made with their consent, and under the rules of any game, no contract can be changed without the consent of the parties interested.

I am an old timer. When I came into parliament in 1900, we could not vote a dollar without its being placed in the estimates, passed through committee of supply and committee of ways and means and put down in black and white. I have heard debates here last for days and days in regard to very small amounts, a question of principle being involved. In the past parliament has abrogated its rights and we are abrogating them again to-day. The Prime Minister has said that no attempt has been made to go beyond the terms of the power that he has; that in what he desires to do there has been no abuse contemplated. But the principle is there. By the measure we are passing to-day we are putting into the hands of the cabinet, a committee of parliament, power to do anything they like to do under the sovereign for the peace, order and good government of Canada. That covers the whole field. In other words, it is a repetition of the War Measures Act. That act, which I opposed in the house and which was strongly opposed by the Liberal party generally, gave to the government of the country full power of awarding contracts without tenders and, in fact, of doing anything under the sun. Under this clause the same power is being taken to-day and that is the main objection I have to the measure. We are all in favour of relief; we have all said so and we say so again, but something which should be sacred in every parliament is that the authority which raises taxation should have control over the spending of the money. We are abrogating that right. A great deal of federal money has been spent in my constituency; we have to vote for it but it is expended by the provincial government. The people of my constituency elected me to represent them in the federal parliament, but we simply raise the money here, send it to another government to spend and then, when the spending has been done, we are called upon to vote for an expenditure about which we know nothing.

This is on a par with the administration of our railways. We were told only a few days ago that the committee that looks into the estimates of the Canadian National Railways would be called. I have asked in parliament many questions that as a representative of the people I have to ask as to how this money and that has been spent and how much has been spent in my constituency. This question concerns fundamental principles of government. I have been, however, refused an answer because I am told that it is not in the public interest. We have taken the creatures, the servants of this house, this parliament, and we have placed them above us, whether it be the chairman of the international joint commission, or of the railway commission, or of the pension commission, or of the civil service commission, or of any of the, I was going to say, one hundred and one commissions that we have created, because we now have government in Canada by order in council and by commissions. We have abrogated our rights, and that is contrary to the very essence of parliamentary government. The principles involved would take too long to state and explain now, nor is this the time to do so. I merely want to register another protest against departing from a principle which has been sacred in the history of the British constitution. It was asserted in England for generations and for centuries that there should be no taxation without representation. The people's representatives secured control of the public purse, and at the close of every parliament the last words that come from the representative of the king are the assent which he gives to the supply bill. Now we are abandoning that control. Those who come after us may blame us for that, but we are doing so voluntarily, except those of us who protest, of whom I am one.

Not only are we going to advance money to the provinces, which of course is a way of giving to the provinces money that we should spend ourselves, but the government are taking power to grant money by way of loans, guarantees or otherwise, to the Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. Then why should they not do so for the fishermen's associations and for the various associations of farmers in the eastern provinces? It may be said: Well, wheat is the great product of the country; millions of dollars worth are produced by the western people. As the Prime Minister said the other day, there is no country in the world in which so much wealth has been raised by so few people in so short a time as that from the head of the great lakes to the foot of the Rockies, the great wheat fields of Canada. During all my time in parliament I have been prepared to support all measures for the benefit of the west. Let us never forget that it was the Liberal party and its policies which placed a million people in that western country. I had the honour many years ago when I was deputy speaker of this house of attaching my signature to the bills creating the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. So the Liberal party did what it could for the west in those days. To-day it is being blamed in many speeches for building too many railways. There was a time when every member from western Canada was predicting that one transcontinental railway was not enough, that two were necessary and that the time would come when half a dozen would not be too many to carry the output of that great prairie country. The west is but beginning after all. How much is under cultivation at the present time? Not more than fifteen or twenty per cent of the land that could be made productive. But that is another question.

I want to refer to the wants of my own people. As I said on Friday, I have received over a hundred petitions from all parts of the province of Quebec, signed by farmers, in favour of the fisheries of the Gaspe peninsula and of Quebec. I want to read just one of these petitions so that it will be on record and in the hope that when the Prime Minister comes to afford the relief he intends to afford under this bill he will not forget the settlers in this country, whose ancestors came to Canada many years ago, and who are now in deep need; men who have not been favoured with the bountiful crops raised in the west, who do not possess such fertile lands, but who nevertheless have stood by and done their share for the upbuilding of Canada. I should like to see the government do what it can under these relief measures to bring about a better understanding between the dominion government and the provincial government regarding this moot question of the fisheries of Quebec, as to which at present there is conflict. In view of the appointment by the Prime Minister of the committee on price spreads this question should be inquired into in the maritime provinces as well as in Quebec. I think it my duty to read this petition.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but that is not the way to present a petition to the house. There is a proper method of doing so, as no one knows better than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARCIL: This is not a petition addressed to parliament, it is rather in the shape of a resolution adopted by these people. I want to read it so that the government may be apprised of the situation in which these people find themselves.

(Translation):

Maritime fisheries of the Province of Quebec.

Whereas the maritime fisheries of the province of Quebec, located on the St. Lawrence river, the Gulf and Bay des Chaleurs, interest a population of at least 100,000 souls partly depending on the fisheries for a livelihood.

Whereas, since 1922, the government of the province of Quebec have taken over the fisheries on the high sea.

Whereas it is difficult for the Quebec government, without aid, to give the service supplied by Ottawa, in connection with maritime fisheries, because such service already exists with its program, experts, scientific institutions, coast-guard vessels, assistance to fishermen and many other facilities which are impossible for the Quebec government to undertake side by side with that established by the Dominion government.

Whereas the federal service extends to the other provinces where fishing on the high sea is carried on, moreover, this service, so highly organized, is partly defrayed by the taxes paid by Quebec and from which the latter receives no benefit.

Whereas the organization of the maritime fisheries on a more profitable basis for the fishermen of the province of Quebec, the theoretical and practical instruction, the establishment of purchasing and marketing co-operative associations can be better undertaken through the medium of the dominion authorities.

Consequently the people of the province of Quebec who depend on our martime fisheries are at a market disadvantage compared with other fishermen of British Columbia and the three maritime provinces.

Therefore, it is moved by....

Seconded by....

And resolved:

That the associations of "l'Union catholique des cultivateurs" on behalf of their members, request the cooperation of the dominion and provincial governments to improve the lot of the maritime fishermen of the province of Quebec.

We respectfully insist that there should be some arrangement between the said governments this year, and we further request if it is necessary, the repeal of the 1922 order in council transferring the exclusive control of the maritime fisheries of Quebec to the provincial government.

We make this request from a purely human, economic and national viewpoint.

We, therefore, beg of the Minister and members, both federal and provincial, to examine this question on its merits, so that both governments may come to an agreement in this connection.

Briefly they ask that there should be co-operation between the federal and the provincial governments in coming to the relief of the fishermen of Quebec who are now in a very, very difficult position. I hope the government will give effect to this view and bring about an understanding by conciliatory methods with the province of Quebec. Quebec at the present time is administering its inland fisheries, but in the maritime part of the province the fisheries were left under the control of the dominion, the Magdalen islands for instance. Naturally the inland fisheries are a matter for the provincial government, but the maritime fisheries should be, I believe, administered jointly by agreement with the province. The Minister of Fisheries for Quebec says, as reported in a Quebec paper two or three days ago, that he had made several attempts to bring about an understanding with the dominion government. I am not familiar with all the negotiations that have taken place, but he claims that so far he has been unable to succeed.

I bring this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister hoping that, in accordance with what he said a short time ago, he will be able to afford relief in cooperation with the provincial government. He cannot do so otherwise because it is a matter of provincial concern with which we would have nothing to do unless these terms relating to peace, order and good government were in the measure. I hope the Prime Minister will give my remarks full consideration and try to bring about an understanding with the government of Quebec.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, any goverment that has had one of its major measures so consistently and strenuously opposed by the opposition as has been the case with this relief bill should not be surprised if we register our last protest on the motion for third reading before the bill passes and goes to the other chamber. That is the usual practice in all similar cases. If the government believe the country is on the way to recovery surely they should be getting away from this class of legislation instead of reverting to it, as they are doing now. Either the government does not believe its own ballyhoo with regard to recovery or it is enacting this legislation, which is more severe than the legislation last year, for some other purpose, and the nearness of an election suggests that that has something to do with it. One of my colleagues was sufficiently good natured to absolve the government from any suspicion of that kind, but I know what this government are capable of doing. Judging from the redistribution bill of last year, which was corrected in two or three particulars in a way as to which I have expressed my appreciation, but which nevertheless was a drastic gerrymander, I say that any government that will take that action will take advantage of this legislation.

There are many ways in which they can do so. We do not forget the wartime election, when certain overseas votes were bunched where they would do the most good. What about the public works program? Can it not be bunched where it will do the most good? If the government are given a free hand and an unnamed amount of money with which to do nearly as they like between now and next session, who can say what may happen? If it is a fact—and it has not been denied—that under this legislation this government can precipitate Canada into a war without calling parliament together, then I am emphatically opposed to it. I do not want to talk about war unnecessarily; I remember the injunction given us some time ago not to talk about war too much. I quite agree, but I can recall the last war, to which the country was committed to the hilt before parliament met. I for one do not want that to occur again, and if this can be done under this legislation—and I believe it can—that alone is sufficient reason for me to make my last protest against it, which I do with all the vigour of which I am capable.

Then there is another point, of which I have spoken at least twice, but the more I think of it the more audacious the conduct of the government seems to have been. I refer to these guarantees in connection with the sale of wheat on the Winnipeg market by Mr. McFarland. Just think of taking the credit of Canada, to an unknown amount, and putting it behind a wheat market stabilization policy with not a report to parliament even once as to the amount involved for three and a half years. I have no doubt the government was well enough intentioned in this matter, but we have had the people's money and the people's credit used continuously for more than three consecutive years, with no accounting to the owners of that credit or the owners of the wheat. The government may have accounted to the pool authorities through Mr. McFarland but they have not accounted to the individual contract signers who owned that wheat, or to parliament. So I repeat that this government, which preaches business ethics to others, is in danger of becoming a castaway itself. They preach nobler ethics for chain stores and mail order houses, but do as they like with unnamed sums of money which they can spend at any time, anywhere, any how. This is done under the direction of one individual, and I do not care how white he is; the whiter he is the worse it is, because he is put in an invidious position in which no straight man would want to be placed, and I do not believe Mr. McFarland wants to be put in that position either. Unquestionably he has the guarantee of this country behind an aggregate credit amounting to at least $150,000,000. That is our guess; we cannot find out the exact amount, so we have to guess at it. Give anybody, with the knowledge of the market that Mr. McFarland unquestionably possesses, control of practically the whole hedging operations of not only the pool but the entire grain trade and he can do as he likes with the option market in regard to jigging it up or down to the advantage of this or the other class of people. I doubt if any hon. member will challenge that statement. Mr. McFarland has almost entire control of the hedging operations of that market. Has he power to throw it in favour of or against any particular class of the community? If he has that power it is no use telling me that he will not use it; if the power is there it is an extremely dangerous power, and I strenuously object to it.

I suppose these words will be interpreted by some as casting some discredit or doubt upon the honour of Mr. McFarland. I am not doing anything of the kind. I happened to have the opportunity at one time of seeing the marvellous vaults of a great insurance company in Montreal. These vaults, with their ponderous electrically operated doors, contained bonds and securities to vast amounts, deposited by many governments and municipalities, corporations, and so forth. I was told that no one, whether an employee or not, ever was given access to those vaults alone. Was that a reflection on the individual, because someone else was sent with him when it was necessary to look into any of those deposits? No, that was a safeguard, and every honourable man in that great insurance company would rather have someone accompany him than have access alone to all those securities. On that occasion I asked a gentleman who was with me how he felt about it, whether he felt that it was a reflection on his honour to have someone accompany him when he went to the vaults. He answered, "No, it is my desire that I should be accompanied; then I will not have to take the whole responsibility alone." So it is with Mr. McFarland. I take the ground, as I think Mr. McFarland would, that he would much rather operate on that market with two or three associates, especially when he is operating with a government guarantee and a continuous account. I do not see why, for the time being, the government could not make Mr. McFarland a member of the board of grain commissioners, which has the confidence of western Canadians to an exceptional and peculiar degree. I think the people there also have enough confidence in Mr. McFarland to believe that if he were added to the board it would make for the better administration of that line of credit. So there would be more confidence throughout the country than is the case when those operations are handled by one man, even though he be the best that ever stood in shoe leather. We do not forget that Winnipeg was recently the home of a man in whom great confidence was reposed, but who failed his friends and his trust. This shows the danger of unnecessarily placing implicit confidence in any one individual. For these reasons I think the government has done itself a great injustice in defiantly refusing to give this house any information with regard to this wheat guarantee. I give the government this last opportunity, which apparently they are not going to take, to tell them that so far as I am concerned the government is the worst friend Mr. McFarland has, although the right hon. Prime Minister is supposed to be the millionaire chum of Mr. McFarland, another millionaire. That will not make the temper of the people any better at this time. I must again avail myself of the opportunity to speak upon this point, although I wish I had been deprived of that opportunity by a candid statement by the Prime Minister. I have been predisposed to look upon Mr. McFarland as an honourable man. But just as it is not fair to give such a trust, alone, to the men in the insurance companies to whom I have referred, who have charge of the vaults and are undoubtedly honourable, so in this instance it is not fair to give such great responsibility to Mr. McFarland alone.

I could go on further and make observations regarding some other guarantees. However the right hon. Prime Minister has said that he does not believe any special power which has been granted to this government has been abused. I cite this particular instance as one in which it has been abused—unnecessarily abused—and the people have been audaciously flouted by being refused information in connection with their own business.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is worthy of some comment, before the house proceeds to third reading. This is one of the most important measures which will come before parliament this session, and the passing of similar legislation is becoming an annual affair. Hon. members interested have in my view a perfect right to express their opinions upon the provisions of the measure now before them. It is quite true that with all the vigour we possess we have opposed the passage of some sections of the bill. We have taken the same action at each session of parliament in which we have considered similar legislation. Further, if we are to have another session of this parliament we will be forced to give further opposition, because I cannot conceive of a complete cure so long as the policies of the present government are in effect.

Without generalizing too much may I state that the government secured its present position by very spacious promises made to the electors. They did not promise to relieve unemployment; they promised to cure it. And not only did they make that promise to the electors in 1930, but they made other promises. They stated that unemployment had reached a stage where it had become a national question, one which was too great for the provinces or municipalities to handle, and which should be assumed by the federal government. On every platform throughout the country they ridiculed the proposals made by the present leader of the opposition. His statement was that in his opinion the relief problem could be handled only as a provincial undertaking, and if the provinces found it too great the federal government would come to the rescue. A great deal of ridicule was heaped upon the heads of the then government by the present leader of the government and his lieutenants. They said, "When we get into office we will cure this unemployment." So strongly did the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) feel upon the point that he said, "Put us in office and we will cure unemployment in three days." I do not happen to have his statement before me, but I have it on my desk upstairs.

Mr. CANTLEY: You would have to go a long way to find that statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can produce it and I do not think the minister will deny it.

Mr. McGIBBON: He said he would pass legislation in three days.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He said he would cure unemployment in three days. That is my statement.

Mr. CANTLEY: You cannot get away with that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I can.

Mr. CANTLEY: No, you cannot.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And I can get away with plenty of others. I do not know whether the hon. member who has just interrupted was or was not one of the guilty ones. I do not suppose he would be, because he is too old at the game to be caught in a tight corner like that.

Mr. CANTLEY: You are trying to get out of it now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I now hold in my hand, as I have at three sessions of parliament, the government's cure for unemployment. It is nothing but the thing they derided, the dole. If one agrees that those unfortunates in the camps under the supervision of the Minister of National Defence are not working on any wage scale, then certainly they must be on the dole. The relief handed out by the provinces and municipalities is nothing but a straight dole. No excuse has been made by the present government for this condition. I believe that the criticism made this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was justified when he said that we expected something more than we have received. That is one criticism I have to offer, and I must criticize further the unfulfilled pledges of this government. Worse than that however they turned about and adopted the very principle they then condemned, namely, relief through the provinces, and by the provinces to the municipalities. How they expect to escape criticism on that score is beyond me. True, they say that at this late date they have discovered it is impossible to act directly because they have not the jurisdiction. I call to their attention however that in some respects they have acted in a direct manner. Certainly the relief offered in the camps is an instance of direct action. In that connection relief has been granted through agencies in the provinces. I wish to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that these were not the policies propounded by the present government but are policies which were derided by them. They have found that when in office they have not been able to carry out their promises.

I am not going to take up the time of the house in a long discussion of these matters, but I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the second important feature of this legislation, namely, the very wide powers sought by the government, despite the fact that they must deal through provincial agencies. What do they want? They want complete power—power to supersede statutes. They want to take unto themselves the only power which parliament has to control the executive. Why do they want this power? They say that in the past they have used it on only one occasion, namely, when Great Britain departed from the gold standard. But year after year they demand this power from the Canadian parliament so that they may have a free hand under the aegis of peace, order and good government to do as they please. They are allowed to do anything they wish under this measure.

I hold in my hand a record showing some of the things for which they have received a blank cheque, and under which they have proceeded to do business. Although I made reference to this point the other day, I shall refer to it again. I shall not take time more than to mention the guarantees to the provinces to assist them through difficult times, but I shall deal at greater length with the government's action in guaranteeing the banks for advances to the Beauharnois power project.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. McGIBBON: What about wheat?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. member refer to the guarantee of the banks in connection with the so-called stabilization of the market?

Mr. McGIBBON: It was to help the western farmer; why differentiate?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is just as obnoxious to say that you delegate to the executive power to guarantee the purchase of wheat as it is to make advances to Beauharnois. It is exactly the same thing. I do not say parliament would have refused these powers, if it had been asked for them—not for a moment. I do not question that there would have been considerable discussion over the question of guaranteeing the banks with respect to advances to Beauharnois to complete construction but—

Mr. McGIBBON: Beauharnois did not originate here.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, but this government took it as its child.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes, it did. Some of these days I shall discuss the matter fully. Then, do you suppose that when a majority of this parliament delegated to their executive the right to make advances for relief purposes anybody had anticipated that they were going to guarantee the accounts of Newfoundland? I question very much if even my hon. friend who is perhaps just as strong a Conservative as I am a Liberal had any anticipation that this government were going to proceed to pledge the credit of Canada outside of this country altogether for the benefit of the sister dominion of Newfoundland. I know that my hon. friend will agree with the next guarantee that I name, that given in respect of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation for the production of steel rails. I am not going to say very much about that except that if such a step had become necessary there was no reason in the world why the government could not have got their following in this house, even if the opposition had objected, to give this guarantee of one million odd dollars. The same thing applies to the advances in respect to the Algoma Steel Corporation and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Outside of the two steel companies there is not a tittle of evidence that these advances were for the purpose of giving employment. It is true that two million dollars was advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of providing employment, but there was no employment at all involved in the guarantee of the sixty million dollar loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway. While I do not wish to be misunderstood or for it to be said that I am opposing these guarantees, I do want it to be distinctly understood that I am opposing the method by which these guarantees were given. The guarantees were given under the provisions of the Unemployment Relief Act which everyone in this house assumed was for the purpose of granting relief to distressed Canadians. Perhaps those institutions come within that category. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the house are opposed to every action of that kind being taken under an unemployment relief measure. We do not say what our action would be if these matters were placed before us, although I for one would have opposed many of them. But I do say that the method of pledging the credit of the people of Canada for such huge amounts as was done under the Unemployment Relief Act should be opposed as strenuously as possible.

The older members of this parliament have some appreciation of the rights of parliament and of the long struggle to obtain them. I for one view with considerable alarm what I see happening all around me these days. I have some appreciation of the battle which the citizens of this and other countries fought for political and individual freedom. But now we have a severe depression and everybody is worried, not only the unemployed, but as I heard stated the other day, many of those engaged in industry from one end of this country to the other because they do not know what next week will bring forth with respect to their particular business. They are in a frame of mind to submit under the present conditions to very drastic action, and I say that this government is taking absolute and full advantage of the state of mind that prevails in this country because they have a very considerable majority in this house.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the statement I am going to make.

Mr. CANTLEY: I know you are going to make it, but that does not make it fair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say it is perfectly fair. Under other conditions I say that the people of this country would not stand for these acts being done. We had one example of the feeling of this country in 1926 when large powers were taken by a majority of this house and exercised by the executive in a manner nothing like so important as this. The people of this country spoke in a very emphatic way upon that occasion when our rights, even in a smaller degree, were attempted to be taken from us. But to-day under this legislation, under the aegis of peace, order and good government this government can do anything. They have all the powers of this parliament conferred upon them, and despite what the Prime Minister said a few evenings ago when he amended section 2 (b) of this act, the executive still have unlimited power conferred upon them under this section. So much for the provision with respect to peace, order and good government.

I turn now to the blank cheque provision. Having been given the right to do anything that parliament has power to do the government are still asking to-day, after four years of experience in administering unemployment relief, that they retain the power, except that the right to deal with private corporations has been deleted from this particular bill, to spend money just as they please. It is all right for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that no case of maladministration can be pointed to, and I am very glad that we cannot. Indeed, if power were taken for that purpose it would be a tragedy. But there is always the temptation when the power exists, and unlimited power is being sought in this bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, the constitution itself is there not only for the protection of the individual but for the protection of the executive itself, and the executive now desires to take away the background of protection which they have in connection with their administrative powers. Under our constitution the executive have no right to spend a single dollar unless it has first been granted to them by parliament in specified amounts, and yet they disregard completely this right which parliament enjoys under our constitution, and which was dearly bought, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that it could not be done were it not for the desperate situation that now exists in this country.

Mr. CANTLEY: It would not have been necessary but for that situation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Possibly not, but I fail to see the necessity for such drastic powers being taken even in the present difficult situation of this country. If the government had continued to come to parliament for a stated sum of money, as they asked for twenty million dollars at the special session in 1930, no one could have had very much criticism to offer, nor was there much criticism offered on that occasion. The government had complete control of the expenditure. True they did not give us details of the expenditure, and since that time up to the present we did not know, and I presume the government did not know, how much it was going to spend in any given year. The government remained the sole arbiter of the amount to be spent, and the sole judge of the necessities of the situation. That is the position they occupy, a position of complete autocracy. The government themselves realize that this is rather a dangerous power now that they see two of the provincial governments at least seizing the like powers from their provincial legislatures. Then this government complains. It is very questionable whether the provinces are within their constitutional rights in so doing, but they are doing it nevertheless, and it is questionable also whether this federal government is within its jurisdiction, but they are doing it because they have a majority behind them which will see them through in putting this act upon the statute books.

Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, we must have relief in Canada. We cannot allow our people to starve. I need not repeat that the policies of this government have added a hundredfold to their difficulties. Yet they refuse to change those policies. It has been mooted that there is to be a change in policy, that we are to have a right-about-face with respect to the most important matter which parliament will have to consider, the fiscal policy. After four years of excessive restrictions upon trade we will welcome with a great deal of happiness any change in the mental attitude of this government towards this important question. I hope that the report is true. Despite the four years in which they have consistently and persistently voted for the continuation of a policy which is so destructive, I suppose the majority will now right-about-face and support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Perhaps for once I may be able to give them some support and my only hope is that the reductions will be reasonable and be able to cure some of the evils from which we are suffering to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wrong.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Someone remarks that I am wrong, and I am a bit afraid that I am. I can scarcely imagine that anything so acceptable would come from the other side of the chamber.

For these reasons I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to the powers which will bring about a usurpation of the rights of parliament. Every once in a while when I think of the monstrous ills of this government and their supporters I am overwhelmed. I am opposed to the actions which this government proposed to take under the guise of relief. They have turned right-about-face on every promise they made with respect to this important question and I am going to tell them about it at every opportunity. Had we been sitting on that side of the house they would have told us, perhaps much better than I can tell them. One should not be rash in making promises to the electors. That is the unhappy position in which this government find themselves to-day and they will be in that unhappy position when they face the electorate. The electorate have long memories and it will be a sorry spectacle to see the hon. gentlemen who traversed this country making pleas for support having to justify the stand they have taken in this house, particularly in connection with a measure of this kind. Hon. gentlemen cannot complain if they find themselves in that position because the public has a right to demand the fulfilment of promises solemnly made. I am opposed to the manner in which the government, under the guise of relief, has taken advantage of this legislation to do any and everything and to usurp the powers of parliament under peace, order and good government. Year after year with this blanket cheque the government has refused to give to parliament its inherent right to control the voting and expenditure of public funds. Therefore, I propose to vote in favour of the amendment.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has referred to a possible change of policy on the part of the government; I think he called it a right-about face. If there is anything in connection with which this government have changed their policy, it is unemployment and unemployment relief. I can recall their statements made on the platforms in 1930 that they were going to end unemployment and take it over as a national obligation. During the special session of 1930 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) introduced his bill he told us that it was a measure to provide work and wages. After a term the government decided that the giving of work to provide wages was too expensive and they changed their policy to one of direct relief. Apparently they have got tired of direct relief and are going to put on a program of public works. In the short space of four years the government have turned right-about-face several times in connection with unemployment and unemployment relief.

During the course of his remarks to-day the Prime Minister said that I had agreed with him on Friday evening, and he seemed to take some comfort out of that fact. Either he did not understand what I said or he twisted my argument around. My argument was in accordance with the one advanced by the right hon. leader of this party (Mr. Mackenzie King), that whatever money this parliament spends should be spent under its own control. My remarks appear in Hansard of Friday, and here is what I said:

To-night the Prime Minister advanced the best argument that I have heard as to why the act should be amended.

I was referring to the British North America Act.

The right hon. gentleman said that if we state a definite amount in this bill the provinces will clamour for what they think is coming to them; even if they need only $2,000,000 if there is $20,000,000 to be divided they will want their share. I think the Prime Minister was right in that argument; I agree with him, and that is just another reason why we in this federal parliament should take care to see to it, when we are spending money, that we spend our own money over which we have control.

If the Prime Minister can get any consolation out of those statements, I am glad to let him have it. The argument I advanced is that which has been advanced continually by the opposition, that when we are spending money we should spend our own money and should take control over it. If the government had carried out their promises to the electors they would have taken control and assumed the obligation of unemployment and unemployment relief. The government told the people in 1930 that they would make it a national obligation and they received a mandate from the people to take over unemployment and unemployment relief as a national obligation. Will anyone contend that the government of Quebec or of any other province would object to this government taking over full control of and assuming full reponsibility for unemployment relief? I am certain that no government would object. The fact that we have this bill before us in 1934, four years after this government was elected to end unemployment, is the best proof that the policies of this government have failed. A policy that has been put into effect by this government and that has lost trade to the extent of $1,768,000,000 in four years, must have been a poor policy and one not in the best interests of Canada. Surely the policies of a government that has lost trade to that extent in four years, that has added four hundred million to the debt of this country and that has increased taxation until the people are overburdened with it, cannot be good for this dominion. Therefore I repeat that this government has from time to time changed its ideas and its policies, and the worst feature of the matter is that it has not carried out its direct promise that if it did not do these things it would perish in the attempt.

I do not need to repeat that those who need relief, those who are working under relief measures, are getting by all odds the small end of the deal, and this government, not content with bringing in a measure of this kind for unemployment relief and having it administered by the province of Ontario in the way it has been, have coupled with it the peace, order and good government provision and all those other matters that have no connection with an unemployment relief measure. I agree entirely with the leader of the C.C.F. party in asking: Why include in the relief measure the peace, order and good government provision and ask for additional powers to maintain peace and order in this country over and above what already exists on the statute books. I contend that while the government are handing out relief with one hand, in the other we have a bludgeon that if the people do not like the relief, then they must be quite subservient and take what is handed to them by the Conservative government or suffer the consequences.

Then this government takes power—and I would not mind if it lived up in some way to the powers that we give it—to make regulations. In connection with the fact that I stated a moment ago that the labour men got the small end of these things, I want to point out that the Minister of Labour—and of course that means the government—has changed his position in regard to the wages that are to be paid to men engaged on these works. If we take the report of the dominion director of unemployment for 1930, there will be found on page 15 regulation No. 7 which reads as follows in connection with the wages that are to be paid:

7. All agreements made with provincial or municipal authorities involving the expenditure of any portion of the moneys appropriated by the act for public works or undertakings shall contain provisions for the payment of fair wages and hours of work in accordance with the intent of the Fair Wages and Eight-Hour Day Act, 1930, and the fair wages policy of the government of Canada as set forth in order in council (P.C. 1206) dated 7th June, 1922, and amendments thereto.

That is what is known as a minimum wage, a fair wage, but at any rate it works out as a minimum wage. According to the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief for 1932, that policy is entirely changed, because we find among the general regulations clause 8 on page 3 as follows:

The federal government will require that a maximum work day of eight hours shall prevail on works and undertakings carried on under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, unless a modification of this requirement is previously agreed to by the minister; the provincial or municipal authorities may fix rates of wages to be paid provided that such rates be fair and reasonable and not in excess of the rates required to be paid by the federal government for the character or class of work in the district.

In other words, the first regulation that was put there by the dominion government on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour was a minimum rate of wages and when they changed their policy in the following year, as shown in the 1932 report, they had a maximum rate of wages. For the information of hon. members who may not be acquainted with the minimum and maximum rate of wages principle, when an employer is limited to a minimum rate of wages he cannot pay below that, but when there is a maximum wage set, he does not need to go to the maximum, but he can pay as low below it as he sees fit. In other words, it is a destruction of the minimum rate of wages. Here we have a government telling the labour men of this country what they have done for them in the face of the intelligent electors, barefacedly including in their regulations a provision that neither the provincial nor the municipal authorities can pay more than the federal government do for works of a similar character. Had the Minister of Labour and the government required them to pay as much as the federal government did, I would not mind that, because I am sure the minister, so far as federal works are concerned, will have a minimum rate of forty or forty-five cents an hour for labour men in his own riding and, in fact, throughout most of northern Ontario. Yet he allows the provincial government in the case of works for which money is contributed by this government to pay $5 and $10 a month.

Mr. GORDON: That is not wages at all and never was intended to be.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEENAN: It is very difficult, Mr. Speaker, to speak in the chamber with the riot that is going on outside. I do not know what the occasion is; it is neither the twelfth of July nor the seventeenth of March—but it must be a Scotchman's day because I hear the bagpipes. If I interpret it aright it is a signal for this government to resign.

Mr. MANION: Your hearing is bad.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. STEVENS: You are not seeing the signals right to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They will see them to-morrow.

Mr. HEENAN: Before recess I had pointed out the many ills that have resulted from the policies of this government; how they had lost trade to the extent of $1,768,000,000, increased the national debt to the extent of about $400,000,000, and increased the burden of taxation until the people cannot stand any more of it. I pointed out that when they first introduced their unemployment relief measures the Prime Minister declared that their intention was to supply work and wages, but after following, that policy for a time they changed it to direct relief or the dole; and that they have now changed again and gone back to work and wages. I had pointed out that this government had changed their view with respect to many principles enunciated by them with respect to wages. I showed that in the first regulations formulated by them they provided for what is known as the fair wage or minimum wage, and in the next regulations they changed that to a maximum wage. The Minister of Labour just before recess had interjected some remark that I did not quite catch, but I shall say to the minister that his policy, the policy of the government with respect to $5 a month or $10, has been repudiated as far as I can learn by the electors of South Oxford.

Mr. McINTOSH: What's the matter with Rennie!

Mr. HEENAN: The government can now realize that Canadian boys were not going to work in the bush for the government at $5 or $10 a month and their board. They knew that the Prime Minister had promised to educate these boys so that they could take their part in the public life of Canada, yet I have cheques in my pocket showing that some of these educated boys drew the magnificent wages of $5 and $10 a month. So the government have changed their view; they are now going to give work and wages again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Too late now.

Mr. HEENAN: We have been going around this country for several years trying to shame the government of Ontario, which as everyone knows is a Tory government, not a Conservative government, and they have at last hearkened to the voice of the people and are now going to pay the magnificent rate of 25 cents an hour on the eve of an election. I received in to-day's mail from the city of Fort William the Fort William Times Journal of April 11. The local member, Mr. Spence, was speaking at a public meeting. What do you think he said?

Mr. GOLDING: South Oxford.

Mr. HEENAN: Never mind South Oxford; listen to this—it will shame them more than South Oxford.

For some of the men the increase had meant a boost of 235 per cent in wages.

That is what the local member of the Ontario legislature for Fort William said to a lot of intelligent men—I know they are because they voted for my hon. friend over there; he tells labouring men without shame that the Tory government is now going to increase their wages 235 per cent. Then he adds that both the Fort William and the Port Arthur members had played a leading role in recent highway legislation. Well, if he takes credit for that now on the eve of an election he must also take the responsibility for the one cent cheques that have been paid for wages by the Ontario government, wages that have been paid now for three years without a protest of any description on their part. I leave it to the electors of Fort William and district whether they are going to be deceived and fooled once more, because they know very well that if by any miracle the Ontario government should be returned to power their wages will be again reduced to starvation point five minutes after the election is over. So the member for Fort William may take what credit he can for the 235 per cent increase, as well as the discredit for what I have designated as slave wages.

A gentleman by the nam of Laverdure, who was sent from Ottawa to live on the public, wrote a letter to the Ottawa Journal which was published in its issue of February 16, taking me to task for a statement I made on the floor of this house. The effect of the letters is that the men were not working; that they were just treated like children; that they got porridge to eat in the morning and pies in the afternoon and sausages for lunch and carrots and something else for dinner.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Well fed.

Mr. HEENAN: He said the men in these camps were well fed and well housed; that they had sausages and pies and puddings and carrots. Have I not designated those camps correctly when I call them slave camps? Anyone who reads the history of slavery knows that the slave masters fed their slaves well in order that they could work and produce more. We know that the slave owners had medical men to look after them and tried to keep the slaves happy and contented because they wanted them to feel comfortable so that they would produce more. Everyone who knows anything about this gentleman to whom I refer knows how he was sent to the camps in our district, what influences were brought to bear to have him sent there and what he was sent for. I may tell you that I have a letter in my possession stating that he is not a $10 a month man but a $70 a month man, who is willing to sign any letters that are prepared for him by the Ontario government. The whole practice is to have two or three men in each camp who are willing to write or sign letters to repudiate anything that may be said by the local member in the Ontario legislature, Mr. Hutchinson, or by myself, so that the people in old Ontario will ask themselves whether we are stating the truth. These men who write or sign these letters do nothing else; they are excused by the bosses and do nothing but lie around the camps. They are treated like children; they are the pets. In the letter I have just received it is said that this man is getting compensation, that he has just been promoted to be assistant superintendent in Algonquin Park. That is the way the organization is carrying on; that is the way they spend the money contributed by this government, and that is where we come in. I do not mind what the Ontario government do with their own money, but I do mind what they do with federal money.

The ex-mayor of Kenora sent a telegram, which the Minister of Labour read on the floor of the house with great gusto, which said that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was not speaking the truth. I wonder if the minister knows that shortly after he received that telegram the man who sent it received an appointment worth $1,200 a year at the hands of the Ontario government as compensation for betraying his own district and his own town.

I could go on and deal with many more of these cases. We have the right to protest because we are protesting against the expenditure of federal money in order to carry on that gigantic political machine in the province of Ontario. Let me read an editorial from the Dryden Observer to indicate that the money is not well spent; the editorial refers to a disaster in which a farmer in a country district was burned to death. Due to the fact that the roads were blocked by snow, though they had plenty of machinery and men to keep the roads open, this man was burned to death in his home. There was no communication; they would not spend the money. I read from the editorial column of the Dryden Observer of April 6:

> The inconvenience of snow blocked roads in this district was never more apparent than this week when the tragic fire occurred at Minnitaki. It was Sunday forenoon before word of the accident reached here and then it was only by the section foreman, Mr. W. Duncan, coming through by motor car on the track. Provincial constable Erickson and Coroner Dr. Morison had to use the same mode of conveyance to Minnitaki in order to visit the scene and had a two mile tramp through deep snow before reaching the farmstead. Neighbours who tried to get to the fire to help the Washburn family had to almost crawl through the deep snow to get there and on account of the snow blocked roads, the funeral and interment of the late Mr. Washburn's remains had to take place at Dryden instead of at Minnitaki.

They could not even bury the remains in the locality in which this tragedy took place. That is some of the work of the Ontario government, which has dozens if not hundreds of men who are leeches on society, Tories who go round the country living on the proceeds of the taxation of the people and rendering no service to the community, the province or the dominion except writing letters of this description repudiating what has been said by public men.

I could go on at greater length, Mr. Speaker, to describe the situation that prevails in northern Ontario, but I think in the excitement of hearing the returns from South Oxford I have lost my notes. Let me say again, however, that the policies of this government have increased rather than ended unemployment. If the sounds I hear in the corridors behind me indicate what South Oxford has said they indicate a protest not only against the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways, who are adding to unemployment, but against the whole government as well. The Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister went over this country in 1930 making all sorts of promises, according to the newspapers and friends who gave me the information. I was not within hearing of their voices; I was down in Cape Breton at the time Howard Ferguson said I was up in my own bailiwick. He does not know much about the geography of the country. Those gentlemen sitting over there with smiles on their faces went to the railway centres and said to the men, "Look at the engines and cabooses standing on the side tracks, stored away. If we are elected on July 28 these engines will be running up and down the tracks, emitting steam and smoke. The railway men every month will bring home full pay cheques and their wives will be smiling and happy all day long." Now, however, at the end of almost four years, what is the situation? I am glad to see the Minister of Railways in a good humour tonight; I am glad to see him take his medicine like an Irishman. He actually smiles in face of the fact that he and his government have instituted policies that have brought about the dismissal of sixty-five thousand railway men. What do they offer them to-day? They offer consolation by way of $5 or $10 a month and their board, with peace, order and good government attached. That is the situation with respect to this government, and in conclusion I want to say that if there is the least bit of shame in the Prime Minister and his government, let them resign at once and go to the country.

MARKETING ACT

ORGANIZATION TO IMPROVE METHODS AND PRACTICES IN MARKETING NATURAL PRODUCTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 51, to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provisions in connection therewith.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any great length on the second reading of this bill, because there will no doubt be ample opportunity to make any observations that I think it necessary to make when the bill is before the committee. It might not be amiss, however, for me to give a very brief review of the history of the marketing of natural products throughout the dominion from the beginning down to the present time, as it will serve to show why we have felt it necessary to introduce this bill. It is for the purpose of remedying some of the conditions that now exist in the marketing of natural products, and which we do not feel are in the interests of the producer.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question? Would the minister kindly tell the house if this bill is to be referred to the committee of the whole house or sent to the agriculture committee?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The changes that have taken place in the marketing of agricultural and natural products since before there was any considerable growth of our urban centres will probably be within the memory of most hon. members of the house. In those early days the consumers very largely received their products directly from the producer. When the farmer slaughtered his animals, his own pigs, for example, he would sell and deliver them to the ultimate consumer, and at that time only did the producers in any considerable proportion receive one hundred cents on the dollar of what the consumer paid. Also, at that time the producer realized as perhaps he never has since the quality of the goods that the consumer demanded. But the growth of our urban centres and the increasing distance of the producer from his market necessitated a change in the marketing of natural products in their raw or semi-manufactured state. It was necessary that marketing should become much more specialized.

Jumping across that gap we find at the present time the following conditions in marketing. We have the producer located on the farm or in the forest or on the sea, or wherever his products are produced. Then we have assembling agents for the taking over of these products from the producer in less than carload lots or in small quantities. These agents assemble the products in centres where a still further assembling takes place. Then the products are carried to the wholesalers or in some cases to manufacturers or processors who are also wholesalers. Next the product passes through the hands of the brokers, and from the brokers it goes to the wholesalers who are distributing the particular product. From the wholesaler it goes to the retailer and lastly from the retailer to the consumer. On the one hand, in the majority of cases there is the assembling at a central point, and then the distribution. This means many costs which cannot be eliminated. First, there is the assembling; second, there is the cost of transportation; then there is the cost of storing, the cost of financing, the cost of insurance and also the profit of those who handle the goods in the different stages. There are similar costs in the movement from the manufacturer or from the centre of this process to the consumer. Here again there is the cost of shipping, the cost of insurance and the cost of storing or holding the goods before releasing to the consumer.

The consumers themselves make many demands. They ask to have the goods distributed in very small quantities. For example, they ask for small quantities of cornflakes, of rolled oats or canned goods. They have also demanded that these products be distributed very quickly, within half an hour or an hour of the time they are ordered. As a result of these demands of a higher civilization, and as a result of our higher standards of living, there has grown up a great spread or difference between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays for an article. If we can reduce that cost of distribution or that spread between what the consumer pays and the producer gets to a minimum, without cramping in any way the operation necessary to bring that about, we will have gone as far as any human agency can go in solving the problem of distribution. If a distributor realizes that his success or his profit must take place within a certain range or between certain limits, his whole effort will be gauged by the quantity of goods which he can distribute and the most efficient way in which that distribution can be brought about. Therefore, I say that if that condition can be brought about we shall have gone a long way towards solving what many in this house have stated is the major question at the present time, that is, of distribution rather than of production.

I am not one of those who feel that the spread between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays is due to the profits or costs of the trade alone. I believe that we as producers are to blame to a great extent for this spread. If the cooperative and other organized trade were certain that they could receive a certain quality of goods in a uniform volume, a great deal of the cost entailed under present conditions would be eliminated. The trade could look ahead and build up its supply so that it would have a uniform quantity at its disposal, whereas at present it is not certain that it can get this supply from the producers. As I say, the producers themselves are to blame to a great extent for the spread which does exist.

This development which has taken place in the marketing of natural products is due to the producer finding himself far removed from the consumer. He has not been in a position to know exactly the quality of goods which the consumer desired. Neither could he understand when he picked up a paper why a consumer had paid two or three times what he had received for a product which in some cases he had produced only a week or two weeks before. This condition of affairs has had a very unsettling and disturbing effect upon the primary producers of the country and this effect has been increased and accentuated by the press and by the great number of public and political speakers—no party is free from this—who have gone through the country stirring up the producers by telling them that they were not receiving a fair share of the consumer's dollar and were being exploited by the middlemen, it is because of this that there is such difficulty in having the producer produce goods of the quality required and deliver a uniform and continuous supply. When he is asked to do this in many cases his reply is: What is the use of my trying to produce a higher quality of goods in sufficient quantity, because the trade takes far more than its legitimate share; the more I produce, the more the trade benefits; I do not seem to benefit to any great degree. This attitude has had a bad effect upon the improvement of quality and production. If we can instil into the producer a confidence that he will not be exploited, that he will be given a fair share of the consumer's dollar, or the greatest possible share, without interfering with the necessary cost of distribution, whether it be through cooperatives or government machinery, whether it be by control over the legitimate or organized trade, then and not until then will the primary producer give one hundred per cent of his efforts to the production of a high quality product.

In an effort to overcome the costs which the producer felt were greater than they should be, cooperative agencies were set up throughout the country. The producers combined to control their own products with a view to eliminating some of what they felt to be unnecessary costs. The result desired was that the producer should get for his labour greater return from the consumer's dollar. However, in many cases these cooperative enterprises have not been the success which it was hoped they would be when they were organized. I am a member of a goodly number of these cooperative associations, so that what I say of them in a critical manner will be a criticism of myself and the other members of the associations. The purpose of these associations was very praiseworthy. In idea or theory they were one hundred per cent correct, but in many cases they have fallen short of achieving the purposes for which they were organized. If they had not fallen short of their objectives it would not be necessary for me to be here to-night speaking on the second reading of this marketing bill.

I should like to give the house what I believe to be some of the reasons why these cooperative associations failed. It was first necessary to inspire the producer to join these associations to market his goods and thereby decrease the cost of marketing. In order to carry out this work a man or woman had to have certain qualities—one might almost say missionary or inspirational qualities—in order to inspire the masses with the idea that it was to their own advantage to combine to market their products. In many cases the men who had been responsible for the organization of the association were placed at the head, the members forgetting entirely that it required a different type of man to manage the business. This, I believe, is one reason for the failures of some of them.

Another reason is, I think, that the cooperative organization devoted too much, if not their entire attention to the marketing of the product and in many cases lost sight almost completely of the improvement of quality and the continuity of supply. Had many of those cooperative organizations given the same effort to improvement of the quality of the goods they produced, thus ensuring to the consumer that through the organization he could get this quality of goods, it would have meant the difference between success and failure of many of those enterprises.

Another reason, I believe, that some cooperative organizations have failed is the constant effort made by private enterprises against the success of the cooperatives, because they recognized in them, and rightly so, one of their most dangerous competitors. The private interests were organized and could combine to meet what they perhaps felt was a keen enemy, so that it is possible that many of the cooperatives met defeat before sufficient reserves had been built up, before an efficient management could be installed and, in fact, even before they got started on their way toward making a success.

I believe another reason for their failure has been that too soon after they were organized the majority of the executive, as a matter of fact, the entire executive in some cases consisted of men well chosen for their business ability, but had not on it people who were vitally, financially interested in the production of the goods, and because there were not people of that type on the executive or at least in a position to advise the management, there was lacking in that management that close touch with the problems of the producer which it was the purpose of the cooperative organizations to solve.

I have omitted perhaps one of the greatest reasons and it is this: we are told and told authoritatively that the reason for the failure of some of those organizations, and especially under certain conditions, is the fact that there has been enough produced outside the cooperative organization to depress the market of those who were inside the organization. That is, a sufficient proportion of the goods produced were not controlled by the cooperative organization and it could be used to depress the market and to make it impossible for the others to carry on as efficiently as they otherwise would.

I may have seemed so far to be a little too harshly critical of the cooperatives, but I have taken the time to discuss the situation, because I feel that this will have a considerable bearing on what we shall have to say later on and also in the working out of the legislation provided for in this bill. Although it seems at first that in many instances the cooperatives have failed, I am not nearly so much discouraged at the failures that have taken place when the obstacles they were up against, wth a complete lack of experience and training are considered, as I am encouraged by the great success that, in spite of those same difficulties, has been made by a very large number of cooperative marketing organizations throughout the dominion. It will be of interest for the house to learn that in 1932, for which year we have the last reliable record, there were 795 cooperative organizations operating actively in the Dominion of Canada with a membership of 2,692 branches. Therefore, although from time to time failures of cooperative marketing organizations have been brought to our attention, I am sure every hon. member will feel that with such a considerable number of cooperatives and their branches still functioning satisfactorily, they have made considerable progress even in spite of almost unsurmountable odds.

If there is within the sound of my voice any person who has given any thought to this question and who feels that with the condition of marketing as it is at the present time, there is nothing to be gained by this bill then there can be no need in his mind for this bill. But I am sure there are many in the house who have given serious thought to the marketing of natural products, who have been surprised at the great wastage, in spite of the combined efforts of private and co-operative organizations, in the marketing of our products. One reason for the wastage, for instance, in the marketing of cattle is that the marketing is not regulated, the production is not planned. Of late there has been a good deal of discussion on that question by different public bodies. Let us take, for example, a veal calf that is ready to be marketed. It is sent to the local stockyards where it is thrown in amongst strange stock before it has even learned how to eat grain or hay. It is sent up the chute and it is lost, not knowing what to do. There it will be buffeted about in being forced into the stock car where it also finds itself among strange surroundings. It may be unloaded again before it gets to the final market. It comes to the market finally but was unable during all this time to maintain the flesh and condition it had when it was sold by the original producer. Someone may say that that is rather an extreme case. It is, perhaps, an extreme case so far as cattle are concerned, but when one considers the hundreds of thousands of calves that are marketed in such a condition, we shall see that it is not by any means so extreme. If this animal is not marketed almost immediately it arrives at the stockyards after the journey which has brought it into such a condition, the loss that is sustained will make it scarcely worth marketing, because any farmer who has experience in raising stock —and the better quality it is the more it is likely to suffer under such conditions—will agree that if it is not marketed within a period of four or five days, it is practically not worth marketing; there is nothing left but skin and bone. The same thing is true of highly finished young cattle that have to go through the same treatment.

Let me give an illustration that will be better understood by hon. members who are not so familiar with the marketing of live stock. It has no doubt come to the attention of every hon. member that if in the summer or the fall one goes down to a Saturday night market, one will find baskets of peaches there just commencing to get overripe and can buy them for almost nothing. The storekeeper considers this to be a sacrifice sale. I maintain there is no product that is more often sold at a sacrifice than cattle, hogs or lambs once they are out of the hands of the producer. If in one breath people claim that everything should be sold through the stockyards and in the next say there are organizations in this country that agree among themselves as to what they shall pay for our natural products, we have this picture: we have all the stock forced into the stockyards, as many as 5,000 head in one yard, and according to the other argument there may be no competition because of an agreement among large purchasers that they will pay just what they wish. All they have to do is to remain off that market for a day or two and they will be able to buy that product for whatever they want to pay, because it cannot be held without terrific loss. Following this, I would say that the time for a producer to sell his article at the greatest profit is, in the case of the farmer, before it leaves his own farm. If small cooperative units were developed which would stress quality production and could control enough live stock or cattle to enable them to bargain with the trade and arrange that the product should be bought on the farms, then the purchaser would have a greater interest in quality and this would make certain, in a way that the farmer or producer cannot now do, that it would reach its ultimate destination in good condition for manufacture.

The same thing applies in connection with pigs, sheep, or fruit, particularly apples. Those of you who have been engaged in the production or have watched the marketing of apples have seen the great waste that there often is between the time they are ready for sale and the time they are sold. For instance, we have cold storage plants throughout the dominion, erected for the purpose of preserving fruit and apples so that they may be kept in better condition for sale. It is known by those interested that if there is delay in getting apples into these storage plants they may deteriorate as much in one day outside as in ten days when placed in proper storage. The same can be said with reference to poultry and other agricultural products. As long as there is this wastage which I have endeavoured briefly to outline I think every one will agree that there is room for great improvement in the marketing of farm products.

Then our products are sold in two markets: for export, and for domestic consumption. If often happens that a small surplus sold in the export market affects injuriously the price of the whole quantity sold in the domestic market, and especially now when world competition is so keen it is necessary that we should take every possible care to make certain that our goods when sold on the export market shall be of a quality that will create a demand for Canadian products. Anyone who has followed the matter at all closely will agree that some of the products that go from the dominion to the world market at present have a bad effect on the demand. I believe that steps, not too drastic, should be taken to prevent products that would have a detrimental effect on the demand for our goods from going out. Then in connection with our domestic market, it will be of interest to the house to learn—it was a surprise to myself when I learned it first—of the very high percentage of some of our natural products absorbed by the domestic market. For example, the percentage of home consumption of certain items is as follows:

Eggs	99·8
Sheep and lamb	99·4
Butter	98·9
Poultry	98·3
Cattle and beef	97·3
Potatoes	96·9
Hogs and pork	95·4
Oats	94·1
Barley	88·2

The only way that a greater return can be obtained for the producer is by some change in the method of marketing, to eliminate some of the wastage that I have outlined.

Another instance of wastage is in connection with live stock. In October and November of 1933 over 38,000 more cattle were marketed in the dominion than in October and November of 1932. They were to a great extent cattle that were not ready to be slaughtered at the time they were marketed, and the result was not only a sacrifice for the people who sold them, resulting in a poor price to them, but a decline quite out of proportion to their number in the price of better cattle. Some farmers who had feed could not buy these cattle to finish them because they had no money, while other farmers who had money were short of feed.

I think then that everyone will agree that there has been wastage, and that it is to the interest of all that the producer should receive more for his product. A great deal of thought and consideration has been given to the preparation of this marketing bill. Because of the great variety of natural products of the dominion, of the large area from which products of similar type are drawn, and of the difficulties arising out of the respective rights of the provinces and the dominion, it has been no easy task to formulate a plan to bring about improvement in the marketing of our natural products. It was felt that it was impossible to see far enough into the future the needs and difficulties that would arise in the marketing of these various products, especially with agriculture in its present condition, to permit of rigid provisions. Therefore it was felt that the bill should be flexible, giving opportunity for producers and groups of producers to submit their collective ideas concerning the marketing of their products. Ample provision is made to give to the producer the fullest measure of control of the product, if he wishes to organize, with a view to the production of a high quality product coming on the market at a planned rate. Power is given in the bill to make certain that undue profits will not be taken by those engaged in the work of marketing. That will apply just as much to the co-operative organization as to the private trader. I believe cooperative organizations for buying and selling have come into being largely because it was felt that there was no control of the spread or toll taken from the producer in the marketing of his goods. At the same time if they feel they can market their goods more economically by combined and co-operative effort, provision is made to enable them to do so. I have discussed this bill with the trade as well as with the cooperatives; they also see the necessity of it, because they realize that they have paid a great price owing to there having been no regulation or planning of production and quality of product. I personally believe that in large measure the organized trade, trained as it is in the specialized business of getting the product from the producer to the consumer, is the best and cheapest method of carrying on the business. On the other hand, while the producers were becoming organized in order to carry on the work of regulating, and in some cases, selling their own products, it was thought only fair that the government should take the necessary powers to assist those engaged in agriculture or any other primary industry while that work of organization was going on.

There will be ample time for further discussion of this bill, but in summing up let me say that there are only three principles contained in the measure. The first principle is to give the producers, to the extent indicated by their organizing powers, the control, regulation and marketing of their own products. I think all hon. members will agree that this is sound, that no person understands the problem better than it is understood by the primary producers. They are the men who have more at stake than any others. In the second place the very fact that they are organizing and are getting closer to their market and the needs of the consumer will show them, as nothing else will, the necessity of producing a high quality product in a planned way so as to furnish a continuous supply to the market. Much of the necessary work has been done, some of it before this government came into power. The legislation passed during the last three years setting up standards for products offered for sale; the creation of machinery to make certain that products will come to the market only when properly labelled and graded, all have paved the way for this further step that it is felt will benefit still further, the primary producer.

In the next place, as I have said, it is felt that this plan is necessary so that the primary producers may devote themselves wholeheartedly to production and be assured that the range within which marketing operation takes place will be limited in order to prevent any undue profit, at the same time seeing to it that the most efficient method of transferring the products, either in the raw or manufactured state, to the consumer is not interfered with. It is also felt—and I doubt if any hon. member who has been in public life for any length of time has not made this statement, particularly before an election—that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, that this country cannot succeed if agriculture and the other primary industries do not succeed. You may go into any store or office in our great cities of Montreal and Toronto; you do not have to go back very far to trace the connection between that store, and the man or woman engaged in that business, and the primary producer who has made possible these great cities with their large buildings, universities, shops and homes. The people in these cities are much more dependent on the primary producer than many of them realize in the ordinary run of business. Therefore I am sure no hon. member will object, once having made the statement that the success of this country depends upon agriculture, if this government sees fit to put the resources of the dominion as may be necessary, behind the marketing of the primary products of the country.

I had hoped that there would be little controversy in connection with this bill. No one realizes and appreciates more than I do the fact that it is far from perfect. There are great obstacles to the working out of any such system, but the fact that there are obstacles is no reason why we should not endeavour to surmount those obstacles. I believe the experience gained in the first year of the operation of this bill will do more to bring it to perfection than perhaps hours of discussion in this house, because, after all, to a large extent it is an experiment. In this experiment, however, we have kept in mind three things. The first is that it must be sound, the second that it must be simple of operation, and the third that it must be practical. I regret to say that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has dashed some of my hopes so far as the lack of controversy goes. It is reported that last week, from a public platform, he stated that this bill would not make any contribution to agriculture, that it would be of no assistance at all. If that statement was made I regret it very much, because it is so sweeping. I have before me many resolutions of appreciation with regard to the bill, not only from producers from one end of the country to the other—supporting it one hundred per cent—but also from boards of trade and other business organizations that realize as they never did before this depression struck us that their continuous success depends more upon the success of the primary producer than upon anything else. I do trust, however, that this bill will be discussed in the spirit in which it is presented. In its preparation we endeavoured to obtain all the points of view possible so far as the organized producers were concerned, at the same time discussing it frankly and freely with those whose business primarily has been that of marketing.

Mr. NEILL: Just before the minister sits down will he say something about part II of the bill? He has not mentioned it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought I had mentioned part II of the bill a number of times.

Mr. GRAY: Will the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My own feeling is that there would be no advantage in submitting it to the agriculture committee; I do not see any need to bring witnesses, as has been done in connection with some other bills we have brought forward. I think hon. members, other than those belonging to the agriculture committee, will be just as anxious to discuss this bill.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the house is not in committee. The minister has moved the second reading of the bill, and he has completed his remarks.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the minister does not wish to answer my question I am quite content to let it stand.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): At the very outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I agree with practically every word spoken by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to-night. I agree as to the necessity for some action on the part of the government; I agree on the need for some improvement in marketing methods; I agree that there has been great wastage in our marketing practices and I agree that the producer must get more for his product if this country is to prosper. I agree that the quality of our products must be maintained, and I agree that three steps in that direction have been taken this session in the passing of the Dairy Products Act, the Fruit and Honey Act and the act with respect to live stock. I agree as to the merits of the co-operative organizations we have had in Canada during the past few years. Some of those organizations have been highly successful, and some have not been so successful. I believe that the organizations which have not been successful have failed for the very reasons the minister has described. I am convinced that there is great need for improvement in our marketing methods, but I am sorry to say I must disagree with the minister when he concludes that the bill before us to-night, if enacted, will result in very great improvement in them. I am a firm believer in cooperation, and without hesitation I say there is no man in this House of Commons who believes more than I do in co-operation between the producers and consumers, and on the part of all who trade with each other. I am not convinced, however, that this measure will in any degree or to any extent improve upon voluntary co-operation properly managed and well directed. I believe in government assistance to co-operation, but when we come to regimentation of men, as I fancy I see in this bill, whether proposed by people who believe in it or people who do not, then I most strenuously object.

In the preamble to the bill I find it described as follows:

> An act to improve the methods and practices involved in the marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith.

If I believed that this bill, if brought into operation, would result in that which is set forth in the preamble, I would heartily support it, but unfortunately there are so many features in the bill to which I must object that I am going to accept the invitation of the minister and enter into a controversy here and now in connection with some of the principles embodied in it.

To begin with, I believe the main principle of the bill may be described as being one of compulsory cooperation, which I regard as a contradiction in terms, although it is an expression commonly used. I do not think that the people of Canada are yet ready for this type of legislation. I am not willing to believe that it would be acceptable to the people of Canada as a whole. I know that from east to west much approval of the bill has been expressed. The subject with which most of the people in the prairie provinces are concerned is that of wheat, and at this moment many of the farmers regard this measure as applicable principally to that commodity. In supporting the measure now before us they have in mind the old wheat board which functioned some years ago, and regard this measure as a sort of reincarnation of that board. However I cannot imagine any two bodies which could be more different than a board under a marketing scheme to be set up under this bill and the old wheat board to which I have just referred. In my view there is no comparison at all. When the wheat board was operating no restrictions of any kind were placed upon the grower. On the other hand, he was encouraged to increase his acreage; he was encouraged to grow as much wheat as he possibly could. The desire of the country and that of the allies was that as much wheat as possible should be raised in Canada. The farmer in those days could grow as much of any variety of wheat as he wished. He was assured of a market for every bushel of it. Best of all he knew he would receive a big price for his product. The farmer to-day has in mind that some of those results will be achieved through this legislation. In my opinion however exactly the reverse will be the case. I firmly believe that the farmer who acquaints himself with the provisions of the bill will come to the conclusion that it is distinctly against his interests. Those who already have approved have done so, in my opinion, either without knowledge of the contents of the bill or without due appreciation of their significance.

When the bill was placed on my file I availed myself of the first opportunity to take it to my room, read it and study it. I tried first to discover how a marketing scheme would be brought into existence, then the kind of products which would be regulated, then the degree of regulation, and finally the nature of the regulating authority. I found, as all members who will study the bill will find, that the products to be regulated are natural products, products of agriculture, the forest, the sea, and of the lakes or rivers.

Probably at this point I would do well to read the section to which I have referred, namely, subsection (e) of section 2:

"natural products" means any product of agriculture or of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product.

I believe if hon. members will examine this section they will find that the expressions contained therein cover practically all the food we use. They include wheat and other grains, milk and eggs, fruit, live stock and cattle, hogs, either in their natural condition or processed.

Then as to how the scheme may be brought into operation, I find that a representative number of persons engaged in the production and marketing or in the production or marketing of any one of these natural products may approach the governor in council with a petition asking that a scheme be set up. I suggest the proposed legislation is deficient in that it does not define what may be a representative number of persons. My suggestion is that it should be more definite in that respect. Perhaps the president and two or three directors of an organization may approach the minister with a petition. May I add at this point that I am not referring to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) because the act does not state what particular minister shall control this legislation when it becomes law. The fact remains however that a representative number of persons may ask for a marketing scheme, and the minister is the sole judge as to whether these petitioners really represent the whole of the producers of that product. In his wisdom he may decide that these three or four officials who have approached him are really representatives. In fact, they may assure him that they represent 20,000, 30,000 or 40,000 producers. I suggest however that that would be no evidence that they do represent those producers. Within the past few years there have been instances where the directors and officers of organizations have represented themselves as speaking for the whole of those organizations when, in fact, the truth was that in many of those cases the majority of the producers have not held the same views as were held by their officers. I suggest the bill should be much more specific in this regard, and at a later point in my remarks I shall compare this legislation with the British marketing legislation in this respect.

Then, I believe that only those who are engaged in the production of one of these natural products should decide whether or not there should be a marketing scheme in connection therewith. That decision should not be left to those who are simply marketing the product. The minister has to decide, but the measure does not state what shall be the basis of his decision. If the minister is satisfied that the petitioners represent the whole of the producers he may refer the matter to the marketing board. The board may report to the minister who if the report is favourable will bring the matter before the governor in council. The scheme will then be put in force subject to two reservations only. I think there is a great weakness in the bill in that respect, but I propose to touch on that a little later when referring to the British marketing act.

There is another section of this bill to which I object even more strenuously, and that is section 9. Without offence I would say that the discretion provided for in this section should not be left to the minister. Section 9 reads:

Notwithstanding that no petition in relation to any natural product has been filed, the minister may, if he is satisfied that the trade and commerce in the said product is injuriously affected by the lack of a local board to regulate such product, at any time propose a scheme for the marketing of such product, and the governor in council may approve of such scheme and authorize the board to administer such scheme directly or through any agency which it may establish. Such scheme shall continue in force until terminated by the governor in council.

It may be observed that the minister does not have to invite the board to make a report on the proposed scheme. He proceeds to propose the scheme to the governor in council and the governor in council may authorize it. Again I intend to refer to the provisions of the British Marketing Act a little later on in connection with that feature of the bill.

As to the kind and degree of regulation made possible under this act we find by section 4 (1) that the powers of the board are exceedingly broad:

The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality or grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

That is to my mind a tremendous power to place in the hands of the board, a power that I certainly should not be willing to place there. Section 4 continues:

(b) to exempt from any determination or order any person or class of persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product or any class, variety or grade of such product.

Then follow three or four paragraphs to which I have no objection. But here is one to which I think decided objection should be offered:

(f) to require any or all persons engaged in the production or marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder;

If it is the intention that a poll should be held in accordance with the provisions of the Marketing Act in Great Britain, it will be necessary of course for the producers to be registered, but if there are to be no steps other than those already proposed in this bill for the formation of the scheme, I think this provision is highly unnecessary. It should not be necessary for the small farmer who produces a few pounds of butter weekly or raises one or two head of cattle occasionally to have to procure a licence from the board to produce these products. I do not think there is anything suggested with regard to the other powers of the board to which I would raise objection.

A few words now with regard to the regulating authority. We have first the marketing board. If the act should pass and the dominion marketing board be set up I do not see that there could be any objection raised to the constitution of the board as provided by this bill, or as to the manner of the creation of that board. But with regard to the local boards I think we may justly raise objection.

Section 5 provides for the erection of a local board. A petition may be presented by a representative number of persons which shall state first of all the natural product to be the subject of the scheme of regulation; it shall present the proposed scheme in sufficient detail, including arrangements for organization and administration under the supervision of the board, to enable the governor in council to consider its expediency; it must set out "the powers hereinbefore mentioned"—that is the powers conferred upon the board in section 4, "which it is proposed shall be exercised by the local board under the board"; also full information respecting the quantity of the product produced and the markets therefor; the number of persons who shall comprise the local board and the basis of their selection, and so on.

I can imagine that local boards being set up all over the country will be an intolerable nuisance to the farmers whose products they handle. That is my profound conviction. It seems to me that by this bill we are creating a large number of officials who, as I have said, will be a nuisance to the producers.

I want for a few moments to compare the provisions of this bill with those of the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain. I firmly believe that majorities should rule, and if our act were framed somewhat on the basis of the British act, and if the scheme could be brought into force in Canada only by the same means as a similar one can be in Great Britain, I think I should have to support the bill.

I find that in Great Britain this is what happens. First of all there must be submitted to the minister the scheme that is the mind of the producer or producers. Any number may submit the scheme, but they must satisfy the minister that they substantially represent the producers of the product sought to be regulated, both as to number of persons and quantity of product. Any petitioner or body of petitioners may present a scheme to the minister. That step is precisely the same as must be taken in Canada.

But now we find a difference in the operations of the British Marketing Act as compared with ours. The minister must cause to be published in the Gazette and elsewhere at his discretion a notice of the submission of the scheme, and of the place where copies thereof may be obtained. The minister in that notice invites objections and suggested modifications. When the modifications suggested and the objections offered have been made known to him it is the minister's duty to consider them, and unless he considers them frivolous he shall direct a public inquiry to be held and shall consider the report of the person holding the inquiry. I might state that I am summarizing the provisions of the British Act, paraphrasing, not quoting, the sections.

This inquiry must be held in accordance with certain rules which have been made by the minister and approved by both houses of parliament.

If the report following the inquiry should lead the minister to make modifications in the scheme these modifications shall be submitted for the approval of from nine to twenty-one persons nominated by the persons submitting the scheme.

If the minister is now satisfied that the scheme will "conduce to the work of efficient production and marketing of the regulated product" he shall "lay before each house of parliament a draft of the scheme," and if each house approves the minister shall make an order approving the scheme. But it is to be noted that when the minister lays the scheme before the houses of parliament for their consideration he must lay before each house a report as to the evidence by which he has been satisfied that the persons submitting the scheme were duly representative of the producers.

Both houses of parliament having approved the scheme the minister shall make an order approving it. The operation of the scheme shall be suspended during what is known as a "suspensory period," beginning when the scheme is approved and ending not less than one month nor more than two months after the poll has been taken.

The minister on laying before the houses of parliament a draft of the scheme—I have outlined this provision already but I will repeat it—must lay before each a report "as to the evidence by which he has been satisfied that the persons submitting the scheme were duly representative." The scheme shall provide for the constitution of a board to administer this scheme, which board shall be composed of registered producers elected by them in such manner as may be provided in the scheme. All this having been done, the minister now shall cause to be published in such newspapers, published in the area in which the scheme is applicable, as the minister may direct, a form of application for registration as a producer under the scheme. It may be pointed out here that any producer who is not registered is prohibited from selling his product. This form of application shall state that a poll of registered producers is to be taken on the question whether the scheme shall remain in force, and specifying the date. A poll of registered producers is then held and the scheme shall come into force at the expiration of the suspensory period if the poll shows that there have voted in favour of the scheme, first, not less than two-thirds of the total number of registered producers voting on the poll and, second, registered producers who are capable of producing not less than two-thirds of the regulated product which all the registered producers voting on the poll are capable of producing. It is also provided that if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the minister that the number of producers voting on the poll was less than half the total number of producers, he shall forthwith by order revoke the scheme. It will be seen that this act provides that a small minority of producers cannot act against the will of the majority. The safeguards are quite ample in that respect.

There are certain safeguarding provisions from the consumer's standpoint. While our bill contains certain provisions for the protection of the consumer, I think the British act is much better with respect to price spreads. A chairman and six members to represent the interests of the consumers shall be appointed by the minister and shall be called a consumers' committee. They shall be charged with the duty of considering and reporting to the minister on, first, the effect of any scheme on consumers of the regulated product and, second, any complaints made to the committee as to the effect of any such scheme on consumers of the regulated product. Another committee is to be appointed, an investigating committee. The minister shall appoint a committee of investigation, consisting of a chairman and four members, to consider and report to the minister on any report made by a consumers' committee. If a committee of investigation reports to the minister that any provision of a scheme or any act or omission of a board is contrary to the interests of consumers of a regulated product, or contrary to the interests of the public, the minister may, after consultation with the board of trade, first, by order make such amendments as he considers necessary or expedient or, second, revoke the scheme. This cannot be done unless and until it has been approved by a resolution passed by each house of parliament.

I consider that to be a really democratic bill. It provides that at least two-thirds of the producers must be in favour of a marketing scheme before it can be brought into force. I believe that the majority should rule and I should be content if this bill contained similar safeguards. Even if that were done, I still believe that within a few years the producers themselves will regret the enactment of this bill and will ask for a revocation of the scheme.

This bill contains principles to which I cannot subscribe and I shall have to say quite reluctantly that I cannot support it. I believe in the sincerity of the minister and I am confident that there is no hon. member more desirous of doing the very best that can be done for farm and other producers.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I come from a part of the Dominion of Canada in which there has been some demand for the establishing of a marketing board for the natural products of this country, therefore I have watched with a great deal of interest the introduction of this bill and followed closely the explanation given by the minister on the motion for second reading. During the Easter recess I took the opportunity of consulting with fruit growers' organizations in Nova Scotia and with other people who are interested in the fruit industry. I discussed the provisions of this bill and received a variety of representations. Some of those interested in the fruit industry were disposed to be exceedingly critical of the bill, while others were disposed to be friendly to it. However, as a member of parliament representing the largest fruit exporting district in Canada it becomes my duty to exercise my individual judgment upon the bill. I have been endeavouring to do this during the past few days with a view to deciding what stand I should take upon the motion for second reading.

While I am disposed to compliment the minister upon the tone and character of his speech, I cannot help regretting that he did not take up the bill itself and give the reasons why various clauses had been inserted—particularly section 4—and an explanation for his departure from the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain, which has been so fully and ably dealt with by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher). If we pass this bill we will be delegating immense powers to some minister, presumably the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) although it may possibly be the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). The operation of the legislation will depend upon how the minister exercises those powers. I think the minister owed it to those of us who are deeply interested in this legislation to give us a much fuller explanation of the clauses of the bill and the intentions of the government when the bill has become law. It has been suggested that the legislation is intended to remain a dead letter, its introduction being on the eve of an election and the government having no intention of taking any effective action under it. I have no grounds for saying that that is the case, but if the government has a well thought out and defined policy of marketing, the minister should give us information in that regard on the second reading of the bill. But the minister did not do so, and we have to take the bill as it stands. We cannot assume that the drastic powers which are conferred upon the government by this measure will not be exercised. Some of those in my constituency who urged that I support this bill have said: "Yes, these powers are exceedingly drastic, and we can understand how in their working out great injustice might be done or great inconvenience suffered, but we must not assume that the government will misuse the powers granted under the bill or need not assume that the government will invoke those powers." I do not think a member of parliament should vote to confer powers the exercise of which he disapproves. For this reason I am afraid that I shall have to oppose the bill as it stands.

Having gone so far, I think I owe it to my constituents and perhaps to the house to give the reasons for the position I take. In order to do that I must put before the house what I consider to be a picture of the legislation. I want to make it clear that this bill does not set up only one board. Some of the language, particularly that in clause 4, seems to be especially applicable to the fruit industry, and for that reason it may be convenient to set forth what I understand to be the plan or intention of the government in reference to that industry.

In the first place, and at the top of the system, there will be a dominion marketing board consisting probably of three members. Beneath that dominion marketing board, which will have to do, of course, not only with apples but with natural products as a whole, there shall or may be a commodity board which will have to do with apples or fruit alone, and it will be the duty of that commodity board to reconcile the conflicting interests and coordinate the different demands of the various apple producing provinces. That will be necessary; the only alternative will be another fruit branch under the dominion marketing board itself. It does not make much difference which you have; extensive machinery will be required to look after the fruit industry as such if fruit is brought within the provisions of this measure.

That is the second board. Under those two boards will be of necessity a provincial board dealing with fruit, and the provincial board will formulate its demands and make its recommendations. The recommendations will go up to the second board, which will approve or disapprove or modify them, as the case may be, and then pass on to the uppermost board of all, the dominion marketing board, which will issue the effective orders and directions. That machinery is complicated, cumbersome and of necessity will be expensive. The first point, however, that I want to make is not precisely that, but the fact that we are talking about setting up in the dominion not one board, but many boards, not only in the fruit industry, but in all the other natural products industries.

A second feature of the proposed legislation we should have clearly before us is that it is designed to deal only with natural products. But the definition of natural products is, I am afraid, not clear as given in the bill. It certainly applies to the products of the farm, the forest, the sea, the lake and the river, but it also applies to certain manufactured products, namely, "any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product." One question I should like to ask the minister is this: Is the proposed legislation confined to manufactured products so defined or is it applicable also to other manufactured products which arguably may be products of agriculture, the forest, the sea, the lake or the river? Does it apply to lumber, or is that a manufactured product and not within the section because it is not a food or a drink? Does it apply to pulp or paper? Will they be considered products of the forest or manufactured or derivative products and not within the section because they are not food or drink? That point should be cleared up. There is no such ambiguity in the British act which applies to agricultural products alone.

A third feature of the bill to which I desire to draw attention is that these marketing boards are not to take the natural products of Canada and market them. They do not buy them, handle them, process them, or sell them; they leave the marketing of the products in the hands of the producers or shippers themselves. They issue a series of orders to the shippers; they say to them: You shall send your goods to this, that or the other market; you shall keep a certain quantity of them at home; you shall feed your goods on to the market both in and out of this country in accordance with this series of orders or directions which we shall issue to you from time to time. If the system were one under which the marketing boards acquired, handled, processed and disposed of the total natural products of the country, it might to some extent be a more effective way of dealing with the matter. It would be far more socialistic than this, but perhaps not any worse on that account. I am not advocating that alternative; I am merely pointing out that this measure imposes upon a competitive capitalistic economy such as we have in this country a bureaucratic interference from above through a series of marketing boards.

The fourth point I should like to mention is that this bill does not follow the British marketing act. The hon. member for Last Mountain made that very clear, and he read the provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Act. He watched, as we watched, very carefully the provisions of this legislation to see in what respects it departed from the British marketing act, and without going into technicalities I think the matter may be summed up by saying that there are four points of departure. They can be stated very simply. The first is that the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain does not set up a marketing board at all. There the minister and the department, subject to parliament, preserve full sovereignty and authority over marketing activities so that there is no duplication of governmental machinery as there will be under this bill. That is the first point of difference between the Agricultural Marketing Act of Great Britain and the legislation now proposed for Canada.

The second is that the producers in Great Britain are protected under their legislation and our producers are not protected under ours—and I use the word "protection" not in the fiscal or tariff sense but in the ordinary dictionary sense. The hon. member for Last Mountain indicated the manner in which the producers over there are protected under the British legislation. In Great Britain they must originate the scheme; it cannot be forced upon them from above as it may be under this legislation by the minister himself, and elaborate provisions are made for voting by polls. Two thirds in number and two-thirds in productive capacity must approve a scheme in Great Britain before it can be forced upon the other one-third; and not only that, but half the registered producers in the industry must vote at the polls. There is no such protective provision in this legislation; it is wide open. Moreover, there is no provision for any particular majority or even for a majority at all. A number of persons in the industry may come forward with a scheme, and if the minister thinks they constitute a representative number he may approve the scheme or may himself originate a scheme without anybody in the industry wanting it. In that respect the producers in Canada have no protection whereas British producers are protected under the British legislation.

The third respect in which this bill differs from the British act is that the British consumer is protected, whereas there is no protection for the Canadian consumer—and again I am speaking of protection not in the fiscal but in the dictionary sense. I would refer the minister to the provisions of the British act, section 9, subsection 2:

A consumers' committee shall—
(b) be charged with the duty of considering and reporting to the minister on—
(i) the effect of any scheme approved by the minister, which is for the time being in force, on consumers of the regulated product; and
(ii) any complaints made to the committee as to the effect of any such scheme on consumers of the regulated product.

In other words, the British legislators have recognized that the consumer has some rights and some interest in marketing legislation, but under the substantial sections of this bill, the consumer is not recognized. That is a very notable and serious and fundamental omission.

The fourth, and perhaps the most important difference of all between the legislation of Great Britain and this bill, is that in Great Britain the rights and the supremacy of parliament are preserved. Under the British Act a scheme, which must originate with the producers, and be sanctioned by a majority of them, and be not inconsistent with the interests of consumers, goes before both houses of parliament, and the draft of the scheme must be sanctioned by parliament before it is even submitted to a vote of the producers. In this as in so much other legislation which has originated with the government now in office parliament is completely left out of the picture. That is a fundamental and important feature of the proposal now before us. One by one measures are introduced which take away the powers and authority of parliament. I certainly cannot approve, nor do I think my constituents or the producers of this country will approve, of the taking away from parliament of its time-honoured rights and privileges, its function of legislating for and protecting the interests of all classes in the community.

So much by way of introduction to a consideration of the legislation itself. Under this bill, as I have said, a series of orders will be issued to the producers. Perhaps I have dealt with that feature fully enough and need not go further into it. Then what are the objectionable features of the bill from an economic point of view? This is an economic measure. I am dealing with it not on a theoretical basis at all but on a practical basis. To begin with I regard as unnecessary, at least so far as the interests of the producers I represent are concerned, the power to determine the quantity of the regulated products that shall be marketed by any person at any time. I refer to section 4, subsection (1) (a):

The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, have power

(a) to regulate the time and place of marketing the regulated product, and to determine the manner of distribution and the quantity and quality of grade of the regulated product that shall be marketed by any person at any time, and to prohibit the marketing of any of the regulated product of any grade or quality.

Right here let me say that I think there is a fundamental distinction between the power to regulate quantities and the power to regulate quality. In the Fruit Act we have a provision that no cull apples may be placed upon the market except for processing or some similar purpose. I think it is a sound thing to have authority vested in some governmental or other authority to keep poor quality goods and commodities off the market. It puts the producers on the stretch to produce commodities of good quality; it benefits the consumer because it gives him good articles. It is one indication of the progress of our civilization that we improve the product that goes on the market; therefore I cannot object to a power to regulate quality. But I think that is as far as we should go. When this bill goes further and vests in a board the power to determine the quantity of the regulated product which shall be marketed by any person at any time, I think it goes too far. What is the effect of the regulation of quantity? It simply means that the board will have power to withhold goods from the market in order to create a scarcity value, temporarily enhancing the return to the producer at the expense of the consumer. I refer the minister to the experiments in curtailing production by withholding goods from the market that have been tried in various parts of the world during the past fifteen years. The proceedings of the Canadian Political Science Association of 1933 contain three very able speeches on this question, and if the statements made at that meeting are correct, such experiments have uniformly been failures from the standpoint of the producers themselves. I wonder if members of this house are acquainted with what happened in the rubber industry between 1922 and 1928, when the British producers of rubber, seeing that they were producing seventy-five per cent of the world's output, thought they could do what they liked with the market for rubber and decided to curtail production. They did so; they enhanced the price for the time being, but whereas at the beginning of the period they were producing seventy-five per cent of the world's rubber, by 1928 they were producing only forty-eight per cent. The control of the world's rubber market passed out of their hands; the Dutch production rose from sixteen to thirty-four per cent of the world's total. Then the British in alarm again threw themselves into the production of rubber in an effort to regain control of the world's market, and there resulted an overproduction in 1928, 1929 and 1930 which caused the greatest glut of rubber in the world's history and ruined plantations all over the world. That is only one example. The same thing happened with regard to coffee in Brazil.

I want to read from a speech of Professor Drummond before the Canadian Political Science Association, found on page 127 of the proceedings of the 1933 meeting. I read at page 130:

> The Stevenson plan is illustrative of the doubtful wisdom of trying to raise prices by the simple expedient of reducing exports. Substantially similar if not more serious results have followed the adoption of the same principle when applied to the marketing of Brazilian coffee. The chief differences seem to be that in the case of coffee government restriction, instead of raising prices, has finally so reduced them and incidentally reduced the governments to such a degree of financial embarrassment that they are now forced to make the best of a very bad job by carrying out monthly a policy of positive wholesale destruction.

Then on this continent we have had instance after instance of attempts to curtail production by withholding goods from the markets. I am not well versed in the operation of the wheat pools in the west, but I have always understood that their plan of withholding wheat from the markets worked out disastrously. I am subject to the judgment of the western members when I say that, but I have always understood that this attempt to take the world by the throat did not work. Following as well as I can the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee, I do not think that the plan followed since of buying wheat and holding it and the government attempting to support the market has been a conspicuous success. I understand that this government are committed to somewhere around $130,000,000 on guarantees for wheat; that they have an enormous quantity of wheat which they dare not put on the market because it would break the market and that if they could get out at present prices the loss would be only between $12,000,000 and $20,000,000; but they cannot get out because of the impossibility of putting the wheat on the market without disastrous consequences. The same thing happened in the United States under the Hoover regime; they attempted to purchase wheat on a large scale and keep it off the market in order to hold the price up. The election literature in the United States shows clearly what the people of the United States thought of that. They gave up the scheme because it worked as the curtailment of production and the withholding of products from the market always works. They may succeed at the outset, but in the end they prove disastrous; it is a case as Professor Drummond suggests of winning a battle but losing the war. That is one principle of this bill, the power to regulate quantity, which I think is essentially wrong.

Coupled with that provision are the provisions for compensation. This goes to the very vitals of the act:

> (c) to compensate any person for loss sustained by exporting, storing or withholding from the market any product pursuant to any determination or order of the board;

I want to give a little picture of how that would work in the apple industry. To make it very concrete and specific, take the variety known as the Ben Davis, not a very high quality apple but one with a good appearance, and produced in Canada in large quantities. The season for marketing, roughly, is from October 15 to March 15. Let us assume that this federation of marketing boards decides to regulate the marketing of Ben Davis apples. First they must find out how many Ben Davis apples there are likely to be in Canada during the season, and they can only do this by sending a small army of investigators around the country, who will go into the orchards, the warehouses and wherever these apples may be graded or stored. They will have to make estimates of the quantity and the quality, that is to say the pack out, so as to estimate the number of barrels of particular grades there will be. They will decide, possibly, that the number is too large to go on the foreign market, that some of the apples should be kept off that market. Then the question comes up of who are to ship, who are to get in the class of persons who ship to that market. They will have to allot quotas to the shippers, and there are so many thousands of small shippers that inevitably there will be a great deal of injustice. The board also will have to say that so many apples will go forward this week, so many, next week and so many the following week during the period from October 15 in the fall to March 15 in the spring. The shippers who strike the low markets will be aggrieved; the shippers who strike the high market will be satisfied, but those who strike the low markets will want compensation for doing what they could not refuse to do, what they were obliged to do by order of the board.

Then you will have the spectacle of thousands of persons bringing in their affidavits and statutory declarations in order to get compensation. I put that proposition to one gentleman who was speaking in favour of the bill, and he said that was not what was contemplated, that it was compensation from a fund to be provided by the other shippers of Ben Davis apples. In other words there is to be a compulsory pooling of the proceeds. All I can say is that the same principle applies in that case as applies in compensation by the government. I would refer the minister to the experiment of the grape producers in the United States. There are numerous similar instances where all the shippers contribute something to a fund, which fund is paid out to a certain class of the shippers. The Patterson plan in Australia is another example; it is not a success, according to the most recent literature on the subject. That is how this will work out under these compensation provisions.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that merely to describe this situation shows the absolutely unworkability of this act. Perhaps it might be carried out, but if so it will be at tremendous expense. I may say that in the apple industry a scheme of compulsory pooling will put a premium on bad grading, because shippers will desire to get as many No. 1's out of their crop as possible, in order to share in that No. 1 pool. That always has been the result in the past, and undoubtedly it will be the result in the future. That is a provision in the act which I think is unsound. If the minister can give a different interpretation of it or if he can explain it in some other way I should be very glad, but it does seem to me that is exactly how it will work out if this scheme is put into operation at all.

There is another feature to which I should like to refer, and that is the tremendous duplication of facilities that will be brought about. I wonder why this clause was included:

(e) to assist by grant or loan the construction or operation of facilities for preserving, storing, or conditioning the regulated product and to assist research work relating to the marketing of such product;

These are very laudable objects indeed, but cold storage is looked after by the cold storage branch of the Department of Agriculture at the present time; research is attended to by the national research council, so why are we to set up this expensive machinery to do what we have hundreds of civil servants attending to at the present time? This bill not only sets up a very expensive piece of machinery in itself; in addition this machinery duplicates machinery already set up for these very purposes.

My time is drawing to a close and I cannot deal with many other features of this act. I will wait until the bill is discussed in committee to take up some of the other points to which I desire to take exception. I do want to say something now, however, with regard to conditions which exist in that part of the province of Nova Scotia from which I come. I hope I will not bore the members of the house by talking of conditions peculiar to Nova Scotia, but I do want to make a few suggestions as to how I think the objects sought by this bill can be attained in a very much simpler, less expensive and more effective manner so far as my part of that province is concerned, and I offer these suggestions to the minister in all seriousness.

There is no question but that there is a great demand on the part of many of the shippers and producers of apples in Nova Scotia for a marketing board or for some control over the shipment of fruit. That is beyond question, but if I understand the matter correctly it seems to me that what is needed by the apple business in Nova Scotia can be pretty well summed up under three headings without resorting to all this complicated machinery at all. As I tried to say the other night the first is proper inspection. There is an idea prevalent among some persons that the apple crop of Nova Scotia will receive very much better inspection and will be graded and packed a great deal better if we have some marketing boards than would be the case otherwise. That is not so at all. The fruit branch of the Department of Agriculture has charge of the inspection of fruit, and other branches of that department have charge of the inspection and grading of other products. If that work is not being carried out as it should be the department is not doing its duty; that is all. There is a great tendency on the part of many persons throughout the country at the present time to pass new laws and to set up new machinery instead of enforcing the present laws and making use of the present machinery. We have many laws on our statute books at the present time in regard to these matters of inspection, packing and grading, and we have a great deal of machinery as well. But in the province of Nova Scotia the machinery with regard to inspection did not operate well this year. I want to make it very clear that I am not attacking the inspectors individually. There may have been a dozen reasons why, under existing conditions, the inspectors could not do their duty. They may have been too few in number; they may not have had proper supervision; they may not have had the proper morale instilled into them or the proper impetus given them by their superiors. I do not know the reason, but I do know that the inspection certificates issued for fruit this year could not be depended upon. A great many of the packers, in fact the majority, did well; it was a matter of pride to them to have their products open on the British market so well. But side by side with their fruit was other fruit not so well packed. Whose fault was that? In the first place it was the fault of the shippers, and in the second place it was the fault of the government inspectors, or rather, I should say, of the service. The inspectors may have been overworked; there may have been other reasons, but for some reason this year that service did not function as it should.

That is the greatest problem in the fruit industry in the province of Nova Scotia. That problem can be overcome without a dominion marketing board at all; it should be taken in hand by the fruit branch, and the regulations should be enforced in an effective manner . That is point number one. Number two: By a simple amendment to the Fruit Act the Minister of Agriculture, on the advice of the local board in the province of Nova Scotia, could have the power to keep poor fruit off the British market. That is to say, he could make qualitative regulations as to the export of fruit, rather than go further and attempt to say by what boats the shippers shall send their apples, how much they shall send, in what weeks they shall send them, and so on.

Then, number three: The government should pursue a more liberal and to my mind a more sensible British preference policy than they have since the passing of the Ottawa preference agreements. The policy of the government, so far as British goods are concerned, seems to be an exclusionist policy. They should abandon that stand. If they will encourage trade with Great Britain instead of pursuing a policy which may run us into exclusion from the British market they will do more than they could do in almost any other way for the fruit industry of the province of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia they are now talking about the danger of quotas. They refer to Major Elliott, who is attempting to make the United Kingdom self sufficient and who is intimating that certain commodities will be subject to embargo and kept out of the British market. We should do everything possible to encourage freedom of trade between this country and the mother country. That policy would do more than any other to remedy the evils of the fruit situation in the province of Nova Scotia.

I have concluded my observations, Mr. Speaker, on the bill at this stage. I must say that because of the meagreness of the explanation given by the minister it is a difficult stage at which to speak. There may be some reasons for the apparent anomalies in the bill, but standing as it does now it is so bad that I for one do not feel that I can support it.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. members on this side of the house who have preceded me upon their criticisms of this bill. My criticism would be in common with theirs, that while the minister gave us a very fine dissertation upon the marketing of natural products he said very little about the provisions of the legislation under which he purposes carrying on such marketing. I believe one of the difficulties this government are encountering all along the line lies in the fact that they have attempted by way of excessive tariff protection to preserve the price levels in the secondary industries. No attention has been paid the primary industries, with the exception of the assistance they were given by the empire agreements. At the inception of those agreements we were promised that through them very great benefits would accrue to the producers of natural products. We have now had two years of experience with the agreements, and since their inception with very few exceptions there has not been any material benefit, particularly in price levels, to the producers of natural products in Canada. On the contrary wheat prices have gone to the lowest level they have ever reached in the history of Canada, and the producers of that commodity find themselves in a very unfortunate and uncomfortable position.

On the other hand I doubt very much if the excessive tariffs imposed by this government for the protection of the secondary industries have had the desired results, for the very good reason that still over fifty per cent of our population in Canada are engaged in the primary industries. If they are impoverished there is no purchasing power for the products of the secondary industries. True, it may be pointed out that there is some improvement in the price level, but generally speaking such improvement is not sufficient to be of any particular value in improving the employment situation or the general business conditions throughout the country.

From time to time I see statements published by the statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce indicating that there have been tremendous improvements in economic conditions in Canada. I believe the whole scheme adopted by this government for the purpose of improving prices and improving economic conditions in Canada has up to date been a dismal failure. It is quite true that considerable quantities of lumber have been sold during the present year under the empire agreements, but they have been sold at prices which brought no profits to the producers; on the contrary those sales entailed very heavy losses. It is to be hoped that under manufacturing, wage and other prevailing conditions the cut which will be processed this summer may produce better results than the stocks on hand which had to be sold under depressed circumstances.

It is needless to describe the condition of agriculture. A carry-over of more than 200 million bushels of wheat hangs like a black cloud over the markets of the world. No matter what kind of marketing board the minister sets up, there can be no decided increase in wheat prices and the condition of the wheat farmer will not be greatly improved until, as pointed out by one hon. member, some disposition of this carry-over takes place. I am inclined to agree with the statement of the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Ilsley) that perhaps in an attempt on the part of certain bodies in Canada to control prices we had the beginning of our difficulties in connection with wheat. To some extent this government is reaping the results of those attempts. I know that as far back as 1929 very serious reports were coming from Great Britain with respect to this matter. We were bound to lose some of the markets we formerly enjoyed for the sale of this very important commodity; I shall not go into details in that connection. No doubt the government made a laudable attempt to prevent an absolute breakdown in the purchasing of our grain, but at the same time there does appear to have been an attempt to keep prices in Canada slightly beyond world prices, a procedure which in my opinion—and I may be wrong—seems to have had the effect of piling up this surplus from year to year. I do not agree with the statement that we cannot sell wheat, or that we cannot sell more wheat than we are selling. We certainly will not sell wheat if we are not willing to take goods in return. I was shocked to-day upon receiving a statement from some of my friends from western Canada who of necessity must import goods. When I saw the details as to the duty, sales and excise tax, and other charges that were paid, and found that duties amounted to more than one-half of the purchase price of the article, it was clear to me that these people would not purchase abroad again. Every time we Canadians refuse to purchase abroad we narrow the opportunity to sell our goods abroad. If we will not buy, we cannot sell. We are frequently told in this house that foreign countries are refusing to take our grain, but I believe that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who is a good trader, were given power to say that Canada is willing to take goods from countries that formerly took our wheat, we could make a trade to-day that would mean a great deal to the wheat growers and farmers of western Canada. I am confident of that despite the fact that we are often told in this house that European countries are producing more wheat than they ever did. That is true, but at the same time they have been using our grain for mixing purposes and selling their own lower grades, and I believe that they would be willing again to deal with us on a fair and equitable basis. But we cannot expect that if we continue the imposts on imports that have been levied by this government.

I know some of the precautions that have been taken by this government to prevent the importation even of empire goods. That is very much to be deplored. The British market is the one market we have left for our western producers, but day by day we see it slipping away from us. What is a marketing board going to be able to do in promoting the sale of our products in Great Britain if at the same time there is a feeling in Great Britain, as there undoubtedly is, that they are not getting a square deal from Canada in the matter of imposts upon British goods coming into this country? Such imposts can have nothing but a deterrent effect on trade even within the empire, and of course countries outside the empire are going to trade with countries that are willing to trade with them.

I believe, however, that both for our export and for our domestic business a marketing board properly constituted would be very helpful in the marketing of our natural products. I agree absolutely with everything the Minister of Agriculture said to-night with respect to the spread between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays.

It is altogether too great, and it has been a matter for consideration for a number of years. Many contributing factors come in between the producer and the consumer which it would be very difficult to eliminate, and a marketing board, no matter how well organized, or how well clothed with all the necessary authority, will find it very difficult to wipe out entirely all these in-between costs. True, as the minister has pointed out, marketing conditions have changed completely within the last fifteen or eighteen years. They have changed completely within my lifetime. I remember when I marketed the produce of my farm under exactly the same conditions as the minister described to-night, but I cannot do it to-day, and I doubt very much if I shall ever be able to do it again. Why? Because in our endeavours to protect both the producer and the consumer, to ensure the marketing of a higher quality of goods, we have established an elaborate system of inspection from one end of this country to the other. As was stated by a previous speaker, we know that in every stockyard in Canada there are inspectors of our live stock. Our poultry and poultry products, our milk and other dairy products, are all subjected to inspection before going on the local market. To-day it is not as it was in former days when our wives would go and sell our produce on the market without any inspection whatever. Unfortunately sometimes they were sold short. I do not want to be misunderstood; I am not decrying the value of inspection. I believe it is all to the good, but I merely point out that we have set up this very elaborate system of inspection for practically all our produce going on the domestic market, and this system makes it impossible for me as a producer to avoid certain costs that are inevitably entailed. These costs, of course, must be paid by someone and they usually come back to the producer himself.

But if a reasonable board is set up, an in-between board, that will seek to reduce some of the costs that are entailed to-day and yet maintain all the necessary inspection services, I am all for it. I sincerely believe that a board of that kind could be very helpful. On the other hand, I agree with those hon. gentlemen who have criticized, and to my mind so effectively, the provisions of this bill and have said that we have entirely too much machinery, too much duplication of effort all along the line. I am of the opinion that had Mr. McFarland, who to-day is a marketing board in his own person, equipped with the necessary facilities and supplied with plenty of money to carry on the business, been given control at the very inception of the marketing of our wheat we would not have had so much wheat on our hands as we are carrying in Canada at the present moment.

I do not see that all this elaborate machinery of local boards right back to the producer is needed unless it is for the purpose of making this marketing act compulsory upon those who do not wish to come under its benefits, and therein I foresee serious difficulty. I believe that in British Columbia there is a milk prdoucers' organization comprising all but about ten per cent of the producers, and the complaint is that that ten per cent causes all the difficulty and makes the work of that organization of no effect. Just as I object to compulsory, coercive methods anywhere, I object to the provision of this bill that when a majority of those interested in any given locality decide to organize a marketing board, then by the authority of the minister the remainder of the producers of the community must come in or suffer the consequences, and under some of the provisions of this measure the consequences of refusal on the part of the individual producer are serious. I may be wrong, but in my judgment he will have to submit or go out of business, one or the other. That does not sound very good to what my hon. friends across the way used to call red-blooded Canadians. It does not sound very good to me. I do not think we in Canada have arrived at the stage where we can afford to take action of that sort.

There are a good many provisions in this bill which I do not like. I am not going to traverse the ground which has been covered by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, but while I am on the compulsory features of the act, when it is realized that by section 9 the minister himself, upon request or otherwise, without consulting the community involved at all, may by order in council impose willy-nilly upon that community a marketing board without any vote on the part of the producers, without the consent of any of them, I think it will be agreed that that is pretty drastic. The minister may think that he requires these drastic provisions. I am bound to say that in my opinion in any community where that is tried the scheme is bound to be a dismal failure; it could not be otherwise, because Canadians will not submit to that kind of thing.

Perhaps the minister will explain when the time comes, but all along I have failed to understand the necessity for so much compulsion being embodied in this bill. Perhaps inherently I am one of those who believe in freedom and personal liberty. Whatever may be the intentions of my neighbours, I do not like the idea of finding myself having to comply, whether or not I like it, with the carrying on of agriculture along certain defined lines both as to quality and quantity. To-day I have to raise grain of a certain standard of quality, I have to produce bacon of a standard quality or I do not receive the price that I should receive. There is a real incentive to me as an individual to raise the quality of my goods in order that I may receive the highest prices, and that is all to the good. But under this bill if I do not do that I may be told that my goods will not be marketed, that they will be delayed, or that anything may be done with them. I may be allowed to sell only so much and told to hold the rest. Not only is quality involved, but quantity is involved as well. This seems to me to be the most drastic provision of all.

Have conditions come to such a point in Canada that we must be regulated not only with regard to the production of natural products but with regard to the production of our secondary industries? We are to be regulated from the top to the bottom. These are the days of societies and associations for all sorts of purposes. Personal liberty is to go in the interests of the state. This is a splendid socialistic idea but may I say to my hon. friends opposite that it sounds rather curious coming from them. Ever since I have been engaged in political controversy with them they have been the custodians of personal liberty and loyalty. Again I say, have our fiscal and trade policies brought us to such a condition that we find we have a superabundance of labour, a superabundance of natural products and superabundance of secondary industries? Is it not a tragedy of statesmanship when we find ourselves in this unhappy position? We have more goods than we know what to do with, and yet throughout the world millions of people are starving.

The method adopted by the government is curtailment all along the line in order that consumption may catch up with production. We are not the only country in this unfortunate predicament; it appears to be common to the world at large. We seem to be a country willing to adopt the most drastic measures of control. We have swung from a country standing for freedom of individual action to a country which is to be regulated in every regard. We are to be regulated by boards under the authority of the minister in the production of our natural products, and we are to have our secondary industries regulated as well.

I do not think this is the way out. While a properly constituted marketing board, not one as outlined in this bill, could be helpful, I doubt whether it would be of any material benefit. The drastic control provided by this bill may prove to be a boomerang rather than helpful, may do more harm than good. As has been pointed out by the hon. member who preceded me, this has been the result of regulation in other countries. There are many aspects of the bill which I do not like. I do not like the drastic measures which will be employed against me as a farmer if I do not take out a licence and all that that entails. The government pointed out this afternoon that it did not intend to put into execution all the extraordinary provisions of the relief bill, and I do not say that this board will enforce all these regulations. But why set up bugaboos if you do not intend to use the powers provided? Everything the government wants to do can be done after these drastic provisions for dealing with individuals who do not agree to come under the provisions of the bill have been eliminated. I ask the minister to consider this. I agree with practically every word of the minister's statement, but he carefully avoided a discussion of the intimate details of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: The rules of the house require a discussion of the principle only on second reading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We did not even discuss the principle.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the bill contains very wide provisions because the minister covered the marketing of live stock, of dairy products and of natural products. If the compulsory features of the bill were mentioned, I did not hear them, and yet they are the principal features of the bill. For these reasons I intend to oppose the second reading of the bill.

On motion of Mr. Stirling the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

END OF VOLUME II.
