That failure to address an absolutely critical social impact in British Columbia could in fact lead to some very serious reactions on the part of those communities. Again, there have been discussions about blockading highways and making very serious stands because of the failure of the government in its environmental review process to consider the social impacts, in this case particularly, on aboriginal communities.

Would the hon. member be in a position to support the proposal that has been put forward in the amendment of the New Democratic Party, to refer this to a committee study? Given matters such as the refusal to consider the Fort Rupert Indian Band concerns, the concerns of the Nimpkish Band, and the Quatsino Indian Band in the social impacts in their particular area, would the hon. member be in a position to support referral of this particular legislation to a study committee?

Certainly, there has been precedent during the term of the government to do so. I recall when the present Speaker of the House was Minister of Fisheries. He, in the middle of a second reading debate, thought it would be very useful to refer an amendment to the Fisheries Act to a study committee. That study committee came back, and the bill proceeded on through the House.

Would the hon. member support it and, indeed, would his party be prepared to support the amendment that we put before the House?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and I must apologize for not knowing the details of the project in British Columbia to which he is referring.

The point that he has raised about the social aspect of the environmental concerns, particularly on native reserves, is a very good one and clearly points out one more difficulty with this legislation.

He is addressing an aspect of the environmental review process and an element of environmental impacts of large projects, namely their effects on society and on the culture and way of life of our native people. We cannot afford to overlook that, certainly not after the situation that has taken place this summer and with the ongoing concerns raised by the Cree, for example, in Quebec over the James Bay hydroelectric project.

The problems with Bill C-78, as well as some of the other concerns with the lack of specific regulations to accompany this bill, lead me to suggest that his concern and that of his party about referring the bill to a study committee are well taken and perhaps should be seriously considered.

• (1730 )

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member. In this House which all too often operates on a pure adversarial basis, the member has given us a very well balanced presentation. I think it is all the more important to understand his very deep criticisms of the bill given the fact that he really did attempt to address the bill in as objective a way as possible.

One of the underlying theses, of course, of any piece of legislation is that the government possesses the requisite national will to really implement a fully and, in this particular case, a truly revolutionary policy in terms of environmental awareness.

I wonder if he would comment as to whether he thinks this government has that kind of national will.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be able to answer that question. I thank my hon. colleague for his question.

Of course this element of will is one which we, on this side of the House, have been trying to assess from this government ever since the last election. We have seen that the government has a lot of will, but we wonder about the direction in which that will has been placed.

It has demonstrated a great deal of will to ride roughshod over Canadians when it wants to get its tax agenda forward and on economic policy, but on environmental matters we have seen delay and delay. First of all, we have seen a green plan agenda, which is merely questions and no real actions. We have seen a Bill C-78, which is long overdue, but still is weak in many areas.

I guess the real test of a government's will is its actions and its commitment, its concrete actions. So far what we have seen is a fair bit of good rhetoric and polite words to indicate that the government is serious about environmental concerns, but we have not seen really concrete actions. This bill is the first acid test, really, of a government's concrete commitment. I think that to be fair, it is somewhat short of perfection.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member fails to say that this bill will pass the test of public scrutiny. I would like to help the hon. member by pointing out that the government believes that public participation is essential to achieving an appropriate integration of economic development and environmental protection. This act will specifically improve public awareness and participation by early notification. For example, proponents will be required to inform the public through advertising and other appropriate means of major project proposals at an early stage of the assessment process. Public comments will be invited at that time.

Then there is the public registry which will be established for each project to facilitate access to information on that project.

As well, there are the public hearings. Review panels for major projects being assessed will be required to hold public hearings to allow the public to present their views and recommendations.

As well, there is public input. Public comments must be considered by the responsible authority before making a decision on a project which has undergone an environmental assessment.

As well, Mr. Speaker, let me point out that reports and follow-up are to be made public. When the minister receives a report from a review panel or from a mediator, it must be made public. Similarly, the government response must also be made public. May I also remind the hon. member of the annual report. The minister will be required to report annually to Parliament on the implementation of the process. Then there are the regulations, including those that establish mandatory study lists and inclusion list, that will be published in draft form for public consultation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the member of the funding. Participants in public reviews or mediations will be eligible to apply for financial assistance. I would be curious as to whether or not the member remembers this.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, all of those things are what one would expect as a minimum in this day and age from a proper environmental review process. We would expect all of those items which the hon. member has mentioned. As far as the funding, we have to wait and see how much the government is prepared to commit to intervener funding and whether the groups that are affected by projects will be able to make their case known and will have the requisite financial assistance to be able to make their cases known. until we have that information, which we do not have now, there is no way we can assess whether this government is serious.

Basically the litany of public participation opportunities which he has provided, and it is a good list, is really what we would expect from an environmental review process in Canada today. But I think we can count on more from this government.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise again to continue debate on Bill C-78. I want to focus my remarks at the outset on the remarks of my colleague for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake when he talked about the undue haste of this government.

What we have seen with the process of the prestudy committee that has been established, and now we are into second reading debate on this, is a real treachery. Canadians who are watching this debate and wondering what is going on here should know that what is going on is the government is trying to rush through this legislation.

I know there is an impatience among Canadians for real environmental assessment review legislation. They must be curious as to our opposition to this legislation. We have to get it right. Canadians are impatient. They want real environmental assessment review, but this Bill C-78 is not it.

As the associate critic for environment for my party, I have reviewed the legislation at length. What I see in the legislation is a real smoke and mirrors game. It would indicate from the briefing notes that this was exactly what Canadians wanted, that it is part of the over-all plan of this government which they say, and which should be commended, that there will be a real priority given to the environment.

The bill was first introduced on June 18, 1990. It was there to address longstanding dissatisfactions concerning environmental assessment at the federal level. But it was also the product of a likely internal struggle within government between advocates for a more effective environmental assessment, and opponents who feared their interests and discretionary authority would be reduced.

So we have the classic struggle between those people who want the legislation strengthened and those proponents of projects who are saying now: "Listen, you are going to hurt us economically if you make it tough for us to proceed". This is what we are doing here. This is why we are debating this, rather than talking about a prestudy with all of the resources of government behind that prestudy.

This is why the government is now trying to push this through, because it has opted for the proponents. It has opted to see that the economy is going to proceed. It is still of the mindset that the economy and the environment are at two polar ends. It does not yet see that in order for us to advance economically and environmentally, those terms, environment and economy, must be integrated. Bill C-78 is shot full of holes. The government wants to push it through in the wrong-headed approach of advancing the economy.

As my colleague for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake pointed out, we have to stop thinking in the short term environmentally. We have to stop thinking in the short term economically. We have to think long term. It is not just this generation. It is not just these projects that have been in the news these past few weeks. It is the economy and the future of our world. As a mother of teenage children, I hope to be able to make this country and this world a better place environmentally for my children. That is one of the motivations that brought me to Parliament. I felt that I could make an impact. In opposing this legislation, I am already doing that.

We in the New Democratic Party have been strongly critical of Bill C-78. That is one of our jobs as an opposition party, to oppose what we see as flawed legislation. It is also one of our responsibilities to give alternatives. That is too often under-reported in the media because we, too, have ideas. In today's Gallup poll, it mentioned that if an election were called today perhaps the NDP would have the responsibility of being the government. We are prepared for it. We have the ideas, we have the commitment. All we need now is the support of Canadians in order to implement those ideas.

I want to turn the focus away not just from criticizing Bill C-78, because there is a lot to criticize, but I want to put forward some principles for alternatives. This is the positive approach of being an opposition party. We have the ideas.

I will read from a paper by Robert B. Gibson, head of the Department of Environment and Resource Studies at the University of Waterloo. He challenges us as legislators to look at environmental assessment in an entirely new way. I want to read some of this into the record because these ideas are worthy of our intention. In his opening paragraph, he states:

> A curse of sorts must hang over environmental legislators. —the legislators now face a world—

We have tried it. We have tried the regulatory approach and other approaches.

> —in which environmental worries are deeper and more extensive than they were two decades ago, where public mistrust is greater and critics more convinced than ever that fundamental changes are needed in the way we treat the environment.

What we have to do is change our mindset. We have to stop looking at the environment as being isolated from the economy. There too the environment and the economy are linked. If we degrade the environment, we degrade our economy. That is why this legislation is so flawed. There are all sorts of inadequacies that legislators and critics of legislation have pointed out over the years. Some of them have been cited here in the House of Commons.

There is a history involved in environmental legislation. There is the regulatory approach which I cited earlier. We found that the regulatory approach is far too narrow. We are talking about the approach where the individual pollutants and polluting activities were addressed in the regulations. But it was not enough.

Environmental legislation came out of the response to the inadequacies of the regulatory approach. Early environmental assessment requirements usually went a little further by demanding somewhat more comprehensive efforts to identify and evaluate the potential environmental effects and proposed undertakings. That was not enough either. Environmental considerations remain peripheral in public and private sector deliberations.

Broad areas of environmentally significant decision making were untouched by assessment requirements.

This is the old legislation, which is superior actually to this Bill C-78. This is where we are now.

Meanwhile, environmental challenges grew. In the Brundtland commission report, we have now faced global scale threats which require significant departures from business as usual. This is a world commission on environment and development, chaired by former Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland. The essential environmental challenge facing all nations is that current human demands and practices considered at a global level are not environmentally sustainable. To put it bluntly, as Bob Gibson cites, we are killing the plant. This is where we have to move from the short-term considerations to the long-term view.

This is what not just Canadians but citizens of the world are feeling frustrated with. The legislators seemed inadequate up to date to realize that. We are not talking election to election. We are talking into the next century. I think that anyone who has children and has a responsibility to leaving this world a better place for them must realize that we have to give up that mindset. We have to think long term.

The major roots of the problem include the general failure in the past to ensure that biophysical and socio-economic factors were considered along with the usual financial and technical considerations in government and corporate decision making. What we are talking about is the test of sustainability, incorporating that test of sustainability into corporate and government decision making. It is much easier said than done. I am not going to be shy in admitting that. It is a major challenge facing legislators.

Once we get our heads around what the major principles are, I think that we are up to it. Let us give this House some credit. There are intelligent people here on both sides of the House. I know that will come as a surprise, given the kind of environment out there, the kind of psychic environment that we are all no-goods. I think that kind of psychic environment really degrades what most of us here are about, that we are trying to make a contribution. This kind of flimflammery on the part of the government on Bill C-78 just feeds that psychic environment.

We must pass the test of sustainability when we are talking about the environmental assessment. We recognize the difficulties. We recognize the challenges. We cannot turn our backs to that. It is just too important.

There are no viable options. There are none. I know that we can get ourselves really depressed considering what the options are if we fail in this. If we continue along the same old way, business as usual, we know what is facing us. We know that we are in big trouble environmentally, not just in Canada but globally.

We as a developed country, as a rich country, have a responsibility to take a lead in developing this kind of legislation. We could be a model for the international community, but we are losing that option if this bill goes through because it is flawed. It is terribly flawed. Because we have a responsibility as a developed country, we have the means, we have the educational facilities, we have the economic options that many of the countries of the world do not have.

We know that one of the strongest determinants for environmental degradation is poverty. We certainly have poverty in Canada, far too much for my liking, but when we consider what is going on in Brazil, Indonesia, El Salvador, or the desertification in Africa and when we consider the kind of options we have compared to the options of those people in those countries, we are very well off.

Of course we have a responsibility to Canadians. As legislators in the House of Commons that is where our first responsibility lies, but we have to stop thinking just in terms of national borders. We have to think about our global environment. That is where I think the short-sightedness, the short-term thinking of this kind of legislation really fails us. Environmental assessment must therefore begin long before a project or other undertaking is proposed. The change of mindset is essential.

I want to give a little of example of what I mean by that. If, for example, the problem is an anticipated gap between electricity supply and demand, it matters greatly whether the problem is treated as a deficiency of supply, implying a need for additional generating capacity, or an excess of demand, implying a need for conservation and efficiency measures.

This is what we have to think about and not keep being seduced by the growth phenomenon. Growth, at what cost? This is the kind of criticism that we have in our party of some of the initiatives that have gone forth in the last few weeks. I am talking particularly about Hibernia where of course there are jobs, and Newfoundland needs them. Newfoundland has long been an underdeveloped part of the country and the people of Newfoundland have suffered because of that. We in our party recognize that projects like Hibernia cannot proceed and jobs cannot be given at any cost.

This is what we are talking about: the test of sustainability. We have to be able to think about not just how we can grow but whether or not to grow is our best option.

I want to make it clear that I am not opposed to jobs. I also come from an island which has suffered from unemployment. I am quite sensitive to the kind of impact unemployment has on a community, the kind of social problems that it creates, the kind of emotional problems it gives people and how it degrades families. I am quite aware of that, but the challenge for us in drafting environmental legislation is to merge that socio-economic and environmental concern.

We can do it because sensitive, long-term thinking and environmental assessment legislation will create jobs. They will not be the same kind of jobs, but what we are talking about is a readjustment of values.

Why shouldn't the person working at a recycling plant be paid union scale? Why not? If our values are our environment and support for our communities, then why shouldn't that person be paid union scale? Why shouldn't he or she be earning $18 an hour, sufficient money to be able to support a family?

This is why I am talking about environmental legislation being merged. Socio-economic and environmental concerns have to be merged, and that requires a redefinition of the environment to a more broad definition. We have to cover the economic and cultural environment as well as the biophysical environment.

Some existing environmental assessment legislation already incorporates such a definition. It is right here in the province of Ontario, the Environmental Assessment Act. I am not saying that it is not flawed, but it incorporates that broad definition of socio-economic and environmental.

Environmental legislation which is initiated or revised today must have interim criteria. We know that the legislation which we bring forth in this House is only a step. Some of us are humble enough to know that we do not know everything. We know that it will be flawed, so interim criteria have to be there.

Some of those interim criteria are: protecting and enhancing the existing and future well-being of all people and recognizing the dependency of Canadians on the well-being of the biosphere and other people sharing it. One again I want to allude to our global responsibility. As a rich developed nation we have that responsibility. We also have to require undertakings to offer net positive biophysical and socio-economic improvements and net reductions in Canadian resource requirements and environmental impositions.

Mr. Speaker, I see you signalling that I have only one minute remaining. I will try to sum up. There is a hope for a change of mindset, and that is what is required: a merging of the economy and the environment.

I also want to reiterate that Canada is in a perfect position to be a leader in this area internationally. We have the means. We have the international reputation, overstated in my analysis but it is there. Let us use it to effect. We have to get good environmental legislation. We have to recognize that it is an interim move. We have to show a model to the world that we are serious about an environmental assessment review.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we in this House respond to a number of publics: the very narrow one which exists on this Hill that we sometimes think is the whole world; the truly important one, the broader one to which we respond, the Canadian public; and then there is that constituency, in this particular case the environmental network, about which there has been concern and which in many ways is leading public opinion. The hon. member and I were recently at a meeting involving that particular constituency, the environmental network per se, and I wonder if she could give her comments on its reaction to this particular bill.

Ms. Hunter: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be only too pleased to give the environmental network's assessment of this bill.

I had the pleasure of having dinner with a number of the group members who looked at this legislation. They are not very happy with it. In fact they are the ones who are pushing us to stop it. It is so fatally flawed that they want it out of here. They realize that the government is trying to push through this legislation in order to satisfy its short-term view, and also it is the old smoke and mirrors routine.

In the Canadian environmental network good, sound environmentalists that they are, are well aware of what the government is doing. I think the best thing for the government to do is to withdraw this bill and have it redrafted considerably.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the member a question. In environmental matters generally the people are concerned about the air we breathe, the land on which we live, the water we drink, those kinds of issues. She referenced a whole bunch of other things like whether union employees should make $18 an hour as one of the things we ought to look into. Then she talked about the Environmental Assessment Act of Ontario being such a good bill as an example. I realize it was brought in by a Conservative government many years ago in Ontario. For five years the Liberals tried to use it and did not, and now the NDP in Ontario has its chance.

Could the member the member tell me of one hearing, of one successful hearing, of one ruling, of one decision that has been made under an Environmental Assessment Act hearing in Ontario if she thinks it is that good? I can tell her there is none, but maybe she would like to comment.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, yes, I would be pleased to comment. I think it enabled me to point out another flaw in this legislation. There has to be enabling legislation to make it enforceable. That is what we are talking: enforceability.

Sure, we can wheedle, we can plead, and we can suggest but really what we need to have is laws, enforceable laws, laws that people know will be enforced and that there will be fines or imprisonment for degrading our environment.

IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, copies of the annual report to Parliament, Immigration Plan for 1991–1995.

IMMIGRATION PLAN FOR 1991–1995

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to table today the government's annual report to Parliament which provides an immigration plan for Canada for 1991 to 1995.

I should point out that this is the first time that the government has introduced a five-year plan. Traditionally, we have had in our Parliament a one-year plan on immigration. This five-year planning horizon is only one of the innovations that we have introduced to ensure that immigration to Canada continues to play an important role in our government's social and economic policies.

By adopting a five-year time horizon, there is sufficient lead time for our many partners in the process to develop their own plans to accommodate the people who wish to come to Canada.

I stress this need for planning and management of the process, because many people try to reduce this important policy initiative to a simple game of numbers.

Mr. Speaker, there are real people behind those numbers—people with real stories, real hopes and dreams—people who have chosen Canada as their new home.

[English]

It is our responsibility as a government to ensure that policies and program are in place to ensure that these people can integrate quickly and comfortably into Canadian society.

As part of my report, I am very pleased to provide a new federal integration strategy which will ensure greater collaboration with the provinces, with immigrant-serving organizations, and with the private sector, as well as new programs and funding for language training for newcomers to Canada.

Much of the strategy was developed as a result of the extensive consultation process that I initiated across the country this past year, a process that included the broadest range of organizations and individuals ever put together from different walks of life and with varying perspectives on immigration.

There are clearly many points of view across Canada on how many immigrants we should accept, the type of immigrants we should encourage and the programs and services that we should provide. Of course, there are finite limits to our ability and to our resources.

As a government, we must make the difficult choices that are necessary to balance the range of opinions, the range of interests and the motives of all Canadians, and still live within our budgetary and other constraints.

To ensure that our choices are good for Canada, we spent close to two years examining the range of options available to us, against the backdrop of our domestic needs, our international obligations, our moral obligations to our own values and our ability to accommodate people coming to Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have made these choices well. We propose a moderate increase in total immigration over the next five years rising from 200,000 people this year to 220,000 next year and to a maximum of 250,000 in 1992 and beyond.

In allowing that moderate growth, we propose to restore the traditional proportional balance among the three streams of immigration—the family, refugee, and independent categories. To accomplish this balance, we have been required to re-examine the nature of family immigration and to re-define "the family" using the criterion of real dependency.

In practical terms, this means that Canadians will be allowed to sponsor spouses and fiancé (e)s; all dependent children, regardless of their age or marital status; all parents, regardless of age or their sponsor's length of residence in Canada; and all adopted children, regardless of age, who are legitimately dependent on their parents.

• (1110)

To allow for these new provisions, we have been forced to exclude adult, non-dependent children. But they may still be eligible to immigrate to Canada under the assisted relatives class.

[English]

We will also discontinue the "retirees" program in 1990, since most retirees who were born in Canada and who wish to return in the retirement will be able to do so under other categories.

We have also chosen to continue Canada's fine record of humanitarianism by providing for generous numbers of government and privately-sponsored refugees, in addition to the people who will have their claims accepted within Canada.

Finally, we will be making a number of adjustments in the independent category to ensure that skilled workers are selected in accordance with both national and provincial economic needs and objectives.

While our choices as a government are difficult, they are no more difficult than the individual choices of those people who choose to come to Canada, who have come here to build new lives. As Canadians we must do everything possible to ensure that we understand both the challenges and the opportunities that immigration provides for us. We must each play a part to ensure that we provide a genuine welcome to those who have chosen Canada as their new home.

In tabling this report, I look around and see the faces of many people who either directly or through a family member know the reality of the immigration experience. It was that reality that directed our choices and our planning. It is that genuine understanding of the people affected that will govern our actions during the course of this plan.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the minister for having given us a chance to analyse the document she just tabled in this House, her five-year plan.

Mr. Speaker, it was a good try by the minister, considering she had to convince both her cabinet colleagues and the Tory caucus, who so often recommended freezing the number of immigration admissions to our country.

The minister is to be commended for moving slowly but surely towards the 1 per cent rate we Liberals have been demanding for several years.

However, Mr. Speaker, we can hardly rely on the figures given in this shiny new five-year plan, because so far, the minister's projections have never been realized.

The levels announced for 1990 are way off the mark, not only in terms of figures but also in terms of the various classes.

In 1988, the same minister tabled another shiny new plan which, according to her, would deal with the backlog of refugee claims that still exists today. Two years later, not more than 20 per cent of these cases have been settled, and now we have another plan, not for two years but five.

What these plans prove is that immigration in Canada is completely out of control. What we need is a return to principles. There was a time when immigration was subject to the vagaries of a changing economy. That is a thing of the past. Today, progressive minds see immigration as one of the major motors of our economy.

In a country with such a low population density, immigration, if dealt with intelligently, compassionately, and with sufficient planning, is an effective lever for developing our economic and human resources.

The fact is, we don't have too many immigrants in this country, Mr. Speaker. We don't have enough!

It is easy to fall into the trap of applying mainly economic criteria when analysing this question and to overlook the sociological and demographic reality we can expect in the decades to come.

The facts are clear, and the statistical projections are impressive. Basically, we have an ageing population in this country which does not reproduce in sufficient numbers to ensure replacement. For the past fifteen years, the birthrate has been below the levels required to maintain the present population.

At this rate, our population will increase during the next few years, reaching a peak of 28 million Canadians 25 years from now, and then dropping to 15 million 25 years after that.

Mr. Speaker, clearly we must take steps now to deal with the consequences of this demographic curve, because if our population ever dropped to that level, this country will face serious socio-economic consequences. Just consider the impact of the following: a dramatic reduction in our productive labour force with the resulting drop in tax revenue, plus the need to meet the demands of an ageing population. To survive and prosper, we must compensate for our falling birthrate and maintain the labour force levels we need to maintain our level of economic activity.

[English]

We must decide now. Do we want Canada, over the next 50 years, to be an important country in the world, or are we satisfied to keep the status quo, becoming in the long run a marginal member of the global entity?

Today, everybody talks about our financial deficit. We do not have only a financial deficit. We have another deficit as important, maybe even more important. We have a human deficit which is increasing and becoming more threatening every day.

In the document tabled today, the minister puts great emphasis on her federal integration strategy, on Canadian values, and on national pride. This is only wishful thinking and good intentions.

The minister failed to outline a detailed action plan, specific objectives, and, last but not least, a budget.

In the document tabled today, the Minister puts great emphasis on her federal integration strategy, on Canadian values and national pride.

But it is only wishful thinking on her part since she failed to outine an action plan, specific objectives, and, last but not least, a budget.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian association of school counselors tells us that, due to a lack of resources, 125,000 to 150,000 immigrant children do not receive any education in French or in English. School authorities simply do not have the resources needed to deal with this sudden influx.

Mr. Speaker, this document does not say anything about a plan to make the Canadian population aware of the social changes related to immigration. We must act quickly to develop a strategy to inform and educate the Canadian public on the still unknown—and therefore threatening—issue of immigration.

Statistics show that roughly one Canadian out of three is reluctant, not to say unwilling, to welcome immigrants to Canada.

Information and education are the best guarantees we have against all forms of racism. This is one of the serious problems with this five-year plan.

Just a year ago, in the great burst of compassion, we expanded our definition of the family for immigration purposes. The minister announced the government's plan on the new family reunification to include all children who had never been married.

• (1120)

Today, in a drastic stroke, she again closes the door on families. Reduce access to families, that is another tragic aspect to the minister's five-year plan.

[Translation]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, today the Minister, with her plan and her big numbers, will give hope to a lot of people here and throughout the world. But we know very well that she can never stick to her plans. This is why we urge her to look beyond her rhetorical speeches and to give her department the resources it needs to implement the five-year plan.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I do commend the minister for several aspects of her report. One is the innovation of the five-year plan which is very necessary, not only for potential immigrants planning to come to Canada, but for immigration staff and Canadian citizens planning or preparing to receive them.

Also, I commend her for undertaking to move toward the level of 250,000 immigrants per year which has a good deal of public support, especially from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, but also from many others.

I commend the minister, also, for one of her decisions regarding the funding of language training and I will come to that later.

However, there are several matters which I cannot commend and I do not agree with her that she has maintained the proportion of family reunification to independent immigration to refugee immigration. In fact, family immigration has not been sustained by her government for several years at the proportion that it used to have and that most people have intended that it should have. There is nothing here to indicate an increase in proportion to the increase in total immigration.

In fact, there is a memo that was leaked to The Toronto Star last month which suggests that immigration posts abroad will process some family members more slowly, last in line. As it is now, it takes two years for many posts to get a family member over here. The new plan makes some wishes but has no provisions for speeding this up.

There is also no attempt to increase the number of government-sponsored refugees selected overseas from the large pool that desperately need resettlement. In fact, the restriction for the last half year on the loan program, in violation of a written agreement with private sponsoring groups, has seriously hindered the bringing in of privately sponsored refugees as well. There is no clear assurance that the loan program will be restored even though several months ago Parliament voted a very generous sum of money for that purpose.

The minister also does not take into account the fact that the Department of External Affairs announced at the beginning of July that it would be reducing the number of visa officers overseas and at home. In other words, the expansion that the minister undertakes is not being matched by staff and is actually going to be hindered by staff if the Department of External Affairs carries out its program of restructuring and cuts.

Within Canada, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has not announced any increases in staff or money to handle the extra workload that the minister has undertaken. We know from past experience, certainly in Toronto, about the line-ups that start in the small hours of the morning and continue all day long. We know that the minister does not have enough staff to handle the work even as it is now.

The good news about language training is that the minister has undertaken verbally $200 million over the next four years to teach English or French as a second language to adults. This is what her staff gave us last night.

The bad news is that there is no willingness at all to assist the schools of Canada in teaching English and French as a second language to children and the SLT program of last year has, of course, been cancelled. In Ontario alone, there will be tens of thousands of children in school who are not being served by second-language programs and that will seriously hold back their education and the education of others in the same school classes.

Finally, I wish to point out that the relative priority being given in this program is the continuing increase in the proportion of independent immigrants. This is questionable in two ways, one of which I have already mentioned. It is done at the expense of family immigration and at the expense of government-sponsored refugees which is frozen at the level of 13,000. It has been at for several years and, according to her report, will be frozen for the next five years. It also raises a question of what the government's motive is in going abroad for independent immigrants.

We have heard it suggested, especially from the other side, that the government has to find skilled people at the lowest cost. In other words, there are poor countries who manage to train a few skilled people or a few highly educated people. We would like to go and scoop those up and bring them to Canada, rather than the government, at any level in the country, spending the money needed to train Canadians, whether they have been born here or not. It would be foolish, as has been done over past generations, to rely on simply bringing our skilled trades and our highly educated professions from overseas.

For one thing, if they move to Canada they may still be footloose and move on to the United States; that is a pattern we have observed. For another, it hurts the training programs for Canadians and stultifies the opportunities for Canada's young people to grow up and learn the trades that are needed in our country.

Therefore, I regret that the same minister who is responsible for training programs seems to want to undercut those programs with her program for independent immigration.

All and all, although there are certain details of this program that seem to be well managed, the main thrust of it is still not what the Canadian people want or need.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford, on a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since this question goes to the very heart of the linguistic duality of this country and the minister has made a major announcement today, I would appreciate an opportunity to address the House and comment very briefly on the minister's speech, since what she said is important to Quebec's linguistic and demographic balance. In fact, the survival of French-speaking Quebec may be threatened by her immigration levels if immigration is not controlled under the provisions we hoped—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I take it the hon. member is rising and asking the Chair if it would be appropriate that he have the same privileges as the two official opposition parties in responding to the minister. That is the point. The hon. member may be moving on to saying what he would say, if he was replying to the minister, but I have his point.

I have a problem, the hon. member knows that, with the rules. I would ask him to address that particular point and then I will hear other members.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Without addressing the substance of the debate, in accordance with the Standing Orders, I believe we represent an important group in this House which has a point of view it wishes to communicate to the House. I think that, in response to the minister's speech regarding a number of questions of particular interest to us, and in the name of democracy and especially in the name of freedom of expression in this House, I believe it would be appropriate for us to have a chance to comment on speeches as important as the one the minister just made, which has a major impact on the constituents we have the privilege to represent.

Mr. Speaker, I am not asking for special favours. I only ask that occasionally, we be given an opportunity to respond to important announcements made by the government. I am sure the government would not object if we were allowed to comment on speeches made in this House to give Parliament first notice of their policies.

Consequently, if the purpose of ministers' statements is to give advance notice to parliamentarians, out of respect for this House and what this institution represents, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the government and members of other parties in this House would be interested to hear the views of the various groups sitting in this Chamber. This goes to the very core of this institution and our democratic traditions.

For instance, as far as immigration is concerned, I am sure that the Quebec perspective is of particular interest to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the Minister of External Affairs, who has an abiding interest in Quebec issues. So I would like to be able to oblige by expressing my point of view.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am just as deeply interested in questions related to the interests of Quebec as I am in democratic issues. Democracy calls for respect for rules, Mr. Speaker, and the rules of the House are clear.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I feel I must respond because the member for Shefford did refer to me personally. First I would remind him that the Standing Orders are quite clear when it comes to ministerial statements, that is who can respond and how.

Mr. Speaker, I fully agree that this morning's ministerial statement is important and that the parties in opposition to the government have the right to reply. I did say the parties in opposition to the government have the right to reply. The Standing Orders are quite clear on that point. For the benefit of hon. members, allow me to read Standing Order 33(1):

> 33.(1) On Statements by Ministers, as listed in Standing Order 30(3), a Minister of the Crown may make a short factual announcement or statement of government policy. A Member from each of the parties in opposition to the government—

I underscore the words "parties in opposition"—

> —may comment briefly thereon. The time for such proceedings shall be limited as the Speaker deems fit.

The minister spoke for seven minutes and I think that the opposition parties, certainly the Official Opposition and the third party, the New Democratic Party, did keep to the allotted time.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, the member for Shefford wants to debate the matter. He is entitled to do that. The debate has been opened by the minister's statement and it will go on, I imagine, during Question Period and probably during comments and statements by members under Standing Order 31. He will have every opportunity to comment on the decision. I know him well enough to realize he will do that without hesitation.

He said something like "we are an important faction in this House". He did not say "we are a political party of the House', he said "we are an important faction in this House'. That is what he said. Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders do not say anything about factions having the right to respond to ministerial statements. The Standing Orders are clear, only duly recognized parties can do so. If the hon. members want, I could talk for several minutes or even several hours, read all the precedents since 1963 when the Standing Orders were changed, and even from the Parliament of Canada Act which gives a definition of party leader and determines who can be considered as such.

Mr. Speaker, in effect, what the hon. member for Shefford said is that, as an independent member of this House—it is his official status—, he would like to reply to the Minister. I am sorry but the Standing Orders do not allow him to do this. I agree with him that it is a very important issue. We are all concerned with—me as much as anybody else—the issue of linguistic duality. I certainly do not need a lecture from anybody on this. However, I, among others, would like to see the House function in a somewhat orderly fashion, which could be accomplished if the hon. members followed the rules as they are written.

If the rule in question is poorly written, I think it can be modified if a majority of members agree. But, in its current version, it clearly specifies that only the opposition parties have the right to reply. As far as I know, the group to which the hon. member for Shefford belongs is not recognized as a party in this House. Mr. Speaker, if we must start debating today what constitutes a party in this House, I am ready to do it right now. And I would like to have my say on this fundamental issue: how do we know what constitutes a political party and what are the definitions contained in the Canada Elections Act and the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

And since the hon. member for Shefford maintains that he is not a political party, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to tell him that we cannot accommodate his request to reply to the Minister, but not because we are opposed to what he is going to say or to his freedom of speech. Even though freedom of speech is sacred in this House, we must follow the rules. Under the item of business called "routine proceedings", the Minister made a statement she had a right to make and to which we replied. In previous rulings, former Speakers, namely Mr. MacNaughton, Mr. Lamoureux and Mr. Jerome, have always maintained that independent members do not have the right to reply to Ministers' statements.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say that we acknowledge and appreciate the fact that the minister made the statement on major changes to Canada's immigration policy in the House today, which permitted then an opportunity for recognized opposition parties to respond.

I share the concern my hon. friend from Shefford obviously has in wanting to respond. I know as a member from the western part of Canada where these changes will have a major impact on our communities, I too would like to respond. The rules limit me from doing so. I also acknowledge that there are other members who are independent members whom I am sure would similarly have views that they too would like to reflect on in terms of this major announcement.

As the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier pointed out, Standing Order 33(1) makes it clear what we can do within the rules. The only alternative my hon. colleague would have would be to seek unanimous consent—we do that from time to time—to overlook the Standing Orders or to alter them in order to let a certain event to occur.

That is the only procedure I see available. Mr. Speaker, your hands are tied, and in a sense our individual hands are tied, but that would be the only way that the hon. member for Shefford would have a chance of responding as would others, if they received unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see other members rising. If they wish, I of course will hear them. I do not think I need to hear further on this point.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I simply had some precedents that I thought might be of assistance to you in dealing with this issue from 1963, 1966 and 1979. I can summarize them briefly if it would be of any assistance to Your Honour.

If not, I am prepared to rely on the arguments advanced by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Kamloops which I submit are correct and in accordance with these precedents.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I am very familiar with the precedents.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt because we do not want to be seen in any way as preventing the opposition from participating in an important issue.

I, too, have gone through the precedents fairly carefully, and it seems to me that the precedents are quite clear that even though a group within the House is not a recognized party according to the parliamentary act that we deal with, often in the past the Speaker has allowed those members to intervene and make statements.

I think that would be the case here today, except for one rather unique exception; that is, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, we are dealing with a group that has not been registered as a party electorally. I think that does have a significant impact on how it can be treated within the Chamber. Essentially, that is a very serious difficulty. The Speakers' precedents in the past have been very clear, that independents were not allowed the privilege of responding to ministerial statements because they did not represent a party. Even though we now have a group that think of themselves as a party, they are in fact not registered as one within the House or with the Electoral Act of Canada.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): I am pleased that my colleagues have now established a certain number of criteria they would like to see applied when a party is recognized as such.

Mr. Speaker, we would also like to benefit from your great wisdom and would appreciate if you could tell us whether the Canada Elections Act takes precedence over the precedents of this House and whether the Canada Elections Act or the legislation dealing with political parties provide for de facto recognition within this institution.

Mr. Speaker, if technically, one must register with the Chief Electoral Officer a reference was made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the parliamentary secretary I would like some clarification in this respect. I read comments by some of our colleagues in the Hill Times, and not that I want to advertise the fact, but it is clear that some of our colleagues tend to emphasize the importance of registration with the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. Speaker, I raised the matter because it keeps popping up every time. We sent you a joint statement that we had formed a political group in this House. We believe this House controls its own destiny and its own rules. I did not imagine the Canada Elections Act and registration with the Chief Electoral Officer in any way affected the recognition of parliamentary groups by this House or their recognition for income tax purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I know you are an eminent lawyer, and I was counting on your insight. Actually, I would be tempted to approach this as a question of privilege, because the question of registration is brought up time and time again. I would like to know how the matter of registration impacts legally on our status here in the House. I wish you would rule on that once and for all. It would also help the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and other members who regularly refer to this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore wish to seek the unanimous consent of the House for commenting briefly on the immigration question, since I don't think we have settled the issue of party status, but I raise this question with a big question mark, and I would appreciate the benefit of your wisdom.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Shefford for his comments, and the other members—

[English]

—the hon. member for Ottawa Vanier, the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands, the hon. member for Kamloops, the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and the parliamentary secretary.

This is very interesting, because the hon. member for Shefford is seeking an interpretation from the Chair respecting certain laws of Canada. A legal interpretation might be very interesting. I am tempted but, unfortunately for the hon. member for Shefford, it is not the Chair's role to interpret the Statutes of Canada. Consequently, I must reject the hon. member's request. I have taken a few moments of the time of the House to discuss a matter which, as I said before, is most interesting but it is an area that is closed to the Chair.

[English]

I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members rule 33. It is very clear.

[Translation]

> 33. (1) On Statements by Ministers, as listed in Stanting Order 30(3), a Minister of the Crown may make a short factual announcement or statement of government policy. A Member from each of the parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly thereon. The time for such proceedings shall be limited as the Speaker deems fit.

[English]

We are bound by the rules here and, as hon. members have said, that is the rule. I think the hon. member for Kamloops said the Speaker's hands were tied. That is certainly the case and, without consent or without a change in this rule, I must say to the hon. member for Shefford that I am not in a position to allow the hon. member to respond.

I want to point out to hon. members, as has been mentioned in argument, and also to the public that this does not mean that the hon. member for Shefford or others who sit in this Chamber outside the recognized parties at the moment do not have a chance to be heard. That would be an interpretation which is not accurate.

All members have the right to speak during the period called Statements by Members each day, a full 60-second statement. Further, members have the right to ask questions in Question Period. After that question is asked, under the rules members can go further. They can ask to be allowed to speak on the adjournment debate and, when their turn comes up, that is a seven-minute speech to which the government responds for three minutes. There are other ways—and I have not precluded some other ways as well—in which these matters can be raised.

Unfortunately for the hon. member for Shefford, I am bound by the rule. I see the hon. member is indicating some understanding of that. His route, I think, is discussions with his colleagues and, if there is to be a change, then of course I would abide by it.

It has been brought to my attention that there was a request by the hon. member for Shefford to respond. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Shefford to respond?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member there is not unanimous consent.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE

20TH ANNIVERSARY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just 20 years ago, in a remarkable act of foresight and goodwill, this House gave unanimous approval to legislation creating the International Development Research Centre. In the two decades since, the IDRC has attracted the interest and the commendation of the world as it has offered forms of innovative and effective assistance to the scientific communities of the developing countries.

This week, the centre's International Board of Governors, composed of distinguished scientists and development experts from 11 different countries, is meeting in Ottawa for one of its regular meetings. As they do so, these men and women have every reason to view with pride IDRC's accomplishments. It is a pride that I know is shared by all hon. members of this House.

[Translation]

IDRC's statutory mandate is to support development-related research. Since its creation, the Centre has chosen to do so by encouraging and funding scientific research undertaken and managed by developing country scientists. In this way the research is relevant to needs, and the competence and experience of local scientists is deepened and enhanced. IDRC-funded research has led to increased supplies of food and water, improved education and health services, more reliable data for decision-makers, and better access to information.

[English]

The success of the centre has attracted the commendation of committees of this House, even of the Auditor General of Canada, and of numerous international observers. Its developmental data bases are recognized as among the most diverse and valuable of any in the world. They include, for example, all of the original archives of the Brundtland commission.

• (1150)

The accomplishments of IDRC, Sir, are a credit to Canada. To the board and to the staff of this unique international organization, I extend, I am sure on behalf of all members of the House, thanks and best wishes for continued success as the IDRC enters its third decade.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to rise today in support of the words of the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs in commending the International Development Research Centre for 20 years of very successful development work.

I find it unfortunate that Canadians are not as familiar as I think they should be with the very successful work of the International Development Research Centre, for if we go around the world into the most remote areas of Third World countries we will find people talking about the accomplishments of the International Development Research Centre.

Some 15 to 20 years ago the populations of Canada and developed nations around the world were concerned about famine and hunger in India; but few Canadians realize what an important contribution the International Development Research Centre has made to the fact that no longer do we hear about famine in India despite severe droughts that it has undergone. This is because of the significant and important research that the International Development Research Centre has put into the sphere of agriculture, its focus of attention and concentration.

Besides concentrating on agricultural security worldwide, employees of the centre have put a lot of effort into health and nutrition and social sciences. They have done much to relieve the poverty at the grassroots level in Third World countries around the world. Next week they will have a small technological fair at their centre to which they will invite the public to see some of the technology that they have brought into place: technology which, for example, has produced pumps that are easily maintained in the Third World, bringing healthy, safe water to population, and a simple device such as the hulling machine which has saved women in Third World countries hours daily in preparing their daily food.

Today we also have visiting us in our country a Dr. Mahbub ul Haq from the United Nations Development Program who has helped the United Nations put out a report on world development. He indicates in his report that it is not so important that everybody in the world have $20,000 U.S. as their income per annum, but how we distribute wealth in the world; that if we support countries who are interested in equitable distribution of wealth and employ the resources that organizations such as the International Development Research Centre make possible, we can do much to improve the status of living of peoples around the world.

Along with the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, I wish to congratulate the International Development Research Centre on its accomplishments. Through its technological fair and through its collaboration with other Canadian entities such as our non-government organizations in our universities, I hope Canadians will become more aware of the enormous contribution of the International Development Research Centre to effective international development and that others in Canada will be encouraged to follow its example.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party supports international development assistance and recognizes the International Development Research Centre as a proper tool for helping to implement Canada's commitment to humanitarian aid to the developing world.

On the 20th anniversary of the International Development Research Centre, we extend congratulations to the board of governors and the staff of the IDRC on a job well done. We also congratulate former Prime Minister Lester Pearson and the Parliament of the day for their foresight in establishing the centre.

IDRC is also to be congratulated on its success to adhering to the development principles laid down 20 years ago at its inception. These principles targeted assistance for the poorest people and stressed aid to developing countries to help them create their own long-term solutions to pressing developmental problems.

The IDRC's practice of assisting with research at the local level, especially the supporting of promising young scientists for developing countries, is a logical and sensible approach to meeting the needs of Third World countries to overcome the cycle of poverty. Getting aid to the right people is always a concern. IDRC seems to have successfully met that challenge.

New Democrats call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to increase the funding to IDRC to the 5 per cent of the ODA target originally set for IDRC and to increase ODA funding quickly to the UN target of .7 per cent of Canada's GNP. We believe the Department of External Affairs, CIDA, and IDRC could extend the value of Canada's ODA by working much more closely together in sharing experience and expertise.

I hope that the International Development Research Centre will use its 20th anniversary to analyse its impact and assist all Canadians to understand the tremendous value of Canadian Official Development Assistance.

In closing, I want to congratulate Mr. Ivan Head, IDRC's president, on his appointment to the Order of Canada last evening. This honour reflects well on the good work done by Mr. Head, the board, and the staff of IDRC.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

TENTH ACTIVITY REPORT OF THE CANADIAN BRANCH OF THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the Tenth Activity Report of the Canadian Branch of the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians.

This Report is a summary of the meeting held by the American Region from August 16 to 19, in Portland, Maine, and presided by Mr. John Martin, the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the seven sectors of the American Region, including Louisiana, were represented. The proceedings were therefore very interesting and I invite my colleagues to peruse the Report I have the honour of presenting today.

BILL C-63

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, with amendment. It is particularly apropos today, with the statement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would permit me just to say how very much I appreciated the fact that the member for South Shore chaired the last three sessions of the committee. He obtained the complete co-operation of all members on the committee. I do compliment him and thank him for putting this legislation through.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT AND CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-341, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act (change of political affiliation).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill which amends both the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act, would be to recognize the importance that political party affiliation plays in the election of members to this House. It would result, in the event of change of party affiliation during the course of a Parliament in a member's seat being declared vacant, and a by-election being held within 90 days of the change of party affiliation.

I think it would enable voters to have a direct say in members' decisions to change party affiliation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table today at least half a dozen petitions on behalf of Canadians who are strongly opposed to a tax on books.

[English]

These people claim that it has been a tradition in Canada not to tax magazines, books and newspapers, that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the application of the proposed goods and services tax.

The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

[Translation]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out the slogan the editors came out with in Quebec and that I find quite striking. It says: "To tax books is imposing ignorance."

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions, both approved as to form by the clerk of petitions.

It is an honour to present a petition signed by almost 3,000 residents of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario concerning the proposed goods and services tax.

In a sentence, the petition says that the tax would be inflationary and regressive. It would reduce the standard of living of Canadians generally. Agreeing fully with the thrust of the petition, I am honoured to present it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is on behalf of approximately 132 residents of Edmonton, Toronto, London and Oakville about the imprisonment of Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, a Canadian citizen in Taiwan. Among other things, they call for the Government of Canada to do everything possible to obtain his early release.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with regard to the goods and services tax.

This petition is part of 17,000 names which were collected by Mrs. Idris O'Neill of St. Catharines, Ontario and submitted to this House beforehand.

I was struck by the words which are used in presenting this petition. They are: "the right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners," meaning the people who sign this, "in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy."

This is one of the series of petitions which has been put in this House of Commons by many members of Parliament. It would seem that the only remedy that this government is going to give us is more of the same. It is just not listening to the people of Canada who have been saying for many months that they do not want this tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three sets of petitions signed by a number of constituents in Massey, Ontario, in Little Current and Sheguiandah on Manitoulin Island and Thessalon, Ontario.

The petitioners call on the government to maintain its support and services to veterans. They point out that veterans of Canada have already made a great contribution to this country, both in wartime and in peace. They call on the government to maintain those services and not deprive them of much-needed services and assistance in times of hardship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have three other petitions signed by several hundred constituents in Espanola, Makaroff and in Wawa. I also have petitions from Kagawong, Gore Bay and Meldrum Bay on Manitoulin Island calling on the government to withdraw the goods and services tax.

The petitioners would have to do this at the Senate level because the bill has been passed in the House. They point out the unfairness of the tax to low-income families and to people who want to read. For instance, the Prime Minister's spouse yesterday talked about the importance of reading—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of farmers from Saskatchewan.

With thousands of bushels in the field and this government failing to move grain in the world markets, thousands and thousands of farmers are going into bankruptcy. These farmers are concerned about the future of orderly marketing in this country.

The petitioners are concerned that the government is continuing to oversee the dismantling of the Canadian Wheat Board. They call upon this government to return oats to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now enjoys. That would ensure that changes could only be made by Parliament itself, in order to give farmers in Saskatchewan and across this country protection.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I will continue to rise until there is not a gasp of hope left, I suppose, in terms of presenting petitions against the goods and services tax.

Today I rise to present petitions from Kamloops, Port Hope and Oshawa as well as Toronto, from individuals who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They point out a long list of reasons, all accurate and precise, why this is a fundamentally bad tax. It is coming at the worst time ever as we are into a recession. They are asking that the government reconsider their determined effort to proceed with the tax.

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from all parts of Canada against the government's decision to tax literature and reading material. They cannot understand how the government feels that taxing a children's story book is going to be good for that child or good for the country.

They ask the government to consider not taxing reading material.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Taylor, (p. 14644).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House that, because of the ministerial statements, Government Orders will be extended 31 minutes. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is debating today a bill concerning the environment. That is an admirable thing to be doing. It certainly is good to read what the Government of Canada claims it is trying to do with this new environment bill.

In the bill, there is a preamble which reads:

> —the Government of Canada seeks to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality;—

Today, in the Statutes of Canada, we have a Clean Air Act, an Environmental Protection Act for the land, and a clean water act, through the Fisheries Act. So one would think, on the face of it, that we would not need any more acts of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, if you go over those laws which are presently in effect in Canada, you will come to the conclusion that if the Government of Canada were doing its job, you would not need another bill to be introduced into the Parliament of Canada, passed by the Senate and made law, to deal with the protection of the environment. But the reality in dealing with the principle of this bill is that we have more problems today than we ever had with the environment and the reasons are quite simple.

If one looks at the Environmental Protection Act which was brought in to protect our enviornment and which outlawed polychlorinated biphenyls, commonly known as PCBs, and other substances that harm the environment, one would say, "Well, that is wonderful, that will protect our environment, that will protect our forest land, our trees, our walkways, all of the areas of nature that we have across this country".

But, Mr. Speaker, what does the federal Department of the Environment suggest to the power companies or to anybody else who wishes to construct a power line or keep it clear or construct a road or a right-of-way? It says, why not use a chemical called 2,4-D? That will kill all of the trees, the plants and the flowers and everything else, all along that power line. It is pretty cheap as well. So a toxic chemical is placed in the Canadian environment, from one part of Canada to the other, to kill all of that vegetation. Everywhere that pole line and that roadway goes, anything goes to get rid of plants, trees, and things that might interfere with that particular development.

The Government of Canada has on its books an act called the Environmental Protection Act suggesting to anybody who wishes to do so that, yes, we approve of the use of a chemical called 2-4-D to get rid of every single thing in the path of that power line, road, or right-of-way from one area of Canada to the other. Can you imagine the number of Canadians who go out every year to pick berries by the side of the road or on a pole line? Does any Canadian think about why it is those wild raspberries or wild strawberries grow so well in those areas, or why a blueberry grows so well under a power line, not knowing that perhaps two months or one day previous, a toxic chemical which kills vegetation was sprayed in that area?

Under provincial licences, there is supposed to be a sign put up. But how many signs can be put up? The Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Environment approves of that toxic chemical sprayed in our environment, taken away by the rain and the streams in all parts of Canada. You might say that is not bad because it is just on the power lines and the roadways. What about our wilderness areas and forest lands?

We have an Environmental Protection Act which allows the use of a tree killer called 2-4-D to be used in any part of Canada. It is used today and was used from one part of Canada to the other this year.

Turning to the forests,there is the Clean Air Act. The Department of the Environment, together with the Department of Agriculture, suggests to the paper companies that they should go up in an aeroplane and spray another toxic chemical all over the forests, in western Canada to kill the beetle and in eastern and central Canada to kill the spruce budworm, the hemlock looper, or the balsam woolly aphid. The Government of Canada says: "You can do that. We suggest you do that. Here is a list of the chemicals we will give you approved by Environment Canada for use to kill the particular insects that you want to get rid of."

Province after province this summer bought one of the most toxic chemicals ever studied by man, apart from DDT which was used in the fifties. They bought fenitrothion and matacil and they sprayed it over enormous areas of forest land from aeroplanes.

If we get the picture, we might go into our wilderness area and leave the pole line or roadway, where the plant killer 2-4-D is used, and walk into the forest, where on all of the trees in little oil droplets is a toxic chemical called fenitrothion which is designed to kill specific insects such as the beetle, the balsam woolly aphid, the hemlock looper, and the spruce budworm.

The Department of the Environment has a study done by the National Research Council on the use of fenitrothion. The study shows that chemical, used in Canada under the auspices of the federal Department of the Environment, has killed not only the forest insects they are trying to get rid of, but it has killed bees, harmless insects, and it has killed the birds, the very predators of the insects they are trying to get rid of.

If the birds that normally eat the insects that they are trying to get rid of are being killed, the next year they are going to have to spray again, aren't they? The same numbers of birds are not being reborn. Of course, the federal Department of the Environment says: "Well, it doesn't really kill the birds. It kind of—well, they don't grow right after." There will be birds that have only one wing.

Because of the approval of the federal Department of the Environment, some provinces today are caught in an endless cycle of using toxic chemicals on all of our wilderness areas and forests to kill an insect that they cannot kill, but they are killing everything else.

Those two chemicals that I just mentioned fenitrothion and matacil, and 2-4-D, which is used in our right of ways to kill the plants and the trees, are relatively cheap. Also approved for use by the Department of the Environment is another substance which again could be sprayed called bacillus theringensus. The short name is BT. It was invented in Canada by a famous scientist in the Quebec region of the Canadian Forestry Service, a gentleman by the name of Dr. Schmirnoff. He invented it and that is being used today in many countries of the world where they want to rid of insects but they do not want to kill the natural predators.

I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, when you really get into this subject, you discover that some of the most interesting things were used to try to get rid of these pests in our wilderness areas. Why, one was invented at a university in eastern Canada, a particular substance that affected the normal cycle of reproduction of these particular insects. In other words, it was like a perfume that gave off the odour of a female budworm, in this case, and of course the males would then try to reproduce at the wrong time of the year. It did not work, but a lot of money was spent on it. I guess you could say that a lot of budworms were frustrated to death.

Many things were tried and the Canadian Forestry Service came up with this one solution called BT. But there is one drawback to it; it is expensive. It is not cheap like the fast fixes of the chemicals.

So, there is the Environmental Protection Act to protect the land and a chemical called 2-4-D sprayed from one area of Canada to the other to get rid of growth of plants. There is the Clean Air Act to protect us from things in the air and to protect our environment. Yet, we approve the toxic chemicals fenitrothion and matacil used from one part of Canada to the other in all of our wilderness area over our forests. There is not much left, is there? That covers the forests. There is a chemical sprayed from the air, from one end of this country to the other. There are the tree ways, the walkways, and the power lines. There is another chemical used to kill the trees there.

Then, we turn to the clean water act, or what we call the Fisheries Act. Keep in mind what is before the House today, the statement in the preamble of Bill C-78:

> —preventing the degradation of environmental quality and at the same time ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality.

We all know what a disaster we have in the waterways of Canada. Under the Fisheries Act, we use a section of the act when a pulp and paper mill puts a substance into the water. We can stop that substance from going into the water, because under the law we cannot disturb fish, and that is the hook that we have for the protection of the environment; namely, the fishing resource.

In the federal government, the Department of External Affairs has taken over the management of that environmental aspect of our development. As I have outlined to the House before, more foreign nations are given licences to plunder our resources on the bottom of the ocean within our 200-mile zone than are Canadians. Let me repeat that. Mr. Speaker, when you go out between 12 and 200 nautical miles, which is perhaps 230 or 240 road miles, that area of our coastline in eastern Canada has more licences granted to enormous factory vessels of 500 feet long and there are more vessels granted to foreign nations than there are licences granted to Canadians.

This year, we saw the Canadian licences cut back in the closure of fish plants in Nova Scotia and in Newfoundland. Today, more licences are granted to foreign nations than to Canadians in what we call the off-shore fishing resource of Canada. So far this year, 82 factory freezer trawler licences have been issued, mainly to Cuba, the Soviet Union and two other countries that were originally called East Germany and the German Democratic Republic. Some of these licences were never picked up.

As I speak today, there are 14 Soviet vessels about 50 miles north northeast of Fogo Island in Newfoundland. There are two Japanese vessels about 100 miles east of the Labrador coast. They are fishing today. They have these enormous nets, as I pointed out before, on rollers that go along the ocean floor, kill everything and grab everything in their path. You cannot have spawning of fish when you have these gigantic, ultra-modern nets, almost like something out of Star Wars, all over our ocean floor totally destroying everything, all because the Department of External Affairs is the real manager of that resource in this country today.

On the principle of this particular bill, the report card for the Government of Canada under the Clean Air Act, under the Environmental Protection Act and under the clean water act, commonly referred to as the Fisheries Act, shows one big zero. It need not be that way. The Government of Canada is totally to blame for the total destruction of some of our fundamental resources in this country.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, just a quick question to my friend, George. In relation to Bill C-78, I am just wondering whether or not he would agree that the bill, as drafted, is inadequate and that it really should apply to government policy, and the acts which should be listed, of which there are over 100, such as the Fisheries Act, should be included in the bill and that the regulations which the government side want to bring in is sort of a Trojan horse. The government side loves to do that and to say everything that is not in the bill can be done by Order in Council.

Would the hon. member agree that that kind of Trojan horse provision is not good for this kind of legislation? Canadians should know what the bill really means. We have regulations missing, acts missing, policy is not referred to and little things, of course, like the minister has never bothered to even speak on the bill. It has been before the House for four months. Perhaps the hon. member could deal with those matters which have been left out of the bill and perhaps he might ponder out loud why the minister will not come to the House, while we still have 20-minute sections when he could, in fact, be questioned. Perhaps we might wonder why he is not here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think the hon. member should bring that to the attention of the House. He may be watching it on television and he may be down, but I do not think that that should be brought to the attention of the House.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I think he is watching it on television and he is even making notes to try to straighten out a few things, I am sure.

My main point is that, regardless of what is in the bill, the Government of Canada does not follow through on what it claims its intentions are. I know that we have had court decisions that have brought on this bill.

The court, as I understand it, was trying to make the federal government responsible for certain actions for which it did not want to be responsible. The bill could be interpreted in such a way as facilitating the absence of the federal government making a definitive decision that the court thought it should make.

I think that that is why the Government of Canada is really not promoting this bill as the answer to the environmental problems that we have. The government may say that that is the case but it certainly will not repeat it too many times because we have too many people in Canada who are, as the preamble states, "compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality".

Canadians do place a high value on environmental quality. Canadians use our environment. Canadians want our environment to be clean when, right now, it is filthy. They want to be able to visit our waterways and visit our forests and today, these are in a mess. They do not want to have chemicals rain down upon them, as they presently do in this country. It is a most disgusting and outrageous thought to walk into our forest lands and realize, if some people only knew the truth, that on a tree is a droplet of oil and in that oil is a chemical that kills things. When you get to a roadway, you do not realize that on each side the reason nothing grows there is because a chemical sprayed there.

What is the answer to it? Well, there is an answer. It is called labour work. There is an answer to preventing trees from disturbing a pole line. Get someone in there to chop them down. There is an answer. Do not use those massive spray programs in our forest land. I really believe that the answer lies, and I know a lot of people would not agree with me, in promotion of the natural predator to the level we had. In other words, restore the bird populations to the levels they were. There is a danger in that as you cannot just have bird sanctuaries all over the place because you will have an over abundance of birds. I recall when one government had a problem with the balsam woolly aphid. It decided to bring in the predator, the shrew. A shrew is a very tiny little animal with a sort of long tail. It is like a tiny mechanical mouse that you sometimes see in a store. The government brought in shrews.

I recall the day that this was announced in the provincial legislature. The premier of the province said: "Well, we got rid of the balsam woolly aphid. The shrews have eaten them up. But now we have a problem with too many shrews". He went on to say that the predator of the shrew is the snake, but if the government brought in snakes, it would never win the next election. That is a problem. The woodlots of eastern Europe where they have bird sanctuaries is a partial solution to this problem of using chemical sprays in our environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. It has been a very wonderful speech.

Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate? It should be the Liberal Party, but I will recognize the NDP if that is what the hon. member would like.

The hon. member for Skeena has the floor. He will be the last speaker who will have a 20-minute speech under Standing Order 74.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: I do not want to take exception to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I have some notes. I do not want to follow my colleague from Gander—Twillingate. I cannot hope to speak like he does and I do not have the knowledge that he has, but I did wish and hope that I could start my speech before the allotted eight hours are up, which I am told will be around one o'clock. If we could get some understanding of that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments. There are 48 minutes remaining as of the commencement of the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, so the hon. member can judge for himself that there will not be that much time left. If he does get into it, naturally the Chair will allow the 20 minutes or he can get unanimous consent if he likes. I am just bringing this to the attention of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

The hon. member for Skeena has the floor on debate.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a somewhat broader ranging opportunity to speak to Bill C-78, and I appreciate my friend giving me the opportunity.

There are a lot of people in this country who want to know more about Bill C-78. It is only through debates such as this that they will get an opportunity. It appears that the government side does not intend to put up the minister because, as the Speaker just pointed out, this is the last 20-minute speech that will have a 10-minute question and answer period with it. The government has ducked the opportunity to bring the minister forward. In the last full day of debate, the government has not put up any speakers. I guess its intention is to not really let its agenda be broadly known in the country.

In our series of hearings in the special committee, which was struck on June 27 but did not have a chair until September 24, we had a few witnesses. We had Mr. Robinson, the head of FEARO, the Federal Environmental Assessment and Review Office, and we have had some people from the Department of Justice. Other than that, we have not had a chance to really do what we were intended to do, which was to act as a pre-study but also as a special committee. My understanding was that we would have the opportunity to redraft Bill C-78, taking into account the major concerns that have been expressed from every province and from both territories, and from public interest groups, who want serious, tough-minded workable legislation when it comes to environmental assessment.

It seems that the government agenda is to not allow for the special committee to do its work. It wants to now complete second reading and force this legislation off to a legislative committee where only minor amendments and adjustments can be made. It certainly is the intention of myself and my party to do everything we can to hold the minister's feet to the fire so that some of the substantive changes that this legislation requires are made. The more than 100 acts of Parliament that should be included, things like the Fisheries Act, the Railway Act, acts affecting Crown corporations and so on, should all be included and they have not been.

It is our understanding from evidence before the special committee that the Department of Justice and FEARO have nearly completed their work in listing all of the acts that have some environmental implication, the Navigable Waters Act and others, so that they could in fact be included in the legislation. That work is nearing completion and that should be done.

There should be nowhere near as many weasel phrases used in the legislation. That means that the sections that have so much leeway in terms of Order in Council powers should be specified in terms of very carefully delimiting regulations so that the public, corporations, industry, provincial, municipal, territorial and federal governments all know just exactly how the legislation should work, how it is triggered and so on. That is lacking.

Policy is not included. It clearly should be. As I noted in the ministerial recommendations from the FEARO documents that are for some strange reason stamped secret, I guess we can find in there some of the reasons why the policy has not been included. Many of the provinces met privately and some of the memos were leaked. We learned through that process that many of the provinces wanted to make sure that the kind of litigation that we have seen in relation to the Rafferty–Alameda, in relation to the Oldman River Dam, in terms of the litigation now under way, and in relation to Alcan's Kemano 2 project could not occur in the future.

I quote from page 22 of 40 pages of this so-called secret FEARO document where it states:

> 93. Advantages/Disadvantages: The principal advantage of legislation is that it represents a long-term commitment by the Government to good and open environmental planning while also obliging all departments to implement the Process, removing the basis for much criticism. It would ensure that the Government applies its best efforts to preventing environmental damage from its own activities or from those it controls. Some consider that this "advantage" is really a disadvantage in that it could constrain departments' discretion. Assigning authority to the Minister and, in the case of Department of Environment proposals to an agency reporting to the Minister, for deciding on the level and form of assessment would enhance the credibility of the process.

Now comes the key part:

> It is also clear that the public would favour the opportunity to seek legal remedies in the courts if the law is not implemented. Unlike the present Order, however, the legislation would, in effect, establish clear limits for court intervention. Assessments of policy proposals would not be vulnerable to such intervention.

This is the 18th draft. It took 18 ping-pong balls in terms of drafts from those who were drafting it in the Department of Justice and FEARO, on up through the system to the Privy Council Office and the cabinet, and back down again. It seems that every time it came up cabinet requested further limitations in terms of the legislation and more gopher holes.

Effectively it has reached the point now where almost any project imaginable can somehow or other be diverted by the minister's discretion out of the process, meaning that there is no known imaginable project that would with absolute certainty undergo a mandatory environmental assessment and review.

A good in point is what we see on the front page of The Gazette: headlines such as "James Bay might start without hearings, Bacon seems to be winner in battle for early start on work." It goes on to point out that the largest industrial project ever conceived of or proposed in North America is the James Bay II project, known as the Great Whale or La Grande Baleine, and the NBR. Those two projects combined are the largest industrial proposal ever in the history of North America.

Even though the courts have ruled that the 1984 cabinet guidelines order is mandatory and there are an abundance of federal jurisdictions impacted by the James Bay II project proposal, we have yet to hear a single strong statement from the government that before this project gets under way, before roads and airports are built, before forests are cut down, before construction of the dams begin and so on, the hearings must take place publicly and that that process must be completed.

Surely we have learned from the loss of environment and the loss of federal and provincial government credibility on the Rafferty–Alameda. The disputes seemed to end up with: what is safety related work, what is safety related construction, and what is completion construction? Now we find the premier of Saskatchewan dumping on the Minister of the Environment and the

The fact is that the environmental assessment panel has resigned. The courts said there had to be an environmental assessment, but we have the two levels of government allowing a project to proceed in direct affront to the court and in direct violation of the law. Precisely the same is going on in relation to the Oldman River dam in Alberta.

As many members of this House will know, in March 1990 the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that Justice Jerome erred in his decision. The court quashed the federal licence to construct and ordered the federal environmental assessment of the project; but that construction continued. The federal government still has not appointed an environmental assessment review panel or an EARP, even though ordered to do so in March by the Federal Court of Appeal.

The federal Minister of the Environment has asked federal justice for a legal opinion on whether he can appoint an EARP while the decision is under appeal. As we know now, that has been sent off to the Supreme Court of Canada. Nothing is in the way of the Minister of the Environment doing what the court had ordered him to do; but he is still not doing it.

We have the two most controversial projects at the moment. On the Rafferty–Alameda, the EARP panel has resigned and no EARP has been reappointed so that it can complete its work before the project is over. In terms of the Oldman, now that the valves have been closed and the reservoir is starting to fill, one of the highest courts in the country, the Federal Court of Appeal, ordered that there be an EARP. The minister still has done nothing to comply with the law. What is the public to think?

Mr. Benjamin: He is in contempt of court.

Mr. Fulton: Of course he is in contempt of court. I suspect he is also in contempt of Parliament. However, that does not seem to matter when it comes to the 1984 cabinet guidelines order even though they have been ruled mandatory. I have all kinds of memoranda from within government, between different agencies, pointing out that it is mandatory and is no longer discretionary. The government knows it is mandatory, but it is not fulfilling the mandate imposed upon it by the courts.

What is the government doing in relation to Bill C–78? Does it pass the simplest tests, even with the tests placed upon the 1984 guidelines order by the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal? The answer is no. It fails on every test that someone seriously concerned about the environment or sustainable development could possibly put the legislation to.

Referring to the comments of the member for Gander—Grand Falls who spoke a moment ago, for many years it was believed by many members in this House and by many members of the public that the solution to pollution was dilution; you just dump the crap in the river or dump it in a lake. Eighty per cent of the toxic and hazardous wastes produced on a daily basis in Canada is still illegally or improperly disposed of.

Where do you think it is going, Mr. Speaker? It is going into the storm sewers. It is going on farmers' fields. We know in some cases, with some of it, that it goes into peoples' gas tanks. They drive around the city and pump the PCBs out on the street so that the chemical companies do not have to pay to dispose of it properly.

This country and the rest of the world are in desperate need of serious environmental assessment legislation that can assess existing projects.

Forty per cent of the marine pollution in Canada today come from pulp mills. For years we were promised new pulp mill guidelines and regulations by this government; ever since 1984 practically. "Oh, we are going to clean this up. We are going to do something. We are coming forward with it. We will eliminate dioxins. We will eliminate furans. We will do something about all of these other things"; but diddley squat is done and the public is getting madder and madder every day.

I described this bill a moment ago as having been carefully addled with gopher holes. The 18 times it went to cabinet, every time cabinet said: "It ain't loose enough. What if we want to put a nuclear plant in my riding? What if I want to build a dam? What if I want to give a cabinet Order in Council exclusion to my pals from Alcan?" Hey, Montreal headquarters picks up the phone: "Hi, Bri. Listen, I need an Order in Council to exempt my billion dollar project".

An hon. member: Sold.

Mr. Fulton: What do they get? On October 12 Bri goes to cabinet: "Exclude the project", the project is to lower the Fraser River by three feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member is referring to the right hon. Prime Minister, I wish he would say the right hon. Prime Minister instead of using his first name.

Mr. Fulton: That is precisely whom I meant, Mr. Speaker. You are quite correct. That is what I meant to say and I was just coming to it.

This project will lower the Fraser River by three feet at Hell's Gate. Don't you, Mr. Speaker, think a project that does that or a project that will lower the level of the Nechako River to only 12 per cent of its original flow should have an assessment?

This is a government that knew it would be sensitive to go out and slaughter the 3,500 bisons in Canada's largest national park, Wood Buffalo National Park. It has been known for 60 years that there was brucellosis and tuberculosis in that herd. Now all of a sudden: "Oh, yes, they can have a panel to look into that".

What about a billion dollar project that will take three vertical feet out of the Fraser River? That project, in and of itself by direct action, will increase the pollution levels in the Fraser River. If there is less water and the communities, the pulp companies and everybody else are still dumping the same amount into less water, what will happen? You know what happens, Mr. Speaker, if you only put one ounce of water with two ounces of Scotch, compared to two ounces of water with two ounces of Scotch, right? This is what is going to happen from this project.

I find it contemptible of the people of Canada to give an Order in Council exemption to a project. The Prime Minister is on record saying there would be a full public inquiry and an environment assessment. What good is his word? Zero. Four ministers of fisheries in a row: James McGrath, full public inquiry and an environmental assessment of Kemano II; the present Speaker, as minister of fisheries—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not want the hon. member to question the Chair. On what he was just saying about the amount of Scotch in comparison to water, you get just as much alcohol in the blood whether you have two or one. It does not really make any difference. I do not think the hon. member should question the Chair anyway.

Mr. Fulton: You raise a very good point, Mr. Speaker. Four ministers of fisheries in a row said that K–II should undergo a full public inquiry and an environmental assessment: James McGrath, the present Speaker, Roméo LeBlanc, and Pierre de Bane. Now we have a minister of fisheries who goes and participates in getting an Order in Council exemption of the project.

What is the Government of Quebec thinking today in relation to the 1984 cabinet guidelines order?

The Rafferty–Oldman project, despite a ruling of the Federal Court, despite the resignation of the EARP panel, despite the views of people from right across this country, is proceeding. It has been politically exempted from having an environmental assessment. The Oldman River dam in Alberta, what has happened to it? Despite a binding ruling, a unanimous ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal, that project is proceeding. It has been politically exempted from what is required and known to be mandatory by the Department of Justice. The Kemano project in British Columbia, exempted by Order in Council, has never seen the light of day.

Who could possibly stand in this House and suggest that Quebec Hydro and the Government of Quebec would even want to consider a full public inquiry and an environmental assessment of the largest industrial project in the history of North America? They will go the same route. Who is kidding whom? They will start building roads. They will start building airports. They will start cutting down the forests, but Canadians are not going to put up with it very much longer.

I predict that this kind of contempt of the law, contempt of the courts, contempt of Parliament, and contempt of public concern will lead to a kind of approach and a kind of response that will require the same kind of serious abuse of civil rights that we saw at Oka this summer.

What about the Trojan horse provisions? Why is not only the legislation drafted in such a way as to be litigation proof? Why is it made litigation proof? The public at least now under the Order in Council can once in a while go to the courts, not apparently get binding injunctions but at least have a bit of a public say in what goes on. This legislation has a flak jacket all around it, making it practically impermeable to the rights of Canadians to go to the appropriate courts of appropriate jurisdictions to get some kind of redress.

Why so many Order in Council provisions? Why aren't the regulations listed? What is the government hiding? What is the secret agenda? Why are the acts of Parliament not included? When the minister himself put out his propaganda packet on June 18, he said that acts such as the Fisheries Act might some day be included. Clearly all of that should be included now.

The other serious issue of concern of Canadians is that for a long time there was an adage in this country that you could go ahead with your own little project. You could go ahead with Point Aconi because it was only going to let off 1.5 million tonnes of carbon dioxide a year, and the "sox and nox" releases from it were not that significant and were not going to violate the agreements that had been made with Ottawa.

We have the Point Aconi project going to proceed. What about the three thermal plants that are proposed for southern Alberta? What about the Shand in Saskatchewan? What about all of these other projects? "At what point," the public keeps asking, "does the destruction of the environment by what has been described as insignificant increment stop?" Everybody wants to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to tell the hon. member that his time has expired. I know we all want to listen to him, but his time has expired.

We will go now to questions and comments and I will recognize the hon. member for Surrey North on a question or a comment.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I was fascinated by the speech being given by the previous speaker, particularly his discussion around Kemano and some of the other projects that seem to be destined to go ahead.

I would like him to expand on it particularly as he would see it influencing such things as the Big Bend in Surrey, which is the last fresh water marsh in the lower Fraser River estuary. Where will it be if the Fraser River is dropped three feet? Will it no longer be an estuary or a marsh but be a high and dry piece of land that some developer is going to want to come along and develop? I would like the member's comments on that.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for an excellent and pertinent question. If we look at issues like Kemano II or Kemano completion that have been exempted from public hearings, issues like the Big Bend are precisely the kind of issue that should have a mandatory environmental assessment.

What we know is that by excluding a big project like Alcan from public hearings, people like the residents of Surrey, New Westminster, Vancouver, Hope and Williams Lake, right on up to Prince George and into my constituency have been excluded from the opportunity to know what the impact of a substantial lowering of the Fraser River means to their community.

It means the people who want to pump out water for the purpose of hay production cannot do that any more. Those new industries that might have wanted to extract water or place certain kinds of materials back into the water will not be allowed to proceed.

The Big Bend is a very important marshland and part of the Fraser River estuary. It is important to all the anadromous species as they come down—it does not matter whether it is sockeye, chinook or any of the other species—that they make use of the Fraser River estuary. They need those marshlands.

No initial environmental evaluation has been done. There have been no public hearings in relation to Big Bend. There have been no hearings in relation to the over-all impact on the Fraser River estuary. This is a cover-up of cataclysmic proportions.

The government has refused to allow knowledgeable, well-meaning, well-intentioned British Columbians to come out and talk about the largest and most important river in British Columbia, and what the impact of something like K-II will mean in relation to their community, their environment, their fishery and the future of their fishery and of the great blue heron populations which make use of Big Bend.

There are other bird populations that make use of it for nesting areas. The utilization by fish and by fry, the importance of these kinds of areas have been dramatically undermined by the approach of this government.

I want to say that the overwhelming desire of Canadians is for a quality piece of environmental assessment legislation. We know the shortcomings of the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, but how can we possibly approve at second reading a piece of legislation that, according to Ray Robinson, the present head of the Federal Environmental Assessment and Review Organization, says that this legislation as it stands does not go as far, is not as wide-reaching as the 1984 cabinet guidelines order?

What kind of a pig in a poke—

An hon. member: It is a step backwards.

Mr. Fulton: It is a step backwards. That is what every major environmental organization in the country has been saying to Parliament. This is a step backwards.

Why would we possibly consider a step backwards when we look at the kinds of issues that need to be assessed? There are existing projects that need to be assessed that are excluded from this.

The mandatory review list is not included. Are nuclear plants going to be included? Are nuclear waste sites going to be included? Are major hydroelectric dams going to be included? We are asked to buy a pig in a poke.

In the post-Meech Lake Canada parliamentarians can no longer go for these smoky backroom decisions. Who is going to make the mandatory list? It has been discussed in departments. Provinces are discussing it. We have a lot of lobbying going on in Ottawa, people who want to be on the exclusion list. I spoke about this before.

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine the back-up of phone calls into that process about who wants to get on to the exclusion list? People from the oil patch, people from the hydro patch, people from the nuclear patch, people from all of these different patches who want to be on the exclusion list?

Legislation of this nature must be very straightforward. The public must know whether it is on the Big Bend or on a major project like K-II, or James Bay, or Rafferty-Alameda or on the Oldman, or brucellosis in the buffalo or issues in Canada's far north or on carbon dioxide in the atmosphere or on any of these issues. Small though they may seem to be to government, or large though they may be on the global horizon, we have to know how they are triggered.

What happens in the first stage? What are the federal jurisdictions? What is mandatory? What is exempted? Why has the government gone to such great lengths to dig all these gopher holes through the legislation, leaving the discretion entirely to the minister at times or to cabinet at other times? Why was the government not totally forthright and set up an arm's length Canadian environmental assessment and review operation so it would make the decisions?

It would have the legislation. It would decide, and both industry and the public would have an avenue of appeal to the minister so that there was a political opportunity for appeal on a decision to mandatory exclude or mandatory include. What many of these environmental errors are leading to are dangerous situations in communities. I have spoken to my colleagues from the Kootenays on issues like major new pulp mills. Communities are being divided and the process is forcing the division as much as anything else, because people do not know what the rules are. That is the problem with this legislation.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member goes on at considerable length with respect to what he perceives to be the deficiencies in the bill. He talks a lot about the role of the federal government, which of course is something which have been evolving since 1984. I think if he were being honest with the House, he would concede that there are substantial improvements in this bill over what was provided in the 1984 guidelines.

I am interested in an indication from the hon. member on behalf of his party as to the role he perceives for the provinces in the area of environmental protection, understanding of course, as he does, that there is a joint responsibility. I think it would be very helpful if he could explain to provincial jurisdictions wherever they may be, whether it be in Ontario or elsewhere, as to whether or not he perceives that they have a role and he could specify what that role would be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Skeena has two minutes.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for the question, although I am not quite sure what he is referring to when it talks about all honesty. I would certainly like to hear a lengthy speech from the member about what he views as ideal or better legislation.

Let me deal with the question that he poses. It is an important one and one that is not dealt with as directly in this legislation as I think it should be.

The provinces and territories do have very clear constitutional jurisdictions. However Canadians, as the member knows as parliamentary secretary, and as public opinion polls have demonstrated extensively over the last half dozen years, are looking increasingly to the federal government and at times look to the federal Crown to use POGG power, peace, order and good government in relation to some major projects, to intervene and to protect the environment on behalf of all Canadians.

What we do know is that there are more than 100 acts that have been passed by this Parliament since 1867 that are clearly in federal jurisdictions. Wherever those federal jurisdictions are, this legislation should be crisply clear and show that there is a federal role in relation to environmental assessment.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): What about the provincial role?

Mr. Fulton: The provincial role in terms of joint assessments and joint reviews is built within this, but it is not clearly enough delineated. The provinces, as the member knows from the meetings they have had earlier this year, have been attempting to reabsorb many of the environmental jurisdictions entirely unto themselves, other than interjurisdictional, that is, interprovincial or international matters where they think there can be joint review panels, but I think the issue of where there are federal jurisdictions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

I would just like to bring to the attention of hon. members we are now operating under the provisions of Standing Order 74. Orders of the Day began at 12.11 p.m. We had 48 minutes of debate and it expired at 12.59 p.m. We are now into 10-minute speeches with no questions or comments. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor for 10 minutes. If he wishes to ask for more time after he gets near the 10-minute mark, I will be glad to ask the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that the member for Skeena would stop talking at 12.48 p.m. so that I would start my remarks and get my 20 minutes but he did not, so I will take my 10 minutes starting now.

Bill C-78 provides for legislation that could have played a crucial part in the important effort to protect our environment. The principle behind the bill is a good one. It is to make sure that we assess the potential environmental impact of projects in order to reduce or eliminate adverse effects. There are parts of the bill that in our view are commendable including some of the statements in the preamble. Unfortunately, this bill has such serious flaws that those of us on this side of the House cannot help but view it and the effort with great disappointment.

Bill C-78 is supposed to create binding legislation ensuring that proper environmental assessments are conducted for projects within federal jurisdiction. But this bill is so full of holes that there are no guarantees that those projects under federal jurisdiction will undergo such an assessment.

A national coalition of 28 environmental groups virtually condemned the bill earlier this fall after a meeting in Hull, Quebec, saying it needs to be completely rewritten. We agree. According to the Winnipeg Free Press on October 2, these groups are critical of the proposed legislation because it gives the federal government total discretion to decide whether an environmental assessment process should be implemented. This is because the bill makes so many allowances for exclusions that it is easy to wonder if any projects will be included in the mandatory lists.

One Manitoba representative at the meeting in Hull on environmental issues, lawyer Brian Pannell, said in the news release issued after that meeting that if Bill C-78 passes in its current form, "Canada will return to the dark ages of environmental law".

Such legislation, returning us to the medieval ages of environmental awareness, is the last thing Canadians want, it is the last thing we need at a time when all around us we see evidence of the damage we have already caused to our environment.

Mr. Speaker, there are two rivers within the confines of my riding, the Rideau river which crosses the riding and the Ottawa river which flows along the northern limit.

Mr. Speaker, we are regularly witness to the serious and sometimes disastrous consequences of spilling all sorts of products—including extremely toxic substances—into the two rivers, and to the environmental damage that may ensue. When the beaches of those rivers are closed in early summer because of high coliform counts, polluting bacteria and chemical products we have every right to ask whether governments—municipal, regional, provincial and federal alike—are doing something to prevent these practices which we all condemn, namely the discharge of toxic materials into our rivers.

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, here in the House in Ottawa I put a question to find out why the federal government did allow departments—Public works, among others—to award painting or cleaning contracts to companies that ended up dumping their waste products into the Ottawa or Rideau river. Mr. Speaker, I was told it came under provincial jurisdiction. That is precisely where the problem lies! The various government levels are not on the same wavelength and they have a hard time understanding one another.

[English]

A few years ago, as I said, pollution of the Ottawa and Rideau rivers was very worrisome but things have not changed very much. They still close the beaches. They still tell us not to go swimming because the water is polluted. They still tell us that there are chemicals, heavy metals, pollutants being emptied into the rivers. It is time that we here at the federal level took this matter very seriously.

Some of those materials being dumped are serious and highly toxic and include the PCBs, polychlorinated biphenyls, which as you know, Mr. Speaker, can cause cancer. What provision does Bill C-78 make for an environmental assessment of the existing practices of federal departments, agencies, Crown corporations and their employees? I did not find it in the bill. I would hope that they will look at that attentively.

I agree with the former Minister of the Environment who made a statement here in Ottawa on June 9, 1987, saying that unless we take better care of our rivers, and I quote former Minister Tom McMillan, "unless our attitudes and practices change, what we pass on to the next generation will not be shining rivers but open sewers".

I am sure all members would agree that the Ottawa River and all other Canadian rivers, for that matter, must be cleaned up and protected from further pollution.

Every region and community in Canada has its own environmental concerns and we should carefully study this bill to be aware of its lost potential.

I would like to point out briefly some of the serious flaws in this bill.

First, nowhere in the bill can you see the telling expression "sustainable development".

[English]

Instead, we have some vague statements in the preamble, including one about ensuring, and I quote the preamble:

> —ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality.

If the government is really committed to the concept of sustainable development, which it says it is, why will it not put the actual term into the preamble? Just put "sustainable development" somewhere in the preamble. If the government wants to place the environment first among its concerns, and in partnership with the economy and all Canadians, why not put the concept of sustainable development and what it requires into the preamble? Why not be crystal clear about our intent?

Clause 4(a) of that bill should be strengthened in my view and changed from requiring that the environmental effects of projects be given, as the bill states, careful consideration, to something more forceful and also more useful, which would be fully reviewed and scrutinized.

One of my greatest concerns with this legislation, as I mentioned, is the lack of guarantees and its ample provisions for exclusions. Two Federal Court decisions handed down earlier this year regarding the Oldman River project in Alberta and the Rafferty-Alameda Dam project in Saskatchewan ordered Ottawa to make mandatory the current EARP guidelines, the environmental assessment review process guidelines. Until now, these guidelines were discretionary. Bill C-78 with all its exclusions would, in effect, undo these court decisions which were encouraging and steps in the right direction for greater environmental protection by making environmental assessments mandatory for all projects under federal jurisdiction.

One of the provisions of Bill C–78, clause 6(1)(a), states that an environmental assessment of a project is not required where, and I quote:

> —in the opinion of the responsible authority the project is described in an exclusion list;

This grants additional powers to a minister, making the opinion of the minister weightier than that which is written in the act.

In clauses 21 and 24 we find the discretionary powers of responsible authorities and ministers outlined. These discretionary powers include the ability to terminate an assessment. That is unacceptable to us.

In clause 34 we find that the authority responsible for the project, such as a minister, is the one required to act on the report of any review and makes the decision to allow the project to proceed or to stop it. Such a requirement leaves the minister vulnerable to intense lobbying from those who wish to see a project go ahead, regardless of the environmental costs and consequences.

A bill that grants such discretion and allows for endless exclusions is clearly one without teeth. What we need now and what we needed years ago, is legislation with teeth, something that will make things happen. The Tories promised this legislation in 1984. It was going to be, in their own words, tough. Perhaps they overlooked their promise to deal seriously with this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the report card on this bill, as we have said, is negative, it is zero, zilch, and no good.

• (1320 )

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to be standing before the House this afternoon speaking to Bill C–78 which is an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

The purpose of this bill is to create binding legislation to ensure that environmental assessments are carried out on certain projects within federal jurisdiction. It would replace the federal policy on environmental assessment and review known as the guidelines order in effect since June, 1984.

Canadians need some sense of confidence that the environment is going to be protected. They are looking for a more considered, sensitive process. This bill is one that gives us something to discuss and to move ahead with because it is badly needed.

Unfortunately, the weakness of the legislation before us makes for a skeptical public and questions the motives of us as legislators and the seriousness of the government's intent in enacting this resolution.

The credibility of the bill would be considerably enhanced if the concept of sustainable development would find its way into the preamble and the purposes. It would be considerably more enhanced if this reference to a balance between the economy and the environment were referred to. This is significant because the over–riding purpose of this legislation should be to foster sustainable development.

It has been said that the 1980s will be remembered as the decade that the earth spoke back. It seems that we cannot pick up a newspaper these days without reading stories about problems in our environment. Think about it: acid rain, smog, dirty water, closed beaches, and global warming. Today human kind is seriously reassessing the relationship with the natural world. We have become aware that in our enthusiasm for economic development we have neglected a crucial component of what allows our economy to support us, the environment. We have been living off the capital we have inherited, not the interest and it has to stop.

Most people want to do the right thing when it comes to our environment. Many of us still have a basic lack of understanding of what we can do to relate to the environment. We hesitate to call ourselves environmentalists, but we do not want to be labelled insensitive. What we do know, all of us, is that the problem is urgent and the time for change is now. And changing we are. With increasing awareness of environmental issues, comes a burning desire to save this planet earth which is the source of our existence. Along with fears and new awareness comes inspiration and dedication. I would like to challenge all of us to let us makes 1991 the year that we answer back.

There are many global concerns that Canadians are faced with. PCBs, mentioned earlier by one of my colleagues, are made up of dioxins and furons, two of the most lethal toxins known to man. Several years ago the federal government took the step to eliminate PCBs. The problem is that PCBs, once created, do not go away. They cannot be destroyed. Therefore, they must be stored, at least until some means of safe destruction is available. The federal government should be encouraged to finance research into safe disposal techniques. Until these are in place, national standards should be established for the safe movement and containment of PCBs.

Global warming. What is global warming? It would result in large-scale melting of glaciers causing the level and size of oceans to increase. Flooded coastlines and islands would be the catastrophic result.

Our water. Canadians are the greatest users and abusers of water in this world. Our supplies of clean usable water are limited. We must learn to use them wisely. It is vital for life and our survival depends upon it.

Ozone depletion. Ozone is a form of oxygen that is suspended above the earth's surface. The ozone layer, approximately 15 to 35 kilometres, forms a protective shield from the sun's harmful rays. It is being destroyed.

Toxic chemicals, pesticides, and herbicides. We overuse them and these chemicals leak through the soil, get into our water supplies, and when ingested they accumulate in body fat.

Wildlife and endangered species. We are killing them off at an extremely rapid rate. There is habitat loss and destruction, overuse and poaching, and toxic contamination. What are we doing to our wildlife and endangered species?

Deteriorating infrastructure, acid rain, and our forests. Our forests are being cut down at an alarming rate and we depend upon our forests for the oxygen necessary to clean the air we breathe. It is also a contributing factor to global warming.

If I could get more site specific and deal with issues closer to home with regard to the environment, I would like to talk about the Rideau River. We have two rivers here in the national capital region, the Rideau River and the Ottawa River. For too long we have been standing around deploring the deterioration of the environment without doing anything about it. Many of us have difficulty dealing with the enormous scope of these problems, and I would like to focus on the ecological crisis facing us.

Let us be specific about the Rideau River. Everyone is aware of the Rideau and the fight to maintain it as a beautiful and vital river here in our nation's capital. We might not know all that is happening to the river or whether or not anyone is doing anything about it, but yet this historic waterway has become a major recreational resource. Once on it, you can make your way from the Ottawa River to the St. Lawrence River. It may be small but it is environmentally significant. The river is in trouble and we are the cause of its trouble.

Fortunately, more attention is being given to the Rideau River and I would like to mention four particular areas with which people are concerned. The rural beaches program by the Rideau Valley Conservation Authority. They are doing a study which will identify our major rural pollution sources in the Rideau River and its beaches. It is terribly important.

Another study done by the Conservation Authority is a study of the Rideau Lakes. The aim is to protect the lake environment. Its members talk to the cottagers. They are doing something about it. The Rideau Valley Conservation Authority is an arm of the provincial government and of regional government. Those are two programs being initiated by them.

The Rideau Canal Management Plan is the federal government plan of the Canadian Parks Service of Environment Canada. The plan will provide for future management, use and development of the canal. It is the policy of the Canadian Parks Service to provide opportunities for public consultation during the preparation of plans.

The Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton is also continuing its sampling and testing program of the Rideau River.

The Friends of the Rideau are the people who live along the Rideau and the cottagers who live along the Rideau. They are officially known as the Rideau Waterway Co-ordinating Association, unofficially as the Friends of the Rideau. It is a non-profit organization concerned about the environmental impact upon that river.

Why do I mention the work under way on this particular river? I did so because, if the government is serious about the environment and what is happening today, then it must be more involved than it is. The federal government is doing less than any other agency to help protect certain areas of our environment. That is exactly why I zeroed in on that particular one.

Bill C-78 excludes, for instance, tax breaks aimed at particular individual projects as a reason to refer these projects to environmental review. What a waste of time, energy and money. This could be a gaping loophole if the federal government was to abuse this exclusion. Instead of devising financial packages to subsidize a project, Ottawa could put together tax incentives, reductions and deferrals, or duty remission schemes, that would be equally as attractive to a company or a consortium with a purpose of avoiding environmental review. Why go to the expense of an environmental review if you do not have to? This is especially relevant to energy, mining and resource projects.

The government should seek out all environmentally friendly businesses and recognize them through any number of positive ways. For example, the government should ask businesses if they meet or exceed all applicable government regulations, if they have developed an environmental code of ethics for their companies, and if they have worked toward pollution prevention rather than clean up.

The government should call on small businesses which practise environmental friendliness. It should promote these firms, hold them up as models to the community, and put their names in a book so that the public will know which company is selling environmentally friendly products or is friendly to our environment.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is up. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak to this very important bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. It being 1.31 p.m., I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.31 p.m. the House took recess.

CHARLES GOLDLUST HUMAN RIGHTS CENTRE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, October 28, 1990, the official dedication ceremonies will take place for the Charles Goldlust Human Rights Centre at the National Headquarters for B'Nai Brith Canada in Downsview.

Charles Goldlust, who passed away in 1985, was interned as a child in the death camps in Germany but was miraculously able to survive. He became deeply involved in all facets of Jewish life in Canada.

The Charles Goldlust Human Rights Centre houses the Institute for International Affairs and the League for Human Rights. The League is among Canada's most respected human rights advocates with a mandate to combat anti-Semitism, bigotry, hatred, racism and any other human rights abuses.

The memory of Charles Goldlust and his good deeds will continue to light the path of brotherly love, harmony and tolerance for all humanity.

TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the United States International Trade Commission found that imports of Canadian fresh, chilled and frozen pork, which account for a mere 3 per cent of the U.S. market, somehow threaten the U.S. pork industry.

This new ruling comes after an earlier remand by a panel under the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement which had disputed the commission's earlier finding.

It has become clear to Canadian farmers that this government has failed to achieve any of their free trade goals. In fact, the Free Trade Panel has been overruled.

The U.S. Secretary of Agriculture stated very clearly during the free trade negotiations that the U.S. Trade Remedy Laws are intact and in the event of a dispute, U.S. law shall prevail.

I call on the government to admit that the Prime Minister's objective under free trade as stated in Hansard on page 4146, March 16, 1987, "is to help Canadian farmers by increasing the predictability and security of access of exports from the farm sector" has, in fact, become another broken promise.

This government promised Canadian farmers that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement offered guaranteed access, not the guaranteed harassment they have received.

1990 COACHING AWARDS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, last evening, some outstanding Canadians were honoured at the 1990 coaching awards dinner. The dean of coaches, Mr. Jack Donoghue in his remarks referred to Canadian youth as our greatest natural resource, and that we need great coaches for their continued positive development.

I ask this House to join with me and the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport in congratulating the coaching award recipients, in particular, four Albertans: Michael Jiranek of Bashaw, who received the Longine-Wittnauer Coaching Excellence Award; Deryk Snelling and Peter Connellan from the University of Calgary for their 3M coaching Canada awards; Mr. Paul Hortie of Edmonton, who sadly passed on before his recognition. However, Mrs. Sylvia Hortie received his award for outstanding contribution to coaching in the sport of boxing.

Thank you as well to TSN for providing turning point scholarships. From this leadership, Sir, Canada will continue with pride to be among the best in the world.

SOCODEVI

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to draw the attention of the House to an organization for international co-operation in my riding, the SOCODEVI.

This organization comprises 12 major co-operative institutions in Quebec that wish to promote the use of this formula as a development tool in Third World countries.

SOCODEVI works together with co-operative or pre-co-operative partners in developing countries, by offering technical and financial support to help these partners establish and promote the development of viable organizations, all in a spirit of partnership and mutual co-operation.

The member institutions of SOCODEVI are involved in a variety of sectors, including finance, agro-food, forestry, housing and tourism.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that SOCODEVI will serve as a model for other institutions and that their work will continue to produce the same excellent results we have seen so far.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, following the demise of Meech Lake, the Tory government failed the first real test of bilateral negotiations with Quebec, namely on the immigration issue.

An administrative agreement on immigration which, according to the Premier and the Prime Ministers, was imminent in June, is now back in limbo after being discussed for more than three years.

Everything with respect to standards had been settled, and funding was almost finalized. A signing session was scheduled by the federal government and then mysteriously cancelled a few months ago.

In view of this new deadlock, Mr. Speaker, today the federal government should have the courage and intellectual honesty to sign this agreement and continue giving Quebec the means to exercise its legitimate and unchallenged responsibility in the field of immigration.

LEBANON

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, On October 13, 1990, the Syrian army, supported by Lebanese pro-Syrian leftist militants, launched a simultaneous attack by air and land against a Christian enclave of East Beirut with the pretext of putting an end to the opposition of General Michel Aoun and the agreement obtained. After the soldiers defending the presidential palace surrendered their arms to the invaders, the latter slaughtered them like sheep and mutilated their bodies. Then the Syrian army initiated a massacre of those in the vicinity.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on many occasions in this House I have condemned the foreign armies on Lebanese soil, in a Lebanon that was one of the signatories to the United Nations Charter in 1945. We have asked the international community,in every way possible, to oblige both foreign armies to leave Lebanese territory.

Mr. Speaker, what does it take to persuade all Canadians to put pressure on the Canadian government to persuade the UN Security Council to end the massacre of a people?

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Small Business Week 1990 is an opportunity for all of us to focus on the importance of small business to the economies of our communities and to the economy of Canada.

This government's policies have been designed to stimulate entrepreneurial spirit, but we must do more to enable Canadian firms to effectively compete domestically against foreign companies which can now easily access the Canadian market and to also be able to go head-to-head in the international marketplace.

Ensuring that our youth have the training and the skills required to meet the demand for a skilled workforce will go a long way in meeting the needs of the manufacturing industry. A young, skilled, innovative workforce will allow greater emphasis on productivity, which is the key to both increased export success and to improving the supply potential of the economy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the recent movie, Sex, Lies and Videotapes was obviously a personal hit with the Minister of Finance for he has now produced and directed his own version.

Three hundred thousand dollars of taxpayers' money has been used to finance this propaganda video. We will have to await the "R" rating but we can certainly predict some of the lies. The minister's video will say the GST is a visible tax. But it is not. It will say the GST will be revenue neutral. It will not be. The video will say it does not apply to food; in part, it does. The minister's video production will say it will benefit Canadians. It will not. It will say the GST will help small business. Untrue. The video will say the GST will reduce our debt. It will not.

The Minister of Finance's version of Sex, Lies and Videotapes will fail to be a box office success. But the minister may wish to submit this spoof of reality to America's Funniest Home Videos.

EXTRADITION ACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, tens of thousands of Canadians have demanded changes to the Extradition Act. Frankly, I am embarrassed that we have such a prolonged procedure, one that allows foreign fugitives to languish in Canadian custody at Canadian expense rather than face justice in their own country.

The hon. member for Peterborough presented a bill to this House on Tuesday that would reduce the extradition proceedings by up to one and a half years. The Official Opposition and the government had agreed to expedite the bill and move it to committee for action.

We had the opportunity to vote with all-party agreement. For purely partisan reasons, the New Democrats refused to agree and have delayed that vote. We had the means to improve the Extradition Act but the New Democratic Party delayed these improvements. The Canadian public has demanded them and we are going to see this act improved in spite of the NDP.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in light of the deal by Liberal senators to get the GST passed, let us look at the facts.

Do the Liberals really oppose the GST?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did the "hypogrit" senators defeat the GST bill at first reading when they had the majority?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did the "hypogrit" senators defeat the GST bill at second reading when they had the majority?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did the "hypogrit" senators use their majority to defeat the GST in April?

• (1410 )

Mr. Rodriguez: Did the "hypogrit" senators use their majority to defeat the bill in May?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Did they use their majority in the Senate to defeat it in June?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: The facts are clear: The Liberals have lost it for the GST since Allan MacEachen and Jean Chrétien first devised it in the early eighties.

Some hon. members: Shame.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in a more serious vein, at the launching of Small Business Week, 12 young business people from across Canada received the FBDB award for young entrepreneurs. Small Business Week is an annual occurrence that emphasizes the contribution of small businesses to our economy.

This year's theme is: Quality and Productivity: The Competitive Edge. This week, hundreds of activities are being organized across the country to give entrepreneurs a chance to exchange information. The award winners are from each province and are all 29 years old or younger. They were selected for their success in business and their innovative approach. The winner in Quebec was David Lauzon, 26 years old. David owns and operates a wood parquet factory in Papineauville, which employs 30 people.

In Beauce, in my own riding, our young people have a very developed sense of entrepreneurship. The federal government is proud of this record and wishes to congratulate all young entrepreneurs in this country.

LEBANON

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was witness to a very troubling event.

Members of the Lebanese community held a demonstration in front of the Lebanese Embassy here in Ottawa. What started as a peaceful march turned into a very violent rally. Fortunately, I was able to diffuse the situation through concerned dialogue.

I do not wish to put the blame on anyone, however, I would like to stress that violence either here in Canada or elsewhere in the world cannot and will never be a solution. Human rights must be respected and can only be achieved through peaceful negotiations and mutual respect.

It is only in this spirit of non-violence that we can hope that Lebanon will recover its sovereignty, independence and peace.

ED SHURTLEFF

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute an inventor, Ed Shurtleff of St. George, New Brunswick.

Ten years ago, Ed realized that money and resources were being wasted every time he threw away dirty oil, so he set out to invent a refiner, convinced that ecological concerns would make such a machine viable.

Four years later, he produced the first model of what would become the SX302 refiner. The device is now available for use by municipalities, truck fleet operators and conventional waste oil handlers.

Canada and the world need more inventors like Mr. Shurtleff. It is by controlling and eventually eliminating waste that will enable us to give future generations an environment in which they can live and prosper.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity today to recognize the contribution of small business to the economy of Canada.

I want to recognize the spirit and determination of Canadian entrepreneurs as they attempt to run their businesses during these trying economic times.

In Prince Edward Island, 90 per cent of the businesses are small and, therefore, the greatest source of new jobs in my province. The rural nature of Prince Edward Island demands that small businesses play a vital role in both the economic and social structure of the Island.

With personal and business bankruptcies at an all time high in this country, a devastating 37 per cent, the area of small business deserves the attention of this government.

It deserves to be promoted and assisted with encouraging government policies and programs, not continually discouraged with regressive practices like the government's high interest rates which produce the high dollar and, of course, the goods and services tax.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, a November 10, 1989, internal government memorandum from Dieter Gruenwoldt to Bob Taylor gave the House a very important insight into what has been going on in relation to EARP legislation. I quote:

S. O. 31

The recent April 1989 Rafferty–Alameda Federal Court Decision relating to the Environmental Assessment and Review Process, EARP, has determined the EARP Guidelines Order in Council, 1984, to be a law of general application. The implementation of EARP is therefore no longer "discretionary"; it is now mandatory–

We have seen in the Rafferty–Alameda case that the government did not do its job. It is now in contempt of the courts and the law of Canada.

On the Oldman River dam case, the government has not lived up to the Federal Court of Appeal unanimous ruling and is now in contempt of the ruling of the court.

On the Kemano II project in British Columbia, it has given Alcan a special Order in Council exempting it from mandatory provisions of the law of Canada.

We heard last night that the Government of Quebec plans to proceed with James Bay II without applying mandatory—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE CANADA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to the dedicated employees in our penitentiaries, the Correctional Service staff.

Correctional employees are responsible for the custody and control of offenders who in many cases have become Canada's most hardened and dangerous citizens.

It is clearly evident that the environment of corrections is both stressful and perilous. It is very difficult for front line CSC employees to endure long enough to become eligible for normal retirement. It is urgent that the question of an early retirement and retraining package be addressed for these employees. It is imperative that such a plan be implemented.

Correctional Service employees play an integral role in safeguarding Canadian citizens. I am hopeful that members of this House will see fit to support their request for such a package and repay their vital contribution to society.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Late this morning the Canadian Press reported that the minister told the parliamentary committee that "Canada is ready to use force to get Iraq out of Kuwait, even without United Nations approval".

Why is the government contemplating using force against Iraq in this way without a United Nations resolution? Is this not a break with Canadian tradition and contrary to the spirit of the resolution adopted by this House and the letters the minister has sent to the external affairs critics of both opposition parties?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition and his party would do the House and, I think, the public of Canada a service if, instead of simply relying upon newspaper condensations of a committee hearing, they would consult with the members of their own caucus who were present at that committee hearing.

I made the point, which I think was generally agreed to by members of all parties in that very useful, calm, non-partisan joint session of the committees on national defence and external affairs this morning, that Canada has two principal goals. One of those principal goals is to have the resolutions of the United Nations accepted and to have Iraq out of Kuwait. Another of those principal goals is to use the United Nations and to operate under the auspices of the United Nations. We hope that we can accomplish both together.

We certainly do not want to leave Saddam Hussein in any doubt at all about the determination of Canada to support the resolutions that we have supported in the United Nations. We know that Saddam Hussein understands only the language of strength. There has been an unprecedented demonstration of strength. We do not want to give him any reason to believe that there will suddenly be some weakening of that strength.

On Canada's part there will not be, and so what we are seeking to achieve here, in support of resolutions of the Security Council, is a demonstration to Saddam Hussein that the only alternative open to him is to move back from Kuwait. That is the best opportunity to give peace a chance. That is the policy of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if there is to be the kind of use of force the minister spoke of in the committee this morning, I ask him: Who will make this decision? Will it be the United Nations? Will it be the United States itself? Will it be Canada? Canadians deserve and need to know the answer to that question today.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question or one very similar to it was put and answered in the standing committee this morning. I am sorry the Leader of the Opposition did not have the opportunity to consult with the members of his party who were active, constructive, non-partisan participants in that committee session this morning.

I have written to my colleagues in the House, the hon. member from Winnipeg and the member from Burnaby. I have indicated to them that if there is some change in the circumstances of decisions the Government of Canada has to take we will seek to consult Parliament and, if consultation is not possible, to advise Parliament.

I made it clear in the committee today that decisions as to changes in policy that Canada might have to contemplate will naturally be taken by the cabinet of Canada. We cannot always wait. Events do not always wait for us to come to Parliament to consult as to whether or not we should respond to a situation that, to quote the member from Newfoundland, his defence critic, "can hot up very quickly". His defence critic understands that. I hope that the hon. Leader of the Opposition might talk to his defence critic.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I am asking the questions I am asking today precisely because I have consulted with my colleague, the lead External Affairs critic for the Official Opposition, as will be very clear when he gets the floor after I complete my questions.

I therefore wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether today, he can give all Canadians the assurance that any decision involving the offensive use of our forces against Iraq will not be made without consultation and debate in this House and without a resolution by the United Nations.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am glad the question was asked, because everything will be clearer after the questions by the hon. member from Winnipeg, since the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition indicate that the Liberal position is not clear.

However, I must point out to the hon. member—and I believe he is well aware of this—that there is a possibility that one of the permanent members of the Security Council might exercize its veto within the Council. It is therefore possible that a veto would make it impossible to act under the auspices of the United Nations. That is why we are now and in fact have been from the outset, negotiating carefully and diligently to find a way that would make it easier for Canada to arrange for a system that would make use of the auspices of the United Nations.

I hope the leader of the opposition is not about to say that Canada's commitment to being against the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq is something we are prepared to set aside if China, for instance, were to exercise its veto in the Security Council. That would be irresponsible, and that is not our position.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a related question, which he also knows is very much a concern to Canadians, dealing with the question of hostages.

We have now had statements by two U.S. cabinet ministers, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Baker, that Canada had been contacted about sending a high level delegation to Iraq to seek the release of hostages. We now have a statement from the state department spokesman, Richard Boucher, saying that President Bush and the Prime Minister in fact have talked about this matter yesterday.

I want to ask the minister what is going on. We have denials from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have assertions by the Americans that discussions are taking place.

Have we been contacted? Has there in fact been discussions with the Americans about whether to send a delegation? In fact, and perhaps most important, are we going to do something other than having our own officials in Baghdad make contact? Will we take special measures to seek the release of Canadian hostages presently being held in Iraq?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had thought the member was going to pursue the line of questioning commenced by his leader, but I certainly can understand why he did not.

There are two questions at issue here. One has to do with a report out of the United States suggesting that the foreign minister of Germany and I had been invited by Saddam Hussein to visit Baghdad. That is false. I have not been invited. I have no expectation that there will be an invitation for me to go to Baghdad.

There was a question as to whether there had been conversations between the President and the Prime Minister. The hon. member will know that there have recently been visits, among others, by the former Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Mr. Heath, to Baghdad and that there have recently been discussions with regard to the treatment of French citizens who are in Iraq.

The Prime Minister and the President were involved in a conversation the other day having to do principally with the acid rain question. It is entirely natural that they would have discussed this phenomenon that had involved France and that had involved the United Kingdom.

With respect to things that Canada might do, the hon. member asked a very helpful question the other day. I gave him an answer which I repeated in committee today, which I think and hope is helpful, that if there are serious practical proposals put forward by him or anyone else as to means by which Canada can help come home some of the remaining Canadians who are in Iraq or who are in Kuwait, and if that can be done in a way that is consistent with the Canadian support for the UN Security Council resolutions, then naturally I will look very carefully at that.

The House would want to know that today fully 97 per cent of the Canadians who were in Iraq or Kuwait at the time of the invasion of Kuwait are home. Of the 3 per cent who remain, some wish to remain. There are some who are against their will. We want to have them come home.

If the hon. member has a practical suggestion that is consistent with the Canadian support of the Security Council resolution, naturally I will look at it.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I think it would be very helpful if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would elaborate on the discussions held between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister about the Iraqi situation, particularly if in fact they discussed, as the Leader of the Opposition was mentioning, the potential use of force against Iraq.

Have there been consultations? Have there been those kinds of discussions to determine whether, how, and at what time we might take those actions?

In that case I would go back to the question of hostages and ask the Secretary of State specifically if he would undertake to send a special emissary to Iraq, a noted Canadian who might make that representation, or in particular to send a group of parliamentarians who are not associated with the government but could represent the interests of all Canadians in trying to seek the security and safety of those 59 Canadians still left in those war-torn countries.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think, but I want to confirm, if the hon. member shares my view that any action we take should be consistent with Canadian support of the Security Council resolutions. Does he agree with that?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Uh-huh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Yes, and that we should not take any action that would send a false signal to Saddam Hussein who might think that Canadian will was slackening. Does he agree with that?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Uh-huh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Yes, he does. Those are the conditions that I have set forward in my answer earlier. If there are proposals by the hon. member or others that will accomplish those goals and respect those conditions, then I am prepared to look at them very seriously.

The member and I had an opportunity in the committee this morning to talk about how my colleagues and I can best keep members of Parliament informed about developments that occur with respect to the situation in the gulf. A question was put to me regarding a particular aspect of a conversation between the Prime Minister and the President. I replied to that.

I intend to be similarly forthcoming on other particular questions that are put to me. As I said earlier today in the standing committee, and I think to the agreement of all members of the House, if some of those matters are matters which are best discussed in some confidentiality, I would request the opportunity to discuss those in confidentiality, but I want to keep the House of Commons fully informed.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the House of the statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs made to the committee this morning.

He said that he approved the use of force with or without the approval of the Security Council of the United Nations. That statement, I submit, is a green light to the United States and others to proceed without the approval of the Security Council, which is a position the Canadian government until now has been working to prevent.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs explain to the House what steps he is going to take to repair the grievous damage this statement has made to Canada's credibility as a member of the Security Council?

• (1430 )

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is inevitable that in an exchange like this, either my credibility or that of the hon. member will suffer. We will see whose does.

Because he was present throughout the debate, the hon. member knows that I repeated à maintes reprises the position of Canada, that our strong, strong preference is to work through the United Nations and that, indeed, we have been bending all of our efforts to that end with some substantial success.

I think that the willingness of the United States to support the United Nations to the degree it has is due, among other things, to the consistent, effective, persuasive encouragement by Canada for them to take that position. That remains our strong preference. But he knows the United Nations system. He knows that there is the capacity among the permanent members to exercise a veto. It has happened several times in the past and has stopped that institution from being effective.

He also knows, if he has been following—and I am sure he has—the recent debates regarding events in Jerusalem, that it is possible for a series of conditions to be imposed upon resolutions that are taken by the Security Council that can either destroy consensus or make those resolutions less helpful than they would otherwise be.

I repeat, our strong preference is to have Canadian action and, indeed, world action, within the context of the United Nations. But we want Saddam Hussein to be in no doubt at all. We have supported sanctions. We want Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. We prefer to have him out of Kuwait as a result of United Nations action, if that is possible. If that proves not possible, then obviously Canada is going to keep its word to the United Nations.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is not just Saddam Hussein who is listening, but it is those in the United States who are now on the point of deciding a very critical issue, an issue which will put at risk the lives not only of Americans and Iraqis, but now, after the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the committee, the lives of Canadians will be involved in this.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely critical that the Secretary of State for External Affairs make it clear to the United States that all parties in this House, and the Government of Canada, will not accept U.S. military action outside the approval of the United Nations.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs not support the United Nations in this, instead of just the U.S.?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we consistently have been supporting the United Nations and, indeed, have been successful in encouraging the United States to support the United Nations to a degree that is unparalleled in recent memory.

Perhaps I can best deal with this by putting a question to the hon. member. Is it the position of the New Democratic Party that if a permanent member of the Security Council vetoes action by the United Nations, then we should simply pack up our resolutions and let Saddam Hussein stay in Kuwait? Is that the NDP position?

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the NDP position is that until all has failed, the United Nations must get the complete, unqualified support of this government, this Parliament, and this country. That is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs is required to do.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: As a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, let me ask for the government's intentions vis-à-vis the Canadian forces. The Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning made a general statement favouring the use of force with or without the support of the Security Council.

Is it the government's position that Canadian forces will be involved in such action? Will the government undertake to come to this House before any escalation of Canadian participation in military action in the Gulf takes place?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would think that Canadians who are interested in knowing what went on in the committee would want to avail themselves of the opportunity to read the committee report, and not rely on the questions that have been put by my hon. friend, or some partial media report.

He has asked for a commitment. I have given a commitment in a letter to his colleague from Burnaby, and to the member for Winnipeg. That commitment is clear. It was delivered. It was offered by this government in the spirit of trying to keep the House as informed as possible.

Does the United Nations have our unqualified support? Of course, it does. We want the United Nations to work. We want those auspices to be the auspices under which Canada acts. We recognize that there is a veto in the United Nations. But we recognize that there would not have been, for example, United Nations action in Korea but for the accident of the absence of China. The question I put to him was not a debating trick. The question I put to him was, if there is a veto exercised by the United Nations that makes it impossible for a United Nations command, does he want Canada to say "Stay where you are Saddam Hussein"? We do not.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the report the minister tabled today, it is evident that family class immigration will rise to a high of 100,000 in 1992 and drop sharply by 1995 to 85,000.

Why did the minister not follow her own policy just announced a year ago to increase family class immigration? What has she against family unification?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member can see from the table, this government is not at all against family reunification in Canada. Indeed, the numbers after 1992 remain considerably higher than they are today.

The hon. member has expressed his support in the past, as have other members in the House, for a balance between the humanitarian, independent and family categories, and I think that the definition of a family, which is based on core family members and dependency, would meet with the approval of members of this House and other Canadians, particularly since the number of family members will continue to increase.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, we used to have a 50 per cent family class. Now we have it down to 30 per cent. That is the difference in her policy.

Mr. Speaker, in the immigrant integration federal strategy unveiled today the minister did not suggest anything to help schools cope with the wave of immigrant children. Why does the minister refuse to lighten the burden of schools that simply cannot provide adequate educational training for immigrant children? Why?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): First, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that in 1984 there were no dependents, none at all, just families. But the hon. member and his party are against dependents. Such was the situation that year. But in our case this is the first time we have drafted a five-year integration plan for the future. We are adding extra funds—$200 million—for integration and language courses for adults, of course, but for small children as well. We are now in a position where we can teach languages to 43 instead of only 28 per cent of the immigrant population. Still there is no denying that the provinces do have legal responsibilities in children's classrooms.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The many personal and business bankruptcies are continuing proof that not only do government monetary policies drive Canada into a recession, but it is also becoming obvious that if we do have a recession in this country, Quebec is hardest hit among all the provinces. I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he now intends to take every measure required to make sure that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Crow, lowers the overly high Canadian interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I would agree with the premise of the hon. member's question. The basic question I have responded to on many occasions is that we are watching what is happening in the economy and what is happening with inflationary pressures. We have indicated very clearly in the past our sensitivity to what has happened with the 1.5 percentage point drop in interest rates over the course of the summer. I think the hon. member has a clear sense of what the policy is of the Government of Canada.

It is important for us to watch what happens over the course of the next few months. If we see a continuation of what went on during the summer, certainly that would be reflected in interest rates.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The interest rate is frozen today but the recession is moving ahead with a great deal of speed. The GST is part of that.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether or not he intends to support the Prime Minister's off-the-cuff comments on the west coast about the removal of GST from books and educational materials or does he realize that no amount of snake oil and patchwork on the GST are going to make this palatable to Canadians. Is he going to let the Prime Minister play games that maybe it can be fixed after the GST is put it in place? Is he going to do what Canadians are asking him to do and withdraw the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about playing games. Canadians understand clearly the game that the Liberal Party of Canada is playing. They have seen their leader on the one hand saying, "We will kill this tax," and on the other hand, "We are going to have a commission"; on the one hand, "We are going to look at this thing again after we are elected," on the other hand, "We are going to kill the tax". People understand very clearly the games of the Liberal Party of Canada. The Liberal Party of Canada is playing a very cynical, partisan game.

On the one hand they have said we should get on with elements of tax reform, as Senator MacEachen, Senator Buckwold and Senator Kirby said back in 1987, but on the other hand, "Let's let Canadians think we are against this tax. Let's give Canadians a sense that we are against the goods and services tax", because deep down they know that this tax is important. It is a very cynical, partisan game that they are playing now and Canadians are showing that they are not fooled by it.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Once again the Minister of Finance and his tax-happy gnomes are acting without any sense of restraint. They are not content to tax literacy and harm the Canadian publishing industry, they have now decided to tax foreign books and magazine publishers by either forcing them to collect the GST from Canadian clients or by threatening to halt shipments at the border.

Has the minister considered the impact on Canadian publishing if other countries decide to retaliate against this global tax grab? Will the minister explain how this extension of the GST will not act as a barrier to cultural access for Canadians? Finally, will he not reconsider his punitive actions and withdraw this regressive taxation on all books, publishing and literature.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe I responded on Monday and Tuesday to the last question. I think the hon. member understands quite clearly the position that we have taken with regard to foreign publishers of magazines that compete with Canadian publications. We want to put the Canadian publications in a position where they are not disadvantaged in relation to the publications that come in and compete with them.

If the hon. member is saying we should not give the Canadian publishers a level playing field, then I would like to hear that from him.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. It's about cheatin' and hurtin'. Canadian bands playing Canadian bars and lounges will have to charge the owners of those bars and lounges the GST. As things now stand, American bands playing those same bars and lounges will not. As a result Canadian bar and lounge operators will be encouraged by the GST to hire American bands.

Will the minister agree that his GST will be cheatin' Canadian bands and leaving them hurtin'?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there ain't no such minister.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. During his recent trip to Vancouver the Prime Minister made the following statement about Canadian seniors and I quote:

They should be in bed at 71 years of age having milk and cookies!

How can the Prime Minister make a statement that is so insulting and out of touch with Canadian seniors?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: No, he said that about Liberal senators.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the statement, but it seems to me that it would be quite appropriate and applicable to Senator Hébert, if we keep in mind his behaviour in recent days.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Vézina: I will continue by stating that we as a government give priority to elderly people. We have programs which attest to the fact that the elderly make up an active and dynamic component of Canadian society. We will continue to defend our affirmative action programs for seniors, and I have the full support of both the Cabinet and the government in these measures.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, criticism against seniors is criticism against seniors.

My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister again. From the Prime Minister's comments, are Canadians to conclude that people such as former Governor General Roland Michener, author W. O. Mitchell and human rights activist Rabbi Gunter Plaut, all of whom are over 71, should stop contributing and go to bed?

Is the government not aware that the seniors of this nation continue to make the country what it is today?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): See, Mr. Speaker, the behaviour of Senator Hébert does provoke a passionate response! I am convinced that the kind of behaviour we saw on TV last week is an insult to older people who are full-fledged and responsible citizens anxious to do their share in the Canadian community.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister should be aware that, while American negotiators at the GATT are pressuring Canada to give up on supply-management, American politicians in Washington have passed a bill through both houses of Congress which will set up their very own system of supply-management in dairy.

Has the minister informed the Americans that their position on supply-management is totally hypocritical? Has he asked them if they will now, given this recent development, support our position at the GATT?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Canadian position has been well documented and well thought out. It is a balanced and realistic position. We do not take our marching orders from the United States of America.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. He seems to be staying surprisingly silent while editorial boards across the country attack supply-management based on faulty information, I might add, that his ministry gave out a few weeks ago on subsidies to dairy farmers.

Will the minister stand in the House today and tell Canadian consumers the truth, that the actual amount of dairy subsidy given to farmers is only one-tenth of the $2.2 billion he claims to be giving dairy farmers, and that the only reason we pay more for milk here in Canada is because the Americans subsidize their dairy producers in billions of dollars?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the proof of the pudding is in the Canadian government's position.

If the hon. member's position is such that he is not in favour of the Canadian position, which fully supports and strengthens the supply-management system in this country, he is about the only Canadian associated with agriculture who does not share that view.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Environment. When the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was Minister of Environment our party supported his view that an environmental impact study be carried out before proceeding with the James Bay project.

We have learned today the the Government of Quebec will begin the construction of infrastructures for this project without first holding public hearings. So my question is: will the Minister of the Environment, in his fight for public hearings, support the former Minister of Environment on the same issue?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell my hon. colleague that I discussed this issue this morning with my counterpart in Quebec, Mr. Paradis, and that his facts are not quite correct.

The Quebec Cabinet did not decide yesterday to allow the project to go forward but to ask Quebec Hydro to submit the 400 environmental studies done to the Ministry of the Environment for review. The Quebec government assured me this morning that no construction permit would be issued before this review is completed. We agreed, as we have done on several occasions, to have a proper environmental review done before construction starts.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the James Bay II hydro project is the largest industrial project ever conceived in the history of North America. As the Minister of the Environment knows, environmental assessment of federal jurisdictions by the Government of Canada is mandatory, meaning that construction without assessment is illegal.

Will the minister assure the House that before any infrastructure construction or any construction of any of the ancillary parts of the diversions or dams will not be allowed to proceed by the federal government until the environment assessment process and hearings are complete and have been reported to Parliament and the people of Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat again in English what I just said in French.

There is no construction permit to allow the project to go along. There is an agreement between the Government of Quebec and the Government of Canada to ensure that there is an appropriate environmental assessment process completed before construction starts. That is the state of this particular file.

LONG POINT MILITARY BASE

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday I met the hundreds of employees of the Long Point military base who were demonstrating against the eventual closing of the base following the recommendations contained in the Productivity Group's report.

Mr. Speaker, this closing would be an economic disaster for the Montreal region, since the military base is the largest industry in East Montreal with its 1,500 employees and the thousands of indirect jobs generated through its contracts with Montreal businesses.

Can the Minister guarantee us and confirm in writing that the Long Point military base will not be closed?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I have informed my colleague earlier, there has been a preliminary study of depots throughout Canada. I cannot provide the assurance that she requests because of budgetary restrictions, because of the need for operational efficiency, and because of the changing geopolitical situation around the world. I cannot guarantee bases in any place in Canada or abroad.

What I can tell the hon. member is that any action that would be taken would need additional study. I can assure the hon. member that that study or any study has not been undertaken to provide that information and at this time there is no intent of closing Long Point.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Quebec Minister of Cultural Communities and Immigration recently said that the federal government had cut by 17 per cent the financing of programs to teach French to Quebec immigrants and that immigration had increased by 12 per cent in that province.

The Couture-Cullen agreement also had to be renewed to be brought up to date. The purpose of this new agreement was, according to the Minister, to confirm the exclusive right of Quebec to select dependent immigrants and to ensure Quebec is in charge of the linguistic, cultural and economic integration of immigrants.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: Is the plan announced this morning by the Minister compatible with this new agreement?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I dealt last week with the immigration agreement between Canada and Quebec.

Today we announced we would increase the funds for language training and counselling across the country, and Quebec is no exception. There is money for French classes in Quebec since the number of immigrants to that province is going up.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would explain why the agreement has not yet been signed, why she is acting unilaterally and exactly how much money she intends to inject into the plan so that French-language programs will be available to immigrants in Quebec?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I answered these questions last week and again this morning. If the hon. member would care to read the plan I laid on the Table this morning, perhaps he would realize what the situation is with respect to language courses for Quebec.

I remain very sensitive to the situation in Quebec, and I am very much aware of Quebec's concern about the proportion of immigrants coming to Quebec.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE CANADA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

In May of this year, the former President of the Treasury Board met with delegates from Correctional Service Canada in Kingston, Ontario. At that time, the minister stated that he would undertake to deal with early retirement and retraining provisions for Correctional Service staff separately from the Public Service reform bill if that bill had not been tabled by early fall of 1990.

Can the minister tell the House what steps will be taken to facilitate this early retirement and retraining package for front-line Correctional Service employees?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. Of course, in my new portfolio one of the very important challenges I have to meet is Public Service pension reform. The government is well aware of the importance attached to this issue by the Correctional Service employees and their representatives. I hope to be in a position to proceed fairly soon with this reform and I am sure the appropriate legislation will cover the people to whom he is referring.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

This morning the Commissioner of Official Languages tabled a special report condemning the government for its failure to adopt the regulations necessary to implement the Official Languages Act passed by Parliament in 1988 with the support of all political parties. Two and one-half years have passed with increased attacks on bilingualism and this law has not yet been implemented.

Why has the government not tabled these regulations? If the government truly believes in the principles of bilingualism and this law, why does it not show some leadership and have this law implemented as soon as possible?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reaffirm the commitment to the government to issuing these regulations as soon as possible.

I will tell the hon. member, in all frankness, that the law makes the President of the Treasury Board particularly responsible for that area and I take this very seriously. I would not want to introduce regulations which were very advanced without going through them myself and consulting with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec and Alliance Quebec. I have been doing that and I have also spoken with the commissioner. I know he has his own views on this, and I respect them.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, that is a lot of nonsense. It has been two and one-half years since the bill was passed and the consultations took place more than a year ago.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on Bill C-72, the Prime Minister said that this bill was so important that Parliament should sit around the clock to adopt it.

Is this just another example of the Prime Minister's political rhetoric? If the legislation was so important at the time, is it now less important? Why doesn't the Prime Minister meet with cabinet around the clock to ensure passage of the regulations and the implementation of this legislation? Why?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I may recall that the Commissioner of Official Languages made some very important nuances that my hon. friend tends to forget. He explained that there were a number of things that had to be improved, but the legislation is in place, it already provides services and there are now 1,600 points of service in Canada. Furthermore, in the public sector, we have finalized 40 memoranda of agreement with the departments in recent months, identifying their responsibilities with respect to official languages.

I realize that we must get on with the regulations, and I am trying to as fast as I can, but I want to do it in such a way that it will help Canada exercise its full responsibility for official languages.

POINT OF ORDER

REPLY IN QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during an answer I gave earlier today with regard to the situation in Korea, I mentioned China, inadvertently, when I meant to mention the Soviet Union. I want to thank the several colleagues in the House who drew my error to my attention.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr Speaker, I just want to put the question usually put on Thursdays to the government House leader. Could he inform the House what the agenda for the House will be for tomorrow, Friday, and next week, Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Nunziata: And be nice about it, Harvie.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): There is the hon. member for York South—Weston talking about niceness again, a ratpacker telling me to be nice. I am always nice.

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will carry on with Bill C-78, the environmental assessment review process legislation, which I hope we will be able to complete. Tomorrow, it would be my intention to call, for completion I hope, second reading on Bill C-73, Crown corporations dissolution, and second reading of Bill C-81, dealing with the UN Convention on contracts, a technical, non-contentious piece of legislation, as well as, hopefully, second reading of Bill C-82, having to do with the charging of fees in Quebec ports, simply to provide a legal basis for what is now occurring.

On Monday, I will call for the final day on second reading of Bill C-84, Petro-Canada. For Tuesday and beyond, I will have the usual discussions with House leaders of the opposition parties to see what can be arranged.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate receiving this information and it is very helpful. I wonder if I could ask my friend, the government House leader, if he has any idea when Bill C-46 might be brought forward. I remind him that in the throne speech of this particular Parliament, it was stated: "You will be asked to legislate new conflict of interest standards for parliamentarians". Could the government House leader give us some indication when we might have a chance to begin that in earnest?

Mr. Andre: As the House leader of the New Democratic Party knows, we have been struggling at great length in our House leaders' meetings every Tuesday to try to reach some accommodation for dealing with the legislative program of the government in an expeditious manner, and that continues to be our objective.

If the House leader of the New Democratic Party is saying he is anxious to see some scheduling so that we can all plan and we can put things and there will be no parliamentary tricks to delay and disrupt our agenda, then I would welcome those discussions and I look forward, with great enthusiasm, to the next meeting of our committee.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): These types of discussions should be done behind the curtain.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee, and of the amendment of Mr. Taylor (p.14644).

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this House to speak to Bill C-78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, at second reading.

This government thinks that this bill is an important step forward in the campaign waged by this country to preserve and promote our environment. Bill C-78 is central to the overall objective of the government's "green plan": To make Canada, by the year 2000, the industrial world's most environmentally friendly country.

In fact, the Dutch government, a world leader in this area, wrote to the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office that this new legislation will make Canada the most environmentally friendly country and help the Netherlands develop their own reform program.

We will meet this objective while ensuring that the law is clear, efficient and predictable. Our goals have not been achieved within the present regulations, defined by the courts, which have never been intended as anything other than flexible guidelines.

Given the great significance of this legislation, Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly outline the four key principles used by the government in drafting the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

[English]

First, the government wanted an environmental assessment process that would be clear, consistent and predictable. There should be no uncertainty for any of the participants or any of the stakeholders in the environmental assessment process.

Second, we wanted a process that would be efficient and fair. Each project should receive the amount of time and the kind of assessment it requires.

Third, the government wanted legislation that would allow us to "anticipate and prevent" problems, rather than continue to struggle with the less effective and more expensive approach of react and cure.

Fourth, we wanted legislation that would encourage public participation and provide opportunities for the public to play a role in decision-making.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is a good law designed to meet all four principles. It is the result of two years of broad consultations with a wide spectrum of Canadians, including governments, the private sector, native peoples, environmental and other special interest groups, the legal profession and environmental assessment professionals.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act delivers virtually all of the recommendations from those consultations. A major feature of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is that it will end the uncertainty and the confusion created by recent court decisions based on the 1984 guidelines Order in Council.

By giving the federal Environmental Assessment process the power and the precision of law, both the efficiency and the effectiveness of the process will be greatly improved.

While the current guidelines Order in Council has proven to be an effective environmental planning tool, the past six years of experience have identified a number of problems. For example, the current process does not allocate time and resources according to environmental risk. As well, the current process provides many opportunities for duplication in assessments between different federal agencies and between different jurisdictions.

In Bill C-78, Mr. Speaker, we believe we have achieved a number of substantial advances that will solve most of the major shortfalls of the old system. It will, for example, ensure that our environmental assessment resources are focused where they are most needed by directing projects into process streams according to their degree of environmental risks. Projects likely to cause significant impact on the environment will immediately be subjected to mandatory study. Projects that are similar to ones that have previously been assessed will be candidates for class assessment, and projects that clearly do not pose environmental risks will be identified on a government-wide exclusion list and be exempted from the assessment. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will introduce mediation as a means of improving the efficiency of the public review process of major projects. Mediation will be the preferred choice for public review whenever all stakeholders are willing to participate and work toward a consensus on the potential environmental effects of a project and the measures necessary to mitigate those effects.

Mediation will involve representatives of all groups which have a direct interest in or are directly affected by a proposed project. In this manner, Canadians who are most involved with and most concerned about a proposal will be able to communicate effectively with each other, with the project proponents and with the responsible federal authorities.

To minimize the duplication of assessment processes, joint review panels will be established where another party or jurisdiction also has the responsibility to assess a project. The other party could be a provincial government, the government of a foreign state, a body set up under a comprehensive land claim agreement, a federal regulatory authority.

Further, another federal public review process can be named as a substitute for a panel review under the new act. One example of a substitute panel may be the National Energy Board.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to remind hon. members that the government is also establishing a parallel environmental review process for all proposals that require a cabinet decision, whether that relates to policies, programs, major projects, or to new legislation. The federal government is committed to an environmental assessment process for all its decisions, one that will preserve cabinet efficiency and confidentiality, but at the same time ensure that all decisions are open to public scrutiny.

[Translation]

An environmental impact statement will accompany the announcement of any cabinet decision. Thus, Canadians will be invited to examine thoroughly these public statements and Ministers could be called before the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on the Environment to discuss the environmental effects of their policies, programs, projects or legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to go on to talk about some of the improvements which will make the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act much more efficient than the existing Order in Council.

First of all, the proposed Bill will ensure that an environmental assessment is carried out before the project goes ahead. This, Mr. Speaker, will ensure that environmental problems are identified and alleviating measures are in place before the actual work starts. That way, we will be able to maintain both a healthy economy and a healthy environment. As importantly, Mr. Speaker, we will avoid the actual process which, so often, turns out to be inefficient from both an administrative and environmental point of view.

Second, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will give the Minister of the Environment greater powers and increased control on the environemental assessment process. Nobody but the Minister of the Environment—not even the responsible authority of the project—will have the power to decide whether mediation or a panel review is necessary.

The bill will also give the Environment Minister the power to set up public review panels to assess the projects which could have serious transborder environmental effects on federal, provincial, Indian or foreign lands.

For instance, a project in one province likely to have environmental effects on another province or a federal or Indian territory, or even outside the country, would belong to this category.

Third, in order to ensure an effective environmental assessment process, this government will agree to provide major new funding for the purpose of fully implementing the process throughout. The addition of this new funding could even triple the current level allocated for environmental assessments.

In order to make it possible for the process to be effective, the Act will set up the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency which will have an arm's laugh approach with all departments, including Environment Canada. Its mandate will be to assess and report on the implementation of the environmental assessment process throughout its organization, Every year, the minister will have to table in the House a report which Canadians will be able to examine.

Fifth, the new legislation will require the setting up of follow-up programs in order to ensure the effectiveness of the new assessment process. The Act will ensure that the setting-up of follow-up and monitoring plans will be part of the environmental assessment of all major projects.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow him to continue?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of information. Did the minister not use his 40 minutes in the first half of this debate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, he did not.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I would like to know why he insults us by a 10-minute speech and asks for unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Perhaps the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands can straighten it out for the hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there were indications that the minister could not make it this morning to be here for the 20-minute speech which he might have legitimately given.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Forty minutes.

Mr. Milliken: No. This morning he would have had 20 minutes in the usual course, with 10 minutes for questions and comments. That time expired, and now we are into the 10-minute segment.

We recognized that the minister could not be here. There were discussions among the parties. We would be happy to extend his 10 minutes by an additional 10 so that he has a full 20-minute speech without questions or comments.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point. We are certainly glad. We understand the difficulties the minister had in being here earlier. We are certainly prepared to let him have the full 20 minutes but, like other members, we certainly hope there is unanimous consent to allow for a 10-minute question and answer period, which I am sure the minister would seek.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow the extension of time, but I will not allow the questions and comments period.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, all that the minister is asking is that we revert to the way we were dealing with the matter earlier. I would ask that we seek unanimous consent to have the minister complete his remarks with a 20-minute speech—as a matter of fact a few moments extra if he wishes—and then the usual 10-minute question and comment period.

I seek unanimous consent to allow the minister to proceed that way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fontaine: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order. Could you perhaps put it again, Mr. Speaker? It is a government member who is blocking unanimous consent for his own minister to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fontaine: I said "no", Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in preparing to speak today on this particular piece of legislation it was very tempting indeed to wander in here with a volley of criticism toward this minister and this government in respect of this particular bill.

It is so easy to criticize this government for the duplicitous nature of this legislation. In looking up that definition, duplicitous means double meaning, deceitfulness, appearing to be that which is not.

Far be it from me to suggest that the minister himself is duplicitous, or that this government is duplicitous. Certainly, in the eyes of Canadians, this legislation is indeed duplicitous.

Rather than a tirade of concern about this legislation, I would rather go into some specific details and show precisely where it falls down. Since the Hon. Tom McMillan was environment minister—and that was some time ago—this government has been promising strong environmental legislation and a strong review process that would be entrenched in law. Instead what we have is a weak and hollow shell of a bill. It has more holes in it as my colleague said than a piece of Swiss cheese. It is weaker in fact than the current guidelines within which the minister must work. It is a step backward in terms of an environmental review process, not a step forward.

It appears that government members are intent on ramming through this bill before the accompanying regulations can be drafted. One has to ask why. I think the reason is very clear, that they want this bill in place before the important decisions have to be made in terms of the specifics of the regulation. They want to leave it vague. They want to duck the issue in terms of a hard-nosed piece of legislation that could be brought down with respect to the environmental review process.

For example, cabinet decisions are exempted from this legislation. This would mean, for example, that a cabinet decision to cut public transit would be exempt.

Members from British Columbia are very familiar with the effect of having too much control by cabinet over these kinds of sensitive issues. Sometime ago, for example, the agricultural land reserve in British Columbia was put in place. There was a professional body of about 80 individuals called the Environmental Land Use Secretariat. This body was put into place to police those kinds of decisions; but the government of the day at that time, the Social Credit government of the day, decided to disband those individuals and decided that cabinet in fact would be the final answer as to whether a piece of land remained in the reserve or without.

We have seen the impact of playing politics with sensitive decisions in that manner. Certainly members from British Columbia have seen the weakness in having direct political access through cabinet to those decision-making processes.

By giving cabinet decisions exemption from this legislation we see a direct political linkage here that is far from comfortable, the process far too political, far too fraught with error.

The bill leaves important questions unanswered, questions like: which projects are going to be covered? Which will be exempted? What legislation will actually fall under the act? How will Crown corporations be affected? Will foreign aid and development be properly assessed?

These concerns have been left to regulations that are yet to be defined. The regulations themselves, the teeth of the legislation, have been left undefined.

An hon. member: It sounds like a pig in a poke.

Mr. MacWilliam: The federal environment assessment and review office will report to the environment minister under this act. That is direct political control. This agency which is responsible for implementing the legislation should have been left to be independent, answering only to Parliament.

A number of reports including the New Democrats' report on the environment, Towards a Sustainable Future, and various environmental groups have called for the creation of an independent environmental auditor to review such government operations independently. This was in the original draft of the bill, but it has been axed. It has been watered down and completely axed in the final version.

It is clear that this legislation has been drastically watered down. It is now, in the government's words, "only an advisory process".

I want to go back a ways and suggest that six provinces have been successful in their appeal to the federal government to cut the guts out of this legislation, legislation that could have had teeth but has been watered down and made essentially useless. The Governments of Nova Scotia, Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario—the previous Government of Ontario—Manitoba and Quebec met sometime ago to mobilize, pressure and develop a strategy to water down the environmental assessment review process.

I want to read into the record a news release of the Winnipeg Free Press in May 1990. It states that the western provinces are demanding that Ottawa rewrite its environmental review guidelines so major projects cannot be halted for court ordered environmental studies. It goes on to say that Premier Gary Filmon said recent Federal Court of Canada rulings have created a nightmare for developers. Well, too bad. If the environmental review process finds that a development goes against the guidelines for sustainable development and goes against common sense in terms of preservation in the environment, too bad for the provinces. We should have that kind of legislation so there is some kind of regulated federal control over the kinds of procedures we have seen in the past and that we continue to see impact upon our environment.

Many projects, as I have mentioned, are now either in the process of being built or considered for construction. They may well escape these environmental review procedures. Let us consider the Rafferty-Alameda—we have talked about that a number of times—and the Oldman River project and the largest megaproject in the history of this continent, the James Bay project. These projects may well not be considered under these legislative guidelines.

In British Columbia—and the members from B.C. have talked on this time and time again—the Alcan Kemano project will divert all of the 12 per cent of the flow of the Nechako River into the Fraser River and divert it into another water course. If that project goes through without an environmental assessment, it will be a disgrace to the environmental integrity of the House.

The diversion of those waters will leave only 12 per cent of the original flow, dropping the level of the Fraser River by over three feet at Hell's Gate in British Columbia. It could have disastrous environmental consequences.

I know my time is limited. I have many other points that I would like to argue, but let me sum up by saying that Bill C-78, the environmental legislation now before the House will not—and I repeat will not—be a step forward but a major step backward. It is a duplicitous piece of legislation that will not do the job and I submit is not intended to do the job which the public believes it should be warranted to do.

Canadians want strong federal legislation and strong measures. They want a government with a commitment to environmental integrity and a commitment to the concept of a sustainable environment. This legislation takes us the other way. It weakens what we already have in place. The government has not served the public well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Agriculture; the hon. member for Vancouver East—Human Rights; and the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Fisheries.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand this afternoon to speak to Bill C–78, the government's proposed environmental assessment act.

I have to say at the outset that regrettably I am not an expert in the area of environment, but I do have a strong concern about the proposed legislation. I have in front of me some statements made by people who are experts in this country who along with me have expressed serious concerns about Bill C–78.

To quote from some of their statements, they are saying such things as: "Mr. Mulroney's government's latest environmental legislation is fundamentally flawed. Canada will return to the dark ages of environmental law if Bill C–78 passes in its present form. Bill C–78 proposes to replace current federal environmental assessment laws. The federal law presently requires that environmental impact studies be conducted for proposals likely to injure the environment significantly. Environmentalists assert that the presently proposed bill will give the government complete discretion over whether to hold environmental impact studies". Rod MacDonald of the Saskatchewan Action Foundation for the Environment is quoted as saying: "This bill completely fails to meet the objectives of environmental assessment."

The environmental assessment caucus of the Canadian Environmental Network met in Hull on September 28, 29 and 30 solely for the purpose of discussing the bill before us today. Thirty–five representatives from groups across the country were in attendance. Delegates unanimously called Bill C–78 a step backwards, directly contradicting the federal Minister of the Environment.

When we complete debate at second reading of this bill, a vote will be held. We will be voting in principle whether to support or not support this bill. If the main principle of this bill is purported to provide good environmental assessment to all projects in this country that are federal, and projects out of this country that are funded by the federal government or funded by other agencies with federal government input or projects that cross a federal boundary, that would be one thing. It is my belief that there is a principle hidden within this bill which is more significant and that is, that this government has full discretion when to call an environmental assessment review and when not to. That is of serious concern to me because I believe it is a step backward from where we are right now with FEARO.

I have particular concerns with regard to this bill. One of them starts with the preamble to the bill itself, which does not even express the words "sustainable development" nor support the principle of sustainable development. Instead, it talks about ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality.

There are all kinds of Canadians and some support environment in one way and some in other ways. I think what we are all trying to say is that whatever Canadian projects we are involved in, they must encourage and support sustainable development. It is a serious flaw of this bill that it does not speak in its preamble about the importance of sustainable development.

To change that we could propose an amendment. There are other amendments that could be proposed to this legislation that would improve it. I have to say again that I am more particularly concerned about what seems to be an underlying fact of this bill, that no matter how we amend it, whether or not an assessment is done is entirely up to the discretion of a minister, not even the Minister of the Environment.

The purpose of this act is to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration. I believe that the purpose of the act should be more ensuring than stating that projects receive careful consideration. It should state that projects are to be fully reviewed and ensure that projects are scrutinized for sustainable development.

In clause 6 of the bill it states that:

> (a) in the opinion of the responsible authority the project is described in an exclusion list.

It sounds straightforward but it could lead to improper discretionary decision by a minister of the Crown. The key is that the opinion of the minister is sovereign and not a statute, and that again speaks to my particular concern about the wholeness of this bill.

In clause 11(3) we say that the scope of the environmental panel study will be determined by the responsible authority, the minister under which the responsibility of the project falls. This clause would be strengthened considerably if this responsibility were conferred on the Minister of the Environment. We have any number of ministers making decisions about whether or not a project will go to a panel and just how that environmental panel will determine its authority. I believe that the scope of the bill must be changed to provide for mandatory environmental assessment of projects.

Section 34 outlines clearly that if a responsible minister can justify the impact of a project, no matter how adverse, the project will be allowed to proceed. The discretionary power conferred by this bill in the responsible authority is a major flaw that could reduce the effectiveness of other parts of the legislation. In general, it leaves far too much room for industrial and business lobbies to influence the responsible authority to make a decision that would be contrary and detrimental to Canada's environmental protection objectives.

The Minister of the Environment was stating in his earlier remarks that one of the intents of the new proposal, Bill C–78, is to have in place clear, consistent and predictable outcomes. I would say that we have just the opposite, that what we would be approving if we went ahead with this bill is an assessment process which would be entirely unpredictable, inconsistent, totally dependent upon the discretion of whatever minister was in charge of a project.

I believe that in many ways this bill is going by us, it looks like a sheep but in fact it is a wolf in sheep's clothing. If a project were to get to the review panel stage, there are many things which I agree with in that process. However, even at the end of the review panel's deliberations on any particular project, that panel does not have judicial, nor quasi–judicial function but can simply advise. I do not have a great problem with that aspect of it, however the fact that we cannot get the public panel review process without undergoing a very discretionary process is of particular concern to me.

If a project does go to the review panel process, one of the areas that again is of particular concern to me is that projects that are carried on and funded in whole or in part by the Canadian government overseas can be exempt from environmental assessment under this legislation. I believe that in Canada we must view all aspects of the environment in terms of the picture that was taken by NASA of our planet earth some years ago. Mr. Speaker, if you look at that image in your mind you can see that the environment knows no such thing as political boundaries.

What happens in other countries of the world affects us. What happens to the environment in Third World countries can affect our environment here in Canada. I think it is absolutely necessary that we apply the same standards overseas as we do in Canada. We cannot penalize countries in the Third World with assessments that do not equally apply here in Canada. I believe that Canada must break out and set the example. An environmental assessment review process is equally important to all of our projects abroad as they are in Canada.

It is very important that we have public participation in all of the environmental assessments that we undergo and in our regulations. I think that we must make sure that when we are able to do environmental assessments overseas that we make allowances for public input to that process.

As I said, I am very concerned that there are going to be special regulations set aside for international projects, projects funded in full or in part by the Canadian government. We will be allowing environmental degradation to continue in the Third World which not only affects populations living in the Third World but affects us as well. We all must be very concerned about this.

Poverty is understood to be a leading cause of environmental degradation. I think that we must attack environmental degradation internationally from the grassroots level, dealing with individuals and the situations in which they find themselves. We must apply appropriate environmental technologies to ensure that people in the Third World are given the opportunity to live a better life, but a better life that preserves our environment, not only for themselves but for us as well.

People in the Third World who are in need and who are beneficiaries of our projects want to have a voice in the projects that are put forward for their benefit. I think that we have a responsibility to help them to participate in the decision-making process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Ottawa South, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. I will then go to the hon. member for Surrey North, and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for Wetaskiwin for rearranging the time so that I could proceed now.

I think that this is a very important piece of legislation that we are dealing with today, important not only because of what is contained in the bill itself and the fact that it sets out in legislative form the guidelines for environmental assessment at the federal level, but also because it needs to be a representation of what the Parliament of Canada believes in terms of environmental value.

We have certainly been evolving very rapidly in our understanding as a society of the importance of preserving the environment, not just for our own enjoyment at the present time, but for future generations.

What this bill needs to do and what it perhaps fails to do is to ensure for all of us that the standards that we expect to be applied to the preservation and protection of the environment are done in a fair, clear, effective and meaningful way.

We know that this bill is an evolution from the previous guidelines that existed. One would hope that by taking the guidelines and putting them into statutory form, that an advance forward would have been made. In fact by actually taking what previously had been a guideline and saying it is now the law of Canada, it is in the statute books, that we actually would have been able to say, "Look at this. Canada has moved forward. Canada has established a rule of law with respect to the protection of the environment which will be a model for countries around the world". But I fear that the government has failed in the bill that it has put forward.

I point out the preamble where the object of the legislation is set out. The preamble states that the object is "to achieve an appropriate balance between economic development and the preservation and enhancement of environmental quality". That, Mr. Speaker, indicates the fundamental flaw in thinking that underlies this piece of legislation.

To see the environment and its preservation and protection as somehow in a continuum or as a trade-off with economic development is exactly the wrong approach to this issue. In fact, economic development for the future depends upon environmental protection now. It is not a trade-off. Our future economic well-being is not going to be improved by degrading the environment today. Our future economic well-being depends upon us acting today to preserve and protect the environment that surrounds us. It is as crucial tomorrow as it is today, as it was when we did not know about in years gone by.

At first blush, this seems to be a fairly wide-reaching environmental assessment structure because the environmental projects to be assessed, as set out in clause 5 of the bill, are very wide ranging and include almost everything where a federal authority is involved. But the first thing that strikes me is if the intent in drafting this clause 5 was to prevent the federal government from intervening where, in the interests of the peace, order, and good government of Canada, it should be intervening in projects that have an effect both interprovincially and within a province. The heritage that we have—

The heritage of Canadians is too important to be left only to the provinces.

[English]

If we have the power under the peace, order, and good government provisions of the Constitution Act of Canada, as we do, according to the Supreme Court of Canada, for example, to impose mandatory wage and price controls in order to prevent inflation, then surely the federal government will acknowledge that it has the power under the same provisions to intervene in development projects which are going to be environmentally harmful. Yet I do not see even a wish on the part of the federal government to acknowledge that that jurisdiction may be theirs in the context of clause 5.

We then get into the process itself, the power of the ministers to exclude projects from environmental assessment and review. Clause 6(1)(a) states:

> in the opinion of the responsible authority the project is described in an exclusion list;

If that is the case, then it is exempt from environmental assessment and review.

The responsible authority is very broadly defined and can include, in the case of a department or ministry of state, the member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada presiding over that department or ministry. In other words, any minister deciding that a project is on an exclusion list can prevent environmental assessment and review from occurring. As a minimum, that should only be the power of the Minister of the Environment.

The Minister of the Environment should have responsibility to account to the House of Commons for the welfare of our environment, as a whole. The Minister of Public Works should not be able, under clause 6, to decide that a project is exempt from assessment and review. Only the Minister of the Environment should be able to do that, if any minister is able to do it. If a minister is able to do that, and if it is the Minister of the Environment, then that decision should be reviewable. There should be an appeal. It should be possible for the people of Canada to take the Minister of the Environment to court and say: "You should not be exempting this. The implications for our environment are too great." That provision, as far as I can see, is simply not in this bill.

It strikes me in so many ways that this bill, although well meaning and although its time has come, is an inadequate response in the context of many events occurring in Canada, such as the Rafferty–Alameda situation and the Oldman Dam. We are seeing the guidelines being enforced by the courts first and the federal government being dragged along somewhat reluctantly. Now is the time to have a clear, legislated statement of what it is that we think should be the standard for the world, not only for Canada, in protecting the environment.

As I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the great assistance of my co–op student, Tom Yurkiw, who worked so hard in preparing notes for this.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate today in the debate, at second reading stage, on Bill C–78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

The time for speeches at this second reading stage is limited and because my native heritage is very important to me. I would like to focus my remarks on those aspects of the bill that hold special meaning for the aboriginal people of Canada. However, let me also be quick to add that this issue of environment is very important to the whole of my constituency.

Hon. members opposite have been very quick to find fault with the fact that Bill C–78 is a planning and consensus–building process based on the principle of self–assessment. It seems that they would prefer that every environmental assessment lead to a court enforceable edict by some all knowing and all powerful authority who would ensure that the best interests of the environment are defended against the inherent evils of development. Personally, I find this suggestion to be both naive and dangerous. It is also quite contrary to the very principles of sustainable development.

Long before the arrival of Europeans on this continent, native communities were both self–governing and self–sustaining. First Nations lived in harmony with nature and were as one with the land, with their ancestors, with their children and their children's children. There was no room in native society for practices that could deplete the natural resources and damage the environments on which future generations would depend. In fact, politicians, academics, and so–called environmentalists who proclaim the virtues of sustainable development, but who fail utterly in their attempts to define such development in practical terms, would do well to reflect upon the lessons learned and the way of life practised by untold generations of native peoples in North America. They have always been, and are still, concerned with management between development and conservation.

If I were to listen too long to hon. members opposite, I might have to conclude that the successful application of sustainable development in native society could only have been achieved through strong central decision making. But nothing could be further from the truth. The sustainability of native society has always been based firmly on consensus building, on a strong sense of community, on deep respect for the experience of elders, and on individual accountability for decisions and actions, in short, the very principles that I see underpinning the proposed Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

Self-assessment and the accountability implicit in that concept tend to strike a very responsive cord with native people and with their ideas of sustainable development. I believe that in the environmental assessment process, the self-assessment approach will always be far more effective than one based on central control. By making individual departments and ministers of government responsible for the environmental assessment process, there is the potential to make some real progress towards changing attitudes about the environment and focusing decision-makers on the goal of sustainable development, progress that could never be made in a centralized system.

For example, under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act decision makers will have to deal directly with the affected public, become sensitive to the public's environmental needs and concerns, and be publicly accountable for the environmental effects of their decisions. They will not be able to hide behind a central environmental authority.

Planners throughout government will have to learn to integrate environmental, social and economic factors, in short, to go beyond the platitudes and learn what sustainable development is really all about.

All departments and agencies of government will have to develop a sense of environmental awareness and stewardship. They will not be able to leave it all to one small sector of the bureaucracy and, in due course, every minister will have to learn to be an environment minister.

An environmental assessment process that puts all of the responsibility and authority for environmental protection in the hands of review panels or environment ministers is not going to move us along the path towards the goal of sustainable development. If anything, it is more likely to lead us rapidly in the opposite direction. What will put us on the path towards sustainable development is a process that puts environmental assessment responsibility and environmental protection accountability where it really belongs, in the hands of the individual government decision makers who make project decisions on a daily basis and that is exactly what Bill C-78 will do.

There are, of course, a number of other features in Bill C-78 that hold particular interest for native peoples in the country. While the legislation is not intended to define native rights, nor is it appropriate that such rights should be defined in environmental legislation, the bill in fact goes a long way toward recognizing a new partnership in environmental matters between the federal government and the First Nations of Canada.

A good example of this partnership can be found in the sections of the bill dealing with joint panel reviews. For the purposes of environmental assessment, the bill recognizes native land claim administrations and native self-governments as jurisdictions on a par with provinces and foreign governments. In this respect, first nations will have the option of being equal partners with the federal government in assessing the effects of any projects that may affect their joint or separate interests.

As well, provisions are made in Bill C-78 to adapt the environmental assessment process to projects on Indian reserves by means of a special regulations. Such special regulations will be developed co-operatively with First Nations. They will recognize the decision-making responsibilities of native peoples for projects on their reserves. They will also recognize the effective and comprehensive environmental assessment processes that many First Nations and native communities have already developed and put in place to deal with the effects of said projects.

Bill C-78 also contains important new provisions for follow-up and monitoring programs for all major projects. From a native perspective, listening very carefully to what nature has to tell us is a basic prerequisite to a healthy and sustainable society. For too many years, however, modern North American society has been blind to the warning signs that the environment has been trying to give it. Modern society has failed to heed these warning signs because modern society has been unwilling to listen to the environment and face up to the reality of what we have been doing to it. Basically, modern society has failed to stay in touch with the environment on which its livelihood and indeed its very sustainability depends. I have seen this occur on own lands during my own lifetime.

Bill C–78 will take a major step forward in ensuring that we listen carefully to the environment from now on and that we learn from the feedback that it is able to provide us. Monitoring programs will allow us to evaluate the accuracy of our environmental impact predictions and to judge the effectiveness of our impact mitigation measures. In this way we will learn quickly from our successes as well as our mistakes, and we will be able to improve and update the environmental assessment process as we gain experience with it.

Probably the most intriguing and innovative sections in Bill C–78 with respect to native interests are those relating to transborder environmental effects. These provisions will allow the federal government to provide much earlier and more effective protection to native land interests during a variety of claim and self–government negotiations.

For instance, once the boundaries of a native land interest have been identified and agreed to by the parties to a land claim or self–government negotiation, the Minister of the Environment will have the authority to establish a public review panel to look into any developments that could cause serious environmental damage to those lands, whether those developments will be located on or off the defined lands. In addition, the minister will have the power to issue an order, and back it up with a court injunction, prohibiting the development from proceeding until the minister and the native people are satisfied that any serious environmental effects can be mitigated. If that concern cannot be satisfied, then the project can be held up indefinitely or at least until the native people take over control of the land under their claim or self–government agreement.

Bill C–78 represents an important step forward in the federal government's environmental assessment process. It is also an important step forward in the government's willingness to learn from the First Nations of Canada about the principles of sustainable development and to work with the First Nations of Canada to protect their common environmental heritage.

As a native Canadian and as a member of the government, and, as I said, because of the importance of the environment to Wetaskiwin, I am prepared to offer my strong support for Bill C–78 for the very reason that it is an effective planning and consensus–building process based firmly on a principle of self–assessment.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, today we have an opportunity to reflect on a great Canadian dream, to have an environmental assessment act so that we can secure for ourselves and for our children in the future a secure life and a secure standard of living.

Debate on this bill brings us to the concepts of economic development and environmental conservation. The two must be linked and that bridge is what we call sustainable development.

Currently there are laws and regulations to protect the environment, to avoid the threats to air, land and water, and the threats to plants, animals and our citizens.

What are some of the consequences to human health, for example, of global climatic change, a real environmental concern today? We can expect due to increased climatic heat an increased number of deaths among our elderly citizens, among the chronically ill and debilitated persons, and among our young infants. We can expect increased death and incapacitation from lung diseases such as asthma, chronic bronchitis, emphysema and bronchiectasis. They are chronic diseases which could make it difficult for patients to breathe.

There are also consequences of global climatic change that emanate from the thinning of the ozone layer, not only from the heat itself. Due to this thinning in the ozone layer, we can expect an increased incidence of skin cancer among the Caucasian population of the world, an increased incidence of cataracts, a reduction in the immune response of the body, and thus the individuals are subject to infections and to increased gravity of infection.

The global climatic change also poses adverse effects on food supplies and agriculture in general. These consequences definitely ask for solutions. One approach is to ensure that binding, effective environmental assessment processes are in place. Thus, there is an opportunity for all of us, government, citizens, businesses, everyone, to face a challenge, to do a job in partnership.

Growing concern with the quality of life, that is good health and a good standard of living, is evident in Canada and in other countries as well. It is believed, for example, by 88 per cent of Canadians that pollution has adversely affected public health. Forty-nine per cent believe their own personal health has been affected. Seventy-three per cent believe pollution is a major cause of cancer and 81 per cent of Canadians believe that pollution problems threaten the very survival of humanity.

Indeed, we Canadians are rightly preoccupied with our environment. It has become a rallying point for us to take steps to protect it by recycling or paying more for products and to pass legislation which would ensure the environment would be for our productive use today as it would be for our children of tomorrow.

We now understand what our reasonable environmental expectations are and we understand even more the depth of our commitment to future generations.

What are some of the basic requirements for environmental processes? Mr. Robert Gibson of the Department of Environment and Resource Studies, University of Waterloo, in September of this year produced an excellent document which I feel could serve as a useful framework for evaluating the bill before before us, Bill C-78.

The most important concerns I have on this bill relate to two basic issues: what environmental assessment requirements should we expect to accomplish? Second, how do we ensure that the expectations will be met? Two expectations are apparent today. There ought to be full consideration of environmental factors and public and private decisions must extend to cumulative and global responsibilities. No longer sufficient is careful attention only to immediate and local concerns.

The second expectation concerns the resulting decisions which should positively and significantly contribute to achieving sustainability. Admittedly, there is no precise definition of the term, but the concept is clear enough, that is that our use of resources today for economic development must ensure we have continuing reserves of these resources as well as for the future. The test of sustainability of development must encompass not only the biophysical but also the social, economic and cultural environment. Inherent in this test of sustainability are the beliefs that equity, acceptability and durability are met as fundamental criteria.

An environment assessment process design must therefore fulfil three basic principles: It must be effective, it must be practical and it must be efficient.

The third principle, efficiency, demands fairness to all parties be delivered.

The second principle requires the process and its demands to be understandable and easily doable.

That it ought to be effective means we ought to be able to encourage, guide, and, when necessary, to force the proper things to be done.

Does Bill C-78 stand the scrutiny of the foregoing basic requirements and principles underlying environmental assessment process? Let me quote: "Canada will return to the dark ages of environmental law if Bill C-78 passes in its present form", said Mr. Brian Pannell of the Manitoba Environmentalist Inc.

As a Manitoban, I definitely agree with this serious indictment made by Mr. Pannell. But why?

The purpose of this bill is to create binding legislation to ensure that environmental assessments are carried out on certain projects within federal jurisdiction. The purpose is excellent, but several flaws are evident.

Allow me in the remaining minutes to focus on a few specific clauses and to consider some amendments. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that clause 4(b) should be amended to include sustainable development as a purpose of the bill "to bind responsible authorities to the concept of sustainable development"

The purpose of this act in clause 4(a) should read: "That projects are fully reviewed and scrutinized to ensure sustainable development, as defined in subsection 2(1)".

In fact, in the preamble we say we believe in the concept of sustainable development.

In conclusion, I would like to say that sustainable development is a concept that requires a strong mind and a strong heart for what are required are reorientation in our current economic strategies, as well as a will to make financial transfer payments between and within communities, provinces and countries.

The concept challenges us to self-evident truths that this human planet can survive without us, but we cannot survive without its life support system.

In its present form, I cannot support Bill C-78.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, there are very few times in Canadian history that the public came together unanimously to either support or reject things.

We have a situation in Canada right now where the public is together because they oppose the GST. We have a situation where the Canadian public is quickly coming together, wishing that this non-elected Senate be abolished because of the plugging of the Senate by the Tories and because of the double-cross by the Liberal senators when they did not take their opportunity to kill the GST.

We also have in Canada a coming together, a consensus of Canadians that they want an environmental review process that will have some teeth and ability to protect the environment. There is a strong consensus growing in the Canadian public that they will not tolerate this type of inept legislation. They say that the environmental process must have at least these six principles. They may want to have others.

First, the environmental review process must be non-discretionary. No cabinet should have the discretion as to whether it is going to take place. Mandatory, that is the first principle.

Second, the environmental review process must be independent, particularly of political interference from government. They will not accept anything less than that.

Third, the process must be open, open to the public and open and above board so that people know that a proper and thorough assessment is being done.

Fourth, they want it to have the technical competence to really examine all of the issues involved, not just some of the peripheral ones but all of the implications both in terms of that immediate project and the long-term effects. Some of them are quite far away. We have heard of examples and I will be referring later to the effect of the Kemano II project, hundreds of miles away on a riding like mine in Surrey.

Fifth, they want the panel to have independent research so that they are not relying on what Alcan tells them or what some other developer tells them or certainly not what some cabinet minister and his department tells them.

Sixth, they want there to be the possibility for real and serious interveners participation where they will have funding and resources and time to properly put their position before a review panel.

I mentioned in this House yesterday the Big Bend in Surrey. It is one of the last freshwater marshes on the lower Fraser River estuary. Right now it is under tremendous threat because of the lack of an environmental review process. The CNR, a tool of government, expropriated the whole area adjacent to the marsh for an intermodal yard. It put it in. The municipality, the local people, no one had a say.

Now we have upstream Kemano II being started where the government has waived an environmental review. It is going to drop the Fraser River three feet. What is the effect on Surrey Big Bend going to be? We have marine life there. It is a fish habitat. It could be very critical and is undoubtedly very critical to salmon spawning. We have beaver there. If you drop the water level three feet, what effect is that going to have on the beaver? There are blue heron. No one has done an environmental impact. We have a developer coming along and saying: "What I want to do is just fill the whole thing in, preload it for an industrial site, dump dirt in there, and backfill".

There has got to be a mandatory environmental review process. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the residents of Surrey and my riding will not tolerate a bill like this. They will not accept it where there is discretion at every step of the way. They want a bill that will be mandatory, open to the public, in which there will be an opportunity for them to participate in that review and to ensure that the environment is protected.

This bill allows discretion, particularly by the government and by the ministers. It does not even call or allow for environmental review of government policy. Government policy is exempt. The NDP report Towards a Sustainable Future talked about an environmental auditor who could independently review government operations and policies. That is what is necessary.

When the land commission in B.C. was first established under the then premier, the member from Esquimalt, its hallmark was that it was an independent land commission, at arm's length from the government, which had authority to act in the interest of the community. Everyone knows what the Socreds did. We also know that in B.C. the Socreds and the Tories are the same people. We have another example here of where people are determined not to have an arm's length body to protect the environment and the interests of the Canadian public.

In closing, I wonder what is the sudden reason for the change in process that the government has brought in. A process was set up where it was going to review this legislation before it was brought back to the House so that some of the major changes that everyone agrees must be made could be made and it could be redrafted before it came back. Now it has been dispensed with. People want effective environmental legislation, but they do not want it done so quickly that it is ineffective.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad I was in the House to listen to the speech from the last hon. member who was very anxious in laying blame on all the other villains and perpetrators of environmental damage, particularly in other parties.

It brought to mind some history. It is too bad he is not prepared to stay to listen to it. About 20 years ago I was the chairman of the environmental council in Manitoba, the first time it was established. The issue at that time was a major hydro project that was being initiated by the then Schreyer government which carried the label: New Democratic Party.

Mr. Green, its the minister of natural resources, would meet with us on a periodic basis, bang the desk, take his shoe off, throw it at people, scream, yell, jump, and say: "By God, the progress of Manitoba was not going to be stopped by a bunch of environmentalists who were going to get in the way of this major project."

I spent almost three years as chairman of that council before I was elected to the Manitoba legislature. I can probably say one of the reasons I got elected was my stand against the New Democratic Party government initiative in flooding something like 300,000 to 400,000 acres of northern Manitoba waterways, displacing thousands of native people and aboriginals in Manitoba and, to this day, not acknowledging that any compensation should be paid.

I can recall Mr. Green, who I know is carried as one of the great heroes, a paragon of New Democratic representatives at the time, was the one who said that by God environmental assessment was something that would happen over his dead body.

I say this simply to remind my hon. friends to the left that it is time that self-righteousness gave way to some self-consciousness and recognition that this entire community and all parties are culpable and that nobody can escape some serious responsibility for having made the wrong decisions in the past.

Unfortunately 20 years later we are making the same mistakes. It seems that we have not learned an awful lot in those 20 years. We are now using the language of environmental accountability and responsibility, but there is still a basic reservation or a lack of willingness to understand just how crucial it is that we change the ethic of our time. It is understandable—and you, Mr. Speaker, in particular would understand it, coming from the province of Alberta—coming as we do from western provinces where for a long period of time the initiation of major capital projects was our lifeblood. Hydro projects, pulp and paper projects and the development of our natural resources, in the opening of the west those were considered to be good things, not bad things. Over time we are learning that what was a good thing also carries with it very bad consequences.

I want to make the case that I think my colleagues up to now have done a superb job in pointing out the serious gaps in this legislation. I also want to say that this will never work. Environmental assessment will never work until we find a way of balancing those fundamental questions of fundamental development and environmental accountability.

I do not think that anyone takes pleasure out of the federal government be a policeman in terms of the actions of the provincial governments. We can see down the road a whole series of potential conflicts, but one way to ensure that there is a more reasonable accommodation is to get the right federal legislation in place. That has not happened. Loopholes and escape hatches are provided and the clauses by which discretion can be exercised do not give a clear message to provincial governments that at the federal level continued abuse or degradation will not be tolerated. However, there is always a way of slipping through, of getting around, and of short-circuiting the system.

I would prefer somewhere down the road for some future government to work out a new arrangement where we share responsibility between federal and provincial governments on these projects. I think that our own creative juices should be employed for finding out how we can share jurisdiction for environmental assessment.

I think it is particularly crucial in the case of fresh water. One of the great mythologies of Canada at this time is that we are a country that abounds in fresh water. That is not true. We have lots of water. Much of it is in places that are not accessible and, where it is being used, it is running out.

We saw a case in this House only a short week ago when we argued over the Rafferty-Alameda dam. What was at stake was a large part of the Palliser Triangle in western Canada which is dry and needs water. Having been born in Saskatchewan and knowing the people well, I sympathize with the feeling that that part of the world cannot survive many more of the droughts that we have had over the last few years.

The quick fix solution that Mr. Devine offered—build a dam and it will all be solved—is not the way to approach the problem. I know that the Senate is not exactly a word that comes lightly to the lips of members of Parliament on the opposite side these days, but I recommend a Senate study that was done a few years ago by Herb Sparrow, the senator from Saskatchewan, on water conservation on the prairies. It pointed out that we did not need a big, grandiose megaproject to solve the water problems. The real answer is a series of small steps to conserve the soil, to bring about a different raising of the water level in the prairie region, something that should have been undertaken jointly by federal-provincial governments.

No one had the political will to do that, so it ends up in a confrontation. We have angry words between federal-provincial governments. We have fights in the House of Commons. We have demands of the federal government to step in and stop the project.

I was pointed at and I have no apologies for that, because it had gone too far. However, we had wasted two, three, five or ten years initiating what Amory Lovins once called the soft half toward project development: small irrigation projects, water reservoirs, ways of controlling the salinity of the soil. A whole series of such measures would require some investment, some involvement and some joint planning. They would not require legalistic confrontation.

In my view an environmental assessment should be in effect the last resort. When stupidity prevails environmental assessment is brought in to put a stop to it. We could avoid a lot of that if we began to have a pro-active environmental program and began to say: "Let's not do the big capital projects any more." Maybe we have to say that like the dinosaur the age of the huge megaproject must come to an end, and that whether it is in energy, water, or resource development there is a better alternate way which does not do the kind of damage to the environment we have seen in this country but preserves and conserves water, develops resources and creates wealth. The two must go hand in hand.

It is important that we are debating Bill C-78 in isolation. We should see it in the context of a larger package of the green paper and other areas or, more important, in a willingness on the part of government leaders at the three levels of government to come together and start doing some joint development and planning in order to deal with environmental problems. We are caught in the compartmentalization of this country: here is a provincial right, here is a federal right, and where they clash we will have a fight and take it to court. It is about time we realized that water and air pollution does not recognize provincial or federal boundaries. It is shared by all jurisdictions.

I have a case in point in own city of Winnipeg where I am trying to promote the development of a tri-level task force to deal with the degradation of water in the three rivers running through that city. I think that is a more constructive way to approach the problem as opposed to ending up in front of the tribunals.

I am saying what we should do in the future, which is the reason this bill is important. Unless we have the proper tools at the federal level, the message will not get through. We should be able to see where this kind of madness has prevailed and say that we are trying to solve the problem by building a big capital project and bringing about all kinds of unintended consequences. Until we can say we have the right to make such assessments, we will not begin to get the proper discipline and proper ethics in place in other parts of Canada.

This is as much an ethic and discipline upon ourselves as it is upon others. I am sorry in a sense that the legislation does not reflect that reality, because this in some ways could be the most important way for the federal government to say it is changing its rules. As long as the loopholes are there and the open clauses and the ways of slipping it through, people will continue in their cynicism, believing that the government is not really serious about its responsibilities to the environment.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was not originally planning to speak to this legislation, but since it touches upon the environment I feel compelled to address a couple of very specific issues such as the binding of the legislation and the power of the federal government to enforce it.

A few months ago I asked the Minister of the Environment about issues that affect Canadians, that is the issue of infrastructure and the issue of controlling the dumping of raw sewage into rivers, oceans, lakes. At the time the minister specifically stated that it was within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments to do so, that the issue was a provincial responsibility and that the federal government had nothing to do with it.

In light of this particular bill, I wonder whether the minister or the government will maintain the same position they had all along or whether there will be some change in terms of that position and they will be playing a more active role in the area of enforcement.

There is another example where sustainable development plays a very important role. If we are talking about dumping raw sewage into the oceans, of course the negative impact will be tremendous in terms of the fishery and the quality of life for people who rely to a large extent on fishing.

At the same time, the groups that have opposed the legislation are skeptical about the ability of the federal government to listen to their concerns. For instance, if the government is to set up some sort of an advisory body or public participation process, would a decision of the advisory body or panel, per se be a binding one or not?

All in all, Mr. Speaker, I think it is a good move on the part of the government to start addressing the issue of the environment. But I think it is extremely important to look at all aspects of the bill before proceeding with it.

I do not think it is too late for the government to go back to the different groups that they have been consulting with, the opposition parties and the public at large, to find out the areas where there are concerns, and try to address those concerns.

In general terms, as my colleagues who have spoken a little earlier stated, the issue in Saskatchewan is quite an alarming one, where we have seen the different jurisdictions fighting over an environmental issue.

I think the time has come for the different levels of government to sit down and really define the responsibility a little more clearly. I would suggest they should forge a partnership between all levels of government when it comes to the environment. I think that it is extremely important to agree on enforcement. Who will oversee the enforcement and who is going to pay for the implementation of it? How are the different relations between the two levels of government going to take place?

There is another important factor and that is the municipal level of government, because the municipal governments are not part of what we are doing. They have been left out.

I might add that some municipalities in our country, whether they want to or not, are contributing to pollution and the degradation of our environment. Unless we bring that third level of government into the picture, we are going to find ourselves in a bit of an awkward situation when it comes to major problems, whether they are federal initiatives, provincial initiatives, or for that matter, whether they are third sector initiatives.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time for the minister to take a deep breath, go back a little bit and start with that objective in mind, that is, the involvement of all of the partners in the issue of the environment. We must make sure that everyone is buying in because unless all levels of government buy in to what the federal government is doing, I do not think we will see this bill succeeding.

I do know the minister has the environment issue at heart. I know he is very serious about the issue and I think it is quite timely for him to start this consultation process and bring those different partners together.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in addressing Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, I want to say right off the bat that, in our view, this is not a good bill.

It is long overdue. It has been long awaited. It is full of missing links and the process that led to the bill before us was short circuited.

Finally, it is a recipe for conflict because of what is missing in the bill, and I will come to that in a moment. The bill before us is not a recipe for resource management or conflict management, or a recipe for conflict resolution, but, rather, it is a bill that creates conflict by indecision and by what is missing from it. It is management for conflict, not to resolve conflict.

What is wrong with Bill C-78? First of all, the bill will be less effective than the EARP guidelines currently in place. It will undo progress made through court decisions like the Muldoon decision on the Rafferty-Alameda dam. Measures in the bill are left to the discretion of the environment minister, making it difficult for the courts to order compliance. Cabinet decisions and government policy, in general, will be exempted from the law, and although intervener funding has been promised, it is not in the legislation, so it could be easily withdrawn.

In addition, the level of funding is not clear. Crown corporations, CIDA, and export development corporations are exempted. Basic questions like, which projects will be reviewed, which will be exempt, and what rules will apply, are not answered by this bill. This will be in the regulations which can be easily changed by the cabinet, at the minister's and the cabinet's discretion.

When it comes to process, the bill was introduced and first reading was given on June 18, 1990. It was then referred to a special pre-study committee. The pre-study committee was disbanded before any work was done, and now we have the bill before us for second reading.

Just that short list of inadequacies and missing links is enough to make one think that this is the animal that was created by the proverbial committee, the double-humped or, in this case, the triple-humped camel. Except it was not done by a committee, it was done within the bowels of the ministry, with a pre-study committee that never got a chance to really adequately deal with the subject matter placed before it.

I would like to put this bill in the context of a dispute, a resource conflict which has taken place and is still taking place within my own constituency. The proposal for the modernization and expansion of the Celgar pulp mill in Castlegar, British Columbia first came to public light at the end of 1989. The Celgar Pulp Company is proposing to expand its bleached kraft pulp mill on the Columbia River, at Castlegar, B.C. The company operates as a joint venture between CITIC Inc. and Power Consolidated Pulp Inc. of the People's Republic of China.

Celgar filed an environmental impact assessment report, as a prospectus, with a major project steering committee in December of 1989. It was not until the end of June of this year, a full six months later, when we finally got the federal government and the provincial government to get their acts together to put a combined impact review process into place.

In that time feelings naturally arose, as they do in any community and especially in a community with as many activists, both pro and con, on these kinds of issues as mine does, and the absence of a review process, one that was in place or could be easily put into place between the two levels of government—and nobody suggests that that is an easy thing to do—led to an escalation of that conflict.

That is what I mean when I speak of the absence in the bill of any kind of a clear outline of a process that has to be followed. It is a recipe for that continuing kind of confrontation and escalation of community conflict. If our purpose, as politicians, is to create conflict rather than to resolve it, then we could not do better than to adopt the very vague recommendations and solutions presented in this bill.

At the beginning of the summer, I put out a "Householder" in my constituency, as we all do. I laid out my own position regarding this particular proposal as it relates to my constituency, and the modernization and expansion of Celgar Pulp very clearly. Frankly, my own judgment is that it is a sound proposal and, in fact, cleans up the environment and I made that clear. But it has been difficult to try to be any kind of a voice of reason and to keep people on the same course, in terms of building long-term, stable communities with some sensible and renewable economic growth and, at the same time, with a greater harmony between ourselves and our environment, when nobody knows what the ground rules are.

I would just like to read from the short statement I made in that "Householder":

> On the home front, while we now have an announced timetable and process for considering Celgar Pulp's proposal for a new and cleaner Castlegar mill, the question remains: Did it really have to take so long?
> Surely it was not too much to ask, as I had done since my first meeting with Celgar officials in Vancouver last January, that federal and provincial ministers and officials get their act together early to launch a joint review mechanism that could deal openly and expeditiously with this long-awaited application.
> It was obvious for months that the law and the courts would require a joint or parallel review process—and that delaying its start could only jeopardize the prospects for a development which has been awaited for some 20 years.
> There are costs to any development. But in my opinion, the costs of not proceeding with this one are higher, for both the physical and human environment—and with no local benefit—than conditional approval.
> Let's hope, in spite of the dithering and the delay, that we still have a choice to make.

• (1640)

I ask the minister and the government to take a second look at this piece of legislation, and while we still have a chance as a Parliament, to draft legislation which will work, which will lay out a process that can be accepted by industry, by labour, by environmental activist, by all of us who care for sane development, so that we will know what the ground rules are and investment decisions can be made.

Certainly industry is not going to be particularly overjoyed with a new set of rules and regulations, but it is better than not knowing what the rules and regulations are going to be. This will give us all a chance to adopt proposals within our own areas which are sensible, which are sane and that we and our children can live with.

One of the other problems we have is the absence of anything clear on intervener funding. I would like to read something very brief from a paper that was just circulated to many of the publications in my area. It concerns the current process in and around Castlegar:

> The approach of the—hearings causes further frustration. Celgar can trot expert witness after witness before the review panel, all of them paid for with money made from the public forests. Yet the public has not been provided with funds to hire consultants; the only experts testifying for the public will be the few who were willing to come for their expenses and a small fee raised out of the pockets of local residents. Lawyers know very well that an "expert" can usually be found who will corroborate just about any side of an issue, because the facts can always be selectively made to line up with one's personal outlook and motives. It is only by hearing a large and balanced number of experts serving various sides of the issues that the truly irrefutable facts can be established.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to have full intervener funding. We have to make decisions and make them expeditiously. It has to be a process that is seen as fair by all if we are to manage conflict rather than to create it.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to rise and speak for a brief time on Bill C-78, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

I think it might be somewhat helpful at this stage for some who have not been following this to first of all go through a little bit about the environmental assessment process. The process that we are looking at now is to replace the former process called the Environmental Assessment and Review Process, commonly called EARP.

The environmental assessments are intended to determine whether a project or activity will harm human health, fish, or wildlife, or their habitats, and if so, how these affects can be mitigated. If environmental damage cannot be mitigated, the review should force a halt to the project or activity under review.

What do we have in this particular reform package, Bill C-78? We have a promise that all cabinet decisions will be reviewed for environmental impacts although these reviews do not have to be made public. We have $100 million per year in additional person-years for the EARPs and we have interveners or participant funding to support public participation in EARPs.

What is wrong with Bill C-78? The bill will be less effective than the present EARP guidelines that we now have in place. It appears that it will undo the process made through court decisions like the Muldoon decision on the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

The measures in this bill are left up to the discretion of the environment minister, making it difficult for the courts to order compliance.

Cabinet decisions and government policy in general will be exempted from the law. Although intervener funding has been promised, as I have said, it is not in the legislation, so could be easily withdrawn. In addition, the level of funding is not yet clear.

Crown corporations, CIDA, and Export Development Corporation are all exempted under this new act. Basic questions, such as which project will be reviewed, which will be exempt, and what rules will apply, are not answered by this bill. This apparently will be in the regulations which, as we all know, can be changed by cabinet.

The process that we have run into here throughout this bill is a process which has introduced this bill, first reading, on June 18, 1990 and it was referred to a special pre-study committee. The pre-study committee unfortunately was disbanded before any work was done and, of course, we have the continuation of the debate now ongoing.

I found the comments and editorial in The Ottawa Citizen last June interesting. The headline read: "Environmental Review—Trust us, we're Green Tories". Some of the comments within that are fairly relevant when we look at exactly where this bill is going and what is involved. I would like to read a little of this editorial from June 19, 1990, from The Ottawa Citizen. It talks about the flaws in the system and the good intentions perhaps of the government but say that it is unconvincing because those assessments will not become public. It then goes on to say:

> The first part of Monday's package is even more seriously flawed. The promised legislation is supposed to set up environmental reviews of government-funded projects before the bulldozers move in. It would give review panels power to call evidence and question witnesses. It would help finance environmental opponents of projects.
> But the core of the new law is hollow. What types of projects must be reviewed? What other federal laws automatically trigger environmental assessment? What projects are exempt? What rules apply to aid projects?

It also talks about the regulations. It states:

> Regulations mean flexibility, says the government. Exactly. The public has seen which way the Conservatives flex when environmental protection is at issue. This government hasn't earned that degree of trust.

The trust it speaks of is the trust that Canadians are looking for in governments. They are finished and tired, as we have seen throughout Canada with governments—Liberals and Conservatives—in the past who have given hollow promises and then not followed through with their promises. The promises in this case I think have been promises that we have seen constantly leading up into elections without any substance.

We have a chance for once of keeping some of those promises, the promises that we actually are about our environment, we actually care about what is happening.

The debate a couple of weeks ago on a Private Member's Motion was interesting. The motion of the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap refers to funding for various waste management programs and suggests that perhaps the federal government should put its money where its mouth is and assist in some of these areas of funding. A Liberal member got up and talked about municipal infrastructure, totally losing the point of the motion before the House. The point was that our environment is what is important, not the roads, not the sidewalks, but the structure to keep our water and water systems clean and healthy and our air clean.

We have that opportunity, but we must grab it now. Tomorrow is too late.

It is interesting that the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy in a recent news release has given its advice to the Prime Minister on how to strengthen the new environmental assessment reform package by opening up government policy assessment to closer public scrutiny. The news release states:

> —Dr. Johnston said that, "for the environmental assessment of government policy to be effective, there is a need for public confidence in the process—" He added that there is also a need for "—reassurance that such assessment meets appropriate general standards, particularly since departments initiating policy proposals will be doing the assessments themselves."

The news release goes on to state:

> Because the assessment of government policies—from a sustainable development point of view—is a new, and as yet untried, approach the Government should conduct a full evaluation of the process, with public consultation, after a period of five years. Then consideration would be given to including policy assessment within the EARP legislation.

This is a start. I am hoping it is not a backward step. Now is the time to show all Canadians the trust they lost in government, and bring in something that is meaningful to all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: On division.

Amendment negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the three parties on this issue and there is an agreement to defer the vote on second reading to Tuesday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Accordingly, the vote stands deferred to Tuesday, October 30, 1990 at 3 o'clock.

It being 5 o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA SALMON AND HERRING

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take action against the unfavourable GATT ruling in relation to British Columbia salmon and herring.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the issue is not a new one, but neither is the resolution. It has been sitting on the Order Paper since April 4, 1989. Nevertheless, the problem still exists and, indeed, is worse than when this resolution was put on the Order Paper.

Before 1989, there was a system of regulations on the Pacific Coast which required that sockeye and pink salmon, the principal specie of salmon, and herring be landed and processed in Canada prior to export. There were reasons for this.

From the point of view of the employees in the processing industry, it provided employment in British Columbia, in Canada. Whereas, if those fish were not landed in Canada, but went directly to the United States, then processing our fish would provide employment in another country. So there were good reasons for it.

There was another reason that in the long run is even more important and that is that it gave us the opportunity to manage the resource. Without knowing how many fish are being caught and the times at which they were being caught, and without being able to count or determine how many of each run of salmon are going up the river at any one time, we cannot properly manage the resource.

I am indebted to the former minister of fisheries for telling me on one occasion, in an aside across the floor, that there were 2,400 different runs of salmon. It is not a case of managing one species, one run, or whatever. It is a matter of trying to manage 2,400 different families over a period of time. To do that, we are maximizing the potential of the resource. By letting the fish go out of the province before they are landed and counted, before we know what is happening, and before we know what species there are, we were losing the opportunity to properly manage the resource. So, there were good reasons for having those landing regulations.

However, the Americans objected. They took it to GATT and GATT agreed with them, initially. Whether it would have in the long run, we do not know. The Canadian government neglected or decided not to appeal. It had the opportunity to appeal, as provided for in GATT, but Canada decided it would not appeal and that it would accept the ruling of GATT.

We had another opportunity, and this was an opportunity that was pressed by both the processing industry and by all of the people working in the processing industry: the fishing industry, the fishermen themselves, their organizations, people working in the plants, and the fishermen who were not organized in unions. All of them pressed the government to appeal the GATT ruling, or, if not, there was an alternative and that was to accept the penalty.

At that time the penalty was calculated to be an annual penalty of $5 million. But we are dealing with an industry that on the west coast of British Columbia is worth in excess of $1 billion. There was plenty of opportunity and good reason for all those people, everybody involved in the industry, to press for us accepting the penalty and preserving the industry, preserving the right to maintain employment in Canada and preserving the right to husband that resource and to manage the resource properly. However, we gave that up.

I can only suspect—and it is not just my idea, but certainly I agree with the conclusion—that we gave it up because the federal government wanted to show how good the free trade deal was for Canada. It knew there would be an opportunity to test this before a free trade panel. Indeed, there was. Under the free trade deal, the Americans again protested what we were doing before we had time to make changes. We did make changes in the regulations that they did not like, and it was all protested to the free trade adjudication process and a free trade panel was set up.

The free trade panel initially said that requiring landing of 100 per cent of these species of salmon and herring was restraintive trade. They made that decision and they said that if it was not 100 per cent, for example, if it was only 18 per cent, that might not be considered to be restraintive trade and might be acceptable. They did not say it would be.

People have said the free trade panel recommended 18 per cent. That was not the case, Mr. Speaker, not as I read it. What they said was: "If you come back and try us with 18, we just might accept it." Well, we did not do that. We appealed this time. We could have appealed to GATT and likely won, but we did not. We did appeal the free trade ruling, and, of course, we lost. Not only did we lose, we lost some ground that we might have made had we negotiated the first free trade panel agreement, because the second time we went to the free trade appeal, the appeal came against us. It said that 20 per cent of the volume two of these species of salmon and 20 per cent of the herring could leave without being landed in British Columbia. Eighty per cent had to be landed here. It could then be shipped out of the province without any processing. It is not all that practical to ship it out with processing, although it is done to some extent. The free trade panel said 20 per cent for the first year. It is to go up to 25 per cent over a period of four years.

The American trade negotiator made it very clear that the Americans wanted access to the total resource. The 25 per cent was an interim measure, as they were not going to accept 25 per cent in the long run. They were going to let us get away with 20, 21, 22 and 23 per cent until it became 25 per cent, knowing by that time, unless there was a change of government, Canadians would be so locked into the free trade deal there would be no way out of it and we would have to accept whatever the Americans wanted to do to us, which this government is prone to do.

I notice the hon. member from the other side speaking from his chair. I hope he gets up and convinces me that I am wrong and convinces the processing industry in B.C. that they are wrong when they say that this is going to lead to an export of unprocessed fish. I think the member drawing attention to me knows that for decades B.C. has had a reputation for quality fish. Our sockeye salmon, in particular, has an international reputation. A very high price is commanded for it in international markets because it is a quality product. There are reasons for that. The regulations are very stringent. These regulations are not just on paper, but they are observed because they are policed, and the industry is aware of that. It makes it more expensive to produce according to the Canadian Regulations for Quality. Everyone agrees with that. That is one reason the market is prepared to pay the higher price for a Canadian product.

If our processors are going to be denied access to the product at prices they can afford to pay, they are not going to be able to sustain the quantity of production that will enable them to financially maintain the quality of production. The argument is that if they are going to whip the ground out from under us and say we do not get the supply of fish, then we want them to relax the quality regulations so that we are down to the level of the Americans.

It is the whole idea of a level playing field in the free trade deal. Instead of bringing them up to our level in social services with people, we are supposed to go down to theirs, and this government is leading us down that road. When it comes to processing fish, instead of maintaining our reputation internationally for high quality fish, we are prepared to sacrifice our quality and compete with the Americans on their ground.

If anyone on the other side can convince me, the Fisheries Council of British Columbia, the unions involved in the fishing industry in B.C., the independent fishermen in B.C., and the shore workers, and everyone agrees on this, if one member on the other side denies it, then that member has a long way to go in persuading all of those people that they are wrong and that he is right. I hope he is right. I fear that he will not be. Only time will tell, I suppose, although time is telling already.

The question has come up whether I do or do not believe in GATT. I said there was a GATT ruling and it went against us. We had the opportunity to appeal .That was provided for. It was this Tory government on the other side that sold us out. It did not do the appeal because it did not want to go that route. The government had no faith in GATT.

Second, there was an opportunity, even if GATT ruled against us, to pay the penalty. It would have cost us $5 million to protect a billion dollar industry and it could have been done under GATT. I believe in GATT. It is this government across the way that does not have the faith in GATT that some of the rest of us on this side of the House do. The opportunities were there. We gave it up because this government wanted to go the free trade route and sold us out.

There was no Canadian appeal and no penalty, and the free trade deal ruled against us. I think we have lost every argument before the free trade panel since it started. The first one lost was before a fisheries free trade panel, the one dealing with the west coast. I do not know of any that we have won. The hon. member is shaking his head.

The Fisheries Council of British Columbia, as I said, is concerned about quality. In a report put out by Mike Hunter of the Fisheries Council of B.C., it states that our fish inspection regime was designed in an era when we had protectionist regulations. He is talking about the landing regulations. We simply cannot afford to have the government dictate to us what quality specifications must be.

The former Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the former Minister for International Trade, and the current Minister for International Trade all reassured the workers on the west coast that jobs would not be lost. This is a direct quotation from the minister of fisheries: "will not allow jobs historically established to be threatened by any such initiative". So, they talk big, talk great, talk most reassuringly, but then give up the fight totally.

Again, the Fisheries Council of Canada has indicated that the long-term future of the processing industry in B.C. is now threatened. Given the fact that between 60 per cent and 70 per cent of the costs to the processing sector are tied to the purchasing of product, there is very little room left for cost cutting. The only opportunity at all is to cut labour costs. You cannot do that through improved technology because the government has been doing that steadily. It is a most modern industry compared to any other country that does this kind of work. The industry has already tried that.

There was a strike last year, a work stoppage, or whatever, a management-worker dispute on the issue. Industry was trying to cut costs by tearing it off the hides of the workers, trying to get the workers to agree to lower standards and to poorer conditions in order to get an agreement that would make them better able to compete so that they would not lose the processing industry to the United States. We lost that.

There is no question that direct exports of unprocessed fish leads to job losses. The current Minister for International Trade has admitted that. Although he will not apply it to the west coast, he certainly has admitted it with respect to the east coast. A quotation from the Minister for International Trade is as follows: "I believe the amount last year was some 80 million pounds". He is talking about exports to the United States from the east coast of unprocessed fish. He went on to say: "If sold in Nova Scotia it would be a considerable help to fish plant workers in Nova Scotia".

According to the government member for South Shore, the province of Nova Scotia loses 1,000 jobs annually as a result of the province having regulations permitting the export of unprocessed fish. Of course, that is what the west coast fishery has been trying to get into as well.

When supply is threatened, jobs are threatened. I made that point and the fisheries council made it. The Pacific Advisory Group in the Vision 2000 document stated: "The impact of the removal of export restrictions on salmon and herring is as yet uncertain. It could result in a significant increase in the export of unprocessed fish to the U.S. with loss of jobs in the Canadian processing sector".

As important as the loss of jobs is, my greater concern is for the loss of our ability to manage the resource, to husband this resource. Canadians have paid the price to protect this resource, manage and conserve it. We have paid for it ever since we have been in the business. For 100 years we have been paying the costs of managing this resource.

Giving the Americans direct resort to this resource is certainly a direct benefit to the U.S. processing industry. We paid for it. We have husbanded it. We have done without on occasion. We have hired people to work in the industry. We have hired people to police it. We have done all these things at great cost to Canadians and now what we are doing, as a result of this government's inaction when GATT threatened us, and its actions under the free trade deal, is say to the Americans that we have looked after it all these decades, now they can have it, that we are ready to abandon the field because we want to be nice neighbours. When do we quit giving in to the Americans? When do we quit giving to them? When do we start demanding some access to our own fish?

Mr. Milliken: When we get a new Liberal government.

Mr. Stupich: When we get a new government. Yes, I agree with the speaker. If the New Democrats form the next government, certainly it will start to look after Canadian interests and live up to GATT.

It is important to protect this resource. It is not something we have created. It is something we have tried to maintain. It is very important to B.C.; it is very important to Canada. As I said, it is a billion-dollar industry. We cannot abandon the right, the opportunity, and the responsibility to husband this resource. Turning it over to the Americans and letting them handle it, harvest it without doing any management, without looking after it, without husbanding the resource, is abandoning that industry, abandoning that resource.

Mr. Speaker, you have heard plenty in this House about what has happened to the east coast fish stocks. I am talking now about the northern cod. That is a disaster created by humans through neglect, not through anything deliberate, through neglect.

We could be going down that same road on the Pacific coast if we allow the Americans to simply exploit the resource without accepting any responsibility for husbanding it, for managing it.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House deals with the salmon and herring fisheries in British Columbia. I am sure that all hon. members recognize the importance of these fisheries to British Columbians and to Canadians as a whole. Certainly, this government does.

But this motion will do nothing to enhance the economic well-being of the people of British Columbia. Rather, if it were passed, it would do a great disservice to them. That is why this government cannot accept such a motion and why it should not be passed by this House.

The motion calls upon the government to take action against the GATT ruling in relation to British Columbia salmon and herring. This is a classic example of the kind of backward thinking that typifies the opposition to this government's policies.

Action against the GATT ruling would turn the clock backward. It would tell Canadians that we can rest content behind the protectionist barriers of old policies. It would tell Canadians to cast off the benefits that they have gained through the open multilateral trading system. It would invite Canadians to turn their backs on developments in the rest of the world.

This government cannot ask Canadians to do this. We will not make the mistake of looking inward and backward with respect to our competitive interests as the hon. member would have us do and, of course, the NDP would have us do. We will continue to look outward and forward, to seize the opportunities to enhance our economic well-being. Failure to grasp the emerging opportunities for Canada in the global economy would doom our country to second class status. This is not the approach of this government.

It is a fact of life of the 1990s that we must build strong, competitive industries which can thrive at home and abroad. The salmon and herring industries of British Columbia enjoy a world-wide reputation. They have built this reputation through the sale of top quality products. The industry has benefited from access to foreign markets. But it must also be prepared to face the challenge of foreign competition if it is to continue to prosper. The purpose of this motion before us today is to isolate these industries from the international economy. The effect would be the ultimate decline in our competitive position.

Mr. Speaker, the government has acted in response to the GATT ruling on salmon and herring. Our consistent objective in addressing this issue was to maintain the integrity of our conservation and management regimes for these fisheries. Our purpose has been to ensure the enhancement of these natural resources for the continued benefit of Canadians, now and in the future. It was for that reason we introduced a landing requirement for all species of salmon in April 1989 when we removed the regulations found wanting by the GATT and the GATT ruling.

Because Canada and the United States could still not come to an agreed resolution on the free trade agreement consistency of the landing requirement, our two countries decided in mid-1989 to place the issue, which still involved the precise nature of our GATT obligations, before a panel within the context of the free trade agreement which provided a bi-national and expedited panel process to resolve the issue.

As hon. members will be aware, that panel found that our proposal to implement a landing requirement for 100 per cent of the Pacific salmon and herring catch was not consistent with the free trade agreement, which incorporates GATT rules. However, the panel recommended that if Canada were to exempt 10 per cent to 20 per cent of the various species of the catch in each fishery from the requirement that it had to be landed, this would bring the measure into free trade consistency and would address Canada's conservation and management concerns.

In its examination of the issues, the panel was quite sensitive to Canadian needs with regard to the resource conservation and management.

In response to this panel ruling we arrived at an agreement with the U.S. that 100 per cent of the catch would be subject to conservation and management control. The settlement with the United States thus provides that Canada has the right to require that all salmon and herring be brought to a registered landing station either at sea or on shore. In that context, up to 20 per cent of the allowable catch was made available for export by sea in 1990. In 1991-1993, up to 25 per cent of the catch will be accessible through at-sea landing stations, only after verification of the conservation and management information. The agreement will be reviewed in the fourth year, with the assistance of technical and industry advisers, in light of experience and prevailing conditions.

The agreement also contains provisions with respect to roe herring. While Canada continues to control the export of roe herring to all destinations, exports are permitted to the United States if processed to the same extent as herring is processed in Canada, or if actual consumption is certified to take place there. This helps to ensure that Canadians will continue to be able to benefit from the comparative advantage they enjoy through the expertise they have developed in herring roe extraction.

It should also be noted that under the agreement for roe herring and salmon caught in Canada's Pacific waters to transported directly from the fishing grounds to the United States, the following conditions, among others, have to be met: first, only licensed Canadian tender vessels, equipped as sea-based landing stations, are eligible to transport roe herring and salmon directly from the fishing grounds to the United States.

Second, in order to qualify as a sea-based landing station, a tender vessel is required to maintain on board adequate facilities for Department of Fisheries and Oceans inspectors to supervise counting, sorting, and weighing and to permit on-board biological sampling. All fish brought on board the buying station must be made available for these purposes.

Third, a sufficient number of Canadian inspectors have to be on board each buying station at all times that the station is in operation.

Through this agreement the government has maintained an effective resource management and conservation system for Pacific salmon and herring. The same high standards in inspection and sampling activities are used now in both onshore and offshore locales. Hon. members should note that our fisheries managers are fully satisfied with the quality of our conservation and management information. Further, rather than the mass export of Canadian unprocessed fish that some had predicted—we heard the cries; we heard them over and over again in this House—less than 1 per cent of the catch has been exported to the United States through at-sea landing stations.

I will repeat that for my hon. friends across the way: rather than the mass export of Canadian unprocessed fish that some had predicted, less than 1 per cent of the catch has been exported to the United States through at-sea landing stations.

The free trade agreement panel process, which was not of a binding nature, enabled both sides to come to a judgment as to how the principles of the findings could be maintained, while allowing for a practical implementation which would satisfy the legitimate concerns of each side. As such, it provided Canada and the United States with a basis for coming to a resolution of this bilateral dispute.

Some of our critics on the salmon and herring issue sometimes sound as if they just cannot stand any kind of trade liberalization and do not want any trade agreements with anybody, but we cannot be content to stick our heads in the sand and wish our challenges away. The government has developed a resolution to this dispute which will continue to benefit the Canadian economy. All those concerned in these fisheries must be ready to sharpen their pencils. They must be prepared to make the kinds of adjustments that our competitors are making world-wide. If they are not, they will not stay on top; if they are, we will stay on top in this area. This government has confidence in the ability of the British Columbia salmon and herring fisheries to meet this challenge.

The motion before us is a vote of non-confidence. It is a vote of non-confidence in the ability of our fisheries to compete. That is why this motion is fundamentally flawed and why it cannot be supported by members on our side of the House.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my NDP colleague for introducing this motion and for bringing this subject back to the floor of the House. As he has outlined in his remarks, it is really an issue not only of trade but an issue of resource conservation and the ability of Canada to control one of its most vital resources, namely fish, be it on the Pacific coast or be it on the Atlantic coast.

I listened with interest to the explanation of my friend from the NDP of his motion. I also listened with interest to the comments from the other side. It is very interesting to hear the government engage in this form of self-justification after the fact.

As was outlined earlier, the lobster and herring GATT ruling on the west coast emerged as a result of a complaint by the United States through the GATT process. Canada, in response to that initial GATT ruling, instituted landing requirements. This government instituted landing requirements in order to meet the GATT ruling and still maintain some conservation of its resource stock.

However, that was not good enough for the United States, so it brought the issue again before the Canada–U.S. free trade panel. Of course we are all familiar with the result of that panel. Essentially Canada was forced to abandon its landing requirements and to allow the United States virtually free access to our west coast salmon and herring without having to land them in Canadian ports. Certainly the 20 per cent requirement, although it is not 100 per cent, is a significant portion of our fish production.

Now government members, after having lost this dispute with the United States, are quite happy to engage in justifying the decision after the fact and using the arguments that they really have pride in our fishing industry and in our ability to compete on the west coast. It is really an unwillingness to accept what happened, that they lost through that free trade panel.

This year the shoe was on the other foot. This time it was the Atlantic lobster. This time it was the United States through an amendment to the Magnussen Act, which regulates, among other things, the size of U.S. lobster U.S. fishermen are allowed to catch, increased the minimum size of Atlantic lobsters that could be allowed in the United States. At the same time it blocked Canadian exports of lobsters that were below that minimum size.

The trade minister and the Prime Minister protested loudly in the House of Commons that this was a trade restriction and not a conservation measure as the American fishing industry tried to proclaim. They instituted a free trade panel. We had the free trade panel with three U.S. panellists versus two Canadian panellists. Of course the decision favoured the Americans, even though we were arguing that the American restrictions under the Mitchell bill were GATT inconsistent and were a violation of GATT rules. We brought the issue to the free trade panel where we were outnumbered by the Americans and where we lost the dispute.

What did Canada do? Rather than admit that once again we had been snookered, once again the government had failed to defend the Atlantic as well as the Pacific fisheries industry, they tried to put the best possible face on this defeat. They tried to gloss over the fact that really the Canadian government had capitulated once again and, in this case, had allowed the American lawmakers to argue that they were protecting their resource and that their rules were not trade distorting restrictions. However, on the west coast they were quite prepared to concede that our landing requirements, which were instituted for conservation reasons, were trade distorting reasons.

What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. This government cannot have it both ways. We are either acting to conserve our resource, to protect our fishing industries, or we are not. We cannot allow the U.S. legislators through the free trade agreement to bully us, whether it be by arguing conservation when it suits them or arguing trade restrictions when it suits them. We have to start defending our fishing industry, which this government has consistently refused to do, whether it be through the free trade agreement or by appealing GATT rulings as my colleague has mentioned.

I think it is an eminently sensible motion. It is a timely one at this time, given that the Uruguay Round is reaching its final stages.

One of the issues that has not been prominent in this discussion of the world trading system, since we are discussing the world trading system, is what I believe will be an emerging concern in international trade, that is the whole conflict between free trade and environmental protection, between free trade and the management of non-renewable resources such as our fish. This is an area in which the rules and the international code of ethics are still very vague.

If the recent behaviour of this government is any indication, it is prepared to allow the preponderant force of our neighbours to the south to determine in what instances they will defend their resource conservation measures and in what instances they will simply tell us: "No, you cannot defend yours. That is against free trade and we will block you on that".

The initial reaction of the government to both of these disputes is not a very good indicator of how the government is going to defend our interests in resource conservation, which is going to be one of the key issues in environmental protection in the future.

The motion we have before us today is a way for us to remind the government of that point, particularly in this instance when we are discussing Bill C-78, the government's environmental assessment legislation, which has been before us this week and which the government is anxious to have passed. It has many gaping holes in it, particularly as it has to do with international jurisdictions. This is an opportunity for us to remind the government that there is one very important trade and environmental issue that is just not being addressed.

I would like to thank the member once again for bringing forward this very sensible motion.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, today we are presented with the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take action against the unfavourable GATT ruling in relation to British Columbia salmon and herring.

I would first like to suggest that this motion is even less relevant and even less appropriate today than it was on April 4, 1989 when it was first tabled. That is over a year and a half ago.

The government has already taken action to resolve our dispute with the United States on salmon and herring in a way which has fully protected our conservation and management interests for both salmon and herring.

Perhaps the hon. member was not able to see the recent CBC story on the tremendous run that has been occurring in British Columbia recently. They have had to hire extra workers there. As the hon. member for Athabasca has pointed out, less than 1 per cent of the salmon has been going to the U.S. to be processed.

I wish to recall the origins of the dispute with the U.S. government on salmon and herring. This issue arose from a petition filed with the United States trade representative in April 1986 by processors in the U.S. They complained that Canadian processors were buying significant quantities of unprocessed Alaskan salmon and herring, while U.S. processors were denied any access to such fish caught by Canadians in waters off our west coast.

It is absolutely essential to keep this fundamental fact in mind throughout any discussion of this issue, that is, that Canadians were free to buy unprocessed American fish for processing in Canadian plants while Americans, under old regulations, against which the GATT subsequently ruled, were unable to buy any unprocessed Canadian salmon and herring caught off our Pacific coast.

In the past as much as 15 per cent of the salmon and 8 per cent of the herring processed in British Columbia was imported from Alaska.

In any case, the U.S. took this complaint against our former export prohibitions on unprocessed Pacific salmon and herring to the GATT. In November, 1987 a GATT panel presented its report, which found that our regulations were inconsistent with our obligations under GATT. Other GATT members supported the panel conclusions as valid and did not support the argument that Canada put forward in defence of our regulations. Faced with this reality, Canada agreed to the adoption of the panel report by the GATT in March, 1988.

This is the only ruling of the GATT against Canadian practices involving fish products. In her statement in the House of Commons on March 21, 1988 the Hon. Pat Carney, in her capacity as Minister for International Trade, announced our intention to remove the GATT inconsistent export prohibitions and bring forward new regulations to put in place a landing requirement for all Pacific salmon and herring.

Miss Carney explained that maintaining the status quo was not a viable option, since it would expose Canadian workers to the threat of U.S. retaliation, and that is no small threat.

In debating this motion, I think it would be useful to question what it would really mean to "take action against" a GATT ruling. In order to do this, we have to reflect on what the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade is, how it works and what Canada's place is in the GATT.

The GATT was established in 1948. It is the only multilateral agreement that lays down agreed rules for international trade. Over 85 per cent of world trade is covered by the GATT. It also functions as the principal international body concerned with negotiating the reduction of trade barriers and other measures which distort competition and concerns itself with international trade regulations.

GATT is thus both a framework of rules and a forum in which countries can discuss and resolve their trade problems and negotiate in large world trade opportunities.

The tenfold growth in the volume of world trade over the last four decades has provided continuing evidence of the GATT success in this double role. There are now 99 members of GATT and No. 100 is on the horizon. The GATT is the cornerstone of Canadian trade policy. Canada was one of the 23 founding members of the GATT agreement, and our membership in it has served Canadians well over the many years. Canada relies on international trade for its economic well-being. We are a trading country. Trade represents some 30 per cent of our GNP and roughly three million Canadians depend on trade for their livelihood. In addition, exports generate about $5,000 a year for every man, woman and child in Canada.

This motion implies that any time that a GATT ruling finds any of our policies inconsistent with the general agreement, Canada should simply ignore the ruling, or as the motion rather mysteriously puts it, to take action against the ruling. But what would we be taking action against? The GATT? The GATT is not only an international agreement, but a forum composed of its members, who are our most important trading partners. So the motion really says that any time that Canadian policies are found to be GATT-inconsistent, we should make a unilateral decision to take action against our trading partners.

The problem with this is that, although Canada is a significant trader of some products on a global basis, we are, in over-all terms, a middle-sized economy and trader. This leads inescapably to the fact that we must depend on strong and predictable international trade rules to provide a secure basis for our export sales. Our free trade agreement with the United States is built upon the GATT. A strong GATT is the best security for Canadian trade and the related jobs. We cannot expect to use the GATT rules to provide a solid base for Canadian economic growth if we ourselves are not prepared to live by these rules.

No country can expect to win every challenge to its practices under the GATT and Canada is no exception. The number of dispute settlement cases in the GATT is tending to increase and this should be no surprise to anyone. In various countries around the world, new and sometimes complex rules and regulations are put into place which have trade-restrictive effects which are questionable in terms of GATT consistency, and thus come under challenge. In other cases, old or traditional policies, such as Canada's former ban on exporting unprocessed Pacific salmon and herring, are challenged. The GATT dispute settlement system has worked as much in Canada's favour as it has against Canada. We cannot pick and choose, simply as it suits our convenience.

In essence, GATT is intended to provide a secure and predictable international trading environment in which industrial and commercial entities—public and private—have the confidence to invest, to create jobs and to trade. We have done very well by GATT and we will continue to do well. The resort by governments to protectionism, on the other hand, has been shown to reduce business confidence, raise prices, slow investment and to damage economic growth and development prospects over-all.

To ignore GATT rulings would constitute a threat to Canadian jobs, as this would leave Canadian trade exposed to retaliation from Canada's trading partners. If we ignore the rules, we create a situation in which others can also ignore them. A less disciplined trading climate would undermine the progress which we had made since 1948 through the GATT.

I have said that this motion is even less appropriate today than it was when it was first written over a year and a half ago. We have already responded to the GATT panel report in a manner which respects the GATT system but also ensures that the conservation and management of our valuable salmon and herring stocks is preserved. This involved implementation of a landing requirement, which was referred to a panel within the framework of the free trade agreement.

There were adjustments which were made. This year there have been a net increase in the number of workers employed in the fishery on the Pacific coast. That has been very good. People are very much aware that what the opposition is proposing is non-workable and does not make any sense.

I would like to conclude my remarks by suggesting that this motion is inappropriate and it should not be adopted in the House of Commons.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to rise this afternoon in this House and speak to the motion that we have before us that says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take action against the unfavourable GATT ruling in relation to British Columbia salmon and herring.

• (1740 )

Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak against this motion that we have before us—

Mr. Whittaker: Support us on this one. Support the fisheries in B.C.

Mr. Belsher: Well, I'm all for the fisheries in B.C. That's just it. I am perfectly satisfied that the action we are taking is more in the way of protecting the fisheries and runs less risk than to take advice from the other side of the House and go against the GATT ruling that we have before us.

Just because the GATT ruling is unfavourable in relation to British Columbia salmon and herring, I am confident that the facts relating to the British Columbia salmon and herring fisheries makes it very clear that this government has brought this issue to a satisfactory resolution.

As the last speaker said, I guess a year ago this motion would have been very much in order because there had not been a satisfactory resolution to the GATT ruling, but a ruling has been made. The predictions which we have heard from time to time about the demise of the industry simply do not add up to scrutiny, Mr. Speaker.

Time and time again in this House we have heard the doom and gloom that has been portrayed from the members opposite. Time and time again, Mr. Speaker, they have been false. It is a sad commentary on how this House works when the members opposite do things that really set out to scare people and to lead them into thinking that black is not black and white is not white, things like that.

Members of this House will be aware of the importance of these fisheries for the Canadian economy. British Columbia salmon and roe herring are valued at close to $1 billion in annual wholesale value. Over 4,400 salmon fishing vessels and 1,500 herring fishing vessels involving 15,000 fishermen participate in these fisheries along the 6,000 miles of B.C. coastline. On average, 80,000 tonnes of salmon and 30,000 tonnes of roe herring are landed each year. The processing sector employs approximately 6,000 persons. Approximately 200 vessels are currently licensed as fish packers.

In coming to a resolution of the dispute brought by the United States before the GATT, to which this motion refers, the government has consistently sought to ensure that the conservation and management regime applied to these vital natural resources is maintained. This would enable the economic benefits which they bring to the communities along the coastline of British Columbia to be sustained and enhanced.

When the United States objected to the landing requirement introduced in April 1989 for all salmon and herring, it was agreed to take this matter to a panel established under the free trade agreement as a means of finding a satisfactory resolution of this matter.

The decision of that panel confirmed Canada's right to verify catch reporting and to conduct biological sampling to provide for the conservation and management of the salmon and roe herring fishery resource. However, it was the panel's view that a percentage of the resource could be exported directly from the fishing grounds without impairing the integrity of the fishery management regime. On the basis of this decision, agreement was reached on February 22 of this year with the United States.

The member opposite has alluded to that and it was 20 per cent for year one and it could roll by a further 1 per cent each year until it reached 25 per cent, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. Stupich: Then you decide what's going to happen anyway.

Mr. Belsher: The member opposite wants to cross bridges before we get to them. I think we should deal with the issue as we now have it before us.

This agreement permitted specified percentages of the total allowable catch of British Columbia salmon and roe herring to be made available to the U.S. buyers for direct sea exports in each of three British Columbia export zones, the south, the central, and the north.

In implementing this negotiated resolution, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans established an export management unit. This unit verifies catch reporting and conducts biological sampling to provide for the conservation and management of the fishery resource.

At the time the agreement was reached with the United States, there were those from the opposition who claimed that any agreement would spell the doom of this important industry for Canada. Indeed, the motion before us is a clear reflection of that pessimistic approach and a lack of confidence in the ability of the fisheries of British Columbia to compete. The statistical data for this year however shows the opposite to be the case.

In the 1990 roe herring season, there was a total of 987.6 tonnes of unprocessed roe herring shipped by land to the United States. No export-at-sea licences were issued. Of the total amount shipped to the United States, 606.7 tonnes was processed in that country and the remainder was shipped back to Canada for processing. By comparison, there was a total of 1,500 tonnes of unprocessed roe herring imported into Canada from the United States.

In the 1990 salmon season, which is ongoing, 22 applications have been received for export-at-sea licences. Eleven licences have been issued and four vessels are actively engaged in direct export-at-sea to the United States. To date, a total of 497 tonnes of salmon have been exported to the United States directly by sea, all from the south export zone. Exports of salmon by land to the United States to mid-September were approximately 2,800 tonnes.

In contrast, during this period, approximately 6,000 tonnes of United States salmon were imported from Alaska to Prince Rupert and 900 tonnes were imported into the lower British Columbia mainland from the Puget Sound area. The over-all import level to Canada from the United States exceeds by more than double the export level to the United States.

In considering these exports of fish to the United States, I believe it is important for hon. members to take note that the programs operated by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for a biological sampling and catch verification at shore based landing stations have been extended to cover at-sea exports. This ensures effective conservation and management of the salmon and herring fisheries. As well, communications and management information systems have been developed in order to provide the capability to control exports near ceiling levels and to provide timely information for enforcement purposes. The experience gained this year is invaluable to the planning process for both the upcoming herring and subsequent salmon seasons.

We are talking about GATT and it was a GATT ruling that this was all about. We lost the fight at the GATT that the Americans brought against us and so we resorted to the dispute settlement mechanism that was negotiated in our free trade agreement. That dispute settlement has found that it is legal and consistent for Canada to expect to count and to land on shore the majority of our fish. That will be an ongoing process and that is what we have here before us now.

This government has worked hard to bring this matter to a resolution with the United States which meets the interest of all Canadians, particularly those engaged in the fisheries in British Columbia. The facts I have presented show that these fisheries are functioning well and there is no basis to assume that the people of British Columbia will not continue to benefit from these resources.

This is a renewable resource. This is a resource that has to be managed. It has to be managed carefully and judiciously. With the co-operation of all the people in the industry, we can expect to have an ongoing fishery for the years ahead.

This year was no exception in that the run on the Fraser River, the Adams River run, was one of the highest runs experienced in the last 50-odd years. It was a beauty to behold. We expect these cycles to continue because nature, in its wisdom, has devised ways that the fish head out to sea to grow, come back home to the spawning grounds to replenish the cycle, and then die off.

I am glad to be able to stand before the House today and state uncategorically that I am satisfied that we have managed this GATT ruling in an acceptable manner, and that the fishery is well on its way to a continued and enjoyable resource.

I know the riding of the member opposite is much closer to the fisheries than mine. Mine is up in the Fraser Valley. Nonetheless, there are a lot of fish that go by our doorstep up the Fraser River to the spawning grounds.

They then come down so that his fishermen can then fish for them upon their return.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to the motion put forward by the hon. member.

British Columbia salmon and roe herring are valued at close to $1 billion in annual wholesale value. Over 4,400 salmon fishing vessels and 1,500 herring fishing vessels involving some 15,000 fishermen participate in fisheries along the 6,000 miles of B.C. coastline. On average, 80,000 tonnes of salmon and 30,000 tonnes of roe herring are landed each year. The processing sector employs approximately 6,000 persons. Approximately 200 vessels are currently licensed as fish packers.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, following the GATT ruling and prior to the Canada–U.S. Trade Commission decision regarding herring and salmon, all catches of these species were required to be landed in Canada. Biological sampling, catch verification, surveillance, and enforcement activities were developed to manage fisheries in an environment where all fish were landed in Canada.

The Canada–U.S. Trade Commission decision regarding at–sea export of salmon and herring authorized exports of up to 20 per cent of the available catch in 1990, and 25 per cent in the years 1991 to 1994. The packer fleet is capable of assembling up to 150 vessels which could theoretically meet criteria to qualify for direct export licences. The implementation of the at–sea export provisions in the herring and salmon fisheries introduced a number of new components to the management regime for these fisheries and established the requirement for the implementation of a more complex management and conservation regime.

The New FTA Export Management Program was designed to address the following requirements: administration of export licence applications; inspection of vessels to confirm compliance with licensing specifications; issuance of at–sea export or y licences; publication of expected volumes of salmon and roe herring to be available from each export zone; over–all planning and execution of export catch sampling, catch verification, export monitoring, industry liaison and enforcement activities; development of export sampling plans, detailed in–season monitoring and reporting of catch statistics and export levels in line with the authorized export ceilings; and integration with onshore sampling and catch verification programs.

The position of the DFO FTA Export Manager was established and the incumbent was made responsible for the over–all planning and execution of export catch sampling—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on October 11, I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture. I asked if he would reinstate the interest–free cash advance. It was the fourth time that week that I had risen in the House to ask for the reinstatement.

I was encouraged that the minister said he was giving the matter urgent consideration. I was even more encouraged when, two days later, he announced the reinstatement of this important program. The minister, however, made his announcement, not in the Chamber, but at a Saturday morning meeting of writers in Saskatoon.

Instead of providing Parliament with the information that I had asked for, just two days previous, he chose to go outside the Chamber for the announcement and left Parliamentarians, such as myself, to respond to the media and to report to our constituents without the benefit of the information that he had made available that morning.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that last year I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party in the House argued strenuously against government legislation which originally removed the interest–free portion of the cash advance. We argued that there were times when this program was very necessary and this year the government was forced to recognize that we were correct.

The government's mistake on this matter has not been adequately corrected, however. The minister's announcement makes reference to the reinstatement of the interest-free cash advance for this year only. If this year's conditions on the Prairies are duplicated next year or the year after, we will have to argue again and again, year by year, for the interest-free program which has served the agricultural community well since the 1950s.

Last year's legislation should be immediately rescinded and the interest-free cash advance program permanently reinstated. This past week, I visited a number of elevator agents, bank managers, credit union managers, and farmers and I have found that the most contentious question remaining this year is that the program requires cheques to be issued jointly to the farmer and the financial institution. I would like the government to consider issuing the cheque to the farmer and leave to his discretion which bills get paid and when, under the cash advance. The big banks and the government are working too closely together on the issuance of these funds.

Our agricultural sector is much too important to be left to the whim of the politicians. There must be some stability brought to agricultural financing. As long as prices remain low and interest rates and fuel prices can rise unchecked, Canadian food producers must have some protection, some security.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture to recognize that even though the interest-free cash advance is only a small program in the whole system, it is important enough to be a permanent part of our support mechanism. I ask that he take the next step and reinstate the program, permanently.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as it has been indicated, on October 13, the Minister of Agriculture did announce measures to assist cash-strapped farmers. Those are in the interest-free cash advances which are now available on undelivered grain.

We know that farmers can now receive, if they qualify for interest-free advances, up to $50,000 through this one-year program. I want to make sure that everyone understands that it is a one-year program. That decision was arrived at in consultation with working groups as to the need and the way to best provide that program. This program will be administered through the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Advance Payments for Crops Act. All crops covered by these two programs are eligible for the interest-free advances.

It is estimated it will cost the treasury about $95 million in interest relief in 1990 alone. This is a short-term measure to answer an immediate need. We know that $95 million is a lot of money, especially now when we are strapped for funds in this country.

It does not address the long-term needs. That is why it has to be a one-year program, because as everyone in this House knows, and anyone who has any connection to agriculture knows, we are working on a longer-term program such as the safety nets that we started over a year ago with the committee. The committees are made up of producers and organizations from across the country and are to come up with a long-term program so that we will not need interest-free advances such as we do right now. The government has responded to the needs at the present time.

We hope that we can have some of these programs in place, such as GRIP and NISA, for the 1991-92 crop year. If governments agree, federal and provincial, this new safety net could provide benefits to Canadian grains and oilseeds farmers next year. This would give them the stability necessary to plan their financial future much better.

These are the two programs we are working on, the net income stabilization account, or NISA, and the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan, or GRIP. NISA would enable farmers to set money aside in good years in an individual trust account, their own personal account.

GRIP is a combination of yield protection and price support. The two programs will benefit agriculture greatly. We have seen the needs over the last few years and have continued to stand by our farmers. I want to make that very, very clear. The Special Canadian Grains Program, the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program, and this spring a commitment of about $450 million to Canadian grain farmers are an example of the commitment we have put forward. On October 13, there was another extension of that support.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, some months ago, I asked the minister to continue funding the Court Challenges Program. Since then I am happy to report that this program has been extended for five years, although a 10-year extension was requested.

The Court Challenges Program provides financial and legal support for litigation to test selected cases and establish precedents for protection of rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This is an essential program for helping disadvantaged groups, including women, natives, visible minority and disabled persons, to achieve a greater degree of equality.

Several cases involving equality rights for women have set important precedents and more are pending. It was essential to extend the funding program since there have been few cases concerned with discrimination against visible minority persons processed.

Barriers to equality continue to exist and racial discrimination remains a most critical and regrettable problem in our country. Many people of colour, including recent immigrants and people who have been here for several generations, do not feel they are accepted as equal citizens in Canadian society. Over the last year racial intolerance and racist incidents have escalated dramatically. Results of February polls showed 54 per cent of Canadians felt there was an increase in racial intolerance.

A study by B'nai Brith found a dramatic 88 per cent increase in incidents of harassment. There were also many media reports of racial discrimination. Blacks and other visible minorities continue to be victims of discrimination and violence in schools and universities. Many job applicants were rejected and humiliated, and promotions were rare.

The percentage of native people in prisons far exceeds their proportion in the general population. Blacks complained about being easy targets for bullets of police officers. Racist pins and bumper stickers were circulated freely. Jewish graves were singled out for desecration.

In addressing a seminar on the rights of the child, John Turvey, a street worker in my riding, said: "Seventy per cent of the kids I see on the streets in the downtown eastside of Vancouver are aboriginal. They make up 5 per cent of the general population. We are a racist culture."

The federal government cannot maintain its innocence regarding racial discrimination. For 10 years an apology and redress for the historic racism of the Chinese head tax and the Chinese Exclusion Act has been outstanding.

Mr. Idris Ben-Tahir and Ms. Mary Pitawanakuat experienced racial harassment in the Public Service. The government's long delay in allowing Sikhs in the RCMP to wear turbans exacerbated overt racism. The government refused to reverse the recent CRTC decision which refused the only black format radio station in Canada, despite its obligations under the Canadian Multiculturalism Act.

The inaction of both Quebec and federal governments to prevent and deal with overt racism during the Oka stand-off is a national disgrace. Images of burning natives in effigy, the Ku Klux Klan, racist slogans and rock-throwing are scars on our souls. The Prime Minister's promise of an investigation has been forgotten.

Systemic discrimination continues in the Public Service where only 2.9 per cent of federal employees were visible minorities, compared to 6.3 per cent in the general workforce, this despite a commitment to employment equity. Recently, the Secretary of State refused promised funding for a National Employment Equity Network conference, creating considerable hardship for participants who represented target groups.

I call on the government to make a concerted effort to eliminate racism and discrimination by strengthening and enforcing employment equity and the Canadian Multiculturalism Act by increasing funds so that the Human Rights Commission can do its job; and by increasing, rather than withdrawing funds from advocacy groups that are working for equality. Canada is a multi-racial, multicultural country where all citizens must be equal in reality, not just in rhetoric.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows, the contribution agreement between the Department of the Secretary of State and the Canadian Council on Social Development for the administration of the Court Challenges Program was scheduled to expire on March 31 of this year.

Through this program, financial assistance is provided for the preparation and defence of test cases involving equality and language rights under the Canadian Constitution. Cases funded under the program have dealt with such issues as discrimination based on mental and physical disabilities, mandatory retirement, equality for native people, discrimination based on marital status and citizenship, and equality for disabled persons. The program, which was introduced in 1985, had a five-year budget of some $11.5 million.

Notwithstanding the difficult fiscal circumstances, the government agreed to renew the program because it is sensitive to the concerns of minority groups and disadvantaged persons and to their views on the importance of the Court Challenges Program.

The minister announced on May 10, 1990, that the Court Challenges Program would be extended for another five years. It will have a five-year budget of $13.75 million. However, the program will now be administered by the Human Rights Research and Education Centre of the University of Ottawa. An agreement was signed with the centre on July 22. The Canadian Council on Social Development felt that it was no longer appropriate for it to administer the program and that another organization should assume responsibility for the Court Challenges Program.

Mr. Speaker, I can therefore assure the hon. member that the government fully supports the Court Challenges Program and what it is trying to achieve.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to a question I asked on December 12 of last year. The question concerned the closure of the Canso fish plant. I want to review some of the chronology that has taken place since that question was asked on December 12.

On December 11, National Sea Products closed its fish plant operations in Canso, putting 750 people out of work and closing down the town's only industry. This action began a struggle by the people of Canso, a struggle which has been dramatic and which has made Canso a national symbol.

I have pursued that struggle on behalf of the people of Canso here in the House of Commons, asking repeated questions in the House and following this issue since that question on December 12.

Later on that same week of December 12, I was privileged to have the hon. Speaker accept my request for an emergency debate, and on December 18, we debated in this House the crisis in the Atlantic fishery, raising this matter to a national concern. Canso had become a symbol. The people of Canso did not take the closure of their fish plant lying down. They held rallies. The trawler workers travelled to Ottawa to convince the government to reverse its decision. The town council of Canso came to Ottawa. When the provincial government provided a very unacceptable deal in February, they turned it down and continued the fight.

Over the summer, after repeated and lengthy negotiations, the provincial and federal government, through the Minister of Fisheries, worked out a deal with a new consortium called Seafreez Foods Ltd., which has allowed Canso to achieve a new lease on life. This Seafreez deal has enabled up to 500 of the 750 people who were working at Canso to resume their work in the fish plant. Through a complex arrangement with foreign fish operators, it allows the trawlermen in Canso to go back to work.

Today, there are 12 people hired at the Canso plant. They have a new manager, and four trawler boats are ready to go out to sea. The refrigeration unit is being replaced and the plant should be in full operation in mid November. This turn of events is a result of the determination and tenacity of the people of one small community in Canso not to take the loss of their livelihood lying down. It is a symbol of their determination to maintain their livelihood and to demonstrate to both the federal and provincial governments that they are determined to continue the work that has nourished their community for centuries. The people of Canso are committed to making the deal work and to being able to continue their long association with the sea and keeping the town alive.

The deal that has been worked out is an imaginative and workable deal. It represents a major commitment on the part of both the provincial and the federal government and the companies involved. I wish to compliment the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for helping to put this deal together. I would like to say as well that I expect the government to hold to the commitment that has been made to the people of Canso and to Cansonians that this deal will ensure a stable future for their community. Cansonians will accept nothing less.

I want to mention that the crisis in the Atlantic fishery is by no means over. There is still a great deal of anguish and hardship throughout Atlantic Canada in many fishing communities as a result of the declining fish stocks and the mismanagement which has occurred in recent years through the fishing industry. The crisis will not be over and we will have to continue to work toward a new arrangement which will allow communities like Canso to grow and prosper.

One of those communities is Lockeport. Unfortunately, the town of Lockeport, which has been in a similar situation to Canso, has not been able to come up with a deal that satisfies the requirements of the provincial government to be able to open its fish plant. That is one community among many that needs to have continuous support, and continued work will have to be made in order to ensure that its industry is preserved.

As the fisheries critic for my party, I am committed to working toward ensuring that fisheries policy ensures the survival of these communities, wherever they may be, and ensures the future of a stable fishing industry.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the Government of Canada is committed to assisting the community of Canso which has seen its fish plant close as a result of resource reductions in important Atlantic groundfish stocks.

In May, the Government of Canada announced the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program of $584 million in assistance for the fishing industry.

These funds will implement a long-term strategy for the fishing industry and include a short-term adjustment package, with a commitment to spend up to $130 million to assist employees in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland who were laid off because of declines in northern cod stocks; an additional $28 million to improve surveillance; $150 million for rebuilding the stocks; $130 million for adjusting to current realities; and $146 million for economic diversification both within the fishery and outside.

These special initiatives are in addition to ongoing federal programs to assist in a workforce adjustment and to attract other enterprises and alternative employment opportunities to Atlantic Canada.

The National Sea processing facility at Canso was closed as a result of northern cod quota reductions. Canso is therefore eligible for assistance under the short-term adjustment package. Of the $130 million available under this initiative, $26.7 million have been projected as required for Canso. These funds will be available over the four year period to 1994 on adjustment measures such as training programs, community development initiatives, and other measures.

The Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program includes $146 million to foster diversification within the fishery and to promote alternative employment in areas affected by quota reductions and stock depletion. Canso is also eligible for assistance under this initiative.

In addition, on August 10, 1990, the Government of Canada announced support for the Seafreez proposal which the member spoke about. This initiative will protect and maintain 500 jobs at the Canso plant. It is great to hear that it is starting in operation again. Certainly it sounds as though by mid-November, by what the member was saying, it is going to be operational and quite a number of people will be working. It is rewarding to see something like this happening and that plant being utilized.

We believe that these initiatives will secure the future of the community of Canso and permit it to continue its 400–year involvement with the Atlantic fishing industry.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION OR TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION ACT

The House resumed from Friday, September 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C–73, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, if this were an isolated measure before us today, namely the proposal in the bill to dissolve, transfer or sell Canada Harbour Place, Canada Museums Construction Corporation, the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the Canadian Patents and Development Limited, the Harbourfront Corporation and Mingan Associates Limited, this bill in its entirety and scope would be a source of concern.

This measure has to be seen against the background of a trend, a pattern. If we look at the record of the Conservative government on the matter of privatization, which actually is a very fancy word to replace the words dismantling Canada, and the interest of the Canadian public in a number of very fine initiatives, then we find a remarkably long list of measures that this government has carried out.

I would like to remind people of the sale of shares of Air Canada, the sale of the CN Hotels, the sale of a CN subsidiary called CN Route, and the sale of Canadair Limited. If that were not enough, this government managed also to privatize Canadian Arsenals Limited and went on happily with the sale of de Havilland. Northern Canada Power Commission was not spared nor the Northern Transportation Company. Then there is Northwestel Inc., Pêcheries Canada Inc., and in 1987 there was the sale of Teleglobe Canada, with proceeds of some $500 million in cash from that sale, a crucial and key industry. There is Terra Nova Telecommunications Inc. on the list of corporations that have been partially or entirely sold.

Crown holdings that have been sold include CNCP, and probably the jewel in the Crown in the sixties and seventies when we were attempting, and were quite successful, to establish Canadian public ownership in key industries, the Canada Development Corporation. Add to that Fishery Products International Limited, Nanisivik Mines Ltd., and Varity Corporation.

To that, one must add initiatives which are now being considered. What emerges is a picture of the Government of Canada under Tory stewardship busily intent on dismantling public ownership in this country.

In doing so, whenever there is the sale of an item, we do not always know whether the new owners will be Canadians or foreign interests, thus increasing of course ownership on the part of foreign investors.

This is a very disturbing pattern, but we cannot accuse the Tories of being inconsistent. Actually, the Progressive Conservative Party has been very consistent in this matter. It has promised to privatize Canada, and it is doing that quite effectively. It is giving away the public interest to the private sector, and sometimes to the private foreign sector.

That is a very disturbing fact, which nobody in this House can deny. In addition to that, we have seen the dissolution of the Foreign Investment Review Agency in 1985. We have seen a constant systematic weakening of the CBC. We are now at the eve of the sale of Petro–Canada about which many of us will be denied the right to speak because of closure.

I would like to remind you, Madam Speaker, that when Petro–Canada was introduced in the seventies, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands quite rightly pointed out the other day, closure was introduced after 15 days of debate. This government allowed debate for only two days before introducing closure, thus denying probably half of all membership in this House an opportunity to speak.

We are on the eve of the sale of Petro–Canada, which is the wrong thing to do for a number of reasons, which would take all the time allotted for this intervention. Madam Speaker, you have the privatizing of Unemployment Insurance through Bill C–21, because the public interest has been withdrawn in the funding of that very important commission. Madam Speaker, there is also the partial privatization of Air Canada.

At this rate, Madam Speaker, the day will come when this government, if given the chance to continue to govern, will attempt possibly to privatize Parliament Hill. It will try to find a good American sponsor, someone probably like Coca–Cola, Kodak or as my colleague from York South says, perhaps McDonald's or Kentucky Fried Chicken? Why not? It could be a very profitable place to privatize. Madam Speaker, you could make money. Why not let this public investment go into the hands of the private sector and into the hands of these great entrepreneurs who know how to make a profit?

Why does the minister in charge of privatization not make a proposal in this House for the privatization of old age pensions? They could also be privatized. Why not? It is a very legitimate way of making money.

The government is already privatizing the airports in Toronto, are they not? It is an interesting theme. There is a phenomenal investment in the name of the public which, the moment it could become profitable—business enterprise in the hands of the public sector can be profitable as well as when it is in private hands. There is no reason why the Canadian public cannot reap the benefits of good management and still retain ownership.

Nowhere in any text of economics has it been disclaimed, Madam Speaker, that you can have the Canadian public as a winner maintaining and retaining its ownership rather than transforming public ownership into some kind of supermarket and allowing the latest arrival on the market to make money at the expense and with the benefit of the Canadian public.

That is Tory theology. In that sense, we can only say that they are being consistent. Why not privatize the Bank of Canada? The pattern is there. Perhaps tomorrow, we will see a proposal to that effect. If it could be profitable, the government would not stop at proposing to privatize Parliament Hill. It would also privatize the Canadian army, but there it would have some difficulties because nowhere, yet, in recent times, has a government been able to privatize its army successfully.

Bill C–73 has to be seen against that background. It is not just an isolated initiative. It is not just something that happened all of a sudden around the cabinet table because the minister wanted to make a mark in history by coming to the House to pass a bill and demonstrate that he is active. This is part and parcel, consistent with Tory ideology: the dismantling of public ownership in Canada. Of course, in the next election we will make sure that this fact is not forgotten by the electorate.

Moving to the measure itself, Madam Speaker, because time is short, let us examine what the minister promises, what is in the bill, and what the Crombie royal commission recommends.

The minister in his intervention in the House assured the nation that when it comes to the sale of the Toronto Harbourfront Corporation, which he wants to wind up and dissolve, that the following will take place, and I am reading from Hansard at page 13555:

> —once a settlement has been negotiated with Ontario, the city of Toronto and other parties.

He proceeds by saying that:

> The proceeds from the sale of the assets will be used to provide for the development of parks and infrastructure on the site—

—and finally—> and to assist in the creation of an independent, locally–controlled entity—

—listen to this—

> —having a capacity to continue the very excellent cultural programming that we know takes place at Harbourfront in Toronto;

That is beautiful rhetoric. These are the three commitments that the minister made in point (5) of his presentation. I urge you, Madam Speaker, to try to find them in the bill. You cannot find them, because all it says in Clause 40 is that the Minister of Public Works, once this bill is passed, is authorized to procure the dissolution of Harbourfront Corporation. Period, paragraph. That is the end of the Progressive Conservative commitment to Harbourfront.

The minister made a commitment in the House and we cannot find the equivalent of that commitment or the substance, the legal powers demanded to what he promises to do in the legislation. That is very, very disturbing. There are no safeguards. There are no conditions in the legislation.

We know that the book value of Harbourfront today is $31 million.

Mr. Mills: That's a give-away.

Mr. Caccia: This was going to be owned by the public of Canada, the people of Canada. Suddenly, this is going to be given away. Who knows how, who knows to whom, and who knows for what purpose? Certainly to make a buck. That we know because that is what the Tories understand well.

Now that we know what the minister promises, now that we know what is in the bill—

Mr. Bosley: Don't tell us about leases.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I suppose that the member for Don Valley West finds my intervention perhaps a little bit too Latin and temperamental, but apart from that he does not like to hear what is being said in here. He comes from Toronto and he may perhaps be worried about the future of Harbourfront, too. I know him to be a very public-spirited, public-minded member of Parliament. If I were in his shoes—and I do not know what happens in the Tory caucus—I would have fought tooth and nail against this bill. Would you not have, Madam Speaker? This is a dismantling of the waterfront in his own city.

This is the access to the lake that we are discussing. It is the greatest environmental asset which the city of Toronto has. Attempts have been made since 1972 to provide an open publicly-owned area, which unfortunately has been partially cluttered. Nevertheless, there is a possibility still to see the lake and have access to it. Suddenly, we are saying: "Well, let's sell it. Harbourfront can go. Give up your lake and say goodbye".

That leads me to this excellent report, The Water Shed by the former member for Rosedale. He was a very fine minister while he was here in Ottawa and probably left because he was utterly frustrated. On page 129 of that report, under the heading "The Future of Harbourfront", the Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront states: "The lands, properties, and residual interests now managed by Harbourfront Corporation and those still in the inventory of Public Works Canada should be held and administered by Public Works Canada, on a temporary basis, until appropriate agreements with the city are implemented." That is not in Bill C-73 and it is very legitimate for the Opposition to raise this at this point and to ask why it is not in Bill C-73.

In making recommendations regarding the future of the Toronto waterfront in another report, the same author, Mr. Crombie, stated, and I quote from Parks, Pleasures and Public Amenities, volume 4, at page 68: "We recommend first that there be no further sale of lands currently held in public ownership." How do you like that?

Where is the co-ordination, the integration, the synchronisation between the government and its own Royal Commission? Maybe someone from the government benches will rise to offer an answer, a justification, or some kind of an explanation.

What is the point of having the Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront produce this outstanding documentation and give recommendations, only to have a silly little bill, Bill C-73, ignoring the work that has gone on for the protection of one of the most important waterfronts in Canada? It does not make sense. It is insane.

Time does not permit me to analyse what is being proposed in Vancouver. Again, another beautiful, private grab is shaping up in that city as well. I will stick to my own home city.

It is quite clear that this bill, Bill C-73, is reflective of the Tory vision. It is a vision which uses the public and what is in public ownership for the promotion of the interests of large business and powerful interests in society. Not only that, but it offers the opportunity to the private interests in society, utilizing investments originally made with public funds. First, the public is asked to take the risk. The public is asked to make the investment. Then, at the threshold where that investment promises to be profitable or become an opportunity for the private sector, then the public is told: "You public just withdraw. We will let the private sector milk that particular cow now". That is wrong. That is ideologically wrong and we resent it. That is not good public policy. We resent the fact that investments made by Canadians—

Ms. Campbell: Nobody has $250 million—

Mr. Caccia: The Minister of Justice has something to say and I will be very glad to listen to her full statement, later on in the debate. I have a great respect for her and I will be glad to hear what she has to say on the question of public and private ownership.

All I can say to the minister is that to us it seems a disgrace. It is shameful to see what is being proposed by this bill and to examine also what has happened over the last five or six years under the Tory regime. It has disregarded the public and the Canadian interest in a number of sectors. It has also denied the opportunity to the public of being involved in the ownership of corporations which could be profitable in the name of the public.

I know that my time is up, Madam Speaker, and I appreciate your patience.

Nowhere can the Tories claim there is a precedent or proof that one cannot be profitable in the public name, in public ownership. What we are witnessing here is a distortion and perversion of the public interest. It is not right to sell public ownership to the private sector when there is an opportunity for the public to be protected and, as well, to make a profit which the public deserves to receive.

Therefore, for these reasons—and I am glad that we have speakers on our side here today—we can only reprimand the government very deeply and guarantee that this will be one of the strong items raised in Toronto during the next election campaign.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on what was said by my opposition colleague, who accused our Conservative government of dismantling and destroying public corporations, and say that what we are dismantling is this empire the Liberals built and the underlying philosophy that helped to stifle private enterprise. I am surprised to see he is supported by some of his colleagues who have been extremely successful in the private sector and who certainly contributed— Yes, you, my dear colleague— who contributed to the economy of this beautiful country of ours. I believe that the Liberals went wrong when they pesisted in the kind of attitude that was extremely useful in the immediate postwar context, when it was necessary for the government to take on far broader responsibilities. It is time the Liberals realized that attitudes have changed and that the government is no longer expected to get involved in every single social and economic sector, nor should it.

I think the Liberals' policy of centralization has tended to stifle private initiative. To centralize means to homogenize. This may have had its uses at a given time, except that eventually, we must acknowledge the existence of individual differences and allow the expression of those differences. Private businesses are the ideal vehicle for individual expression and initiative. In Montreal North, in my riding, since a number of vast empires built by Liberal ideologues have been privatized, employment opportunities and the market share of our private businesses have increased, and I am thinking of Canadair, Teleglobe and Air Canada. Privatization has been instrumental in updating operations and restructuring resources. As you know, centralization means more bureaucracy, and that is what I wanted to point out, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I understand the hon. member's concern and why she feels she has to defend this bill. As a government member, it is her duty to blame the Liberal Party and the Liberal government, but I want to point out that it was the Liberal government at the time that purchased the Toronto Harbour front Corporation and Canada Harbour Place in Vancouver, and we did this in the public interest. I realize, we do not see eye to eye on the government's role in protecting the public interest.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, the member for Davenport's defence of public enterprise was most rewarding to hear from this side of the House, knowing that it sometimes took a lot of pressure from this side of the House to have the other party move into areas of public enterprise, one of which being the Crown corporation, Petro-Canada.

The member for Davenport indicated that he was most disturbed by the fact that he was denied the right to speak on the Petro-Canada bill because of the closure actions of the government. We obviously at this end of the House, as well, are quite disturbed by the closure action on this very important bill to privatize Canada's national oil company.

Today, in the newspaper we read that Petro-Canada's profits in the nine months ending September 30 have increased to $80 million from $1 million in the previous year. When the Minister of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs introduced the Petro-Canada bill earlier this year, he indicated that Petro-Canada was not earning profits, and it was a good time to privatize Petro-Canada.

Today, with oil prices being what they are and Petro-Canada leading the way in increasing prices at the pumps, its profits surging to $80 million this year, I ask the member for Davenport if he would take a minute to tell us why he does not support the government on its privatization move. Why does he support the maintenance of Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation?

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, the question as to why I support Petro-Canada as it is now is a long subject. In essence, to say it very briefly to the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, it boils down to the fact that Petro-Canada has an incredible future and role to play on behalf of the Canadian public in the decades ahead because of environmental issues, such as climate warming, which are beginning to emerge at the horizon, and because we have to find ways of reducing our dependence on fossil fuels and, therefore, generate or develop alternative sources of energy.

I am sure the hon. member knows these things. I do not know whether he is seeking information or whether he wants to very kindly give me a platform to speak on Petro-Canada.

The last thing we should be doing is selling it. If anything, we should strengthen and expand its mandate. I see here the member from Edmonton who has made excellent speeches on this subject on a variety of occasions. We think very much alike on this matter.

I would also like to remind the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake that it was the Liberal government which bought Harbourfront, or at least made a commitment to buy Harbourfront in 1972, because at that time it realized that something needed to be done to establish a window, so to speak, for the citizens in order to have access to the lake. This is what makes this measure particularly offensive.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the member for his speech here this morning on Bill C-73. As you know, Madam Speaker, the member for Davenport is a veteran member of this Chamber. He has been here for a significant number of years and he and the member for Broadview—Greenwood are here today for the same reason that I am. We are all members from the Toronto area. It is not often that we have the opportunity to speak to an issue that will directly affect the 2.5 million people who live in metropolitan Toronto, indeed people who live in greater metro Toronto.

We are shocked at the fact that this government would at this time privatize Harbourfront. It seems to me that this government is totally ignorant of the situation at Harbourfront. What makes it worse is that it was a Conservative member from the Toronto area who introduced this bill, the hon. member for Brampton.

Can the hon. member for Davenport indicate to the House what has happened on the waterfront over the last number of years as a result of allowing the development to take place without enough government control? He knows, and in particular the members from Toronto know, that the private sector has to a certain extent destroyed the harbourfront because of the free-wheeling development that has gone on there.

Perhaps the member can explain to the House, for the benefit of those who do not come from the Toronto area, what the private sector has done to Harbourfront and whether he believes there are existing opportunities to salvage the beauty of the waterfront for Torontonians for generations to come.

Mr. Bosley: What hypocrisy.

Mr. Caccia: Evidently, a number of serious mistakes have been made along the harbourfront. There is no doubt about that. This is the final blow that should not have been given.

The hon. member for York South Weston in his question also gave the answer to his own question, and very eloquently so. What we want to see now, at least as a minimum, is the retention of the public interest or what is left in public ownership. This is what we are objecting to in the light of what has happened recently.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I had not intended to enter into the debate. I had intended only to enter into comments. Since that time has expired, I wish to put a few things on the record.

I listened, Madam Speaker, to the comments of the hon. member for York South Weston, who clearly was never around in the days when some of us were asked to be part of the planning committee for Harbourfront 15, 16 or 18 years ago. As members of the council of the city of Toronto and metropolitan Toronto, we pleaded with the government—and the member who has just spoken was a minister of that government—to turn the property over to the metropolitan council. The government of the day, led by members who were then in cabinet, who have just spoken, absolutely and utterly refused to take any position that would commit or allow the people and the citizens of metropolitan Toronto to own and to manage the harbourfront park themselves. So, many, many years later, a very sensible—

Mr. Nunziata: That's not what the bills says.

Mr. Mills: Not to public ownership.

Mr. Bosley: It is amazing how the facts cause reaction, isn't it?

Some years later, David Crombie, who is one of the smartest guys in municipal affairs this country has ever seen, recommends, if you read the document fully, that the Harbourfront Corporation be turned over to a negotiated local entity for local control and local management, and that is precisely—

Mr. Caccia: That's nonsense.

Mr. Nunziata: Question, question.

Mr. Bosley: Yes, it is. Yes, it does say that. That is exactly what it says. It says that what should happen in the Harbourfront Corporation is that it should be put under local control.

What this bill says is before you can do that, you have to introduce the legislative authority to allow the Minister of Public Works to take the legislative steps necessary to permit that change.

There is nothing in this bill that requires the properties of Harbourfront to be transferred to private ownership and members opposite who claim that are utterly misleading the House. Read the whole bill. It is very simple. It allows the minister to wind up the corporation. That is all it allows the minister to do. If you want local control of Harbourfront, then this bill is the absolute sine qua non in law to allow the minister to do that. Any other suggestion by Liberal members opposite that there is anything else in this is the same kind of distortion that was made by Liberals in 1972 when they said that the people of Toronto would be allowed to run this property and then put every roadblock possible in the way of allowing that. It is typical attempts by members opposite to destroy the capacity of local Torontonians to run Harbourfront the way they should have been able to do from the beginning.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, do I have a question or can I debate? Is it a question period?

Madam Deputy Speaker: We had resumed debate. The hon. member for Don Valley West used only a few minutes, but that was debate. We are now in a period of questions or comments.

Mr. Mills: Okay, but is it a question period?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am just trying to answer your question, if I may.

Mr. Mills: Okay, I will ask a question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is now the period for questions and comments.

Mr. Mills: First of all, Madam Speaker, I want to say through you to the hon. member for Don Valley West that I may have a misunderstanding here, but is he saying that this bill states categorically that this is just a matter of transferring Harbourfront from the Government of Canada to local governments, whether they be provincial or municipal?

My interpretation of the bill is that there is a book value at this moment in time in a depressed economy of approximately $31 million on Harbourfront, and it is basically up for sale to whoever will come along and buy it, whether it is a developer or whoever.

I would feel more comfortable if he were suggesting that we can only move it into a different form of public ownership where the object then in terms of service is totally different than a property that is in the private sector.

Could the hon. member please clarify for me, because I have the impression that he was saying that this is not going to go into private ownership. It is going to go into just another form of public ownership.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I may take the member back to the beginning. It is wonderful now to hear Liberals talk about how Harbourfront ought to stay in public ownership and use since it was Liberals who required that the property be developed by the private sector for private purposes.

Mr. Mills: Jointly.

Mr. Bosley: That was the only way in which the public was to be allowed access to any part of it. That was not the position—

Mr. Mills: Jointly. What's the reality?

Mr. Bosley: That was not the position that was taken by the local councils of the—

Mr. Nunziata: Make it specific.

Mr. Bosley: It is absolutely typical, Madam Speaker. It is impossible anymore to get a rat-packer to listen.

This bill proposes that the minister be allowed the legislative authority necessary to dissolve Harbourfront Corporation. It says nothing about who will get the property, who will get management and control of the assets. What it does say is that the minister will have the legislative authority in order to take the steps that become necessary when the minister has concluded his negotiations that the hon. member knows are under way now with the province of Ontario and the municipalities to attempt to resolve the impasse that currently confronts the Harbourfront Corporation in its management of its affairs.

Whatever that negotiation produces, and one hopes in fact that the province of Ontario and the city will be able to get more public property than even the parklands that were originally promised, that little bit of public access parkland that was promised in the Harbourfront Corporation plan, that that negotiation will produce even more public access to the site.

The change that will be needed in law to allow the entity that Mr. Crombie recommends to manage that property is that the Harbourfront Corporation has to be legally dissolved in order to make the transfer to the new management body. I do not know, nor does the member know, what those negotiations will produce as the recommended solution. The member does know, however—

Mr. Mills: It will go to private development.

Mr. Bosley: No, the member makes an assumption that the lands get transferred to the private—

Mr. Mills: You assume otherwise.

Mr. Bosley: I make no such assumption. I make an assumption that there is a negotiation that has to go on and I am well aware, as the member is, that in order for the minister to implement the federal part of whatever that negotiation produces, this is the beginning of the legislative changes that are needed to do that, the end product of which must be greater control, locally. That is the ultimate objective that some of us have been fighting for 15 years to get.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, we understand the bias of the particular member. His family is in the real estate business. I am not suggesting his family would benefit in any way from the sale of the assets of Harbourfront. It reflects a particular point of view or a particular disposition in terms of the private sector being able to do certain things and to earn a lot of money as a result of the sale and disposition of assets that belong to the people of Canada.

If the hon. member has read the bill, he will know what is contained under section 40, subsection (2). In case he has not read it, I will read it for the public record:

> The Minister of Public Works may do all things and perform all acts necessary for or incidental to closing out the affairs of Harbourfront Corporation.

In other words, if this bill passes, the Minister of Public Works, without having to come back to Parliament, without having to receive the endorsation of this Parliament, may sell all the assets of Harbourfront to the private sector.

We on this side of the House are saying that it is the wrong move to take. If the national government no longer wishes to be involved with Harbourfront, we can accept that but on the condition this bill specifically says—and would the member not agree that it would be far more acceptable to his constituents and the people in the city of Toronto to have a very specific provision—that the assets of Harbourfront must be sold to either the city of Toronto, the municipality of metropolitan Toronto, or the province of Ontario. In that way the people of metropolitan Toronto can at least be guaranteed that there is still some opportunity for the public to exercise some control over the development of Harbourfront.

The member from Toronto knows that the Huang Danczkay mess that is there on Harbourfront is a disgrace to the city of Toronto. That is what would happen if Harbourfront were to be handed over to the private sector. The private sector is in business not to create green open space, not to create parkland, not to make the waterfront a nice place to be, but to make the big bucks.

Does the member support private developers, and in particular the real estate industry, making huge profits at the public expense and thereby destroying the waterfront and Harbourfront in Toronto?

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, there is nothing so revisionist as the Liberal mentality. Huang Danczkay got the site on which to build the shoddiest apartment buildings that were ever built at the time because of the rules imposed on the Harbourfront Corporation by the Liberal cabinet of the day. The city of Toronto was left no choice by the cabinet of the day if it wanted to have access for public use of the public park but that that project be approved. Those were the rules of the Harbourfront Corporation imposed by the Liberal cabinet of the day that many of us tried to stop.

The hon. member chooses to drag my family's name into it. Yes, my family is in the real estate business. We were also the longest serving directors of the Toronto Harbour Commission, and my grandfather was also the chairman for the longest number of years of anybody. I can tell the hon. member that not once in our professional lives did we take a fee or have anything to do with anything in the harbourfront for 14 years because we value it. One of the reasons I became involved in municipal politics was to try and stop what Liberals were then doing to my harbour.

For the member to suggest now that the destruction of the Harbourfront property was caused by anything other than the rules that were imposed by the Liberal cabinet is so revisionist it is beyond the pale. What we needed then and what we need now is the greatest possible local control of that site by local entity, however the players involved choose to negotiate the end product that will come out of those negotiations. I do not know whether it will be new a Crown corporation that is provincial or a new Crown corporation that is local. I do not know what it will be. It will be whatever the partners who are all government partners choose it to be. That is what this is designed to allow to happen.

I suppose I should not be surprised, but for Liberals who created this mess to ignore the heritage they created and say that somehow this is an attempt to turn it over to the private developers is unbelievable.

• (1050)

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is an extremely important debate about the future of waterfront. The member is a senior member of the Conservative Party. I seek unanimous consent of the House for other members to continue asking questions of the member from Toronto.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member. I guess the hon. member for Don Valley West should also be consulted.

If there is unanimous consent, I am ready to allow it. Is there a consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent is not given.

Mr. Nunziata: Let the record show that it was the member himself—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would not want to let the hon. member for York South—Weston impugn motives to the member for Don Valley West, because he is not the one who denied unanimous consent. I think the record should also show that.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You asked for the unanimous consent of members of the House, and I specifically saw the member for Don Valley West shake his head in the negative when you sought unanimous consent. You may have seen someone else say no on the Conservative side.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have not only seen other members. I heard a no and automatically if there is one no—and there was more than one—there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, first of all, I want to say that I am not one who is opposed to privatization in certain conditions. I am not one who is opposed to looking at Crown corporations and seeing if they have outlived their public purpose. If all of a sudden the private sector wants to get involved because it can do a better job, I have absolutely no problem with that.

I am also one, by the way, who is not running away from Harbourfront. I happen to believe that Harbourfront is a multicultural mecca. Sure, it has some flaws, but I think it is one of the finest people places in North America.

I think of many of the joint ventures between the Government of Canada and the private sector, such as the Queen's Quay, the first building that went up with Olympia and York. It was a great joint venture. During the special recovery program period during 1981–82, when times were so bad, we were able to add parking lots. We have a great antique market down there and a beautiful skating rink that people use during the winter. All of these are pluses.

Even though the processing of the apartments on Harbourfront is really questionable, I happen to think that Huang Danczkay who built these apartments in record time, with all of the problems, probably did not do a bad job. There were many great builders and developers that pulled Harbourfront up from absolutely nowhere and, in joint venture with the Government of Canada, made it one of the best people places in Canada with cultural and recreational events. The men and women who put it together over many years—Liberals, Tories, NDP—helped to make it a great place.

Where my problem comes in with this bill is that Harbourfront, as it is evolving right now, is doing a fabulous job. We cannot ignore the fact that the Government of Canada, with taxpayers' money to the tune of about $250 million that has been put into this place, is part of the reason it is so great.

Now all of a sudden we come along and we have Harbourfront running beautifully. We have people sensitized to the fact that there should be no more development down there. Even though sometimes we think that green space is the only way to make a people place, we can also have development and density. That can also create a people park. I am satisfied with that.

What I cannot understand is why this government is taking a jewel like this, our Harbourfront, putting a book value of $31 million on it, and putting it up for grabs. I am really trying hard to understand the point of the hon. member for Don Valley West, although I resent the fact that he calls me some kind of a rat packer, because that is not my traditional style. I am not taking anything away from my colleagues, because there are different styles.

However, it is absolute craziness to take a public piece of property that is probably worth $300 million and put a book value on it of $31 million. If they were to say that they were going to transfer it to the public sector specifically, because maybe the city or the province could do a better job, then I would not have as much of a problem with it. I am a centralist, and I think that the national government should have some say in what goes on there. It is not just for the people of Toronto; it is also for tourism and people who come to our city.

I have a very serious concern about this Harbourfront deal. The developers who put Harbourfront together, not taking anything away from their craftsmanship, are great people; but it is the same group that is basically now in charge of, owning and running Terminal 3. When I say "owning", I know there is a technical word here called a "lease". It is a 40-year lease with a 20-year option on the third largest airport in North America.

What concerns me is that this bill is so tricky, because we have wrap–ups of museums, constructions, corporations, and the Patent Act. In there is also the harbour lands of B.C. I am absolutely dismayed that the Minister of Justice is supporting this bill.

Pearson International last year made $70 million profit. That is before depreciation, and a lot of people say that it is being run poorly; in other words, that the private sector could come in and do a better job and increase the value. I give you that, Madam Speaker. Maybe the private sector could come in and do a better job.

It has been over 10 years. That is $1 billion worth of profit that the Government of Canada has traditionally used to help make sure the tarmac surfaces were maintained and make sure that smaller airports were maintained around this country.

Now what has the Government of Canada done? The Government of Canada has given to the private sector Terminal 3, which is really nothing more than a cash box for the private sector. Yes, it will pay a certain amount each year under the terms of the lease. I cannot get that lease from the Minister of Justice. I cannot get my hands on it. Nobody has seen it, and that is one of the problems that we have in this government.

If it is such a good deal for the taxpayer, why not put it on the table? Why not show that it is such a good deal. I have no problems if in fact the taxpayer is properly being served here. Then so be it. Let it be privatized. However, I have been told by experts who are assisting in that airport project that basically it is a private sector operation and that the Government of Canada has no control on how the public is being served. The public benefit could really go out the window here.

This is one of the reasons I have concern about the Harbourfront in Toronto. If we allow our Harbourfront to be in the hands of the private sector completely, with no government authority, and if we give away our national airport—not just Terminal 3, as the Minister of Transport announced the other day—what will happen? This is not an optional use facility. This is a facility the public must use. I do not mind if it is an optional facility that the private sector can run better. That is fine, but this is not an optional use facility. It is a facility that the public has to use, and it is 50 per cent of the nation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but he will be able to continue later.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TRIBUTE TO DR. JULES BRODEUR

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, today I wish to pay tribute to a great resident of Montreal North, Dr. Jules Brodeur, who was awarded the Prix de la Recherche en santé et en sécurité du travail by the Institute of the same name. This week, Dr. Brodeur was selected as personality of the week by the Montreal newspaper La Presse.

Dr. Brodeur, who founded the Department of Occupational Health at the University of Montreal, is a professor at the School of Medicine of the University of Montreal. Dr. Brodeur continues Montreal's great medical tradition, following the footsteps of famous medical researchers like Hans Selye, Jacques Genest and Paul David. Congratulations, Dr. Brodeur!

HERITAGE LANGUAGES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, the federal government's decision to seriously reduce support for the heritage languages program last spring has badly hurt the operation of many heritage language schools across Canada. Every child in a heritage language program is now feeling the effect of those cut–backs.

The establishment of a multimillion Heritage Languages Institute will in no way make up for the withdrawal of these basic life line funds for these schools. A non–partisan rally for heritage languages will be held on Parliament Hill at noon tomorrow, sponsored by the heritage language schools of eastern Ontario. A similar demonstration will be held at the same time in Saskatoon.

Across Canada heritage language schools are struggling to keep classes operating and to share their knowledge, languages and cultures with all Canadians. Heritage language programs are an investment in a global future for all Canadians.

All members of Parliament are urged to show their support and attend the rally for heritage languages on Parliament Hill at noon tomorrow.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, at this very moment, during Small Business Week 1990, Canadian entrepreneurs are facing a series of complex challenges. All those interested in the small business sector will have to pool their expertise, experience and foresight to gain an understanding of what we can expect in the years to come.

Madam Speaker, international markets, international competition and increasingly demanding consumers merely accentuate the problems facing small business.

With this in mind, in 1984 our government introduced its economic renewal program. As a result, we have made tremendous progress in creating new job opportunities, thanks to tax reform, deregulation and the abolition of trade barriers. The government's, challenge in the years to come will be to continue economic renewal, and businesses will have to adjust, to take advantage of the many new opportunities that will be available.

DAVID IRVING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, David Irving is speaking across Canada and will be in Ottawa at the Ottawa Congress Centre next month. He is spreading a message that the holocaust was a fabrication.

David Irving testified on behalf of Ernst Zundel that Nazi Germany had no official policy on the extermination of Jews and he doubted six million Jews were systematically killed.

Such holocaust denial is offensive to all Jews and to anyone who supports fundamental human rights and is bound to engender hostility towards some Canadians. Therefore, I especially question the appropriateness of providing Mr. Irving with a platform in a building owned by the government and operated at public expense.

I do not know whether Mr. Irving is a racist, but in my estimation he is certainly not an historian, and does not deserve our attention, but instead our condemnation.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, Small Business Week recognizes and encourages the entrepreneurial spirit of thousands of Canadians who operate a small business in our country. This year's theme, Quality and Productivity: The Competitive Edge is most appropriate.

Small businesses are the cornerstone of the Canadian economy. They are the main source of new ideas and new wealth, and account for three-quarters of the jobs created in Canada in the past few years.

Small Business Week is highlighted by such activities as trade fairs, exhibitions, information sessions, conferences and award presentations in every region of Canada.

I will be attending an award presentation in my riding of St. Albert on October 27. The Chamber of Commerce will be presenting an award to the St. Albert businessman of the year. I am proud to recognize the men and women who, through their small businesses, contribute so much to the nation's prosperity.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, as the sun sets on Small Business Week, the darkness is closing on small business in Canada. High interest rates, free trade and the GST are all succeeding in driving more and more entrepreneurs out of business.

As we see a growing number of businesses go into receivership or bankruptcy, we have to ask ourselves where we will find the entrepreneurial spirit the government has talked about.

Will we find it in the small one and two-person firms whose operators do not have the will to continue in the face of becoming unpaid GST tax collectors for the federal government?

Will we find it in the furniture manufacturers who have gone broke?

Will we find it in the retailers along the U.S. border who are closing their shops because they can no longer compete with the Americans?

Will we find it in the hospitality industry which is already overburdened with taxation by this greedy government?

I strongly fear that the only spirit will be the ghost of small business, small business which has been killed by this government's policies.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, potato farmers in New Brunswick are facing a disaster. Heavy rains and wet weather this fall have placed this $70 million industry in jeopardy. As thousands of acres of potatoes lie rotting in the ground, as much as one-quarter of the crop is already lost.

The New Brunswick potato agency estimates that 20 per cent of those involved in the industry in my riding will be unable to survive this severe economic blow. At this time, we do not know what the cumulative loss will be, but we do know with certainty that difficulties lie ahead. We will be looking for a joint effort between the federal and provincial governments to assist.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in an agreement reached between the province of Ontario and the federal government, the province recently announced that it will provide reserve land at no cost to the federal government for the six Ontario bands who have been fighting for reserve status since 1985.

The announcement is good news for the six bands, since they have been living in conditions not unlike those found in Third World countries. There is no running water, no indoor plumbing, no schools in some cases, no electricity, no telephone service and the housing is well below standard.

The only thing separating these communities from improved living conditions is the final approval by the federal cabinet. Cabinet approval of the agreement will provide the funding necessary to provide the residents of Kee-way-win, Wawakapewin, Saugeen, New Slate Falls, McDowell Lake and Aroland with the infrastructure they so desperately need.

Madam Speaker, I call on the Minister of Indian Affairs to press full steam ahead in order to ensure that cabinet approval is given by the end of the year. The government has to live up to the commitment it made on September 25 if it wants to demonstrate some good faith.

BILL C-43

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice has said over and over again that a federal abortion law is needed to "occupy the field", to ensure that the provinces do not pass their own abortion laws.

Well, 17 of 18 constitutional experts disagreed. The New Democratic Party and the majority of the witnesses before the legislative committee on Bill C-43 disagreed. Now, the Nova Scotia courts have also told her she is wrong.

In the absence of any federal legislation being enacted, the Nova Scotia courts have, not surprisingly, decided that a province cannot pass legislation outside its jurisdiction.

I call on the Senate to be less obtuse than the Minister of Justice, to listen to the experts, to the courts, and to common sense, and defeat this bad legislation.

I also call on the Minister of Justice in the event that this bill is passed through the Senate, to wake up to the facts and not proclaim the bill.

The increasing lack of access to services in the face of this bill is devastating. Hanging on to wrong conclusions in the face of overwhelming—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member's time has now expired.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I wish to offer my support to the comprehensive five-year plan for Canada's immigration policy announced yesterday.

In the tragic circumstances of poverty and homelessness for millions of people which we witness in so many places in the world today, surely our intentions to moderately increase our annual immigration levels by 50,000, a 20 per cent increase over five years, will be generously received and supported by all Canadians.

While Canada is noted for its humanitarian principles, there is also a basic demographic reality which immigration serves in this country, the sustaining of our own population levels so essential to our economic viability as a nation. Some experts advise that we should be taking in 1 per cent of our population each year just to keep our total population constant.

The new five-year plan, even with the increases, falls short of that minimum goal. Immigration is part of the challenge for a national commitment to multiculturalism. Together those qualities help to make Canada a richer nation in all respects.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, here we are, at the eve of the second world climate conference in Geneva, and Canada has no position on carbon dioxide pollution reduction. Other countries have, but not Canada.

Why is the Minister of the Environment so reluctant? Is he afraid to give leadership? Is cabinet undecided because it is divided? Who pulls the strings? Is it the minister of energy, who believes that oil companies are philanthropists, operating in the public interest? While he fiddles, other nations are taking firm positions on cutting carbon dioxide pollution.

We are not giving leadership to the global community. No longer are our international positions, from Iraq to carbon dioxide pollution finalized in Ottawa. Alas, Madam Speaker, the Tory government takes its cues from the White House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, this past week more and more Canadians are applauding the long-awaited passage of Bill C-21, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

These much-needed amendments improve the program's ability to help Canadian workers adjust to change.

Madam Speaker, the Canadian public increasingly appreciates the need for a well-trained workforce. They realize the need for a new attitude and approach to labour force training. Our workers deserve a national training effort which better meets the demands posed by structural and technological advancements.

Under Bill C-21, the commitment of an additional $800 million to training is another step in the right direction. To all Canadians I believe that it reflects our pursuit of an effective national training effort, as well as our commitment to helping Canadians find and keep jobs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, remember away back when the Prime Minister announced that a centre for sustainable development was to be opened in Winnipeg with a grant of $85 million dollars?

It all sounded so promising, the nation with the highest per capita energy use was going to do something of value. But somewhere along the way the wheels fell off. Funding for the centre turned out to be only $5 million and, as a constituent stated in a letter to me, the original proposal was reduced to tokenism and the concern with the environment tagged as rhetoric. As if that was not bad enough, the government announced a grant of $88 million toward construction of an opera house in Toronto, which makes you wonder about this government's priorities.

I will give the last word to my constituent, who said in his letter to me: "Surely if money is available for a house of pleasure, then it should be available for a research centre that can help solve some of the world's environmental problems".

PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I was most pleased to hear of the imminent closure of the Kingston Penitentiary for Women. I would like to acknowledge the Solicitor General's diligence in this area and express gratitude on behalf of the women prisoners and their families.

I am sure that we can all empathize with the extra pain suffered by these women and their families as a result of this separation.

The creation of five new facilities for federally sentenced women located across the country is a humanitarian measure that is long overdue. While the changes came too late for some, who saw no way out of the situation but suicide, there is new hope for others. I am hoping that when the minister makes his decision on the locations of the facilities, that he takes Saskatchewan into consideration. Saskatchewan is centrally located within the prairie provinces.

The economic boost created by the construction, upkeep and employment of this facility would be greatly appreciated. More importantly, the need to keep a reasonable proximity between the women and their families is of paramount interest to the citizens of my home province.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, Italian Canadians, Chinese Canadians and Ukrainian Canadians are getting very tired of waiting for the Prime Minister to apologize for injustices that were perpetrated on innocent victims earlier in this century. This is important to our history.

Since 1983, we have been calling on the government to acknowledge the unjust Chinese head tax and Chinese Exclusion Act, which was deliberate racist legislation, separating families for several generations.

Ukrainian Canadians were unjustly interned during the First World War, in 26 concentrations camps across Canada, yet few Canadians are aware of this.

During World War II, hundreds of Italian Canadians were labelled enemy aliens, separated from families and imprisoned. German Canadians suffered similar injustices.

These injustices would never be tolerated under today's charter of rights. They are shameful events in our history. I call on the Prime Minister to acknowledge each of these injustices against fellow Canadians on behalf of all Canadians.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, during Small Business Week, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the contribution made by small businesses in the riding of Drummond, where leadership and entrepreneurship are a way of life.

As the cornerstone of the Canadian economy, small businesses generate new ideas and are a new source of wealth. Furthermore, they have created nearly three-quarters of the jobs in recent years.

Thanks to the agenda for economic renewal introduced by the Conservative government in 1984, tremendous progress has been made in creating new job opportunities as a result of tax reform, deregulation and the suppression of trade barriers.

Madam Speaker, Canadian entrepreneurs should take advantage of every opportunity they are offered to become even more competitive, innovative and creative, in order to meet the challenges of the 90s.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in his absence, for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canada was prepared to use force against Iraq, to take part in military action of an offensive nature, without there first being a United Nations resolution approving such action. Today there are reports that the United States is sending another 100,000 troops to the Persian Gulf.

I ask the Prime Minister, is there a pattern here? Is Canada part of a co-ordinated action with the United States to escalate the tensions in the Persian Gulf, and is it doing this without first consulting and getting the approval of our House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, Canada is part of a co-ordinated group of like-minded nations that seek the enforcement of the resolution of the Security Council of the United Nations. We have been part of this group quite properly from the beginning and we would propose to remain there.

What we are doing is enforcing, or seeking the enforcement of, a series of unanimous resolutions, passed by the Security Council of which Canada is a member.

I am quite astonished that the Leader of the Opposition, whose party has supported the general approach of the government, would seek to question it today.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the approach that we have supported, and which is stated in the resolution of the House, is in support of United Nations' resolutions condemning Iraqi aggression and the use of sanctions to roll back that aggression.

For weeks now, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been telling Canadians that these sanctions are an effective way of rolling back Iraqi aggression against Kuwait and that we must give those sanctions time to work. Yesterday in the House the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs certainly created the impression that Canada had decided that sanctions were not working and was giving up on them.

Why does the government appear to have reached the conclusion that sanctions are not working? What is the evidence for this? Is this conclusion also that of all the other countries which worked to have the resolutions adopted at the United Nation to create the system of sanctions to deter and roll back Iraqi aggression?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, obviously everyone in the House knows that the question of the Leader of the Opposition is both a distortion of what the Secretary of State said yesterday and a distortion of the statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of the government over the last two months.

In point of fact, the Secretary of State never said the sanctions are not working, and the Secretary of State did not begin yesterday to point out to members of the House the difficulties inherent in seeking the enforcement of UN resolutions.

Indeed, on October 15, some two weeks ago, the Secretary of State for External Affairs wrote to the spokespeople for external affairs of the Official Opposition parties and said, and I quote: "At the same time, I have also made it clear that if President Hussein does not withdraw from Kuwait, in the face of the unprecedented international consensus and under the pressure of sanctions, he must understand the willingness of the world to take further actions, including military action. Canada is prepared to consider, with its Security Council colleagues, what the next steps might be."

The Secretary of State spelled it out very clearly two weeks ago. I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition expresses the view that this was newly minted information yesterday, when it has been government policy all along.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister quoted the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada would be willing to consider other action with its Security Council colleagues. That can only mean as part of United Nations action.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said clearly that Canada was ready to take offensive action against Iraq, even though there was no decision first by the United Nations.

In this House yesterday, Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that the government is considering the possibility of sending our troops in offensive action against Iraq, without the approval of the United Nations. That was quite clear, yet the Prime Minister said exactly the contrary when he quoted from a letter of the Secretary of State a few weeks ago.

So I ask the Prime Minister whether he can assure Canadians today that should he decide to involve Canadian troops in offensive action against Iraq, without the sanction of the United Nations, he will not make such a decision without first consulting with and securing the approval of this House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in addition to the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs which I have just quoted in English, two weeks ago he also advised the opposition as follows: "It stands to reason that in critical times the situation may evolve very rapidly and require immediate action. As you may recall, on September 24 last I said in the House that if there were any change in the gulf situation the government would confer with Parliament." The Leader of the Opposition may claim to be surprised by these statements, but two weeks ago the Secretary of State did say in writing, and I am sure Madam Speaker will allow me to read his statement: "But at the same time I made it quite clear that, if Saddam Hussein does not yield when faced with the unprecedented international consensus which now prevails and with the pressure of sanctions taken against him, he should expect the world community to resort to other measures, including military action. Along with other countries belonging to the Security Council, Canada is prepared to consider what these measures might be."

What the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday was fully consistent with his earlier statements.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question as well for the Prime Minister.

This morning I was in telephone contact with Mrs. Joyce Scobery, whose husband is presently being detained in Iraq, and with Mr. Shiraz Rustom, whose elderly parents are being held against their will in that country. They speak for all those Canadians who have family, loved ones and relatives in Kuwait or Iraq. I want to say to the Prime Minister that they do not understand why the government is not prepared to take special measures to release their families or loved ones. The present system is not working.

In light of the plea, the request of these families, and in light of the failure so far to gain release of their relatives, will the Prime Minister consent to send a special envoy, a special emissary, a group of parliamentarians, in order to sit down with the Iraqis and negotiate and discuss the release of Canadians who are presently at risk?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, of all of the Canadians who were in Kuwait on August 2, only 3 per cent now remain.

My hon. friend says that he was in conversation this morning with some Canadians. He concluded by saying that they speak for all Canadians held in Iraq.

Last night on The National on the CBC, there were a number of Canadians living in Baghdad interviewed by the CBC. Those who were interviewed said that it would be inappropriate and unacceptable in their judgment for Canada to take action that would diminish the solidarity of the allies in seeking—

Mr. Arseneault: One was censored, Brian.

Mr. Mulroney: One was censored who was trying to get out the message that it would be unacceptable to diminish the solidarity of the allies in trying to bring pressure on Saddam Hussein.

My hon. friends may want to examine the transcripts of last night's television program, but those people were certainly speaking in quite a different way from the suggestions of my hon. friend.

What we are ready to do, of course, is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has repeatedly said. We will examine all options to be helpful to those Canadians who are there. We will seek to do so in a manner that does not diminish the effectiveness or the solidarity of the members of the United Nations Security Council that put together and voted unanimously in favour of a simple, straightforward resolution that calls upon a dictator and an aggressor to withdraw from an innocent country.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. First, I want to have the Prime Minister confirm that it is true that our present Canadian Ambassador in Iraq has not even had his credentials yet accepted by the Iraqi government and therefore, his ability to undertake direct negotiations is limited.

I would also like him to confirm what the Secretary of State said in the House yesterday, that, in fact, he, the Prime Minister, and President Bush had discussed this question of hostages in Iraq during a telephone conversation one or two days ago. It is clear that success of the emissaries of other countries has been working. It remains a question why we are not doing the same.

Specifically, is the government not undertaking special measures to get Canadians out of Iraq and Kuwait because President Bush asked it not to?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, even my left wing, anti-American friend from Winnipeg knows that that is a completely false suggestion. He knows full well. I will not even dignify that part of what is really a spurious and unacceptable suggestion by a distinguished parliamentarian. I know that, upon reflection, my friend from Winnipeg is going to want to withdraw that kind of suggestion.

The other question was in regard to the effectiveness of the Canadian ambassador whose credentials are questioned by my hon. friend and who was on television last night as well. The Canadian ambassador in Baghdad said that he was working effectively and well, and that he was the representative of the Government of Canada in terms of dealing with the question of the hostages. I concluded from his intervention that he thought it was going well and that other interventions would be unhelpful.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister as well.

On August 25, the United Nations passed the resolution supporting an economic blockade against Iraq. The Canadian government sent troops and ships to support that economic blockade.

On Wednesday night, media reports indicated that the blockade was working. On Thursday, the minister responsible for external affairs decided to up the ante, through his inflammatory language, and suggested that Canada would undertake military action without reference to United Nations and without the approval of Parliament. The question that Canadians are asking and that I ask the Prime Minister is this. Is it the policy of the Canadian government to undertake unilateral offensive action with the United States without the approval of the UN Security Council?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed the matter in a given context, one of which dimensions implied a possible veto by another or other members of the Security Council.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been deploying his personal efforts and those of his department here and around the world, looking for a peaceful solution to what is a very serious matter. At no time has he "upped the ante", to quote my hon. friend. What he has done is repeated what he conveyed to the spokesperson for External Affairs for my hon. friend's party two weeks ago that there are some very serious consequences that flow from this kind of action and, in a realistic manner, Canada, along with our allies which support the United Nations, must be prepared to envisage those consequences.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, a supplementary to the Prime Minister. I would say to the Prime Minister that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said to the committee that Canada would use force against Iraq, with or without Security Council approval. I ask the Prime Minister again, is it the policy of the Canadian government to enter into unilateral offensive action with the United States without the approval of the UN Security Council and without the approval of this Parliament?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in the communication that was sent to my hon. friend's party on October 15, the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated very clearly that there would be consultation obviously with the House of Commons. That was very clear cut.

With regard to the statement of yesterday, in its proper context it is fully consistent with the earlier statement set out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Simply put, Canada seeks, along with other members of the Security Council and the 150 members of the United Nations who have endorsed the Security Council position, the respect of the Security Council resolution which calls upon Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait. It is an innocent country that has been a victim of aggression. We hope that the Security Council resolution can be fully implemented.

We are now part of an effort to bring all possible pressure on Saddam Hussein in regard to this, and Canada will maintain that position.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the minister responsible for external affairs said in this House that he would not necessarily ask for Parliament's approval for going to war. He said at page 14692 of Hansard that we cannot always wait, in reference to parliamentary approval.

There is, however, another serious question and that is the question of the hostages in Iraq.

Yesterday's inflammatory statements by the Minister of External Affairs may have some serious consequences for the safety of Canadians being kept hostage in Iraq. Other countries have shown a great deal of prudence and discretion. That is not the case with the Canadian minister who seems to have completely forgotten that the hostages, situation is a precarious one. My question to the Prime Minister is as follows: what does the government intend to do to guarantee the safety of Canadian hostages in Iraq?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this respect have been explained at length, not only in a communication from the minister to the hon. member's party on October 15 but also yesterday, in committee, and during Question Period yesterday afternoon. There is no contradiction, none at all, between the position Canada has defended since the beginning of the crisis and the position taken by the Secretary of State yesterday. Only 2 per cent of the Canadians who were in Kuwait on August 2 are still there today. This means that Canada has been very effective in getting Canadian nationals out of the country, does it not?

As for the remaining— Last night, on CBC television, we saw Canadian men and women, including a nurse from Nova Scotia and another Canadian citizen, who seemed to be giving us the message that the Canadian government's policy was appropriate and that they would not approve of sending a special Canadian envoy to Baghdad to more or less beg the president of Iraq to free Canadian nationals.

As for discretion and prudence, I think that Canada's policy has been not only prudent but effective, ever since the beginning of this crisis. We intend to maintain the same firmness and vigour, and in doing so, we will ask for the co-operation of the hon. member and her party.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Visa fees charged by her department for family members are now $250. Yesterday, the minister said that part of the cost of her five-year plan would be paid for through a cost-recovery program. Since the family class comes off worst in her plan, could the minister give this group the assurance that visa fees will not be increased?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is important for this government and for the country to cover immigration costs with new fees, and there are no guarantees for any class. However, we feel it is very important for people who come to Canada to have services, and those services must be paid for.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, the minister has just stated that only the rich will be able to enter Canada.

[English]

According to yesterday's announcement, the minister wants to put immigration in line with planned immigration levels. Is she introducing for the first time in Canada an immigration quota system?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have no quarrel with what we are doing in terms of planning to the levels that we have outlined for the next five years. The hon. member can call it anything that he would like to call it, but what we have is universal access to Canada under different kinds of categories. In order to provide the services that we want to provide for new immigrants to Canada, it is our intention to make sure that the system is managed to the planned levels.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last February, I asked the minister to explain how the GST would impact on aboriginal people who are not covered under the Indian Act, essentially those who are off the reserves.

On August 22, I wrote to the Minister of Finance but received no response. I ask the minister today what the Department of Finance is doing with the treatment of the GST for native people who live off reserves or for a community where there is a mixture of status and non-status Indians. How can he implement a discriminatory tax system where some will pay taxes and others will not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the interest of my hon. friend in this matter. I have been having, either directly or through my officials, ongoing consultations with members of the native communities. When we have a resolution of these discussions, I will be able to make an announcement.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

I have just returned from an all-chiefs meeting in the Atlantic with my colleague from Western Arctic. One of the resolutions that was passed was with respect to the goods and services tax. The chiefs unanimously agreed that the tax is a direct infringement of the first nations' inherent treaty rights.

Will the minister admit the proposed tax is a violation of aboriginal rights and a breach of the federal duty to protect these rights? Further, how can the minister implement a tax that will directly contravene aboriginal tax immunity?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the statement the hon. member has just made as it relates to the goods and services tax. I will tell him, as I told his colleague, that we are having discussions with members of the aboriginal communities and we are trying to find ways to meet the objectives and concerns they have. When we have a resolution of these discussions, I will have an announcement to make.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of the Environment.

Yesterday, the Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan brought down a very disappointing decision on the Rafferty-Alameda project. It has been three weeks since the panel resigned and now the court has refused an interim injunction and delayed its decision for another week.

This government has continually mishandled the issue and has allowed the province of Saskatchewan to defy court orders and the federal licence.

Why will this government not end this farce and use its power under section 13.1 of the Environment Act to suspend the licence?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, permit me to answer on behalf of the minister, who is in western Canada today meeting with western ministers.

To refresh my hon. friend's memory, there was an agreement in January that work at the dam site should proceed while a panel is being appointed to study the matter and examine mitigated measures that would have to be implemented to bring the structure within the conformity of safety since work had already begun.

In September, Saskatchewan attempted to amend that agreement to allow the completion of the dam while the panel makes its finding. Of course, the minister could not agree to that. Therefore, he suspended any federal payments to the project and took the matter to court. My hon. friend has indicated what the court has decided to do. There is a delay of a week, but certainly a court injunction is ordered by the federal government.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

This government cannot hide behind a January agreement which Premier Grant Devine has declared null and void. I was in the courtroom in Saskatoon yesterday, and federal lawyers admitted that the minister made an agreement with the premier of Saskatchewan on September 5. This was after the minister stood in the House on October 12 and told me he did not make such an agreement. Certainly the judge's decision hinged on an agreement, otherwise he would have had no choice but to grant the injunction.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is there an agreement, written or verbal, between the federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan that overrides the January agreement?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, there was not an agreement of September 5. The agreement and understanding under which the minister is acting and by which he has approached the court dates to the January agreement. There is no agreement that could provide the minister or the Saskatchewan government anything different than what was agreed to in January.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns qyestions specific to immigration in Quebec, which since 1978 has been governed by the Couture-Cullen Agreement.

Considering that some time ago, Quebec submitted a draft proposal for adapting the 1978 agreement to the realities of the 90s, could the minister inform the House whether an agreement with Quebec is imminent, so that the province can implement immigration and integration policies and programs that are in line with Quebec's distinct identity?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House yesterday and Tuesday, it is unfortunate that there can be no constitutional agreements of the kind planned under the Meech Lake Accord. The government is still looking at the situation, but there are a number of new factors that must be considered, as the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, in committee, we learned from the Deputy Minister of Employment that the made-in-Canada recession we are in will increase the projected deficit on the UI account to the end of 1992 by an additional $1 billion, that is over and above the $3 billion that was forecast last April.

Given that his government has withdrawn from the UI program with the passage of Bill C-21, will the Minister of Finance tell this House how he plans to meet this additional shortfall caused by his policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend will go back to Bill C-21, he will see that there is a stated rate there for a three-year period for the unemployment insurance premiums. That is the basis of our planning and, if there is any shortfall, then this will be made up by the government.

This is the basis on which we have proposed the different elements of Bill C-21.

[Translation]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. She knows that, before Bill C-21, self-employed fishermen's benefits came from the government's general funds. At this time of crisis in the Atlantic fishery, can she assure this House that fishermen will not be abandoned? Can she promise us today that fishermen will not have to pay for the recession created by her government's policies and that their benefits will not be cut?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, let me say that we have never abandoned the self-employed fishermen in Atlantic Canada.

Clearly we will be looking at the kind of emergency measures that are needed, as we have before. Indeed, the fishing regulations, as the member knows, are not affected by Bill C–21 at all. The minister of fisheries and myself are working very closely on the kinds of measures that are needed in Atlantic Canada.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last year the Prime Minister assured me and this House that he would discuss the lobster size restrictions being suggested in the United States with President Bush. Then we got the free trade panel saying that the United States could do this, that is impose a size on lobster for import into the United States.

At present we have the Minister for International Trade with an understanding, by some people in the U.S. industry and Canadian industry, saying that there has to be a further restriction. That is an industry proposal. It goes against all lobster fishermen's interests.

Will the Prime Minister ask the Minister for International Trade to reject this proposal, this understanding, which his own minister of fisheries has said is a trade restriction on the fisheries? Will he have his Minister for International Trade reject the proposal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it has been very clear that the position of the government has been to defend, to the best of our ability, the interests of the lobster fishermen. That has been what the Minister for International Trade has done with great vigour over the period of time that he has been the Minister for International Trade.

My hon. friend raises some specifics of this particular matter. I will draw those to the attention of the Minister for International Trade, and he will get back to her as soon as possible.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I thank the Minister of Finance for the informative answer that he will talk to the Minister for International Trade. Perhaps it is the same way that interest in other matters in this House has been brought to his attention and nothing done. I presume it should be done immediately.

My question for the Prime Minister concerns the lucrative lobster fishery in the Bay of Fundy which starts in the month of November. They are uncertain as to what size they can fish, what type of trap they can fish with. We are not talking about the U.S. import restrictions. We are talking about catching lobsters in Canada and selling them in Canada and to other countries aside from the United States, which we have done very well.

Will this government reject, without delay, the proposal that is before the minister of trade which he may bring before Carla Hills later but after the lobster fishery starts?

The lobster industry needs to know and not have the uncertainty that this government has created when its own minister of fisheries has said it would be a trade restriction on our own people that is not necessary.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend speaks of a proposal that is before the Minister for International Trade.

I have all the minister's briefing notes. There is no such proposal. There may be a proposal in the United States, as there always is, to seek advantage for fishermen in the United States. We are not officially dealing with such a proposal and, if it comes forward, the Minister for International Trade and the minister of fisheries will do what they have always done, that is, protect with all their energy and in the best interests of Canada the interests of our fishermen.

JOHNSON MATTHEY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

On Monday of this week the Johnson Matthey company, a British firm controlled by the South African Anglo-American Corporation, announced that it was "restructuring" and, effective December 31, "relocating" its high-tech electronic materials development and manufacturing plant from Trail, B.C. to Spokane, Washington in the U.S.A., with the loss of some 95 highly skilled Canadian jobs—space age jobs—within a small B.C. community.

This closure and job loss occur less than two years since January 1989, when the then minister and Investment Canada approved the sale of this former Cominco division to Johnson Matthey amidst widespread public assurances that Johnson Matthey had purchased a 125-year lease and had no intention of moving the plant.

What action has the minister taken to ensure that Johnson Matthey lives up to the commitments which it presumably made to Investment Canada and his government only 22 months ago? What specifically were those commitments, and what is he doing to keep these high-tech jobs in Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I want to say first that we are of course always sensitive to a community like Trail, which will lost about 90 high-tech jobs. My friend is right, but he knows very well that the problem is that there is a decline in the demand for that kind of production in Trail, particularly for the military industry.

For that reason the company has decided to rationalize its operations. Obviously if there is any commitment which was made—

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Define rationalization in Canada.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Madam Speaker, perhaps members are not interested, but I believe the workers in Trail are, absolutely.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): If any commitment was made by the department of industry with that company, the officials of the department will check everything that has been signed. Once again, if the commitments are not respected, the department will do what it did with a company by the name of Varity, that he totally agreed with. In other words we made a deal, and we will try to have the same kind of commitment.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, when it comes to the commitment, I did give the minister's office some notice of this question yesterday. I would hope that he would by now know if there were commitments or not.

There is also the matter of some $3 million in Canadian and U.S. research and development funds that went to that firm in recent years. Even if the government got no guarantee from Johnson Matthey in return for Investment Canada's approval, or value for the R and D funds, will the minister at least accept that the government has a moral obligation and a clear responsibility to these 95 Canadians who are losing their jobs to the U.S. and make a specific commitment to the communities of Trail and Warfield to help develop new alternative productive employment opportunities on the Johnson Matthey site.

Does he accept that responsibility? Has he done anything? Will he do anything? What and when?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I want to make a little correction first. Part of the production will be moving to Victoria, British Columbia.

An hon. member: Small.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Yes, small, but it is there. It is better than nothing, sir.

Second, once again a lot of help could be provided, particularly by my colleague the Minister for Employment and Immigration. We are always open.

Mrs. McDougall: Right, absolutely.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Every day we do different kinds of negotiations with those workers and the companies. Normally we find the answer.

My friend said that he gave me notice of the question yesterday. It is because I am serious that not interested in giving an answer which means nothing today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Dr. Nguyen Dan Que, a medical doctor whose two brothers are in the gallery today from Montreal—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Kilgour: His works have been sponsored by the World Health Organization. He has been imprisoned now for 10 years in Vietnam.

I wonder if the minister on behalf of her colleague would tell the House what if anything has been done or is being done to try to win the liberation of that distinguished doctor.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to respond to the question of the hon. member.

As he will know, the human rights situation in Vietnam has improved over the last few years with major amnesties in 1988 involving more than 5,000 political prisoners, but the government has not relaxed its efforts for improvement.

As the hon. member also knows, the Canadian Ambassador to Vietnam is resident in Bangkok. He raises specific issues and our general Canadian concerns with respect to human rights on each visit to Hanoi. These visits take place two to three times a year.

The most recent example of direct Canadian representation on human rights matters took place in September of this year, during a visit to Hanoi, by the Canadian Ambassador, and the case of Dr. Que was raised at that time.

The Vietnamese response quite predictably was that human rights matters were a question of internal affairs for Vietnam. At the next opportunity the ambassador will press the Vietnamese on the case of Dr. Que and, in particular, will seek to obtain information on his health.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Order.

Some hon. members: Order.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I understand that the hon. member and representatives from the Vietnamese community in Canada will be meeting with officials of the Department of External Affairs this afternoon. I know that they will have helpful suggestions to make, as well as an opportunity to be fully briefed on the situation.

RAFFERTY–ALAMEDA PROJECT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In court yesterday Justice Department lawyers confirmed that there was an "agreement to agree" between the Minister of the Environment and Premier Grant Devine on the Rafferty–Alameda project.

Now that the Acting Minister of the Environment has denied what the lawyers said in court yesterday, I ask the Prime Minister: Is there an agreement, formal or informal? What does it consist of?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I can only reiterate what the minister has said on several occasions in the House in response to this question. There was no agreement in September that would have in any way modified the memorandum of understanding, the agreement that was arrived at in January.

The Government of Saskatchewan asked for a two–week delay in the court proceedings to put its case. A one–week delay was granted.

I know that my hon. friend would agree that we should allow the court to make its determination, and the minister will act accordingly.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, for over two weeks now we have heard the premier of Saskatchewan say there was a handshake deal. We have heard the Minister of the Environment deny it. We have heard a lawyer acting on behalf of our Justice Department and the Minister of the Environment say in court that there was a deal.

Canadians and this Parliament have a right to the answer on this question. Will the Prime Minister clear the air now and table all documents and records of whatever kind relating to discussions between the premier of Saskatchewan and the Minister of the Environment, or their officials, so that Canadians can learn the truth?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, with respect, I do not believe that the judge, as the hon. member says, made any statement yesterday that there was or was not an agreement. The judge just simply granted a stay of the proceedings for one week. The Minister of the Environment, who was to have met with Premier Devine and others on September 5, obviously would be the best authority to know. He said repeatedly inside and outside the House that there was not an agreement. He did indicate what the province of Saskatchewan was seeking, that the dam should proceed while the panel proceeds with its work. But that was not agreed to.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. A year ago tomorrow he received the report on the northern and isolated tax allowance. He has done nothing in that one year.

A number of communities have lost their northern tax benefit. It has been phased out over the last three years. As of January 1, 1991 thousands of communities will lose the northern tax benefit. When will the minister introduce a fair regime of taxation for all northern residents? When will he finally make a promise to assure these people that they are being treated fairly by the tax system in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not think it is accurate to say that I have done nothing. In fact, we have spent a fair amount of time consulting with various people who are affected and who do have a view on the particular proposals that were put out by the Brunelle task force. We have listened very carefully and are in the course of formulating our final thinking on this. I would hope to have a decision to announce soon.

POLYTECHNICAL SCHOOL VICTIMS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Last December in Montreal, the killing of 14 female students shocked the whole country. The Canadian Association of University Teachers submitted to the government two proposals to establish scholarships in memory of these victims. The Minister of Science wrote back to assure the Association of his support and co-operation in finding the money to implement its proposals.

Madam Speaker, this letter was written in May and nothing has been done so far. I want to ask the Minister when he will establish these scholarships in memory of the 14 female students?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we continue to work with a variety of organizations who have put forward some very creative and interesting proposals on scholarships for women in engineering, both at l'École Polytechnique and at other universities across the country. I have met with the Canadian Association of University Teachers to discuss these proposals, with my colleague the Minister of Science, and discussions are ongoing with NRC to ensure that we will have a proposal for scholarships which will be appropriate. I hope we will be able to come forward with announcements in the near future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of residents from my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Most of them live in the beautiful town of Hawkesbury I remember talking to you about, Madam Speaker.

These people are opposed, and understandably so, to the GST that the Conservative government wants to impose, and I support them wholeheartedly.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, to follow up the question I asked in Question Period today, I have a petition to present signed by residents of northern Canada with regard to the need for a real tax benefit to recognize the high cost of living and working in areas described as northern or isolated.

Whereas the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas released one year ago fails to address these realities, the undersigned call upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the report and to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program which recognizes the financial needs of the people of northern and isolated areas.

This petition is signed by approximately 600 people, many from The Pas, Manitoba but also from the communities of Wanless, Snow Lake, Thompson and Sherridon, and in addition the communities of Swan River and Birch River and Birch River in the Dauphin—Swan River constituency.

Madam Speaker, as you and other members are aware, a number of communities in northern Alberta, northern Quebec and northern Ontario have signed similar petitions and want the government to act now.

GANNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from the residents of Grand Manan Island protesting the destaffing of the Gannet Rock lighthouse, which has been with us since 1831.

This is just one of many petitions that I have presented on this very topic. I am very pleased to present this on behalf of the residents of Grand Manan. This petition is duly signed and recorded.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition to this House. Your petitioners object to the GST on books and newspapers.

[English]

This GST on books, magazines and newspapers is a tax on learning and reading.

[Translation]

Your petitioners call upon the House to reject the tax on books and newspapers.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I am deeply honoured to present this petition not only because of the subject matter, but also because of the people who signed it.

The subject matter, of course, is the goods and services tax. These petitioners are calling on the Government of Canada, and in particular the Prime Minister who is in the House at the present time, to withdraw this regressive tax. They are concerned about the negative impact it will have on the petitioners.

I am honoured to present the petition because the people who have signed it come from places like Dunrobin, Woodlawn, Kanata, Embrun—which happens to be the home town of the mother of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—and from a significant number of people from the community of Sarsfield in the—

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are now presenting petitions and not getting a history lesson, even though it is quite interesting.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I would not abuse the rights of members by indicating that this petition is from the Kingston, Nova Scotia area. I will not do that.

I have the honour and privilege to table a petition today signed by a number of Canadians who point out that the proposed goods and services tax of the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay.

They go on and on pointing out how the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, but to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

• (1210)

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition to this House from many Canadians who are disgusted with the way this government is trying to tax books and other services.

Hopefully, the Prime Minister will listen to our children and university students, and bring in legislation that does not tax the fundamental privileges of our children.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 and once again carry forward the fight against the GST on behalf of residents of Canada.

I rise on behalf of residents of Ontario and the Barrie and Mississauga areas who ask this government to readdress what it has been looking at and look for a fairer tax than the GST.

The petitioners ask the Senate to stop now and not push this through, readdress where the tax system is going, and get rid of the goods and services tax.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present two petitions.

Both petitions relate to the disappointment of the aboriginal people of Canada as it relates to their treatment by the federal government. These petitioners from Seine River and Manitou Rapids ask the government to consider moving on land claims and the rights of their people. Hopefully the federal authorities will move quickly so that we will not antagonize race relations in Canada, and continue to provoke dangerous and ignorant acts of racism.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me this morning to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from numerous Canadians asking that tax-free status of the printed word be retained and granted to all Canadians. It should apply to everyone who goes to school so they will not be taxed under the GST.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to present petitions from a number of Canadians who oppose the GST. In particular, they oppose the tax on books, newspapers and all types of learning material. They humbly call upon this Parliament to withdraw this tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary will know that I asked him privately, approximately one week ago, as to why a starred question that has been on the Order Paper in my name for at least six months has not yet been answered.

Perhaps the hon. member could give us a reply now or could inquire to look into it and report as soon as possible.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, maybe I could take this opportunity to indicate to the House that there have been 288 priority questions asked of the House, 245 or 85.1 per cent of which have been answered.

There were also 100 regular questions, 86 which have been answered. We are doing all in our power to accommodate the members and to get those answers as quickly as we can.

I do want to indicate that the question the hon. member is referring to is No. 295. I did receive an answer that I was not happy with. Because we always endeavour to make sure that this hon. member receives nothing but the best of answers from the government, I have asked it to be revised and will get it back to him as quickly as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-73, an act to provide for the dissolution or transfer of certain Crown corporations and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before I interrupted the hon. member he had had the floor for seven minutes, so there will be plenty of time.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, this is a very important issue for all of us who are members of Parliament from Toronto. I am happy that the member for Davenport opened the debate today. I know that other members from Toronto are going to be speaking on this debate. I just want to give a short recap of a couple of the points that I made.

As I said before the debate was interrupted for Question Period, there are times when privatization is a good thing and it works. I was not in any way, shape or form casting aspersions on the joint ventures that had built Harbourfront. In fact, I am proud of Harbourfront. As I said earlier, Harbourfront is a multicultural mecca. There is always room for improvement when you are building a large place like that from absolutely nothing. There was a bunch of useless buildings and space which nobody in Toronto had any use for it 10 to 15 years ago. It is now of course a real people place and hundreds of thousands of people enjoy it every week.

The member for Don Valley West said earlier today that there could be a chance that the city of Toronto or the province of Ontario could end up owning Harbourfront. If that were the case, I want to make it perfectly clear that I would have absolutely no problem with that, but this bill does not say that. It is also a very likely possibility that this could go out and whoever in the private sector wants to put the cheque on the table that is determined by this cabinet could walk away with it.

As I said earlier, the taxpayers of Canada have spent about $250 million over many years to put this Harbourfront palace together. It is really not a palace, but it is a place that I am so proud of as a Toronto member that I would hate to think that it is going to go into the hands of someone who does not have the same public purpose. Where else in Canada, or anywhere in North America, have we seen a private sector interest create a public park with the cultural and recreational support facilities such as Harbourfront? I cannot think of anywhere.

There is another thing that concerns me about this bill. It is clause 42. It states:

> All obligations and liabilities of Harbourfront Corporation are deemed to be obligations and liabilities of Her Majesty in the right of Canada.

I know that there are some contingent liabilities on Harbourfront because of some approvals that were given to developers to advance and build even further density. With just cause, the city has stopped those plans from going forward. There is a contingent liability there for Harbourfront. Let us suppose that we did sell Harbourfront Corporation to a developer for $31 million. My goodness, if the contingent liability, which is the Crown's responsibility, were $30 million, that would mean the possibility exists that we would literally give Harbourfront away.

It is absolutely obscene to put a value of $31 million on Harbourfront. If the government is so convinced that this is a good thing for the people of Canada, if this is a good thing in terms of the public benefit, then let us put all the books and records, and all the deals and linkages on the table. Let us have a full analysis.

I have said this to you before, Madam Speaker. I believe that if the private sector will do the job that is necessary for the public service, let it do that. I support entrepreneurship and I support the private sector. But there are times when it is incumbent upon governments to make sure that they are in a control position to make sure that the public benefit, the public policy objective, is being served. I have seen, and many of us in the House of Commons have seen, time and time again, where the government has sold off things. It sells something that is losing money, and that is a pretty good reason if it can get somebody to come in and do it better. But it even sells things that are doing well.

Mr. Nunziata: Like what?

Mr. Mills: I am going to give a very specific example and I have mentioned it before. I am absolutely convinced that the privatization of Pearson International Airport is not the right thing to do. Not only that, but the number of people who are involved in this is almost like a monopoly. We cannot have that with a public institution, where it is not optional for the public to use it. We have to use it. I am concerned how this affects tourists coming to the country.

• (1220)

I said this earlier that the profits with Terminals 1 and 2 operating inefficiently were in excess of $70 million last year. Take that over the next 10 years and that is $1 billion that traditionally went into the taxpayers' coffers. You could buy two Terminal 3's for $1 billion, and we, the taxpayers, the Government of Canada, would own them.

What is going to happen when suddenly some of the smaller airports in the country need new services in terms of tarmac, et cetera? We are not going to be in a position to dictate because the public objective is totally different than the private objective. In privatization, it is the absolute right and responsibility to make sure that the private shareholders are served. But in public policy, its the people of Canada who are served.

It is incumbent upon all of us in the House who are accountable to make decisions as to how we govern costs, all the way from the cost of a hamburger in that airport, to a dinner, a rent-a-car, the fees for going to buses, hotels, and everything else. If the private sector controls all of that, then who makes the judgment as to what the public good is all about?

My concern about the disposition of Harbourfront is not because I am in any way, shape or form casting aspersions on the joint ventures of the many good things that have happened at Harbourfront. Some of those joint ventures are actually starting to make a dollar right now. If they can pay back the taxpayer for some of the investment, why would we give it away?

If the province and the city of Toronto so passed it, and this were to go to a private developer, it is not impossible that one developer in the country would control our largest international airport, Pearson, plus our Harbourfront. We cannot be serious about allowing that to happen in a city like this.

If the private sector is convinced that it can do a better job of managing Terminal 1, 2, and 3, let us give them a lucrative management contract. But let us not give away the asset. From year to year, we can judge the management of that. If it is so confident, we can build in incentives and build in bonuses, but we do not need to give away our Harbourfront in Toronto. We do not need to give it away to the private sector so that it have its own private cash boxes.

The government always argues: "Well, where are we going to get the money to build Terminal 3?" If private development can go and get $450 million from the various pension funds and pay a proper rate of interest and it can make a profit on, then so can the government.

Do not compare this to the Dome Stadium or the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto where it is optional whether we use those facilities or not. We must use our airport. We must use our Harbourfront. In no way, shape or form, will I ever support the government giving either of those two things away.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I want to take two minutes and express my sincere gratitude and thanks to my colleague for letting me, my constituents, and other people in Toronto know what exactly the government is planning to do. The government, since it came to power, has sold everything, one thing after another. Now, the government wants to give everything away.

My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, mentioned the airport. I want to ask him a question. Will he share with me and the House what his views are and what he thinks the government is trying to do? Where is the government going, and what is next on the chopping block that the government wants to sell? Will he please let us know what the government has in mind to do with the International Airport in Toronto? The government certainly is not doing it.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. I really could not venture a guess as to what the government is going to try to privatize next.

I see the Minister of State for Housing over there and I know how committed and sincere he is about affordable shelter in the country. I would not be surprised if the government let him try to get some zoning on the front lawn of Parliament Hill and tried to privatize the Hill.

Think of some of the assets that the government is giving away.

But I want to address my colleague seriously. The central issue in public life today and the one on which we are all going to campaign on in the next election is the issue of trust. We are all hated in this place and all distrusted. Government actions that increase trust are going to be rewarded accordingly, and government actions that decrease trust are really going to hurt.

Privatization in certain instances can be a good thing. But I believe, when we are talking about an airport, a national institution, or a Harbourfront, that we should have a full look at all the books and records, the investment that was made, the liabilities, the contingent liabilities, in fact the whole process. The government is so paranoid that it cannot get productivity and wealth-creation going in the country that it has to sell off assets that people have built up over the years to be great tributes to the country. If this is the only creativity the government has to sell off, then at least let us make sure that the taxpayer is being properly served.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I was astounded to learn this morning that this bill not only will privatize the facilities in Toronto which have just been mentioned, but also will privatize Canada Harbour Place Corporation in Vancouver. I doubt very much that anyone in Vancouver knows that that is what the government has in mind.

I think you will probably recall, Madam Speaker, that Canada Harbour Place is the symbol for Canada on the Pacific Ocean. It is the place that we see in all the brochures about western Canada, and particularly about Vancouver and B.C., with the big sails. For visitors who come in by ship to the west coast of Canada, and it is what means Canada to people on the west coast. It is the place where cruise ships come in. It is the place where we hold national events such as Canada Day, where groups representing all ethnocultural communities put on many activities, and where we come to celebrate Canada. It is absolutely essential, in my view, that we have these kinds of symbols, especially in our remote regions, particularly in British Columbia. Heaven knows that the British Columbian government will give absolutely no acknowledgement of Canada and the federal government except in a very negative sense and is only too willing to claim credit for anything that is sponsored by other levels of government. I think it is very important that we take another look at this.

It is bad enough that we have privatization and deregulation that have been undermining Crown corporations of many descriptions in Canada. We of course have consistently opposed the selling off of Air Canada, and now Petro-Canada.

I must just interject to remind people and particularly to remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Petro-Canada issue was one of the things that resulted in the downfall of his government in 1979.

This, I understand, is a statement, not a question, Madam Speaker. Is that correct?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. We are in the question and comments period.

Ms. Mitchell: Perhaps I will just finish it up as a statement. I do want to say that the Canada Harbour Place Corporation which is, as I said, the symbol of Canada on the Pacific coast, must be retained as a Canadian symbol and, therefore, a Canadian government facility. It is particularly important too if we look at the history of the other Expo lands that were sold off by the provincial government. Billions of dollars were lost as a result of the under-pricing of that and the whole plan to sell off some of the lands that once had been federal property.

I certainly feel very strongly that we must vote against this bill.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Toronto Star in an editorial stated: "Dennis Mills is no ordinary MP". The member of Parliament for Broadview—Greenwood has just shown again why he is not an ordinary MP.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member, after more than six years in the House of Commons knows that when he is referring to any of his colleagues in the House, he should be referring to him or her by the name of the riding. After six and a half years I think the hon. member knows that. I would appreciate the hon. member sometimes following the rules.

Mr. Nunziata: I take it that you have just made that comment tongue in cheek, Madam Speaker, but you should know, given your immense experience, that when you quote from a document, you can quote verbatim. I was quoting from the editorial from the Toronto Star.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood would want a question, but to answer the hon. member, no, even when quoting a document it is not proper in this place to refer to a member by his or her name.

Mr. Nunziata: The Toronto Star said that the member for Broadview—Greenwood is no ordinary MP. The reason why he is no ordinary MP, Madam Speaker, is because of the passion and the commitment he has to the issues that affect ordinary Canadians. Here we are on a Friday afternoon talking about an issue that may not be of concern to Canadians from coast to coast generally speaking, but it is of extreme importance to the people of metropolitan Toronto, hundreds of thousands of whom visit Harbourfront during the summer, almost on a daily basis.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood ought to be commended for his commitment to the preservation of certain wonderful things around Harbourfront. He said, and he asked the question rhetorically, where do you see the private sector creating a public park. That is an extremely important question.

This bill allows for the sale of public land on the waterfront in Toronto to private corporations. Does the member believe, as the government seems to believe, that the private sector, i.e. developers in metropolitan Toronto, will purchase public land there, land that belongs to the public, Canadians, and turn that land into a public park? Or does he believe, as we on this side believe, that the private sector wants to purchase that land, not to create parks and places for people to go, but to create luxury condominiums for the wealthy in metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, if the private sector was only going to take over the Harbourfront in its current condition and no further opportunity for generating income or cash were not there, why would it do it? Why would it do it?

The obvious point is that it is going to come in and figure out ways in which further sources of revenue can be developed. I do not have any problem with that, but for years we have been doing it as partners. Why can we not continue to do it as partners and still that way the people of Canada can own it?

I just want to say one final thing, Madam Speaker, to my colleague from York South Weston. This Harbourfront is not just for the people of Toronto. People come to Toronto from coast to coast. They come to Toronto, the greatest multicultural city in the world. They come and Harbourfront is—

Mr. Boudria: From Hawkesbury.

Mr. Mills: They come from everywhere. It is a multicultural mecca. Is a tourism mecca. Very rarely does anybody come to Toronto and not go to Harbourfront, and for us to give it away—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this horrible piece of legislation. Before I begin to discuss the merits of Bill C-73, again I would like to commend and compliment my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for his excellent speech that he gave this afternoon, for his continuing concern for the quality of life of people in metropolitan Toronto.

Madam Speaker, here we are on a Friday afternoon in Ottawa talking about something that will have a very direct and negative impact on people in various communities, and I take exception to the strategy employed by the Government of Canada with respect to this piece of legislation.

As you know, Madam Speaker, this legislation was introduced on May 31 of this year. There was no debate in the House at first reading. It was brought back for second reading on Friday, September 28—another Friday. The government, again, is trying to slip through a piece of legislation that it knows is highly unpopular. Here we are again on another Friday afternoon dealing with this bill.

I can tell you, Madam Speaker, whereas some people might have fallen asleep at the switch, the Liberal members in this House have not. In particular, the members from Metropolitan Toronto have not fallen asleep. We know the negative impact of Bill C-73 and we will fight this bill, tooth and nail, here in the House, and at committee, to ensure that Harbourfront in particular is taken care of, that the Government of Canada, or the government of the province of Ontario, or the municipal governments in metropolitan Toronto have control over the assets of Harbourfront and that Harbourfront is not sold to the private sector.

Madam Speaker, as you know, Bill C-73 is a bill that privatizes six Crown corporations which I will list: Canada Harbour Place in Vancouver, B.C., Canada Museums Construction Corporation, the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the Canadian Patents and Developments Limited, Harbourfront Corporation in the city of Toronto, and Mingan Associates Limited.

This is part and parcel of this government's privatization-crazy mentality. Since the Conservative Party came to office six years ago, it set out in a very systemic and methodical fashion to sell out Canada.

I think it is important at the outset to put this whole matter into perspective. Since 1984, the government has privatized in whole or in part 18 Crown corporations. If we, for a moment, review the track record of this particular government in its attempt to dismantle Canada and in its attempt to sell out Canada, we will see that in fact it is succeeding, given its majority and strategy.

It is slowly but surely succeeding in destroying our country. It is not overkill as far as rhetoric is concerned, because we know that in 1985 one of the first moves of the Conservative government was to eliminate the Foreign Investment Review Agency that gave the Parliament of Canada the legal tools necessary in order to ensure that foreign investment would be to the benefit of Canadians and that there would be a significant benefit to Canada as a result of foreign investment.

Since 1985, it has put up the "for sale" sign. Not only have foreign corporations and foreign capital come to Canada to purchase Canada, of course the government also endorsed and brought in free trade with the United States.

We know now, given the track record of the free trade agreement, that it certainly is not in the best interests of Canada.

What else has it privatized? What other things has this government done to destroy the Canadian dream that we have all cherished and loved over the years? We know that it has attacked the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by severely slashing the budget of the public broadcaster which has as its main preoccupation the promotion of national unity in Canada.

It is in the process of privatizing Air Canada, the symbol of Canada world-wide. Whenever Canadians travel abroad and see Air Canada or an Air Canada plane, they cannot help but feel proud that there is a piece of Canada. No longer will it be a piece of Canada because of this government's desire to privatize.

Now this government has decided to privatize Petro-Canada, a Crown corporation and oil company in Canada. I believe that Petro-Canada is something that Canadians support in significant numbers.

We know that it has privatized the unemployment insurance program in Canada. It has dismantled VIA Rail. With respect to the airport in Toronto—my friend from Broadview—Greenwood spoke about the situation there—we know that the Government of Canada privatized the construction of Terminal 3. The final chapter has yet to be written with respect to that particular decision of the Government of Canada.

Here we had Pearson International Airport run by the Government of Canada and netting the taxpayers of Canada over $70 million a year, and it decided for whatever reason—presumably one of the reasons was to help its rich developers and business people on Bay Street—to hand over the operation of Terminal 3. Now we know that the government is handing over the operation of Terminals 1 and 2 to the private sector.

The private sector is there for one reason and one reason only; that is, to make a lot of money. As Canadians become aware of what the government is doing to the international airport at Toronto, they are becoming increasingly concerned about the situation there.

The private sector is not there to ensure that Canadians, foreigners and others are able to go to the airport, get onto an airplane and leave on time. The private sector is there to make money for itself, not to help in terms of transportation. It is there to create a shopping centre.

When Terminal 3 opens in several months time, Canadians and Torontonians will see that what was created there is not a structure that will assist in terms of the problems at Pearson International Airport, but it will simply be a huge shopping centre. The goal of the people who will operate Terminal 3 will not be to ensure a transportation system that works efficiently but to ensure that the people stay on the ground for as long as possible in order to spend as much money as possible at the shopping centre that is being built there.

Now we have Bill C–73 that furthers the privatization craziness of the Conservative government. I wish to restrict the remainder of my comments and the remainder of my time to Harbourfront Corporation, which is one of the six Crown corporations that will be privatized as a result of Bill C–73. I would like to put the government on notice today that the Liberal members of Parliament from metropolitan Toronto and other Liberal members of Parliament in the opposition will take a very keen interest and will attack in a very vigorous fashion this piece of legislation because of what it does to Harbourfront.

I work from the premise as a former municipal politician in the city of York in metropolitan Toronto. I see the Minister of State for Housing, a former mayor in the city of East York, is present. We often used to refer to the city of East York in a fond way. We used to call it the city of least York. However, the minister is here and he is the Minister of of State for Housing. Prior to his appointment to cabinet, he was an outspoken critic of issues affecting Torontonians. I know that he is sitting here this afternoon, very concerned about what this government is doing with respect to Harbourfront. I hope that he has spoken out at cabinet against this particular piece of legislation. He will have an opportunity to speak later, and hopefully he will speak for the public record, but I know he agrees that the waterfront in metropolitan Toronto should be a place for people and for parks.

What we have seen over the last number of years, because of the lack of sufficient controls, is the development industry moving into Harbourfront in Toronto and throwing up hotels and luxury condominiums left and right, not for the benefit of Torontonians generally or Canadians generally, but for the benefit of a small group of wealthy people who want to have a condominium on the lake.

I say shame. The lake does not belong to the rich in metropolitan Toronto. The lake belongs to each and every one of us who call Toronto home and to all people who visit Toronto. Toronto is an international city, a city that prides itself in the international community with respect to the amenities it offers to people. We in the metropolitan Toronto caucus of the Liberal Party believe that Harbourfront should be for people.

This particular piece of legislation allows for the privatization of Harbourfront and all the assets of Harbourfront Corporation. Clause 40 (1) of the bill states:

> The Minister of Public Works is hereby authorized to procure, on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada, the dissolution of Harbourfront Corporation.

Subclause (2) states:

> The Minister of Public Works may do all things and perform all acts necessary for or incidental to closing out the affairs of Harbourfront Corporation.

If this bill passes, a big huge for sale sign will be stuck in the sand on the beaches at Harbourfront. The developers like leeches will be swarming to the minister who wants to privatize, making offers not to create a park at Harbourfront, not to create and enhance upon a jewel, as the member referred to it, but to build concrete, to build buildings, to build luxury hotels, to build luxury condominiums. That is wrong because once it is gone, it is gone.

We have certain buildings there, two in particular, the Huang Danczkay condominiums. They are a disgrace to Harbourfront. Those buildings and others are a disgrace to the waterfront. They ought not to have ever been allowed to proceed. Because of the lack of proper controls, we see a situation now where we have a number of very ugly buildings that block the harbourfront in metropolitan Toronto.

When the member for Don Valley West spoke earlier, he said that this bill allows for Harbourfront Corporation to be locally controlled. That is not what it says in this bill. That is not what it says anywhere in this legislation.

This legislation would allow for the sale of Harbourfront Corporation to the highest bidder, to anybody the Minister of Public Works wants to sell to. Once this bill is passed by this Parliament, this Parliament forever and a day will not be able to deal in a direct way with Harbourfront in metropolitan Toronto.

If the member were sincere in what he was saying—and I believe he was—then I am sure that he will support an amendment to this legislation. The Liberal Party intends to move an amendment to ensure that if the Government of Canada no longer wishes to participate and to exercise some degree of control over Harbourfront in metropolitan Toronto, we should hand it over to other government authorities, either to the provincial Government in Ontario, the city of Toronto, to the municipality of metropolitan Toronto, or to a combination of any of the government agencies in metro.

We will not support the sale of the assets of Harbourfront Corporation to the private sector, because we know that the purpose of a sale to the private sector will be to make a lot of money for a very small group of people who will not be here in 50 or 100 years' time. But the waterfront will be here, and we have to ensure that the waterfront in metropolitan Toronto remains a people place. It is a beautiful place for people to gather, especially in the summer months and also in the winter months. We have to ensure that it continues to be a people place, notwithstanding the imperfections that now exist because of the lack of control on the part of different government agencies.

As the member for Broadview—Greenwood said, it is a jewel. It would be a travesty for the remainder of the lands owned by the federal government to be developed in the form of luxury condominiums.

In closing, let me say that we believe strongly that there should continue to be public control over Harbourfront Corporation. We believe that there should be a federal government role in the development of the waterfront because it is a harbour. The government has had for many years a direct role to play with respect to the Toronto harbour.

We look forward to dealing with this bill in a vigorous fashion at committee. I hope this government will come to its senses. It is trying to hoodwink Canadians into believing that the privatization of Harbourfront Corporation is in the best interests of Canadians generally. We do not believe it is. We believe that there ought to have been more consultation with the people of Toronto. There was not a sufficient amount of consultation.

I know the Minister of State for Housing, until his appointment to cabinet was always keen on public participation in development matters. I hope that he will speak to his friend, the Prime Minister, and ask him to ensure that public hearings take place in Toronto before this government forces this bill through this Parliament.

The public in metropolitan Toronto and the municipal politicians in metro have a right to participate and to be consulted before the assets of Harbourfront Corporation are sold off by this government.

The government has indicated that the book value of the assets there is $31 million. Well, that is a real joke. If the Government of Canada is going to be selling the assets anywhere near book value, then the Canadian public will be terribly ripped off as a result, because the fair market value of Harbourfront is at least 10 times, if not 50 times, that particular amount. The hon. member knows and the Conservative government knows that no amount of money will ever be able to buy back our waterfront in metropolitan Toronto.

The Harbourfront Corporation has as assets not only land but leases and property rights. The government says that this is a housekeeping bill. We do not accept the categorization of this bill as housekeeping. It is a major piece of legislation. Even though the government indicated in its last budget, the budget of the Minister of Finance last February, that it was moving to privatize certain corporations, in that budget speech nowhere did it say that it would be privatizing Harbourfront in metropolitan Toronto.

In closing, I urge all members of the House, not only members from metropolitan Toronto , to take a very keen interest in the progress of this legislation because we will, I can assure them.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I was amazed when I heard he hon. member for Yord South–Weston object to the transfer of development to local authorities and especially control over certain lands. It seems to me that this goes against a recognized principle that says that people living in a community should have the power to make their own decisions. What this bill does is ensure that the people of Toronto will decide, and not the federal government, for instance.

The hon. member also said repeatedly that it was a bad thing to privatize Crown corporations. I get the impression he is struggling against a trend that is gaining ground internationally. If we take a look at what is happening in socialist countries, we see they are trying to privatize all State-run corporations to make them profitable, efficient and competitive. What the hon. member is doing now, and it is typical of this party's thinking, is trying to turn the clock back. Instead of taking a look at what is happening throughout the world, and realizing that major socialist countries— In fact people who said that only the State could develop a country now realize they were wrong, and today, they are coming to Canada for help in privatizing their enterprises because they are not profitable, they are a threat to the environment, they ignore local authorities, and so forth.

I wish the hon. member would explain why he is so set on turning the clock back, while all other countries on this planet are trying to go in exactly the same direction we want to take this country.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member has completely missed the point. He says that the purpose of this bill is, as the hon. member for Don Valley West said, to hand over control to local people. We have no objection to handing over control to municipal authorities in metropolitan Toronto or the provincial government in metropolitan Toronto. That would be local control; the people of metropolitan Toronto would continue to exercise some degree of control. That is not what the bill says. The bill says that the Minister of Public works has carte blanche. He can do as he pleases with Harbourfront. He could, and no doubt he will, given the bent of this particular government, sell the assets of Harbourfront to developers in order to develop Harbourfront. If the member is honest about what he is saying, if the government is honest about its stated intentions, why does it not say so in the bill? It is not going to fool us on this one.

It was able through the privatization of Terminal 3 to hand over millions and millions of dollars to the private sector that should belong to the people of Canada. That was because this Parliament was not consulted. This Parliament had no say in it. We do have a say in the privatization of Harbourfront Corporation. We will say no on this side of the House to the sale of the assets of Harbourfront to the private sector.

We will co-operate with the government, if its intention is to hand over the assets of Harbourfront to the local government authorities but that is not what the bill says. Given this government's track record, nobody believes the government. It has zero credibility when it comes to its undertakings and promises to the people of Canada. It has consistently over the last six years lied and hoodwinked the people of Canada.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is an excellent member at throwing smoke screens and clouds of dust on the trail. He is well aware that this bill is set against a long series of events relating to Harbourfront dating back many years, to the time that Harbourfront was established in the first place by the former Liberal government. It was established with the intention of creating a parkland and also creating some arts, recreation and entertainment there.

In order to pay for all those good public things, the arts, recreation and entertainment, the former Liberal government set in place a mechanism and a policy for developing lands at Harbourfront in order to generate dollars to pay for the actual arts and recreation activities. The mechanism which created all of the developments at Harbourfront, all of the horrible things that the hon. member has been referring to, relating to the building of huge high-rise apartments and condominiums, the huge profits that private sector developers have apparently, according to the hon. member, made out of this, all of that was put in place by the former Liberal government. As a result, a great hue and cry went up from the people of Toronto about blocking off the waterfront with all these huge buildings and not allowing access to the waterfront. The hon. member knows that. He also knows that the Toronto city council and their zoning rules and regulations are overseen by the provincial government, who have their own controls in planning. They are the regulatory bodies for all of that development.

Because of the concerns raised by people in the city of Toronto, this government put a freeze on all other development and it set in place a mechanism of investigating what was going on. Mr. Crombie, the former member for Rosedale, a former minister in this government and the former mayor of the city of Toronto was appointed as a royal commissioner to look at the whole situation. Subsequently, the Ontario Liberal government of the day appointed Mr. Duncan Allen, a provincial bureaucrat, to also take a look at it. Mr. Allen came up with a very detailed plan of what should happen to Harbourfront and the hon. member knows that.

This government has said to the provincial government, at that time a Liberal provincial government, "We think there is some merit in this plan. However, we think there are some problems with it. We are going to appoint our own negotiator to see if we can work out some of the details". That was Mr. Darcy McKeough, who in fact is currently trying to work out those final details.

This bill, as the hon. member is well aware, is just part of the process to give authority to wrap up the existing Harbourfront in order to create a new Harbourfront with the pipeline properties, those development properties taken away from the waterfront and also to make sure that there still will be some public arts and recreation facilities there that will be funded properly and looked after in perpetuity.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I really would love to believe what the minister is saying, but that is not what it says in the bill. Obviously he has not read the bill because it does not bear out what the minister is saying.

An hon. member: You do not know what is going on down there.

Mr. Nunziata: I know what is going on. I know the credibility of this government and it is at an all-time low.

Why then, if what the minister is saying is true, do we not just delete clauses 40 and 41 and the other clauses dealing with Harbourfront. Let's put it on the backburner. Let's wait until all the negotiations are complete. Let's wait until the government of Ontario and the other local governments in metropolitan Toronto have spoken.

Let's wait for a tentative deal to be signed and then come back to Parliament, and we will pass a piece of legislation so that there is local control over Harbourfront. But do not come to Parliament asking for a blank cheque to sell off the assets of Harbourfront because we know the track record of this government. It wants to sell it to its rich friends on Bay Street, not to the city of Toronto, not to metropolitan Toronto, and not to the province of Ontario.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

[English]

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt. I do apologize to the member, but I had to look to see if there was someone else rising from the other side of the House.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in this House to talk about something that is going to happen to my home town of Toronto.

In the past six years, we have seen the Conservative government leading its friends to the trough. I want to take a couple of minutes and talk about that trough. Just a couple of minutes ago the minister of housing stood up and gave us this great speech. Well, I disagree with the minister of housing. Although we happen to be good friends, and although, on occasion, we have gone to the same events, politically we disagree.

In 1978 when I graduated from the University of Toronto I went to work for CN. I came to this House in 1988, Madam Speaker. That was 10 years ago.

At that time CN was the jewel of Canadian transportation. Only recently, in 1985–86, when this government took power, did it put CN Express on the chopping block. I was a young industrial engineer on loan to CN Express in 1978. It was losing $12 million per year. There was room and we were working to turn it around. We almost had it turned around. That corporation was going to be making money. What happened after this government took power? They sold CN Express to their rich friends for a market value of $29 million.

Mr. Mills: Shame.

Mr. Karygiannis: My colleague for Broadview—Greenwood says shame. I want to let this House and my colleague in on an even bigger secret. After it was sold, the buyers who were buddies of our government across the way went to the bank and said, "I've got a proposition for you". The bank said, "What is the proposition?".

"I've got this great big thing, this white elephant the government calls it, that is losing money, and I want to borrow money against it". The bank looked at it and said, "Gee, that is a very good deal. How much do you want?". He said, "Well, what do you think the market value is?". The bank said, "Close to about $200 million". Yet the government's rich friends were only on the books for $29 million. As we see right here in this legislation, Harbourfront is $31 million. Let me continue my story about CN Express because it is dear to my heart.

They got a loan from the bank for $50 million, the great big individuals who were running the company. This was in 1985, when fax machines were something that were looked upon as the future. They had fax machines and portable phones in Jaguars. They had this big boat and put it in at Concord. In the seventies government prided itself in the latest transportation needs going from place to place. A couple of months later this company, Route Canada, folded. There were 3,500 people laid off work. I called the minister—one can never get the minister on the phone, it is an impossibility. I spoke to his executive assistant and said, "Will you table today in this House the agreement of the sale of CN Express to Route Canada."

Time and time again we asked this government, "Will you table that agreement of sale?". This government kept saying, "Well, it is a Crown corporation."

The government is hiding because it knows if it is tabled today, we will see that there was an agreement that those employees were going to be protected for three years. Yet this government has no guts—absolutely no guts—to bring that agreement forth.

The story continues. Air Canada was put on the chopping block. It was a big thing and everybody was going to make money. What happens? We only found out a couple of days ago that there will be 2,900 people out of work.

Next, we come to VIA. What did the government do? It split VIA down the middle. The Minister of Transport said, "If you go ahead and start using VIA, it will not be chopped." The ridership increased and yet, what did he do? What his boss told him. He chopped VIA and the government halved it. Again, there were hundreds of people out of work.

The government wants to think of this bill as housekeeping. These six companies, Canada Harbour Place, Canada Museums Construction Corporation, Canadian Livestock Feed Board, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, Harbourfront Corporation and Mingan Associates Limited are housekeeping.

We have something else that this government wants to put on the chopping block. It is Petro–Canada. When the government puts Petro–Canada on the chopping block, will it have the guts to let the Canadian people open the books and find out exactly what it is selling. This government never did that. We find time after time that friends of this government and in particular, close friends, make money. Why? Because they happen to have the right connections at the right place.

We now come to Harbourfront. The book value is $31 million. I am wondering if this was put to the test, if there was a real evaluation of that property done, if there was a real estate appraisal done, how much would it be worth? Is this government willing to go to a real estate agent and say, "We want to have an appraisal of this property." Is this government willing? Absolutely not. I hear the minister of housing across the way. I am wondering if that minister of housing will ask his boss, the Prime Minister, to have this property appraised. Absolutely not. The minister knows that when that is done, it will be worth more than $31 million.

Years ago, one used to go to Toronto central island. When looking across, one could see the skyline of Toronto. What does one see now? A wall of condominiums. There is a small property there which is open. That small property is the Harbourfront. I am wondering what really is behind this sale of the Harbourfront Corporation. Why does the government want to sell it?

I see the Minister of State of Housing across the way is very interested in listening to my comments. I remember in 1988, during the election, the then housing minister said: "If you cannot afford Toronto, you can move out."

Right now the immigration minister is announcing figures for immigration and employment for immigrants coming into Canada that would give Toronto close to 100,000 new immigrants per year. We have nowhere to house them. I hope the minister is listening. He has a real problem in his hands.

Let us come back to the $31 million of Harbourfront. The question is, how much is it worth? Twice? Three times? Four times? Five times? I am not a real estate expert but, if I was to ask anybody in the House, he or she will more than likely tell me it is about 20 to 50 per cent understated the $31 million we have here.

There is going to be a sign up there that is going to say: "1-800-MULRONEY". It will be just like we got sold in 1988 with the free trade legislation, and just like right now when the government wants to entangle us with a trilateral agreement with Mexico. We have another one. It is not going to be as big. This sign is not going to be as big. This is going to be a smaller sign. People will not even have a chance to look at it.

Some backroom boys who are friends of the government will not even let this poor little sign be put on. They are going to get on the phone and dial: 1-800-M-U-L-R-O-N-E-Y, and it is going to ring at 24 Sussex. "Oh, my good friend, how are you today? Thirty-one million and you do not have it? You want to borrow against the bank? It's a deal." Just like CN express was a deal. Thirty-five hundred workers were put out of their jobs. In this particular deal, we might not have any workers who will be put out of a job, but it is the trough which is very important. It is very important that we are trying to hoodwink ordinary Canadians.

I do not doubt that the government is going to ram this legislation through this House, get it over to the Senate to get Royal Assent. It is going to run, because if it does not get it, it is going to go get another eight senators in order to make sure that it is done. A couple of years down the line we are going to see great big condominiums rise. The average price for a lakefront condominium is anywhere between $300,000 to $500,000.

I wonder: Is the government gutsy enough to have an appraisal done of this property? Is the government honest enough to come clean and say what its intentions are? Is the government able to stand up on its own two feet and say to Canadians: "We have misled you. We have taken you down the garden path. Everything that we said from one day to the next day is not the reality." Is the government going to stand up on its own two feet and say to Canadians: "Gee, we might have told you a little white lie in everything we have been telling you on a day-to-day basis."

Canadians are not blind and they are not stupid. We see what the latest polls are doing. We know what Canadians want. Canadians want no part of this government, and they will tell it clearly in 1992—

Mr. Barrett: Nor of the Liberals.

Mr. Karygiannis: My hon. friend from the NDP says: Nor of us. Let me assure him that in 1992, he is still going to be on this side of the House and with fewer members than right now. I am very confident of that. We come clean. We tell our people that it is not worth $31 million.

Madam Speaker, through you, I say to the Canadian people and to the government: Stop hoodwinking us. Tell us the honest truth. What is the market value of this particular property? Why do you want to sell it? Who is going to buy it? Who is going to profit? Why do you not just leave it alone?

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, the only point on which my colleague and I agree is that Canadians are not stupid. Liberals have always conveyed a double message: at the same time as they promote liberalism, therefore individualism, they think that people are weak, stupid and in dire need of protection. All measures taken by the Liberals since war's end were aimed at protecting people against themselves. They would centralize, institutionalize and create self-feeding bureaucracies. Again I fail to understand. I see some of my colleagues opposite who hail from the private sector. Business circles have been complaining for decades that the government is overly interventionist.

The Liberals created the welfare state and advocated dependence. It does not work! Canadians have no more use for that, they are much more autonomous, they are a lot more initiative-minded than you think. As a government we believe that people are intelligent enough and need not be told what to do. We need to establish standards and devise means of action and policies to protect Canadian values, but it is up to the people to decide how to achieve that. There is no need to reduce. Time has come to switch from the welfare state to responsible government, and that is precisely what privatization is all about. That is what we are debating today—privatization. The concept of public ownership which you advocate is just a way of depersonalizing people and making them irresponsible. Canadians do not need to be sheltered. They need to regain control over their own lives, and that is what we are doing. You take away their ability to fend for themselves and, in doing that, you deprive them of creativity. By privatizing we give more freedom to people, we emphasize that small is beautiful.

The job losses you are referring to were— We know that bureaucracies feed on themselves. I am not talking about bureaucrats but about bureaucracies. Employees are stripped of any responsibilities except filling out forms and doing paperwork.

Air Canada had become dependent on the government. Taxpayers, including those in my riding, were paying for its services which did not really benefit either the Canadian population or the flying public. Deregulation created jobs in my riding. Canadair, that was sold to Bombardier, has supported some of my constituents through these difficult economic times and a few of them even told me recently—I could give you names—that they have a problem hiring people. There is not enough qualified workers because the Liberal government, instead of investing in job training, decided to subsidize jobs and businesses rather than research and development.

Madam Speaker, I wonder how my colleague opposite, whom I hold in high esteem, can put up with this rubbish we hear coming from the other side. By supporting individualism, we encourage creativity which, in turn, brings in taxes enabling governments like ours to offer needed social services.

[English]

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, in 1984, Brian Mulroney, our honourable Prime Minister, stood up and said: "Jobs, jobs, jobs." In 1990, we see eight jobs: "Senator, senator, senator, senator, senator, senator, senator, and senator". Some of them are questionable senators. Thank you.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a question, through you, to my colleague. By the way, I must say that we in Metro Toronto are not against entrepreneurship. We are not against the spirit of free enterprise. We really are not. We have had many joint ventures with the private sector over the last few years.

But the member for Bourassa, for whom I also have a lot of respect, talked about standards and talked about values. I think standards and values are important.

The Minister of State for Housing talked about an investigation that the government had into Harbourfront. I, for one member, may take a different point of view if the government would care to put the deals or the investigations on the table. I cite two examples: Harbourfront, the investigation as to what it found that it wants to get rid of it; and, more importantly, Terminal 3. We have a situation developing here where, technically, one corporation could monopolize our airport and our harbourfront.

Would my colleague from Scarborough—Agincourt be a little bit more receptive to taking a different approach to this if the government would put all these deals on the table so we could have a full and open analysis?

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the question. I will say this much. I have never stood in the path of progress and, as a small businessman, I know what the government wants to do to Canadian businessmen by implementing the GST. That is really going to kill us.

We talk about jobs, jobs, jobs.

Did you want me to sit down, Madam Speaker, or may I answer the question?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If you are asking me a question I will, of course, answer. I was signalling that the hon. member was maybe on the point of being totally out of relevancy, considering the question. That was my only suggestion to the hon. gentleman, so that I would not have to rise and remind him.

Mr. Karygiannis: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I will attempt to answer the question of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

I would like to have open dealings and I would like for me and the Canadian public to see what is behind this agenda, what is the real value of the land. Let us put it on the table. Let us have a full investigation.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, earlier today the member for Scarborough—Agincourt said that in 1984 the Prime Minister had promised a lot of jobs but that all he has managed to do is create eight new seats for senators.

Perhaps I might remind my colleague that if the Prime Minister was forced to resort to that provision of the Canadian Constitution it was because the Liberal senators of his own party did not show any respect for democracy in this country, and that these people in the Senate abused their powers not because they had been elected but indeed because they had been appointed by his favourite idol, Mr. Trudeau.

I think he should keep in mind how and why Prime Minister Brian Mulroney had to use section 26 of the Canadian Constitution in an attempt to restore a modicum of credibility in the illustrious institution we refer to as the other place.

[English]

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, my colleague from across the way speaks about why the Prime Minister had to use section 26 of the BNA Act. We, in the House, believe that if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance listen to 85 per cent of the Canadian public, they will do the right and honourable thing. That is, they will scrap this GST, throw it out, go back to the drawing-board, and clearly understand that the people of Canada are against it. If we do that, then we will not need the eight new senators.

The Senate is the House of sober second thought and its members are clearly listening and reading the names of people across Canada who are objecting to this unfair and preposterous tax.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my contribution will not be noted for its length, but for its wisdom. I want to focus on one particular aspect of this bill that relates to my home province of British Columbia, and the city of my birth, Vancouver.

This bill gives the government the authority to dispose of Canada Place, that wonderful focus of downtown Vancouver that is still in public hands. This bill gives the government the right to dispose of Canada Place on such terms as approved by the governor in council.

Our experience with this kind of asset disposal in the province of British Columbia has been one of scandalous give-away. One need just look at what our provincial government did with B.C. Place as a consequence of the end of Expo 86, and the disposal of those properties for a pittance of their value to a private sector buyer. That was a provincial government.

An hon. member: Tory.

Mr. Barrett: Let us understand where the land came from in the first place. It was part of a Crown grant to the CPR and was held in trust by Marathon Realty. Marathon Realty, as an arm of the CPR, became the legal owner of that property as part of the price of keeping a national railway open for passenger service across this country.

The government got rid of that idea in a hurry, but it did not take back the property. It is a new kind of corporate give-away that allowed VIA Rail to take over the role in Canada, only to have the Tories kill that and steal the lands that were given to the private corporation, kept in their hands and sold off.

An hon. member: That's capitalism. Down with capitalism.

Mr. Barrett: I want to tell you it is a straight kind of deal that every Canadian citizen would like to share in. When these members talk about entrepreneurship, people would just like the opportunity to get in line for that kind of entrepreneurship. Nevertheless, CPR walked away with $250 million worth of timber property in exchange for the property it got for nothing from the Canadian taxpayers. It was then sold to the private sector, and after, we discovered in the handling of this deal, it was sold off for a pittance.

If the government intends to do the same with Canada Place through order-in-council, then I say shame on them. Do you have to be as bad as Social Credit? How low can you sink? How bad can this government get?

An hon. member: Just watch them. Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Barrett: Is there no standard for lowness?

An hon. member: None at all.

Mr. Barrett: Is there no boundary for stupidity?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Barrett: Is there no possibility of defining an absolute limitation of madness? The Social Credit government has tried its best to do it, and having failed to establish an absolute maximum definition of stupidity, this government is hell-bent to try to find that definition for itself.

Through this bill this government is attempting to say: "How can we give away this last Crown jewel that is in the hands of the public in downtown Vancouver?" Thank goodness it does not own Stanley Park. If it gets rid of this property, it will certainly try to ruin the view to Stanley Park.

The government says that this is probably housekeeping. Can you tell me of anyone in Canada who practises housekeeping by throwing out all their furniture, their television, their stereo, and everything else, then shoots their mother and father and then goes to court and pleads for sympathy because they are orphans? It is this government. It shoots itself in the foot, throws away our assets and then asks the Canadian people to vote for it because it is an orphan.

Only this level of incompetence could be accepted by either the Liberals or the Tories because the Liberals have brought to the House the pathway of developing this kind of stuff. What the Liberals did as amateurs, this group is trying to professionalize. When the Liberals gave stuff away, it was only because they were new at the game. These guys give stuff away because they deliberately sell it out.

I find it most interesting that the Liberals stand up after their history of giving away half the country, crying after giving away half the country. They are angry that the Tories are giving away the other half and they do not have the chance to do it.

As we go through this whole examination and we have this debate, this to me is a capsule of the history of Canada. These two parties do not fight to get at the trough. They fight to see who they can get to the trough for them. That is what it is all about.

Here in Canada Place we have a situation where there has been no analysis of the privatization plan.

Mr. Nunziata: That's from my briefing notes.

Mr. Barrett: That's right. When you are in opposition, you prepare good notes. When you are in government, you burn them.

Mr. Speaker, I told you I was going to be brief—

Mr. Nunziata: But not from my briefing notes.

Mr. Barrett: No, and the Canadian people are having their briefs stolen, more than their briefs, their shirts, their shoes, their briefs. Everything is going in this bill.

On a Friday afternoon when everybody is lulled into the belief that we are now headed into war in Iraq, where they are mobilizing the parliamentary green buses to take the MPs to the front line to fight for our minister of external affairs, they are busy giving away half of the assets that belong to the people of this country. If Saddam Hussein did this in Kuwait, they would be the first ones at the barricades, Mr. Speaker. You bet. They would defend the rights of the Kuwaitis and at the same time give away half of Canada's assets.

It is ludicrous, Mr. Speaker, to think it is anything more than perhaps a little bit of humour. If we would not have humour about this, we would burst into tears at the stupidity and cupidity of a government that stands here and says in explanation of giving away assets: "This is free enterprise".

Where is the process for bidding? What has been tabled in this House to show the true value of these assets? They claim Canada Place is worth $67 million. Do you guys want to buy Canada Place? Each chip in 10 grand, make a down payment, we will walk away with a killing. Sixty-seven million dollars. Why that is not even coffee money for some of the that who have already skimmed off British Columbia through Social Credit. It is an invitation for another give-away. Why does it do this?

An hon. member: Leverage buyout.

Mr. Barrett: Leverage buyout, my friend says. When you have a monopoly access, leverage buyout is the best way to go. This government—

Mr. Mills: You got it.

Mr. Barrett: Exactly, my friend, the member from Broadview—Greenwood, the single-minded person—I mean the single tax person—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: —has said, Mr. Speaker, I've got it. You know how this is done. I will show you. Was it Ring Lardner, Jr., or was it Damon Runyon who wrote the story about Harry the Hat? He would go into a dice game, and the Prime Minister is wonderfully famous for using this analogy of dice games: "Roll the dice". Harry the Hat would go into a dice game. He was a big fellow, six foot two. Everybody else was smaller. He would put the dice in the hat, hold them up and shake them. Say: "All bets down", he would say: "Ya". Then he would look in the hat and say: "Seven. I won". Then he would pick up the dice and put them in again. He would roll them and say: "Eleven. I won".

One of the smart alecs in the dice game said: "I want to see the dice. I want to see the roll". You know what he said, Mr. Speaker? He said: "You're out of order". You have to be relevant to this game and there is no relevance in this game to seeing what the evaluation is, what the bids are, what the options are for anyone else to buy, or even a suggestion, as my good friend the member suggested, a lease. None of that stuff. Harry the Hat calls out the numbers and we all lose. This may be a simple analogy, but nothing could be more simple than this government. So the analogy fits. You are setting the rules over there. It will all be kept in the dark. The Canadian people do not see what the evaluations are. They are never going to see the process. All of a sudden a buyer is going to be announced.

In the case of British Columbia Place, the buyer was announced as Li Ka-shing. He announced that he had made a deal for $250 million. We discovered later that he really put up hardly anything and the provincial government was responsible to clean up the mess before he got the property. As a matter of fact, we are going to end up paying for him to buy the place from us. That is free enterprise. That is really sharp dealing. What guarantee is there that we do not have the same thing here?

Some of my Liberal colleagues are in pretty good shape when they are sitting there on this side. They have raised some valid points. The only question I have of them is, if it is so bad and you predict you are going to win and be the government, are you prepared to expropriate back, after fair compensation, in the name of the people any one of these rotten deals that this group, this dumb-bell government, gives off?

They are nodding their heads. They are prepared to expropriate. The only reason they are nodding their heads is they are down to 31. If they get up to 38, boy, it will change like this.

I have seen it all. I have heard it all.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: Never have I been so popular with the Liberals and Conservatives as I am now because I give them a chance to repent. I give them a chance to save them from themselves before they continue their give-away of this country as exemplified by this bill.

All they are really fighting about is who gets to the line first to give away most. The Canadian people have had enough of this nonsense.

If the Liberals are prepared to expropriate back, after fair compensation, this bill, say so publicly. As far as this government goes, you have a moral and I think legal obligation to be up front. Do not play Harry the Hat, do not give this stuff away in a fixed game. If you are going to sell it, let us have open competition, open evaluations and even better, competition for long-term leases until a generation comes along that has a heck of a lot more sense than you have.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. membre for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, is still excited after his great performance. He told us a few moments ago that the government was throwing Canadians' clothes and refrigerators through the windows. This is very impressive but he forgets that the voters in his own province have elected him to a job 3,000 miles away to prevent him from squandering money in his own province.

I would like him, as a socialist, to tell me why every socialist country in the world is trying to implement a free enterprise system similar to the one we have in Canada. How can he explain that the most passionate defenders of international socialism have agreed to come to Canada to find out about our systems and their efficiency? Why is he still trying to convince Canadians that our government is heading in the wrong direction?

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for giving me this opportunity for a two-hour discourse on the stupidity of monopoly capitalism versus true competitive enterprise. That is the point really.

If you are going to make assets available, they should be made available in an open, competitive manner that is separate and distinct from the Crown and leaves no idea of interference from the Crown whatsoever. If you really intend to do this, don't do it by Order in Council, but establish a separate tribunal at arm's length from the government that is above board and is clearly open in terms of process, in terms of competitive bidding and, furthermore, examine leasing. Mindless capitalism does not mean the extension of some monopoly opportunity. If you are really going to have competition, then let it be true competition and set the stage so that everybody has an option to have a go.

My friend talks about the socialists. I have to compare it to their own performance, since he has asked. It was not my government that gave $800 million to the Canadian Commercial Bank to bail them out. I understood that under the member's kind of free enterprise people have the God-given right to go broke.

Why is it that you rush in with $800 million to bail out thousands of offshore depositors of a bank? Why is it that you assume that $800 million of Canadian taxpayers' money should be used to bail out offshore investors? Yes, a bailout.

If the government is going to give $2.7 billion to the oil companies in Hibernia, I do not believe in that kind of giveaway. What kind of free enterprise is that, $2.7 billion to Hibernia and $800 million to the Canadian Commercial Bank?

I have publicly advised the food banks to change their names to either Hibernia or the Canadian Commercial Bank. That is the way to get money from the government. You would not give five cents to a food bank, but you would give $800 million to bail out some of those investors whose deposits were well above what the insurance protected.

Why is it that the government uses these clichés and these homilies and this jingoism and this nonsense about free enterprise when at the same time it goes out of its way to take care of the rich and to hell with the poor? Is that social justice? Is that economic justice?

You show me another country in the world that has had a record of being so dumb as this country has been under right wing governments that have given away assets.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Argentina.

Mr. Barrett: Argentina is probably a good case, but at least it did it under military discipline. Here they cannot even decide who the general is overnight, for crying out loud. I find these pious platitudes coming from these members in the—

An hon. member: We don't have to take any lessons from you.

Mr. Barrett: You do not have to take any lessons from me? I am not even offering you any lessons. Let me disabuse the members of the Liberal Party that I am giving them any lessons at all. Nobody can teach them a damn thing, absolutely not. The Ontario people have taught them their lesson.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nunziata: That sounds like a good idea, Mr. Speaker. This is an important debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): The hon. member for York South—Weston on a point of order.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I note that the hour is 1.48 and this debate will expire in 12 minutes' time. I hope the hon. member will give other hon. members the opportunity to rebut some of the nonsense that has been coming out of his mouth, over the last few minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): On a point of order, the hon. member for Erie.

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening very closely to the speech which has been delivered by the hon. member. The one point that I want to raise is that his comments, Sir, should be addressed through the Chair.

Here we have a speaker who is an hon. member in this place. He should recognize the rules.

• (1350)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): I am sure that the hon. member will take those words to heart.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, if inadvertently I missed passing my remarks through you to my colleagues, I apologize.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, and to my colleagues through you, Sir, let me continue my answer to my friend. Mr. Speaker, you will be the first to recognize that these remarks, although addressed through you, are not a personal admonition to you or to the Chair. When I call the government "stupid", you are only the conveyer of the message and not the originator of the message. Let us keep that very clear.

To ensure that that point of order is strictly adhered to, I would hope that you, Mr. Speaker, in your fairness would understand that sometimes I get carried away because of my passion and anger at the stupidity of the previous government.

To answer the question, my colleague asked for an explanation of why I as a social democrat would be proposing fairness, justice, and openness in contracts when other administrations are not doing that.

Well, my dear friend, if you believe in Stalinism as I do not, you will agree to this kind of bill. I do not agree to a new form of Stalinism. This bill, through you, Mr. Speaker and only through you, Mr. Speaker, clearly through you, Mr. Speaker, and singularly through you, Mr. Speaker, is nothing more than just an extension of autocratic dictatorship allowing privilege to take place without true competitive enterprise being guaranteed every single step of the way.

We have seen this time and time again. I repeat my question so that you can understand, Mr. Speaker. If this government intends to be fair, why not consider seriously the suggestion by my Liberal colleague about, first of all, leasing? He was far more generous than I am prepared to be in terms of the incentives to lease. Nonetheless, I am prepared to accept those as well. Leasing at least gives a future government and future generations the opportunity to develop an alternative.

Second, if you do not go for leasing, Mr. Speaker, then indeed why not fair competition? What guarantee are we going to get under this legislation that there will be fair competition? My friends have been raising issues about other matters, Mr. Speaker, and through you, Mr. Speaker, that have not yet been answered by the government about other disposal problems.

The answers have not been forthcoming from the government. The government ministers have avoided answering daily questions on specific disposal of assets that are creating problems right across this country.

In particular, in British Columbia, Canada Place was a gift by all Canadian people to our province of British Columbia. It is deeply appreciated and much respected. We were thankful for the share that every Canadian taxpayer put into Canada Place. It would be a betrayal to every one of those taxpayers to have this gift sold off.

What kind of gift givers are you? Who is going to believe that this is fair? Not I, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this time. Thank you for sharing with me your control and gestures that my time is up. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you regardless of what other members have said or felt, I have enjoyed this conversation with you immensely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): The time for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening attentively to what the member has been saying. Unfortunately, time has expired. It is an important debate.

I would seek unanimous consent of the House to allow for further questioning of the member from British Columbia.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): I do not hear unanimous consent.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I would also like to take a moment to put a few remarks of my own on the record as it relates to this particular piece of legislation.

I would like to bring this piece of legislation to a more northern context. We in northern Ontario have said on many occasions that our tax dollars are not spent the way we would like them to be spent. When I make that statement, everyone looks and asks: "What do you mean by that".

The answer to that question is simply the following. We do not have fine facilities in northwestern Ontario like the Dome into which tax dollars have been put. We do not have these fine airports like Pearson where millions and probably billions by now of tax dollars of the public have been put into the system. We do not have the waterfronts, like the Toronto waterfront we are talking about today, in northwestern Ontario or in northern Canada for that matter.

I would like members to consider that when these particular situations take place, as they relate to public dollars being put into facilities that may or may not be considered in the realm of private enterprise, we as northerners look at these particular facilities for the public good.

I as a northern member travelled on many occasions through Pearson Airport. We all know the expense of Pearson Airport. We all know the cost to fly from Kenora—Rainy River to Toronto. It is almost $1,000 at this point.

My fear in changing the public good of these particular facilities to more private enterprise oriented businesses and no longer institutions is that prices will become so restrictive to northerners in this country that we will become second-class citizens. We pay a lot of our tax dollars not only through our personal income tax but through royalties from resources of the north. We have a large mining industry and a large forestry industry. Through these resources, billions of dollars are put into the hands of southern politicians every year for the benefit of all Canadians.

In northern Ontario we talk on a continual basis about the fact that the agenda of Canada is controlled, to a certain extent, by central Canada and the the Windsor-Montreal corridor. We have always asked as politicians from the north to consider, when pieces of legislation such as Bill C-73 are put in front of the House, it is also looked at through the eyes of northern Canadians. When the Pearson Airport is changed to a private enterprise what effect would that have on northerners? When one goes to Pearson Airport right now—and this applies in most cases to Canadians with low incomes—one can barely afford to eat a sandwich at this facility because of the price that private enterprise is now putting on such goods.

If the government is so inept at running these facilities, then perhaps it should enter into these lease agreements that my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood talks about. Possibly the government should look at a fair and equitable system of leasing and selling our particular goods or facilities or assets of the Crown, if need be. However, to turn around and take this particular piece—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member. I am sure he will want to continue at the next possible occasion.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

WORKERS MOURNING DAY ACT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved that Bill C-223, an act respecting a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace, be read the second time and referred a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise on this occasion to introduce my private members' bill, Bill C-223, an act respecting a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace.

Madam Speaker, as you are no doubt aware, this is the second time that I have risen in this House to introduce this legislation. I have been given assurance from representatives of all parties in this House that they will support this legislation and move it forward in order that we may have a law passed by the Parliament of Canada recognizing the contributions that workers across this land have given, and recognizing the fact that many have given their lives.

I am very proud that the Parliament of Canada is moving forward with this legislation. I believe that it is only proper that it be supported by all parties, because all of us know that the issue of health and safety in the workplace is grave and demands immediate action.

I believe that this legislation will go a long way to improving awareness of health and safety issues at a minimal price to the Government of Canada and to employees and employers alike, because we must spend more time talking about the health and safety of our workers.

This bill calls for the recognition by Parliament and by this nation of April 28 as a national day of mourning for those persons killed or injured in the workplace in Canada. With the number of people who fall victim to workplace injuries, sometimes fatal, it would appear fitting to ask for a week or a month to remember our brothers and sisters. In this legislation, I only ask that the nation remember these people in an official way for one day each year.

Madam Speaker, I ask that we consider the following. In 1987 alone, 1,031,097 persons were injured in the workplace. Of these, 612,886 suffered debilitating injuries, and 887 were reported as fatalities. These figures are staggering and they have remained consistent over the last decade.

Let us not forget those who have died due to exposure to unsafe materials in the workplace. The Public Service Alliance of Canada estimates that between 6,000 to 10,000 Canadian workers each year die as a result of occupational cancer. Yet many of these deaths are not reported as being job related. These people and the dangers they face must be recognized by the Parliament of Canada.

Workers are indeed what make this country productive. It is injuries in the workplace that rob our workers of their health, their lives and their ability to produce. Think of the statistics: every workday, one worker dies each hour; one worker is infirmed each six seconds; one worker is permanently disabled every 12.7 seconds.

Each year, Canada's economy loses 16 million workdays due to workplace accidents, injuries and deaths. To put that into perspective, 16 million workdays are equivalent to all the time and production lost due to strikes and lockouts five times over. It is clear that the issue of health and safety in the workplace is not only a worker's concern, but a concern to all citizens of our nation.

As parliamentarians, it is our duty to look for and find ways to rectify the problems of unsafe working environments. I believe that education and prevention are the best weapons we have to battle the appalling statistics. All employers and workers must recognize the gravity of this issue and become aware of the ways they can improve their odds against injury or death.

It is the intent of this legislation to ensure, by recognizing a national day of mourning, that Canadians will institutionalize a day to remember their fellow workers, friends, neighbours and family who were killed or injured while on the job site. This would make workers more aware of the dangers they face, and hopefully help to reverse the alarming trend toward higher and higher casualties. I also believe that a national day giving official recognition would be a catalyst for educational programs and other efforts to use this day at the work site to focus our thoughts and to educate ourselves on the issue of work place safety.

April 28 was the day chosen by the Canadian Labour Congress five years ago as a day for mourning job site casualties, because it was on that day in 1914 that the first worker safety legislation was introduced in a province of Canada. That province was Ontario. We have indeed come a long way since that time in the area of health and safety legislation, but as can be seen by the statistics, there is still much to be done. The passage of this legislation, with the support of members of all parties in the Parliament of Canada, would be a step on the road to a healthy work place in Canada.

As the members will notice, I have introduced an additional clause into Bill C-223 from the legislation I introduced in the past to clarify the status of this day of mourning. This day will not be a legal holiday, and as such, opposition to this legislation cannot be based on the problem of time lost on the job. It is ironic, as I have mentioned, the great loss of time that is caused by work place injury and death, that people would be concerned about the time that would be lost if this was a national holiday.

In order to have this legislation accepted by the House, we have made that amendment to the legislation, and again I thank the members in the other parties for their support.

It is my contention that economic progress cannot be achieved at the expense of health and safety of our workers. I am sure that hon. members will agree with me that we are no longer in the era of the beginning of the industrial revolution. We no longer accept sweat shops. We no longer accept child labour, and we can no longer accept unsafe working conditions for our citizens. We must all take the steps we can to promote safer working environments. We believe that the health and welfare of our people matters a great deal to all of us. Let us ensure that on April 28 every year, we prove that.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C–223, an act respecting a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace. Members will recall that for the past five years, the Minister of Labour has officially acknowledged April 28 as a day of mourning by making a statement in the House and observing a minute of silence in honour of fallen workers and their families.

I believe that by enshrining April 28 in legislation as a day of mourning, it will reinforce in the minds of all of us the terrible losses caused by industrial accidents and diseases. It will also reinforce the need to work constantly and diligently to improve the situation.

In 1988, preliminary figures indicate that more than 800 people died on the job in Canada, and 20 million person days were lost because of work accidents, occupational injuries or illnesses. No one will be unmoved by these figures, I am sure. No loss of life on the job is justifiable, not only from the point of view of the victim's family but also from society's point of view. The direct and indirect costs of work accidents amounted to approximately $22 billion in 1988. That is an enormous burden for our country at any time, but particularly at a time of increasing world competition in trade.

These are telling statistics, but they do not express the tremendous suffering of the accident victims themselves. Often they suffer not only physically but also mentally because they are unable to return to their place of work or earn their living with dignity. These people deserve our help.

We must stand together. We must declare our common determination to fight this terrible scourge, work accidents.

Work conditions and occupational safety and health have evolved greatly since Confederation. At the federal level, there were various pieces of labour–related legislation over the years, but a major step forward was taken in 1968 when the Canada Labour (Safety) Code was adopted.

Occupational safety and health issues are now fundamental to managing the workplace. The rights and duties of employers and employees are now embedded in our law and regulations. For the federal jurisdiction, the Canada Labour Code is the main vehicle used to further the cause of occupational safety and health.

The code requires that employers make employees aware of all known or foreseeable hazards in the workplace. Workers have the right to refuse dangerous work. Also, workers have the right and responsibility to participate in identifying and solving job–related safety and health problems as members of safety and health committees or as safety and health representatives. Needless to say, they play a key role in further safety and health issues.

We should not become safety conscious only after accidents occur. Prevention has to be foremost in our minds. While laws, regulations, and governments play an important role in accident prevention, in the final analysis it is the employers and the workers who are responsible for preventing, eliminating, or controlling hazards in the workplace. This is a responsibility which no one can shun.

Only through awareness and involvement can Canadian workers significantly improve occupational safety and health in the workplace.

This government favours co–operation and seeking consensus and we are constantly searching for ways to give workers and employers the tools they need to prevent work accidents and occupational injuries and illnesses.

On October, 1988, the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System became operational. This system was created through the joint efforts of federal, provincial and territorial governments, unions, and employers.

The WHMIS is an extremely important system, one of the most advanced of its type in the entire world. Its purpose is to identify and standardize the labelling of hazardous substances used in the workplace. Now that it is operational, this system requires suppliers to state the dangers posed by imported or domestically produced substances that are used in the workplace in Canada. The system also requires suppliers to send data sheets to employers who must then inform their employees of the hazards.

In the area of regulations, the federal government is constantly on the lookout for new approaches it can use with its partners to make the workplace safer for workers.

As we have witnessed in the past, having all interested parties involved in occupational safety and health is the only real way to ensure progress and change in the workplace. In the years to come, we must all be part of the continuing effort to make needed changes happen. Each and every one of us in our respective roles must contribute to reducing the suffering caused by work–related accidents and illnesses.

Enshrining a day of mourning in the legislation will assist in reminding all of us of the need to continue to work toward this end.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, first, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for his bill and I would also like to congratulate the government for agreeing to enshrine this bill into permanent legislation.

Before I speak about it, I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, who is the Liberal Party critic for labour. He has been pressing our caucus and working with our members for a while now trying to persuade us to move in this area, and trying to get unanimous consent which he has obtained without any hesitation from our caucus in terms of our support for this legislation. I know that on a number of occasions he has dealt with the Canadian Labour Congress on this issue. I would like to commend him for his interest. As an individual he is very supportive of the labour movement in his area and across Canada.

Certainly, it is an excellent initiative on the part of the hon. member who proposed the bill to recognize April 28 as the day to remember persons killed or injured on the job. Before I speak about the bill, I just wanted to outline a couple of facts.

According to Workers' Compensation Board statistics, every seven seconds there is a Canadian worker who suffers a disabling injury or disease. Also, the same statistics tell us that every year in Canada approximately 1,000 die as a result of workplace hazards. That is 1,000 lives every year.

Not only that, statistics tell us that there is an economic cost involved with those incidents. For instance, if we look at the latest report by Labour Canada, the cost as a result of incidents in the workplace adds up to about $10 billion every year. These figures do not include those injuries that were disallowed by the Workers' Compensation Board, nor those injuries or diseases that were not reported for one reason or another.

In 1989, for instance, in Ontario we had approximately 465,000 claims made to the Workers' Compensation Board. These claims cost the treasury approximately $1.8 billion in compensation benefits.

Last year, in Alberta, there were approximately 500,000 claims made. The resulting cost to the treasury of Alberta was $2.5 billion in terms of paid benefits.

The figures show that British Columbia had 200,000 claims that were made to the Worker's Compensation Board, and the list goes on and on.

These are some of the economic costs that are we are paying for as Canadian taxpayers'. There are other costs which we cannot put a handle on. Those are the social costs. How can we measure the cost of the death of a member of the family, a friend, or an acquaintance?

The other issue which we also have to think of is the unpleasant situation that one might develop a fatal disease, a permanent disease, or long–term disabilities and the demoralization of an individual as a result of an incident that he or she might have.

In my view, while the bill is an excellent one, there is one aspect which the government should look into besides acknowledging April 28 as the day to mourn those who are killed. That is the aspect of prevention. We have to focus and put all of our energy and resources into prevention. In my view, if we are to invest money in training, education, and awareness in the workplace, we can deal with this issue a lot more effectively than to deal with the result of the problem.

Interestingly enough, just a couple of days ago there was a report in The Ottawa Citizen on a Canadian company which also has plants in the United States, Campbell's Soup. The report stated that 70 per cent of the Campbell's workers were found to have some sort of difficulty adapting to changes in the workplace and changing jobs within the workplace. That encouraged me to speak about the illiteracy issue.

The sad thing is that in the vast majority of our industry, other than the high tech industries, there is this terrible situation of illiteracy in our society. It is costing the Canadian economy approximately $10 billion, directly and indirectly. Businesses alone in our society are paying approximately $4.5 billion on an annual basis. One can appreciate the magnitude of the problem and the need for some sort of a proper strategical plan to deal with this issue. Of course, when there is an illiterate work force, there are likely to be more accidents happen in the workplace. People are more to get injured or killed as a result of that.

I cannot see anything in the long run that could handle or deal with the issue of incidents in the workplace better than prevention through education and training. Bill C–223, as proposed by the hon. member, is an excellent first step, but it is a first step. The federal government has to look at this issue as a package rather than look at it in bits and pieces.

We have to deal with this issue through education, through training, through a proper national strategy to deal with illiteracy in the work force, and with the issue of education within the work force and with the issue of free training within the work force. The vast majority of those people who are suffering as a result of that are the workers who are in their forties through sixties. They are the people who are paying the biggest price as a result of the unfortunate amount of illiteracy in the work force as a result of the change in terms of new technologies, new fields and new eras.

On a closing note, I would like to commend the government for adopting the bill of the hon. member. I hope that the Minister of Labour, in conjunction with the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship, in the very near future will map out some sort of a strategy so we can deal with this terrible, terrible disease of illiteracy in the work force and consider training and retraining within the work force.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I will be extremely brief. I had a speech I wanted to make today in support of the bill but, as has been indicated already, the government will adopt this bill and I think that itself should be celebrated so I will not make a long speech.

I had the honour and privilege to be briefly our party's labour critic some years ago and that became an area of special interest to the hon. member and I. We became friends through that. Later I had some satisfaction in a different role here having something to do with allowing our employees to be better able to negotiate with their employer here than they were able to before. As well, in my riding is Lindhurst Hospital which for those involved in rehabilitation therapy is a fairly special place. We see the consequences of work place unhappinesses. I only want to say this.

Today represents one of the things that the present Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland hoped to see some day when he introduced his reform package and that is that we would be able to do more of this in this institution. I want to congratulate the government for accepting a sensible idea and, specifically and importantly, I congratulate the hon. member for Churchill for his initiative. It is because of the possibility of McGrath's reforms and the initiatives of people like the hon. member for Churchill that we will make more progress in this place.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I just have a few short words. I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. member for Churchill for his bill.

As was mentioned by the member from Ottawa, who takes a lot of interest in the workplace, literacy, and numeracy, I also too, have a great interest in all this. It goes all the way back to the child, growing through youth, training, education, and health.

All that leads to less opportunities for accidents in the work place. I think it all ties together. Certainly the minister and the government are pleased to be supportive.

Madam Speaker, you will find that there has been consultation among all parties and that there is agreement to have this bill go to a legislative committee. I suggest that that be put to the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I just want to say that I was delighted to see the hon. member for Churchill table this bill in the House.

Madam Speaker, you don't see me rising very often to congratulate a New Democrat but today it is a pleasure to congratulate the hon. member on his excellent initiative.

Before I was elected to Parliament, I became familiar, through my work with the problems that exist in the construction industry. I have worked for engineering firms, and I was involved in the construction industry for 24 years. I saw the safety problems they had on construction sites and I remember the number of deaths that occurred annually, both in the consturction industry and industry in general.

It is therefore a real pleasure today to see that the House is unanimous in its approval, and I hope there will be other times when we will have the same kind of unanimity on other subjects. I say bravo to this excellent initiative, and it is a pleasure to support this bill, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I too would just like to rise and congratulate the member for Churchill before we put the question.

I would just like to mention to the member the significance of what this bill says. If we take a good look at it, it basically says: "A national day of mourning". That is not something to be overly proud of, the fact that we have to have a day to commemorate the death or injury of a lot of Canadians.

I want to bring forward the suggestion of my colleague from Ottawa. Basically this is the starting point of something very significant. It is not out of the question for the government to consider that this should be a national day, a holiday, in one sense; that is, an opportunity for workers all across the country to have the day off work in order to have conferences and to participate in educational endeavours and processes necessary to educate the public and the workers of just how large an economic and social problem this really is.

I bring that to the member's attention, because it is not pleasant when in this place we have to talk about people's deaths and the reasons why they are occurring in a country that is considered to be one of the most sophisticated and technological in the modern world.

I would like to congratulate the member. I ask members opposite who are in government to consider using this as a starting point, to push it just a little further, and to do what we have done for the environment, for example, which we had once totally ignored. Through initiatives that members made in this place we have carried it to the forefront.

I think the work force and the work place of Canadians is of the utmost importance to us all. We should think very seriously about going forward and not just standing still.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand that the House is ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I imagine there is unanimous consent to call it three o'clock.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock, the House stands adjourned until next Monday at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

PARLIAMENT HILL

SMOKING REGULATIONS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should demonstrate to Canadians that Members of Parliament and their support staff are subject to the same regulations enforced in federal buildings with regard to the smoking of tobacco products by banning immediately all smoking of tobacco products on Parliament Hill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise in the House to speak today on this important issue.

The issue comprises two things. One is the matter of a very serious health problem in Canada, indeed the world, and that is smoking and consumption of tobacco products. There is the impact on our health budget and on our population, generally.

The second aspect of it is the question of the House of Commons adhering to regulations that it has put forward, as well as setting an example for the rest of the country.

By the end of this Private Members' Hour, I would ask if the Chair will be ruling on a matter raised by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. He had made a plea, in a question of privilege, that smoking by members of the Conservative caucus on the other side in the lobby be curtailed or ended as per the requirements.

The motion that we are dealing with today, in attempting to curtail or at least prohibit smoking entirely on Parliament Hill, is very relevant. It asks that members of Parliament set an example by following the rules that they have laid down, especially in an area such as the House of Commons. It would be my hope that the Chair would take this very timely opportunity to answer that particular question of privilege and whether or not the rules and regulations imposed by the House will in fact in this place, the House of Commons, be followed.

The second thing that I would be asking today, probably by the same vehicle, is that the Speaker's office become involved in the matter of enforcement of the regulations of the House. The maintenance staff of the House of Commons report that 20 per cent of the offices are still permitting smoking to be carried on in the offices on the Hill. Apparently, they have kept a survey of offices in the simple matter of clearing out the ashtrays. The rules are not being adhered to. It would be my hope that, at the end of the day, that matter would be dealt with as well by the Speaker's office in an attempt to encourage members, support staff, and employees on Parliament Hill to follow through on it.

Why? It is a simple matter. If the House treats with contempt rules and regulations to attempt to preserve and enhance the health of Canadians, surely nobody else has to follow them. When I walk along beside a school yard, be it in British Columbia or as far away as Brookfield High School here in Ottawa, and see hundreds of young people in front of those schools smoking, I think we have an obligation as people in elected office to set an example to carry that out.

The thrust of this motion asks that there be no smoking on Parliament Hill, period. The reason for this is twofold: It is a serious health problem and there is a need for an example.

Hopefully, the question of privilege will be picked up today and the Speaker's office will treat as a serious matter that still about 20 per cent of the offices pay absolutely no heed to the question of smoking on the Hill.

• (1310)

The third item is that the gatherings at the doors are just intolerable. There are rights for people who do not smoke and those individuals who do should be moved off Parliament Hill if they intend to smoke.

The question of smoking is an interesting one. I would like to begin the main body of my remarks by quoting from a hearing of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment of the House of Representatives in the United States in July of 1988.

The matter before the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment in the House of Representatives revealed a document from the research department of Philip Morris by William L. Dunn, a researcher for them. He said we should understand clearly that "cigarettes should not be conceived of as a product", but that Philip Morris uses cigarettes only as a package to sell a drug, nicotine. The report states the product of this tobacco company is nicotine, and the cigarette and the other forms in which it is sold are simply the packaging. The report states:

> The cigarette is but one of many packaged layers. Think of the cigarettes pack as a storage container for a day's supply of nicotine. Think of cigarettes as a dispenser for a dose unit of nicotine, think of a puff of smoke as the vehicle for nicotine.

In short, before the American Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, it was clearly defined by the company itself that it was in the business of selling drugs. We in the House of Commons have got to adopt that approach to this product. In fact, the drug is defined as one that is more addictive than heroin.

It is ironic that there is not a smoker who does not say: "I want to quit, " and that smokers do not believe that this activity is a healthy activity. They are convinced by the information that it is detrimental to their health and they want to quit. Unfortunately, there is not an incentive that brings them to want to quit right now.

We have that opportunity on the Hill to clean up the act, in the government lobby by answering a question of privileges, and in the offices of members of Parliament by addressing this report from maintenance that says 20 per cent of the offices are still permitting smoking. That should happen and that should happen today.

The next point is that the health budget of Canada in 1987 ran something in the order of $46 billion. It was estimated that up to 5 per cent of that was treating people who voluntarily damage their health or the health of others by consumption of tobacco and smoking. It is interesting that we are talking in the order of $2 billion to $3 billion of the health budget expended in treating illnesses that are completely preventable, caused by a voluntary activity. If smoking stopped that area of illness that would disappear. Those health care resources could certainly be better used in treating children with cystic fibrosis, in expanding health care technology, and in community health programs. There are 1,001 areas, such as reducing the waiting lists in British Columbia for coronary artery transplants and open heart surgery that will save lives. This squandering of health care resources is a terrible situation.

The Parliament of Canada has an opportunity to set an example. Not only do we see that this is not enforced in the members' lobbies, this is not enforced in members' offices, and employees are permitted to smoke on the Hill. We have a nursing staff which operates health units on the Hill. Those health units do not have a statement of goals and objectives aimed at trying to assist people on the Hill who smoke to stop.

Mark my words, there is not a smoker who does not want to get out from under this habit. The consumption of nicotine is as powerful, if not more powerful, than heroin. The nurses on the Hill are a competent and committed staff, who do not have a set of objectives laid out for them by the human resources operation and who do not know how many people smoke on the Hill, who do not in any regular way offer quit-smoking courses, and who do not follow up. In an interview with the nursing staff, they indicated that there needs to be a budget allocation for that kind of activity. There needs to be a steady follow-up of how many people are smoking, how many people have tried to quit smoking and, again, a substantial, working, quit-smoking operation on this Hill that is an example to other industries and other operations in Canada. Rather than being in the back eddy of this activity, we should be leading it and setting an example for others to follow. The argument was that there was not enough, in terms of human resources, to undertake that kind of study.

At Algonquin College and at the University of Ottawa, there are student nursing programs in which part of their practicum is to undertake public health assignments. This assignment of undertaking a survey on Parliament Hill, assisting in setting up quit-smoking operations and doing some follow-up would be an excellent public health practicum for those nursing students of Algonquin College or the University of Ottawa. It is simply a matter of channelling resources that are already there and helping the education process on the Hill.

Tobacco kills more people than drug addiction to heroin, cocaine, or marijuana or than motor vehicle accidents. In the United States, every year, tobacco kills more people than those afflictions. It is interesting to note the amount of money and initiative spent for law enforcement in those areas and yet we pay minor lip service to attempting to prevent health damage due to tobacco. It is absolutely critical that we do that. On this Hill, the example could start.

I commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare for statements that he has made. Those statements must be translated into action. They are not strong enough. Remember that smokers want to quit, but they are in the grip of a powerful addiction, a powerful drug, promoted by tobacco companies, absolutely unscrupulous companies, which are targeting children and Third World countries and attempting to push this product. What we have is the Government of Canada making statements that it recognizes the problem but failing to act or failing to act strongly enough.

First, there must be an absolute ban on importing tobacco products into Canada. The health of the population of this country is at stake. We would not permit cocaine to come into Canada and yet it does less damage. We would not permit heroin or crack to come into this country. We put enormous law enforcement against those drugs, but we permit tobacco products to come in and kill far more than any of those products.

There must be an absolute ban on any kind of tobacco advertising and promotion by tobacco companies of events in this country. A stroke of the pen does that. It begins to erode and break the tobacco companies' market. It is an absolute must. The carrot and the stick, prohibit it.

There is no reason why we should assist smokers to gain the product. Increase the tax on tobacco—pick a figure—100 per cent a year for 10 years. By the end of 10 years, it would certainly be very difficult to smoke. There would be a powerful incentive to get involved in a quit-smoking program. The more incentives that we can provide, the more people will quit, the more healthy this population will be, in terms of the individual smokers as well as the people affected by the health hazards of secondary smoke.

Incidentally, it is projected that 330 people a year die of cancers and health problems related to secondary smoke such as spouses and children of smokers who are affected by this. We cannot tolerate it; we must prohibit it. We must prohibit the import, tax tobacco products and absolutely prohibit any tobacco advertising and promoting.

The next thing is that the Third World is being targeted to take up the slack where there is market erosion. Market expansion and profit expansion of the tobacco companies is going on and it is by exporting to Third World countries. A ban on the export of the product would fix it at least from Canadians. There should be an initiative through the World Health Organization and the United Nations to stop other countries from doing it. These are the things the government could be doing nationally on the prohibition side to create a healthier Canadian population, to prevent the death that goes on as a result of tobacco smoking, the selling of a drug that is killing Canadians. We could see that happen if the government took this seriously. I know the minister of health takes it seriously. I know the Liberal Party takes it seriously and certainly we take it seriously.

There is also the health promotion side of it, the carrot and the stick. We have no truck or trade with the tobacco companies. They are selling a drug. They are the purveyors of death. That is absolutely certain.

They are targeting our children, our teenagers in those schools. They are talking about selling smaller packs of cigarettes, selling packs of cigarettes with sunglasses in them, or CD disks in order to niche market this stuff to our kids. We have to stop it. It is absolutely ludicrous. We have to set the example, as members of Parliament and people who work in this institution, to other Canadians and to our own children that this has got to stop.

On the promotion side of it, we have a health unit on this Hill with dedicated people who staff it, who have offered quit-smoking programs on this Hill, but they do not seem to have the budget or the support of members of Parliament, of the Speaker, and of the human resources directorate. We should be putting a quit-smoking program in place. There should be a careful survey of smokers on Parliament Hill. There should be a highly advertised program to attract people into that with incentives: time off work to participate, not on a Friday night or a weekend or after work when everybody is tired and it is difficult to avoid your other commitments, but let us give an incentive where those people are paid to take that program.

Our benefit is simply a healthier population that has proven more productive. There are fewer days of illness for non-smokers than smokers. The workforce on this Hill would be more productive. The workforce on this Hill and the people who live and work here would be healthier. The return to health care budgets, to productivity, would offset the costs of providing a quit-smoking program.

Then we need some resources to follow up. Not everybody can shake this drug the first time around. If there is follow-up and continuing incentive and support to do it, we could be of tremendous assistance to stopping the smoking on this Hill. Nobody is attempting to remove the rights of smokers, to belittle them, badger them. It is simply too important a health care item.

It is the voluntary destruction of a person's health and the committing of our health care resources to treating them when those injuries occur, for the loss of productivity in common tasks that we all share here, that is preventable. We are all the beneficiaries of that. We must move on it, Mr. Speaker, and we must be strong.

In terms of the taxation item, if there was an enormous effort to tax the industry and to prevent the development of this industry in Canada, we would have to look seriously at conversion. There is no reason that tobacco farmers should be totally and economically hung out to dry. There should be a move in this country to reduce production by 10 per cent a year to the year 2000, when we are out of the business totally.

The taxes raised could assist farmers to move into different operations. The incentive again is to provide grants or forgivable loans to individuals who convert from tobacco to another product. We could attack this from the bottom of the industry, where tobacco is grown and processed, to the very front end of it where our children are standing out in front of the elementary schools, the junior secondary schools, and the senior secondary schools initiating themselves into a habit that is going to kill quite a number of them.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of people who wish to speak on this issue this afternoon. It is my hope that your office will rule on the question of privilege of the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants that this institution must not permit smoking within the confines of the House of Commons, the Chamber, or its opposition lobbies.

The Speaker's office should take the initiative to stop smoking in members' offices. How can we turn around to our employees and say: "There is a penalty for you smoking on this Hill," and yet at the same time permit it elsewhere. That example has got to happen, Mr. Speaker.

Let us get into our health unit and order the director general of the human resources branch to get a clear statement of goals and objectives, to get a powerful stop-smoking program on this Hill and with the incentives to make it successful in the follow-up.

The last statement is an appeal to the minister of health. Good so far, but statements are not enough. We need a powerful attempt to stop this industry in its tracks and save Canadian lives that are going to be lost, and lives of our children that are going to be lost.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the member for North Island—Powell River for reminding us once again of the considerable importance and significant act that was taken by this Parliament not very long ago in its previous session. I think I am right in reminding him that it was one of his colleagues, the former member for Broadview—Greenwood, Lynn McDonald, who initiated this very important step that was made here in the previous Parliament.

Bill C-27, the Non-Smokers' Health Act received Royal Assent on July 29, 1989, along with the regulations made pursuant to the act, and came into force on December 29, 1989.

Members will recall that that bill was given all-party approval. It also received extensive support from health organizations, employer and employee groups, consumer organizations, anti-smoking groups and the public at large.

Essentially, the act prohibits smoking in the workplaces under federal jurisdiction except in designated smoking rooms or areas. Perhaps to the degree that the member for North Island—Powell River is able to point out that we have not sufficiently eliminated smoking in either members' offices or in other parts of this building, it may be partly attributable to the fact that I am not aware if we have made available any alternatives for those who on their own private decision have continued to smoke. Certainly in the winter and other times of the year we see people outside of these buildings and other public buildings puffing furiously. This may not be the most humane or even sensible way to proceed.

There is no doubt, however, that research has demonstrated that breathing second-hand tobacco smoke contributes to, or causes a variety of health problems. Now that we have eliminated in the first instance the public acceptability of smoking in public buildings, there is this problem for those who are very much affected by second-hand smoke.

Tobacco smoke contains in excess of 4,000 different chemicals. Some of them are highly toxic, and 43 at least are known to be cancer-causing substances. Studies show that second-hand tobacco smoke worsen systems of pre-existing conditions, such as angina, emphysema, acute respiratory diseases, asthma, hay fever and other allergies. Prolonged exposure may also increases instances of lung cancer and heart disease.

A recent report examined the effects of second-hand tobacco smoke and makes reference to the United States Surgeon-General's conclusion that involuntary smoking can cause lung cancer. Children of parents who smoke face increased risks of respiratory disease. The separation of smokers from non-smokers in the same air space may reduce, but does not entirely eliminate exposure to environmental tobacco smoke for non-smokers.

A recent study by the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States states that if you add up all the lung cancer deaths from other cancer risks which the EPA regulates, the total number of deaths from all those sources would be less than the number of deaths now attributed to environmental tobacco smoke in an indoor environment.

The purpose of the act, therefore, is to protect both employees and the public who have access to the workplace from the adverse effects of such exposure. Under the act, employers under federal jurisdiction have a responsibility to ensure that persons do not smoke, except in designated smoking rooms or smoking areas. If an employee contravenes the act, the employer is expected after due warning to take disciplinary measures against that employee, consistent with standard employer-employee disciplinary practices. In large measure, however, the act is self-regulating, although there are more stringent enforcement measures available in cases of flagrant contradictions.

The act has been in effect for some 10 months and I believe that it has been received in the workplace with remarkable equanimity. My friend for North Island—Powell River mentions that there are still 20 per cent of the offices where there is the obvious evidence of those who are still smoking.

An equally remarkable statistic is the fact that 80 per cent of the offices do not now reflect that. When one thinks about the heavy incidents of smoking, politics and smoke-filled back rooms, I think in the course of less than a year it has been a remarkable, most impressive change, one that is very significant. I want to say a word about that in a moment.

Attitudes toward smoking have changed rapidly and profoundly. The right of workers to a healthy smoke-free environment is no longer a matter of debate. When we think about environmental issues generally and matters of personal health and safety specifically, we have to say that in terms of what has happened in the Parliament Buildings over the last year or two nothing is more impressive, in my estimation, than the very real change of atmosphere—no pun intended—with respect to the way in which smoking, if not entirely eliminated, has been reduced so substantially as to be truly significant.

Over the course of the last year you will recall that collaborating with you, Sir, and with members of the environment committee—and I would like to pay tribute to both, including my seatmate from Parry Sound—Muskoka and others—we have been attempting to make the Parliament Buildings and environs a model of environmental responsibility.

Another example which I think is quite impressive is that of styrofoam cups, which have been used in abundance here for years. We were up to close to one million styrofoam cups per year. In the course of making the transition away from styrofoam in the last year, we have eliminated by half a million the number of styrofoam cups presently being used.

Major changes in lifestyle and personal practices can take place when there is a will to do so. With respect to smoking, we have already been impressed by the changes that have taken place. I would like to emphasize that the Non-Smokers' Health Act applies to all workplaces under federal jurisdiction, including the House of Commons and the Senate. Section 2 of the act is explicit on that point. Members of Parliament and their support staff are subject to the same requirements as the rest of those under federal jurisdiction. We have ensured that we have not imposed on others legislation with which we ourselves are not prepared to comply.

It is true, as the hon. member for North Island—Powell River has suggested, that there is still 20 per cent of the offices where there are some incidents of smoking. I would like to commend the other 80 per cent, that other four-fifths that have made this very real change in lifestyle and practice in their own offices and environs.

There are still going to be complaints—and I believe we should be aware of them and take appropriate responsibility—about members who are smoking in restricted areas such as their own offices. We simply cannot allow this to continue indefinitely. I certainly strongly recommend to you, Mr. Speaker, that all members of Parliament and their support staff take upon themselves to comply with the regulations in the Non-Smokers' Health Act and thereby set an important example for all the very real and important reasons suggested by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River and certainly well known to all members of this House.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, cigarette smoke adversely affects smokers and non-smokers alike. It harms adults and children as well as the unborn in the wombs of their mothers. Yes, smoking is a serious hazard to health.

I therefore rise today to speak on this particular motion from our colleague from North Island—Powell River to reinforce the concern I and other Canadians have and should have about this deadly poison: smoking.

I am confident that all members of this House will agree that smoking is a health hazard. Since the hon. member proposed his motion on June 27, 1989, we have seen improvement in the House, as noted, from the House of Commons smoking policy dated November 1989. We have seen improvement, but we would like to reinforce the idea of the danger of smoking.

Smoking related diseases kill some 35,000 Canadians every year. Second-hand smoke causes about 350 deaths each year in Canada. Deaths due to smoking are not due only to cancer that victims develop. No doubt smoke is a class a carcinogen in the ranks of asbestos and benzene. However, deaths from smoking also occur from other chronic debilitating lung diseases such as emphysema, chronic bronchitis and bronchiectasis—diseases that make it difficult for patients to breathe freely. This disease not only kills but also incapacitates a large number of Canadians.

This issue is not getting the prompt attention necessary to make this disease disappear from Canada. Regulations governing labelling of cigarette packages have again been delayed by this government. We have seen that. It appears the tobacco lobby is allowed to win some battles. We cannot afford to be complacent. We cannot afford to sit down. Seeing the dangers of smoke, we have to remain vigilant.

Ten years or so ago the idea of banning smoking on the job would have appeared outrageous to most Canadians. Today we should be outraged that smoking is still allowed. The challenge is clear. Ten years from now we should be able to say and wonder why smoking started in the first place in the history of mankind and continued to be condoned and abetted by governments. I do not want to wait until the turn of the century for cessation of smoking to happen. Smoking is killing our adults, is killing our growing children, and is even killing the unborn.

The House of Commons should set the example for the rest of the country and completely ban smoking to the extent that no one is allowed to smoke on the grounds of Parliament Hill, let alone on the doorsteps. I am promoting today that smoking be prohibited everywhere and anywhere on government property. We have an obligation to set the model. We should be a paragon to others.

Those who do smoke, we must understand them as well. We must provide them with the means and the necessary resources for them to quit the habit with ease. According to senior scientists at the Addiction Research Foundation in Toronto, those who try to quit the smoking habit face three difficult hurdles: nicotine addiction, psychological habituation, and emotional reaction. Each smoker is a separate clinical case. Any smoking cessation program, therefore, should be tailor made to the individual. I congratulate the leadership of the House of Commons for allowing an assistance program to be available to smokers who want to stop smoking, but we must see to it that everyone is making use of this program.

Commercial gimmicks should not replace proven effective methods. For the method to be successful we should have policies in place so as to include the necessity of providing psychological and financial help to those who want to quit smoking. As along as a person wants to quit the habit, the federal government should be there to provide all the necessary assistance.

In the interim, designated places must be available for those who cannot yet break the habit. Designated spaces ought to be adequately ventilated. As well, the employees of the tobacco industry must be helped to find alternative types of work. If we do this then we are serious in our purpose. We realize that smoking is so harmful that even if only the cost of health care is taken into account in our country, there is a big price to pay, not to mention loss of human lives.

One approach that has been proven effective to further counteract smoking, particularly among the young, is to increase taxes on smoking. We should do that. We should tax smoking to death, if need be, but we must remember that that is only one step. We must link health care policy and tax policy together if we are to stop this bad habit in the country.

I am very pleased to speak to this motion. I salute my colleague for bringing it forth for further consideration. If we have the will we can always find the way.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to address the House on the evolution of the Non-Smokers' Health Act and how it was developed to ensure that the health of visitors and employees of Parliament Hill would be protected.

The legislation which eventually became the Non-Smokers' Health Act was introduced in the House of Commons as Bill C-204, which became the act. It was supported on both sides of the House and Senate, as well as by various groups representing labour, health organizations, consumers, employers, citizens, anti-smoking groups, et cetera, and given Royal Assent in June 1988.

By Order in Council in December 1988, certain ministers were made responsible for the implementation and administration of the act. I take exception to the hon. member for North Island—Powell River suggesting that we have not been leading in this initiative. It is really misrepresenting this government's actions to the people of Canada.

I want to point out a couple of areas that I am sure the hon. member would applaud if he were to stop and think about them. For example, when the Minister of Transport, who is one of the designated ministers I talked about earlier, took the case of the new legislation, Bill C-204, to the common carriers, the carriers of Canada immediately followed the regulations, including Air Ontario based in London, Ontario, and brought in non-smoking flights. This applied to flights to international destinations as well.

The member would certainly join with me in congratulating Air Canada which is a way out in front in this particular endeavour by having no smoking at all on its flights in the future.

Clearly the act which became law under this government was passed on to Canadians who picked it up and are moving ahead with gusto.

Last June this Parliament had the opportunity to host 300 of our colleagues from 30 countries in the Council of Europe sponsored environment conference here in Ottawa. We brought in this law, Bill C-204 with all its regulations, into effect, so the Europeans learned first-hand from Canadian parliamentarians that possibly they could take some of these regulations and these ideas for legislation home to their own countries and bring non-smokers' rights to the attention of their own legislatures.

There has been clear leadership both within this House as well as within this government. I think the member for North Island—Powell River could reflect on that and say: yes, this government has been active and has been very supportive of the health of Canadians in wanting to do everything about it.

That is not to say that there have not been problems. In its original form, the act contains certain deficiencies that would have made it difficult to administer and apply. For example, it lacked a system of inspection and enforcement and had as well technical and drafting problems.

For example, section 3 of the act required that every employer provide a smoke-free environment in which all employees could perform the duties that are directly or indirectly related to their employment. This requirement would have made it necessary for concentrations of tobacco smoke to be measured, which technically and administratively is not feasible with any degree of accuracy.

There was also confusion about the terms smoking room and smoking area, as well as the definition of employer. Clearly there were things to overcome, but again our government has not been negligent and has worked on these. Without departing from the spirit and intent of the act, amendments were sought to provide a system of inspection and enforcement, to correct its deficiencies and to enhance its workability.

Bill C-27, an act to amend the Non-Smokers' Health Act, was passed by the House of Commons on June 26, 1989. It is very clear that this government has not fumbled the ball. It has stayed on top of this issue because it knows that it is important to Canadians. It knows that the health of Canadians is first and foremost on their minds, as any good government would. In fact, policies and regulations must be in effect that will help Canadians as we move forward to be the champions of the 21st century. It is evident that we already have legislation designed to prevent smoking on Parliament Hill except in designated rooms. It should be emphasized that such rooms cannot be members' offices.

The employer is responsible for enforcing the Non-smokers' Health Act in the workplace. If workers do not abide by the rules in the act, the employer is supposed to take appropriate action. Such action would first involve a warning to the employee who violates the act. If this type of response proves to be unsuccessful in achieving the employee's compliance with the act, further action with respect to that worker would have to be taken by the employer. This action should be consistent with traditional disciplinary procedures established by the employer in consultation with employees.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that goes without saying, it is common sense. The fact that Canadians are grasping this act of the Government of Canada, Bill C-204, shows that they know that its time has come, that the health of Canadians is at stake. Canadians have risen to that challenge both nationally through their actions, the fact that they do not ask government to give them no-smoking campaigns, and they do not ask the government to pay for them to stop being smokers. They know the responsibility is theirs. They are readily coming forward, accepting this responsibility to their fellow Canadians and acting appropriately.

This message has not got lost on our colleagues that we share this world with. The fact that other parliamentarians as they leave this House see how far we have come on such health measures as this one, are now going back to their legislatures around the world seriously looking at what Canada, what this Progressive Conservative government has done for Canadians and saying these people know the way, they are the future. It is a pleasure to speak on this today.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on Motion M-510 which was introduced by the hon. member for North Island—Powell River and which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should demonstrate to Canadians that Members of Parliament and their support staff are subject to the same regulations enforced in Federal buildings with regard to the smoking of tobacco products by banning immediately all smoking of tobacco products on Parliament Hill.

I listened very closely to all my colleagues who spoke on this issue.

[English]

I do agree with him totally that smoking is not good for one's health, whether one smokes or someone is smoking next to one. I think it has been proven. Everyone understands that. Practically everyone seems to accept this.

I think the approach is one of a totalitarian state. We give people authority sometimes but they are just a group of do-gooders wanting to protect the health of everyone, including their own. Of course, we have to be careful.

I am a non-smoker. I have never smoked any time during my life except for once when I was 14 years old. I tried a cigarette and I was so sick that never, never again did I ever touch one. I got the feeling that I was absolutely allergic to it. However, I understand that some people are not allergic to smoking like I am, but my allergy does not make me Attila the Hun where I command and order everyone to do as I feel is best for them.

That is the part that I really find disgusting in this approach. We should have programs.

[Translation]

—programs which encourage people not to smoke, programs which encourage people to quit smoking, programs to ban advertising to promote smoking. Smokers have various options, mainly cigarettes, cigars, and pipes. I am sure my colleagues all agree that we used to have a generation of cigar smokers—practically extinct by now, thank God!—a practice that was absolutely disgracious. It was enough to make you choke and, besides, it stank!

• (1350)

There were people who smoked a pipe and some still do. Some people don't mind the smell at all, in fact they enjoy it.

As far as cigarette smoking is concerned, the smell is far less offensive. In the case of cigarettes, we see people who have been inveterate smokers for many years. For some people it is pretty hard, and in some cases almost impossible, to shake the habit and quit smoking. I know members of this House, employees, friends of the family and even family members who smoke.

I think the key word is moderation. First of all, people should be encouraged not to smoke. However, we should not go overboard with our regulations. We must not be stricter than our own rules. When we go past public buildings, whether they are federal, provincial, municipal or regional, where the rule is: No smoking, it is a common sight to see employees, winter and summer, come out of these buildings and pollute the space outside the building, and I am referring to visual pollution. There is also pollution in the real sense, when they drop their cigarette stubs all over the place, because the people who run the buildings close their eyes to the problem and refuse to co-operate and accommodate inveterate smokers by providing ash receptacles to keep the place clean. I think it is ridiculous that enforcing these rules means people have to go outside to smoke in the middle of winter. I wonder how much sick leave is taken as a result of the fact that people are forced to go outside to smoke for ten minutes, without a coat on, and then go back to their jobs.

I think it is unfair that people who are addicted to smoking don't have a place where they are allowed to smoke. I think the Minister of Transport's decision to prevent smoking on board aircraft is ridiculous if it applies to all flights and all aircraft. There should be a space for people who are addicted to smoking and who have to smoke.

I repeat, I hate the smell of smoke, and I can't stand people smoking in front of me. However, what I find even more distressing is the authoritarian attitude of certain people——do-gooders who decide what is good for other people and they are going to apply it as if they were Attila the Hun or the chief of police. They go all over the place like police officers being absolutely disagreeable with everyone and not being accommodating in the least bit.

This motion says that everywhere, all the time, there is to be an immediate ban on all smoking of tobacco products on Parliament Hill. I believe that there should be areas where those who are stuck with smoking are allowed to smoke, and that these people do not have to rely on trickery, cheating, hiding, and all kinds of other activities so that they can have their short smoke.

Mr. Speaker, because of the autocratic and totalitarian approach of this motion, I would vote against it.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I was listening very carefully to the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester who summarized his position, saying that policies and legislation in this area were too authoritarian.

To a certain extent, he is probably right. However, I would like to mention a very specific case in my riding, which concerns residents who work at the tax centre in Shawinigan South. There are 1,500 employees. Before Parliament passed two bills—we voted twice on this subject—half of the 1,500 employees at the tax centre of Shawinigan South were acknowledged smokers. They were obviously not very pleased when they heard that the Parliament of Canada had passed legislation prohibiting smoking at their place of work.

Subsequently, the federal government introduces policies to help these people quit smoking—which can be dangerous to your health—in the workplace. They held demonstrations. They came to my office. They protested vehemently because they felt their rights had been violated. In this country, people seem to have more rights than responsibilities. So in this context, the Shawinigan South tax centre offered its employees a chance to take courses at taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Speaker, today, nearly 75 per cent of smokers at the Shawinigan South tax centre have quit smoking. When we meet them today, they say: You forced us, but you did us a big favour by making us give up smoking. The initial negative reaction among federal employees in my riding was very strong. They were emotionally and personally shocked by the fact that they had to give up an old habit, unhealthy for them and for society. They found it very difficult to accept the federal government's decision.

Today, the same employees are delighted, at least most of them. There may be a few, as the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester pointed out, who go outside to smoke the way people do here in front of the Parliament Buildings. These people are sick, and that is why the legislation comes under the jurisdiction of Health and Welfare Canada, Mr. Speaker.

When we see people who have to go outside at 30 below, outside the Parliament Buildings here in Ottawa or in my own riding in Shawinigan, I think we have ample proof that this is a situation where the legislation must be enforced in order to help people who are often unable to make this kind of decision on their own.

In this perspective, I think the motion presented by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party is a very important one, and that we should support it. As members of Parliament, we should set an example, whether we are on the opposition side or the government side, to the rest of Canada.

Viewed from that standpoint, Mr. Speaker, some people might suggest that the motion of the New Democratic Party member is redundant but at least it is a timely reminder to all of us here on Parliament Hill and to all Canadians who are listening to us that it is very important to protect our health. There is no such thing as the right to destroy one's health, nor is there any such thing as the right to destroy the health of people around us. Nowhere in any parliamentary institution worldwide is there a right to destroy one's own health.

Mr. Speaker, if there were no highway safety code in your riding, drivers would breeze right through red lights. We put up traffic lights to remind people that we live in an orderly society. We have laws and regulations because we are not living in the forests or in northern regions where rules may be less restrictive.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pronovost: I see my colleague from Abitibi does not take kindly to my remarks about northern regions, but I certainly did not mean to be little his riding. We have to take an all-encompassing approach to this bill. It does not restrict the rights of the citizens, it protects them yet at the same time it confirms that people who are victims of the tobacco habit have responsibilities, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hour provided for the considerations of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

[English]

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, this is Canada Career Week. It is a national event that promotes the need for young Canadians to focus on their futures while still in school.

Communities all across Canada are pitching in to stage a range of imaginative events. Students, teachers, parents, the government, and the business community are all taking a role in helping young Canadians to look ahead to their career opportunities.

In my riding of Calgary Southwest, our Canada Career Week committee is hosting a breakfast forum for about 80 counselling professionals. The theme is: "Managing Your Career to Manage Your Life". We hope to create a ripple effect throughout the school system that will influence young people to stay in school to achieve their career objectives. In this way, we are joining hundreds of other events all across the country to help young people make their own career decisions.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE PROGRAMS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my many years in continuing education here in the nation's capital taught me the importance of heritage language programs to both children and adults.

In this country we pride ourselves in our cultural diversity and our tolerance. There is no better way to appreciate each other than by encouraging these heritage languages to be enriched and shared.

[Translation]

Everywhere in Canada, heritage language schools are feeling the pinch of federal funding cuts.

[English]

I call upon the government to reconsider its slashing of funds to heritage language schools and to heed the request of those who rallied here on Parliament Hill, this past Saturday, requesting the same.

ISRAEL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the last two years have likely been one of the most difficult periods in the history of Israel. Many Jews around the world are feeling a sense of alienation and a lack of support for Israel's genuine pursuit of peace and self-determination.

There have been many instances of unbalanced media reports. Where was the world outcry against the terrorist whose bomb killed Marnie Kimmelman, of metropolitan Toronto, on a beach in Tel Aviv in July?

The recent killing of almost 20 Palestinians at Temple Mount was indeed tragic and sad. I support Israel in refusing to receive a United Nations investigation team. The tragic incident has been investigated by a government-appointed inquiry and its findings have been made public.

This is a time when friends of Israel, such as Canada, must stand up and be counted.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the government's policies continue to drive Canadians across the U.S.-Canadian border to spend their money in the United States. A study tabled in my community last week revealed that $100 million was spent on the American side of the border for goods and services from our community alone.

Why are Canadians following this practice? Government policies such as high interest rates, the free trade agreement, a general cynicism, even hatred of this government, and the proposed GST are all factors.

I ask the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, who has shown at least some concern, if he will ask the Finance Minister to lower interest rates? Will he ask the Finance Minister to kill the GST? Will he ask the Minister for International Trade to revoke the free trade agreement? Will he ask the Minister of National Revenue to offer some tax relief for the border communities of the country?

Will he take any of these actions or will he say nothing and do nothing, as he has done for the past two years?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Congress has passed a new clean air act, which President George Bush is expected to sign, officially, in a matter of days.

This American legislation will help reduce urban smog, emissions of toxic chemicals and the acid rain that has ravaged the lakes, rivers and forests of the United States and Eastern Canada, including the Abitibi area.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney said, on behalf of all Canadians, that he was pleased with this American initiative, which will benefit present and future generations of Canadians and Americans.

Mr. Speaker, Saturday, the Prime Minister paid tribute to the many Canadians and Americans who worked on this bill. Today, I wish to pay tribute to the Prime Minister for the leadership he has shown, for the benefit of our country and Quebecers.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in January, 1988, the Canadian government said it would continue to test Cruise missiles until progress was made on disarmament.

It is now 1990 and we have seen a major change in east-west relations with détente, co-operation, and arms reductions. Yet, today, another U.S. Cruise missile will be tested in northern Canada.

We are now in the post cold war era, with a treaty on intermediate nuclear weapons already signed and treaties on conventional arms, chemical weapons, and strategic missiles well advanced. What then is the purpose of continued testing of U.S. Cruise missiles in Canada?

Nuclear weapons are still one of the greatest threats to human existence. On October 15, the Soviet Union reaffirmed its readiness to become a non-nuclear state, if other nuclear countries did the same. Canada should support that goal and put an immediate end to Cruise missile testing in Canada.

SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, one out of every 100 Canadians is affected by schizophrenia.

This disease uses 7 per cent of all hospital beds and is responsible for almost $2 billion in hospital expenses each year. Yet the federal government's contribution to research for this serious mental disorder is only $2 million.

Schizophrenia is a disease about which we know very little. We have some ideas about what causes it and how it can be treated, but we are nowhere near an understanding of this serious mental disorder. The amount of federal expenditure on research is out of line with the seriousness and the economic and social impact of this disease in Canadian society.

I would encourage the government to provide more funds for research to reduce health care costs and to improve the lot of those affected with schizophrenia.

MEDIA OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on November 1 the oldest continuously published newspaper in Canada, an important institution to both the citizens of Kingston, Ontario and the people of Canada, will cease to be. The Kingston Whig-Standard, an independent newspaper since 1824, will be absorbed into the Southam corporate empire.

Concentration of media ownership is much more than simply a merger, an acquisition or a bottom-line statement and I caution the new owners of the Whig-Standard accordingly.

A newspaper of this stature is something of a sacred trust. It achieved respect for its integrity and quality of writing by diligence and hard work, but as the government's own actions prove, sacred trusts and integrity can easily be abandoned. This development can be viewed with alarm. Something vital to civic life, news and information is becoming less distinct and less connected to the community.

It is time for the Standing Committee on Culture and Communications to live up to its commitment and hold hearings into the concentration of ownership within this and other media.

CANADIAN ORIENTATION WEEK

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, a number of activities are taking place throughout the country to mark Canadian Orientation Week. In every region, Manpower Canada advisers will be telling students about the reality of the labour market and the disastrous consequences of quitting school. These employment officials are supported in their mission by orientation counsellors from comprehensive schools. They will be there to answer questions from students who will also have an opportunity to watch a video on the various careers open to them.

October 28 to November 3 is Canadian Orientation Week throughout the country, and the aim this year is to convince students that they should remain in school until graduation so they will be in a better position to face the future. That neatly sums up our objective, which is to help young people be fully aware of the importance of completing their studies.

Thanks to this initiative, Mr. Speaker, young Canadians should find it easier to conciliate their choice of career with the ever more internationalized labour market.

WOOD BUFFALO NATIONAL PARK

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the 3,200 bison in Wood Buffalo National Park are the only remaining free-roaming herd in the world.

Last February, I stated in the House that the government would be making the largest wildlife management mistake in the history of the country if it proceeded with the eradication of the Wood Buffalo herd. When the environmental panel recommended total slaughter in August, I immediately wrote to the Deputy Prime Minister and asked him to reconsider the options.

Today, the aboriginal people, particularly the chiefs of the region and the MLA for Tu Nede, Don Morin, have hopefully been successful in convincing the government that it would be wrong in doing anything but salvaging the Wood Buffalo herd.

Large questions remain about the geographical occurrences of the diseases, the genetic significance of the bison, and the environmental impact of a policy of total eradication. The ecological integrity of all national parks would be threatened.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, there is a problem in the way gas retailers are setting their pump prices. The pump price is a reflection of upstream production costs. Consumers are aware that costs must be covered and they accept this.

What they have a hard time accepting is the method of pricing which delays the increase in the pump price until the supply has made its way through the production chain. This problem is emphasized by the rising pump prices seen throughout the lower mainland and in my riding of Fraser Valley East, while crude prices have dropped significantly. Valley drivers now pay the same as Vancouver, even though Vancouver has an additional transportation tax.

The existence of low crude prices and high pump prices is incongruous and assaults the sensibilities of the consumer. Pump pricing that reflects the price of crude is a more appropriate system. Perhaps the first in, last out method of supply pricing should be changed to last in, first out. This would prevent any misperception of gouging and ensure a measure of congruity between the wellhead and the pump price.

The industry needs to take a serious look at pricing policy. In the valley, 69.9 cents a litre is out of sync with the rest of Canada and far too high.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in 1988, when the government introduced legislation to privatize Air Canada, the Deputy Prime Minister said in reference to the employees: "Those people have pride in their jobs, pride in their company, and hope and confidence in their future."

Given the recent lay-offs of some 2,900 employees at Air Canada, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister would be so bold as to repeat his statement.

There is no doubt on this side of the House that privatizing Air Canada was not a wise move on the part of the government. The privatization only temporarily solved the airline's financial troubles. The government could have followed the lead of former Liberal governments in helping the airline restructure itself and therefore protect Air Canada's thousands and thousands of workers.

The same government is now in the process of privatizing Petro-Canada. How many more jobs are at risk? What will it take for the government to realize that privatizing in itself does not resolve financial difficulties and that it puts too many workers in danger of losing their jobs.

It is time for the government to live up to its commitment of providing employment for its citizens, instead of taking them away, especially during these recessionary times.

PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, when the Conservatives were elected in 1984, the Prime Minister said Canada was open for business. Under free trade, everything in Canada is now up for sale. And guess who has cashed in on this? None other than Premier Vander Zalm of B.C. His sale of Fantasy Gardens, loosely described as a theme park, has now been approved because it is a net benefit to Canada.

The Conservative Premier of B.C. has welcomed free trade, likes selling off Canada, and now even likes the GST. His government officials have been working with Revenue Canada, co-ordinating the implementation of the GST on provincial fees and licences.

The Premier should call an election now so that the people of B.C. can comment on his record in office. You're no quitter, Mr. Premier. Call an election.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, last week the government announced plans to increase the number of independent, skilled or educated immigrants coming to Canada. This is to replace the 60,000 people leaving Canada each year and to help offset Canada's low birth rate.

The Reform Party wants to cut immigration but offers no specifics. How will we be able to keep the economy on track with a declining birth rate and an aging population? Who will pay for Canada's pensions and social programs?

The Reform Party preys on people's fears. I challenge Preston Manning to come clean with Canadians. Where would he set immigration levels? What are his policies? Why is he silent? We all know what he is against, but what is he for?

LABRADOR

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, every member of the House of Commons accepts the status quo as no longer sufficient to meet Canada's future constitutional needs. We all understand the need for tolerance and understanding as the nation begins the process of developing a new national consensus.

That is why I and many Canadians are disturbed by the proposals of members of the Quebec wing of the Conservative Party of Canada, as reported in today's The Toronto Star, to sever Labrador from the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and to attach Labrador to the province of Quebec.

That kind of proposal does not contribute to national understanding and building a national consensus. It contributes to division.

I call upon the Conservative Party of Canada—especially the Prime Minister of Canada—to reject that approach to nation building.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, on a national CBC radio program, the chief government Whip, a senior spokesperson for the government, speaking about the GST said: "If anybody is going to get hurt it is the central part of this country, Ontario and Quebec, under the GST."

We agree with the chief government Whip when he says that Ontario and Quebec with their 16 million people are going to be devastated by the GST. We also believe that the rest of Canada, the Atlantic and the west, is going to be devastated by the GST.

Does the Prime Minister agree with the statement made on national radio yesterday by the chief government Whip? If he does, will he axe the tax now and not wait until it is done by the Liberals after the next election?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asks if I agree with a given statement.

I agree with the statement made by Mr. Chrétien which is quoted in The Toronto Star of March 5, 1990: "It would be irresponsible for the Liberals to promise to scrap the GST without offering an alternative."

Mr. Chrétien told The Globe and Mail two days later: "We [Liberals] cannot reasonably make a commitment that there will not be a consumption tax."

A few days later, he told The Winnipeg Sun: "I cannot say if I will kill the GST, or I will not kill the GST. You have to tell people where you'd get the $25 billion."

Indeed, tell us where you are going to get the $25 billion.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to tell us whether he agrees with only one statement, the statement made by one of his chief spokespersons, the chief Conservative Whip, on national radio yesterday when he said: "If anybody is going to get hurt, it is the central part of this country, Ontario and Quebec, under the GST."

Again, I ask him if he agrees with that statement, which is correct also as far as the rest of the country is concerned. I ask him: Will he axe that tax now and not wait until the next election when it will be done by the Liberals who will be on the other side of the House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friends on the other side would, of course, want me to examine the context in which any particular statement was made.

I have just been informed by the Whip that there was a debate going on between him and Mr. Preston Manning of the Reform Party. I would want to carefully examine the context in which it was said.

Not having seen the statement, I want to tell the House that time and time again the Whip of the Conservative Party, who is seated right here, has gone to Calgary and has defended the interests of a national, united government against attempts to hive off Canada into small regional parts. Rather than criticize the Whip of the Conservative Party, the Leader of the Opposition should be encouraging his Whip to do precisely the same thing.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that the chief government Whip took this position in Calgary. That must explain why, on the weekend, the provincial Conservatives started to divorce themselves completely from the federal Conservatives because of their dissatisfaction with Conservative policies like the GST.

And people in Quebec will wonder why the Prime Minister is not willing to deny the statement made by the chief government Whip, and I quote: "If anybody is going to get hurt it is the central part of this country, Ontario and Quebec, under the GST." If the Prime Minister does not agree with this statement, why does he not deny it? Is he going to withdraw the GST to avoid causing any harm to the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the GST will generate about $9 billion worth of new economic activity across Canada. The chief government Whip was telling Mr. Manning and his audience that Alberta would benefit the most: an increase of 2.8 per cent in economic growth compared with slightly less in other provinces, and he was perfectly justified in making the statement in this context.

[English]

Mr. Marchi: What about the divorce?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "What about the divorce?" It may very well be that the Conservatives in Alberta will find it convenient to have an exclusively provincial party. That is why the provincial Liberals divorced themselves from the federal Liberals eight years ago in Alberta, and 25 years ago in Quebec.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is extraordinary to stand here and listen to the Prime Minister say that he agrees with his chief Whip, who said that the GST was going to have the most devastating impact on Ontario and Quebec.

Is this the Prime Minister's view of nation building?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Willowdale should not get so exercised. He, too, should read the transcript very carefully.

What the Whip was indicating was that there will be about $9 billion of new economic activity generated in Canada as a result of the GST. It will create thousands of new jobs, many of them in Ontario. One of the chief regions to benefit will be western Canada, where there will be an increase of 2.5 per cent of economic growth in those provinces.

I think that is good news for Alberta and it is news that my hon. friend would want to celebrate.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that even the Prime Minister now realizes, because he agrees with his Whip, that there is going to be a negative impact right across this country from the imposition of the GST.

On June 8 of this year the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology said: "This government's record for industrial development has been excellent."

Manufacturing bankruptcies are up 36 per cent. Since January 1989, Canada has lost 133,000 or 6.2 per cent of its manufacturing jobs.

The only things that this government knows how to manufacture are unemployment and a made-in-Canada recession. When is this minister going to start acting like the minister for industry and insist that his government reverse its high interest rate, high dollar policy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct the record for my hon. friend where he indicated that I acknowledged that there would be a decrease in economic activity as a result of the GST. I did no such thing. I have repeatedly said, including today, that there will be an increase of $9 billion in economic activity across the country which will result in thousands of new jobs in Canada.

It is consistent with the creation—

An hon. member: The lion's share goes to the west.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is talking about the west. When I became Prime Minister, the unemployment rate in British Columbia was almost 15 per cent. It is down to 8.6 per cent and 270,000 new jobs have been created in B.C., the largest since the end of the Second World War.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister doesn't seem to think the comments made by his party Whip are a very serious matter. My question to the Prime Minister is, whether he would agree that his government and his Whip made a mistake and that it is not very useful in this country to have tensions between its various regions. Is he prepared to deny what his Whip said right now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is never useful for Canada to experience regional tensions. The hon. member referred to the Whip who represents a riding in Calgary. The tension generated by the Liberal-New Democrat coalition to impose the National Energy Program in 1980 almost killed the oil economy in Western Canada and had a very disturbing impact.

It was to avoid the kind of philosophy that gave birth to the National Energy Program, which in turn devastated the economy of Alberta and Western Canada, that the hon. member pointed out the differences that might exist, because this time, as a result of the GST, Western Canada will experience somewhat stronger economic growth than certain other provinces.

This was said in a constructive way, and not in order to create tension, unlike the situation in 1980, when the hon. member's party supported the National Energy Program which had such an unfortunate impact on Western Canada.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is fascinating to have this history lesson from the Prime Minister, who was not here when that national energy fight took place, to a member who also was not here. The Prime Minister talks in the past when the people of this country are concerned about the present.

We saw last night on the CBC the tremendous concern, the tremendous hurt which people across this country are feeling. Despite the millions of dollars in propaganda, this government has still not persuaded people to support the GST.

Will this government listen to those people who are hurting so badly across this country? Will this government change its economic policies and, above all, will this government get rid of the GST?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend quite properly points out that I was not here in 1980.

Mr. Waddell: I was here, Brian.

Mr. Mulroney: I did not have to be here—and I want to tell my friend—to know that the National Energy Program was a disaster for western Canada. It should never have been inflicted on the economy of western Canada, and it never will again.

My hon. friend points out to me that the CBC had some less than flattering remarks to make about us last night. This is not new or alarming.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: The question is my hon.—

Mr. McCurdy: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Howard, cool it. Take it easy.

My hon. friend makes the point that the GST is unpopular, and he asks me to withdraw it because it is unpopular. The answer to that is that I will not withdraw it because it is unpopular. We know it is unpopular, but we know that in the long haul it will benefit Canada. It will make for greater prosperity and greater tax fairness. At the end of the day, when the GST has passed, it will be seen to be in Canada's national interest. We are not doing it because it is popular. We are doing it because it is right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not seem to realize that there is a tremendous, serious crisis of confidence in this country. Seventy-two per cent of Canadians feel that governments do not care what the people think.

Will the government not respond to this crisis of confidence by killing the one central symbol of that refusal to listen, the GST? Will you kill the GST as Canadians want you to?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right in pointing out there are areas of difficulty and that we are trying to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: We are trying to come to grips with them in a number of ways. My hon. friend makes a very emotional appeal on behalf of those who are affected. We will carefully listen and carefully respond to his concerns.

Indeed, when last I heard him in the House I was so taken by his appeal that I asked for some information, and I notice that this appeared in the Windsor Star, and I quote:

> When MP Steven Langdon recounted the woeful tale of Essex County farmer Paul Cazabon to a sympathetic House of Commons Wednesday it was the first Cazabon had heard of his dire financial troubles.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: It continues:

> "I don't know if Langdon got me confused with someone else or what," said a perplexed Cazabon after returning from the fields Wednesday evening. "I am still a viable farmer yet"

GREAT WHALE PROJECT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and concerns the Great Whale project at James Bay. The project's infrastructure includes an airport, a road that crosses territory where Crees have rights, and a road that crosses navigable waters.

Will the minister acknowledge that she has all the jurisdiction she needs, a jurisdiction that is quite clear-cut, to insist on environmental studies for the project's infrastructure?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment for the province of Quebec has asked for all the documentation that relates to this project, including any negative environmental impact that would occur as a result of the construction of the access roads and other infrastructure. There has been no decision by Quebec at this point to begin any work or commission any work, without an environmental review.

Certainly it is not the intention of the federal government to grant any kind of a licence or to allow any kind of work to proceed, that is associated with that project, without the federal review.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Why does this government refuse to make a clear stand on this issue? The federal government cannot deny it has jurisdiction over airports. The federal government cannot deny it has jurisdiction over navigable waters, and the federal government cannot deny it has jurisdiction over wildlife. Does the government intend to follow its own guidelines? Does the Prime Minister intend to settle immediately the present debate in Quebec on infrastructure? Does the government intend to show the kind of leadership it has failed to show so far in other environmental cases in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my language is not clear enough, but certainly the minister has spoken on this issue several times. The message could not be clearer. There will be an environmental review process.

The minister happens to be in Montreal today on urgent business, and he asked me to respond to questions like this one as they come forth.

There has not been the commissioning of any work of any sort. There cannot be any clearer statement than the one that has been made. Ideally the EARP process should be conducted in partnership with the province of Quebec. Failing that, there will be a full environmental review process carried out, as other Canadians and the people in Quebec would expect us to do, including any works that are associated with the dam project, infrastructures such as airport roads, and any other work.

HEALTH

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Today Canadian standards for levels of dioxins, the most toxic man-made chemical found in food, are several hundred times more lenient than those of the United States. Yet much of the food that reaches Canadians fails to meet even with this government's relaxed guidelines.

Given that the minister's own department has admitted that if the current standard were applied much of the food currently in the marketplace today would have to be removed, will the minister now confirm to this House that he does not enforce current standards and is considering ways to allow more dioxins, not less, into the food supply?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that current standards with regard to dioxins are under review at the present time. There is a process of public consultation inviting participation by the public. If the hon. member would like to participate in that, we would welcome participation from her as well.

Dioxins are ubiquitous in the environment. Much food in Canada has trace elements of dioxin in it, without posing any threat to human health. The difficulty is that it is possible to discover very, very, small, minute quantities of this. If we were to take the position that no dioxins whatsoever could be allowed in any food used in Canada, we would have to ban breast milk, for example, and throw away literally hundreds of millions of dollars worth of good, nourishing, nutritious food in Canada each year.

That is why we want, first of all, to take every effort that we can to eliminate the creation of dioxins and furans and, second, to ensure that standards which are set in Canada are realistic and ensure that Canadians have a safe and nutritious food supply.

• (1440)

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that Canadians expect this government to lead, not mislead.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the same minister. The minister is no doubt aware that municipal incinerators are one of the main sources of dioxin. Since the practice of burning paper and plastic together in incinerators produces a large part of these dioxins, is the minister prepared to take the necessary steps to protect Canadians from the dioxins he now allows them to burn? Is he prepared to make a commitment to provide the necessary funds to modify these incinerators and improve pulp and paper plants?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the Minister of the Environment is working very hard to take every possible step to ensure that dioxins and furans are eliminated from the environment to the greatest extent possible.

The hon. member should also know that dioxins may be naturally generated as well through such things as fires and that one of the difficulties is that dioxins are quite ubiquitous in the environment.

The hon. member says that we should be careful to lead and not mislead Canadians. Just to be sure that Canadians are not misled, can the hon. member indicate to the House whether it is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada that any food with trace elements of dioxins in it, notwithstanding the fact this food may be nutritious and safe, should be destroyed and should be refused for sale in Canada? Is it the advice of the Liberal Party of Canada that in cases where, for example, in breast milk trace elements of dioxins could be found it would advise mothers not to breast feed? That is not the advice of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Contrary to what he has just been saying, Canadian babies are being exposed every day to a dangerous chemical brew contained in their mother's milk. Even with the loosest, most poisonous standards in the world, Canadian babies face 16 times the so-called safe Canadian limits for dioxins and furans or 27,500 times higher than what is acceptable in the United States.

Will the minister, since it is well known that the sources of dioxins and furans can be controlled at source, assure the House that the tough regulations that were promised on June 16 of last year will be passed by the House this year, halting the discharge of man-made dioxins and furans into our environment and food chain?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is our goal to halt the creation of man-made dioxins and furans.

It is important, though, for the hon. member to recognize the fact when he cites mother's milk, for example, that the levels of exposure infants are receiving from mother's milk is exceptionally low and that we are dealing with here, if we look at the threat to human health posed by dioxins and furans, is the cumulative effect over a period of time.

I want to be very careful that no member of the House, on any side of the House, leave Canadian mothers who are nursing their infants with the impression that they are not doing the best possible thing that they can for their infants. The Government of Canada encourages breast feeding. It is far and away superior to any other method of feeding an infant.

Every method that can be taken by the Government of Canada to eliminate dioxins and furans from the environment will be taken. In addition to that, there is an open process with regard to the setting of standards. If the hon. member wishes input into that we would welcome him to do so, and any other organization or any other individual in Canada can do so too.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I would suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not know what he is talking about when he gives that kind of advice to mothers in this country.

I was horrified to learn that the federal health ministry is searching for a way to further legalize and increase the release of these toxic poisons into our food chain.

Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare assure the House that the dioxin and furan exposure limits will be made smaller and safer so that Canada moves toward zero discharge of these poisons, rather than the Frankenstein option of larger, more dangerous limits suggested by the minister in the House and by his officials outside the House?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, let me just make sure I understand the hon. member correctly. Is he saying that the position taken by the New Democratic Party of Canada is to discourage mothers from breast feeding their infants? If that is so, he should spell it out clearly because he would be doing a very serious disservice both to the mothers of Canada and also to their children if that is the position that he is taking.

The position taken by the Government of Canada is to try to eliminate the production of dioxins and furons but also to ensure that Canadians have a safe, affordable, abundant and nutritious food supply.

If the position taken by the New Democratic Party is that any piece of food which has any element of dioxins in it whatsoever must be destroyed and withdrawn from the market, the effectiveness would be to destroy hundreds of millions of dollars of nutritious food each year, drive up the price for Canadian consumers and reduce the availability of nutritious food.

Our goal is to ensure that for every Canadian, food is affordable, it is nutritious and it is safe.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Children's Hospital of Winnipeg Foundation, a non-profit group that raised $1.2 million this year for hospital equipment and health care research stands to receive only a 50 per cent rebate on its operating expenses.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. How does he propose to rectify this crack in the GST package, or does he expect some non-profit organizations, like this foundation, to work part-time collecting revenue for his department?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I would indicate to the hon. member that we have been very careful to devise a package—and I think he should go back to the technical papers and read them—to protect and maintain the capacity of municipalities and such organizations as the one he has referred to, to maintain their capacity not to be charged more tax after GST reform than they were before. This is where we stand.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, rather than the minister wanting me to refer to the technical papers, it would be very simple, he can just promise that the Children's Hospital of Winnipeg Research Foundation will not stand to suffer from its operating expenses as a result of the GST.

Volunteers and non-profit organizations have always been a vital force in helping hospitals and patients, made even more urgent now that this government has capped transfer payments to the provinces for health. Why does this government want to tax and penalize through the GST the efforts of volunteers and non-profit organizations? Has this government no public conscience?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, while reading the papers over the weekend I realized that the leader of the opposition party, not the leader in the House but outside of the House, has come up with a very secret weapon to tackle tax reform. He will form a committee.

I should warn him that he may discover the best way to go would be to follow the lead of very modern countries, like Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan and so on who have the GST. Ours is more respectful of the concerns he has expressed than any of their taxes.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Many Canadians who in the past have received disability deductions on their income tax are being told this year that they do not qualify. Not only that, but they are being asked to repay the deductions they received in the past plus interest.

Why is the government putting the squeeze on disabled Canadians, many of whom are on fixed incomes and need this deduction, not to mention the fact that they cannot afford to make these repayments?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government has been reaching out to people on fixed incomes and Canadians with disabilities. Someone mentions the GST. It is precisely for that reason because the existing federal sales tax, for example, is paid by low and modest income Canadians who will be receiving GST credits in that respect.

In answer to the hon. member's specific question, I can assure the hon. member that there has been no change in the policy of the government or of Revenue Canada in this regard, in that we are treating Canadians of low and modest incomes and with disability pensions in as fair a way as is possible.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the policy has changed. The minister cannot say he is reaching out if he is putting these people under undue stress. It was his government which approved the disabilities to begin with. Now it has changed its policy without even the courtesy of a further medical examination. Why is the minister defending the government's position of trying to balance the books on the backs of disabled Canadians? What is he going to do about it? When is this policy going to stop?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am getting sick and tired of misinformation coming from that member on that side of the House.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: It is that type of questioning that creates uncertainty and confusion in the minds of the public.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The American Congress has just endorsed a new clean air legislative measure. That is excellent news for current and future generations of Canadians, Quebecers and Americans. Last Saturday you paid tribute to the many Canadians and Americans who have been working for years to have this legislation in place.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the implementation of this new American law will pave the way for significant reductions in toxic chemical emissions and acid rains which have been destroying lakes, rivers and forests in Quebec, in the Maritimes and in the rest of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): First, Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member not only for his question but also for his interest in the acid rain issue. For years now he and his colleagues in this party as well as many other people have been the architects of the successful endeavour which was announced a few days ago and which will lead to a treaty between Canada and the United States.

The legislation passed last week was indeed very good news for Canada. It provides for a decrease of 10 million tons in emissions, and that in turn will reduce damages to eastern Canada lakes and forests. Mr. Speaker, I might point out that the third series of Canada-U.S. bilateral negotiations towards an acid rain agreement will take place in Ottawa this week. I had a telephone conversation with President Bush last week and both sides believe and hope that agreement will be reached as soon as possible.

MUSEUMS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Auditor General, in his recently released report, has issued a stinging rebuke of this government's financial management of the construction of the National Gallery of Canada and the National Museum of Civilization. The report cites absence of formal contracts, inadequate financial analysis, lack of reconciliation of budgets and design, and the failure to provide the cabinet with a comprehensive analysis of project costs and funding shortfalls.

In light of the 74 per cent cost overrun and the serious financial mismanagement that is highlighted in this report, what steps has the Prime Minister taken to ensure that those responsible will be held fully accountable?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would be tempted to invite the hon. member to direct his question to the Leader of the Opposition.

Of course it is very sad to see such mismanagement. The government has the duty to do everything it can to prevent it, and we are doing it. Unfortunately, there is a very sad story unfolding and we are trying to deal with it as best we can. I can assure the House that as President of the Treasury Board, I will look at this very carefully and make sure that such things do not happen again.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report raises important questions about the responsibility of this government, and the buck stops there.

There are questions remaining regarding the tendering of contracts, questions about ministerial oversight, questions about financial mismanagement and questions about vulnerability to corruption. Is the Prime Minister willing to exercise his public responsibility and call for a full and independent inquiry which is the next logical step after the findings of this commission report. Will the Prime Minister not acknowledge that inextricably linked to this whole affair is the conviction to charges of influence peddling and bribery of former MP Michel Gravel.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I have said. The contracts were granted or agreed upon before this administration came into place. It is a fact that we have been struggling with it ever since. We are trying to find a way to manage these situations in a much more responsible way. I think we have achieved that.

HOUSING

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. It concerns the issue of MPs, such as the NDP member for Trinity—Spadina and the NDP member for Edmonton East who are living in subsidized housing.

In the case of the MP for Edmonton East, I understand he shares with four other people and that his share of the rent is less than $200 a month.

An hon. member: Incredible.

Mr. Attewell: I support the concept of subsidized housing, having mixed incomes, but surely politicians should exempt themselves from such a benefit. Since the two MPs I have referred to have refused to give up their perk on a voluntary basis, would the minister consider implementing a regulation which would bar any politician from any level of government from exploiting the subsidized housing concept?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the housing programs that were put in place prior to 1984 under the former Liberal government were not fully targeted to the needy.

Since 1985, this government has endeavoured to target all of its housing funds to needy people. One exception to that has been the co-op housing program which has central to its philosophy a mixture of low and moderate income people. However, the hon. member knows that I am preparing recommendations for cabinet. I will certainly take into account the hon. member's representations as I will take into account the representations of a retiree in Toronto, Freddie Caplan, who said, "Get them out now and let the needy in".

ENERGY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my question is to the Prime Minister. In 1984, the Conservative government eliminated the Canadian capacity to conserve energy and develop alternative energy sources. Today the Canadian people are paying dearly for this lack of foresight on the part of the Tory government. Will the Minister make the commitment to restore to their 1984 levels the funds set aside to support energy conservation as well as research and development of alternative energy sources?

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House and the hon. member that our department is working very closely with the private sector and the provinces to review all energy programs at this time in relation to what is happening with the cost of energy in Canada today.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, when this government cut out the NRC's energy division, it certainly did not work with the private sector, so what is the difference today? The Gulf crisis has brought home what we said in 1984, that energy policy must include programs of conservation, and research and development of alternative energy sources.

Will the minister table a comprehensive plan to meet Canada's conservation and alternative energy needs which government will support for industry back to the 1984 levels.

• (1500)

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if we want to go back to the 1984 levels, we can talk about the National Energy Program which crippled the country from coast to coast.

The government will do its utmost, working with the private sector and the provinces, to ensure that we will come up with a program that will be beneficial for all of us.

ENERGY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that we are in a recession. The Minister of Energy has indicated that he thinks oil companies are good corporate citizens and he will do nothing about the price of gas. We all know that in a recession, the price of energy is one of the major contributors to slowdown and to unemployment.

Will the minister take some initiative on behalf of his government and do something about the price of gasoline?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said last week in this House that he had met with his counterparts from the provinces because this was a provincial responsibility. As for me, I must ensure, through the Competition Tribunal, that there is no collusion among the companies to raise prices.

I have already stated in this House, like my colleague, that we—

I wish my colleague would let me finish my answer to his question. I have indeed asked the Competition Tribunal to review and monitor the situation. It did, along with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, we must also compare that with what is happening at the international level. Even though I find the increase in prices in Canada unfortunate because of the pressure on the economy, we must recognize that it is a global issue and that the only thing we can do is monitor developments throughout the world. And this is what my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and myself will continue to do, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, occasionally in the House of Commons, members of Parliament make statements and questions which are not correct. I have to tell the House that I made such a statement last Wednesday, as the Prime Minister alluded today.

I suggested in a question which I put forward that a particular farmer in my constituency had lost his 740-acre farm. What I should have said was that he had lost part of his farm. I should make it quite clear that he had lost the 100-acres of his farm which he actually owned.

I want to make it quite clear that this was on my part an inadvertent misstatement of fact, but nevertheless a misstatement of fact which has to be recognized and which I clearly do recognize as such to the House.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to request that the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville correct his remarks as they touched me.

The fact is that I have operated according to the law, the intent of the law, and to the regulations of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I pay the market rent for the apartment that I live in which has no swimming pool, no roof garden, none of the luxuries at the Tridel apartments on Bay Street to which the government made a loan of $15,000 interest-free per unit.

My point is that I have acted according to the intention of the governments of Canada when they ask that the low income and middle income units be awarded without regard to income limits, in the same way as is done when apartments are built with government subsidies by Tridel or groups such as that.

Therefore, I request that the hon. member, who I know would not intentionally misrepresent the case, clarify his remarks to show that I have acted in accordance with the intention of the law.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I want to stand by the statement I made and the remarks. Regardless of the financial numbers involved—I do not know what he pays in rent, but surely in this day and age, when politicians are under enough attack from a number of things, a politician should just voluntarily not participate in that form of housing.

That is my view, that is my belief and I will say it again.

SMOKING IN GOVERNMENT LOBBY

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on February 13, 1990, a matter was raised with you by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants concerning smoking in the lobbies. There was, I understand, a commitment on your part to rule on this.

It was further raised that there was substantial continued smoking in about 20 per cent of members' offices and also that the health units of the House did not have a basic statement of goals and objectives in terms of the smoking issue on the Hill.

I wonder if the Speaker would undertake to carry forward on his commitment to make a ruling on this issue raised on February 13 and to include the other two matters of the continued violation of the rules by members and a positive action by the health units on the Hill in terms of setting up anti-smoking programs.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for intervention and I will consider carefully his remarks and report back both to the member and to the House.

HOLIDAYS ACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–342, an act to amend the Holidays Act (Canada Day).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill in question is to repeal section 2 of the Holidays Act which states that when Canada Day, July 1, is celebrated on a Sunday, July 2 will be the legal holiday.

In enterprises such as Canada Post and other Crown corporations, when Canada Day occurs on a Sunday, the people working on that day do not get overtime, whereas those working on the Monday do get overtime, instead.

Obviously, it is a mistake in the law and it should be corrected. This bill proposes to do just that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA–U.S. AIR TRANSPORT AGREEMENT

REQUEST FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to seek the unanimous consent of the House to refer the subject matter of the proposed Canada–U.S. air transport agreement negotiations to a special committee of the House for the purpose of public consultation.

The special committee be asked to conduct a series of public hearings in cities across Canada and in Washington, D.C., in order to canvass the views of communities, provinces, the aviation industry, labour groups, the business community, the tourism industry, and the shipping and travelling public.

For the purposes of this reference, the special committee will be granted the powers of a standing committee of the House.

I would ask that the special committee report back to the House no later than January 15, 1991. It is also hereby provided that if the House is not then sitting the report shall be deemed submitted on the day such a report is deposited with the Clerk of the House.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to speak with the member who just spoke and, while we are pleased that he added an extra month to the consultation, we are pleased to support the said motion. I would like simply to say two things.

First, we would prefer that this work of consultation had happened vis–à–vis the transport standing committee, where it ought to have gone if the Tories were in any mood to work.

Second, this should not be misconstrued as an endorsement of the wide open agreement that the government wishes to pursue at this time in terms of amending the 1974 agreement. We believe it is important to consult with Canadians far and wide. That is why we have suggested and we are pleased that the government has seen fit to extend this to January 15, rather than report December 14. We, on this side, will support that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to indicate the support of my caucus for the establishment of the special committee to review the open skies policy consideration.

We do so because the transport committee is unable or unwilling to meet. We regret that, but that is a matter for the Striking Committee to deal with.

It is an indication that we are willing to work in the field of transport. We believe it is appropriate that there be a parliamentary review of the proposed policy of the Government of Canada, as opposed to an inhouse bureaucratic review, which I think is where it came from in the first place.

I would also welcome the changes made, not just in the question of the date for reporting but over the course of time the wording of the resolution to ensure it is clear that we are examining the concept and in no way are we adopting the principle of the study itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition against the GST, especially the GST on books and newspapers.

[English]

This is a tax against learning and against education.

Those who have signed this petition urge the government to reject the GST.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise once again under Standing Order 36 to present a petition against this dastardly goods and services tax that the government is proposing to bring in against the people of Canada.

The petitioners in this particular petition are calling on Parliament to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax, reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, that this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

They ask Parliament to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Canada representing areas of Scarborough, Oshawa, Markham, Ajax, Mississauga, have signed a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It calls on the House of Commons for a remedy for a very serious issue. This issue is relating to labelling on pre-packaged foods.

A few months ago, Robyn Allen, a 15-year old resident of my riding of Scarborough, passed away as a result of a very serious allergy reaction. This petition calls upon the Parliament of Canada to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives in pre-packaged foods.

In addition, they call on restaurateurs and food retailers to provide to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 25 citizens of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, mainly residents of the villages of Russell and Navan. These citizens are asking the Parliament of Canada to adopt policies and legislation to protect the lives of the unborn.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of bringing to the attention of the House a petition from a number of citizens of the Province of Ontario, especially the community of London, Ontario, and some of the communities in the southern part of the province.

They ask Parliament to listen to them on this occasion and address the problem of unfair taxation that is currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

These petitioners are calling on the Parliament of Canada to reject the current proposals for the goods and services tax, reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

• (1520 )

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I rise both as a member and as a former educator on behalf of citizens from B.C., from Halifax, and even from my own Toronto, who are outraged at the impact of the GST on learning, books, periodicals, and other materials that are required for the development, not only of a literate culture, but of one that is steeped in democracy and understanding all the ramifications of living in one.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all those several hundreds who have signed this petition, I call upon Parliament to encourage the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to withdraw the GST on books and other educational materials.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions on behalf of the people from the district of Cardigan, mostly from the Stanley Bridge and Tracadie areas.

The petition states: considering that Prince Edward Island has a large rural population, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly call upon Parliament to reinstate Saturday rural mail in Prince Edward Island.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, question no. 335 will be answered today.

[Text]

ALLOCATION OF CAPITAL FUNDING IN THE PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 335—Mr. Mifflin:

1. For the calendar year 1990, was capital funding allocated by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for small craft and harbour infrastructure in each of the seven federal ridings in the province of Newfoundland, and, if so, what amount?

2. Is such funding planned for the calendar year 1991, and, if so, what amounts?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. The Department's records are based on the fiscal rather than calendar year. Funding for the fiscal year 1989/90 including Capital and O & M for Small Craft Harbours by constituency is as follows:

| Bonavista—Trinity—Conception | 5,586.1 |
| Burin—St. George's | 3,609.3 |
| Gander—Grand Falls | 344.6 |
| Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte | 2,158.4 |
| Labrador | 524.6 |
| St. John's East | 1,857.4 |
| St. John's West | 3,923.4 |
| Throughout | 3,020.4 |

2. Estimated expenditures for 1990/91 are:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Lee:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"this House oppose in principle Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, because it considers it irresponsible to abandon public sector involvement in the Canadian petroleum industry in the absence of a coherent Canadian federal government energy policy at a time of increasing international uncertainty with regard to petroleum supply."

and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:

"and at a time when the development and wide dispersal of alternatives to traditional fossil fuel energy sources is an environmental necessity."

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted, quite appropriately, at the end of our session the other day, I had just finished recounting some of the history of Petro-Canada.

As you know, Petro-Canada now has a history of some 15 years of operation behind it. Its current situation and prospects are conditioned, to a significant extent, by that past history. Understandably, some of the high-risk frontier investments which it undertook in the early stages of its existence, in fulfilment of its energy policy role, have not yet produced commercial revenues. As a result, Petro-Canada's financial performance is now not as robust as in the case of some of its privately-owned competitors. Despite this, under the new direction that it has had, the company has become a major player on the Canadian oil and gas scene and it is now ready to face reality by placing its shares in the free market.

Petro-Canada is now a major, integrated company and it is the largest Canadian-controlled company, with the second largest proven reserves of oil and natural gas liquids and the fourth largest natural gas reserves of any company in Canada. It has the second largest refining capacity and gasoline sales in Canada, and it has established major holdings in Canada, in existing and future energy megaprojects. Petro-Canada will be a major force in the Canadian oil and gas industry far into the future. It is time for it to cut the apron strings, to stop relying on the public purse and to get on with its business in a truly competitive environment.

The reasons for my support of Petro-Canada's privatization are simple and clear. State ownership of Petro-Canada is not necessary for the government to achieve public policies' objectives. Petro-Canada needs capital to develop to its full potential and it is much better to raise capital voluntarily, through a share issue, than it is to further burden the Canadian taxpayer with debt and higher taxes to pay that debt back. When Petro-Canada was created in the 1970s, we were told by the then Liberal government that a centrally planned, state owned oil company was needed to achieve three national objectives.

First, the company was to be the great oil finder. It would increase oil and gas supplies in Canada by exploring for new sources, especially in the frontier areas off Canada's coasts and in the Arctic. Mr. Speaker, I doubt that one barrel of new oil has been discovered by Petro-Canada that the oil industry would not have discovered on its own. Second, the company was to be a window on the industry to help governments see through the corporate veil of secrecy so that it could formulate national energy policies. Policies such as the National Energy Program were a total disaster, certainly for Alberta, and in my opinion, for the whole of Canada.

Third, the company was to be a negotiator that would somehow arrange special nation-to-nation deals that would guarantee oil supplies. I have already explained what a flop that was.

In the 1990s it is clear, if it was not always clear, that state ownership of a national oil company is no longer needed to achieve such public policy objectives. The government has access to the information it requires through agencies such as the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the National Energy Board. There are many other ways for the government to ensure energy supplies through state-to-state negotiations, should they be required.

In short, there are no valid reasons for state ownership of Petro-Canada. History will decide if there ever were any, other than the desire of central Canadian Liberals to put a stranglehold on western Canada. It is a time to put things right, time for Petro-Canada to step out of the shadows and subject itself to the full light of public and investor scrutiny.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in my comment. I will present a question to my colleague as well.

The present chief executive officer of PetroCan suggested not three or four months ago that if the timing was not right to go ahead with the privatization of PetroCan that it would not proceed. May I suggest that the timing could not be worse. If this is not a bad time, I wonder what the chief executive officer would describe as a bad time.

I do not want to get into the prices and the pitfalls of what we are proceeding with, but I would like him to comment on that.

Going from the financial angle to the human side of things, I am told by PetroCan dealers, not only in my community but in other communities, that in some of the bigger communities the PetroCan people were told not to comment on the privatization of this PetroCan oil company that is owned by Canadians. The people in my community were told nothing at all. Is there not something wrong with that? With regard to the livelihood of these people and the future of their families, should they not have been kept abreast as to what was going to happen or what was happening to them, rather than reading it in the newspapers just like the rest of us?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments and questions from my hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie.

With regard to the timing, I am sure that there is never a time when he would say that it is the right time. He and his party have always wanted to have our industry, not only the oil industry, but other industries, centrally planned and controlled so that there is no ability for the public to participate directly and to be entrepreneurial in their activities. This is his philosophy. As far as that is concerned, it is a very difficult question for me to answer to his satisfaction.

However, as far as I am concerned at the present time there exists a situation where it is clear that Petro-Canada should be stepping out. There is no logic to having a company which controls only 6 per cent of the upstream resource finding in Canada, and 18 per cent of the marketplace, to be trying to use that position to leverage itself into a public policy position. There are much better levers that a government can use if it wants to, and in fact I would say that I hope it does not use them.

As far as the human considerations are concerned regarding the communications within Petro-Canada, I have not been personally involved in those; but knowing how major oil companies work I am sure, insofar as it has been possible, that communication has been quite full and complete within the company.

To say that there is no communication and that people do not know what has been going on is totally inappropriate because the government's plan has been well forecast and stated. I think anyone working in the company would celebrate the fact that the company is now going to expand its asset base and be able to perform more effectively in the marketplace and therefore they will have securer jobs.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a question in an attempt to resolve what I think is possibly a dichotomy; at least it certainly confuses me.

As the member and his party as the government recommend to all Canadians that the government abandon oil and gas exploration activity, abandon the vertically integrated oil company approach to participation in the marketplace and in fact abandon the whole field to the marketplace, I am curious why at the same time the government has rushed full force into the Hibernia oil development with billions of dollars in subsidies and has done it hand in hand with Petro-Canada, which maintains a 25 interest in the Hibernia oil development.

Could the member explain the difference of philosophy there? I do not understand how the government can send the whole business of oil and gas and energy policy back to the private sector on one hand and can put so many resources on its own into the Hibernia oil development, which has definitely been defined as not being a marketplace venture. It would not exist if it were simply market forces.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer that question because quite frankly it is one that I am asked quite often in Alberta.

The situation is this: we cannot compare what is going on, for example, in the western oil and gas industry with what is going on in Hibernia. The Newfoundland oil and gas industry is back where the western oil and gas industry was about 30 years ago. That industry needs support for its basic infrastructure.

We have a situation where the proponents of the project are being asked in effect to build a company, to build one piece of equipment and then effectively close that factory down. To do that they are obviously going to need a subsidy. Of course we are quite sure that that factory will be there to build future units on an ongoing basis, but in order to get it started there has to be a subsidy. This is a very fair situation.

We are not providing equity investment, and I think that is very important, because we are not getting the government involved in equity participation. We have the government providing the basic subsidy and loan guarantees. This is fundamentally sound for the oil and gas industry in Newfoundland in the stage that it is at at the present time.

This is not at all different to the type of support that was given, for example, to the oil sands projects in the early days of Alberta's history where they were given special tax breaks, special royalty breaks and so on to get the industry started.

It is a very fundamental and fair comparison, one that I fully support. We are not getting the government involved through Hibernia in equity participation in the oil and gas industry.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, after listening to my hon. colleague opposite, I am wondering why the government does not use such a reasonable voice, in a more positive light, in some of the deliberations that it has. I find his presentation convincing, but I do not know if I am completely persuaded. I was tempted to ask him a question, but I did not want in any way to indicate that I was mischievous in the kind of question I would pose. He is obviously on his own in the positions that he has taken. He has pointed out some very good and solid reasons why Petro-Canada should exist. He has pointed out its success.

I might say that that success was underscored and emphasized by the head of Petro-Canada, Bill Hopper, on Morningside on October 27, 1990. When he was asked about whether Petro-Canada had been good for its consumers, his response—and I think I quote him accurately—was: "The purpose it served was to go out aggressively and do a lot of exploration in the frontier. That is its first purpose. It spent a lot of money, brought a lot of people with us, but we also found how Hibernia, Terra Nova, heavy oils and tar sands all have been good for Canadian oil supply."

It is fair to say that a private company could not have been as aggressive in the frontier as we have. Our purpose at the time was not to have a bottom line profit, but to find carbon resources for Canada. It did that job very well. I notice that my colleague opposite, in his presentation a few moments ago, pointed out that it had been most successful in the exploration field.

He suggested that perhaps a private sector company might have been equally successful or that the oil might have been found—and I stress the words "might have been found"—by other corporations as well. The point of the matter that it has been found under the auspices of Petro-Canada.

Even the minister who is so keen to privatize it, as reported in Hansard on October 10, gave his presentation as to why there should be privatization. He said:

> Clearly Petro-Canada has established itself as a major integrated energy producer in Canada—Today it represents 6 per cent of the exploration and development side of the industry and 19 per cent of the refining and marketing business in Canada.

With that kind of success, one has to ask oneself why we have to privatize. I think there is a larger question which quite frankly is about why the government refuses to use Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy. That is really what is underlying this debate.

I think that is the reason why the minister opposite, who is following this debate diligently, after only two hours and fifteen minutes of debate—and, Mr. Speaker, if you check Hansard you will see that we are not off at all—stood on a point of order and asked that we apply time allocation to this bill.

Mr. McDermid: I gave notice that I would be.

Mr. Volpe: That is right. He really wanted to give notice that he was going to do it on the very next occasion that he had because it was ruled out of order by the Speaker. He went ahead and moved a motion. The point that all hon. members ask themselves is why he would want to do that so quickly if what he was talking about was privatization, or whether he was in fact afraid of the issue of using Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy. He knows full well that all he has to do is check our public accounts. Since 1984 the government has not spent one penny on Petro-Canada. There have been no government funds into Petro-Canada. Notwithstanding, the company has been very successful.

Mr. McDermid: Because you wouldn't give us an agreement.

Mr. Volpe: I only quoted what he said in Hansard. If he wants to retract what he said in Hansard, I am willing to give up my spot right now and have him retract everything. While he is at it, he might even go ahead and retract his bill.

He would do everybody a favour. It did not take long. Two hours and fifteen minutes is about as much time as it took for him to stand.

My esteemed colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River stood and gave a very succinct, very incisive and very thorough analysis of what was wrong with this bill. The minister opposite was shame faced and red faced when this happened. I am not referring to the fact that he was beginning to acquire a different political colour, but it is one that happens when someone is embarrassed.

I have to give credit where credit is due. My NDP colleague from a riding in Winnipeg continued in the same vein as started by my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River and just reamed of this bill. It is poorly drawn. It is wrong. Its economic bases and financial presumptions are all distorted.

The fourth speaker was a member of the government side. Within a couple of minutes the minister decided that this was time to ask for time allocation. He wanted to show that we were going to stop this debate as quickly as possible. What these colleagues of ours were showing is that Petro-Canada had not been a drain on our debt nor on our deficit.

The government has been careful over the course of the last several months to talk about how to reduce the deficit. Everything is deficit reduction driven and nothing else. What happens is the minister who acknowledges that there are no government funds going to Petro-Canada says: "No, no. We have to privatize this thing".

They will start with a 15 per cent sale offering right off the bat. That sale, given the facts that are incontestable right now, will obviously bring only marginal benefit to the government deficit reduction, if any at all. In fact on that 15 per cent, the highest estimate of what it is supposed to raise is somewhere around $700 million, according to today's prices and today's values on the marketplace. That $700 million is not going toward deficit reduction; it is going back into the company. It is a great deal.

My colleague from London is looking at making a few investments. He is wondering whether this would be a good place for Canadians to go. You go ahead and buy a 15 per cent share in the company. Then you get the money back, so you automatically get a 15 per cent saving or a reduction on your investment.

This is good finances on the part of the government. There is no net benefit to the government in terms of debt reduction or deficit reduction.

What are they doing? The company is profitable. Just the other day in the House we had reference again to the financial statements of Petro-Canada, which in the first three quarters indicated net revenues after expenditures of $84 million. It is not losing money.

All hon. colleagues have their calculators out. They are going to say: "If we divide this $84 million in the first three quarters by three and multiply by four, we discover that we have about $102 million in net revenues after expenditures for 1990". That is not bad. That is a good profit. If that $100 million were to carry a loan at 15 per cent, it would probably generate another loan of $680 million.

The government says it needs somewhere around $500 million to $700 million. It has an opportunity. It can carry it on the basis of the profits it will make on this company; but the government says: "No, no, no. We have an opportunity to raise funds differently. We don't have to borrow. What we do is sell off part of the company".

Rather than think in terms of having a government contribution, if we go a bit farther down the road we see that we cannot become too heavily indebted. The debt to asset ratio for Petro-Canada is 1.9 per cent to 8.6 per cent, so roughly 22 per cent of all of its assets are encumbered. Essentially we are talking of a very low encumbrance level for a company.

If it is true that the borrowing is tough, then when we take a look at the debt to asset ratio and at the revenues after expenditures and ask ourselves—and all Canadians have been asking themselves this with respect to privatization of Petro-Canada—why it is that one of our profitable companies, a Canadian company in which we have invested billions of dollars, a company that is doing well on the marketplace, a company that the minister stands up and says is a very productive, very profitable and very efficient company, is going to be sold off, the first offering for 15 per cent.

For those of us who are also concerned about jobs and where the government's priorities are, it is important to keep in mind that Petro-Canada employs some 8,753 employees. If we take a look at what has happened in the past with other companies that have been privatized and we refer, for example, to Air Canada and the consolidation that has taken place in Imperial and Texaco, we see a reduction because it is in the same proportion of about 2,000 men and women who could lose their jobs on the basis of the government's action. The important thing about that, aside from—

Mr. McDermid: That's fear mongering.

Mr. Volpe: It is not fear mongering. It is a little bit better than having a monopoly on mistruths which is what you perpetrate all the time.

We can leave the nonsense to one side, and take a look at these men and women who are currently earning money, are not a drain on our economy and are contributing to our tax revenues through their contributions. Many of these people are going to be put at risk because the minister says the best thing to do is to go ahead and privatize.

We must keep in mind that everything that Petro-Canada has done has been accomplished without government funds. We are confused with the government's ambivalence. We must look at whether it is thinking about exporting jobs, whether it is sincere when it says that it wants to privatize everything, whether the marketplace should dictate all of the economy and whether it is honest when it says the government should not be involved in the marketplace and let business handle the marketplace itself.

Upon careful reflection, it appears that the government is not very consistent in its position. For example, if it is concerned about the amount of money that it put into areas of private enterprise, it is instructive to know that last year some $602 million in grants and cash payouts of taxpayers' money was given to private oil companies for exploration and development. Many of those recipients included some desperately poor multinationals. One example is Chevron. This is Chevron itself, not its sister companies and not its subsidiaries. It received a mere $7,358,254 to conduct those activities. Another example is Husky Oil. It received $4,582,523. Mobil Oil, one of the companies that is a partner in Hibernia, received $5,530,492. Texaco received $6,719,515. Amoco also received grants and moneys under CIDA in the amount of $2,585,062. These amounts do not include tax write-offs and other subsidies. These are strictly cash payments.

What I am trying to get across is that we have a government that says it cannot get involved in the activities of exploration and development, it cannot get involved in the marketplace, it must give this company an opportunity to handle things on its own, but it is willing to give out these millions of dollars to private oil companies to conduct exploration and development in Canada. What is so galling about all this is—I am not suggesting for a moment that that is not bad enough—there was a further $4,100,437 given to companies that did not have enough money to set up a subsidiary office in Canada. Therefore, the money was transferred directly to their offices in the United States.

For those of us who have difficulty comprehending how much money $600 million is, it represents a $10,000 tax on every little baby that was born last year. As soon as the doctor slapped the little baby on the buns, he said, "Here you are, wake up, you have a $10,000 debt to the oil companies, thanks to the Government of Canada."

Obviously the government has a problem in deciding which direction to turn. Privatization is seemingly inconsistent with other government decisions.

My colleague pointed out a few moments ago that in the area of oil and energy development, the government is willing to put up the $600 million that I just cited. Look at what else it does with respect to Hibernia. There is $1.6 billion in subsidies and loans to Hibernia and a further $1 billion in soft loans. I do not think its rationale for that was contested by many of us. In fact I accepted that policy and the government's action on Hibernia because I saw it as an instrument of public policy and something that should be applauded.

For example, the minister of energy says that the Hibernia project is critical if we want to be energy self-sufficient and shield ourselves, if not in price, at least in terms of supply from events in the Middle East.

The head of Petro-Canada, as a follow-up, says that only one-third of the production might find its way to Canadian refineries, which happen to be ill-equipped for the processing waxy crude. Both he and the minister expect that there will be technology transfers to Canada and that Canadian entrepreneurs might seize the occasion to develop the kind of technology that will provide for any new developments that might come out of the Hibernia deal.

If the government is using Hibernia to carry out job and economic diversification in Newfoundland and in the maritime economy and if, as the government says, there are spin-offs for industries in Atlantic Canada, why does it not apply the same kind of thinking to a mechanism that is already there at its disposal? Why not, for example, use some of the moneys available to encourage some of the refineries that currently have difficulty processing the waxy oil that is going to be coming out of Hibernia.

I guess one is left to conclude that perhaps the government is missing an opportunity and it is going in the wrong direction at the wrong time. What the government might be doing, what it should be doing, is taking a look at Petro-Canada and using it in the area of conservation and energy efficiency, not merely energy development.

The privatization demonstrates a lack of understanding of the government's role in sustainable development. We have discussed in this House over the course of the last several weeks Bill C-78 and the implications it has for sustainable development and the environment.

In the area of sustainable development what is needed more than anything else is co-ordination of energy processes and end use. That is paramount to ensure success. The government cannot leave the development of energy and environmental impacts to the disinterested, fractionalized private sector. The private sector is essentially that.

To leave those two areas to the private sector would run counter to the government's long stated objectives under the Green Plan. It turned thumbs down to the environmental committee's findings about threats to the environment globally and to the western economies, and in particular to our own.

Energy, especially that which relies on fossil fuel and carbon consumption, will be responsible for approximately 50 per cent of global warming over the next 40 years. Conservation efficiency is going to be absolutely crucial in curbing that global warming and its threats both to our environment and to our economies.

Climatic change and environmental degradation is an energy issue, and the government's privatization indicates that it is willing to wash its hands of the use of any instrument that could help in alleviating that problem.

I spoke the other day about some of the items that might draw the attention of government if instead of concentrating on privatization it was to become seriously involved in the efficient use of fuels available and in the development of alternative substances—and I might be able to do that in the question and answer period coming.

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada can play a leadership role in energy efficiency. That is less expensive than expending energy supplies and it promises more optimistic views for limiting CO2 emissions. In fact, more than anything else, there are proven economic consequences for those who provide a national effort to improving energy efficiency.

There is a reduction in oil imports, which will drive down manufacturing costs and gain a cost advantage in the international markets. For that we need a national competitive strategy where increasing energy efficiency will permit shifting of expenditures from energy consumption to productive investment.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are motioning me to end my brief introduction, and I will do that.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I merely would like to comment. Why should Canadians buy a company in which they have already invested billions of dollars? In any case, when Petro-Canada was created, we never found out how much this cost Canadians. We were never informed in Parliament about what went on during those negotiations. Why should we keep this company? Since Petro-Canada belongs to the State, taxpayers had to pay the cost without necessarily sharing in the benefits. Public participation by all Canadians means leaving it up to Canadians themselves whether they want to invest in Petro-Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I was taking notes, and in fact, Canadians as shareholders will be able to comment by using their voting rights, electing the members of the board of directors and holding them accountable for the company's productivity. Furthermore, investors will be able to sell their shares when they feel like it, which is unthinkable in the case of a Crown corporation. We are never in control of a Crown corporation, Mr. Speaker. We have a good example of that in Abitibi, where we have corporations like Canadian National and VIA cutting railway lines. We have no say in the matter and we don't even know how much money they are spending. That is why Canada, the Government of Canada, the Prime Minister of Canada, and all of us here who run this country believe it is high time we sold Petro-Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Would the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence care to comment?

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglington—Lawrence): My reaction is the same as that of all Canadians, all residents of this country when they hear remarks of this kind.

[English]

I can see why Canadians feel frustrated that their governments are not using the tools available to them. As well, with the intelligence that is acknowledged that members of Parliament have, how can the hon. member for Abitibi say that we have to make Canadians shareholders and that we are not giving them any benefits from all of this, when members from his own caucus, including the minister, point out that Petro-Canada has been absolutely fundamental to the exploration and development of Canadian energy?

Second, if he has a problem with what Petro-Canada has been unable to do, what he should do is stand up in his caucus and give direction to his ministers. He should say: "Listen, we have the tools, let's use them." Mr. Speaker, you cannot blame Petro-Canada for not accomplishing what you have decided it shall not accomplish.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member.

I guess he would want to have his facts straight. First of all, there are 6,568 employees and not some 8,000, as he rhymed off in his speech. If he checks the briefing book that was supplied to his critic, the accurate numbers are there. I do not know where he got his numbers.

Second, the hon. member obviously is displaying to the House his philosophical differences. If a business or a Crown corporation is making money, then keep it. If it is not, get rid of it. That is the philosophy over there. I am not sure why he has not explained this today.

We get rid of Crown corporations if there are two questions answered. The first is, do they serve a good public policy purpose? The answer is no. Second, can they make it in the private sector? The answer is yes. Then they are a candidate for privatization.

Petro-Canada does not serve a public policy purpose. It does not have to serve a public policy purpose. The Government of Canada can very easily carry out its energy program. The hon. member rhymed off some facts and figures today of where we have helped in Hibernia, as a government, to bring on a resource off the shores of Newfoundland.

We did that as a government by participating, not because it was through a national oil company, but in fact as a government.

He also rhymed off Texaco, $6 million; Chevron, $4 million. The hon. member does not know a thing about the energy industry. For example, $1 million a day is spent on the rigs that are exploring in the Beaufort. That is the expense. This member is talking about companies getting $6 million and $4 million in grants and so on.

That is pretty small stuff compared to what companies are spending on exploration.

• (1600)

Had he been around here during the famous National Energy Program, when the Liberal government was handing out PIP grants to companies like candy to a baby, then he would not be quite as arrogant in talking about supporting an industry and doing some good exploration work.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. minister opposite is probably going to go back to his office and lash out as his assistants because he is paying them a substantial money and they forgot to take a look at the Public Accounts in order to come up with the figures that I came up with. If he is sending out information that is different, then he should make sure not only that he has got his staff doing the job that he wants them to do, but also that he is sending out accurate information to the general public.

The minister opposite thinks that, again in Public Accounts, the $6 million, $7 million, and $5 million that add up to $602 million just last year is penny ante. He probably will not like it, but there are a lot of unemployed people in Atlantic Canada, in fact all over Canada, who would dearly love to be able to use the argument that he used in my regard about knowing the problems of the people who are in private enterprise, in the marketplace and who have a difficult time trying to make ends meet. The government is going to come in and give $602 million because it understands how this happens. They understand that you need money in order to get equipment. They understand that you need money to build up equity. They understand that you need money in order to go ahead and hire those who are going to work for you, so that you can then turn a profit and then hire your accountants in order to ensure that you pay no taxes.

If the minister opposite would just get his staff to do a little bit of their homework for him so that he would not embarrass himself and the government before the members here, then we could talk about what Petro-Canada ought to do. I indicated in my speech that Petro-Canada ought to get into the business of energy efficiency.

The other day I pointed out, for example, that just in the area of consuming waste oil, crank-case oil and motor oil, and applying the technology that is already available, we would have an opportunity to free up approximately $1 billion for investment.

If the minister opposite would also acknowledge that for every million dollars of investment we have the opportunity to create some 46 jobs, then that $1 billion of released funds for investment would create 46,000 jobs. If he believes in creating jobs, putting Canadians to work, and making sure that government money is used properly and using the instruments available to it, then he should get off his royal chair. We might get him to do his homework before hand and talk about how we would best use an instrument that is vital to public policy to Canada. You are not going to talk about an instrument that is incapable of doing something, the moment that you hand shackle it and tie its hands, the moment that you decided that you are not going to allow it to do what it can do.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague for his analytical speech. We on this particular side of the House would almost welcome him over here. I thought perhaps he was a Democratic Party member the way he was speaking.

I am sure that he would remember, since he a bit of an expert in this area, that the formation of Petro-Canada was done at the behest of the New Democratic Party. I am just wondering about the Liberal philosophy.

Is the Liberal philosophy one of government intervention and public ownership? I know that the Liberals are somewhat flexible in some of their philosophies. Would the hon. member make comments on that and very briefly comment on what he sees as the future for Petro-Canada? I think he has about 30 seconds to do that. What will happen to the future of Petro-Canada?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I could be brief enough to satisfy the member over to my left. I thought he was beginning his debate. I thought that he wanted everybody to be rigid and brittle like the members of the government side.

If there is flexibility, it is suggested that we do see a role for Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy.

That is why I began my debate by saying this is a question of why the government does not want to use Petro-Canada for what it can represent, an instrument of public policy. We have seen inconsistencies of that kind of thinking, both with Hibernia and in other areas.

That is why I took pains to do homework that the minister does not think is necessary if one is going to fulfil a job in the House. But I did homework in order to illustrate that there is an opportunity to establish Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy. It has nothing else to do with anything else. If one wants to use it as that, then, fine, go ahead and give it the tools that is required to do its job.

If one does not believe it should be an instrument of public policy, then divine all kinds of excuses for ensuring that it does not take place. The minister opposite has given all kinds of reasons why one should believe him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Jonquière.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also listened carefully to the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence, and is there anything more eloquent than figures? In 1989, Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada profits were $31 million. Not bad, I would suggest. But sometimes it is better to make a comparison to find out just where the comapny stands. For the same year, 1989, Shell profits were $219 million, seven times bigger that Petro-Canada's. Now the profits of a tiny little company, Imperial Oil, during that same year: $456 million, or 15 times more than Petro-Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, you can understand that when I read an article by newspaperman Shawn McCarthy in today's Toronto Star who quotes the words of none other than Petro-Canada Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Hopper as follows:

[English]

> Instead of looking to the government for money and direction, Petro-Canada is to look to the private sector instead.
> "I am excited about the years ahead,"—

[Translation]

That means he is encouraged, he is excited about the years ahead. Those are the words of the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Petro-Canada.

[English]

> —Hopper told a Senate hearing last week. "The coming privatization of Petro-Canada will give us the financial flexibility to pursue these opportunities and more."

In other words, privatization will give them an opportunity to expand.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Right on.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): But that is not the way the opposition looks at it. As far as they are concerned we should leave well enough alone. For their information, here are the figures again: Petro-Canada made a profit of $31 million, against Shell's $219 million and Imperial Oil's $456 million. Mr. Speaker, it is passing strange that profits in the private sector appear to be definitely better than those of a Crown corporation. It must have been sheer luck, Mr. Speaker.

Well, Mr. Speaker, allow me to lend my support to a piece of legislation enabling the Canadian government to sell to Canadians some of its shares in Petro-Canada. Mr. Speaker, the first offering estimated at 15 per cent will yield $500 million, the kind of money Petro-Canada needs to make new investments. I made my choice for specific reasons. State-owned Petro-Canada does not help achieve our public policy objectives. The company needs a cash inflow to exploit our oil and gas reserves. As an example we have the Hibernia project in which Petro-Canada will be involved, not to mention Terra Nova which is still in the planning stage.

A public share issue is a far more acceptable way of raising funds than raising the deficit or raising taxes, in order to consolidate the corporation's capital. Let there be no mistake, Mr. Speaker. Petro-Canada needs money for new investments, such as research on new oil products and gas exploration. If the corporation needs money, we have two choices: since this is a Crown corporation, either we give it the funds, and to do so, we have to take that money from the taxpayer; or we do an accounting procedure and increase the debt. I imagine the opposition knows what that debt is. The government's cumulative debt is $315 billion.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Because of the Liberals!

An hon. member: And the Conservatives!

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Those 350 billion cost us between ninety-five and one hundred million per day in interest. That's not peanuts! That is a lot of money, $100 million a day in interest! Imagine how much more we would be able to give in the way of family allowance payments, old age pension and new services for Canadians—

An hon. member: We could built hospitals.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): —if we didn't have the deficit. So I would like—

An hon. member: How much was it in 1984?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): In 1984, it was $200 billion.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Marc Lalonde certainly helped to raise it!

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Two hundred billion dollars.

And now, I would like to talk about Petro-Canada's role. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition is anxious to comment. I may remind the opposition that $200 billion at 10 per cent means an extra $20 billion annually. This is $20 billion the government has to take from the Treasury to try and pay off the debt. And you know perfectly well that draconian measures are needed to put this economy back on track.

Mr. Volpe: You forgot?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence can always have his say later on, Mr. Speaker.

When Petro-Canada was created in 1975, the previous government told us that a publicly-owned oil company was needed to achieve three objectives on behalf of Canadians. This is what it said: First of all, the company was to increase supplies of available oil in Canada by exploring for new sources, especially in the frontier areas off Canada's coast and the Arctic. That was the first reason. The second: the company was to be a window on the industry, to help the government formulate national energy policies for Canada.

I would venture to say this does not hold water. The information available to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is more than sufficient. Furthermore, information on exploration of our energy resources is also collected by the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the Petroleum Monitoring Agency.

The third reason, Mr. Speaker, evoked at the time by the Liberal Party, was that the company was to be a negotiator that would arrange nation-to-nation deals that would guarantee oil supplies. Interestingly enough, Mr. Speaker, during the past 14 years, Petro-Canada concluded only one international deal, and that was in 1979 with Mexico. This despite the fact that it was one of their main conditions, one of their selling points at the time.

Mr. Speaker, obviously, public ownership is no longer necessary in order to achieve the objectives of public policy in the 90s. Our country now has a more enlightened understanding of the extent of our frontier reserves and their development possibilities. We must not forget that Petro-Canada represents only 6 per cent of our income from up stream oil and gas activity in Canada. Furthermore, our government has other cards to play when the time comes to negotiate trade agreements with other countries.

Briefly, the initial reasons that favoured State ownership of Petro-Canada have now become obsolete. Let history be the judge whether they were ever otherwise.

Today, Canada's energy policy must acknowledge that Canada's economy is an integral part of the international market. The attempts of previous governments to insulate us from this fact were unsuccessful.

We all agree that energy markets should be able to respond to changes in supply and demand.

This policy is good for Canadians because it provides the basis for expanding our resources and for setting competitive prices for consumers. When the government intervened, it was in order to promote energy mega-projects, whose costs and risk factors were an unsurmountable obstacle for the private sector. Things have changed, however. Petro-Canada has a role to play in developing Canadian energy reserves, not as an instrument of government policy but as an active and competitive company in the private sector.

Petro-Canada is one of hundreds of oil and gas companies that got involved in this major activity. We must not forget that. I repeat, Petro-Canada represents about 6 per cent of exploration and development activity in Canada. We must also remember that developing these resources requires a lot of money.

As the chief executive officer of Petro-Canada said, the corporation can no longer develop our energy reserves without increasing its debt to dangerous proportions, unless it acquires additional funds to consolidate its capital base. I may remind hon. members that Petro-Canada's debt today is $1.2 billion. Clearly, if major investments ae necessary and this debt is increased, we are putting the corporation in a very difficult situation.

Without new funds, Petro-Canada will not really be able to play the role it was meant to play. This situation leaves the government, Petro-Canada's present shareholder, with three options.

First, it can ignore the problem and hope the corporation finds its own way. Petro-Canada will have to choose between the risk of financial instability, selling assets and changing its profile or reducing exploration and development activities.

The second option is that the government can provide for Petro-Canada's financial future, but to do so, as I said earlier, it will have to increase its deficit, raise taxes or reduce certain programs, if it selects this option.

The third option: the government can invite Canadians to become directly involved in the company's activities by purchasing shares. By putting Petro-Canada shares on the public market, we offer every Canadian a chance to acquire part of this great oil company and to share its future. More importantly, perhaps, we are ensuring at the same time that Petro-Canada gets the financing that it would not get otherwise.

Mr. Speaker, as our minister for Privatization mentioned, both the consumers and Petro-Canada will be better served if we allow Petro-Canada to raise fresh capital directly from the investors instead of its continued reliance on the Canadian people. Let us look at a few success stories. Canadair, Teleglobe Canada and Air Canada were privatized. And now, Mr. Speaker, we can read in The Daily from Statistics Canada that the staff of the public companies in the federal government decreased 18.7 percent to 198,000 in June of 1989 and to 161,000 in June 1990, mainly because of the privatization of companies such as Air Canada and the rationalization of others, such as Via Rail, Petro-Canada and CN.

Given the various options available to us, I think that the Canadians will agree. Maybe not unanimously, because it is impossible for either the Liberals or the NDPers to support us. It is not unlike a religion, Mr. Speaker, to be a Liberal. I could see people yesterday standing up to greet Mr. Chrétien, who aspires to be elected to this House soon. One day, he told us: "It would be nonsense to oppose the GST with no alternative to propose." A week later, he told the Senate: "Do your best to block the GST. " And a few days after that, he said: "Elect us and we will abolish the GST."

Mr. Speaker, this represent $25 billion in government measures. How can this man speak from both sides of his mouth, saying one thing one day and something else the next?

It is unbelievable to see—

Mr. Volpe: That religion!

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Yes, that religion the Liberals continue to use and spread before Canadian men and women.

Petro-Canada is part of a dynamic and competitive industry. If we want to help it meet its competitors head on, we must provide it with a reliable source of new capitals. It is no longer acceptable for this corporation to dig into Canadian taxpayers' pockets. Privatization will give Petro-Canada direct access to another source of capitals, namely, private investment.

This initiative will strenghten the corporation by allowing it to raise capital to continue the job it is doing best. Privatization will give Petro-Canada the financial flexibility it envies its competitors, as well as an access to new capital without increasing the fiscal burden of Canadian taxpayers.

By limiting the aggregate holdings of foreigners, we can achieve all these objectives while ensuring that Petro-Canada remains under the control of Canadians.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Not under the control of the Liberals!

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Absolutely not!

There would be a price to pay for maintaining the public ownership of Petro-Canada. The first victim of such a decision would be the corporation itself, with greatly diminished powers. Moreover, middle income Canadians would bear the costs for such an option by way of tax increases, a bigger deficit based on the figures I quoted earlier—an accumulated debt of $350 billion with $100 million in daily interests—or a further reduction in public services. Such a decision would prove detrimental both to Petro-Canada and the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, such are the reasons why I support this new legislation and why I am against the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Scarborough—Rouge River, as well as the amendment to the amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Edmonton East. The amendment moved by the Hon. Member for Scarborough—Rouge River reads:

> "this House oppose in principle Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, because it considers it irresponsible to abandon public sector involvement in the Canadian petroleum industry in the absence of a coherent Canadian federal government energy policy at a time of increasing international uncertainty with regard to petroleum supply."

It is important to know that as far as oil price is concerned, Petro-Canada has always responded to the markets ups and downs. That is the difference between the Liberal Party, the New Democratic Party, and our Party: We want private enterprise to have the upper hand in Canada. I repeat the figures, Mr. Speaker: Shell's profits last year were seven times those of Petro-Canada, and those of Imperial Oil were fifteen times those of Petro-Canada. Private enterprise does not work or function the same way as public organizations, there is profitability.

Look at what is happening in Russia, Mr. Speaker. What is Mr. Gorbatchev doing? He is scratching everything that is publicly owned to give it back to the private sector. He is even inviting Canadian businesses, such as large engineering, accounting and tax consultants to go to Russia to set a model following the one we have here in Canada, the one that is applied in the United States and other countries. It is bankruptcy of a system opposed to the one of private enterprise that proved itself and continues to prove itself in our country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Jonquière. Unfortunately, I don't think he is to be commended for his speech. I do not mean to say the hon. member was not eloquent. However, this speech was somewhat lacking in substance. For instance, the hon. member said that Petro-Canada failed to fulfil its mandate. Since the Canadian government is supposed to run this country, I think the hon. member should have the honesty to say that it was the government that let Petro-Canada drift during the past four or five years, without anyone at the helm. If the hon. member thinks Petro-Canada lacked a firm hand, I think there should be some breast-beating by the Conservatives opposite and the hon. member who just told us that Petro-Canada did not fulfil its mandate satisfactorily. After all, he said it. However, I am not sure I would agree with this analysis.

The hon. member argued that proportionally speaking Petro-Canada had fewer profits than Shell. He told us that Shell's profits were seven times those of Petro-Canada, and Imperial Oil's profits were 15 times as big. I would like to ask the hon. member opposite: since when are Crown corporations competing to defraud the consumer? Why are we here? Aren't we here to protect the consumer? Certainly not to make bigger profits as a Crown corporation, at the expense of those we claim to defend! I think the hon. member opposite owes me an answer on this particular point. The Minister of Labour just told us he doesn't think this is a good point. Mr. Speaker, I realize that protecting consumers is not one of the government's priorities. However, I would urge the hon. member to respond to this comment, and I wish he would tell us why, because he still hasn't said why— He told us: why shouldn't we sell Petro-Canada? He never said: why should we? why not keep it?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada is using my money, it is using the money of the people of the Jonquière riding and the people of his riding.

An hon. member: Laval.

An hon. member: Laval-East.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): It is using every Canadian man and woman's money. With it, it went to compete with Shell and with Imperial Oil. I will repeat the figures for you. With our money, the profit was only $31 million while Shell, with its own money or its shareholders' money made $219 million, that is, seven times more. Imperial Oil's profits were fifteen times those of Petro-Canada.

I also want to remind the hon. member that the government cannot interfere with the management of the daily affairs of a Crown Corporation.

The hon. member wants figures. Here are some. He thinks it is not good enough to compare profit figures. Let us assume he is right and that this measure is not adequate. So let us look at the return on capital. Would the hon. member agree that the return on capital is a good measure? He does not say anything now, Mr. Speaker. Here is what today's Toronto Star has to say about it: During the past 10 years, Petro-Canada's return on capital was 1.97 per cent as compared to 7.93 per cent for Imperial Oil and 6.91 per cent in the case of Shell. Here are the return figures. Does that answer the question of my honourable colleague?

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, my Liberal friend has just told us that the intervention by our colleague from Jonquière was lacking in substance. I, on the contrary, want to congratulate him on a very well_prepared speech, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harvey (Chicoutimi): For a Liberal to say that an intervention by a Conservative member is lacking in substance smacks of insolence, not to say rudeness, especially since his leader told us last weekend that he would only get ideas in two years. This statement shows a lack of seriousness and is therefore totally unacceptable.

Interestingly, while my colleague was speaking, some Liberal members were asking him about the debt after he reminded us that it amounted to $200 billion in 1984. It has now reached $350 billion but the difference is due to an 80 per cent increase in interest on the debt accumulated during the Liberal follies of the 70s. This is the reality, Mr. Speaker!

Our privatization policy must be examined in a context which our Liberal friends are having trouble understanding, i.e. the whole issue of budget control. In the last six years budget increases have not exceeded 2 or 3 per cent, compared with 12 to 19 per cent when the Liberals were in power. We have made enormous progress and it is in this way that we will bring the federal debt under control.

Members of the Liberal Party do not really understand the relationship between budget, fiscal and monetary policies. Privatization is an essential element of the progress this government is making across the country. Therefore, I hope this policy will be pursued because it is an important part of our future.

To reassure our Liberal friends, I would like to ask my hon. colleague whether he thinks privatizing Petro_Canada will have a negative impact on consumers by causing price hikes and leading to industrial concentration.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, it is important to note, first of all, that nobody will be able to hold more that 10 per cent of the shares of Petro-Canada, which will prevent concentration of a large number of shares in the hands of one individual. I think it is very important, as the fact that not more that 25 per cent of the shares will be allowed to be owned outside of Canada.

Those are valuable points. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the 15 per cent part of the shares we are selling this year to the private sector, as a first offering, will bring in $ 500 million that will be handed over to Petro-Canada to enable it to make those first investments.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question in the public's mind and those who are watching on television that really what the Conservatives are up to under this plan to privatize Petro-Canada is actually to attempt in some way to rewrite a lot of Canadian history and to destroy a lot of the institutions that many of us have come to recognize as part of Canada.

I was just out in front of the buildings today talking to some people. They were saying that for many new Canadians who come to this country part of the video that they are shown so that they can get an understanding of this country is of a Petro-Canada service station, a symbol we have all come to recognize and understand, something that this government is attempting to destroy to create a Tory blue institution across the country.

I wonder how much participation the member has in Petro-Canada with a Petro-Canada credit card. Second, is it the government's intention to recall all Petro-Canada credit cards and reprint in Tory blue so that we all have to run around and remember the damage that this government has done to this country?

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I fail to see what a question like that has to do with anything here, that is how much gas I buy from Petro-Canada, from Shell or from Esso. What does that have to do with the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Canadians all across the country are free to deal with whatever gas station they prefer. So, if he has anything to say about that it might be interesting to find out how many New Democrats fill up at Petro-Canada!

[English]

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am pleased to rise in this debate to oppose the privatization of PetroCan.

I was interested in some of the debate that went on prior to the question and comment period about the comparisons between Imperial Oil and Shell Oil and the comparisons between the various levels of profit. I think probably more went unsaid in those comparisons than was said. Those companies are essentially quite different companies and operate in quite different areas. Shell Oil and Imperial Oil, long established companies in this country, hold lands on which very little in the way of royalties have been paid over the years.

Many of these lands became producing lands back in the 1940s and even earlier, whereas a new company like PetroCan is often forced to take its exploration activities out into the more expensive areas of the country. The costs in those areas are very much higher, but it has been an advantage to Canada to have that company operating in order to extend into the frontier areas so that oil can be brought into production that will benefit all Canadians.

I am opposed to this act which is essentially just another series of acts designed not to serve the national interests in Canada, the national benefit to Canadians or serve an economic need of Canadians. They are simply to serve the fundamental tenets of Conservative ideology. One is a statement that the Prime Minister was once suggested to have made: "You dance with those you come with." What he meant by that was since the oil companies essentially paid his campaign fees, there is a return benefit that has to go to the oil companies in this country.

Essentially, that is what we are doing today. We are not serving the national interests of Canadians. We are not serving the interests of Canadian energy policy. We are not serving the interests of energy consumers in Canada. We are fulfilling a campaign promise that was implied when the oil companies put the money over the counter in order to finance the Conservative campaign.

It was interesting how the campaign donations of oil companies have changed over the years. Whereas they used to contribute a great deal to the Liberal Party, the Liberal Party's sources from oil companies seem to have dried up after the establishment of Petro-Canada. The greatest beneficiary of that transfer of funds was the Conservative Party. What we are doing here is that we are delivering the pay-off, at the cost of the people of Canada, for the Tory campaign funds. It is going to be financed by the people of this country.

What is going to happen when this oil company is privatized for ideological reasons, basically? This government and this political party do not believe that the Canadian government, the people who represent all Canadians, should have any economic power with which to assist Canadians as a kind of countervailing authority to the power of the huge corporations and the huge financial institutions that really form an oligopoly in this country.

I think anybody who has read the document by Diane Francis, Controlling Interest, will know that something like 50 per cent of the total assets on the Toronto Stock Exchange are controlled by eight or nine families in this country. In the case of this sale, ten families could buy the full amount of the shares. However, in this case we are again serving the interests of that oligopoly with its control and stranglehold on the economy of this country.

• (1640)

Mr. McDermid: What have you got against Canadian families?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Petro-Canada had a terrific advantage to the people of Canada when it was in the hands of all Canadians. It has been in the hands of all Canadians. Every Canadian, by right of citizenship, by right of being born into this country, had an ownership interest in Petro-Canada, in our national oil company.

The reason for that is that they had the right to elect people to this House of Commons, people, who should they become government, could direct that company in support of the policy objectives that people in Canada wanted to see followed. Once this company is privatized, not every Canadian family, not every Canadian, will have the ability or the wherewithal to purchase this company. Like other companies in Canada, the ownership will be tightened and more closely held until finally it is out of the hands of Canadians altogether, beyond the influence of ordinary Canadians. It will function just like any of the multinational oil companies in this country that operate on an oligopolistic basis because they are tremendously powerful. They are powerful both as representatives of world-wide parent companies and powerful in the way they elect governments and influence energy policy or prevent changes to energy policy which would be beneficial to Canadians and beneficial to the environment.

This company is going to end up being something like what we saw with de Havilland of Canada, because the government used very much the same kind of arguments in privatizing de Havilland of Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Fifteen hundred more employees there now.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): What the government said was that it had an opportunity to make a profit but that development costs were going to be extremely high. For us to get into the market for the Dash-8 and Dash-7 aircraft it was going to be very expensive. The company needed to be able to generate the capital to raise that money to put those aircraft into full production and to sell those aircraft.

What did it do? It sold de Havilland to the biggest corporate welfare recipient in the whole world, the Boeing Aircraft Corporation of the United States that lives of the public dole in the United States and has done so ever since its founding years and years ago. It sold a Canadian company to a company that is really a state financed company in the United States. It did not even respect its own ideology in this regard.

What is going to happen to de Havilland Aircraft Corporation now? Boeing is selling it again and it is going to become a state corporation again. This is strange ideology when they sell it to L'Agence aérospatiale it is going to become a French state corporation. This is a company that the government said was going to be sold to encourage the development of the aircraft industry in Canada. Exactly the opposite has happened. It is now owned by a French state corporation.

Let us look at what some of its other successes in privatizing the various companies have been and think of the promises it has made prior to the privatization of these companies. I think of All Routes Transport, an operating entity of the Canadian National Railways. It was subsidized and ended up being sold to an Ontario policeman who did not even have the wherewithal or the credit rating to get a Visa card. Where is All Routes Transport today? It has gone bankrupt. The properties have been absconded with and some of the principals are living off the proceeds down in the United States. These are some of the successes of Tory privatization strategy. We hear a great deal from the minister responsible for privatization about the advantages that these kinds of privatization projects will bring to all Canadians—

Mr. Della Noce: You did not say anything about Canadair in Montreal.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): You said nothing about the advantages.

Mr. Speaker, we hear of the advantages that privatization of these corporations is going to bring to all Canadians. In fact, the Tory record of failure in privatization has been as dramatic as the record of privatization virtually anywhere else in the world. I cannot think of a single example of a successful privatization strategy. It is done for ideological reasons, to serve their wealthy friends who made the campaign donations to them. That is who succeeds as a result of these privatization strategies. I could not believe some of the members who support it.

Who is going to buy shares in this corporation? Taxation statistics tell us that a very small percentage of Canadians have the wherewithal to invest in shares. They simply do not have the money to invest in shares. In fact, a substantial number of Canadians do not even have enough money at the end of the month to put into a savings account to save for the next few weeks, the next few months, or for the next year. Most Canadians do not even have a large enough net income to permit them to save at the end of the year. So who is going to get this company and who is going to own the shares in this company? It will be going to be those people in this country who are sufficiently wealthy that they can afford to buy up those shares. That is who is going to own this corporation.

We had the same kind of experience in British Columbia with Westar, a company which purchased a number of forest industry assets around the province that were having some financial difficulty. It put together an integrated, operating, forestry company in the service of the people of British Columbia. Then the Socred government of the day privatized that corporation, and it has now shut down operations all over the province. It is one of the most inefficient corporations operating in the industry. Shares in the corporation were once broadly held and are now held by a very small number of people.

I recall the hon. member for Abitibi saying that once we are shareholders then we can go to shareholders' meetings and can influence what the directors do. Obviously, that member does not hold any shares and has not been to a shareholders' meeting.

Mr. Corbeil: Do you?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I certainly do hold shares and I certainly have attended shareholders' meetings. I know that at those shareholders' meetings, it is gavel to gavel in 15 seconds. It is directors paying themselves, it is owners paying themselves and the shareholders are there as so many sheep to be fleeced. That is the reason why this company is being privatized. I have been to some of those meetings and I know exactly how they operate. The shareholders do not have any influence on how a company is going to operate once it is in the private sector.

But the member, by suggestion, did criticize how the federal Government of Canada, under the Conservative party, does manage this corporation and does secure accountability for the people of Canada. These people have refused to make that corporation accountable to the people of Canada and that is the problem. Once it is privatized, it is going to be even less accountable to the people of Canada. What the Tory party should have done is to require PetroCan to become more accountable to the people of Canada and that is what it failed to do.

A number of speakers have suggested today that the government has refused to give any kind of policy direction to Petro-Canada in order in order that it may become a leader, for example, in seeking out alternate energy sources, energy sources that are less damaging to the environment and that are more environmentally friendly. That could have been a direction given by the government to Petro-Canada so that it could have sought out those sources, sources such as ethanol, and the use of renewable resources to produce liquid fuels for motors in Canada. We could have been using Petro-Canada as the lead agency to be seeking out these alternate fuel sources which have less damaging impact on the environment than the use of fossil fuels.

We could have used Petro-Canada perhaps in the same way as Hydro Quebec, who have recently entered into a joint venture project. Some of the things they do, I do not support. Other things—

Mr. Della Noce: I pay the bills. I am from Quebec. I pay the bills.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Well no wonder they cannot survive.

Hydro Quebec has just entered into an agreement with a Japanese battery producing company to set up a joint venture which will actually try to develop electric cars in Canada, not in Japan, not in the United States but between a provincially owned corporation and a privately owned corporation. This joint venture will try to develop electric automobiles which will reduce the amount of carbon dioxide and fossil fuel pollution that we put into the atmosphere. After all, according to the OECD and UN agencies, we are the worst energy pigs in the world and we are one of the worst polluters in the world. This is a good act on the part of Hydro Quebec and its Japanese partner. To develop an electric car may result in the reduction in the kinds of emissions that cause so much damage to the atmosphere in our cities and around our countries.

Petro-Canada could have been used in very much the same way. A Canadian company with the support and guarantees of the government could enter into joint ventures with people in the advance of technology to try to develop alternate fuels or new ways of operating transportation systems and fuel systems in order to become more environmentally friendly, more supportive of a clean environment and with adequate direction from the government, that would have been possible. The problem, as the previous Governor General has pointed out, is that there does not seem to be that kind of leadership available in the whole Tory caucus in the House of Commons. If that leadership was there, Petro-Canada would be a leading agency, not only in Canada, but in the world in developing the kinds of alternatives that would carry on and improve our transportation system, and also make our transportation system much more environmentally friendly.

Petro-Canada also has a leadership role to play in the consumer area in the pricing of oil and petroleum products.

Mr. Della Noce: Tell me of one case since 1970.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I am not sure you are capable of listening.

There was an example a few years ago in 1985 or 1986, when oil prices had sky-rocketed in the world market. As a result, gasoline prices and heating oil prices in Canada went up dramatically. Petro-Canada followed suit because no direction had been given by the Government of Canada to hold the line on prices.

Mr. McDermid: Would you subsidize gas prices?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): We are not talking subsidies.

Mr. McDermid: You are.

Mr. Skelly (Comox-Alberni): Wait until I finish. When world crude prices dropped the gasoline companies in Canada kept their gasoline prices up—

Mr. McDermid: That is not factually true.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): —when world crude prices had dropped by about 25 to 28 per cent.

Mr. McDermid: That is not factually true.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Even Pat Carney, the former minister of energy, after constant questions and a barrage of statements to try to get her to persuade Petro-Canada to lower the price of gasoline to a price more representative of the world price of crude, finally gave the word to Petro-Canada that they should lower prices. In fact, prices went down and the price of gasoline at the pumps began to reflect the price on the world market.

An hon. member: What date was that?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): January 1986, when they were given leadership by the government. As a result of pressure from the opposition, the government finally decided that it would indicate to PetroCan that the price should go down and the consumers should receive lower gasoline prices, and that is precisely what happened.

Mr. McDermid: That's a crock, and you know it.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I will give you the newspaper articles, and you can read it.

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada is a valuable asset to the people of this country. It can be used to benefit our consumers. It can be used to help with research and development in our transportation and fuel systems. It can be used to help us protect the environment if we have the leadership in government that is capable of giving it that leadership. Privatization will do none of that. We will just have another price-gouging, energy-flailing, environment-destroying, private energy company that Canada will have no control over whatsoever.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the National Revenue): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise following the speech of my colleague from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Skelly), in which he quoted all kinds of figures, all kinds of falsehoods, particularly when we talked about Quebec-Hydro, which he compared to Petro-Canada. We know that Quebec-Hydro enjoys a monopoly, while Petro-Canada must compete with other existing companies. If you do not like Petro-Canada, you can go and buy from Esso. If you do not like Esso, you can go to an independent company.

If you do not like an independent company, you can go to Shell. With Quebec-Hydro, you can't. It had an annual rate increase of 7 per 100 for the past two years, and next year, they will blame it on the GST. That's an old story, Mr. Speaker. I hope my honourable colleague knows the difference. If not, he can come to Quebec, because I pay for electricity, which, in passing, is now more expensive than heating oil.

I would also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague has not done his homework. He talked about CN Route, but he forgot to mention Canadair. I have plenty to tell you about Canadair. It was on the verge on bankruptcy. For two years, the first two years, people came to see me, because they were nervous. This government sold Canadair, and not only did it save 4,000 jobs, but it created 2,000 more, and half of them in my constituency, Mr. Speaker. It gives me twice the fun to say that to my honourable colleague. He also forgot to mention Teleglobe, which is experiencing an extraordinary expansion. And I do not know what he has to say against De Havilland, where there are 1500 additional jobs.

[English]

I ask two questions of my hon. colleague on the other side, and I hope he will give me some good answers. Let us see if he knows what Petro-Canada and Hydro Quebec are doing in this world. What kind of dividend did Canadians get for their investment?

This government removed in 1985, in case my hon. colleague does not know, .07 cents a litre on that famous tax to buy PetroCan when people did not ask for it.

Why did government ownership of Petro-Canada give Canadian taxpayers all the cost and none of the benefits? Why do we have to force Canadians to participate in investing in Petro-Canada? Canadians cannot make their own choice about investing? Are they so dumb that they cannot decide themselves where to put their money? Why do you want to keep Petro-Canada? Is the gasoline cheaper because of Petro-Canada?

Just to finish, I have been a gasoline dealer, and I want to know, why did Petro-Canada take my money from my pocket to compete with me—and I did not ask for that—and to close my doors? I survived. It did not survive.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the personal problems that the member has experienced in business, or about the love affair he has with Canadair in his riding, so I cannot really comment on that or on any other affairs in his riding.

Mr. Speaker, I can comment on the fact that Petro-Canada has brought many benefits to the people of Canada.

Mr. Della Noce: Name one.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): If I only have to name one, it is the fact that back on January 29, 1986 when, after pressure from the opposition in the House, the headlines read "Pass on Savings Carney Tells Oil Firms", that Petro-Canada led the fight on behalf of Canadians and gave Canadians cheaper fuel prices at the pumps and protected the consumers of this country from the price gouging of the companies for which you work.

• (1700 )

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague on an excellent speech, a speech which has pointed out the foolishness and the lack of direction that exists with respect to the government's views on privatization.

I would like to put a question to my colleague because I think it is an important question. We are in the midst of an oil crisis and a situation in which war in the Middle East is being talked about in the House of Commons. The supplies of oil could very well be interrupted. Gasoline rationing is being discussed by the government. The situation which we have now is perhaps even worse than the situation which existed when Petro-Canada was first thought of.

Could my colleague possibly think of a worse time, a worse situation, or worse circumstances for a government to decide to get rid of the one effective policy tool that it has to be able to use in the area of oil and gas exploration and development in the country?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, there is an easy answer.

It astounds me that some feel that the price of oil that is produced in Canada, refined in Canada, and distributed in Canada should be determined by events that are happening tens of thousands of miles away in the Middle East. We are capable of producing all of our own crude oil and refining capacity. It simply does not make sense. This is not a real market. It is an artificial market.

If one reads the profit pictures of the oil companies that are operating in Canada, the latest quarterly profit figures are going right out of sight because they are taking advantage of the cheap crude oil that they have been able to get from the Government of Canada. It is being inflated to world prices, running through its integrated system, and gouging people at the pumps.

This is exactly the worst time to be privatizing an energy agency such as Petro-Canada, which can give Canadians a certain amount of control over the pricing of fuel. This will establish price leadership and it can bring down the price of fuel to Canadian consumers. This applies to both home-heating fuel and transportation fuels.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I was terribly offended by the member for Comox—Alberni. I hear him laughing and I wish he would stop.

We all know that the country is suffering from many people losing faith in their institutions and their politicians. You are doing the House no favour with irresponsible and untrue charges. He lays himself wide open to the same kind of questions in reverse.

Do you report back to your biggest campaign contributors? Is that how your party operates? I can tell you that ours does not operate that way.

The people we answer to are those who believe in less government. They do not want government interfering in business unless there is a very good purpose for it.

Mr. Della Noce: He doesn't trust private enterprise.

Mr. Worthy: Your idea of government intervention or government policy is—

An hon. member: What about the food industry?

Mr. Worthy: The food industry is very important to Canada. You would have us buying up all of McDonald's so we would have a window on the industry. It is absolutely ludicrous. That is the way your mentality works. There is no way that the way my colleague looks at things and the way the people whom I represent look at things can possibly be seen as eye-to-eye.

Mr. Langdon: I have a very short point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I hesitate to interrupt the diatribe, but I would point out that the hon. member, through the Chair, should be speaking through the Chair. He should not be speaking directly to a member.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I do stand corrected. My concern for the House got me away from proper procedure. I do apologize for that.

I will address just a couple of points that were made. There was talk of the lack of success of some of our privatization. I ask the member to look at the figures for Canadair, Air Canada, and Teleglobe.

My time has expired, but we have given the information to his side of the House. If he checks the record, he will see that those are all very successful businesses. They are good examples of why the privatization of firms is the policy of the government, and why it is a good policy for Canada.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, first, I am going to call on that member to check the donations that are made to the various political parties and to check how much in the way of donations his political party has received from the various oil companies in Canada.

Furthermore—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Manicouagan on a point of order.

Mr. Langlois: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to remind the hon. member that the debate is about the privatization of Petro-Canada and absolutely not about the contributions that companies might make to political parties of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, back to my original point. I challenge that member to check the donations that were made to his political party and the promises that his political party made in response. I say that there is a direct connection between this policy with respect to Petro-Canada and the donations that were received from the oil companies in Canada. There is absolutely no problem in my mind and in the minds of Canadian citizens about that either.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for having to rise on a point of order again, but I believe that the last set of exchanges included comments from the Conservative member stating that what my colleague had said was untrue.

I believe that is not the case, but more important in the context of a point of order—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but this is not a point of order, it is simply a matter of opinion. We have to go on with the debate. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury has the floor.

Mr. Bird: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order? The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the point which I was making was that it is using unparliamentary language to refer to anything which somebody has said as untrue.

I think, if the Speaker will check his sources, he will see that I am correct with respect to that point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am asking for the co-operation of both sides of the House and from all hon. members. I repeat that all parties got their say. I give the floor once more to the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

• (1710)

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to address this House on Bill C-84, the beginnings of privatization for Petro-Canada.

At the outset I would like to put Petro-Canada in perspective. As with the 13 other Crown corporations that have been privatized by the government, particularly three of the larger ones such as Canadair, Teleglobe, and Air Canada, I want to emphasize that Petro-Canada is a major Canadian corporation.

First, it is a Crown corporation and based on 1989 figures—I am using The Globe and Mail Report on Business of July, 1990, for my figures so they may differ slightly from some which have been used in this debate. I want to assure hon. members that the figures I am using have not been manufactured for me by any particular source, but they are independent public figures published in the leading business journal of the country.

The Report on Business states that Petro-Canada is the largest Crown corporation in terms of sales revenue at $5 billion. In terms of assets, it is the third largest Crown corporation with assets of $6.8 billion, ranking behind the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and behind Canadian National Railway.

It ranks third among Crown corporations in terms of profits and the figures that I have for its profits before extraordinary items are $85 million in 1989, well behind the CNR and Canada Post.

In one other measure, Petro-Canada fairs only seventh among Crown corporations and that is in terms of return on capital where it was listed at 7.8 per cent for 1989. By comparison, this key statistic for Canada Post was 9.68 per cent, and for the CNR it was 8.68 per cent. Ordinarily one would not be very impressed with any corporation that finished behind the CNR or Canada Post in terms of business performance. As we all know, those two traditional Crown corporations have for many years been financial millstones around the government's neck and it has been only in the last couple of years, under the direction of this government, that both those corporations have commenced to perform as legitimate profitable corporations.

To gain a full perspective about Petro-Canada, it is also necessary to compare it with one or two similar private companies in the integrated oils category. For example, Imperial Oil revenues are twice as large at $10 billion and Shell Canada at $5 billion is just about equal to Petro-Canada.

However, when it comes to profitability, the comparisons are not so favourable. Shell's profitability is three times greater for the same sales and Imperial's profitability is five times greater for twice the sales. In the critical category of return on capital, there is a remarkable demonstration of difference between the two well-run private companies, each exceeding 15 per cent return on invested capital over a five-year period annually, whereas the Crown corporation, Petro-Canada, which is also a well-run company, shows only one-third that performance at 5.13 per cent annual return on capital over the five-year period.

I think that those are meaningful figures in this debate because we are talking about the basic philosophy of turning the public Crown corporation in a private enterprise direction.

The question naturally arises, particularly for those of socialist persuasion, why even think of doing such a thing? Is it not better, they ask, to keep the company in government hands on behalf of the people, rather than risk private enterprise initiative for that dirty word, profit? It seems to me the facts about return on capital firmly answer those questions. For some inexplicable and mystical reason, private corporations just seem to run a lot more efficiently and successfully than Crown companies. As I say, just note the difference in return on capital between Imperial and Shell at 15 per cent annually and Petro-Canada at just over 5 per cent, a three-to-one differential in performance.

One of the basic principles of the privatization process which is followed consistently from the government's agenda for economic renewal presented in 1984 is a market-oriented energy policy. It is based on the belief that the private sector, guided by efficiently functioning markets, is in the best position to make optimal decisions concerning energy consumption, production, and investment. Surely the stark reality of the numbers I have presented with regard to return on capital, particularly, help to confirm the basic truth of that principle. Somehow the private enterprise performer is almost always more efficient, more effective and more productive than the government-controlled company. One of the principles, one of the tenets in 1984 when this government commenced to restructure the country's economic framework was to enable Canadians to become more competitive generally in our efforts to meet the challenges of the emerging global marketplace.

Therefore, I strongly support this legislation which authorizes the sale of shares in Petro-Canada to the general public because I believe that direction will ultimately prove the best both for Petro-Canada and for the government representing all Canadians.

As Petro-Canada is gradually transformed to face both the opportunities and the disciplines of the private market system, I feel confident that its performance will emulate its major competitors because it already is a sound and solid corporation. I believe that privatization will make it perform even better.

There are obviously other reasons which strongly support this legislation. Petro-Canada needs increased capital to develop its oil and gas reserves. Since gaining a commercial mandate in 1985, Petro-Canada has become a major player in several energy megaprojects. It presently has the second largest proven reserves of oil and natural gas liquids in Canada and the fourth largest natural gas reserves of any company in the country.

It will take money, lots of it and much of it at very high risk to develop these reserves on a viable, profitable basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Petro-Canada is one of hundreds of oil and gas companies operationg in that major field of activities. Let us keep that in mind. Petro-Canada accounts for roughly 6 per cent of exploration and development operations in Canada. Nor should we forget that the development of these resources requires a lot of capital.

[English]

The best way to raise that capital is through a public share issue where investment is made on the merits of the market system and not simply by tapping the federal treasury for huge new amounts that will reflect in higher taxes or a larger government deficit. That is where the moment of truth occurs in the enterprise process, when a corporation is compelled to demonstrate its plan for attracting capital and must do so in a highly competitive way. That is when the prospects for performance are evaluated in the context of the investment required and the test is whether or not the money is forthcoming.

Last, I support the legislation because state ownership of Petro-Canada is no longer necessary for the company to achieve public policy objectives, if it ever was required for that purpose. When Petro-Canada was created in the 1970s, the Liberal government of the day set three objectives for its public policy role on behalf of the people of Canada. First, it was to increase the petroleum supplies available and to increase exploration for new sources of oil and gas, especially in the frontier areas of Canada's coast and in the Arctic. Second, the company was to provide a window on the oil and gas industry to help government formulate national energy policies. Third, the company was to act as Canada's agent in any negotiations with other states concerning energy supplies.

Looking back in history, we have all come to realize that government ownership of Petro-Canada is no longer required to achieve those public policy objectives. In fact, we have come to the realization that there is only one principal public policy objective in the energy sector. That is to establish the conditions in which the economic development of our energy resources can occur. There is now good reason to believe that privatization of Petro-Canada will better serve that major policy objective and will not put other energy policy objectives at risk through privatization.

For example, we now have a much clearer perspective on the extent of our frontier reserves and on their potential for development. We are confident that the private sector is the best approach there. The government has a variety of mechanisms to remain intimately informed about the industry, including the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the National Energy Board. We do not need a major Crown corporation as a window on the industry at all.

If trading directly with other states becomes a requirement, there are other more direct options which the government can use. The capabilities and expertise exist in more than one government department: Energy, Mines and Resources for one and International Trade for another.

In summary, therefore, the original reasons for government ownership of Petro-Canada are no longer valid, and one wonders if they ever really were valid. It is tempting to draw a parallel between Petro-Canada and the infamous National Energy Program which was introduced to Canada by the Liberal government 10 years ago.

Mr. Lewis: Supported by the NDP.

Mr. Bird: As business and political writer, Tom Kierans, said in his report on Business Magazine of July 1990: "The National Energy Program was a reckless and thinly veiled experiment with a planned economy."

Even the energy minister of the day, the hon. Marc Lalonde, admitted that the National Energy Program was not about people, it was about power. Ottawa's aim was not simply to sustain and cushion eastern Canada against oil shocks, but rather as Kierans observed, "It was the intention of the federal government to recycle a large component of the huge energy price increase through its coffers so that it could both restructure the energy industry, and also redirect the industrial economy while increasing its federal control".

The government was basing its planning on estimates that oil prices would reach $80 per barrel. Some plan. Even though consumers would be paying a lot more for petroleum products, the oil and gas industry would be very prosperous, it contemplated, and government revenues would be so large that all of its social programs would be supported and the federal government would probably have no deficit.

Mr. Della Noce: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Right.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, talk about the GST and the burden which many people claim it will bring to Canadians. Can you imagine what the National Energy Program was designed and disguised to accomplish? It was to bleed us dry at $80 a barrel and that was the plan for this nation.

We all know what happened. Oil prices collapsed, and the planned economy collapsed with it. Unfortunately, however, many of the social contracts had already been put in place and much of the government spending was already under way. Today we see the result of massive deficits which were accumulated in the early 1980s, and the incestuous process of debt upon debt which became embedded in the system by the time the current government came to power in 1984.

To a considerable extent in this bill, Mr. Speaker, we see the distinctions here of political philosophy, and we saw them with the National Energy Program as well. We are confronted with some of the basic differences and political principle between a Liberal outlook that "government knows best, and does best", the Socialist outlook that "governments should own everything", and the Conservative philosophy of "The market system does it best, let it work".

It is worth reviewing briefly again some of the main features of this government's energy policy which impact on the Petro-Canada bill. As emphasized at the start, we have implemented a market approach to energy policy in the belief that the private sector is by far the best vehicle to achieve Canada's energy goals.

Consistent with that philosophy, we have reformed regulations governing the energy sector, and have allowed prices to be set by market forces.

Of utmost importance, the government has negotiated secure access to the vast U.S.A. market for Canadian energy products via the free trade agreement. This historic move has created an atmosphere in which investment in this country is now again fostered, including foreign investment, while ensuring continued opportunities for Canadians to participate in the oil industry.

Shortly after taking office in 1984, this government dismantled that grand Liberal experiment in a planned economy called the National Energy Program. It was already even then dying of its own bureaucratic weight, and of the reality that the golden goal of $80 per barrel for oil was long a dream or a nightmare of the past. Unfortunately, a large part of Canada's financial stability collapsed in the ruins of the National Energy Program.

In 1985, the government gave Petro-Canada a commercial mandate, and it has commenced to make significant progress as one of Canada's largest integrated oil companies.

Now, by commencing to privatize Petro-Canada, the company will be given the freedom it requires to run its business on a market basis without the burdens imposed by government ownership, and with access to the private market for investors and operating partners.

Security of energy supply has always been a key component of Canadian energy policy, and this government has recognized that security can best be achieved by ensuring that Canada possesses a strong, diverse and growing energy sector. We have put in place policies to encourage the development of all economically viable forms of energy. Through regulatory reform and the removal of oppressive and discriminatory taxes, we have created the conditions which will enable the domestic oil industry to grow, and which will stimulate the exploration necessary for new reserves of oil and gas to serve the future.

Also, to encourage security of supply, Canada has established emergency procedures within our own domestic market to deal with possible shortages and has entered into emergency sharing procedures with our international energy agency partners in the event that physical shortages of oil should occur. That sort of condition is intensified in these days of crisis in the Persian Gulf.

Those are some of the key directions of Canada's energy policy. As I have said before, the privatization of Petro-Canada will not only serve those policies but it will bring many other benefits as well, both for the company and for the country.

By placing Petro-Canada on the same basis as its private sector competitors, we will increase the business potential which Petro-Canada will have to develop its assets and to acquire new ones.

Privatization will permit the company access to the full range of private sector financial markets and instruments, which will help it to build its business in a timely fashion.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, privatization will provide Petro-Canada management with the financial flexibility enjoyed by their competitors and give them ready access to new funds without adding a cent to the tax load of Canadians. By limiting the over-all participation of foreigners we can gain all these benefits while making sure that Petro-Canada remains under the control of Canadians.

[English]

Equally important, the financial resources of government will be relieved of such financial support and investment which truly does belong in the private sector, where the efficiencies of performance are so well demonstrated.

Last, privatization will remove the myth that government needs direct participation as an operator in the oil and gas business to achieve our public policy objectives. It has been clearly demonstrated in many ways that Petro-Canada is not, has not been for some time, and perhaps may not ever have been, an effective direct instrument of government energy policy. Like the National Energy Program, it has been a grand interventionist scheme going largely in the wrong direction and not toward the destinations and goals which our country must find and obtain. Clearly, Petro-Canada does have a major role to play in the development of Canada's energy reserves, and I have utmost confidence that with its excellent workforce of almost 7,000 people and its outstanding management, Petro-Canada will play that role in extremely successful ways. Its future will be found, not as an instrument of government policy, but rather as an active and competitive private sector company in the forefront of the Canadian energy effort. It is in that manner, along with so many other dynamic enterprises on the Canadian energy scene that both the company and the country will be well served with efficient, effective, reliable and competitive energy supplies for decades to come.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, while the creation of Petro-Canada may be viewed as the product of an ideology, the decision to privatize flows from good old common sense.

[English]

Those are among the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I strongly support Bill C-84 and the privatization of Petro-Canada Corporation.

Along with Canadair, TeleGlobe Canada, Air Canada, and with 10 other of those Crown corporations since 1984, a commitment has been fulfilled by this government, not an ideological commitment toward a planned economy but a common sense commitment in the best interests and best traditions of Canadian and Conservative directions.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his speech. I do not doubt for a moment his sincerity. I have some doubts about the content, but I do thank him. I know he is a sincere individual and has helped me with a situation in my riding. His counsel has been valuable and is, I believe, working.

As to profits, and I noticed with many of the speakers on the opposite side of the House, and several from the corner on that side, the thrust of their speeches was based on profit; PetroCan only made this much whereas Imperial Esso made this much. My question to my colleague is, when does the profit become greed and avarice and immoral and just unacceptable to the government side? We are not agin profits, but surely there is a point when profits reach that state.

On another smaller point, I am sure my colleague did not mean to but he seemed to intimate that the private companies were well run and that Petro-Canada was poorly operated. I am sure both the administration and the other people in the 3,000-plus stations across this country would take some umbrage or some insult from those comments. I am sure my colleague did not mean that.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has been generous in his comments with respect to my counsel to him on another matter. I would like to say that there areas where even members of the New Democratic Party and the Conservative Party can get together and help to make this country work. I appreciated his interest in the initiative on which we have been able to help each other.

I would like to answer his second question first. He obviously was not listening because I said, at the very conclusion of my speech—and I said it once at the beginning of my speech—that Petro-Canada and its almost 7,000 employees was an excellent company, it was well run, and it had outstanding management. However, as I said, for some mystical, inexplicable reason we have a major company like Petro-Canada with the same sales as Shell or half the sales of Imperial and getting one-third the return on capital.

The private enterprise society which has built this great country. The efficiency of performance has always been measured by the enterprise system. I would like to read a definition that contained in the article by Kierans as to what really constitutes the best search for perfection. He wrote: "Essential to the workings of a market economy is the freedom for individuals taking decisions independently and in competition to achieve society's objectives at the lowest possible cost".

I just have to say, in terms of fulfilling Canada's energy policy objectives, Imperial Oil has to stand out equally as a private corporation with any Crown corporation in terms of the services provided to this country, and it is not even a totally Canadian owned company.

I think we have a philosophical conflict here. There are some subjects my friend, from the NDP and I probably could never reconcile on. That would be his belief in a socialist approach to government and my belief in a Conservative, private enterprise approach to government.

I submit to you, Sir, that the approach I support has worked and has served this country extremely well for 125 years of Confederation and even long before that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Other questions or comments? The hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a very short question. First I would like to congratulate my colleague from Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

[English]

I would like to congratulate him on his sincere, honest, and valuable speech.

I understood very positively my hon. colleague when he said that Petro-Canada could play the role of a private company with 6,000 or 7,000 employees. I do believe that. I do believe that Petro-Canada has a future.

Of course the socialists on the other side do not like profits. They do not like private enterprise and they do not trust private enterprise, but I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. colleagues on both sides of this House that if I made no profit when I was in business, there were no new jobs at all. Profit brings jobs. I cannot understand that these people did not understand after so many speeches, particularly the last beautiful speech given by my hon. colleague on the other side, that if one has no profit there are no jobs.

There is one thing I would like to ask my hon. colleague. Would Canadians like that famous window on the industry now? I am speaking about retail gasoline, not if they want to nationalize McDonald's and have a window on hamburgers. Would Canadians who are listening to us have wanted us to keep the National Energy Program and Petro-Canada, with the famous words "a window on the industry", which Mr. Lalonde does not believe in any more? I do not know if he became a Tory in the last two weeks, but I like to hear what he said the other day in the press.

If the window on the industry, the National Energy Program, had not been scrapped by this government, the price of a barrel of oil would be $117— that is just a fast calculation—or $1.10 per litre at the pump. I would like to ask my colleague if we had kept Petro-Canada and the National Energy Program, would it have helped the Canadians who are listening to us? We forced them to invest in Petro-Canada.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I would like to caution my hon. colleague that when he speaks about the other side we are speaking about the same side. This is what is called the small blue corner. I do not want my colleague to lose sight of the fact that we are on the same team.

The reference to the National Energy Program was prefaced on the prospect of oil at $80 a barrel. The calculation that my hon. friend has made indicates that it probably would have gone to $117 a barrel. What it would have become would have a been a tax of another form. It would merely have been a case of raising the cost of petroleum to Canadians whenever the government needed to prime its own fiscal pump.

As I did the research of sorts for my address today, I realized that the planned economy through the National Energy Program was much more nefarious and deceitful than anything that could ever be claimed by the most severe critic of the goods and services tax. I am encouraged that again we find that we are very much in the right direction and, by comparison to history, we are not only going in the right direction but we are going in a very fair, equitable and effective direction on behalf of all Canadians.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member about two points.

First, this management which has had such a poor record of profitability in Petro-Canada will nevertheless be given the right to carry Petro-Canada to the private sector. Why have there not been changes in the management if the profit record has been so poor?

Second, are we not talking in the case of his own particular province about not the great force of small numbers of companies competing against each other in the petroleum industry, but instead about the virtual dominance of all gasoline sales in that province by a single company, the Irving company, which has led to massive rates of profit and to serious problems for the people of New Brunswick?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has covered a very wide horizon of issues in his question. I would like to respond to him very quickly.

The performance of the Irving company, both in petroleum and in other interests in New Brunswick, is a source of pride to all New Brunswickers. I would challenge him to put that question to his own NDP leader in New Brunswick. I believe that she would criticize him for making such an inference.

On the other question he raises about the management of Petro-Canada, I have said on two occasions in my address and once in answer to a question that I regard the management and the performance of Petro-Canada highly. In fact any Crown corporation that can show a profit at all is an exemplary organization. What the record shows is that if that company is put into the private market system, the chances are that it will emulate the performance of Imperial Oil and Shell, which will be to triple its present return on capital.

In closing, I would like to refer to the three major companies that have been discussed in terms of privatization prior to this bill. Canadair's sales have risen since privatization from $438 million to $800 million. Its employment has risen from 4,667 to 7,200. Air Canada's profit went from a loss of $22 million in 1985 to a profit of $36 million in 1989. In the case of Teleglobe, the demand for service is rising at the rate of 30 per cent annually. These are examples of what happens when we take government's burdensome ownership away from a corporation and put it into the private market system which serves all Canadians much better and in a far superior manner.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate today with a sense of alarm that this government is going to privatize the institution we call Petro-Canada, a corporation that is already owned by Canadians. Now it is going to sell back to us something we already own.

The original purpose for the creation of Petro-Canada was to provide a window on the oil industry for Canadians and to explore for gas and oil in Canada's frontiers. It did this very effectively until this government came to power and cancelled Petro-Canada's public policy role, telling the publicly owned company to behave just like any other private sector oil companies. Now look what has happened.

In 1984 we had approximately 5,800 oil wells drilled, completed, and brought into production in Canada. Last year there were 1,720 oil wells drilled and brought into production. This year, as of October 6, there were only 1,306 oil wells drilled and brought into production here in Canada. As of October 9, there were 306 oil drilling rigs in Canada that were down. They were not working. There were 23 rigs in the process of moving, and only 159 rigs actually drilling. Only one-third of the oil rigs in Canada are working at the present time when we are facing an energy crisis. So much for the private sector.

Just recently, James K. Gray, Executive Vice-President of Canadian Hunter Exploration Limited of Calgary, stated in a speech:

> Our current supply of conventional crude oil is diminishing. As an explorationist I can assure you that there are still discoveries to be made, and it is crucially important that we be encouraged to explore. Nevertheless, trends indicate that conventional oil production will decline by over 20,000 barrels per day per year in Canada over the next 30 years, while demand is expected to increase by approximately 25,000 barrels per day per year over the same period. Our modest surplus of production will soon disappear.

That is from the oil industry itself telling us what is going to happen over the next few years.

I have further concern that it is not just happening in Canada. The decline in Canada will begin in 1991 to 1995 by about 10 per cent. During the period 1987 to 1990 production in the United States declined by about 25 per cent to 50 per cent. I should point out that crude oil in the United States now amounts to 41 per cent of its needs.

It is this type of lack of direction from this government that is putting Canada in another energy bind. Here we are going to privatize a public company that was set up to develop frontier lands at a time when we are coming into an energy crunch.

Petro-Canada stands as number two in terms of oil reserves. It stands as number two among all the companies. only exceeded by Imperial Oil. It stands as number two in gas reserves and as number four in gas production. It stands as number one in net land holdings in this nation. Petro-Canada has control of most land holdings, or more control, than the other companies in Canada at the present time.

It was put there to fulfil a mandate, to do the exploration work in Canada's frontier. This government has cancelled that mandate.

Mr. Speaker, why has the private sector not picked up the challenge in the frontier lands and the offshore? Why has their exploration work dried up? It is because in a land as vast as ours and the harsh climates in our Arctic and the frontier, one needs incentives because the private sector is not going to do it. After this government deregulated the oil and gas industry and took away Petro-Canada's mandate, things have gone downhill ever since.

This is one of the reasons why Petro-Canada has not shown the same rate of return, because of the high-risk exploration it did on the frontiers. It probably has not yet got the return back from the oil pipelines built to service those wells.

It is only recently we have seen the price of natural gas change, and that is in response to the start of construction of the Mackenzie gas pipeline.

I think we should look at what has happened in Canada. First of all, last December, under the so-called free market system when we had a cold snap all of a sudden propane prices almost doubled. Propane is a by-product of the oil industry, bottled gas we call it, but it is really bottled propane. Many people have to rely on this for their heating and just recently the price has gone up again.

I had a constituent call me just a few days ago who has a fleet of school buses powered by propane. He called to tell me he was not sure whether he could continue to operate because of the current high price of propane. But the sad thing is there is no shortage of propane.

It is the private sector taking advantage of an energy shortage, not in Canada because these prices are set outside of Canada in Texas. An organization outside of our own country is really controlling our prices and determining what lies ahead. It is not much wonder we have problems in the Middle East when we have the type of chess games being played by the huge oil companies in wanting to ensure a supply of product to supply the world from wherever they choose at whatever price they feel they should pay.

It is nothing new for the government to be subsidizing oil companies. Hibernia would never be developed without the $2.7 billion, I believe, of federal government backing that is going in there.

Time will tell whether or not any of that oil will ever benefit the Canadian people. We are putting out a tremendous amount of money to bring that onstream, but there is nothing in the agreement that says the oil has to be refined or sold in Canada. There is no long-term security of supply there for the Canadian people. When we look at the equal access that the Americans have to our energy supplies under the free trade agreement, it makes me wonder how this government could ever think of privatizing a corporation like Petro-Canada because it is our operation and it was established through Canadian taxpayers' money. Now the government has given it away and the Americans have equal access.

I think rather than privatizing Petro-Canada we should be going the other way. I think the mandate should be broadened and strengthened. We have diminishing reserves of conventional oil in Canada and the United States. We have tar sands oil but that is one of the most expensive to produce.

Rather than limiting its mandate, Petro-Canada should be expanded back to where it was at the time this government took office, with responsibilities on the frontier and the offshore, where the private sector does not want to venture because of the risk involved. We as Canadians need assured reserves. I think it should expand to include the development and use of renewable fuels. I am talking here about ethanol, for example. There is only one oil company among all those in Canada who is actually involved in this, and that was again with a level of government subsidy in terms of research and development.

I think we have to look very seriously at expanding the mandate of this Crown corporation. For example, there are millions of tonnes of grain stacked across the prairies that could be the source of a renewable fuel. It could account for up to 10 per cent of the automotive fuels used in this nation. Not only would it provide a market for the millions of tonnes of grain that remain unsold, but it could provide a domestic market for between five and eight million tonnes of that grain. At the same time, it could clean up the environment.

The use of 10 per cent ethanol in an automotive fuel will lower the carbon dioxide emissions of those fuels by 10 per cent. That is the first benefit. It would also provide a means of getting rid of carbon dioxide emissions by the very fact that the growth of a plant itself removes carbon dioxide from the air. An acre of corn, wheat or barley will remove as much carbon dioxide from the air as an acre of forest. We are all concerned about the destruction of our forests, not only in Canada but in the Amazon rain forests and other countries of the world. So we could have a double-barrelled impact on pollution. I think the government should look very seriously at moving in this direction.

I am shocked to find out that the additive put in gasoline by oil companies at the present time in Canada to replace lead—and this took place a couple of years ago—is not allowed to be used in the United States. But it is manufactured there and sold to us, and here we are using it in our vehicles to further pollute the atmosphere.

The oxygen content of ethanol blend is almost twice that of other oxygenated fuel resulting in reduced carbon monoxide emissions. It could be as much as 25 per cent. I said 10 per cent previously, but it could be up to 25 per cent.

I should point out that currently the city of Toronto ranks as one of North America's worst cities in downtown carbon monoxide levels and most of this is from car exhausts.

Just this afternoon on the way to Ottawa, we landed at Toronto Island Airport. We circled out over Lake Ontario to come in for the approach to the landing. We looked at the cloud of haze lying over that city, and most of that at this time of year has to be automotive emissions.

This government has an opportunity to expand the mandate of this Crown corporation into the development of renewable fuels, which will benefit all Canadians and here it is going to sell it off to the private sector because it thinks it can do better. Yet when we examine the dismal record of what has happened in the Arctic in the last few years, and currently there are nine rigs in the Arctic, not one of them drilling at the present time, or as I should say as of early October and late September.

I look at the record of what happens under privatization, and I have to look at the Polysar situation in the city of Sarnia. It was established in 1971 with $250 million worth of seed money. This is a very successful company. In 1985 to 1987 the government decided to privatize it and sold 48.2 per cent of its shares for a return to the taxpayers of only $361 million. Yet, within two years Nova Corporation paid $1.3 billion for that same company. The government sold those shares for $5.75 a share and two years later Nova Corporation paid $20.70 a share.

Then in May of this year the government sold off probably the crown jewel to the Bayer Corporation, a crown jewel that only in one year since the 1940s had ever lost money. It was a world leader in research and development and it was sold, to be gone from Canadian control forever and a day.

That is the type of thing that has been happening under privatization. The government has been selling Crown corporations at less then their actual value. In the meantime, somebody makes a bundle on the stock markets.

It has been indicated that seven executives of that corporation received about $8 million in severance pay and then two years later part of the crown jewel of research and development, the old rubber division, was sold off to foreign interests.

It seems rather strange that this government is moving in this direction, particularly with the uncertainty in the Middle East. As I indicated earlier, with our reserves diminishing, the government should not be selling at a time when we should be looking to clean up the environment. Petro-Canada is a vehicle through which we can do this to work in the long term.

It is strange that we should be looking at a mandate that was pulled away from a company to develop the Arctic and the offshore and would allow ourselves to become dependent on decisions made in the boardrooms of other nations for the energy future of this nature, particularly when we have the harsh climate that we do.

It seems strange that we would rush to sell off our non-renewable resources the way we are. I reflect back to January and February 1989 when there were huge natural gas contracts made with the State of California and other companies out there. One of the American Senators was speaking to me about this. He told me that he cannot see why Canada is selling off its natural resources the way it is. He said that most of that natural gas during the summer months is being pumped back into the depleted fields in California to replenish their own reserves. He said, "Let me assure you that 20 years from now we will have natural gas and you will not have any".

I look at the number of rigs that are down in Canada at the present time, and the fact that this government is going to sell off this Crown corporation that was set up to develop and explore the Canada Lands, the Arctic and the offshore. I find it inconceivable and not at all acceptable that we should be heading in this direction and leaving future generations of Canadians wondering where their fuel supplies are going to come from.

In conclusion, I have no alternative but to vote against this bill. I have no alternative but to look at what has happened in the oil industry. I have no alternative but to look at what has happened in Alberta itself where 60 per cent of the oil well service industries that were in business in 1984 are now non-existent. I have no alternative but to encourage my colleagues on this side of the House to vote against this legislation. We should be looking to expanding the mandate into the renewable fuels. We should be taking the initiative and the lead to make sure this happens as quickly as possible, to give the farmers in western Canada an income, to provide a market for those millions of tonnes of grain that are out there at the present time, and also to provide a high level of protein feed suitable for livestock at a reasonable cost to keep our livestock industry competitive with that of the rest of the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Manicouagan.

• (1800)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address some of the comments my colleague for Lambton—Middlesex made regarding the mandate that he would like to see for Petro-Canada.

Of course, the wide range of subjects, items, and proposals that he outlined for a mandate for Petro-Canada is quite valuable. I would agree to that. But why, in his mind, would it be impossible for Petro-Canada to have the same mandate and attain the same goals that he has been talking about, being owned by Canadians shareholders, instead of the Government of Canada?

Why would it be impossible for the shareholders of Petro-Canada, a majority of whom will be Canadian citizens, to give that same mandate to Petro-Canada in a competitive and economic environment that will level the playing-field for Petro-Canada, while at the same time, not having to live under the government and all the restrictions that it imposes?

I feel personally that it would be much easier for Petro-Canada, if it had such a mandate, to have access to more research and development, and new sources of funds, being owned by Canadian shareholders—the Canadian public—and not having to live with the restriction imposed by government ownership. I would like to hear the member's comments.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I think the record speaks for itself in that there is only one oil company that is proceeding at the present time into the area of renewable fuels and that is Mohawk Oil. It is doing that in co-operation and in partnership with the Saskatchewan Pool Elevators in the Province of Saskatchewan.

It was tried in Ontario a few years ago by United Co-operatives of Ontario in two test marketings. There was one in Listowel, Ontario, I believe it was, and the other at Guelph. Motorists were lining up at the pumps for clean fuel. It was discontinued because the oil company supplying that the gasoline that was used as a base with 10 per cent of ethanol added to it, refused to sell them any more gasoline. That is the reason.

The private oil companies want to sell oil. They are not interested in selling a gasoline that has 10 per cent ethanol involved in it, even though it may clean up the environment and even though there are other benefits that accrue to the rest of our economy.

I should also point out that this product has gained acceptance in the United States, far more than it has here because of legislation passed by Congress and the Senate mandating the additives that can be used, and those that are not allowed to be used.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating my colleague and friend, the member for Lambton—Middlesex, for an excellent speech. It was a speech that to a certain degree was very informative, not as partisan as I thought it could be, mind you, of the severity of the legislation that we are discussing and so I have no choice but to make a few comments.

I was very pleased to hear some of the suggestions he made. I would only hope that all hon. members in the House would listen to some of those suggestions, take heed, and even introduce something in the near future that might help us in regard to the new mandate of Petro-Canada, rather than the privatization.

Looking back, it is almost a decade ago that the Tory government had attempted to privatize. You know what happened at that time, Mr. Speaker. It had to back off for a number of reasons. It then proceeded to introduce a different type of strategy. Rather than outright privatization, it decided on a different strategy.

In 1985, it took away from Petro-Canada the tools to do an efficient job here in Canada. It redefined the mandate of Petro-Canada. That has basically declawed Petro-Canada. Now, it is in the process of privatization. So, it has been a long, long plan.

Let us look at that policy of privatization and I know the hon. member talked about the philosophy involved here and giving it the proper tools. The question I have for him has to do with this mandate and the timing of this privatization. Does the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex not think the timing is terrible and that it is a bad time for the government to become a spectator in this volatile industry? It is a bad time because of the problems being experienced in the Middle East.

He mentioned the mandate and I would ask him to elaborate on the mandate of a new Petro-Canada, rather than the privatization.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I completely agree with my colleague in that we could not have picked a worse time to start the privatization process. Of course, if the government were to sell now, before the oil prices sky-rocketed, and they will do that if war does break out in the Middle East, there would be instant profits accruing to whoever makes the purchase.

If oil is a diminishing resource, and we know that for a fact, then whoever buys in will have increased share value similar to what I quoted from the sale of the Polysar Ltd. and Nova Corporation. They almost made four times their investment in a matter of two years. The same thing could happen here. From that aspect alone, we should be taking a hard look to safeguard the investment the Canadian taxpayer already has in this company.

In terms of expanding the mandate, Canada is a very broad and diverse country. We have the ability to produce the ethanol that I spoke of, not only in the Prairies but in eastern Canada as well. That could provide up to at least 10 per cent renewable fuels. It would have to be done in a way that would bring it onstream in a matter of a couple of years.

As I indicated earlier, our conventional oil reserves are going to diminish in the next few years. This would give us the breathing space to bring this on and create the two-fold purpose that I spoke about in my address, that is, lowering automotive emissions by using an environmentally friendly product. I should point out that it has not only been identified as an environmentally friendly product, but the growing of crops to provide the base, the feed stock, or the grain for it would also remove the carbon dioxide from the air.

It is in this context that we should take a long, hard look—a look that entails a lot more than just a few windfall profits the business world will be out there to grab. It should be a long-term look as to what is in the best interest of our economy, our environment, and the people of the nation.

The other benefits that spin off in terms of balance of trade would benefit as well because the products being added to gasoline now in the nation are not manufactured in Canada but rather in nation to the south of us. It also benefits our balance of trade as well as the environment and the diminishing oil reserves, giving them a boost to be longer lasting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That puts an end to questions and comments. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has the floor for debate.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, many times during the last six years, you have heard me say how pleased I was to speak to a bill. But never was I as happy as today because Bill C-84 recognizes something the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada really believes in, an economic reality for Canada, and that is the privatization of a company.

I think that the opposition distorted the debate at the outset. This debate is not about the privatization of an oil company but rather about the matter of whether or not our government, our country, should own companies which are competing with private companies. This is the first question we must ask ourselves. And I would answer, as the majority of Canadians have done since 1975, by saying: No, the government should not own companies which are unfairly competing with the private sector. A little earlier, I heard the hon. member for London—Middlesex say: Why buy what we have already bought?

Unfortunately, it is true that, when his political party was in office, they paid a fortune, they spent a huge amount of taxpayers' money to purchase some private companies. But Canadians just like you and I, never wanted to buy Petro-Canada, Petro-Fina, Supertest or any of the others, they never accepted that deal and do not own that business. Canadians do not own Petro-Canada and do not feel like they own it. And that is easy to explain. Since 1975, that is for the last fifteen years, if Canadians had thought they owned Petro-Canada, do you know what they would have done during all that time? They would have bought Petro-Canada products. They would never have dealt with another company, they would have gone to their own company, Petro-Canada. And all the other companies, like Gulf, Shell, Esso, and my colleague from Laval-East could name a few others, would have gone bankrupt.

An hon. member: Sergaz.

Mr. Vincent: Sergaz. Nobody would have bought gas at thoses places if Canadians had had a feeling of belonging, of ownership for a society a governement decided to buy without ever consulting them.

Mr. Langlois: At a high price!

Mr. Vincent: At a very high price, as mentionned and rightly so by my colleague from the North Shore, from the beautiful constituency of Manicouagan, as he would say himself. It is not as beautiful as the constituency of Trois-Rivières, but it is not bad. So, the Canadians do not own it and, I will follow up on his argument as to why we should buy what we already own with an example. When my constituents buy secondhand furniture or old jeans at the Army surpluses and I follow his reasoning, they pay a second time for what their government has already bought. The argument expressed by my colleague from London—Middlesex does not hold water. Both parties, the Liberals and the NDP, are in favour of state-ownership. Privatize means to ensure that the Canadian economy, in whatever sector— and again, I want the debate to be on the level of the principles of nationalization or privatization. We could talk about nationalizing hamburger companies, to have a window on the hamburger market in Canada. We could talk about nationalizing the furniture manufacturing companies in order to know what is going on in the furniture industry.

An hon. member: And toothbrushes.

Mr. Vincent: My colleague points out toothbrushes, but we could go into every sector, nationalize everything, but that is not this government's policy. The Conservative government's policy is to let the Canadian economy and Canadian enterprises work, compete so that Canadian consumers get the best value for their money. This is what we want, and I can say that in my riding of Trois-Rivières people are glad to see that over the last six years we managed to sell 18 Crown corporations which were competing with people of my riding, people who invest time and money.

Let's take the example of a Petro-Canada station near a service station where a good worker was investing time and money to pay for it, make it work, create jobs and pay himself a salary to feed his family. What did we have on the other side of the street? We had a brand new Petro-Canada station which was competing with him, with the help of your taxes. This retailler was saying: "Why is the government doing that to me? I did not do anything to the government. Why do I pay taxes to the government—I work hard to earn a salary and send some money to the government—and it turns around and uses this money to put a competitor across the street. Why is the government doing this?"

An hon. member: Same thing with me!

Mr. Vincent: I had no answer for him, because there was none. I would say: "You are out of luck, they could have nationalized donuts but, no, they nationalized service stations." This is what the people in the riding of Trois-Rivières have to say. They are happy, as I said earlier, that 18 companies could be privatized, bringing in $3 billion on top of everything. That means that there were $3 billion laying about in Canada, in companies which had the mandate to compete with Canadian tax-paying companies. This is illogical.

No need to own a company to know what is happening in the oil industry in Canada and around the world. There are federal civil servants paid to do that in Ottawa. The provincial Energy departments are dealing with that at the provincial level, and at the national and international levels because of the ramifications. One does not need to set up an office in my riding to know if it is a good idea to invest there. Surely you do not need anything specific to know if such and such company in your riding is a good investment.

It is the same thing with regard to energy. There is a government with a minister and a department to deal with that subject. If what the members opposite 524 were true, then, the Minister of Health and Welfare would need to have his own hospital competing with other hospitals in order to be able to make decisions regarding his department. The Minister of Transport would have to own a truck, car, and plane manufacturing company as well as an asphalt company in order to decide if the asphalt to be used on a national road is adequate. You see how absurd it is to argue that you need to own a company in order to administer the country in a certain field. I could go on with all forty departments, Mr. Speaker.

If the hon. member opposite wants to comment, I suggest he wait his turn.

Furthermore, if we take a look at the energy sector, the situation has changed in Canada since 1975. I see the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who knows that constitutionally, the situation has changed since 1975, and the same has happened in the energy sector. The situation has changed and policies have changed. The energy sector as such as changed as well.

Mr. Saint-Julien: The government has changed too.

Mr. Vincent: As the hon. member from Abitibi said, the government has changed as well since 1975. So there is no reason for maintaining a corporation in that sector. We have more Crown corporations to sell off, and my dearest wish is to make them sufficiently viable so we can sell them. The problem is that in 1984, we inherited 400 Crown corporations that didn't have a chance to be profitable.

At the time, taxpayers' money was invested in unprofitable companies that then competed with private companies owned by Canadians who were paying taxes, and those companies were profitable. Try and explain that to the people in my riding! They do not understand, they do not agree and they are right.

That is what we have been doing, gradually, since 1984, and that is why Petro-Canada should be privatized as soon as possible, so that Canadians who have confidence in the energy sector and want to invest in the industry will receive dividends, for a change.

Because for fifteen years they have not received dividends from PetroCan. Canadians who want to invest will be able to do so and to buy shares and if they are not satisfied with them on January 2nd, they will only have to resell them on January 3rd, while today they can do nothing if they are not satisfied with PetroCan. That is the main difference between privatization and government ownership and between the opposition parties and that government that makes decisions and administers the economy of a huge country that has inequalities but must reflect anyhow the policies that are put in place and the economy of the whole country.

The other point one must consider in matters of nationalization and privatization is where the money comes from and what it is used for. When I talk about privatization, I say to Canadians in general, as we did in the case of Air Canada and all the others: you take money out of your pockets, if you want, and you buy shares from a company. Here is its bottom line and we think it is profitable; if you are interested, you buy shares. That is privatization.

Nationalization means telling Canadians: This year, you will pay more taxes, because I need more money, since I decided to buy a furniture company.

Mr. Della Noce: At what price?

Mr. Vincent: At an outrageous price, as it was done in the case of Petro-Canada, formerly Petro Fina. I made the decision to buy a furniture company, so I raise your taxes, because I have to pay for it and, naturally, it is not profitable; evidently, I buy it because it is not profitable. Second, I will tax you a little bit more every year because I must keep it in business. I must tell you also that this unprofitable company I am buying with your income tax money will compete with your own profitable furniture company, one which creates jobs and also pays tax to me. This is what the debate is about today, the difference between privatization and nationalization.

Petro-Canada does not change anything to the price of petroleum products. Nothing at all. Once again, if it charged less than the other companies, it would have gone bankrupt and put itself out of business. Petro-Canada worked in a competitive economic context and did not give better prices to Canadians. It achieved nothing except costing money to Canadians and competing with private businesses, thus distorting the rules of the market.

This is what nationalization did to an oil company, and for a very high price. However, our Progressive Conservative government believes in free enterprise, believes that Canadians are capable of being productive, and they proved it. If we look at statistics since 1984, we see that Canada is now one of the most productive countries in the world. Canadians are capable of being productive, capable to do research and development, capable of being ingenious, of producing goods and selling them at a reasonable price. Because there are more than one capable Canadian producer in a given industry, we have better prices for all consumers. This is free enterprise, this is what the government believes in. Once again, we are talking about Petro-Canada, it could have been Donut-Canada or Hamburger-Canada or Furniture-Canada. Il is a basic principle. The government is here to manage the taxes it collects from Canadian citizens and to provide services that private enterprise is not able to give. This is the major thrust of our policy.

If the unfortunate National Energy Policy implemented by a Liberal Government still existed today—it was abolished five years ago—all experts agree that oil would cost $117 a barrel while a month ago, before the Persian Gulf crisis, it did cost $20 a barrel and now it costs nearly $40 as a result of the international situation.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, oil costing $117 a barrel would mean gas at the pump costing about $1.10 a litre. In other words, $1.10 a litre compared to 66c.. That is also the difference between a government which allows the market forces and competition to operate fully, and a government which, for the sake of so called higher principles, intervenes in almost every economic field to counteract the economic system and ruin the skills of our Canadian men and women in every industry. This distinction is at the very heart of this debate on Bill C-84, Mr. Speaker.

I have referred to the Liberal Government, but unfortunately the NDP thinks and acts in a likewise fashion, always ready to step in and increase the tax burden of the people they claim to represent. But if every Canadian man and woman went to his or her Liberal or NDP Member and asked: Listen, how much of my income tax this year will go to Crown Corporations which compete with my own company or my employers' company? How much money is there in my tax account? Then, they would have to come clean. What is the answer, Mr. Speaker? Ten, fifteen, twenty per cent of the income tax paid each year to the Federal Government to support non viable corporations which compete with the private sector? Again last week, Mr. Speaker, I got a phone call from one of my constituents concerning a Crown corporation that was awarded a contract because its bid was below cost price. Sure enough the company in my riding did not get the job because a Crown corporation got the contract for less than cost price.

Mr. Della Noce: No sweat, that is taxpayer's money.

Mr. Vincent: No sweat. But he was furious, Mr. Speaker, as you can well imagine. I can think of another word which might not be parliamentary. He told me: It does not make sense, I pay taxes to have that company take contracts away from me. And he is absolutely right, Mr. Speaker, and he said it did not make any sense.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I see my time is running out, and that is unfortunate because I would have a lot more to say about basic principles. I simply want to urge the House to pass Bill C-84 at the earliest opportunity because it will be good for the Canadian energy sector, good for the private sector, and good for the economy of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this in time because the member from Trois-Rivières acknowledged my presence and the fact that I was listening to his comments. I must say that he totally misunderstood the fundamental reason for the establishment of Petro-Canada. When he compares that Crown corporation to others, he lachs complete objectivity or at least a basic sens of reality. Why is there a Crown corporation in the energy sector? It's because the previous Liberal administration thought it was essential for the Canadian people to have a significant degree of ownership in a resource as important as oil which is found in abundance in the Canadian soil. Provincial governments also considered essential that there would be Crown corporations in the hydro field. I cannot figure out why the hon. member would not understand that what is useful and really profitable for private interests become public property and that revenues and profits benefit all Canadians instead of being sent abroad.

We know that large oil multinationals have always refused—not only in Canada but everywhere in the world—to share with governments the huge resources generated by the sale of oil products. For many decades, they have been so powerful and have done away with the basic rules of competition in Canada. And when the Canadian government decided to own its company in order to have a window on the energy sector, the conservatives, who have made themselves the champions of multinationals, objected.

When the Canadian government decided to impose a tax on oil production to collect from the start revenues for Canadians, having realized that the big multinationals paid no income taxes in Canada, the Conservative Party opposed this measure and promised, if it ever formed the government, to suppress such a tax that it judged inappropriate.

Interesting enough, the first measure President Reagan took when he came to power was to cancel all antitrust measures against the big oil multinationals. Not surprisingly, the first one taken by the Mulroney government, after its election, was to suppress this tax which the oil multinationals considered unacceptable.

The first measure taken by both Reagan and Canadian croney, Mr. Mulroney, was something done to please the big oil companies!

What is this bill if not but the ultimate concession of the conservatives to multinationals?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has been too long in this Chamber not to know that during the period of questions and comments, he should be as brief as possible. I will therefore ask the hon. member to conclude with his question, without any comments.

Mr. Ouellet: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, if this is a period for questions and comments, you should allow me to make my comment!

I want to ask the following question of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: What guarantee can he give us that this sale will be dealt with more strictly than other sales of Crown corporations? Everyone knows how Canadian assets were sold out in other cases.

One of the most outrageous cases was the sale of CN Route to friends of the government. The sale of Air Canada did not bring about the expected results—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I have to tell the hon. member that time is running out. I think, in all justice, that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance should have the floor now.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ouellet: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel on a point of order.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that according to our Standing Orders I may use those ten minutes for comments if I wish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

I refer the hon. member to a ruling by my predecessor, Speaker Jeanne Sauvé, interpreting—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. In that ruling made when our Standing Orders were amended, she set out quite clearly the purpose of the questions and comments period. It should be used for brief exchanges between members on both sides of the House.

In the spirit of that ruling, I shall recognize the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the frustration of my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel who was a member of the Cabinet when Petro-Canada—which was then called Petro-Fina—and the National Energy Program were established.

After reading a few books written by authors who were Liberal cabinet ministers when the National Energy Program was put into place, I realized that, regrettably, ministers were not consulted. The Prime Minister at the time announced this Program without consulting with his ministers and without discussion.

I also want to remind him, Mr. Speaker, that he said: "The first thing the Conservative government did after being elected in 1984 was abolish the National Energy Program, as they had promised during the election campaign." He is right on this point.

Mr. Della Noce: We kept our promises!

Mr. Vincent: First, we promised it; second, we got elected; third, we did it; fourth, we got re-elected, Mr. Speaker, on top of it all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent: You must remember this.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we fulfilled the mandate the Canadian people gave us with regard to the National Energy Program, which had nothing to do with the big oil companies, as my colleague was trying to explain.

His question was: What will be the guarantee on the sale of Petro-Canada shares? I will answer him that this guarantee will be 100 times better—

An hon. member: And more honest!

Mr. Vincent: —than the purchase of Petro Fina's shares in 1975, purchase that got lost in the bank accounts—

An hon. member: All Liberal bagmen became rich.

Mr. Vincent: —of acquaintances of people in the then Liberal government. That is how the shares of Petro Fina and other corporations were purchased.

The guarantee we give in this situation is there will be a law, there will be investment dealers who, by definition, are controlled by independent legislation that provides for an examination of the whole process. I think it will be ten times better.

In conclusion, I say in response to my colleague that since Petro-Canada will be held by Canadians, since its shares will be held by Canadians, the dividends and profits will not fall into the hands of foreigners. They will fall into the hands of Canadians, and that is what we want, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question and comment period is over. Resuming debate. The hon. Member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. We still have five minutes.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, as you have just indicated, I only have five minutes to participate in this debate. That is not a lot of time to deal with a matter like the privatization of Petro-Canada, Bill C-84.

Let us be blunt about our language today in dealing with this bill, because there has been an awful lot of nonsense, most recently by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, being spewed about this House.

• (1840)

We are not dealing with the privatization of Petro-Canada, a 15 per cent share offering. That is an unmitigated farce. The Government of Canada is selling off Petro-Canada lock, stock and barrel, 100 per cent. There is nothing in this bill that limits the share offering to 15 per cent. There is nothing to indicate it will only be a partial privatization. It is a full privatization. It is a giveaway of another national asset, but this government lacks the courage or the integrity to say so. That is what is happening.

What is going on in Canada today with a government that languishes for the last five months at 15 per cent in the polls, that is despised in this country, is analogous to what is happening to Kuwait. There was not an invasion. There was a democratic election. However we have a regime in Kuwait today that knows it is not staying there for very long. While they are there, the people, the army of Iraq, the army of Saddam Hussein, is plundering Kuwait. They are taking away the furniture. They are taking away the wealth of the nation. They are stripping the assets of the nation. This government, at 15 per cent in the polls, knowing that at the next election it is finished, on behalf of is corporate friends in whose pockets it lives, is stripping away the assets of Canada. That is what is happening today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: This is the government that sold Route Canada, part of a Crown corporation, with all of the same rhetoric and rationale we heard today, to an individual who could not even qualify for a credit card.

My God, Mr. Speaker, is there no depth to depravity, the ideological foolishness of this party? Imagine selling a $35 million asset to a Canadian whose only qualification was his Tory membership cards because his credit cards had been cancelled. Can you believe it, Mr. Speaker?

That is the mentality of that party. It sold Air Canada. It was going to do great things in the marketplace. It was going to flourish. It was going to change the Crown corporation involvement and fly even higher. What has Air Canada done? It has laid off 3,000 employees and financially it is going down.

The Conservatives sold off Fisheries Products International. They were going to unshackle Fisheries Products International. It was going to fly in the corporate world and what has happened? Its shares have died down and we have a disaster, people bleeding left, right and centre, all over the place in the fishery.

Let us not waste time, in the few minutes we have left, with subtle language about the free market. The free market implies competition. That is what it means: competition. However, what is happening in Canada? We have an incredibly concentrated energy sector, incredible concentration. That is not competition. That is capitalism, not free enterprise. That is the resources of the nation in the hands of a few for the benefit of the few and not for the nation as a whole. That is what we have. That is the creed of the Conservative Party as it strips away the assets of this nation.

We have a sector now that is dominated by U.S. interests and by U.K. interests or British interests. That is the reality and the one lever, if only this government had the guts to use it, and it hasn't. It is the one ability to have some say about the rip-offs that are currently going on at the gas pumps.

Look at this. Today, in The Ottawa Sun, third quarter profits of all of the oil companies in Canada have doubled, tripled, and quadrupled; amazing increases, and nothing but the sound of silence from members opposite.

It is time for these members, these plunderers of the national assets, to crawl out of their corporate pockets, go back and face their constituents, stand up for Canada, and protect the assets of this nation. The plunder must stop and stop soon.

Some hon. members: Hear. hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) on Tuesday, October 23, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harvey negatived.

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think you might find the disposition of the House to apply the division on the subamendment to the amendment of my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River, and for the reverse to apply on the main motion of the government.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, as usual, consultations have been productive. I just want to confirm that that would be acceptable to government members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan on a continued question of privilege.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, almost two weeks ago, on October 18, I rose and asked you to rule on whether or not the privileges of myself and other members have been breached by the boycott of the transport committee. While you continue to deliberate on that issue, I would like to raise a second related question of privilege.

I ask you to look at the failure of the government Whip to call an organizational meeting, as provided for in paragraph 579 in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. It is only through his action that the committee can elect a chair and operate as the House intended when it struck the standing committee.

I ask you to rule on whether this failure to act impedes members of the House in the performance of their general duties on committee and, in particular, whether it prevents members of this House from performing the specific duty of reviewing the Order in Council appointments of two important transport officials. My arguments that there is prima facie case of privilege will be very brief.

A few years ago the House examined the operations of the House with a specific goal of increasing the role of private members. The Special Committee on Reform of the House, chaired by the former member, James McGrath, made several suggestions which were adopted by the House. Among these suggestions was a mechanism to enable House committees to review Order in Council appointments. This empowerment of House committees provided for an accountability of the executive power to appoint and thus a check on abuse of patronage appointments.

The Standing Orders which govern the procedure are 110 and 111. Briefly, these rules provide that Order in Council appointments shall be tabled in the House within five days of their being gazetted and that they are automatically referred to a standing committee. The committee then has 30 days to make a decision on whether or not to summon the appointee and, if it decides to do so, a further 10 days to hold a hearing.

I do not think I can understate how important this right of review is to the proper functioning of Parliament. It is the only mechanism available to Canadians, as Standing Order 111(2) states, to "examine the qualifications and competence of the appointee or nominee to perform the duties of the post to which he or she has been appointed or nominated".

Yesterday, the government tabled two Order in Council appointments and referred them both to the Standing Committee on Transport. One is the appointment of the Deputy Minister of Transport, the other is the appointment of the Associate Deputy Minister of Transport. These are extremely important appointments. These two individuals will be charged with the day-to-day operations of one of our largest government departments. Yet, as things currently stand, I will be unable to ask the transport committee to summon these two important individuals. The committee will not be able to make a decision to summon them or not. The House of Commons will not be able to ask them to demonstrate their ability to meet the requirements of this public office.

It may be submitted that the government has another 28 days to call a meeting of the transport committee in order to enable it to review these appointments. I think there is evidence that they do not wish to call such a meeting.

Yesterday, the government introduced a motion to refer an important transport matter, the issue of open skies, to a special committee of the House. I was party to the original negotiations to refer this to the Standing Committee on Transport. Surely, if the standing committee were to meet soon, the government would have continued with its original plan.

In conclusion, I submit that the following establishes a prima facie case that the ability of members to fulfil their roles and responsibilities is being impeded by the chief government Whip. First, the Standing Committee on Transport is not meeting and cannot meet until the government Whip calls an organizational meeting. Second, the motion to establish a Special Committee on Transport is evidence of their intention to not call a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport. Third, the appointments of the deputy minister and associate deputy minister have been referred to the Standing Committee on Transport. Fourth, until the Transport Committee meets, organizes, and elects a chair, I nor any other member of the House can ask for these appointees to come to committee. And, fifth, there is every indication that these appointments thus not be reviewed.

I apologize for taking up so much of your time, and the time of the House. I hope with your guidance, this entire matter can be resolved. If you find there is prima facie evidence, I would be delighted to introduce a motion to refer the matter to committee, in this case, not the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support, very briefly, the comments just made, but I want to add one or two further elements as well.

There is an additional Standing Order of the House which I believe is being breached by the action of the government in this case, namely, Standing Order 106. The Speaker will recall that when the question of privilege was raised in the House the last time, the Committee on Transport had been asked to sit, pursuant to Standing Order 106 and Standing Order 108. They refer to a committee meeting further to a request by hon. members, having petitioned the chairman of the committee and causing it to meet for the purposes of studying a specific issue.

My colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West and others, made exactly that request but by not providing the sufficient number of members in order to cause a quorum, the government made it impossible for the committee to choose a chairperson of that particular committee.

The Standing Orders were not followed by this particular action. That is very regrettable because the committee, at that time, wanted to study the issue of the Hamilton Harbour, which is a very important issue, brought to the attention of the House by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West. In spite of specific Standing Orders enabling members to refer such matters to the committee and in spite of the action having been taken by a group of hon. members of the House, the committee has never studied it. The government's action thus has caused a breach of yet another Standing Order, in addition to the one raised by our colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, earlier today.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has just provided the House with the arguments relevant to the reality that the orders in our Standing Orders are being obeyed. Standing Order 106 does govern the situation, to some extent, and the House is acting as if Standing Order 106 were be attended to in the way that it should.

I want to go back to the arguments raised by the Whip for the New Democratic Party and I think that part of what he said is that something could occur only through my actions, as the chief government Whip. That is simply not correct. With regard to the responsibility of the Striking Committee, Standing Order 104(1)(a) reads in part:

> —within the first ten sitting days after the Monday following Labour Day, lists of Members to compose the standing committees of the House and to act for the House on standing joint committees—

That is a responsibility which the committee I chair has and we met that obligation and reported to the House on October 5. Standing Order 104(1)(b) states that we may not report to the House again any earlier than the end of this calendar year.

We have a single report from the committee. The Standing Order says that can be the only report for this fall session related to the composition of committees of the House. We have done that.

I sought the unanimous consent and in all of our parliamentary history that has always been given for the formation of new committees, up until this fall. The McGrath committee report on reform of Parliament indicated that this should happen once a year so that members' privileges related to their membership on committees are protected and protected adequately, and that was done. But Standing Order 104 also states that we should have an opportunity to change those committees at the commencement of the fall session, each year. That is what should be happening in the House.

If we need to divide, that is fine. We should be dividing on that Striking Committee report. That is the remedy not only for the transport committee and the issues raised by the New Democratic Party Whip, but for some other situations as well that are becoming somewhat burdensome for members on all sides of the House.

During the course of the summer it is not unusual for opposition parties to change critics, as an example. It is not unusual for governments to change parliamentary secretaries and/or cabinet and responsibilities of one kind or another. That is what the summer in part, traditionally, has been for. We have Standing Order 104 so that we can then go into the fall session with those new assignments clearly related to the formation of committees.

I think the division on the members of the striking committee is simply one related to the size of our standing committee. The majority of members of the House, I think, feel clearly that those standing committees should be small rather than large.

If you look back on the attendance of those committees for the last couple of years, you will find that the poorest attendance relates to the committees that have been large. The best attendance relates to the committees that have been small.

I think you will find in particular that the obligation to be in attendance in the large committees has not been fulfilled more often by the opposition members than by government members. Attendance difficulty relates to their caucus and their sense of responsibility. It is difficult sometimes to be a critic in the full sense and also to be a member of the standing committee and to meet both those obligations day in and day out. Certainly the attendance records of the House would show that.

We have had one other departure from normal over the summer, Mr. Speaker, in that we now have an abnormally large number of independents in the House. There are 13. Approximately 10 per cent of the opposition in the House is represented by independents. The striking committee report reflects that reality and provides a place on a proportional basis or reasonably so for independents in the House to participate in the standing committees of the House in a direct way, including a vote.

We did our best as a striking committee. If the opposition members who spoke earlier this day would like to divide on that committee report right now or later when we are called to the House perhaps for another division later this day, at any convenient time government members would be quite prepared to face that division, and if the committee report were affirmed, we would be off with the new committees. If it were rejected by the House then we would have to consider that situation in light of our standing orders.

It is incorrect, Mr. Speaker, to say that my action constitutes the remedy for the dilemma which the New Democratic Party proposes. The remedy, according to our standing orders, should be the normal practice of the House on accepting the striking committee report which was tabled in this House on October 5. That is about 25 days ago. Certainly in my conversations with members on all sides of the House, they would prefer that the striking committee report be accepted. That would be the preferred model I think for most, if not all, members of the House, but the only way we would know that for sure is simply to divide.

I would ask that you seek unanimous consent at this point to divide on that issue now and then I think you could avoid having to rule on the question of privilege.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, too, but I feel I must add to this argument being put to you and I hope that you can come to speedy resolution on the situation.

The chief government Whip is speaking on two considerations for your deliberation. On the one hand he regrets the process being undermined because in part 106, the part of the situation he claims he is in because of the situation of appointing a chairman to those committees. On the other hand, the chief government Whip has no problem with making two government appointees that must come under the consideration of the transport committee.

I do not understand how on the one hand he can make one claim and on the other take action which is in need of examination by the hand that he says he cannot do anything with. It makes no sense to me. This job is frustrating enough with all its rules and regulations without having points of argument put forth by the chief government Whip as has been presented to us today.

• (1120 )

On the other point of order, Mr. Speaker, I rose in this House on a point of privilege because I feel that my privileges have been directly breached in that when I put Standing Order 106(3) to the transport committee, a conscious effort was made to ensure that members of the Conservative Party were not in attendance at that meeting of transport.

What I remind you, Sir, to consider in your deliberation is that when I asked the parliamentary secretary how many of his members were going to attend that committee meeting, his response was: "I am not sure. You will have to wait and see". That was not it, Mr. Speaker. His response directly to me was: "Stan, none are showing up today". That is a deliberate handcuffing of the committee.

Mr. Boudria: It is true. I was there.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is not normal in this Chamber for one member to claim that another member said something when that member is not here to deny or refute it. That is inconsistent with other rulings from the Chair on other occasions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West could conclude his remarks and then we will hear him.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, you have my remarks now on the record, just as the fellow member of the transport committee, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, has quite concisely put the argument to you.

I would hope, Sir, that you would come to a speedy resolution on this debacle.

Mr. Boudria: Very briefly. Earlier on I referred to Standing Order 106. To be more precise, that was Standing Order 106(3) of our rules.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, briefly. Then I will come back to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker. The chief government whip has requested that there be unanimous consent of the House to vote on the report of the striking committee. We are quite prepared to debate the report of the striking committee in this House and would like the opportunity to do so.

I would be delighted if the government on motions today would move one of the motions it has for concurrence in the report and debate it. I understand the government House leader does not want to do that. He would like to proceed with the government bill.

If the government Whip is prepared to move the adoption of the report, we are quite prepared to have a debate. Of course, ultimately, there will be a vote. But we feel it should be discussed in this House because what the government is doing to the committees of this House is wrong.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to belabour the point. There are two items I need to raise, though. The chief government Whip made reference to the standard practice of the House adopting the striking committee report unanimously and without debate.

I would suggest to you, Sir, that the past practice of the striking committee report tended to be a unanimous report. It was not unanimous because there is a fundamental disagreement as to the proposal by the government to reduce our membership on a number of committees; from two members down to one.

The irony, Mr. Speaker, is that one of the most highly attended committees is the transport committee where we have had, in fact, more members in the opposition than we had seats at the table. It is one that we worked hard at to pursue the matters of transport.

I would also just like to add that we, too, would be happy to debate this at great length. Almost every one of my members is excited about the possibility of getting into this debate and that would also mean that a lot of House time would be used up.

Obviously the government has to make a decision as to whether it wants to continue to pursue the striking committee report, which I am advised is amendable in this House. Regardless of the standing order that says that we report only once per year, that report is not only debatable, it is amendable.

At any time the striking committee could meet. Whether it is a striking committee or a meeting of the Whips, they could meet to work out a new approach that perhaps deals in some way with the government's concern about its ability to drag bodies back in from the constituencies in order to ensure that committees function in the way that the government would like them to, while at the same time protecting our membership.

I think there are options available that have not been explored yet, Mr. Speaker, but I would hope that your ruling would come down reasonably soon and provide us with some new direction.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, members opposite will know that it is a longstanding practice of the House that members with an interest in committee meetings can attend these meetings.

With very few exceptions, members who come and who are not normally members of the committee have a chance to participate. There is nothing in the striking committee report that obviates that basic principle.

If there are 10 members who want to come to transport, that is certainly something they could do. What we are talking about in terms of striking committee report and the size of the standing committees of the House is simply how many votes need to be cast.

We are paying close attention to the proportionality of the House, whether we are talking about a large committee or a small committee. We are simply talking from our point of view about whether members have to sit to warm a chair because we do not believe that that was the intent of McGrath.

We thought the intent of McGrath was for members to be knowledgeable, to be consistent in their attendance and to provide the House with good advice.

The suggestion has been made that we engage in a debate. If the motion is moved at any time during Routine Proceedings after notice, there is a two-hour debate. If people filibuster, then it is simply transferred to Government Orders and it has to be recalled as part of government business down the road. That is a very time consuming proposition for the House.

I make two suggestions to the members opposite. We might want to discuss it at the House leaders meeting later this day to see if we could come to a limited debate. If that is really what they want or if they want to filibuster the situation, it depends. We could go immediately to a division, which was my suggestion.

I would still like you, when I am done, to put that to the House. Is there unanimous consent for an immediate division on the principle? I think that would serve the House best in terms of getting on to resolve the problems that exist out there.

Mr. Speaker: This matter was raised some days ago, and I have reserved on it.

I will consider very carefully what was said and include the representations that I have heard in my report back to the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 28 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and in some sense the pleasure this morning to present a petition under Standing Order 36 signed by a total 346 residents—mostly of Edmonton, but of other points in Alberta as well—calling on Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Especially in this year of literacy, that would seem to be sound advice indeed for the government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to present petitions to this House.

The petitioners are from Thunder Bay and London, Ontario, and other points where in fact people have been adversely affected by the VIA cuts. They ask Parliament and the government to rebuild VIA Rail, to give it an increased mandate to serve the public, especially in light of the great concern of Canadians about the congested highways and the environment.

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour for me to stand today under Standing Order 36 to present two separate petitions.

The first comes from the good residents of Industrial Park in Halifax.

• (1130 )

They call on the government to make improved service the highest priority of Canada Post and to instruct the government to abandon this policy of closing rural and urban post offices.

The petitioners recognize that postal services are a very essential and very important service to the members of that community and many others. They are calling on the government to cease dismantling of that excellent service.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Further, Mr. Speaker, I have quite a number of petitions signed by residents from many, many different areas of the north: Moose Factory, Timmins, Wawa, and Iroquois Falls, to name but a few—

An hon. member: South Porcupine.

Mr. Samson: South Porcupine, to name another one. They are calling on Parliament to reject the recommendations of the committee report and to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program for northern residents.

They are asking the Minister of Finance to recognize the financial needs of the people in the north and isolated areas and to reject the report put forward by the committee.

VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of constituents of the Alexandria area.

These people are calling upon Parliament to ask the government to reject the budgetary measures that would cut back on veterans' benefits and allowances.

BILL 178

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I also have a second petition, Mr. Speaker, that it is my duty to present in this House. The members across will understand why I use the word duty.

These people are asking me to present a petition to ask the Governor General to disallow Bill 178 of the province of Quebec.

Even though it is my duty to present this petition, it should not be misconstrued as my agreement with it, because it is not.

CANADA POST

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from 1,044 of my constituents who reside in the Alberni Valley and who are complaining about the drastic cut-backs in service by Canada Post in the Alberni Valley.

Canada Post has cut of the drive-through mailbox services. It has taken local sorting out of the community and transferred it to Nanaimo, resulting in the loss of several jobs in Port Alberni. My constituents feel that if the management of Canada Post was not under the ideological protection of the Conservative Party, it would have been fired in a minute.

My constituents therefore request that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to keep existing outlets, operate longer hours, expand revenue generating services, stop privatizing and start increasing services to raise revenues.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to place before the House a petition protesting the implementation of the Mulroney GST.

The petition appeals to the House of Commons to rescind this repressive element of taxation. It is presented by residents of Iroquois Falls, Timmins, and Moose Factory. It also acknowledges the intent of the residents of Powell River, British Columbia to cash in every single Canada Savings Bond and to cancel their payroll deduction as a protest to the implementation, without a mandate, of the Conservative government GST.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-83, an Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in my introductory remarks to begin today's second reading debate of Bill C-83, I intend to deal lightly with technical details and concentrate more on the broad objectives we will achieve through reform of legislation and regulations governing federal financial institutions.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the trust and loan companies bill we are considering today is the first of several bills that, along with new regulations, will modernize the rules governing federal financial institutions.

Other bills will include the Bank Act, the Insurance Companies Act and the Cooperative Credit Associations Act and related statutes. All of the new statutes are to come into effect on the same date.

The government's reform will break down barriers among the pillars of the financial sector—banking, insurance and trust and loan companies—and allow financial institutions to compete more directly with each other.

[English]

The trust and loan companies bill and the subsequent bills and regulations contain four essential elements. First, they establish rules for an ownership policy that allows for both closely held and widely held institutions.

Second, they establish a new framework for competition in the financial sector through the removal of many of the remaining rules that presently restrict institutions from fully competing with each other.

Third, they update prudential safeguards to reflect the new world in which financial institutions will operate.

Fourth, they modernize old statutes by adopting rules and procedures modelled on the Canadian Business Corporations Act.

[Translation]

The reform, Mr. Speaker, maintains wide ownership for Schedule I banks, including the six largest Canadian banks. This ensures that no one person or group of associated persons can own more than 10 per cent of any class of bank shares. These requirements are consistent with international rules and practices about the ownership of banks.

Large trust, loan and stock insurance companies will be required to ensure that at least 35 per cent of their shares are widely held and publicly traded within five years. Significant changes in the ownership of financial institutions will be subject to approval by the Minister of Finance, who will take account of whether transfers are in the best interests of the Canadian financial system.

Although these rules may appear to be technical adjustments, or tinkering, they are significant in part because they represent adjustments to an industry that is of major importance. All Canadians will be affected by these changes—and for the better. The sheer magnitude of the industry makes an impact on Canadians inevitable.

There are more than 3,000 Canadian financial institutions, with assets of some $900 billion. Canada's 25 largest financial institutions hold assets of more than $760 billion. A total of 23 of these institutions are federally incorporated 23 out of 25.

The manner in which the federally incorporated financial institutions serve the needs of Canadians will be directly affected by the legislative and regulatory reforms we have announced. I sincerely believe, Mr. Speaker, these institutions will operate more effectively and competitively, and that they will be more accessible to meet the objectives of Canadians.

We must not forget that the money handled by Canadian financial institutions funds the mortgages of Canadians, finances our automobile puchases, shelters and invests our savings, and makes available the investment needed for new or expanded industries and businesses. The success of these institutions is key to our economic success, as well as our security as savers and investors.

Because of the particular importance of financial institutions in channeling savings to finance economic growth, it is essential that they be sound, innovative, dynamic and internationally competitive.

The challenge has been to develop a regulatory approach that protects the public while it encourages, rather than inhibits, innovation and efficiency in our financial sector. Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have met that challenge.

[English]

The objectives of this reform of financial sector legislation are to enhance protection for depositors and policyholders. They are also to benefit consumers by increasing competition and the spectrum of services offered by financial institutions. It will strengthen the ability of Canadian financial institutions to compete at home and abroad. It will lay the groundwork for harmonization discussions with the provinces. This is very important.

These goals will be achieved under the new legislative framework and regulations.

[Translation]

Honourable Members will recognize that in order to protect consumers, the government had already tightened up prudential rules in 1987. These will now be further strengthened, including additional enhancements to the supervisory system. I know that the hon. member for Nickel Belt, who monitors these issues very closely, will be very interested in this aspect of our legislation. For example, tougher self–dealing rules will be implemented, the self–policing role of directors and auditors will be made more effective through mandated roles and responsibilities, and the Superintendent of Financial Institutions will have increased powers to require information that will enable problems to be anticipated. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions is therefore being given the kind of access he did not have before.

Consumers will find shopping for financial services more convenient and will benefit from a wider choice of financial products since banks, trust and loan companies and insurance companies will be allowed to compete more directly with each other. The interests of the consumer will continue to be protected.

For example, the new Bank Act would also include the service charge disclosure provisions now contained in Bill C–9, which is before Parliament. By opening new avenues of growth for Canada's financial institutions the new regulations will strengthen the ability of these institutions to meet the new challenges that have evolved in the global marketplace.

Financial institutions will be able to diversify by owning institutions operating in other segments of the financial services industry. For example, banks and insurance companies will be allowed to own trusts; in addition, trust and loan companies and banks will be permitted to own insurance companies.

Together, Mr. Speaker, these proposals set out a framework for fair competition that will allow all insitutions to participate.

[English]

However, we are all aware that there are competing interests within the financial institution community which cannot be completely reconciled. In those cases we have sought a reasonable balance. For example, banks and trust and loan companies will be restricted from offering most insurance services, and retailing of most insurance products in branches of deficit taking institutions will be prohibited. This ensures that insurance will continue to be sold by qualified licensed insurance brokers and agents working independently of any deficit taking institution.

At the same time, however, banks and trust and loan companies will be given the power to promote goods and services, including insurance to their credit hard holders. The government has spent considerable time consulting on its proposals with financial institutions and their associations. It has integrated these views with its continuing analysis of the needs of an evolving and dynamic market, both nationally and internationally. This process has led to firm, pragmatic policy decisions that are being put forward to Parliament.

This exercise in re-regulation represents a balancing of individual, national, international, federal-provincial and commercial and prudential concerns that will, as a package, serve the public interest well and permit our financial institutions to get on with the job.

The measures set out a framework for strong national institutions that serve the national interest. The reforms also respect provincial rights of supervision and authority in the financial sector.

There is a need for greater consistency among federal and provincial rules in order to avoid balkanization of regulatory regimes and permit our institutions to compete more effectively at home and abroad.

The new legislation and proposals take into account a number of concerns that have been expressed by the provinces regarding matters such as commercial links, the in-house trust powers of banks, and provisions allowing for improved sharing of information among federal and provincial supervisors of financial institutions. This opens the door to in-depth discussions with the provinces to clarify responsibilities for the supervision of financial institutions.

Co-operation between federal and provincial authorities is the most responsible way of ensuring the stability and growth of our national and regional financial institutions. This would reduce the possibility of regulatory and supervisory duplication.

The goal, Mr. Speaker, is to avoid, in pratical terms and to the degree possible, the multiple regulation of federal and other institutions operating in several jurisdictions. This approach could be designed to have institutions regulated as much as possible by their jurisdiction of incorporation.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I believe we have much work before us. I hope that I can count, and I am sure that I can, on the co-operation of the House in expediting consideration of the bill now before us as well as the other bills that are to follow.

I believe that in the interests of consumers and in support of increased competitiveness for Canada's financial institutions, it is time for us to get on with the business of reform.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak in favour of the motion for second reading of Bill C-83 regarding financial institutions. I am pleased to do so mainly because modern legislation is urgently needed by the financial industry and we, as legislators, have a duty to help them compete in the new global market.

We also have an equally important duty to protect consumers and ensure the soundness of the financial system in Canada. I believe that all of these interests will be best served by getting this bill past second reading and into committee. Once in committee, we intend to conduct a very thorough study of the legislation.

• (1150)

The need for financial sector reform has become so urgent because this government has been incredibly slow in responding to the needs of the industry with new modern legislation.

The Conference Board of Canada refers to the: "repeated delays in financial sector reform and the urgency for policy makers to move ahead with new legislation in this area". It is in this spirit that we will be supporting this motion.

When the Minister of State for Finance last month tabled this trust and loan company bill and released the policy paper concerning banks and insurance companies, we in the opposition and those in industry, were extremely pleased because this government had finally decided to act. We were disappointed, however, that the government only introduced a policy paper on banks, not a new Bank Act. We were disappointed for two reasons. One, without a new Bank Act, the government's picture of financial system reform remains incomplete. Two, the current act expires in five months, and when the act expires banks lose their licences.

Last week, the minister did introduce a last-minute bill that would extend the current Bank Act one year until April, 1992. This will prevent the chartered banks from losing their licences, but this last minute piecemeal approach has been typical of the way this government has been handling financial reform and many other matters.

The government's policy process started about five and a half years ago. First there was the green paper in April 1985, followed a year and a half later by a blue paper in December 1986. That was followed by promise after promise after promise by this government that new legislation was coming soon. The industry waited and waited and waited. Soon, it turned out, meant not in six months, or even in 12, soon turned into four years, during which the Canadian financial industry watched their global market share tumble.

For example, look at the Royal Bank, Canada's largest. According to the Economic Council of Canada, the Royal Bank ranked sixteenth in the world in terms of assets in 1981. Today, it is around 57th. In nine years the Royal Bank went from being 16th down to 57th. Consider the fact that during the early 1980s we had four banks in the top 50. Now we have none. Even countries much smaller than Canada, such as Switzerland, Hong Kong, and the Netherlands boast larger institutions than our own.

Look at international loans. Canadian financial institutions make only 3 per cent of the world's international loans versus almost 8 per cent seven years ago. That is a tremendous decrease in the last eight years.

Any way you look at it, Canada's financial institutions are facing fierce global competition. It is a war out there, but this present government, has been allowing our banks and other financial institutions to go out and to compete with one hand tied behind their back.

That is why I am very pleased to welcome this legislation concerning trust and loan companies which we are debating today. There are several reasons why this new financial legislation is needed in Canada. I spoke briefly about the first one, globalization. The others include the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, Europe 1992, and provincial deregulation.

First, globalization. Financial institutions have undergone massive transformation in recent years. As technology has advanced, geographical barriers have retreated, turning several international markets into one huge global market. Billions of dollars can be sent around the globe in a matter of seconds, 24 hours a day.

The globalization of financial markets has been driven by the needs of both borrowers and investors. For corporate and government borrowers alike, the search for the cheapest source of funds has known no national boundaries. Like individual Canadian consumers, those corporations and governments are price–shy and they go where the money is the cheapest.

For large portfolio managers and other investors, the incentive has been better investment opportunities and greater diversification of portfolios.

Canadian financial institutions are well aware of the potential advantages in this new global marketplace. In fact, Canadian Bankers Association president, Helen Sinclair says Canadian banks have "made a virtual obsession of the question of their role in the global marketplace".

Another major issue highlighting the need for financial reform is the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. The FTA changed the rules concerning financial institutions in two major ways. One, American banks entering Canada have had the limits on their asset growth removed and they can now open new branches without permission from the government. Two, Americans can now buy up to 100 per cent of any Canadian financial institution, whereas before they were limited to buying a total of 25 per cent.

Also related to the free trade agreement is American Express. It received government approval to operate as a bank in Canada, even though the company is not regulated as a bank in the United States, which is an apparent contradiction of Canadian law. It is not a contradiction of this government's policies because if one notes, permission for American Express to operate as a bank was given on election day, 1988, during the heat of the free trade debate.

Canadian financial institutions understandably felt that the playing field had been shifted in favour of the Americans. This was because the new AMEX Bank was owned by commercial enterprise, a type of ownership forbidden to Canadian banks. Clearly the issue of the level playing field in Canada is one that this reform package must resolve.

The free trade agreement also established the ground rules for another round of international negotiations, those surrounding Europe 1992. As the European Community moves towards a 12–country, 320 million person market, Canada must be involved. But in order to gain permission for its financial institutions to operate in that market, Canada will be under great pressure to grant to the Europeans the same privileges granted to the Americans under the free trade agreement, especially the exemption from the asset ceiling on Schedule 2 banks.

The second issue arising from Europe 1992 is the inability of Canada's federal government and the 10 provinces to achieve harmonization in financial institutions, compared to the 12 countries in Europe. Clearly, then, the government's new financial package must address federal–provincial harmonization.

In fact, the lack of Canadian harmonization is another force, a major force, pushing the need for reform. Several provinces, including Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick, and British Columbia, have updated their legislation regarding financial institutions considerably over the past few years. While the federal government has been operating at a standstill, the provinces have been moving ahead.

The most far–reaching changes are taking place in Quebec which in 1987 introduced its blueprint for financial sector reform. These changes included the blurring of the four so–called pillars: the banks, the trust and loan companies, insurance companies, and securities dealers. They also included the acceptance of financial and commercial links, where commercial enterprise, such as a steel company, could own a financial institution such as a trust company or credit union.

One of the most controversial effects of Quebec's reform is the ability of one credit union chain to sell insurance directly through its branches. This is one issue that the new legislation was expected to address. More than that, the new financial reform package was to have taken steps to level the playing–field for financial institutions regulated in different parts of Canada, with the goal eventually of establishing one set of rules for the whole country.

This levelling is very important if we are to avoid the spectacle of federally chartered financial institutions trading their federal charters for provincial ones. This would mean that the provinces, not Ottawa, would be the regulators in charge. This kind of movement would represent a reduction in federal authority, a loss of control to the provinces. The federal government must act now. It must act now to prevent such a loss of authority. It cannot continue to let the provinces take the lead in this issue.

After a long wait, the reform package unveiled on September 27 certainly was greeted with special enthusiasm by those of us who are eager to get on with federal–provincial harmonization of financial regulations. The provinces are certainly in this category and among them is British Columbia. British Columbia's Finance Minister, for example, said that he welcomed the government's package because, since the limited financial sector reforms by Ottawa in 1987, there has been, and I quote, "no meaningful dialogue between the federal government and the provinces on financial institutions reform".

Perhaps one of the reasons for not having any meaningful dialogue between Ottawa and the provinces is simply the fact that the government has consistently declined invitations by the provinces to sit on their interprovincial committee for financial institution reform. On September 28, the day after the reform package was tabled, I asked the Minister of State for Finance in the House why he had not accepted the provinces invitation. He simply ignored the question, just like he has been ignoring the provinces.

Before moving on to the issues raised by the government's reform efforts, I want to give a brief overview of Canada's financial industry. The four pillars to which I referred earlier are made up of the banks, the trust and loan companies, insurance companies, and security dealers.

There are more than 3,000 Canadian financial institutions operating today in Canada and throughout the world. Together, they have close to one trillion dollars in assets. Through some 1,400 branches across the country and with close to half a million employees, Canadian financial institutions serve practically every individual and business in the country.

If anyone has ever had a mortgage, borrowed money to buy a car, deposited money in a bank, written someone a cheque, or purchased an insurance policy, they almost certainly had to go through a financial institution. These are the institutions that hold our savings, lend them to businesses and individuals, and operate our cheque clearing system.

It is probably safe to say that without financial institutions, our economy would simply dry up. Financing is extremely important to the economy, whether it is a large national economy or the small economy of Prince Edward Island, my province. Crucial to the development of my province is the establishment and growth of small business, which in turn is dependent upon adequate and low cost financing.

If Canada's financial industry becomes inefficient as a result of federal government neglect, or for whatever reason, the economy of Prince Edward Island, and of Canada, would suffer. Clearly then, the ability of Canada's banks and other financial institutions to survive and compete globally has a direct impact on their ability to provide relatively low cost financial services here at home.

I would like to address some of the major issues that have been raised by the government's reform package. These are issues that certainly must be resolved before meaningful reform of Canada's financial institutions can take place. I will deal with them under four separate headings: powers, ownership, regulation, and supervision.

The situation before this reform package came along is that trust and loan companies can, among other things, take consumer and commercial deposits and are involved in the mortgage business. They do not have full commercial or consumer lending powers yet. However, Bill C–83 will change that.

The first issue under the heading of powers is networking, or the ability of a financial institution from one pillar to offer its network offices to promote or to sell the products of an institution from another pillar.

As we know, Bill C–83 gives trust and loan companies natural personal powers or, in other words, allows them to engage in whatever financial activity is not expressly forbidden by law. The present trust and loan companies can do only what the law expressly permits them to do.

This kind of opening up of the financial services industry in principle is a good thing because it gives consumers more choice and it should ensure more competition. However, I wonder if the government knows what it is doing by throwing the market wide open in this way. What are the costs? What are the benefits associated with this new openness? Will the loss of jobs in the industries now protected from competition from trust and loan companies be matched by an increase in new job opportunities? These are the kinds of questions the government certainly should have asked before releasing its policy package. They are the ones that we will be asking in committee.

One of the most controversial network proposals contained in the government's package concerns banks selling insurance. The insurance industry has warned against letting banks sell insurance. It has argued that consumers will suffer a reduction in the level of service and that banks, with their huge network of branches, will grow to dominate the insurance industry to the detriment of fair competition.

Other issues under the powers heading include the question of whether financial institutions should be able to promote goods and services, including insurance, to their credit card holders and the whole question of allowing banks into the auto leasing business.

The auto leasing business is extremely important with thousands of jobs at stake. One opposition member told me that he had 15 auto dealers in his riding representing over 400 jobs. Clearly we have to deal with this issue very carefully, balancing the need for more competition with sensitivity to the local employment situation in Canada.

Under the ownership heading are issues such as closely versus widely–held ownership of financial institutions, commercial financial links, banks owning insurance companies, and the question of foreign ownership.

The ownership situation now is that trust companies can be closely held and can have commercial links. There are institutions such as Canada Trust, which has one major shareholder, Imasco, which owns a drugstore company, a tobacco company, and other commercial ventures. Many insurance companies are closely held, have commercial links, although some, mainly life insurance companies, are widely held and do not have commercial links.

Banks, on the other hand, cannot have commercial links and must be widely held, meaning that no one can own more than 10 per cent.

The issue of closely versus widely-held ownership is crucial because it deals with soundness of the financial system in Canada. A case can be made for either side, and I want to summarize very briefly both of those.

First, the broad ownership of financial institutions has come to be recognized by some as a very effective way of protecting the misuse of depositors' funds and self-dealing which might occur if there was just one major shareholder.

Second, widely held ownership is seen as preventing discrimination by a financial institution against potential borrowers who happen to be competitors of the institution's major shareholder.

There is also a case for closely held ownership. The first argument is that, while the stated goals of widely held ownership are admirable, the cost to the trust industry, for example, might be just too high.

They argue that if you are concerned about self-dealing and other abuses, there are better ways to guard against them than imposing strict ownership limits. They point to better regulation, bans on self-dealing and rules to expose conflicts of interest. This is the way to prevent these abuses, they argue, not imposing one ownership structure on all financial institutions simply because it sounds good in theory.

Turning now to the specific question of commercial-financial links, again we see strong arguments for and against. Those in favour of these links say a commercial parent would be able to increase the capital of the financial institutions, which is very important in such a competitive industry.

Some say that the existence of a strong shareholder would also provide an opportunity to make the management of the financial institution more responsive to the wishes of its shareholders and less likely to grow stagnant.

Commercial links, according to this side, would also allow the parent institution to diversify its sources of revenue, thus contributing to the overall income stability of the group.

It would promote competition, they say, by encouraging the entry of new institutions into the market.

It would contribute to economies of scale in Canada, putting our domestic institutions on a better footing with respect to their global competitors. For example, a real estate company that owned a financial institution could sell mortgages, or a bank that owned a department store could use the store's network of outlets to increase its business. Both would be able to operate more efficiently and compete effectively with the large conglomerates from Japan and Europe.

Indeed, one argument for commercial-financial links is that Canada may have no choice but to allow them, given the growth of such links around the world, and even within Canada. Denying federally-chartered financial institutions access to such links, the argument goes, would be asking them to compete with one arm behind their back.

Finally, those in favour of commercial-financial links point to the case of the American Express Bank which has commercial links and is competing against Canadian banks which are denied access to such links. This present government, by issuing a foreign banking licence to a company that has commercial links, and indeed is not even a bank in its home country, has set a double standard.

The opponents of financial-commercial links counter that these links may lead to self-dealing, conflict of interest situations. Even for a financial institution that is otherwise well run, just the appearance of commercial interference could reduce depositor confidence in the institution.

• (1220)

They also argue that, just as a commercial parent could improve the balance sheet of the financial institution, just the opposite could very well happen and one would see an unhealthy commercial parent threatening the solvency of its financial subsidiary, and therefore its depositors.

They say the special role that financial institutions play in the Canadian economy is just too important to take the risk of something like that happening.

Financial commercial links would also increase corporate concentration by putting more assets and power into fewer hands.

Finally, opponents of such links argue that a commercial company in trouble could take advantage of Canada's system of deposit insurance by drawing on its financial subsidiary. One could have a situation where Canadian taxpayers were subsidizing the losses of a commercial corporation.

They point to a situation where the owner of a trust company, for example, is deeply in debt and draws on the trust company's funds to help itself out. The trust company could become threatened with insolvency and would have to be bailed out by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, financed by other institutions and by taxpayers. Taxpayers, in other words, would be unknowingly bailing out a commercial company, representing an abuse of the deposit insurance system.

Another major ownership issue relates to foreign ownership of Canadian financial institutions. Canadian financial markets are relatively open. Allowing foreign institutions access to our domestic market has served to increase the competitiveness of the Canadian financial system generally, to the benefit of consumers. It has also allowed Canadian institutions the right to operate in other countries, thereby strengthening their operations back home.

Currently, foreigners can open financial institutions in all four pillars and may own 100 per cent of those institutions they create. They may also buy into existing institutions, but individuals cannot own more than 10 per cent of banks, while trust companies and insurance firms, and total non-U.S. foreign ownership cannot exceed 25 per cent. No restrictions apply to individuals or total foreign ownership of securities dealers.

Under the free trade agreement, however, Americans are exempted from these rules and generally have the same ownership rights as Canadians, in terms of federally-chartered financial institutions. Provincially-chartered trust, insurance and securities dealers are not affected by the free trade agreement.

A major objective of any financial reform package, therefore, must be to encourage Canadian ownership of our financial institutions. We need strong Canadian financial institutions so they can look after Canadian interests first.

Turning very briefly to the areas of regulation and supervision, the primary concern is ensuring the solvency of our financial institutions. Threats to solvency come in various forms, such as self-dealing, where a bank, for example, makes a questionable loan to one of its directors.

Solvency could also be threatened by a conflict of interest. For example, where a trust company makes a questionable loan to a company affiliated with its parent company.

There are now many rules in place to prevent such abuses, and Bill C-83 expands those rules. The question, however, is whether these rules go far enough to protect the solvency of our financial institutions, or whether they go so far that harmless, everyday transactions get hampered. This is an area that we will be examining closely in the legislative committee.

Finally, looking quickly at supervision, we see in the government's reform plan an enhanced role for the Superintendent of Financial Institutions in terms of federally chartered institutions. While I welcome that move by the government, I must remind it of the need for better harmonization of federal laws with the provinces, and I repeat my request that the Minister of State for Finance accept the invitation of the provinces to join their conference of ministers responsible for financial institutions so that there can be a meaningful dialogue between Ottawa and the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I want to briefly summarize and conclude. Bill C-83 and the reform package put forward by the government are long overdue. They must be studied in the context of the fast paced world of global financial markets.

We in the Liberal Party will support the motion for second reading of this legislation because we recognize the urgent need to have new modern legislation in place so that our financial institutions can compete globally.

This package raises many important and fundamental issues such as the proper role of financial institutions in Canada, protecting consumers and depositors, ensuring a level playing field between domestic and foreign institutions operating in Canada and among Canadian institutions from different pillars.

I look forward to dealing with these and other issues at the committee stage of the bill and to meeting with representatives from the industry, with consumers and other interested parties. I want to re-emphasize our party's commitment to a modern, competitive financial industry in Canada. We are also equally committed to protecting consumers, to enhancing their choices, to ensuring the soundness and stability of the Canadian financial system and to the harmonization of federal-provincial regulatory policies.

These are the principles to which we are committed. These are the principles we will be fighting for in committee.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to introduce to the House of Commons the image I have of the minister responsible for financial institutions and responsible for this bill. Here are these four pillars, pillars of the financial institutions of this country and here is this minister standing between these pillars. Like a modern day Samson, he is collapsing these pillars. One could ask how he can do this with as little hair as he has. We know that in Samson's dying days he had as much hair as the minister, but he summoned up his last ounce of strength. Here he is, this picture of a very huge person collapsing the pillars. It is an image that tickles my funny bone.

The minister talked about wanting to clear up conflicts of interest on boards and the relationship between the financial institutions and no self-dealing.

I want to start right at the beginning and lay on the table a concern I have before the bill goes any further, because this bill when it passes the House goes to the Senate. If you look at the litmus test of the senators in the other place, every single one of them—well, most of them—are connected to financial institutions of this country. I want to say to Canadians, do we have trust?

• (1230)

We must have an awful lot of trust to think that in fact this bill can go to the other place and have thorough examination without any interest being brought to bear by the activities of the senators in the other place. I have very serious concern about that because this government has refused to bring in effective conflict of interest legislation which binds senators in the other place as well as members of this House.

We will start on that note. I understand that the minister had choices. He had two choices on the one hand. Unlike the Liberals, I am not prepared to give carte blanche support for Bill C-83. As I think through Bill C-83 I want to raise questions. We will continue to raise those questions in committee.

However, I see on the one hand the minister having a choice of opening up the ownership of financial institutions and in fact removing the pillars completely. It has been suggested previously that in fact it should be open season. On the other hand, I look at the model that says: maintain the four pillars and streamline the regulation of those four pillars so that each one of them can be adaptable, can be flexible and can identify trends in the marketplace and react accordingly.

Therefore I raise the question: Is bigger better or is smarter better? I tend to think that smarter is better. God only knows the problems the Japanese banks are having. One only has to look at Chase Manhattan these days and see the problems it has been running into.

Let us look at the savings and loans. I have also heard in this House that we have to build institutions that can compete globally. That is the argument I heard with respect to airlines. I heard that what we had to do was deregulate the airline industry because that is what encourages more airlines to become involved in transportation in Canada and that by having more airlines there would be more competition and lower prices.

That works fine in theory and on paper. In reality the opposite has happened. In fact I would predict that in the next couple of years we will probably have one Canadian airline operating in this country with disastrous effects for people who live in the regions in terms of quality of service, price, and safety.

The minister had these choices. What I think he has ended up with in Bill C–83 is gradualism, deregulation by gradualism. Let us look at the scene: banks can own insurance companies, insurance companies can own trust companies, trust companies can own insurance companies, trust companies can own banks, and banks can own trust companies. Donald Trump would have a hey–day.

I do not know. The minister has now suggested that we will protect the interest of investors by having firewalls. We are now into the construction business. We are going to be putting up firewalls all over the place. Banks can own an insurance company, but they cannot market the insurance products through their branches. So we can have the scene, Mr. Speaker, of a building with a bank in one half, a firewall, and the insurance company in the other half.

The minister says: "Aha, we will have an arm's length relationship. You will be able to market the insurance through credit card holders." Junk mail, here we come. Canadians better hold on to themselves because here comes an onslaught of junk mail. We are going to get all sorts of promotions through the mail with respect to the credit card.

We are concerned in this party about consumers. Will consumers benefit? That is the question. Will consumers benefit through lower prices for the services provided? Will it be more convenient? Will there be a variety? Will they have protection with respect to the service charges?

The minister says that the services charges outlined in Bill C–9 will be included in the Bank Act, but they certainly will not be applied to the trust companies; only to the banks. Trust companies are going to be doing exactly the same thing as banks in terms of their customers, yet consumers would not even have the protection of this powder–puff bill which I consider Bill C–9 to be. Even that protection is not going to be there for consumers.

How will consumers benefit? I suspect that once the shakedown takes place Canadians will wake up one morning and find that one bank owns all the financial institutions in this country. Surely, if we believe that there should be competition because that is what creates better services, lower prices and more convenience, it is not to open up the game so that power is concentrated in one bank or one trust company. Surely the whole idea is to permit many players into the marketplace. That is the classic argument that Tories ought to be putting forward, not to be supporting those practices that lead to monopoly capitalism. That is not the way to go.

The bill does not include any changes to the $60,000 insurance protection for depositors through the Deposit Insurance Corporation. There is no increase in the $60,000 level. It remains at $60,000. The protection for consumers—not in the specific services received but in the over–all administration and supervision of the provisions of this bill—will rest with the director of financial institutions. He is given an enhanced role in this legislation.

Will the government increase the staffing to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions? It is great to have a whole series of laws, but if we do not have the cops to enforce the law then the law is meaningless. It is not enough to talk about all the improvements, all the laws and all the changes that will come, unless we are prepared to increase the supervision.

We have a question: How do consumers benefit from Bill C–83? How do they benefit specifically? I am unable to detect from Bill C–83 how they will gain any benefits from this legislation. On the one hand we have the problem of greater concentration of economic power. This is the danger that I think this bill will lead to. On the other hand we would argue—and I have a question in my mind—as to whether maintaining the four pillars and streamlining them would be better. I want to explore the idea that rather than to collapse them it is better to streamline and ensure that there is competition in the field for which that particular pillar is operating.

We noticed, for example, that banks were not allowed to own brokerage houses. Then that was changed. Every single bank bought out a brokerage house. Now the bank has in its stable a brokerage house. I think there is only one bank, the Toronto–Dominion, that actually started to form its own. All the others bought out brokerage houses. We can see where this is headed. The banks will then buy out insurance companies. They will set up these firewalls as required by the law. Then those will break down.

In the legislation the governments says that it has tightened up the ownership. The banks remain at 10 per cent. No person can earn more than 10 per cent of the shares of the bank, while for trust companies and loan companies it is a lot looser. The government also says in the bill that it will tighten it up, that it will prohibit self-dealing, conflicts of interest, and a whole host of other practices, and that it will make the boards of directors more democratic.

This is why I think there is a gradual move to loosening up the whole field. If that is the case, why do they need to maintain the 10 per cent ownership in banks? Why is there a need to maintain the 10 per cent? If they have these tighter rules about self-dealing and conflicts of interest, why did they keep the 10 per cent rule? I have not had an answer to that question.

Even with the ownership it raises another question about the way we treat Canadians as opposed to the way we treat Americans. A Schedule II bank can come in to Canada, yet the 10 per cent rule would not apply to that bank. However, a Canadian could not establish a bank in Canada unless he obeys the 10 per cent rule.

Why is it that we are permitting aliens to be treated differently than we treat Canadians? Why are we permitting a foreigner to do something in Canada that we would not permit a Canadian to do?

One can have a bank in a state but one cannot go and establish in another state and another state. I wanted to point that out. I would say that in itself that is discriminatory. That is a question we wanted to raise.

On the question of bank services charges, we did a study on that area and we made recommendations to the government which came in as legislation in Bill C-9. One would think that consumers would receive the protection of that pussycat legislation, but in this bill it only applies to the banks. It does not apply to trust and loan companies.

It seems to me that by collapsing the pillars and allowing the trust and loan companies to do the things that banks do, by erasing the differences, then surely when we impose things such as disclosure and the way we treat certain bank services it has to apply to the trust and loan companies as well. Yet we find that they are exempt from this. Mr. Speaker, we cannot see why this would be so. In the bill, the way to calculate interest is set out for the banks and for the trust and loan companies, so it seems to us that it is a short step over to cover the trust and loan companies with the bank service charges as set out in Bill C-9. It seems to me that that is logical.

We also have the impression that the area of ownership of the banks in Canada, this 10/25 rule that I mentioned, not only permits a non-Canadian, an American specifically because of the free trade agreement, to come into Canada and be treated differently from the way Canadians are treated. It also raises the question as to whether a Canadian can buy an American bank and then have that bank come in as a Schedule II bank and, in effect, avoid the 10/25 rule.

An hon. member: I'm not sure.

Mr. Rodriguez: The member says he is not sure. Well, I raise that because, while the officials have said these are guidelines, there is nothing in Bill C-83 that says it cannot be done. Schedule II banks can do just about anything that a Schedule A bank can do. We are concerned about that and we want to have that question cleared up as well.

We are also concerned about the role of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. I mentioned one aspect of it. We think that he has to be provided with the wherewithal to enforce the act.

There is another aspect of this which was included in the 1986 blue paper. It was one of the proposals, and we do not see it reflected in this bill and we want to know why it is not. The bill gives the government the authority to vest all of the capital of the institution with the CDIC, where the institution is threatened with insolvency, and the affairs of the institution would be managed by the CDIC to affect a merger or sale of the assets, as it deems necessary. We notice that that is not included in the bill. We would be interested in knowing why that was not included.

Mr. Speaker, these are questions that we have to raise with respect to Bill C-83, because the bill is of such importance. Once this bill gets put into place, it has far-reaching implications. I see this bill, frankly, as a gradual removing of all the pillars and so we must take a good hard look at the way in which it is being presented. Quite frankly, I am interested in the arguments of the witnesses who will come before the committee to outline their own positions and to answer questions.

We know that the banks have wanted to be able to market insurance through their branches. I am not sure if they asked the government to give them the power to own insurance companies. I am not convinced in my own mind as to whether the lesser of the two dangers is to allow them to market the insurance through the branches, or to own the insurance company. I would tend to have a preference for them to market the insurance through the branches at this point in time, but I am prepared to listen to the argument as to why they should be allowed to own the company.

It seems to me that one of the advantages of being able to market the insurance through the branches might be to provide convenience to the consumer. The greater danger is that the banks under Bill C–83 could end up owning more and more of the financial institutions in the marketplace. That is the concern I have.

It is also well known that the banks had approached the government with respect to being able to lease automobiles. We know at the present time that they are in leasing. They do lease farm and construction equipment—over 20 tonnes, I believe—so to some extent the banks are involved in leasing. I am prepared to listen to the argument as to why they should be denied the ability to lease cars. I am also prepared to hear the argument for the other side.

We have to see the details of this three–tier regulation which the government has outlined in Bill C–83 with respect to self–dealing. We have, in this party, long expressed concern about the fact that trust companies could be subject to self–dealing. The minister has now promised in Bill C–83 that self–dealing will be outlawed, and that there would be a whole host of regulations with respect to tightening up and ensuring an arm's length relationship between a financial institution and any of its subsidiaries or any of its owners.

We would welcome any regulations which tightens up this whole area. We supported it in the past, but we would like to see the form that the regulations take.

The government has promised a new change in the structure of the board of directors, new rules with respect to conflicts of interest on boards of directors—banks particularly—where a person sitting on a board of directors of a bank but connected closely to a large corporation would be able to obtain loans from a bank for activities other than their ongoing process of business. We have expressed concerns about that in the past. We understand from what the minister has outlined in Bill C–83, that there will be a new era with respect to this whole area of conflicts of interest on the boards of directors of banks.

As I said, this bill is far–reaching. It is not a simple bill. It has implications beyond what is here. It opens up a whole new era. The potential down the road for concentration of economic power is very great. We are concerned that once barriers come down, no control will be exerted by the state on the flow of capital around the world, out of Canada and into Canada. We have concerns about that. What we will be looking for very closely is the way in which when these pillars are collapsed. What is the rationale for collapsing a pillar? What is the long–term view of financial institutions? What kind of financial structures do we want in this country? Do we want a wide–open, loosey–goosey, catch–as–catch–can, take–over–as–take–over–can approach? Is that what we want? Or do we want financial institutions that have been set up to do certain specific things and do them well. These are the kinds of issues that Bill C–83 raises.

We know that the trust and loan companies acts have not been amended since 1914, and a lot of water has passed under the bridge since then. It is important to update the acts governing these particular institutions. We know there is a need to harmonize the laws federally with those laws that affect those institutions provincially. We understand that, but we believe that in doing so, we must not throw out the baby with the bath water. Are we on the path to creating a Frankenstein, that down the road it will be very difficult to put back into the coffin? This is the crux of the problem.

We have concerns about banks buying out insurance companies, insurance companies buying out trust companies, trust companies buying out banks, banks buying out trust companies, trust companies buying out insurance companies, and on and on. The more complex the game gets, the more the loopholes become apparent and in the long run, consumers suffer and pay the price.

We approach this bill in the spirit of seeking answers because we want to make sure that when this bill is passed that, in fact, it can be the hallmark, the foundation of the way in which financial institutions serve this country and not the other way around, that people serve these financial institutions.

We look forward to the bill going through second reading and we hope that the concerns we have raised will be noted and addressed. If they are not addressed, we will look for opportunities to amend the bill in committee.

TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the Report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

VANIER CUP

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important aspects of Canadian culture is amateur sport. Canadian college football's Vanier Cup, named after a former Governor General, is one of the few truly national sporting events. It is a Canadian event played between Canadian teams by Canadian athletes.

S. O. 31

CBC radio has broadcast almost all the Vanier Cups live since the first game in November, 1965. However, CBC radio's program director in Toronto has apparently decided that this year's November 24 game at the SkyDome will not be broadcast because, as she puts it, sport in general and the Vanier Cup in particular have limited cultural and historical significance.

Canadians from sea to sea want to listen to the Vanier Cup on CBC radio. I would encourage CBC radio to reconsider its decision and broadcast the 1990 Vanier Cup.

AIDS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, nearly 70,000 newborns have been tested for AIDS without the knowledge or consent of their parents. Worse yet, the parents of the 21 babies, and 6 are from the Ottawa area, who were subsequently found to have the HIV antibodies were not informed, nor has a record been kept of the names of the infants. This is a terrible abuse of the rights of parents.

The University of Toronto, with funding from the Department of National Health and Welfare, has been carrying out these tests. Although its procedures may be legal, I have to seriously question the ethics.

Research into AIDS is vital. The minister must look into methods, which are acceptable to the general public, of conducting necessary studies, but also that tests be documented to enable parents and doctors the proper mechanism of tracing the possible transmitter of the virus.

AUDITOR GENERAL KENNETH DYE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, today, the tenth and final report of our Auditor General, Kenneth Dye, is tabled. In those 10 years he has served his office well and the people of Canada even better.

In his report today he says, "I came to Ottawa because I had been intrigued by my predecessor's innovative ideas about comprehensive auditing. I also like constructive change and thought I could contribute to the advancement of accountability, perhaps implanting the notion that public servants should spend people's money as carefully as they would their own."

He has pursued these ideals relentlessly through his 10 years and can retire from his job content in the knowledge that, although there is much work yet to be done, he has successfully focused government attention on efficient and effective use of public funds.

The New Democratic caucus wants to extend our thanks to Mr. Dye for his hard work over his 10 years as Auditor General and wish him much success in his transition back to private life.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada Career Week is not just an opportunity for youth to learn about the career opportunities available to them, but it is also an opportunity for all of us and for adults everywhere to look at the contributions we can make toward encouraging our youth to complete their training.

The most important thing we can do is change our attitudes toward skills training and non-academic education. We must realize that a student who does not excel in English literature is not less intelligent than the student who does. They have different aptitudes but both are equally important to our communities and both deserve the same amount of encouragement and respect.

Through education, we give our youth self-reliance and an opportunity to be productive adults. By encouraging our youth to be the best they can be—bricklayer, welder, teacher, scientist, or whatever—we instil self-respect and self-confidence which, in turn, promotes a healthy regard for the achievement of others. Investing in skills training is an investment that keeps on giving us a return. I cannot think of another investment with such guarantees.

USE OF CHALLENGER JETS

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board tabled a report on the use of the federal government's six Challenger jets. Incredible but true, Mr. Speaker: there has been a 40-per cent drop since the Conservative Government was elected in 1984.

Under the Liberal government, which means until August 1984, the Liberals took 672 flights in twelve months. In two twelve-month periods, in 1989 and 1990, the Conservative Government used the Challenger jets 258 and 301 times, respectively.

Mr. Speaker, this is one more example of good management by this government.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my constituents of Hamilton Mountain, as well as most other Canadians, are worried about the effect the proposed GST will have on their standard of living. I would like to point out to Canadians yet another flaw in the government's proposed new tax.

Close scrutiny of the GST shows that not all Canadians will be treated equally under this new tax. For example, stockbrokers' fees will be GST exempt. Commissions charged by other professions, such as auto dealers, real estate agents, and art brokers, are all taxable. Yet the commissions charged by stockbrokers are exempt. Is it not interesting that the Minister of Finance cannot find a way to tax his former colleagues and employers?

When a government introduces a piece of legislation that will hit the poor and the elderly the hardest and gives the boys on Bay Street a break, it should come as no surprise that the Liberal caucus, under Jean Chrétien, would vow to scrap such a tax.

Many alternative forms of taxation exist which are fair, equitable, simple, and visible. This is the type of taxation that Canadians have come to know under successive Liberal governments. I salute the foresight of my Liberal colleagues in the other place as they attempt to—

TRIBUTE TO MARCO MAIOLO

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, it was a great pleasure to join the Prime Minister yesterday in a celebration for Marco Maiolo at the Meadowbrook School in Lachine, Quebec.

Marco is the one millionth student to enrol in the Seeds Program for energy awareness.

The program was set up in 1976 to make students aware of the importance of energy and of the challenge to produce energy while protecting the environment.

In recognition of the contribution of the Seeds Foundation to education and to mark the enrolment of the one-millionth student in the program, the Prime Minister gave Marco Maiolo a certificate to commemorate the occasion and congratulated him, also on behalf of the Government of Canada.

I can only applaud the achievements of this program and I want to congratulate Marco and wish him every success with his studies.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, two years ago the government said it would continue testing Cruise missiles in Canada until progress is made on disarmament.

Two years later, the Cold War is over. Gorbachev is reducing Soviet arms and dissolving the Warsaw Pact. He has offered to make the Soviet Union a non-nuclear-weapons state if NATO will do the same.

Why is the government promoting war fever by testing the Cruise missile over northern Canada today? When will the government contribute to peace by ending the testing of the Cruise missile in Canada?

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, for nearly eight weeks, the New Democratic Party of Ontario has failed to respond to one of the most important environmental issues, the proposed dump in the Rouge Valley.

While in opposition, the NDP stated there would be no dump within the magnificent Rouge Valley system of Scarborough. With the federal government pledging $10 million to save the Rouge as a park, Bob Rae has failed to put a stop to provincial lands in the Rouge from becoming a dumping ground.

• (1410)

I say to the Premier of Ontario: "You have been given your chance. Lack of action has shown the people of Scarborough and all of Metropolitan Toronto that the total environmental protection of the Rouge Valley is really not on the NDP agenda."

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, while the government has pushed interest rates to the 14 per cent mark, it is ignoring the hardships it has imposed on Canadians.

Housing starts are at their lowest level in six years. Home sales have plunged 30 per cent compared to last year and the construction industry is expected to have an unemployment rate of 15 per cent.

Across the country, families earning $40,000 or $50,000 a year are defaulting on their mortgages, a jump of 41 per cent in the last six months. In Toronto hundreds of homeowners have already had to give up their properties and default on their dream homes.

While the Tories stick to their destructive high interest rate policy, CMHC has predicted a continued rise in defaults in the coming year. The Canadian Real Estate Association, meeting here in Ottawa today, is under no illusion as to what the problem is. It is interest rates.

As the unemployment rate increases and interest rates push housing prices higher and higher, hundreds of thousands of Canadians are shoved out of the market to buy their first home.

This is the price Canadians are paying for the government's inflation-fighting tactics. The long-term damage to the Canadian economy is a price not worth paying.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, here we go again. We have heard it all before. Jean Chrétien and the Liberal Party are telling Canadians they will scrap the GST if elected.

An hon. member: That will never happen.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: But can we really believe them? Not if you look at Liberal history, Mr. Speaker.

Remember the 1974 election? The Liberals promised us no wage and price controls. What happened less than one year into their term? We had price and wage controls.

Then, in 1980 the Liberal Party forced an election over a proposed 18-cent per gallon gasoline tax, and what happened? By the time they were turfed from office in 1984 gas prices had risen by 99 cents per gallon.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Thompson: This latest announcement is another signal to Canadians of the Liberal Party's cynical approach to government. And yes, Mr. Speaker, we have heard it all before.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

NSC DIESEL INC.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House a scandalous example of program abuse and ineptitude by officials of ACOA and, indeed, perhaps the minister responsible.

I refer of course to the circumstances surrounding the approval of a $12 million loan to a company owned by Rick Black, NSC Diesel Inc.

Even before the building was finished, the company's orders dried up and its business plan was found to be total fabrication. The result is dozens of contractors who extended lines of credit now facing bankruptcy themselves, hundreds of their employees losing their jobs, and more economic misery for the people of this part of Nova Scotia because of this fiasco.

Now that the federal Auditor General, in response to my request to review this smelly deal, has concluded that program assessment criteria were not followed, it is time for a full public disclosure on how this deal got funded, who was zooming who, and for heads to roll, starting with the minister responsible.

KIDS HELP LINE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, imagine, if you will, being on the receiving end of a call from a four-year old child who wants to know how to commit suicide. Imagine the pain in that child's life.

Twenty-five thousand children a month make calls for help to the Kids Help Line. On Monday, two of their phone lines will be closed. Based on last year's statistics, this means that over the next six months 100,000 kids will not be responded to by the hot-line, 2,000 suicidal kids will not receive counselling, and 9,000 kids who are the victims of family violence will not have access to a counsellor.

This service has proved itself invaluable in direct intervention and now has over 300,000 pieces of data on the nature of the difficulties faced by children in Canada. Surely the new minister responsible for children will not let this proven program deteriorate when the need is so great. Could the $72,000 the government used promoting the children's summit have been better spent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 18th anniversary of the political class of 1972. That is those members of Parliament who were first elected on October 30, 1972, went on to consecutive and unbroken re-election victories and are still presently members of the House of Commons. Believe me, given the uncertain fortunes of political life these days, that is no small feat.

On October 30, 1972, 59 Conservatives, 23 Liberals, 11 New Democrats and three Socreds were elected for the first time. Mr. Speaker, you and I are counted among that number. Of those members there are only 11

Conservatives and two Liberals remaining with unbroken records.

In the Liberal caucus there remains Jean-Robert Gauthier and the Hon. Bill Rompkey. In the Conservative caucus we have you, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Harvie Andre, the Hon. Perrin Beatty, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, the Hon. Paul Dick, the Hon. Jack Epp, the Hon. Otto Jelinek, Bill Kempling, Gus Mitges, Frank Oberle and myself.

To all, I say we have much to be proud of, for as political survivors, we are all too rare in public life these days.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, regardless of all the rhetoric and press releases delivered by this government to try to make people believe that they are being open and above board in their operations, this government is still denying the Auditor General of Canada his statutory authority to audit ministerial expenses.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board this: Why will the government not put its words into action and hand over minister's receipts so that the Auditor General can perform his duty on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for at least recognizing that we are coming forward with a lot more information than his party did when it was in power.

As a matter of fact, we are following a role that it established. We have made public information as promised by my predecessor, the former President of the Treasury Board, on government travel, minister's travel and aircraft travel. I think we have come a long way in satisfying the Auditor General.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the minister that he has not satisfied the Auditor General in any way.

As chairman of the Public Accounts committee, I have written to the government asking it to provide those receipts for the Auditor General. Our Public Accounts committee has had the Privy Council Office, the Comptroller General of Canada and the Treasury Board before our committee. We have been stonewalled at every turn. This federal government is the only jurisdiction in all of Canada that still denies this information to its Auditor General. Surely the taxpayers of Canada must wonder what this government has to hide.

What is the government's real reason for denial of this important information to the Auditor General of Canada? We are living for the future, we are not living for the past.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, even in the present, the government is taking major decisions.

If the hon. gentleman looks at the report that we have produced, he will see that the number of flights by government ministers has been reduced by some 40 per cent since 1980. What the government is concerned with is its real savings and real management of public finance and it has done that by maintaining public expenditures lower than they have ever been, lower than all the provinces. The government has cut $25 billion in the management since 1984, starting with a deficit of $16 billion to a surplus this year of $9 billion, 70 per cent of that being from expenses reduction. That is what the government is proud of.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, if the government is so pure, why does it not co-operate with the Auditor General?

• (1420 )

Mr. Speaker, I am not getting answers there, so I will follow up the Auditor General's report with a question to the Minister of Transport.

The ice-breaker St. Laurent was out of service for five years. The minister will be well aware of the fact that four years ago, a Halifax contractor was granted the job of refitting the ship at a cost of $51 million over a period of two years.

Now, two years overdue, the work on the ship is still ongoing, and the cost has risen to $125 million. That is the kind of financial management we are looking at. What is the government going to do about this fiasco?

How can the government possibly justify increasing taxes at a time when it is wasting public money in this way?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the approved cost for this project was an estimate. That is all it was.

The refitting work began. It was impossible until they opened up the ship to determine exactly what problems would be encountered. Modernizing the Louis St. Laurent will improve our ice-breaking capacity. That may not matter much in Pembroke and Renfrew, but it matters to your colleagues from the maritimes.

I think you should have checked with them before you asked that question.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has warned the government that it may suffer severe losses upon implementing the goods and services tax because the system to administer the tax will not be adequate.

Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General is worried because the GST will collect $2 million every hour, twenty-four hours a day, 365 days a year. I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is prepared to acknowledge that the goods and services tax will be a real nightmare, both for business and the government, and that this tax proposal should be cancelled.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that. We have worked very closely with people in the private sector. We have also heard from those people that the concerns that have been expressed about the complexity of the GST are not well founded.

Also, we know that the federal sales tax today is a very complex tax. What I think most Canadians are interested in is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Let me read some headlines here. After the speech last weekend: "Waffling Jean," "Chrétien does an about face on the GST," "Who will bear the costs of Senate delay?", "Liberal senators should reconsider their actions," "Gut the GST now—"

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, representing small business in this country, says that the goods and services tax will be an administrative nightmare.

The minister says that the Auditor General's concerns are not well founded, but he knows that the goods and services tax is going to collect more than $2 million an hour, 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

Is the Minister of Finance going to pursue his deadly scheme of imposing the goods and services tax on Canadians? Does he realize that the time for Tory tax trick-or-treat games is over and he should withdraw the goods and services tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if there are any trick-or-treat games, it is Jean Chrétien playing them on the Canadian people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): April 6, 1990, Jean Chrétien said that it would be irresponsible to say now that a Liberal government would scrap the GST. "That is $28 billion. At this point, I will not say I will abolish the GST. I won't say I'll keep it either."

What we do know is that Jean Chrétien back then would not say that he would scrap the GST without knowing where the money is coming from. Does Jean Chrétien know today where the money is coming from? Does he have any idea how he is going to change the tax system? Is it going to be from consumption tax? Is it going to be personal income tax?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has confirmed what most Canadians have long suspected, that despite six years in office this government does not have a comprehensive strategy for dealing with environmental issues.

My question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Auditor General has found that the ocean dumping program deficiencies could have serious environmental consequences, deficiencies that were known but were kept secret from Parliament.

Since the Auditor General could find no evidence that the department had any scientific basis for informing Parliament that ocean dumping was being permitted in a safe and regulated manner, will the minister assure the House that from this date on, there will be no permits issued for ocean dumping until an effective, scientific monitoring system for existing and proposed disposal sites is fully in place?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the Auditor General also mentioned that action has been taken by the department to resolve the deficiencies noted for the two 1988 examples and the 1989 ocean dumping regulatory program. There is an action plan in place right now. The action plan consists of improvements to scientific support for the program, including research; improvements to dump site monitoring; increased compliance and enforcement activities; and amendments to ocean dumping regulations, including changes to permit fees to make them comparable in cost to other disposal alternatives. So, we are certainly acting on this issue very actively.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped that the minister could simply have said yes.

In a shocking indictment of the effects of delegating authority to provincial enforcement agencies, the Auditor General reveals that between 1982 and 1988, the percentage of mining companies breaking the law in Canada leaped from 15 per cent to 52 per cent. In many cases, the level of dumping has occurred at triple the safe allowable levels.

A 240 per cent increase in crime, what a Tory success story.

Will the minister assure the House that this rampant illegal activity will be halted immediately and that charges will be laid against the provinces and those companies that are in violation of federal law?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the problems that we are encountering in the mining industry, I would like to tell my hon. colleague that we have established a number of conventions with mining establishments across the country, that enforcement is being increased and the increase will be enforced through measures that will be announced in the green plan.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the minister is confirming that the Auditor General is right, that this government does not have a comprehensive strategy for dealing with environmental issues.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act in 1988 provided for agreements to be negotiated between Ottawa and the provinces concerning regulation and enforcement of toxic substances. There are, at the moment, no agreements signed and the levels of toxic and hazardous materials in our environment continue to climb.

My question to the Minister of the Environment is when will this government take action on these agreements concerning toxic substances and hazardous material?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure my hon. colleague opposite that toxics are very much at the forefront of our environmental agenda. It is an agenda that is, by the way, quite comprehensive, probably the most comprehensive in the world. We are looking at toxics and a list of 44 substances that have been identified as toxics. We are discussing this with the provinces and there will be quite a bit more to be announced when the green plan is tabled in the House before the end of this calendar year.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Western Economic Diversification.

This government has funded some hare-brained schemes in its day, but one of the most outrageous has to be the $100,000 in public money spent on an engine turbo charger which wound up on the race tracks in the United States and ultimately on the scrap heap.

• (1430 )

I wonder whether the minister would tell us why this scandalous waste of public money was allowed by his illustrious predecessor, our very own hot rod Bill over there.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): I find it exceedingly strange, Mr. Speaker, that a member of Parliament who comes from a region such as Newfoundland would be critical of actions that are taken in western Canada to diversify and strengthen the economy.

I can inform the hon. member that in most casts, except for research and development, the western diversification initiative makes all moneys given to business refundable.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister of course misses the essential point. The decision was made here in Ottawa.

While he is forthcoming, can he tell me a couple of more things? First of all, this turbo charger had to be destroyed in 1987. The government found that out two years later and, notwithstanding, paid out additional money to an Alberta firm for a non-existent project.

Will he answer that question? Will he tell us why the Government of Canada paid out public money for a turbo charger that had been wiped out, destroyed, two years before?

An hon. member: Tory efficiency.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can explain to the hon. member that in western economic diversification the decisions are made in western Canada. There is a deputy minister—

Mr. Simmons: This one was made in your office.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, the member makes an allegation that that decision was made in my office. That is a lie, that is a lie.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure, no matter how strongly the hon. minister may feel about it, he would not want to use that language, and I would ask him to withdraw that word.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, as I would always wish to follow your instructions, I only could only do so if the hon. member for Burin—St. George's would withdraw his allegation.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. minister to consider his position, and we will return to it later.

STELCO

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The minister is no doubt aware of the confusion surrounding whether or not Stelco workers who were laid off after the long Stelco strike will be eligible for benefits under UIC.

Will the minister give Stelco workers her assurance in this House today that they will indeed be eligible for UIC benefits once this long strike is over?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the rules on unemployment insurance are very clear. Now that we have Bill C-21 and the new rules will come into place on November 18, my officials in Hamilton will be working with the company and with the union. All will become clear in that time.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The 6,800 workers have to work this Saturday on the agreement. If the federal government is not prepared today to give a written undertaking that all workers will be eligible for unemployment insurance, there is a very good possibility that this strike will not be over. In fact, both union and management have been in touch with the government seeking just such an assurance.

I am sure that the minister, along with all her colleagues, hopes that this long strike is over and that those 6,800 people in whole or in part can come back to work, but will she guarantee the House today that some 4,800 who will not immediately be recalled will be eligible for unemployment insurance?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not the practice of this government to get into the middle of disputes between labour and management. The hon. member knows that our job is to work with both sides to come to a conclusion. That is exactly what we will be doing in this case as in other cases.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in the last couple of weeks we have watched the Secretary of State for External Affairs rattle his sabre and push this country to the brink of war. Yet, today, the Auditor General has pointed out that the Canadian forces are not suitably designed for conditions of war.

Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs explain why he is pushing this country toward war when it is obvious that our Armed Forces are not prepared for combat?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, not even the cartoonists of the country believe that.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the cartoonists will have more fun today.

The Auditor General was asked this morning if the Canadian forces medical services could withstand a prolonged war or a dramatic increase in patient load. His reply: "We are not in a position to give appropriate medical help in wartime".

Given the statement our Armed Forces medical services are not equipped to deal with war, what extra steps are being taken to ensure the men and women serving in the Persian Gulf will receive the best possible medical attention should the need arise?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not sure, with all his attributes, the Auditor General is the best qualified to be qualified as a military strategist either.

I can inform the hon. member as to actions that we have taken to assure that Canadian men and women serving Canada in the Persian Gulf will be able to receive medical attention as required. We have put forward into the Canadian—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. McKnight: There are 10 Canadian medical professionals who are serving on the U.S.S. Mercy.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, today the Auditor General pointed to lack of government planning to deal with deregulation at airports throughout the country. As an example, at Pearson he pointed out that the government's refusal to act on reports dating from 1986 to repair the parking facilities at Terminal 1 has cost the government between $28 million and $38 million and further has put the safety of the structure into serious jeopardy.

In the interest of public safety and fiscal responsibility, will the Minister of Transport tell us today when he will act upon these recommendations to repair the facilities?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend would know, had he checked with the transport critic, that I announced some two weeks ago that we were prepared to renovate Terminals 1 and 2 fully, which naturally could include the renovation of the parking garage. I welcome his assurance that his party supports the initiative.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General is not at all convinced that there is a completion date for the airport master plan and for the plans that the minister speaks of. In fact he says, and I quote: "There is a lack of a policy statement and financing philosophy".

There has been a $15 million cost overrun at model q at Terminal 1 since 1987. The project is one and a half years behind schedule. There is a shortfall of $3.25 million in projected revenues at the U.S. pre-clearance facilities, and the minister is pushing ahead with privatization.

• (1440)

Will the minister tell this House why he is using privatization as a quick fix and a quick out for the administrative and financial mismanagement at Pearson?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is easy. Because of the previous administration's fiscal mismanagement we do not have the money. That is why we are going to private enterprise.

Oral Questions

HEALTH

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister told this House that dioxins are now everywhere in our environment, but he will not tell us why. The reason is that industrial air pollution rains dioxins on every inch of this country.

I ask the minister to confirm to this House that he considers food that violates his own department's regulations, creating thousands of new cancer cases, to be, as he declared yesterday, safe and nutritious.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this sort of tactic is simply reprehensible.

Members of the House of Commons, yesterday, listened to members of the opposition attempt to frighten nursing mothers into believing that they were poisoning their infants by nursing them.

What we have today is an allegation being made that thousands of Canadians are dying as a result of the intake of dioxins in their food. If the hon. member has evidence of that, let her bring it forward.

I specifically challenged the hon. member yesterday to indicate on behalf of her party whether her party's position was that all food containing any trace of dioxins in it should be pulled from the shelves and destroyed. Perhaps she could answer that.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians take no comfort from the minister's umbrella of words. The minister knows full well that the dioxin crisis is a 20th century problem. He also knows that there are studies which confirm that no dioxin was present in human tissue until the turn of the century.

The minister told us yesterday that he is overwhelmed by the amount of dioxin currently in the environment and does not feel it necessary to take drastic action needed to safeguard the Canadian food supply.

Given that as many as 18,000 Canadians will develop cancer as a result of the dioxins consumed in their daily diet, will he confirm to this House that this government is not willing to enact stiff regulations and invest necessary budget dollars toward the health of Canadians?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, just the opposite. What I will indicate is that the Minister of the Environment and I are working very closely in terms of doing everything that we can do to eliminate the creation of dioxins. It is nonsense to suggest that dioxins did not exist prior to the turn of century. They are created by such things as forest fires. Perhaps hon. members opposite would have us pass a law banning forest fires to eliminate all dioxins from the environment.

The critical question is this: if the standard that is followed is the standard proposed by members opposite, that no food may be consumed in Canada even if it has minute traceable quantities of dioxins in it, it would result in our saying to nursing mothers that they could not breast feed their children and it would result in the destruction of hundreds of millions of dollars of food which is safe, nutritious, and available for Canadians.

I challenge the hon. member again: is this the position of the Liberal Party of Canada?

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Auditor General has confirmed what Canadians guessed long ago, that the government's refugee backlog system is not working. By March 1990 he says that one-tenth of the cases that ought to have been resolved were resolved. He believes that it is doubtful that they can meet their schedule. Now the minister's officials are holding back the most deserving cases in order to process last come Caribbean cases first.

Will the minister admit that the backlog system has failed? Will she land those people and let her immigration staff get on with regular immigration work?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I simply will not accept the allegation of the hon. member that we are moving ahead cynically with cases from the Caribbean as opposed to other kinds of cases. That is simply not a fact.

Second, I would like to thank the Auditor General for some of his suggestions. As indicated in his report, we were moving on many of the areas that he made suggestions on—both in the backlog and in the new system, and in our over-all immigration plan leading to our five-year levels—because we understood as well that there were some problems in our management.

Since the end of March things have changed; 50 per cent of the cases within the backlog have now been opened because we have improved our processes, and 30 per cent of them have been decided.

The Auditor General also suggested that we should use greater deterrents. Perhaps that is what the critic for the NDP is suggesting.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has also confirmed that the government's new refugee determination system is falling behind, taking nine months instead of nine weeks to process people and resolve their refugee claims. And the refugee board's own figures show a new backlog in a year and a half of something like 25,000 unresolved cases.

When will the minister admit that the new system also is failing and bring in the quick and fair system that was asked for several years ago by the churches and other public groups in Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, when we brought in our new system, the part of the new system that the hon. member was most against was the safe third country provision. Is he now suggesting that in the interest of speed we bring that in?

HOUSING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister of housing. In large urban centres such as Toronto and Vancouver the average family still cannot afford to purchase the average home. The problem is that first-time home buyers in Toronto need a down payment of up to $60,000.

Will the minister consider changing the rules so that people with funds in RRSPs can use that money for down payments, or will the government make it possible for first-time home buyers to set up self-directed RRSPs to be used for those down payments, thereby making home ownership more affordable.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion put forward by the hon. member is one of a number of suggestions that are going to be discussed tomorrow and the next day at the Canadian Housing Finance Conference which, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is the first ever housing financing conference held in this country. It will bring together 150 experts from Canada and internationally, from business, from the financial community, academics, to focus on what can be done to make housing more affordable, and to allow more accessibility to home ownership.

The Department of Finance had some understandable concerns with respect to the use of RRSPs for housing down payments. They obviously do not want to raise the expectations of Canadians that something of that sort will be brought in immediately, but at the same time, it is something that is under careful examination at the present time.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As Minister of Transport, I am sure he is aware that there is only one highway into Nova Scotia and on to Newfoundland.

Elimination of rail freight in Newfoundland has resulted in dramatic increases in truck traffic on this highway. Since being elected less than two years ago I have witnessed several accidents on this highway, resulting in fatalities to men, women, and children. Last Friday night was the most recent but sadly I know there will be more. We desperately need a new federal-provincial agreement to stop the fatalities and the grief.

Will the minister negotiate, with all the urgency required, a new co-operation agreement to have this overburdened highway replaced?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I presume my hon. friend realizes and appreciates that highways are a provincial responsibility. However, I would say that my provincial colleagues and I recently approved phase four of the national highway system study at the recent Council of Transport Ministers meeting and we are looking at the priorities at the present time.

But I should also tell him that there has been no decision made on funding mechanisms at this time.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report on the lack of credibility of this government in terms of the environment is simply devastating.

He said: "The unsatisfactory quality of the department's evaluations raises serious questions about the extent to which Parliament can rely on them." That in a very articulate way comes perilously close to the unparliamentary language of the Minister of National Defence.

The Auditor General has said that after six years of Tory rule there is not one shred of believability left in this government's approach to the environment. Is there any reason for the Canadian people to think any differently?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend imputes a blanket indictment to the Auditor General in respect of the government and its spending, including the Department of the Environment. He says—

An hon. member: Another quotation.

Mr. Mulroney: They do not like quotations over there.

The Auditor General said in his report today: "1990 is the first year an Auditor General has given an opinion without reservations on the government's financial statements since enactment of the Auditor General Act."

But in 1975-76, the Auditor General said: "I am deeply concerned that—the government has lost or is close to losing effective control of the public purse." The President of the Treasury Board that year was Jean Chrétien.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister felt it important to bail out his Minister of the Environment, perhaps he will also answer the second question that the Auditor General put very clearly.

The Auditor General said very clearly that the problem is that this government will not allow the Minister of the Environment the authority he requires or for which he can be held accountable.

Will the Prime Minister give the Minister of the Environment final authority over the green paper? If he does not, will he deem it a failure, unless the Minister of the Environment is given the authority to overrule the minister of energy as the minister of energy overruled him last week. Will he give him the authority to overrule the Minister of National Health and Welfare as the Minister of National Health and Welfare overruled him last week? Will he give him the authority to overrule the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as the minister of fisheries has consistently befuddled the environmental—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer to all my colleague's questions obviously is, yes.

The government has made that commitment. Later on today, we will be voting in this House on the second reading of Bill C-78. If my hon. colleague had taken the time to read it, he would see the words right in that bill.

LAPRADE FUND

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in his report today, the Auditor General pointed to some serious shortcomings in the procedure for funding projects through the Laprade Fund.

In many cases, projects were approved even if they did not meet the basic criteria. My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. How can the minister justify spending considerable sums of money while deliberately ignoring the program's strict criteria?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is really a shame to hear a Liberal member talk about the Laprade Fund!

Mr. Speaker, I think the Laprade Fund, which was created by the former government— We have some figures here which were most certainly brought to the attention of the Auditor General. Of 597 projects, 195 were approved and 175 were accepted. Thanks to money paid from the Laprade Fund, 3,662 jobs were created. I hardly think the Liberals could have matched that.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

There is something definitely rotten in the State of Denmark. Money was given for projects that were already completed. An arena was divided in two in order to get twice the maximum grant. The Auditor General made it clear that this was a case of a minister exercising his discretion and not following his own rules. My question is this: is the minister prepared to table in the House all documents related to this fund and show who benefited from the dollars laundered by a government with very few scruples?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, once again, I believe that the projects submitted for funding by the Laprade Fund are absolutely genuine. The projects are submitted to senior officials of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and evaluated very carefully. Some projects are turned down because they do not meet established criteria.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the arena is concerned, I think the purpose is as valid as it was in the case of the bingo halls they subsidized for years.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I genuinely believe that when the Prime Minister came to this House in 1984 he was committed to civil liberties as a Canadian and as a Quebecois. He acted on that by repealing the War Measures Act, which is much more than the Trudeau government was prepared to consider.

Having repealed the War Measures Act, at the Oka crisis last summer his government did not use the Emergencies Act which has all the powers through which Parliament could have scrutinized what the army did and why it was called in at Oka.

Given that the Prime Minister said on September 24, 1990, in a response in this House to the leader of my party, the member for Yukon when she called for a public inquiry into the situation:

> We must all obey the same laws and, as soon as that is settled, the government will be more than pleased to take the kind of action suggested by my hon. friend.

We do not have a public inquiry. We have a parliamentary inquiry, but it was just announced by the Indian affairs committee that in fact it is going to be restricted.

Is the Prime Minister committed to a full parliamentary inquiry into the events of calling the army into Oka last summer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House leader of the government has been and is ready to engage in discussions with the House leaders of the respective parties in regard to precisely this point.

The army was dispatched to Oka by the Government of Canada pursuant to a request made under the National Defence Act by a provincial government. It was perfectly entitled to make that request. The Government of Canada made a value judgment and responded to that request.

I believe that the army did an excellent job at Oka. It conducted itself with moderation, restraint and a great deal of effectiveness. I know that all members of the armed forces would appreciate the support and the congratulations of the members of the NDP as they have received from other members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must surely understand that this is an incredible situation where an army is called in by the provincial premier, the feds pay for it and we do not even have a parliamentary inquiry. What is going on? That dwarfs what the Auditor General is saying today.

For my supplementary question I ask him to consider this specifically.

[Translation]

It is public knowledge that Quebec Minister Claude Ryan is opposed to a public inquiry on this issue. Did the Prime Minister promise Mr. Ryan he would sabotage an inquiry by this Parliament, our Parliament?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken there was a resolution before the House that need only the approval of the New Democrats. The Government House Leader has just told me that if the New Democrats had approved the resolution that is before the House, we would have been able to proceed as soon as possible.

Has the hon. member spoken to his colleagues? Had they supported the resolution, we would have been able to proceed.

WITHDRAWAL OF REMARKS

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to withdraw my use of unparliamentary language in response to a comment made by the member for Burin—St. George's. I apologize to the House and totally withdraw my unparliamentary remarks.

PRIVILEGE

REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I now would like to rise on a question of privilege for which I gave you notice.

When I was answering a question regarding a grant which he claimed was made by Western Economic Diversification and the authorizing point in that grant, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's said: "That was authorized in your office", meaning me, Mr. Speaker.

I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, that members of the House, members of the Public Service who are responsible for Western Economic Diversification, and the recipients of grants understand the process.

The pacemaker process to which the member for Burin—St. George's referred was a project which was initiated and authorized in 1985 under the IRDP. I was not the minister responsible in 1985 for the IRD program. The program was transferred to Western Economic Diversification when that department was established to encourage diversification in western Canada.

There were further payments made to the pacemaker project. Those payments were made in January of 1989. I was not the minister responsible for Western Economic Diversification at that time. Another final payment was made in March of 1989. I was not the minister at that time.

The payments were made after an independent audit of the financial statements and an audit visit to the site by the WD officers. It was agreed upon that the company had met all terms and conditions of the 1985 agreement under IRDP.

The hon. member, in saying that it was done in my office, was either unaware of the circumstances or inadvertently was misleading the House.

I will conclude by saying that out of 37 projects in Western Economic Diversification reviewed by the Auditor General, one—this one, initiated by another department—was found lacking, 36 were found to be fully satisfactory.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Defence has, of course, very properly withdrawn his remarks and has continued on a question of privilege. The House has heard him. I expect all hon. members will, of course, hear the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I rise in relation to the question of privilege raised by the Minister of Defence. The point he made toward the end about the number of projects that did not come under the scrutiny of the Auditor General is not at all the point. This one did.

This one was initiated before his time in terms of administering the project, but he had ministerial responsibility for it. He does not have it any more, and that is the crux of it. He chose to rise today, although he is no longer answerable or accountable to the House in respect to this particular department.

I say to the minister that there is no innuendo. I was very direct in what I said. I said across the floor to the minister that the decision was made in his office. Now, candidly, I cannot tell you, Sir, whether the decision was made in his office, or his rec room, or his bar. But I can tell you this, and I can tell him this, that this one has got politics written all over it and the handwriting—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's may want to argue the point of privilege further. The point of privilege is very simple.

The hon. minister has risen and said that an accusation said across the floor by the hon. member for Burin—St. George's is not true, and the hon. Minister of National Defence has given the House his word that it is not so. That is the issue. In this place we usually accept an hon. minister's word or any hon. member's word, if it is stated.

I think the position that the hon. member for Burin—St. George's is in is to give me some explanation as to why this is not a question of privilege and, also, to indicate to me what his response is to the fact that the minister has risen and said that this did not take place in his office.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I am not clear on that point, but I shall repeat it one more time. I think these are the actual words, or essentially these. I said, in all candour, I do not know whether the decision was made in the minister's office or his rec room.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the comments and report to the House.

The difficulty that the Chair is in, and the difficulty that the House is in, is that we have a tradition that if an error has been made and someone rises and says: "I did not do that" or "The facts are wrong", there is a gentleperson's tradition in the House that the member making the error withdraws the allegation. That is what the hon. minister is asking the hon. member for Burin—St. George's to do which, it seems to me, would be an easy thing to do and would also end this difficulty.

Mr. Simmons: If the minister says that the decision was not made in his House, I take him at his word, it was not made in his house.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Well, perhaps the hon. member for Burin—St. George's can consider his position further, and we will move on to other things.

AUDITOR GENERAL KENNETH DYE

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, as we have received this morning the Auditor General's Report, and since this is Mr. Ken Dye's last report, on behalf of the government I would like to indicate that we feel he has made a very significant contribution to helping guide the government to improve our management and efficiency.

I would like to say that he has been very useful in following up on his recommendations, that we have also taken them into great consideration and we have acted upon them.

I would like to assure him that until the end of his mandate we will continue to collaborate with him.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief but important point of order and it relates to the matter of the comments by the Minister of National Defence.

The last time that—

• (1510 )

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if we could leave that for the moment. The hon. minister has risen with respect to the Auditor General. I think that there may be some comments from other parties.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his patience. I want to follow the President of the Treasury Board in making a few comments about the Auditor General.

Today the Auditor General tabled his last report in the House after serving this Parliament for 10 years. It is a big job for a person to come in and take over because government is big business. It cannot possibly be done all in one year. It has to be divided up in cycles, with parts done parts each year. Even in that time, it is a big job.

I think the Auditor General has some very fine achievements to his record, as indicated by the President of the Treasury Board, achieving that certain reservations no longer exist. For example, today Public Service pension funds that are owed by the government as part of the debt of the government and also the foreign loans that will not probably be collected are now part of the country's liabilities.

He has tackled these things in a very realistic way and in a very serious way. As Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee I can say that the Auditor General and his staff have been most co-operative. Whenever he appeared before our committee as a witness, he never backed down from statements that he had made because his work was well researched with fine conclusions emanating therefrom.

In the years ahead, it is going to be very important that we have a good successor to the present Auditor General who has laid so much very important ground work. The taxpayers of this country and probably any free country of the world are going to demand greater accountability of their parliaments and their legislatures and, indeed, they are going to ask for greater accountability from their individual members of Parliament and representatives. I think that is one thing that we all have to accept as part of democracy.

The Auditor General has been very adamant in his protection of the public purse. It is very important that this Parliament support the Auditor General, his office, and his staff. It is very important that the public accounts committee co-operate and work very closely with him. Of course, it is very important that he has the support of the people of Canada because he is the one that is going to protect their purse.

Many countries send their auditors general to Canada to learn our system. That simply indicates the good programs put together with approximately 690 personnel in the Auditor General's office and a system whereby other people who are experts a in the field, perhaps atomic energy or defence matters, can be brought in on short-term contracts, and then let go.

He has put together a very good program. He has been an outstanding servant to the country. I hope that those who are searching for a new Auditor General for the next 10 years will indeed find the qualities in the new man that have existed in Kenneth Dye.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the other two members who have spoken of the Auditor General and the work that he has done, on behalf of my party, the New Democratic Party.

Although I am a rookie to the House of Commons and fairly new to the public accounts committee, I have learned in a very short time that the Auditor General is a friend of all parliamentarians. The Office of the Auditor General has shown that it is willing to work for and with each member of Parliament if the member shows an interest in finding out anything within that department.

I would like to say also that the people of Canada are very proud of the job that the Auditor General has done. Being a native British Columbian, like yourself Mr. Speaker, we in British Columbia are particularly proud that the Auditor General for the last 10 years is from British Columbia.

The Auditor General in wrapping up his summation in his tenth and last report says at page 40: "I shall leave my post at the end of next March believing that the office of the Auditor General has made a positive contribution to Parliament and that I have done my best. I hope many will agree."

Mr. Speaker, we in this party unanimously agree that in fact he has done his best and he has done an excellent job for the people of Canada. Thank you, Auditor General.

Mr. Speaker: It being 3 p.m. the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion at the second reading stage of Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Therefore Bill C-78 is referred to a special committee appointed to pre-study the bill and to act as legislative committee thereon, pursuant to order made Wednesday, June 27, 1990.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to special committee.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Opposition House Leader on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to do this because members know the rules, but Citation 223 of Beauchesne's fifth edition is quite clear, as follows:

> 223. (1) A Member must be within the House and hear the question put in its entirety, in one of the official languages, or his vote cannot be recorded. It is not sufficient for him to hear it while he is in a gallery or behind the curtains.

Mr. Speaker, I humbly submit that the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean did not hear the question put in the House and that he is not entitled to have his vote recorded as being in favour of this bill.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was unable to be in the House at the appropriate time. I was detained behind the curtains and I rushed in to take part in the division.

Mr. Speaker, be that as it may and whatever your decision might be, I support this bill. I am very proud of it because it will put Canada right up front when it comes to the environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will draw the attention of Mr. Speaker to the facts and he may decide to make further comments.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-83, An act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise and speak to the trust and loans bill. My first comment has to be that the trust and loans bill does not stand alone. It fits into the total reform package of bills and will encompass all of our financial institutions in Canada.

I will be trying to explain briefly some of the history we have gone through in arriving at this bill and how the bill has taken into consideration the various needs of the institutions, the consumers and the people in Canada.

The historical framework within which Bill C-83 is being brought forward is a process of reform of the financial sector, and is not a quick one. The process in fact has been said by many people to have taken too long. However, I think hon. members will agree that it is wise to deliberate longer and to make sure that what we do come up with is workable.

In this bill the minister and his staff have been pragmatic and practical and propose what in large part has taken years of consultation and consideration to arrive at.

• (1550)

At the beginning of its mandate, the government recognized the need for reform. Therefore, in April 1985, it brought forward the green paper. This green paper resulted in many discussions across Canada. Committee reports were made on it, and as a result of these discussions, as well as input from the industry and the public, the proposals underwent refinement. This led to the tabling in December 1986 of the paper entitled New Directions for the Financial Sector. Once again, there were further discussions, draft legislation was compiled at this point and the trust and loans companies draft legislation was tabled for discussion purposes in December 1987. Of course, further consultation took place subsequent to that.

Throughout this period, as well, several other pieces of legislation did come into effect to make temporary improvements to the system. These were Bills C-42 and C-56. These bills implemented a number of changes in the regime governing the financial institutions, particularly with respect to the supervisory functions now exercised by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. These, in effect, created a stronger position for the Superintendent, and this has been recognized by all parties and throughout the industry as being a very positive move.

The government has been active in pursuing the reform of the financial sector. We have also been careful to ensure that our proposals will be effective as well as practical. We know that there is no point in producing reforms that look good but in the final analysis will not work.

I believe that the measures recommended in Bill C-83 will be found to be effective as well as practical. Because they will be practical, they may fall short of some of the aspirations of many of the parties. Because they are broadly acceptable to all sectors of the industry, there will no doubt be some people who wish that one provision or another were a little different. This is the case, however, where it would be impossible to grant everyone's wishes fully. There are too many legitimately different points of view. The government has settled on proposals which meet the needs of the economy and the institution, as well as the Canadian public.

It is important to remember that with the size and importance of this sector, there are four sets of needs which this legislation must recognize and fulfil.

First, there are the needs of the economy. The financial system is not just an important segment of the economy in terms of its size, it is a vital support system without which the economy as a whole would grind to a halt. The easiest and fastest way to harm the economy is to have a financial system that does not meet the current needs of companies and individuals. Conversely, a healthy and dynamic financial system will strengthen the whole economy. Anyone who has bought a car, has tried to get a mortgage on a house, has tried to finance their business, knows that the financial institutions in this country play a critical role in our economy.

There are also the needs of the institutions themselves. The trust and loans legislation was enacted in the first 20 years of this century. If my memory serves me correctly, it was 1917. It is in excess of 70 years since this legislation was first enacted and obviously there have been many changes in the environment in which they operate, many changes to their needs and, of course, this legislation must take that into account.

Then, of course, there are the needs of the consumers and the public. They need information and assurance that the health of the institution with which they are dealing are honourable and that they can have confidence in dealing with them.

They also require the improved services that the financial institutions in Canada want to provide for them and, of course, it is up to us to make sure that this legislation does provide this increased responsiveness to the Canadian public.

In addition, there is another important demand placed on these proposals and that is the need to harmonize with the provincial governments. If a person is going to create a viable financial business in British Columbia or in Quebec, or one that is going to function across the country, it is obvious that the regulations controlling these institutions have to be co-ordinated.

It is recognized by the Department of Finance and our minister in producing this bill that harmonization with the province and their regulations must take place. The co-operation between the two levels of government is the most responsible way of ensuring that the health of all Canadian financial institutions is maintained. I am pleased to say that the proposals for reform are substantially met in the bill that we are tabling.

I would like to get into a few of the points of the bill itself, how it addresses the needs of these various people in the tax reform. I want to reiterate first, though, the important point that the principles of this bill are not isolated. They are part of the larger reform process and must be discussed in the context of that larger reform. All four pillars of our financial institutions are being addressed and the bill today, of course, just addresses the trust and loans, but it must work in harmony with the other bills to follow.

The bill will achieve four things. Initially, it will revitalize the rules of ownership. They will allow for both closely-held and widely-held institutions. It is required that it revitalize the framework for competition in the financial sector. This will be done by removing many of the restrictions imposed now on financial institutions so that they can compete fully with each other.

There has to be, of course, updates to the prudential safeguards. These will be providing protection for the depositors as well as the policy holders. In the process of this, we will be, as a by-product, modernizing the existing statutes.

Let us look first and quickly at the framework for competition. The general policy of the government with respect to competition is that consumers and institutions should be able to have the opportunity to offer similar ranges of service and competing markets previously not open to them. This is intended to enhance the choices available to our consumers.

We propose that with appropriate approval and subject to some relatively minor restrictions, financial institutions will be able to diversify into new financial businesses through their subsidiaries. This follows on the provisions of legislation passed in 1987 which permitted federally chartered financial institutions to own security dealers.

Under the new provisions, trust companies may be owned by institutions without trust powers, such as banks and insurance companies, and trust companies may themselves now own insurance companies. Similar provisions will apply to other types of financial institutions not covered by this bill before us today.

In considering whether to approve the purchase of a financial institution by another in a similar business, the minister will, of course, take into account the size of the buyer and the size of the institution being acquired.

• (1600 )

Trust and loan companies will also receive full consumer lending powers. Full commercial lending powers will also be available to them, as long as they satisfy the conditions which will ensure that they have the necessary staff and controls in place to manage the commercial portfolio. Banks, of course, as an ancillary to this, will be able to offer portfolio management and investment advice services, inhouse.

Trust and loan companies will also be allowed to network financial services offered by affiliates or independent financial institutions, subject to the restrictions on retailing of insurance.

I would like to get into that, just briefly, because there are some things that deposit takers are not going to be permitted to do and it is important that we, as legislators, and that all Canadians should be aware of them. First, with a few limited exceptions, banks and trust and loan companies will not be allowed to retail insurance or to distribute insurance applications through their branches. The exceptions are credit-related life insurance and travel insurance, which they have provided for many years.

Second, while a deposit-taking institution may own an insurance company, the operations of the two businesses have to be kept separate. It is important to recognize that this approach carefully balances several policy objectives. It promotes a degree of extra competition that we believe will be healthy and beneficial for consumers but without disrupting the long-established business of insurance retailers. Licensed brokers and agents will continue to be able to give their clients professional advice on which insurance companies and policies will best serve their needs.

Also, no financial institution will be able to engage in car leasing and this is something for which there has been a lot of demand for by financial institutions and about which a great deal of concern in the general marketplace.

In theory, the idea of financial institutions being in the car leasing business is very attractive but it flounders at one critical point. Banks are already extensively engaged in the business of financing car dealers and they also are in the business of providing consumer auto loans. If, on top of this, banks were to go into the car-leasing business, there would inevitably be questions of conflict of interest. Of course, it is for this reason that the government has decided not to allow car leasing within financial institutions.

There are going to be significant changes in the ability and control of ownership within financial institutions. The government has adopted a pragmatic approach to the question of ownership. There is an area where many options have been expressed, many mutually exclusive. But I believe the proposals in the policy contained in Bill C-83 will meet the needs of all those involved.

The first step in our ownership is to ensure that the Minister of Finance has the authority to approve significant changes in ownership of federal financial institutions, as well as the existing authority to approve all start-ups. This is an increased responsibility for the minister and, of course, the opportunity for increased flexibility within the system. Specifically, an investor will be required to obtain the minister's approval of any purchase of shares which will result in ownership of more than 10 per cent of any class of shares held in that company. Investors now owning more than 10 per cent of the shares of an institution will be required to gain approval from the minister for the purchase of additional shares.

Finally, an investor must gain approval to acquire control of a company that is linked to a financial institution, when the result is a change in the significant ownership interest of that institution.

Trust and loan companies will continue to be able to be closely held and, in fact, they will be able to be sold on closely held basis. But if a trust and loan company is of any significant size, in fact, if it has assets in excess of $750 million or more, it will be required to take the necessary steps to ensure that at least 35 per cent of the total voting rights attached to the shares are widely held and listed for public trading on a Canadian stock exchange. Institutions will have five years to comply with this provision, which is very fair. A Canadian financial holding company or a Canadian-regulated financial institution could be able to meet the rule on behalf of its trust, loan, or insurance company subsidiary.

I would like to mention now the credential safeguards. These are the safeguards put in place in the legislation for the depositors and policyholders. A major focus of concern in the financial sector, as in business generally, is what is known as self-dealing. This is of a great deal of concern to the government, and I believe it is of great concern to all members in the House.

Our proposals embodied in this bill are based on three elements: a general ban on non-arm's length transactions, internal controls and screening of permitted transactions, and a preclearance of certain special transactions by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. Institutions will be required to set up committees of the board, one the conduct review committee, to clear these transactions that are permitted. These conduct review committees will have a majority of their members independent of the institution.

Certain improvements will be made to the existing supervisory system. Specifically, the superintendent will gain the power to demand information from owners of federal financial institutions. As well, any director who resigns as a result of disagreement with other directors or officers of the company, or any auditor resigning or being placed at the company's request will be required to submit a written statement to the superintendent. Affiliated directors will now have to make up one-third of the boards of directors and, to enhance the possibility of minority shareholders being represented on the board, a system of cumulative voting will be introduced for institutions where any shareholder owns more than 10 per cent of any class of voting shares.

Finally, our policy requires federally regulated financial institutions to put into place procedures to resolve conflict of interest.

I believe this legislation is appropriate. It is the fruit of many, many years of consultation and its provisions express principles that will operate to the benefit of the financial sector, the economy, and in fact all Canadians. I am proud to be able to speak in support of this bill and I urge its consideration to the House.

READING OF A MOTION ON DIVISION—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before we go into the question and comment period, having considered the point of order raised earlier this afternoon by the opposition House leader and the fact the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean admitted he was absent when the motion on Bill C-78 was put, it is my duty to have the name of the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean withdrawn from the list of those who voted for the bill.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Gun control; the hon. member for Dartmouth—Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Trinity-Spadina—Immigration.

On questions or comments, the hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with great interest. I had an opportunity in the past year to meet with a member of the board of the Bank of Nova Scotia, Mr. Gordon Bell, who is also the chairman of the bank. Mr. Bell and I had a lengthy discussion and he tried to convey to me why the bank should be allowed to sell insurance over the counter.

The question that I have to pose to the member is: Does he feel that in any way, shape or form the insurance industry will be hurt? If so, in what way, if the banks are allowed to compete? Does the hon. member not see that, if this is allowed to the banks, it would give the general public a much easier means of obtaining insurance? Also, in the sense of trade, does he not see that it will lower the insurance rates along with the charges of insurance on individuals?

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I would like to thank the member from Scarborough for his question.

There has been a great deal of interest, not only by banks, which the hon. member mentioned, but also from trust institutions. Any institute that has depositors and branches has encouraged us to consider giving them the ability to be able to sell retail insurance from their branches.

As has been stated very strongly by the insurance companies, their representatives, and people concerned with the issue, the insurance companies now do a very good job of selling insurance. There is a lot of competition already. The feeling was that the professionalism shown by the industry and the ability to deal properly with it was more properly done through insurance companies.

Of course, banks will be able to have insurance companies as affiliates and will be able to get into the insurance business if that is really their intention. But it is not felt to be in the over-all interests of the public, the consumers, or the financial institution to allow the retailing of insurance at the branches.

Mr. Speaker, if I could pursue that question a little further, one of the things which strikes us about this legislation and, in fact, the broad pattern of deregulating step by step financial institutions which is taking place, is that we are going to see a situation created in which it will be possible for banks or other financial institutions to move into other fields through the takeover of existing institutions or the establishment of new institutions.

For instance, a bank will be able to establish an insurance company. It will be able to use that insurance company to promote the sale of insurance products and services through the credit card operations at the bank. There is a great deal of new scope for banks to broaden their activities. Similarly, there is a great deal of new scope for insurance companies and trust companies to broaden their activities.

Yet, there is a line which is drawn when it comes to an insurance company which a bank might set up being able to promote through credit card mailing lists and that kind of thing. It is nevertheless prevented from seeing those insurance services directly offered to the consumers of the bank on a branch-by-branch basis.

In short, it seems that one has not established a level of increased direct service or increased direct competition at the branch level of banks, for instance, that would operate as a threat to existing insurance companies. It seems to me as I look at this that there is a major question that one can raise as to whether the government is not trying to let these major financial institutions have their cake and eat it too. They would have the possibility of expanding their operations into new financial fields, yet securing from competition and securing from the possibility of better service to consumers those institutions that might be threatened by that expansion.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I was listening carefully to the member for Essex—Windsor. I think he has put his finger right on the critical area, as I indicated in the first few statements of my speech.

There is a very critical balance that was required between the liberalizing or streamlining of the financial industry and yet retaining some of the controls that we feel are in the best interests of the people of Canada.

It is in this particular area where the government tried, while encouraging the competitiveness between these financial institutes, which my hon. friend indicated is there, but retaining as a policy for the existing insurance retailers, the dealers and the professional bodies that are there to service the insurance needs of the Canadian people, that that is still going to be retained and controlled as a separate entity.

The member will find that there will be people, and in our committee meetings I am sure we will hear from people, who will talk to both sides of that issue and who will be able to explore exactly why that balanced point in fact was taken.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member if he would take a moment to explain to me what will happen to those depositors and consumers as a result of the initiation of this legislation.

These are consumers who were accustomed, prior to this legislation, to two things: First, the kinds of regulations that imposed very strict guidelines on each of the pillars of the institutions which he has mentioned. Such regulation was made easy by the fact that each one of them was guided by a separate body of laws and regulations. Applying the regulations to one meant that regulations were being applied to the entire industry.

Second, what would happen to the depositors who had some security, but now, faced with new legislation, the depositors and trust and loan companies will find that the regulation and therefore the security is well blurred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In one minute, please, the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, you want a 10 minute answer in one minute.

Mr. Karygiannis: You have already taken 30 seconds.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I have already taken 30 seconds, the hon. member says.

I should point out first that the depositors are going to feel more secure with this legislation. The improvements to the increased powers to the superintendent should make him feel more secure. The demand that the internal control by companies to protect those same depositors should make them feel more secure as well.

The guidelines existed in previous aeons it seems like. It must be remembered that these are 70 years old and long overdue for a realignment. I believe that bringing them together so that all four pillars are in fact being guided by the same principles will be a dramatic breakthrough. It will be better for the banks. It will be better for the insurance companies. It will be better for the trust and loan companies and, most important, it will be better for Canadians.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I approach this piece of legislation with a great deal of trepidation because I think that the country has been waiting a long time for changes in the banking and financial institutions of this country. At this point in time we are not quite sure, after all this deliberation, whether or not this is the most appropriate piece of legislation.

The industry: banks, life insurance companies, trust companies, and loan companies, have been waiting for close to seven years for this legislation to be produced. There are all sorts of rumours on the Hill that this House is not going to continue, but is going to be prorogued soon. I hope that this is just not another false start for people in the industry. It is a great cost to the people dealing in the financial markets to have such insecurity attached to a piece of legislation and to see it introduced to the House at a time in which there is a great deal of doubt as to whether or not we will continue. It is unfair to those people who depend upon security and continuity in their operations.

The insecurity that has been there for the last seven years is reflected in a comment in a letter written to me by a life insurance company which is concerned about its own security. They were answering the question: Has the wait cost them anything? They responded:

> The truth of the matter is that the banks have had a field day compared to insurance companies. We have been waiting over 50 years for modernization of our legislation, while the banks have enjoyed regular decennial reviews which have expanded their powers each time. No stroke of the pen will make the field level. We have a lot of catching up required before any semblance of parity exists. Our industry is in some danger from both lack of modernization and from the banks getting even greater powers, including the ownership of insurance companies.

This concern still stands as we face this piece of legislation. For the past seven years everyone has been waiting for the government to present its great step forward. We have had several rumoured attempts in the past by this government. Either they lost the way or lost their courage in dealing with this critical issue.

Our financial institutions control billions of dollars in assets. Whether it is their savings in a bank account, or their financial security expressed through their insurance policies, the vast majority of Canadians use our financial institutions on a day-to-day basis. They demand that we have a system they can depend on.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, at this time, we find that our institutions are facing a great deal of external pressures to change. I think it is incumbent upon members of Parliament, when we are dealing with the modernization issue, to deal with it honestly and directly because those changes are taking place, whether we like it or not.

For example, I would like to list three or four factors which are really influencing the progress, or the lack of progress, in our financial institutions. First of all, the globalization of financial markets. In recent years financial institutions have undergone a massive transformation. This transformation has included the development of new financial instruments and practices for managing risks, broadening markets and improving access to funds. The increased use of technology has facilitated this transformation and has been stimulated by it.

The underlying factor shaping the transformation of financial institutions has been the globalization of markets. There are processes now in place that can handle up to 900,000 transfers in the banking system on a daily basis.

The globalization of financial markets has been driven by both the needs of borrowers and investors. For borrowers, corporations and governments alike, the request for the cheapest source of funds and a broadening of their borrowing base has been paramount.

For savers and portfolio managers, the incentive has been better investment opportunities and greater diversification of portfolios. These considerations have also driven financial institutions to take a more global view of their operations.

Canada has been very slow to adopt its financial institutions for this new international reality. Consequently, many are playing a smaller role than might have been expected and in what would appear to be their natural niche in international markets. Globally, many of our institutions are losing out to competition.

A second change taking place that affects all of our financial institutions is the implementation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Under this agreement, American banks have gained entry into Canada and had the limits removed on the growth of their assets. Their Canadian subsidiaries are no longer required to obtain approval of Canadian authorities before opening branches in Canada, so they enjoy the same opportunities as Canadian banks.

Another significant provision under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement is that which exempts U.S. Schedule II banks from the asset ceilings on the size of the foreign bank sector, thus improving the ease with which they can establish branches. Many of the banks feel aggrieved by this, as do the trust companies.

Perhaps even more important to the Canadian financial institutions is the second change taking place, and that is Europe in 1992. The evolution of the European Economic Community toward a full market integration will have tremendous impacts on the Canadian financial institutions. By the end of 1992, the 12 member countries of the community will become a single market for 320 million people within which individuals, goods, services and capital will be able to move freely as they do within their own respective nations today.

The service sector is a major part of the EC 1992 program. In this field, the banking directive is the keystone of the EC program. This will make it very, very difficult to have banks such as the ones in Canada get access to the European market. In the insurance sector, for example, the EC has made, and will make, a series of proposals to achieve a single European insurance market. The aim, as for banks, is to allow insurance companies to provide their service in the community on the basis of a single authorization.

In order to gain access to provide services in the European market, Canada will be under substantial pressure to grant to the Europeans the same privileges granted to the Americans under the free trade agreement, especially the exemption from the asset ceilings for European Schedule II banks.

A third factor affecting federal legislation is the recent provincial initiatives where the financial environment has been altered significantly since 1986 relating to the legislative programs of the various provincial governments. Several provinces, including Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and New Brunswick, have updated their legislation as it pertains to trust and loan companies. This has generally meant that provinces are in the lead in providing new directions for financial sector evolution. The most far-reaching provincial initiative is the Quebec blueprint for financial sector reform introduced in 1987.

The above factors underline the need for reforming financial institutions in Canada. There is no question about that. The question becomes one of what sort of principles should be involved and how should we approach this? I think that the principles that are very important for us to remember in the House are the principles of competition and independence. Are we increasing competition in the marketplace, are we maintaining the independence of the institutions? In many cases, as we move into a globalization process, we could become afraid that our national institutions do not have the size to compete, we may set aside the questions of independence and competition within the Canadian marketplace for these other values.

I can assure the House that we on this side are very, very concerned that that balance be struck. That is why we look forward to seeing this piece of legislation referred to the committee and discussed in detail because we want to make sure that all parties have an opportunity to be heard.

In dealing with the question of competition many people, as individual consumers, are afraid that as these institutions grow so large that their interactions with the banks, life insurance and trust and loan companies, become so impersonal that they are not able to control that interaction, that there is information out there that makes them afraid about how they are being treated. Many of us live in a world of information and we take for granted how our information is gathered and how it is exchanged. But for many people, it comes as a great surprise to find out that they thought they were doing one thing at a bank or a trust company, and find out that somebody knew something else about him as a result.

I have here a letter written by a retired executive in Winnipeg who came across the most unusual example of how banks use information. I will read part of that letter because I think it is very illustrative of the concerns of Canadians as they face these changes. It states:

> My bank recently contacted me by telephone noting a large cheque had passed my account in the name of an insurance company and inquiring if the bank was satisfying all of my requirements for financial services.
> Subsequently, I complained to a bank vice-president citing what I felt was a misuse of confidential information and unethical practice in using a record of banking transactions, unavailable to other financial institutions, to market the bank's own financial service. I was informed that a breach of confidence would only occur if the information was shared outside of the bank and the ethical question was a fine line in a very competitive world.

Nothing is more unnerving to a businessman whose business might be vulnerable in a time of recession, or to a family that might be paying a large mortgage, to feel that a banking institution knows its every move and has every piece of information. Part of the squeeze play that can be put on a consumer is the squeeze play of using that information to the disadvantage of the consumer whether he or she be a business person or a person running a family.

The House has to be conscious of our responsibility to ensure that as we move toward the modernization of the process, which we support in every way, we do not forsake or move away from the principle of competition among these institutions. For example, we welcome the decision of the government not to allow the banks to sell insurance because we think that it sets up a retail network that would be very hard for independent people to survive. The insurance industry itself is very concerned about this. I am sure it will welcome the legislation in that context.

However, the other part of the legislation contradicts that intention when the government says that it will allow the banking industry to become involved as owners of an insurance company. If we accept that part of the principle of modernization and every other field has been integration, the very fact that we are setting up a process which allows at an ownership level an integration of function, one would have to be pretty naive to assume that at the retail there would not be some products which reflect the integration.

The government has appeared to close the door on this issue, but I am wondering if it slammed it shut. Will we not see continuous pressure from the different associations which have something at stake here? We all know they are very active. Will they not come back to the government after this piece of legislation is passed and say: "We are all in this together. We have companies that do both businesses. We do not understand the rationale of why we cannot be involved in the leasing industry or in insurance selling"? Will it not just be a matter of time before we find another proposal on the table going back to the question of selling insurance?

Before this government came to power there was a different attitude to what changes would be necessary to ensure the solidity and security of our financial system. We wanted strong conflict of interest provisions and self-dealing rules. We wanted to guarantee the solvency of the players. The expansion of corporate powers into different areas of financial services was a secondary consideration, but the attitude has changed. Instead of protection for the consumer in the industry, the focus of this new legislation is exactly the opposite. It is expansion of concentration.

We have already seen what deregulation has done in other industries of national importance. For our airlines, deregulation has meant a reduction in the number of airlines and airline jobs, reductions in service for small centres, and over-all financial difficulties for the remaining carriers. The same could happen in the financial sector.

With the recent change-over to the fall schedule, I am sure all politicians from different regions in the House would join me in recognizing the fact that cities outside the Ontario-Quebec golden triangle are suffering greatly from the cutbacks in the airline industry. The reality that Canadians have to face is that the quality of the service being provided to many communities is nowhere what it was a few years ago.

Yet the basis of the argument for change is similar to the arguments that we face right here in the financial legislation: the arguments of globalization, free trade, and changes in the national economy. Those arguments we deal with here are the same technical arguments that we dealt with under airlines deregulation. We walked away from the principles of independence and the principles of competition in airline deregulation, and we have been badly hurt by it.

Will we even have two airlines in the 1990s? Can we imagine somebody raising that question in the House a decade ago, saying that we would only have one airline in Canada? That member would not have been respected or listened to for one minute. However, right now this government, because of its commitment to free markets, cannot protect two airlines. We will be left with only one. The government does not have any appreciation of what it means in the regions and of the lack of services.

Similarly, if the government does not apply the same principles in this legislation, companies trying to survive in regional markets, companies which have developed a segment or a focus in the marketplace will not be able to withstand the pressures from the big actors to take them over. They will not be able to recapitalize. They will not be able to take on the international markets because the rules within Canada will not be able to sustain their activities.

There are several companies which need the protection of the national government. That is why we have a national government, although it is not believed on the other side of the House. We have a national government to protect the public interest in Canada. While we respond to these international conditions and set up companies so they can compete internationally, we have to remember that our purpose is to make sure the consumer of Canada is dealing with companies which are both independent and able to survive, whether they are located in Vancouver, Winnipeg, or Halifax and that unlike the chartered banks they will have a regional focus in their activities.

There are many other issues to be raised but, if we take a look at some of these factors, we have reason to think that as we go through the consideration of this legislation, as we review the powers of the financial institutions, as we deal with the issues of closely held versus widely held ownership, commercial and financial linkages, foreign ownership and the regulations dealing with financial institutions such as self-dealing and solvency, we will find that it is a step in the right direction to have a piece of legislation in front of the House finally.

I must encourage the government to spend a considerable amount of time in front of the committee, to encourage witnesses to appear and to take these deliberations seriously. The purpose of the government is not to accommodate the financial institutions but to establish public interest. What is lacking in this proposed legislation is the clear establishment of public interest in favour of independents and competition.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a concern about the comments the member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed. First, on Air Canada and Canadian Airlines, I am not sure they would appreciate the obituary the member opposite just gave to one of them, suggesting that one of them was going to be gone soon. I for one would have to disagree with that, but I will leave that up to the airlines to decide particularly.

The hon. member carried on about withstanding pressures and about how one institution may have to compete with another institution, whether it be banks, trust companies, or insurance companies. He then commented on the purpose we should have in the legislation of protecting the interests of independents and of smaller concerns.

I would like to know the view of the Liberal Party. Very clearly in this proposed legislation there is protection for independent insurance brokers, of which we all have members in our ridings, in the municipalities we represent. We also have a tremendous number of car dealers throughout Canada. Each of us has one in our own riding. These brokers or car dealers contribute an awful lot to the community. Our proposed legislation has put in place protection to make sure that these independents carry on doing business and contributing to the communities in which they operate.

An hon. member: And the leasing dealers.

Mr. Soetens: The car leasing dealers, absolutely.

I would like to ask the member opposite: Does the Liberal Party support the protection of these small, independent brokers and car leasing companies throughout Canada, or does it believe we should remove that from the bill and let the banks rule?

Mr. Walker: Well, of course not. I take my direction from the minister from my home province.

• (1640 )

To go back to the question of Air Canada and Canadians, the reality is that it may be too soon to have an obituary; but it is not too soon to express concern about competition in that industry. To have two airlines essentially setting the pace and it almost being impossible for competitors to enter the market give us every reason to stand in this House and not wait until it is too late. I know the government would prefer to wait until it is too late, because then it can stand in the House and say that it has already happened and there is nothing it can do about it.

Of course we stand for the increased competition among independent insurance agents. Many families have built up multi-generational businesses through acting as independent insurance agents. They must be protected and therefore they must have products that they can put on the marketplace.

I do not know about you, Mr. Speaker, but the last time I looked the banks in Canada did not sell their products through independent agents. They sold their products through branches that they controlled. If we allow this system to continue, those branches will pick up every service they can. The principle behind this legislation, when it is finally passed, has to be to protect independent businessmen in every region of this country so that they can continue to survive.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, one wonders whether the hon. member for Ontario is representing the interests of Ontario in a national government which becomes more and more fractionalized, as we see through this legislation.

I wonder if I could draw the attention of my hon. colleague for Winnipeg North Centre who gave us a very thoughtful approach to the implications of this legislation, not only to competitiveness on a world scale but competitiveness in the four pillars of the financial sector, as he outlined. He also outlined what that competitiveness would do not only for the independents that operate in that business but, most important, the theme upon which he touched.

I noticed that the parliamentary secretary opposite a few moments ago suggested that the level of service, the quality of service and the security of service provided to depositors in trust and loan companies and banks should be the main focus of attention in this legislation. It should also be the type of regulations that will allow for the maximizing of opportunities that depositors and consumers would like to see from the four pillars of the financial sector.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, these issues are very important throughout the country, particularly in Manitoba. One of the last remaining independent insurance companies was Great West Life, which operated out of Winnipeg very successfully. Also the last remaining independent brokerage house in the country, Richardson and Greenshields, had its beginnings and its focus in Winnipeg.

An hon. member: And Wawanesa.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Wawanesa is another company. Winnipeg has a long tradition of building up financial institutions. Of course I know members from other parties who come from Manitoba would join with me in making sure that those companies remain strong and healthy through new legislation.

It is interesting how the changes sometimes go unnoticed, but I am sure the hon. member who just asked the question would be interested to know that in the last decade service charges in the banking system in Canada were introduced very quietly, obviously with the acceptance of the government. Canadian consumers now pay annually $3.1 billion, an average of $120 per person in banking charges. Those fees never existed before.

An hon. member: Isn't that disgusting? It is hard to believe it.

Mr. Walker: One of the greatest areas of expansion in banking profits in this country is from those services. We can see that if we allow that sort of development to continue without some questioning or without some movement on the part of the government to challenge them as to the need for this money, we will find ourselves to be victims again.

Consumers do not like their governments to be victims and to be feeling sorry for themselves. They like their governments to be strong. to show some purpose and to show some direction in protecting the consumer. Of course, as we see in the recent oil prices, the ability of the government to protect consumers is somewhat limited; but I am sure that the minister knows his responsibility and will be ever vigilant in protecting the Canadian consumer. That adventure is his commitment.

There are many other points I could raise, but I am sure the House wishes to continue so I will leave it at that.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C–83.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of State for Finance for finally going ahead with this important process. As we know, we have had several papers in the past, but this minister has really started the process. He has taken a pragmatic approach and not a theoretical one.

The major objective, as I see it, is to make our financial institutions more competitive for the benefit of consumers. The world of financial services has been changing rapidly for a few years, and we must change.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Finance covered what I think of as the marketing side very well a few minutes ago. He did that very thoroughly.

Today I am going to deal primarily with the elements of ownership proposals affecting banks, trust and loan companies, life insurance companies, property and casualty companies, and the like of credit unions.

The federal government does not propose that a single ownership structure be imposed on all federally regulated financial institutions, or that a total ban on commercial enterprises acquiring any financial institution be enacted. The issue has been debated at length by parliamentary committees, industry associations, financial institutions and their owners. Arguments have been made in favour of both widely held ownership and closely held ownership and it is apparent that no ownership model is correct to the exclusion of all others.

The proposed legislation thus puts forward a pragmatic approach by allowing both forms of ownership to continue to exist within a strengthened regulatory environment.

Let me take a few minutes to discuss our bank ownership proposals. The proposed revisions to the Bank Act would permit chartered banks to be either widely held, on a path to wide ownership, or directly owned by a widely held regulated financial institution.

For Schedule I banks, which include the six largest domestic banks, the revised Bank Act would maintain the current regime of wide public ownership. Wide ownership of banks prevails in one form or another in all western countries and in Japan. The policy would ensure that the big six domestic banks would remain widely held with no one person or group of associated persons owning more than 10 per cent of any class of shares.

The existing Bank Act permits a Canadian or a group of Canadians to start a Schedule II bank and own it on a closely held basis for the first 10 years after receiving a bank charter. After that time, it must become widely held. This provision would be maintained in the new Bank Act.

As well, the new Bank Act would continue to permit a foreign bank to apply for permission to establish a foreign bank subsidiary in Canada, designated as a Schedule II bank.

In the new measure, the proposed Bank Act would expand the Schedule II bank designation to include banks that are directly owned by, and continue to be owned by, widely held regulated financial institutions that are not themselves banks, whether they be Canadian or foreign.

Owners of such a bank could be widely held trust, loan or stock life companies as well as mutual insurance companies or widely held securities dealers. As is currently the case for foreign banks that wish to establish banks in Canada, one of the factors that would be considered prior to giving approval for a widely held financial institution to own a bank would be the presence and nature of non-bank activities operated by the parent of the proposed bank.

If the ownership of a Schedule II bank subsequently changes as a result of a takeover or of the parent bank by an unregulated entity, for example, the Schedule II bank would be required to be widely held within 10 years. If it wishes to remain closely held, it could convert to become a federally incorporated trust company.

As to the ownership of non-banks, the trust and loan company bill and the insurance companies bill will permit federal trust, loan and stock insurance companies to continue to be closely held and if sold, to be sold on a closely held basis.

A federal trust, loan or stock insurance company with $750 million or more in consolidated capital would be required, within five years, to take the necessary steps to ensure that at least 35 per cent of the total voting rights in the company are attached to shares that are widely held and listed for public trading on a Canadian stock exchange. A Canadian financial holding company or Canadian regulated financial institution could be eligible to meet the rule on behalf of its trust, loan or insurance company subsidiary.

Schedule I banks would automatically meet the 35 per cent rule by virtue of their 10 per cent ownership limit. The 35 per cent rule would not be relevant for Schedule II banks that are required by legislation to meet the 10 per cent wide ownership requirement within a 10 year period.

For other Schedule II banks, the 35 per cent rule would apply where a capital size of $750 million is reached because of the acquisition of a large domestic institution that, prior to the acquisition, was itself subject to the 35 per cent public shareholding requirement. A ministerial exemption from having to meet the 35 per cent requirement will be available for institutions that reach $750 million in capital through internal growth. Other situations, such as reaching the $750 million capital threshold through successive acquisition of a number of small Canadian financial institutions, would be examined on a case-by-case basis.

An extension of the five-year time limit would be possible where general market conditions warrant and the minister is satisfied that a company has used its best efforts to satisfy the rule.

The 35 per cent rule will ensure a significant public shareholding to provide a counterbalance to the influence of the majority shareholder. An element of broad public ownership can bring benefits in terms of ensuring market scrutiny and establishing the basis for sound, corporate government.

As for foreign ownership, the existing foreign bank regime will be maintained. However, the foreign bank guidelines will be modified to cover entry by non-resident widely held regulated financial institutions that are not banks, such as life insurance companies and securities dealers. In addition, the so-called 10/25 foreign ownership rules now found in federal legislation, which limit acquisitions of Canadian controlled financial institutions by non-residents, will be based on a broader definition of control.

As part of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, U.S. residents are not subject to the 10/25 rules. As noted previously, all significant changes in ownership of federal financial institutions will also be subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, who will consider a number of factors, including the best interests of the financial system.

An ownership approval process is an important element of the proposed ownership regime. At present, the Minister of Finance has the authority to approve all start-ups of federal financial institutions, but subsequent changes in ownership do not always require approval. It is proposed that this deficiency be corrected by requiring that significant changes in ownership of federal financial institutions be subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. This will ensure that a takeover is in the best interests of the financial system and that new owners have the expertise necessary to run a financial institution, adequate financial resources and sound and feasible plans for the future conduct and development of the business.

An investor will be required to obtain the approval of the Minister of Finance in order to buy shares of the financial institution that would result in the investor owning in excess of 10 per cent of any class of shares. Similarly, if an investor already owns more than 10 per cent of a class of shares and wishes to purchase additional shares, approval will be required.

Finally, an investor will be required to seek ministerial approval if that investor acquires control of a company that is linked to a financial institution and, as a result, there is a change in the significant ownership interest in the institution. For the ownership approval process, and generally throughout the legislation, control will be defined to include control in fact.

The proposed legislation will permit minor fluctuations in ownership to occur without requiring approval. As well, it will provide prospective owners with the opportunity to obtain pre-approvals so that they can make business decisions with certainty.

As announced on August 11, 1989, the new legislation would make the approval process for trust and loan companies effective as of that date.

I believe the ownership proposals will work to the benefit of both the financial industry and its customers. I ask that we move forward quickly with the proposed legislation before us today.

As a long-time member of the finance committee I want to say that we are beginning to hold hearings. The member for Ontario might correct me, but I believe the deadline for submissions is November 15. We will be consulting widely with all people affected, auto leasing companies, insurance brokers, banks, trust companies, and credit unions, because this is an important milestone in financial services in this country. We do not intend to get bogged down. Yes, we will consult. Yes, we will take ample time. But, given how quickly the world is changing out there, Canada needs to be competitive.

I think we can be tremendously proud of our banks. When considering what is going on in the United States these days with the trouble that certain banks there have been getting into with bad loan portfolios, look at our banks. They are very sound. Some people might have been a little afraid of the free trade agreement, but our banks, which are class banks, are going to be even more competitive in the U.S. market.

Look at what is happening down there in the savings and loan industry. They are in trouble to the hundreds of billions of dollars. Even though they are closely held, look at the trust companies we have that have been so well managed.

Our life insurance industry, as well as the property and casualty, is not without some problems but frankly, due to the good management, good personnel, and also due to the very fine and thorough inspection by the authorities in Ottawa of their loan portfolio, capitalization rates, and so on, those companies have kept Canada in the forefront by being very sound financial institutions.

I take exception to any person who thinks that we are opening doors for weakened financial institutions. I think it is just exactly the opposite. I take great pride in being a part of this process. I wish it had started three years ago, but it did not. We are into round one and I hope that all sides of this House will co-operate to enact the necessary legislation just as quickly as possible so consumers will have better deals out there and the financial institutions will be able to compete more effectively.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. When I look at a piece of legislation such as this, one of the questions I would like to ask is how does it helps the working man and working woman of Canada? Second, what evidence does he have that it will make us more competitive than U.S. banks, which is one of the points he has made? The answers to those two questions would be of great interest to me.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the question.

The Canadian banks in this country have approximately 7,000 branches, give or take a few hundred. They are about twice as well branched—if I could use that term—as banks in the United States. There is absolutely no risk that any U.S. bank—and mark my words, check it out in a few years—is going to come into this country and out-branch our fine Canadian system. Our banks have been well placed for years and will be able to service their Canadian customers very adequately, whether it is in a small town like Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan or in downtown Toronto. I believe the American banks will concentrate more on the commercial loan aspect and other things. So I do not have any doubt there.

This proposal supports the organization of our fine insurance brokers, thousands across the country with small independent agencies, who give personal service and have that expertise. No American will be able to compete. No new American will come in on that.

There are thousands of auto leasing dealers across the country. It is a type of service requiring expertise and personal service. This legislation supports them 100 per cent and they will also be able to compete.

As Canadians, with great respect, I think we often kind of hold our heads down—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Attewell: On a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, I did not finish the full 10 minutes of questions. With full consent of the House, might we continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent. We shall therefore proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS—MOTIONS

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

MOTION FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should table as quickly as possible the regulations made under the Official Languages Act passed by the House of Commons on July 28, 1988 and promulgated on September 15, 1988.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is dated April 10, 1989. It is over a year old. It is still current, however, because as you know, the government has yet to table the draft regulations for the new Official Languages Act that was adopted here in the House more than two and half years ago.

I would like to thank the hon. member for St. Boniface who seconded Motion no. 408, which asks the government to table as quickly as possible the regulations made under Bill C-72.

Mr. Speaker, I have an impressive chronology of this legislation which, as you know, was adopted by all parties in this House, by a majority of members present, and was unanimously supported by official language minority groups.

Bill C-72 was adopted here in the House on July 7, 1988. On September 15, 1988, more than two years ago, the Act came into force. However, Mr. Speaker, an act without regulations is a paper tiger. It has no teeth. Its teeth are the regulations. It needs regulations if people are to know how it is to be applied.

A few months later, on April 10, 1989, I tabled a motion, the same motion before the House today, asking the government to table its draft regulations. On April 11, in his 1988 Annual Report, the Commissioner of Official Languages asked that the regulations be tabled by the end of 1989. On April 11, I put a question in the House to the President of the Treasury Board, asking him to table the regulations, and if not, why not. His answer, Mr. Speaker, was that consultations were being held.

On October 12, I wrote a letter to Mr. Robert de Cotret, President of the Treasury Board, about the draft regulations, and I asked him again: when are we going to get the regulations? He answered my letter on January 26, 1990, saying it would be as soon as possible.

You need a lot of patience in this House, Mr. Speaker. You need a lot of patience if you want to get this government to act on issues as important as official languages.

On January 26, 1990, in a statement pursuant to S.O. 31, I again asked the government to table its regulations.

On February 2, I was back again with a question for the new minister, Doug Lewis, who informed me that he was working on it and that drafting regulations was a lengthy process.

On March 13, 1990, I put another question to the President of the Treasury Board. He told me what I already knew, that consultations were continuing, although everybody said that the consultations were over with. Everybody was saying that, Mr. Speaker. The minority language groups had been consulted, so I got in touch with them, I talked to them, and they told me it was all over with and they didn't know why the government was still hesitating. I don't either.

In his 1989 Annual Report, tabled on April 3, 1990, the Commissioner of Official Languages brought the matter up again. He said the delay was unacceptable. On April 3, 1990, I rose in the House again and asked the government about the regulations to implement the Official Languages Act, and the answer was again very vague: they were involved in consultations.

On April 4, 1990, the Commissioner of Official Languages threatened to resign, and I quote:

[English]

> So, as a protest against this current situation I am going to consider very seriously the possibility of tendering my resignation unless there are serious improvements because I am an officer of Parliament and I have not been appointed just to sit, watch and make annual reports.

Mr. Speaker, that was a statement made by the Commissioner of Official Languages on CHEZ–106 in Ottawa on April 4, 1990.

On April 4, the same day, I was moved again to ask the President of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Doug Lewis, if he would at least give me an answer and answer some of the letters I had been writing to the government, written to his predecessor, Benoît Bouchard, and Doug Lewis answered that the regulations were being formulated and that consultations were going on.

[Translation]

On April 4, 1990, I moved again, hoping that, in time, I would drive my point home. It is like driving a nail, you have to hit three, four, five times. The same is true of speed signs on the highways, Mr. Speaker. The "100 km speed limit" sign is not posted only at the beginning of the road, but every four or five kilometers. I told myself: "This government is either stubborn or deaf. Let's give it another try." So, I did again on April 10.

On June 14, 1990, the second report of the Standing Committee on Official Languages was tabled. It was not the report of Jean–Robert Gauthier, MP for Ottawa—Vanier, but that of the Committee on Official Languages, which is like the government made up of Conservative members. Still, they asked the government to table as soon as possible its draft regulations made under the Official Languages Act. We are still waiting, Mr. Speaker.

The government has a few more days, until November 11, to respond to that House Committee report. I would hope that, although they did not want to answer the member for Ottawa–Vanier, they will at least have the good sense and heart to answer a parliamentary committee which asked the government for a response within the allocated 90–day timeframe as to why the regulations have not yet been tabled.

Mr. Speaker, I wrote the Prime Minister. I wrote the newly appointed President of the Treasury Board on October 18 asking him to table the regulations. It is getting tiresome to keep writing ministers without ever getting an answer.

The Official Languages Commissionner tabled a special report on October 25, that is a mere five days ago, asking the government to table its draft regulations under the Official Languages Act. On the same day, my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce asked a question to the President of the Treasury Board because he too is interested in that project, like my friend from Saint-Henri—Westmount and all my colleagues on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker. We are all interested in seeing this legislation implemented. We have been waiting for two years and a half, and for two years and a half we have been told: be patient and we will get over many problems.

However, one of the problems is that all political parties have approved the regulations, but only one party is in power; it has the power to introduce these famous regulations so that we know why and how the legislation will be applied.

I want to simply remind the House of the purpose of the Official Languages Act. By the way, Mr. Speaker, recently, I read in an editorial a line that said: "Language justice delayed, language justice denied." I think that this is true. When you delay something, it is because you want to deny it eventually. Either you are unhappy, or nervous, or a little insecure. Therefore, I ask the government, again by way of a motion, supported by the member from Saint-Boniface, to table these famous regulations so that we can review them together and decide if they are going to work, because the Act contains some provisions that will allow members of this House to debate these regulations. And if these regulations are not suitable and 30 members want to oppose it, they can do it in this House. We certainly have to start somewhere, Mr. Speaker.

The Commissioner of Official Languages report tabled last week, October 25th, is a special report—something rather rare—and in this report the Commissioner criticizes the fact that some sections of the Official Languages have not been implemented. These are important sections, for example the one dealing with the number of Canadians needed for the federal government to provide services in either official language? Should it be 500, 1 000, 5 per cent, 10 per cent? Nobody knows, Mr. Speaker.

In my opinion, it is quite simple: one person is enough to warrant the provision of a federal service in a country which claims to be respectful of both its official languages, Mr. Speaker. All Canadian wherever they live should be able to communicate with the federal government, and I say federal government, and be entitled to receive in the language of his or her choice all necessary services, information and notices.

The Commissioner criticizes the lack of respect of certain fundamental rights of Canadians. He said, Mr. Speaker, that the failure of the government to issue regulations weakens the confidence of the public in the Canadian linguistic duality. And this is very serious! The refusal of the government weakens the confidence Canadians have in the linguistic duality, because nobody knows how the legislation applies. Even civil servants have received no new directives in two and half years, they do not know how legislation applies to them, what are their own rights, whether they have the right to work in their own language, English or French, and they work for the federal government. It seems to me that these are basic principles which have to be clarified, which must no longer be left in the dark.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the government response to the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages will be complete and logical, but above all I hope that between now and November 11, two weeks, the government will have enough courage to do what it has to do, and that is face up to its responsibilities and table the regulations in the House.

By way of example, the Canadian Parliament is debating a bill to levy a new goods and services tax in Canada. What a surprise, Mr. Speaker! We already have draft regulations stemming from a piece of legislation that has yet to be adopted by Parliament! But when it comes to the Official Languages Act and regulations, what is a two and a half years delay!

Mr. Speaker, the Official Languages Act is a fundamental piece of legislation in this country. And if the government has any intestinal fortitude, as I suggest it should have, it should be possible for it to produce the regulations concerning the Official Languages Act. But no! Would it be that monetary considerations take precedence over linguistic issues? I ask the question because— Of course, the answer is clear enough.

Mr. Speaker, denying access to linguistic rights—and I say this with all the sincerity I can muster, for the failure to produce the regulations is tantamount to failing to properly apply the Official Languages Act itself—is the same thing as telling Canadians that in their communities they are not entitled to have regulations and a law that are fair, equitable and applicable throughout the country.

My request is not more complicated than that, Mr. Speaker. It is quite honest and I dare hope that today this government will have enough guts not to tell us that it is involved in consultations right and left. It would not be telling the truth. The time for consultation is over. I know full well that there have been four different ministers over the past two and half years, that it is difficult to train a new minister, that departmental officials change constantly, that it is difficult for a minister to get to know all these matters, but I trust that the current minister will show fortitude and make sure that these regulations come out as soon as possible, Mr. Speaker, because it is urgent!

If the government is able to submit draft regulations dealing with the taxes Canadians will have to pay, it should be able to issue regulations dealing with the Official Languages Act! I therefore ask the government to respond affirmatively to this motion.

[English]

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to inform the House about the government's actions to implement regulations under the Official Languages Act. There has been some concern expressed about the time it is taking to put these regulations in place.

In addition to the parliamentary committee on official languages, the Commissioner of Official Languages, representatives of the minority official languages associations and others have urged the government to take action. Now the government is asked to table the regulations as quickly as possible.

The government has been moving as quickly as possible to bring these regulations before the House. The suggestion that the government is not moving quickly enough is based on misunderstanding about the process which must be followed.

In the 1988 Official Languages Act, Parliament set out in broad terms the course Canada will follow in official language policies and programs. The act sets out the right of the public to communicate with and receive services from offices of federal institutions in the national capital region and in other offices where there is significant demand for services in English and French and where the nature of the office makes it reasonable to provide these services in either language.

The act also sets out some very specific responsibilities, particularly for Treasury Board. The act directs that the Treasury Board take responsibility for the general direction and co-ordination of policies and programs for all federal institutions exclusive of Parliament for the implementation of the Official Languages Act. Treasury Board is also responsible for recommending regulations to cabinet. The President of the Treasury Board must present Parliament with a draft of any regulations that the Governor in Council intends to put forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our government is anxious to consult the public before adopting regulations which are likely to affect them. A preliminary consultation seems the best way to ensure that the regulations are workable, fair and equitable.

In 1986, the government developed a policy for the drafting and publication of federal regulations. When dealing with such basic issue for our society as the official languages, Parliament took a number of additional steps by including in the Official Languages Act the process to be followed for the adoption of the regulations. That is precisely what we are doing!

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to review the four main steps leading to the adoption of the regulations under the Official Languages Act.

The first stage is the most time consuming because all interested parties are supposed to participate into it.

To open the consultation process, the government publishes every year a statement of intention in its Federal Regulatory Plan, to inform Canadians of the regulations to be passed during the year.

In the case of the regulations made under the Official Languages Act, this document provides a short description of the general objectives and scope of each regulation.

As all hon. members probably know, a first series of consultations was held with representatives of both French and English communities throughout Canada to obtain their views on this matter. These consultations are compulsory under the Official Languages Act.

The proposals were then reviewed in the light of the views expressed in order to better reflect the needs identified during the consultation process.

• (1720)

Moreover, in keeping with the announcement he had made in this House, the previous President of the Treasury Board met with representatives of the two main umbrella agencies, namely the Federation of francophones outside Quebec and Alliance Quebec. He than knew for sure that no other propositions were better than the ones put forward.

Now that these preliminary consultations are over, the government can confirm to the members of this House that it is now ready to proceed with the approval of the proposed regulations as soon as possible and in the most appropriate way.

[English]

In the second stage of the process set out in the act, there is consultation with Parliament. This second stage, which is also unique, gives members the chance to study the regulations thoroughly.

To this end, the act says that the President of the Treasury Board shall lay a draft of the proposed regulations before the House of Commons. The act specifies that there must be 30 sitting days of the House before the draft regulations can be prepublished in the Canada Gazette. During the next 30 sitting days of both Houses of Parliament, the general public again has the opportunity to comment on the proposed regulations.

The regulations in draft form are made available to the public in Part I of the Canada Gazette which publishes them along with a description of their expected impact. The comments are studied. If they point out weaknesses or suggest improvements, the regulations can be changed.

Finally, the regulations are approved by cabinet and published in their final form with a final description of their expected impact in Part II of the Canada Gazette.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the process I have just described is a long and complex one. But in this way all Canadians have the opportunity to express their views on the regulations. That is something nobody should object to.

The process which allows people to make their views known about the regulations is not the only complex criterion we have to meet in order to develop the regulations made under the Official Languages Act.

The regulations themselves are particularly complex.

In the case of the Official Languages Act, we need regulations to make sure the law is applied in a fair, reasonable, and consistent way. To meet this triple goal, we have to examine such concepts as "significant demand", "nature of the office" and "services to the travelling public".

Although mention is made on the Act some general criteria to define more specifically concepts such as "significant demand", the regulations have to take into account contingencies that may not, and should not, be set out in the Act.

As for the "nature of the office", the regulations must take into consideration, for example, the health, safety and security of members of the public, as well as the location and activities of the office.

[English]

Hon. members will appreciate that the regulations must be uniform and fair legal definitions, which can accommodate various circumstances in all parts of this country. Such uniformity and fairness is not achieved quickly.

We know that the Treasury Board secretariat has been hard at work for more than a year consulting with minority language associations and holding discussions with federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations.

Regulations are being drawn up which reflect the linguistic realities of Canada and which are fair. The government should not apologize for the time it is taking. The government should not be rushed into preparing regulations in haste. The government should be given the chance to consult fully with interested parties.

The act ensures that all Canadians will have ample opportunity to comment on regulations that will contribute to a better service to the public across Canada.

I know that the government intends to propose regulations that are fair and reasonable. As a member of Parliament, this is an objective that I support. I trust that all members will lend the same support to these regulatory proposals once they have been placed before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect, normally there is a spokesperson for each one of the parties. In this case the Liberal Party member brought forward the bill, then the Conservatives responded. It is normally then the turn of the New Democrats.

I do not object to hearing from the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. He is always worth hearing from and he will get to be heard, but I think that is the normal round.

With no offence to him, I have to object on that so we do not create any big precedents here.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am the servant of the House. If it is agreeable to the Liberal opposition, I am prepared to recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not a matter of whether or not it is agreeable to other members of this House; we have to follow the procedures and the Standing Orders, the normal process here in this House.

When the normal process is followed, we have a Liberal, a Conservative and a New Democrat and then members of splinter groups.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think I will stand by my decision and immediately after I will gladly recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has the floor.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that in private members' hour now the rules that apply in ordinary debate do not apply and that you pick speakers as you see them.

Mr. Speaker, the motion presented by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier asks the government to table as quickly as possible the regulations necessary to implement the Official Languages Act of 1988 which was passed more than two and a half years ago.

Two and a half years have passed since this House voted on that bill and we still do not have the regulations. It is interesting to note that during that debate the Prime Minister stated that he was willing to have the House sit night and day in order to pass the legislation because it was essential for the country. Those were more or less the exact words of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the opposition to the bill at that time was not made by any of the opposition parties. The opposition came from certain members of his own party who were referred to by the press as dinosaurs. That opposition was there and the Prime Minister, wanting to get on with the business, said he would have the House sit night and day to pass the legislation because it was essential for the country.

I must ask what happened between those days in 1988 when the Prime Minister thought it was absolutely essential to get this legislation through and the two and a half years which have passed since. One wonders whether the dinosaurs within the Conservative caucus have grown in strength and have now more or less thrown obstacles in front of the government so that it does not have the political will to proceed with this legislation.

I refer to an editorial which was written in The Montreal Gazette of October 29, a few days ago, following the special report submitted to this House by the Commissioner of Official Languages. The headline in the Gazette editorial states: "Languages law languishes. Ottawa's delays are letting the country down". Then it goes on to say: "Linguistic justice delayed is linguistic justice denied".

We not only have the promise of the Prime Minister during the debate to implement this legislation quickly, but the Commissioner of Official Languages has pointed out in his recent special report in which he condemned the government for not implementing the legislation a whole list of promises by ministers of the government that we were going to get the regulations soon.

• (1730 )

On April 11, 1989, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the President of the Treasury Board said that the regulations would be tabled in the House before the end of 1989. That was a full year after the bill was passed. In any case, 1989 came and passed by, and we still did not see the regulations.

Then, on the first anniversary of the act, the Commissioner of Official Languages put out another press release on September 15, 1989 and asked what was happening, when were we going to see the regulations? Then again, in his famous annual report of April 3, 1990, the Commissioner of Official Languages felt he might have to resign because the government was in contempt of Parliament which had passed the law, and still there were no regulations to implement the legislation.

On the same day the President of the Treasury Board said that before June 23, before the summer, we would see the regulations. That was earlier this year.

The House adjourned at the end of June, the summer passed, and we still have no regulations. I might say that at the end of June the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages issued a special report, a unanimous report, including Conservative members of the committee, Liberal members of the committee, New Democratic members of the committee, and senators from both parties, requesting the immediate tabling of the regulations to implement the legislation.

The House came back in September, and we still have not had the regulations. I raised the question a few weeks ago in an adjournment debate and the parliamentary secretary came to the House and said: "Soon". Well, Mr. Speaker, soon is not good enough.

As a result, we see the Commissioner of Official Languages has once again condemned the government for its delays.

The minister, the parliamentary secretary and, again this afternoon, my hon. friend from Lachine have said that the reason is consultation. I have been in touch with the groups that were the subject of that consultation, and they say the consultation was over long ago.

When the Commissioner of Official Languages tabled a special report last week, he said in the press conference which he gave that he himself had been in touch with the groups, the Fédération des francophones hors Québec, Alliance Quebec, and the other francophone minority groups in the country, and they said that the consultations were finished. They do not understand what this talk is about consultation.

The reason is not consultation. We have no clear evidence. The reason appears to be a diminishing political will due to something that is happening within the Conservative caucus, but that is not reason enough.

While this delay has been taking place, we know that there has been a growing opposition to official bilingualism in this country, and that is unfortunate. Following the failure of the Meech Accord we have seen the growth of intolerance on both sides. Polls tell us that the majority of Canadians still favour official bilingualism, so the government should listen to those polls in this case. It should move ahead despite that growing opposition, but it is not showing the leadership.

The opponents to bilingualism are speaking out. I refer to groups such as APEC, the Association for the Protection of English in Canada, a unilingual, anglophone group which is anti-francophone, the Reform Party which has taken a position against the Official Languages Act, the COR Party, and certain Ontario municipalities which have passed resolutions against official bilingualism. That is on the anglophone side.

On the francophone side we have seen the Government of Quebec pass Bill 178, contrary to the court decisions at three levels in Quebec: the Superior Court of Quebec, the Court of Appeal of Quebec, and the Supreme Court of Canada. Yet the Government of Quebec introduced and passed Bill 178, contrary to the principles of good bilingualism. We have seen, as well, the growing strength in the polls of the Parti Quebecois and the emergence in this House of the Bloc Quebecois, groups which are not fully favourable to official bilingualism.

While this growing opposition to bilingualism has been taking place since the failure of Lac Meech, the government has not shown any leadership.

It introduced a bill in 1988. Every opposition party supports that bill. The only ones who oppose it are a few dinosaurs in the Conservative Party. We support the government's bill, and the government has not implemented it for one reason or another.

That is not good enough. I would hope that somebody representing the government would intervene. I know that my hon. friend from Lachine has intervened. He comes from the anglophone minority of Quebec, as I do, but we want somebody representing the ministry. We want somebody representing the Prime Minister who will stand in the House this afternoon and say: "We are going to introduce those regulations next week" and "we are going to move ahead with official bilingualism in this country".

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think, in the interests of the orderly conduct of this debate, there would be agreement in the House to hear next the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and afterward two members from the government side, beginning with the member for Témiscamingue if that is agreeable.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. I agree with that, since I am the next one to speak, but I do not need permission to be able to speak. As the third party the NDP should be speaking next.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no problem. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has the floor, and I thank him for his understanding and his collaboration.

[English]

An hon. member: Why two Liberals before the NDP? It is not fair.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my friend says: "Why two Liberals before the NDP? It is not fair". Don't worry, after the next election there will be two NDP for every Liberal.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say to the member who last spokes, my friend from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, that he put his finger right on it by saying that there is a diminishing lack of political will in the Conservative caucus. That is the only reason that we can see why this bill and its regulations are not being implemented. Everybody agrees. It is not a question of consultation.

The other matter that he underlined—and he has much experience in this area and is worth listening to in the House—was that there is a growth of intolerance in Canada. The member and I sat on that Joint Senate–House of Commons Committee on Official Languages when APEC, the Association for the Protection of the English Language, came before it. We could see the intolerance.

As the member pointed out, there is intolerance both on the side of the French and on the side of the English. It is not restricted to one side. The member spoke out eloquently at that committee meeting and asked some pretty pertinent questions. He has always taken the position that we have to fight intolerance, whether it is English or French, anywhere in Canada. I just want to underline that I totally agree with him on that.

The question as he raised it at the end is—and if he had more time he could talk more about it; maybe I will—who is speaking for Canada? Who is showing some leadership for this country? Who is trying to bring it together?

I watched the Prime Minister in Question Period. He spends a lot of his time making cheap points. "Well, that belongs to the responsibility of the last Liberal government", or "I can quote from Jean Chrétien who said" such and such, or "I can quote from Ed Broadbent" who said such and such, or "I can quote the member of Kamloops".

Those are cheap political points. I was ill at home last week in Vancouver so I watched television. I watched you on television, Sir, doing a superb job in your debut as deputy speaker. It is very interesting to watch this House for a bit. The Prime Minister should take a week off and go home and watch the House on television. Maybe he wouldn't be so smart-alecky and so quick to put down things rather than explain things to the Canadian people and show some leadership.

Let me deal with a couple of points in this debate. First of all, to the member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, the Conservative member who spoke for the government, I was going to say: Murder your speech writer, but that is a little too much. Take your speech writer out, he or she, and just hit them over the head a little bit. Wake him up. Get rid of it. Tear up the speech.

• (1740 )

The hon. member is thoughtful and gives good speeches, but what an apology for bureaucratic inertia. It is one of the worst apologies I have heard. He said that the government has moved as quickly as possible. Is this moving as quickly as possible? This government makes a tortoise look like A. J. Foyt, the racing driver, it moves so slow. A tortoise moves quickly compared to this government.

Have you ever heard of Mackenzie King, Mr. Speaker? He used to be famous as a Canadian politician who always put off decisions. Sir John A. Macdonald, "old tomorrow" they called Sir John A. Macdonald. This government makes Sir John A. Macdonald look faster than a speeding bullet in making a decision, or Mackenzie King, because it simply is not making any decisions in this area.

The hon. member says that we are misinformed and that he will inform the House. It is not just us who are misinformed. Tell that to the Commissioner of Official Languages who does this job full time and is expert at it. He says that the government is dragging its feet.

What a pitiful excuse in that speech for bureaucratic dilly-dallying. He spoke of consultations and revisions. I made notes of this. Three times he spoke of revisions and he made four mentions of consultations, the first stage of consultations. Then there was the second stage of consultations, and no doubt there will be the third stage or the fourth stage.

MPs can study it and it can get in The Canada Gazette. It just goes on and on and on. The bureaucrats are fiddling while Canada is burning. We should get down on our knees and ask God, he or she, to say to the government: "For God's sake, show some leadership in this country".

This is not an unimportant area; this is a very important area. Let me just recap the motion and give a viewpoint from the New Democratic Party on this motion. The motion is that in the opinion of the House, the government should table as quickly as possible—

"As quickly as possible", in the other official language.

[English]

—the regulations made under the Official Languages Act passed by the House of Commons on July 28, 1988 and promulgated on September 15, 1988. This is October 30, 1990, and we are still waiting.

The background of the issue is as follows: Bill C-72 was passed in the House on July 20, 1988. The government has not presented the regulations required to put the bill into force. That is the way legislation like this works.

This spring, in the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, there was a condemnation of the government for its failure to act. This matter was a principal issue at a hearing by the Joint Senate-House Committee on Official Languages.

Mr. Fortier of Alliance Quebec, the Fédération des francophones hors Québec and even APEC, the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada, participated. Toute la gang was there.

Last week, Mr. d'Iberville Fortier, the Commissioner of Official Languages, issued a special report into the government's failure to enforce the Official Languages Act, 1988. He said in part: "If we want to make our country go on, the least we can do is make sure acts of Parliament are respected. Two years later this act still does not have teeth. These delays may well endanger the linguistic progress made in federal institutions over the years".

We may go backward as a result of not having these regulations. Mr. Fortier justified this extraordinary action, because it is, by noting that if the regulations were not tabled soon, providing 30 working days for Parliament to study them, they cannot be published—and the member should listen to this—in The Canada Gazette. If the House prorogues, as this House might, we will have even further delays.

It is therefore fortunate that this motion has come forward for debate at this time. I congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for bringing it here.

I will not debate the substance of Bill C–72 or why the regulations are needed. I think the heart of the matter is why the government is not delivering here. What is, as Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once called it, the inarticulated major premise? In other words, what is stopping the government? None of this gobbledegook that the member across gave. What is the real reason? This legislation has faced strong opposition from a number of groups who have never accepted the need and support for official language minorities, and have never accepted a bilingual Canada.

I think both these groups are represented within the Conservative caucus; nationalists from Quebec, and what my friend called dinosaurs from English Canada. It seems to me that the Prime Minister is afraid to take on these groups in the name of a higher cause, namely the unity of Canada.

I will give you an example of where the government is going. Tomorrow we are going to debate a bill on broadcasting. The government has withdrawn a clause which states that the CBC has to promote national unity, because national unity is a dirty word now for this government. I ask, where is the vision in this country of Henri Bourassa or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who believed in a society of tolerance and believed in bilingualism from coast to coast where people at least had a right to be served and communicate with their government in their own language. That is all that the official languages does. It implements that vision, which is limited if anything.

I do not understand why the government is not bringing this in.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this year we celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. The vision expressed in this report's recommendations have had a tremendous impact on the history of this country. The central recommendations of the report, the principle that official languages minorities in Canada should be assured to get public services in their mother language, the idea that French as much as English should be a working language in Canada, were reflected in the Official Languages Act of 1969. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is in the legislation in question today.

[English]

The government is celebrating the twenty–fifth anniversary of the Laurendeau–Dunton report on bilingualism by taking a step backward. The Prime Minister said these regulations will be tabled at the most precipitous moment. For whom? When? It seems to me that there is a clear lack of leadership here.

Let me conclude by saying this. The government is endangering the whole policy of official bilingualism. The government is leading to more intolerance. It is growing in Canada on the part of the English and French and on the part of extreme groups like the Bloc Quebecois on one side and the Reform Party on the other. Who speaks for Canada? We need vision in the leadership of this country. Sometimes it is tough. Sometimes you have to face down the bigots. It is not easy to say that to some people in Canada. We want these regulations. We want them now.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest, as co–chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages, that I participate in today's debate. I would like to take this opportunity to mention the names of my collegues who talked sooner today, that is the members for Ottawa—Vanier, Notre–Dame–de–Grâce and Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis, because they are people with whom we work regularly in committee and who really strive to protect the interests of the French and English minorities in Canada. I believe we must recognize the good work done by my collegues on the committee.

The member for Ottawa—Vanier gives us the opportunity with the motion he presents today and which says: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should table as quickly as possible the regulations made under the Official Languages Act passed by the House of Commons on July 28, 1988 and promulgated on September 15, 1988", to show how this government has fullfilled its obligations regarding official languages in this country.

Having been a member of the Joint Committee on Official Languages, the member for Ottawa—Vanier knows full well that these last few years, since 1986 or 1987, it is the minority groups who complain during the committee hearings that the law had become ineffective. It is a law on official languages, one must recognize, which was adopted in 1969 by the then liberal government, and which, over the years, has become ineffective.

I have a question for the member for Ottawa—Vanier, who strives so much to protect the interests of the French and English minorities in Canada.

• (1750)

For 15 years, he witnessed the ineffectiveness and the degradation of the Official Languages Act. Why did he not ask his government at that time to bring in regulations to give teeth to the legislation? No, Mr. Speaker, Canadians had to wait until 1984 when the Progressive Conservative government was elected. We promised major changes and reform of the Official Languages Act and we delivered. The Act was amended with the support of all parties in the House and with the support of all groups of society. The new act that our government put in place in 1988 was hailed by both the English and French media and by everyone else.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that when you talk about something, you have to put it in the right historical perspective. For 15 years, our linguistic minorities had to live under an act which had major flaws and shortcomings that we spent sitting after sitting denouncing at the Official Languages Committee. We acted and, as a result, we have an effective legislation. It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that the absence of regulations does not preclude the application of the Act. This Act is in effect since September 1988.

Every French-speaking citizen living within an English-speaking majority and every English-speaking Canadian living in a majority French-speaking community is entitled to be tried and to work in the language of his or her choice. Minorities have the right to equitable participation at work and have rights before the courts that they did not enjoy under the previous legislation, Mr. Speaker. At the present time, any citizen, with the help of the Commissioner of Official Languages, can lay charges against any federal institution or any organization that does not comply with the Act. Those are some of the positive aspects we included in the new legislation.

To get back to the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on June 14, as Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the House and the Senate, I tabled, and I will read it to you, a report by our committee asking the government to produce its regulations as soon as possible, Mr. Speaker, and I may point out that according to Standing Order 109, the government has 150 days to do so. As the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier mentioned, this period ends on November 11, and since November 11 is a holiday, as the House is aware, it means that the actual deadline is November 9. Personally, I am convinced the new President of the Treasury Board will table his response to our report by November 9, and that this response will involve the tabling, very shortly, of those long-awaited regulations.

I think the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier mentioned that he respected and trusted the new President of the Treasury Board. Mr. Speaker, you realize he was sworn in on September 20, 1990, barely a month ago. When we consider the importance of his department, of the position of the President of the Treasury Board who has to look after the Public Service and all the departments in terms of their budgets and human resources, and when we consider that the new President has already given the new regulations some thought, I think this shows he is genuinely committed to going ahead with the regulations. Opposition members would probably have liked the President of the Treasury Board to hastily table regulations totally unknown to him as soon as he was sworn in. regulations totally unknown to him. Those who know the hon. member from Quebec City see him as a reasonable and responsible man who wants to have a thorough knowledge of the issues before he makes a decision. Is it to much to ask to give him a month to study the regulations we are about to table? I do not think so. In due time, the President of the Treasury Board will make his position known and I am sure it will be along the lines of the commitments made by the Prime Minister and our members to our official language minorities.

Mr. Speaker, 150 days may seem like a long time. Our report was tabled on June 14, and the government has 150 days or about five months to answer. Let us have a look at what happened since then. Our report was tabled on June 14. Two weeks after that, the House adjourned for the whole summer. We returned on September 24. We have been here for a little more than a month, Mr. Speaker. So chronologically, I think the two-year delay that has been mentioned can be explained easily in the light of what I have just said. Two years may seem like a rather long time, but above all it proves one thing, that there has been consultation, as the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier said, even too much of it, but the fact we consult the population when we legislate has been one of the characteristics of this government.

Contrary to what Liberals did for a long time, we do not practise a policy of confrontation with the provinces and the Canadian society. We practise a policy of consultation and dialogue. Maybe we are making too many consultations, it is possible, but it is better to consult wisely in order to bring forth a beautiful baby, Mr. Speaker, a good regulation which will be long lasting and will satisfy the different official language minority groups in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I could speak at length of the consultation process, I could mention all the organizations—There are thirty-six associations for official language minorities in the country. They have all been consulted, and not only once, but twice, Mr. Speaker. The first time was during the 1989 summer, when the Office and Treasury Board officials drafted the first bill. We were determined to consult every one of these organizations across the country, to know for sure what they really wanted. Then, we took note of their demands and we went back to see them, Mr. Speaker.

Therefore, this shows how concerned and how serious the government has been about these regulations. Mr. Speaker, I see you are trying to tell me that my time has expired. I just want to say that I am convinced that the President of the Treasury Board will follow up on that demand in accordance with our committee's report and that we will soon have good and lasting regulations which will meet the needs and expectations of the minority groups in this country.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Halifax West. You have two minutes.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that is time enough to make a few points on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board who is the minister responsible for the implementation of the Official Languages Act.

First, let me confirm the support of the Government of Canada, particularly the Prime Minister, to the policy of official languages in Canada. It was the government of the Prime Minister that brought in the Official Languages Act and improved the language law in Canada in 1988.

That is not all. As late as February of this year, 1990, the Prime Minister rose in this House and proposed a motion that this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada as reflected by this House in the Constitution amendment and the Official Languages Act of 1988.

There is no wavering in the concern and in the support for official languages policy from the Prime Minister or the Government of Canada.

I want to point out to members of the House some matters that transpired in this debate. We heard the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce talk about the turmoil in Canada over language and other constitutional matters.

In the midst of that turmoil do members want to create more havoc by creating more uncertainty and difficulty? The prudent course is the slow course: the course by which we examine carefully the language proposals; by which we make sure there is consensus across Canada to those proposals. That is what the minister is doing.

I remind the very members who spoke in this debate that they approved the complex procedure under the Official Languages Act that is required to be followed so that there will be consensus to the ultimate regulations. That is why we have consultations. That is why we have a specified period for examination and re-examination in the House of Commons.

All members supported that process, and now they cannot deny the results of it. The President of the Treasury Board, the Government of Canada, will proceed with the implementation of the regulations. And the regulations will be acceptable to the great majority of people in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, on April 3, 1990, I rose in the House to ask a question of the Minister of Justice regarding gun control legislation in Canada.

When I rose in the House in April to address the urgency of gun legislation, the country was reeling in the aftershocks of the massacre at the École Polytechnique in Montreal. Concerned Canadians were shocked and horrified by the senseless murder of young women by a man who should have been denied access to a firearm. Canadians across the country then turned their outrage and sorrow to action. On April 9, 1990, a petition bearing the names of over 500,000 Canadians was presented to Justice Minister Kim Campbell. The message was clear. Canadians want tougher gun control legislation.

On June 26, 1990, the Minister of Justice introduced a comprehensive package to strengthen the control of guns in Canada. The proposals provide a minimum waiting period for a FAC, a provision for two references who have known the applicant for at least three years, national firearms safety training courses, mandatory testing for would-be gun owners, and the establishment of a Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms.

The need for a balanced approach when dealing with the issue of gun control is essential. I want to make it clear that members of gun clubs are, for example, not the problem. I visited the Sharon Gun Club last fall and I was very impressed with their safety regulations. I do not want those good law-abiding citizens unduly harmed or inhibited by any gun control legislation.

For example, the proposal to limit the magazine or clip size to 5 and 10 for certain firearms is totally impractical. While it is important to recognize the rights of the responsible and legitimate firearm owner, legislation must deal harshly with criminals, gun dealers, and others, using or trading illegal or unauthorized firearms.

Stiffer sentencing, one of the important parts of the new proposed legislation, is essential to protect the public from attacks and murder by criminals. We should also consider additional years in jail if a firearm was used in a criminal act.

Since 1978 when tighter gun control legislation was introduced, the number of robberies, homicides, accidental deaths, and suicides involving guns have all decreased. There are about 1,400 firearm deaths each year. However, almost 85 per cent of these deaths were suicides. Homicides totalled approximately 180 deaths.

While these numbers tell us violent crimes involving firearms are decreasing, crimes still occur that could be prevented through tougher legislation. A case which I believe demonstrates the urgent need for tighter gun control laws is the attempted deportation of Robert Cave.

Robert Cave was sentenced to seven years in prison for several armed robberies in 1981, including the brutal and threatening attack of a 21-year old woman who was managing the McDonald's restaurant he robbed. This woman was terrorized by Cave who at the time was high on drugs. He shoved the nozzle of his pistol up her nose as well as using other threatening gestures. Robert Cave was given only two years for the use of a firearm in the commission of the robbery, in spite of his past criminal record and the obvious brutal way in which he used the weapon.

Those convicted of an offence involving firearms should pay through hard time. We must make the country safe for all abiding and upstanding citizens. More care and compassion must be directed to the victims of violence.

There is another aspect of our justice system which must be changed in order to better protect our citizens. I am referring to our extradition laws.

Charles Ng fled the United States five years ago to escape prosecution and still remains in Canada. Charles Ng, a former U.S. Marine, was charged in California with the sex slayings of 13 people, allegedly committed between 1984 and 1985. In 1985, following a month-long international man-hunt, Ng was apprehended in Calgary after a bungled shoplifting attempt. Five years have past since his arrest in Alberta and Ng still remains in Canada fighting an extradition order thereby escaping prosecution in California.

I think it is possible that Canada could become a haven for criminals such as Ng, criminals who, facing the prospect of a death penalty, flee to Canada to escape prosecution. Because of Canada's close proximity to the U.S. and its long, continuous border affording many opportunities to flee, this notion is quite real.

We must not only toughen gun legislation but all legislation dealing with criminal justice. It is absurd to think that people such as Cave and Ng have more judicial options and opportunities available than does a Canadian citizen who is accused of committing a crime. Let us stand up for the right of all Canadians to live in a nation which provides them a sense of security and well-being. Our laws must provide more protection for society and a greater sensitivity to the victims of violence and their families.

In closing, I want to say that I held a town hall meeting in Stouffville last Saturday morning, October 27, 1990, to hear the views of the residents of my riding regarding the proposals to strengthen gun control in Canada. There were almost 40 people in attendance. I was assisted by three panellists: Norm Gardner, Vice-Chairman of the Metropolitan Police Commission; David Brown, a former police officer and a sports shooter; and Morton Greenglass, a lawyer and legal expert on gun control and a sports shooter as well. A number of good constructive recommendations were proposed, and I will be presenting many of these to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, since I only have three minutes available to me, I will address the member's first concern, which is that of gun control.

I would like to say that the Minister of Justice shares the concerns of the hon. member. She is certainly aware of the strong desire among members of this House and the Canadian public for effective gun controls.

Gun control is a very complex issue. Many of our northern and aboriginal citizens, for instance, require firearms for their livelihood. We must try to balance the concerns of all Canadians about public safety with the legitimate interests of the responsible law abiding firearms community.

It should be pointed out that Canada already has one of the best gun control systems in the world. It has also been pointed out that more can be done.

It has been demonstrated that some types of firearms, those of a military nature, have become a problem since the law was last amended.

Bill C-80 represents a considered response to these concerns that will help assure the safety of the Canadian public with the least possible interference in the interests of legitimate and responsible gun owners.

The previous Minister of Justice, who is now Minister of Transport, had the benefit of extensive consultations with the provinces and many firearms interest groups during the summer of 1989. The present Minister of Justice intends to pursue the consultation process as the bill proceeds through Parliament. In particular, the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms is being set up to give members of the firearms community and other interested parties access to the consultation process.

The intent of the amendment proposals is to address a number of concerns that have arisen since the law was last amended in 1978. Some of these have to do with the screening of applicants for firearms acquisition certificates and other documents.

It should be kept in mind that some types of firearms present a risk because they have a design or firepower that cannot be justified with any legitimate or socially useful purpose in mind.

Our problem is to make a distinction between those firearms that have a legitimate sporting and hunting purpose and those that do not. This is what Bill C–80 attempts to address.

I can tell the hon. member that the consultation process that was begun by the prior Minister of Justice will continue. I am looking forward to this piece of legislation getting into committee so that we can hear some other concerns of Canadians who have taken an interest in this area.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give a little further information and perhaps a little more in–depth questioning on a question that I asked in this place on October 2.

I asked two questions. I am not sure to which one the parliamentary secretary will be responding this evening, but I am going to address both those questions because that is what I put in for.

The question I raised that day dealt with the advance collection of the goods and services tax. The particular case in point was a lady in Halifax County who had prepaid a ticket to Florida, and the travel was to take place in April of next year. She was absolutely astounded when Air Canada called her back and indicated that she not only had to pay in advance of the ticket, which she fully expected, but she also had to pay in advance the 7 per cent goods and service tax. That lady was incensed, as she should have been. She called my office, she went to the media and she said: "This act is not yet law and not only is it not yet law, and the government and the bureaucrats will come up and tell me reasons why they can still collect it, but my goodness, it is facing the fight of its life in the Senate of Canada". Eight–five per cent of Canadians have consistently been opposed to this form of taxation. Surely to goodness the government is not going to tell consumers across this country that they have a legal obligation to pay that 7 per cent goods and services tax in advance of January 1 or whenever that act becomes law. Hopefully it never becomes law.

I asked the Minister of National Revenue if he would give us an unequivocal statement, to stop trying to dance around the issue, on whether or not he had instructed businesses across Canada that they had no legal obligation to demand from a consumer that tax be paid in advance of January 1.

With the glibness and smugness of this Minister of National Revenue, he got up and said: "No, I won't because I have done that on August 9". If he did it on August 9, he certainly should have done it again the day I asked because in the next few days the media was full of reports of outraged consumers from coast to coast in this country who had been told by this government that they had to pay the 7 per cent goods and services tax in advance. The minister likes to have it both ways.

This government has spent over $30 million. It is a lot of money, hard–earned money that has been taken from the taxpayers of this country, $30 million to put out propaganda, some of which has been found to be false and misleading by the Advertising Standards Council of Ontario dealing with this proposed, wonderful great thing that the government is trying to foist upon the Canadian public called the goods and services tax.

Instead of doing his job, the Minister of National Revenue refused in his next propaganda mail–out to big, medium and small business in Canada to tell those businesses that they had no legal right to collect in advance the goods and services tax. He did not want to come forward and do what he should have done under the law and tell those businesses that they had no right.

My second question that day was to the minister who was supposedly responsible for consumer interests, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I said: "My goodness, are you going to do the right thing? Are you going to do what your job is and protect the interest of consumers and ensure that they know that they have no legal obligation to pay in advance the 7 per cent goods and services tax?" He was mute. He was silent. He was in the House that day but he was mute and he allowed it to go back over to the Minister of National Revenue.

I am going to tell you, Mr. Speaker, it will be a sorry day for consumers in this country when it is the Minister of National Revenue who is looking after the interest of consumers. It is supposed to be the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but, again, that minister did not do his job, not just for the lady in question in Halifax county who found it repugnant that she was being forced to pay a 7 per cent goods and services tax on the advance purchase of airline tickets, but for every consumer in this country.

I asked that day in my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs how he could in all good conscience have sat at the cabinet table and allowed the government, the cabinet of the day to approve expenditures, a multi-million dollar series of expenditures to put out propaganda to the Canadian public, to the consumers of Canada which he knew to be false and misleading. If he did not know at the time, he should have listened to the Advertising Standards Council this summer when it said that the radio ads that were paid for, not by members of the government, anybody out there who is watching, but by your tax dollars. The government was trying to fool Canadian people and do it with their own money, for goodness sakes.

I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that day whether he was prepared to do the right thing and dissociate himself from the propaganda campaign of this government. As I said, he remained mute.

The Canadian public has not decided that they are going to lay down and die on the goods and services tax. The latest poll that is out, it was just one poll. I guess I could not quote it with a great deal of authority, but it is one of a series of polls that have been done since this government embarked on that dangerous path for Torydom called the goods and services tax. Every single poll that has been taken regionally or nationally shows that this government is out to lunch in its pursuit of the GST. Maybe if the government was supported by 51 per cent of Canadians, but 85 per cent did not like the tax, you might say, "Well, maybe it is a passing fancy".

• (1815 )

The numbers speak for themselves. Seventy-five per cent of Canadians in the last poll that was done said that they were absolutely, fundamentally opposed to this regressive, crazy, insane tax, called the GST, particularly at a point in time when this government's policies have driven the economy of the country into recession.

The only lower approval rating for any issue that was in the poll was for the popularity of this government. Only 15 per cent of the respondents said that they supported this band of rascals opposite in their pursuit of fiscal and social policy.

It becomes clear that this government has lost the moral authority to pursue policies that are not supported by the majority of Canadians. I would hope that I am going to get a better answer tonight from the parliamentary secretary, as he licks his lips waiting to get up and give us the answer.

I want to know from the parliamentary secretary why is it that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not look after the interests of consumers? Second, why is it that the minister responsible for Revenue Canada, since he is sending all kinds of propaganda out saying what a great tax this bad tax is, did not tell the businesses of Canada that they did not have a legal obligation nor a right to collect this tax. Why, if it was so complicated, did the government not forego that little bit of tax that would have been paid in advance for the first two or three months of next year and protect the interests of the consumer, and, for once, protect the interests of Parliament and the parliamentary process?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will answer on behalf of the Minister of Revenue but not on behalf of the Minister of Consumers and Corporate Affairs.

I would now like to give a more detailed answer to the questions asked by the hon. members for Dartmouth and Scarborough West about the requirements under the proposed GST that apply to businesses getting paid after August 1990 for goods and services to be received after December 1990.

[English]

Let me first say that, in advance of Bill C-62 receiving Royal Assent, collection of the GST for transactions straddling the transition date is strictly voluntary and is suggested as a matter of convenience for the consumers and the businesses involved. In fact, under the legislation, the vendor will not be required to remit any GST collected until the first GST return for 1991 is due.

[Translation]

On August 9, 1990, the Minister issued a press release to remind businesses of the interim provisions of Bill C-62. This release stated that businesses supplying goods and services to be delivered after 1990 will be accountable, effective January 1, 1991, for the proposed 7 per cent GST on advance payments made between September 1, 1990 and January 1, 1991.

Even though the Minister was urging businesses to follow the interim regulations contained in the proposed legislation, he clearly stated that, in these cases, collecting the GST on the 1991 part of the contract was not yet mandatory.

[English]

The decision on whether to charge or pay GST on invoices issued on or after September 1, 1990, for goods or services to be delivered after 1990 is a matter for vendors and their customers to decide. However, I can appreciate that in many instances this would be the most convenient and least costly approach to take.

[Translation]

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, the government is continuing to emphasize that there is no legislative authority to enforce collection of the GST until the legislation is effective. At the same time, we will continue to encourage businesses to be prepared to account for the tax due on prepaid supplies.

If I have 10 seconds left, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

I will repeat the last paragraph in English for my colleague.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, the government is continuing to emphasize that there is no legislative authority to enforce collection of the GST until the legislation is effective. At the same time, we will continue to encourage businesses to be prepared to account for the tax due on prepaid supplies. Mr. Speaker, I hope that answers my friend's questions.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on October 17, I pointed out to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that refugee claimants in Canada, who have already been hurt by their experiences that caused them to seek refuge in Canada, were studied in a survey by a team of church people, under the direction of psychiatrists, and 58 per cent were found to be in deteriorating mental health. Their mental health was worse since they came to Canada than it was when they arrived.

Why? One of the reasons is the difficulty in getting jobs. They cannot get a work permit until the first hearing, which is often delayed. Even then, it is often a limited work permit and, even then, employers say: "Well, we do not know if you are permanent here because you have not had your second hearing". There is anxiety about their futures and, worst of all, there is separation from their families. Usually husbands and fathers here are separated from their wives and children overseas.

One man came to my office two weeks ago who had been here six years. His wife died overseas, while waiting for him to bring her here. His children wrote to him and said: "You have killed our mother, now you are going to kill us. Why will you not bring us"? There is nothing he can do. This government will not let him have his case decided, and will not let him bring his family here until his case is decided. Even after his case is decided, he must wait a year for landing and then wait some time after that for the processes of immigration.

I asked the minister what steps were being taken to end this torture, this misery. All she could say was that 50 per cent of the cases have been opened in the refugee backlog. After 21 months, since the program was announced, 50 per cent have been opened. Not 50 per cent resolved, 50 per cent opened. She did not give us any indication whether they will really be able to finish it on time, a year from now, as they promised.

I asked her for an amnesty. I have never asked that of the minister before but, because of this terrible situation, I asked her to land all the people in the backlog so long as they meet the health and security standards which are required by the legislation.

There are many, many of those people who are skilled, many of them who have one of our official languages, and they are able to settle readily. Whether we consider that they were cheaters or whether we consider they were real refugees, it is time to stop torturing them and it is time to stop breaking down the immigration system by pouring staff into that useless project. Expensive staff, adjudicators, translators, lawyers, and so on are having their time wasted while the minister pursues that project.

The Canadian Council of Churches presented this matter in a brief to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, under article 40 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It was reported today in The Globe and Mail that the UN committee was very concerned about what Canada was doing. The council pointed out to them that Canada is now giving priority to processing claims of English-speaking applicants from the Caribbean, forcing many applicants from other countries of severe persecution to wait years before their claims are handled, and they can attempt to bring over family members.

The UN committee expressed, and I quote, "grave concerns about Canada taking people out of order, by virtue of language, and processing their applications first". An expert Toronto lawyer, Ms. Jackman said, and I quote:

> —a study by the inter-church committee shows that "people become suicidal" when they are in limbo for five or six years without a determination on the outcome of their refugee application.

The brief proceeded under four articles of this covenant. One is there should be "no cruel or inhumane treatment" and "committee members suggested that these long delays to people who had already suffered trauma could be a form of cruel treatment". That is article 7. Under article 14 of the covenant, everyone shall have a "fair trial, committee members expressed concern that delays were not consistent with a fair trial and questioned the independence of the Immigration and Refugee Board".

• (1825)

Under article 23, protection of the family, "committee members were concerned about delays in reuniting families". Under Article 26, against discrimination, the committee members asked questions which "left no doubt that singling out English speaking Caribbean claimants was to be viewed as discrimination".

Today, the minister denied that that is being done, but I have spoken to many people in Toronto and I find that church representatives and lawyers in private practice—this government usually likes private practice rather than government. It wants to privatize everything but it attacks the lawyers in private practice if they do not kowtow to the government.—are finding that their clients are having their cases set back if they are not from the Caribbean in order to move Caribbean cases ahead.

It is also being observed that most of those who are currently being processed are black. I ask: What is the government trying to do? Is it trying to juggle its statistics, that is, rush through these hearings and a lot of deportations? Or, is it trying to punish people who it considers cheaters en masse because of their country of origin? In so doing, it hurts real refugees whom it claims to be trying to protect. It also delays Canadians who want to sponsor their families into Canada but are delayed because the experienced immigration officers are stuck working on the backlog.

I ask that the minister consider an amnesty.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to expand on the reply given by the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina on October 17 of this year.

The minister rejects the notion that this process is torturing refugee claimants. Refugee claimants in Canada enjoy the protection of Canada while their claims are being determined. In fact, as Gordon Fairweather, the Chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board has pointed out, a United Nations high commissioner for refugees has said that within the Canadian refugee determination system there may be a model for the world.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration understands the concerns of backlog claimants who are waiting for decisions. That is why steps have been taken to make that wait a productive one for claimants. Backlog claimants have had permission to work since January 12, 1989. They and their families have access to Canadian schools and social programs.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration also understands the concerns of backlog claimants who are separated from their families. That is why measures have been put in place to bring to Canada on a priority basis the dependants of backlog claimants who are facing life threatening situations or who are abused or abandoned children. In addition, as soon as a claimant has been provisionally approved for landing, the appropriate visa office is requested to initiate processing of the dependants the claimant intends to sponsor. This reduces the time required to bring those dependants to Canada.

In addition, those claimants who know that their claims are unfounded may choose to leave voluntarily with letters of introduction to visa officials abroad. They are guaranteed an interview with Canadian officials. Their Canadian experience will be favourably considered during this interview.

When the backlog clearance program was announced on December 28, 1988, it was made clear that all claimants would be treated fairly, humanely, and on the basis of their claims to convention refugee status. The option of an amnesty was considered and rejected. In its report of the backlog clearance which was tabled in December 1989, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration supported this decision. An amnesty would be unfair to potential immigrants and to their relatives in Canada who have followed the lawful process for immigration.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

ISRAEL

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the criticism of the Israeli police by the recent commission of inquiry into the tragic events in Old Jerusalem.

Israeli security forces should not have trusted Islamic religious authorities who were notified that a fringe Jewish group would not be allowed to enter Temple Mount. Muslims proceeded to defile this holy site with an illegal, planned attack on Jewish worshippers. Rioters were incited over loudspeakers to slaughter the Jews.

Israeli police showed great restraint in not using live ammunition against the stone throwers as they attacked police and then thousands of praying Jews at the Western Wall. The police officers who had been forced to retreat re-entered the Temple Mount to rescue officers and to prevent the thousands of rioters from seizing weapons and ammunition in the police station. Only then did they use live ammunition in life threatening situations.

When will Palestinians and Muslim extremists learn that Israelis will never agree to their self-determination if they cannot be trusted to respect the basic human rights of others? When will the world learn that sanctioning attacks on innocent victims leads to further violence, not peace?

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, Transport Canada's decision to implement a cost-recovery program for air services in April, 1991 can only hurt airports and air services in Atlantic Canada and further alienate Atlantic Canadians.

Higher fees on airport operations will raise air service costs beyond the point which is affordable by the vast majority of Atlantic Canadians, or even shut down smaller operations altogether.

The government again has abandoned Atlantic Canada with its virtual withdrawal of passenger rail services from the region, the steadily deteriorating condition of the Trans-Canada Highway, and the rising costs for users of Marine Atlantic ferries, ports, and harbours.

Prince Edward Island spends more per capita on transportation than any other province. We spend 4 per cent of our gross domestic product on this sector, while having the lowest GDP in Canada. Higher air service costs could cripple an already vulnerable transportation system in P.E.I. and in the rest of Atlantic Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, when the labour dispute between the United Steelworkers of America and Stelco and Algoma Steel Corporation does finally come to an end, and if we are to believe the assertions of the corporations and the predictions of steel analysts, fewer than 80 per cent of the steelworkers will be called back to work. This figure has been used as a precedence based on an arbitrary figure which signals the end of a labour dispute, the workers eligible for UI benefits after that.

We ask the minister to utilize the flexibility given her to reduce the 80 per cent figure to 30, 40 or whatever percentage is appropriate so those people who have been without any money for 12 weeks and counting will become eligible without any long bureaucratic delay. We ask the minister to demonstrate compassion and exercise authority to reassure these 16,000 steelworkers that indeed they will immediately be eligible for benefits if not recalled to work.

HOCKEY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in little over a month, the NHL board of governors will be granting new hockey franchises to the league. Two Canadian applications are up for consideration: Hamilton and our own capital, Ottawa.

Given the spirit of fair competition it appears obvious to me that we in Canada should be first in line for a team. We have the money, the talent, the heritage, and the know-how. Hockey is our home game.

As our present Governor General said in the Chamber in 1983, "The National Hockey League is a type of public trust. More than that, hockey is central to the Canadian identity."

In addition, hockey has become big business on the international stage. We must not allow a group of backroom boys to dilute our leadership in this game by granting franchises to interests whose only familiarity with ice is in their whisky.

I call upon all members of Parliament to rally their constituents by circulating a petition in support of the two Canadian bids. Copies are available in my office.

And, finally, to the NHL board of directors I say: when Canada plays hockey, hockey wins.

UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, last week the United Nations celebrated its 45th year of dedication to world peace and international good order. It is with gratitude that we note that the United Nations has probably never been closer to achieving its original mandate than during the last few months of the Gulf crisis.

However, despite the UN solidarity on the Middle East to date, there is growing concern that the agenda being followed by Canada and others is that of the United States, not the UN. One questions whether or not the U.S. is using the UN for its own, and not the international, good. Have we been led to UN commitments which entrap us into following from here on a U.S. agenda?

The UN is currently owed $600 million in late support payments from 17 countries world-wide. Of this, $482 million is back debt owed from the United States. Actions speak louder than words. What is the U.S. commitment to the UN? The government must insist that the U.S. prove its commitment to the UN and what it stands for by paying its debt to the UN.

METROPOLITAN QUEBEC CITY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, the Metropolitan Quebec City Chamber of Commerce and Industry, one of the most dynamic chambers I know, is offering, through its international trade committee, an intensive course on how to export know-how.

The course, to be given on November 8, 9, 14, 15 and 16 by Mr. Pierre Lacroix, president of Roche International, is intended to help certain businesses be better prepared when they enter the export market, and to help other businesses take advantage of knowledge acquired in the field.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this initiative deserves our attention and should be supported by entrepreneurs who, after all, will be the ultimate beneficiaries.

THE LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents agree with the Prime Minister, who says Jean Chrétien is a man who keeps changing his mind. Mr. Speaker, I think they are right.

Two days ago, Mr. Chrétien announced he would scrap the GST if his party formed the next government. A few weeks ago, however, Mr. Chrétien admitted it would be irresponsible to get rid of the GST without proposing a new tax formula. It didn't take long for him to change his mind.

On the constitutional issue, a few months ago Jean Chrétien favoured a strong central government. Today, he talks about changing the powers given to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, Jean Chrétien keeps changing his mind, fails to provide leadership and has no vision for the future of this country.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, there is presently in Ontario alone a backlog of 44,220 English-speaking refugees waiting to be processed.

The Auditor General's report states: "The system was extremely prone to large-scale abuses and became overloaded by a growing number of claims that compounded existing delays." It continues: "Changes had either not been implemented or were not operating as intended."

We have reached this point. The Toronto office alone is facing 22,000 cases. It will be able to handle only 7,000 cases within the next year. In an attempt to deal with this, present policy dictates that only English-speaking refugee cases be processed.

The Auditor General clearly states: "The backlog clearance program will cost more than estimated."

Clearly, this is a complete failure. I ask the minister when will she act responsibly and announce immediate measures to solve this inhumane and unacceptable situation.

DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, recently, I attended a press conference to draw the attention of the public to the important work being done in my riding. I am referring to the development strategy submitted by the Laurentides community development assistance board.

This tool will have a positive impact on the entire region. The development strategy will help members of our community make wise choices and concentrate on priority projects. The strategy is the result of effective regional consultation, reflecting the enthusiasm and energy of our community.

The Laurentides community development assistance board is to be commended for a job well done, and I urge residents to take part in these consultation exercises so that we can achieve balanced development in our community.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, according to the Auditor General's report released yesterday, we have a lot of tax evaders that cost the country $10 billion a year. Mr. Dye is quoted as saying: "These cheaters are really hosing the honest person."

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to you a list of some real hosers in our corporate welfare bum of the week award.

They are: Wellwood of Canada, with a profit of $110 million in 1989 and a $2.8 million tax credit, and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: Sovereign Life Insurance, with $6.5 million in profits in 1989 and a half million dollar tax credit, and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: And, CP Hotels with $46.9 million in profit in 1989 and a $2.1 million tax credit, and no taxes paid.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: The winner is: CP Hotels. This corporation did not pay any taxes in 1989 and still received over $2 million in government hand-outs.

Congratulations to all our contestants for showing us how to avoid paying taxes by using the loopholes that are already in existence.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, Canada and the United States are closer than ever to initiating a major commitment to curb acid rain. The American commitment to curb acid rain is only a president's signature away. Did the ranting and raving of the New Democratic Party have any effect on persuading the American government? Of course not.

Statements in the U.S. Congress say it all. Congressman Boehlert says this:

> There are a lot of heroes today. President Bush has been mentioned in very favorable terms, and rightly so—
> I say that as a Republican who, quite frankly, admitted disappointment in the previous administration. But George Bush is an environmental President. He put this matter at the top of his agenda, and he provided leadership.
> But he did not do it alone. He did it with the Democrats and Republicans.

There is another person who deserves mention. Another person whose——name has not been mentioned on this floor today. His name is Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister of Canada.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Prime Minister of Canada showed the United States the leadership it deserved.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

DAVID IRVING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in a few days a man whose views are despicable will be allowed to use a publicly-funded facility here in Ottawa to promote racial intolerance.

On November 5, 1990 in the capital of Canada, this man will spout his lies on how the holocaust, according to him, was exaggerated and how six million Jews did not die in the gas chambers of the concentration camps.

My colleagues and I find this very distasteful that the Ottawa Congress Centre would be the venue of this presentation. We urge the Board of Directors of the Ottawa Congress Centre to cancel the engagement in question and to review the leasing conditions to prevent the facility being used for such intolerance and racism in the future.

Canada is a tolerant country. It is a land rich in ethnic diversity and respect among people. There is no room for racism here. I call upon the Congress Centre to cancel the Irving engagement. Better yet, I ask David Irving to leave. He is clearly not wanted in our country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues facing Canada today, particularly the Atlantic region, is passenger transportation. The royal commission which is now underway will have a great bearing on the future for travel within our great country.

Because transportation pressures are mounting in all directions, it becomes essential for the commission to work with a sense of urgency and to make its recommendations as early as possible. In the meanwhile, it is also essential that we hold a steady course with present services.

For example, in Atlantic Canada we reluctantly accepted the need for reduction in VIA Rail services to match budgets and levels of service. We endure a Trans-Canada Highway that is inadequate and dangerous until we are able to find ways to improve upon it. One saving grace for Atlantic transportation, however, has been the improvement in air services in recent years. But even these are now challenged by proposals for increased landing fees and other charges to enhance transport cost recovery.

Surely, these new charges can be deferred until the royal commission report is complete in a comprehensive context. We must not any longer approach passenger transportation one segment at a time. The future demands a total solution.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Today, Statistics Canada, the government's own statistical agency, stated: "Economic growth turned clearly negative in August." Gross domestic product, the overall size of the economy actually fell 0.5 per cent, the largest monthly drop in almost five years. Under the government's policies, the economy actually shrank in August.

These cold numbers do not begin to tell the full story of the pain, the suffering, and the damage caused by the government's policies for hundreds of thousands of workers, farmers, and small business people.

Will the minister, today, change his policies and bring in new policies that will not cause this economy to shrink? Instead, will he bring in policies that will cause economic growth and that will not destroy jobs but will create them for people all across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition and he is quite right. The size of the economy declined by half of 1 per cent in the month of August.

I want to point out to him, so that people do not get the wrong impression from the exaggeration of his words, the economy grew in both July and June.

I have made it quite clear since the Budget of this year that the government was expecting some decline in the economy. I also have said that after seven and a half years of very strong growth, growth which started to exceed our capacity as a country and as a economy to handle, that there were bound to be some inflationary pressures and also some decline in the economy because economies cannot grow forever. That is the sort of period that we are going through.

It is an unfortunate thing that this is the sort of thing that does happen in an economy. We have to work our way through it. Interest rates have been coming down during the month of August. Every week the interest rates declined. That is the response that we have made in order to get the economy back on a sound footing so we can see a period of solid growth ahead.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians wonder why all the minister can say in the face of the shrinking economy is that he actually caused this recession through his policies, repeating this over and over again, in a way Canadians will consider cold and heartless.

Today the Ontario Agricultural Commodity Council, representing two-thirds of Ontario's farmers, that is 50,000 farmers, stated:

> Ontario farmers are facing one of the most serious income situations, in real value terms, since the "Dirty Thirties" – the current recession has only added to the financial stress of Ontario farmers.

Why will the minister not stop these policies that are damaging farmers in Ontario and all across the country? Why will he not stop these policies that are damaging workers, as well as farmers, in every part of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says that I do not understand what is going on. I have gone through this type of thing when I was in the private sector myself. I say to the hon. member that he has not shared that same type of experience himself, so he does not have to tell me what sort of things I feel.

I do not like to see the economy doing what it is doing now. I take great pleasure in seeing an economy that is booming. That is something that we have enjoyed over the course of the six years that we have formed the government in the country, up until quite recently.

The important thing that the hon. member should remember is that he should be straight with Canadians. I have made it clear what the government's policies are. The Leader of the Opposition is saying on the one hand, stop these policies that hurt the farmer. On the other hand, they are saying to the senators in the other place "Stop the GST". Well, the GST is going to result in a reduction in costs of production to farmers in this country of $250 million. If the hon. member felt as strongly as he does about the farmers in this country, he would be supportive of the goods and services tax.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's experience on Bay Street cannot come anywhere close to the loss of jobs by hundreds of people, thousands in fact, week after week just in the past year on the part of the people that send me to this place to speak for them.

He can speak for Bay Street. I will speak for working people in my riding and right across the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that today, Statistics Canada announced that our Gross Domestic Product experienced its steepest drop in five years. I therefore want to ask the minister why he still wants to impose his GST. It will only make the recession even worse. Why does he want to impose hardship on Canadians? Why doesn't he withdraw his GST today?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the only time the Leader of the Opposition took a cut in pay in his life was when he lost the government.

Whether you work on Bay Street or whether you work on Main Street, you still have to go through the difficulties in an economy. In my job on Bay Street I took a cut in salary because of the difficulties in the economy. I understand what these people are saying.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hear the hon. member opposite. Does he have any sense whatsoever of what people are going through in the country today? No, because he has never experienced it himself. I have experienced it.

The Deputy Prime Minister is meeting with the Ontario Agricultural Commodity Council. Just to quote the people who he will be meeting with today, they refer to the ad hockery of policies of previous governments. The failure of ad hockery is why members of the Ontario Agricultural Commodity Council were so supportive of the initiative announced by the Canadian Minister of Agriculture who established two committees, a federal-provincial safety net committee and a grain and oilseeds safety net committee last autumn. Both committees have worked hard during the past year and have made recommendations to the government.

We are working with the agricultural community. We are discussing directly with them the difficulties that they have in the international community and are coming up with specific solutions. The goods and services tax is also one of those solutions, and if the hon. member would be honest with the farmers of Canada—

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this morning at 8 a.m. in Sydney, Nova Scotia, the owner of three gigantic factory ships from St. Malo, France, boarded one of these vessels, having brought along the press from Paris to witness his stated threat that he will ram any vessel from any country that tries to stop him from illegally fishing in so-called Canada-France disputed waters. They fished there all day Friday and they fished for the last three nights in Canadian waters with no observer aboard.

I want to ask the Minister of Fisheries now, why is this government unwilling to protect a signed quota agreement between Canada and France? Why is it that the only party trying to stop them tonight is a tiny military vessel from St. Pierre?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador are going to be impressed. Today, we have the Newfoundland member defending the interests of the fishermen of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I guess the member is right.

There is a problem between la flotte métropolitaine française and les pêcheurs de Saint-Pierre et Miquelon. Surely, the member is not advocating that we intervene in a French matter and tell France how to treat its fishermen in St. Pierre and Miquelon, because that is a problem.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the minister would have us believe that for the last three nights they have not been fishing while they have been in the Canadian zone 80 miles off our coast with no observer aboard.

What does he think they have been doing, having a Tupperware party?

How can this minister expect—when his main duty is to protect the fishing resource for Canadians—Canadians to believe that three massive factory freezer trawlers fishing an already depleted resource which we claim is ours is none of Canada's business?

[Translation]

Is this government now telling France: "Here's the fish, the zone is yours"?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): I must say George's French is improving all the time?

[English]

The issue here, as the hon. member knows, and what we are talking about are the French metropolitan vessels. They are not fishing—I want members of the House to know this—in undisputed Canadian waters. They are fishing in the 3PS zone that is subject to an agreement which we entered into a couple of years ago. I am sure the hon. member recalls this.

By the way, this is the agreement that reduced French catches by 40 per cent in Canadian waters, which the previous Liberal government did not have the guts to do.

PERSIAN GULF

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Much has been said lately about the preparations for war in the Persian Gulf. The U.S. president has been planning military action with the congressional leaders.

Saddam Hussein has said that Iraq is preparing for a war and expects a U.S. attack. Last week, the external affairs minister said that Canadian young men and women may not come home for Christmas, or at all, and began to talk about Canada's participation in a war.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. The government has done a lot to prepare for war. What has his government done, using our seat on the UN Security Council, to prevent a war? Specifically, what has the Prime Minister and his government done?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party reads The New York Times. If she does, she will know that about four or five weeks ago when there was a very serious dispute within the United Nations, within the Security Council as to whether auspices of the United Nations would be used or not, it was the leading intervention of Canada that helped encourage all members of the Security Council to operate within United Nations auspices.

She will know, if she is interested, that the Government of Canada, through our ambassador to the United Nations, has been highly instrumental in achieving the consensus that we have found so far on the resolutions that have come with both unanimity and impact upon Saddam Hussein from the Security Council. We have in addition been in touch at all levels of the government, calls made by the Prime Minister directly on the telephone, conversations the Prime Minister and I both had during the Children's Summit at the United Nations with foreign leaders, contacts by a range of our ambassadors and representatives seeking ways in which we can first make clear to Saddam Hussein that the world wants him out of Kuwait and that that is a condition precedent to other changes that might occur.

• (1430)

Canada has a very important diplomatic card to play. We are playing it very effectively. We intend to continue to play it as effectively as we can. If the hon. member wants, as her status as a party leader would entitle her to, a more detailed briefing so that she could speak from the facts, I would be delighted to provide that.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister responsible for external affairs.

The facts are that Canada has escalated the talk of a war, has not escalated the talk of peace at all, and to tell Canadians last week that their sons and daughters might never even come home from the Middle East is not advocating for peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The minister for external affairs, Mr. Speaker, talks about UN resolutions. This government chose, without reference to the Canadian Parliament, to send ships to enforce an economic blockade in the Middle East. Presumably the government did this thinking that an economic blockade would be successful. No one agrees with Saddam Hussein's actions.

I ask the minister responsible for External Affairs, when this was done how long did the government plan to give the economic blockade in order to see if it was going to be effective? It seems that only last week the economic blockade was seen to be effective, the next day the minister for external affairs was telling Canadians their sons and daughters might not return home.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the Leader of the New Democratic Party honestly believes that when Canada sends Canadian troops abroad, whether we send them on peacekeeping missions, as we have done with such credit to Canada around the world, or whether we send them in support of a world-wide effort to force Saddam Hussein to respect the fundamental laws of international sovereignty, we send them with the implicit suggestion that if things get tough, Canada should turn and run. That is not the position of this government. I do not think that is the position of most Canadians other, perhaps, than those who sit behind her in the New Democratic Party.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the minister responsible for external affairs.

The position of this party is that this government has a responsibility to come to Parliament and to discuss and debate in Parliament before military action is taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, traditionally this country has played a peacekeeping role and worked together with the United Nations. My question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs is this: will he give the House the assurance that he will not deploy any military personnel in the gulf without the approval of the United Nations and this Parliament?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was a debate here in the House, in which hon. members all had a chance to participate. There was a vote. The New Democratic Party voted against the resolution. Part of the resolution gave the parliamentary committee the right to continue consideration of issues related to the Canadian presence in the gulf. The New Democratic Party voted against the idea of Parliament referring the subject to committee. There was a discussion the other day with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence and myself, who were there to explain the government's position.

[English]

During that debate, Mr. Speaker, that discussion in the standing committee, there was a very curious position put forward by the New Democratic Party. That position, if I understand it, is that it is fine for Canada to have our troops there in support of United Nations activity. But if something happens, if there is some emergency, instead of having Canadians take part in advancing the interests of the United Nations, what we should do is come back here and have a debate. How long does the member for Yukon want us to have this debate? How long does she want us to wait? What does she think Saddam Hussein would be doing while the Parliament of Canada was debating and while Canadian troops were waiting?

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In his annual report, the Auditor General severely criticized the government for its failure to monitor immigration programs.

Will the minister get the resources to carry out her mandate and how does she intend to implement the five-year plan she announced last week, now that according to the Auditor General's report, it is clear she is incapable of monitoring the backlog of refugee claims? Will she get the resources to carry out her mandate and deal with these problems once and for all?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in his report, the Auditor General did not recommend any changes in the system with respect to handling the backlog. He recommended that we improve the system. The situation has started to improve, and that was clear, because 50 per cent of the claims have now been processed and 29 per cent have been finalized.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, according to the report of the Auditor General, more than 50 per cent of the entrepreneur immigrants did not comply with the terms of the conditions of their visa once landed in Canada. Why is the minister getting tough on family reunification and the refugee conditions while the entrepreneur immigrants have the door open without control? Why?

An hon. member: That is immigration Tories, double standards.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member clearly is not following what we have been doing in the immigration program because we have effected two things: first of all, we have a private sector advisory group which is helping us to improve the standards of both the investor and the entrepreneur program, and we have inside the government increased our monitoring capacity on both aspects of the program and, indeed, in one case charges have been laid. Those improvements are already in place, and I emphasize that.

On my recent trip to Asia, I spoke about the need for entrepreneurs and investors to meet our standards of investment and of businesses established, I said that we would have no patience not only with those investors who fail to meet terms and conditions, but with the consultants who assist them.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and it concerns comments made by the Auditor General in his annual report. He has found that petty jealousy and turf warfare between customs officials and the RCMP may be resulting in illegal drugs and traffickers escaping detection and prosecution.

Given that any breakdown in our war against drugs adversely affects all Canadians in many ways, what specific actions, and I underscore the word specific, has the minister taken or will he take to investigate and correct this unnecessary rivalry between two fine services?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): First, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree in any way, shape or form with the hon. member's preamble, because there has been a great deal of co-operative effort with the RCMP over the past in joint forces operations, in exchange of personnel, many examples of success in control deliveries, representing hundreds of millions of dollars worth of drugs apprehended at the border by both the RCMP and the customs. An example just last week of a delivery from Vancouver to Montreal resulted in a $5 million seizure.

• (1440)

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, about a year ago I asked my officials and the Solicitor General asked his, to begin discussions to put together a comprehensive agreement between Customs Canada and the RCMP. We have given instructions to our officials to make certain that this agreement is finalized before the end of this calendar year, that is, before the end of December, which will address any or all of the concerns of the Auditor General.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, typically this answer is neither specific nor acceptable to Canadians. The preamble was not my preamble, but contained on page 613 of the report of the Auditor General.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wappel: I thought the minister would like to know what the Auditor General said, not what I said. The problem, Mr. Speaker, is not new. The Auditor General reports that this conflict has been around since 1984, six years without a resolution, and who knows how many drug busts have gone sour because of it.

The Auditor General—not this member—has said:

> The RCMP should ensure that its custom enforcement activities are fully co-ordinated with the policies, strategies and priorities of Canada customs.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Wappel: Will the minister take immediate steps to resolve this conflict instead of letting it fester for the rest of this government's short lifetime, to the detriment of Canadians.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that the hon. member had his supplementary question written out before I gave the answer to his question—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: —because I very clearly answered the hon. member's first question—

Mr. Wappel: Its been going on for six years.

Mr. Jelinek: —when he asked, "What is the minister going to do about this?" I said that I had instructed my officials about a year ago to begin preparations to eliminate any jurisdictional contradictions that existed between the RCMP—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: Just be quiet for a minute. Listen and you will learn something.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister can complete his answer.

Mr. Jelinek: To conclude the answer, I can assure my hon. friend that a detailed agreement between Customs Canada and the RCMP is going to be reached by the end of December of this year which will eliminate any jurisdictional problems that have existed in the past between the two departments.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of Indian affairs. It is with regard to the shocking revelations of the abuse of native children in mission schools throughout Canada, and especially in the province of Manitoba.

Canadians were deeply moved by the courageous statements of Phil Fontaine, the head of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs. Would the minister of Indian affairs respond to the letter of our leader, the member for Yukon, who asked on July 13, that there be a public inquiry into all aspects of child abuse in schools that were run by the Department of Indian Affairs or on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think all Canadians are deeply saddened by the revelations of Chief Phil Fontaine yesterday in a meeting with a number of church leaders in Manitoba.

We regret the fact and wish we could rewrite history about the way children in residential schools were subjected apparently to physical and sexual harassment many years ago.

All members of Parliament, governments and leaders of institutions, such as the churches, have an obligation to bring forward initiatives to try to redress those injustices and to provide adequate counselling and assistance to those who were the victims.

I want to inform the hon. member, if he is not already aware of it, that I responded in detail to a letter from his leader on April 30, and spelled out all of the aspects of the government's response to these terrible problems. I will table that letter if it be the wish of the House.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): First of all, just to correct the minister, he responded on August 30 and, yes, I do have a copy of the letter.

The question is this. Healing starts by an open acknowledgement of the problem. It is not a matter of rewriting history, it is a matter of acknowledging history. There will only be further child abuse, further alcoholism, further drug abuse if these incidents are not studied. Will the minister commit himself now to the request made on July 13 for an open public inquiry into this very important matter?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and other members of his party seem to believe that public inquiries are the only means of resolving such serious issues.

This department and this government have taken major steps to deal with child sexual abuse and family violence within Indian communities. We have closed all but one federal residential school in Canada since 1970. At that time there were 60 such schools. We have brought forward a program of initiatives these past three years at a funding level of $1.4 million to assist in dealing with child sexual violence in native communities.

The Prime Minister has committed this government to a major initiative on family violence, and further details of that are to be announced shortly. We have taken numerous positive steps. We are saddened by revelations of the past. All members should work together to ensure that these tragic stories never repeat themselves.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA. Yesterday the Auditor General cited as inappropriate the funding by ACOA of millions of dollars in loans to NSC Diesel Corporation because ACOA had not properly evaluated the financial viability of the project.

Since the spectacular collapse of this company has led to the bankruptcy of many small subcontractors on that shore, and the loss of jobs of their employees has now been clearly linked to incompetence and negligence, will the minister do the right thing and take personal responsibility for this fiasco and explain his involvement in its approval?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I read the exaggerated statement of my colleague yesterday and I have listened to his question today. I want to point out to him that there may have been and are some difficulties on this project, but ACOA officials have acted with circumspection and we are still trying to restructure the project.

I want to point out to him for his interest that the loan guarantee and all of the other advancements of money were carried out with great attention to detail. I am willing to admit that one cannot always avoid some mistakes. I want to point out to the hon. gentlemen, who is very fair, that even such a very conscientious person as himself, while he was executive director of his party for three years, was recently quoted as saying he had no idea that his own leader was drawing a secret salary from a trust fund from his own party.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the minister opposite can run but he cannot hide. I will tell him right now that the subcontractors who are going bankrupt do not buy that type of rhetoric, the people who are losing their jobs do not buy that type of rhetoric, and the taxpayers who are going to lose up to $2 million do not buy that type of response from the minister.

Will the minister now commit to a full, open and public inquiry into the approval of this project so as to determine whether or not it was bureaucratic bungling or political expediency that led to the inappropriate approval of this project, a project which just happens to be in the minister's own riding?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should ask the hon. member the difficult question, perhaps I would if he would, with respect to the other matter.

Let me say to the hon. member that instead of kicking the entrails out of a project that is in trouble, perhaps in fairness he should refer to the 235 projects with eligible capital costs of $42 million and over 600 jobs that were to the benefit of his own constituents.

ENERGY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

I have copies in my hand of Transport Canada directives on motor vehicle fuel testing. The gasoline additive MMT has been banned in the United States because it may be one of the causes of severe mental disorders, including Parkinson's disease. Given that such is the case, will the minister tell us why he has not banned MMT in Canada, and why will he not do it now?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member is talking about MTBA.

• (1450 )

The hon. member makes a valid point concerning additives. The government is looking at various additives for gasoline, and specifically octane rating. It has not made any decisions obviously, but is looking at some of the issues relating to the new environmental approaches that it wants to take.

I will take the hon. member's position under advisement. Others have asked for the same kind of approach as he has asked for today.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in the words of one of our leading neurotoxic scientists, "this is a case of sheer government negligence." Ethanol is an environmentally safe and acceptable alternative that is renewable, and would benefit farmers across this country.

Will the minister take the necessary steps to ban MMT in Canada and replace it with ethanol?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thought that was eventually where the hon. member was going.

Ethanol is being produced in my home province of Manitoba by a small oil company called Mohawk. It is located in the riding of my colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a very successful program and it is used as a blend for 10 per cent. Generally speaking, it also advances the marketability of the gasoline of Mohawk.

The issue that has to be dealt with regarding ethanol is that if one compares it to the United States, the Americans have to supply from offshore sources 50 per cent of their oil, whereas we are self-sufficient in oil. That is why the use of ethanol also makes some sense. In the United States there is an approximate 60 cent subsidy per gallon of ethanol. It is those kinds of subsidies that one would have to consider as well in Canada, if one was going to use ethanol.

Despite all those factors, the government is looking at alternate energy and it is well ahead of anything that their government ever did.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday in the public accounts committee hearings, the Auditor General said that he is very concerned about the huge potential for fraud with the introduction of the GST. He said: "there is a great potential for companies to inflate claims about their inventories in order to claim manufacturers' sales tax rebates."

I would like to ask the minister what he has done to prevent the massive potential for fraud with the implementation of the GST? The people of Canada want to know.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite interesting that the NDP, not too many months ago, were complaining about the government hiring "tax police" to make certain that there would not be any fraud taking place under the forthcoming goods and services tax. They cannot have it both ways.

Second, hon. members should know, and the Auditor General agrees with this, that the existing federal sales tax is the one riddled with loopholes for potential fraud. That is just one of the many reasons why that sales tax must be scrapped.

Finally, it is as a result of the Auditor General's recommendations of last year when he said that the government could not, in fact, properly prepare and administer the sales tax without getting new technology, new systems and new personnel in place in advance. That is just what we have done to assure a clean, smooth launch, which in fact will take place January 1, 1991.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment.

After listening to expert witness for more than a year on the dangers of global warming, the environment committee of this Parliament concluded that the minimum that Canada can and must do is cut carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Despite repeated invitations, the minister has never attended the committee to hear just how strongly all members of this House hold that view.

Will the minister assure this House that while he is attending the second World Climate Conference in Geneva next week, that it will be to support the 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide, or is the minister frozen to the dangerous view that Canada should continue as the fifth worst per capita greenhouse gas polluter in the world?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have made our position very clear on this issue. Canada is committed, as a great number of nations are, to stabilizing $CO_2$ emissions by the year 2000 to the level they were in the year 1990. Certainly Canada would like to move ahead on the schedule, but Canada will not move ahead on a schedule as important as this until we have a scientific data base to allow us to suggest specific measures that will allow us to accelerate the process.

We will stick with this position. It is a position that shows responsibility as a world leader on this question.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

After the demise of Meech Lake, the government made a commitment to sign a formal agreement on immigration with the Quebec Government that would transfer to the Government of Quebec the authority to select—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard: I am sorry if this bothers the members of the Liberal Party, but these things are important to Quebec.

I was saying that the agreement would transfer to the Government of Quebec the authority to select and integrate these immigrants. So far, the agreement is in limbo.

Yesterday, the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, demanded that the federal government sign the agreement. My question is: what is the minister waiting for and has the government decided to put a freeze on negotiations with Quebec?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my answer hasn't changed since the last time the hon. member asked me that question. Both governments still intend to follow up on the Cullen–Couture Agreement, but as I have already stated on several occasions, do not ask me to confirm a date.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, I repeated my question because the answer I got was not satisfactory. It is always the same.

One of the harmful effects of not signing the agreement is that the Government of Quebec has fewer resources to apply to French courses for immigrants. At the present time, the government's refusal to sign is doing immeasurable harm to the immigrants concerned and weakens Quebec's language policies. Will the government tell this House that it will stop meaning well and start doing what it has to do?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to read the document on future immigration levels, because far more funding has been set aside for language courses under the integration plan and, of course, Quebec has its share.

HEALTH

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, the subject of suicide is of special interest to me, particularly as it represents a wasted life. I know this is of concern to all parliamentarians.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, apparently, this does not interest some members of the opposition and I regret that.

There is currently a conference under way in Vancouver sponsored by an association called the Canadian Association on Suicide Prevention. I understand that the role of the federal government, in particular the Department of National Health and Welfare, in suicide prevention has been raised.

This being the case, I wonder if the government could please tell this Parliament what the department is doing in this regard.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. We know that suicide is a most tragic event which is caused by a number of things. The most important one is mental illness. We know that over 80 per cent of the people who commit suicide in this country are affected by mental illness and a majority of those are affected by schizophrenia.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has given instructions to people in his department to co–operate very closely with researchers across the country. Our aim is to reduce the number of suicides in this country and I am sure every member of this House will support the Minister of National Health and Welfare in this respect.

AIR SAFETY

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport in the absence of the Minister of Transport. Today Transport Canada will terminate weather and communication services at the airport in the community of Fort Franklin, Northwest Territories.

My question is regarding the issue of air safety. Given the apparent lack of federal government policy on the provision of services to northern remote communities that have no roads and average about 2,000 flights per community per year, I ask the minister this.

• (1500 )

How much is air safety worth to the government and why is the minister putting a dollar value on the lives of my constituents who have no other choice than air travel?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my officials to give me a full report on the operations at Fort Franklin. However, I have been told that the only air carrier at Fort Franklin is equipped and able to provide the essential information required for safe operations.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the information we get from the air industry around Fort Franklin is not to that effect. My supplementary question is directed to the same minister.

The community of Fort Franklin held a memorial service for seven residents killed in 1984 in a tragic plane crash. The Canadian Aviation Safety Board's investigation into the crash indicated the accident could have been prevented if there had been adequate weather and communication services.

Will the minister stop his officials from terminating the current services? Today is the deadline. Will he commit to upgrading the service to a full communications air radio service program, which is what those residents and the air industry around that area want?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the information that we have is that the only air carrier at Fort Franklin is properly equipped and able to provide the essential requirements for its safe operation. If the hon. member has any facts to communicate to us to the contrary, we will be very pleased to take them under consideration.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Margo Wallstrom, Swedish Minister for Equality Between the Sexes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I would like to table, in both official languages, the annual report of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women for the year 1989–1990.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I would like to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 29 petitions.

BILL C-68

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-68, an act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and to make provisions for the applications of certain orders with amendments, in both official languages.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by several Canadians dealing with the government's intention of imposing the goods and services tax on books, publications, magazines, et cetera.

The petitioners humbly submit that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a corner-stone of our democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application. The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

NATIVE COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 58 people from such communities as Watson Lake, Old Crow, Whitehorse, Quesnel, B.C, and Fort Frances, Ontario which criticizes the Secretary of State for cancelling funding of native newspapers and reducing funding for native broadcasting.

This has resulted in the undermining of communications between native people, and between native and non-native Canadians. This cut in funding has also further jeopardized the survival of aboriginal languages in Canada and compromised the efforts to improve native literacy.

The petitioners pray that the government should reinstate both the native communications programs and the Northern Broadcast Access Program at full funding levels and, further, that the Department of the Secretary of State conduct consultations with the groups affected before it changes the funding plans for native communications media.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I want to present a number of petitions, the first being 12 pages in length and signed by a number of my constituents regarding the goods and services tax.

It points out the inequity of the goods and services tax, and it also states that the government should be implementing a tax system which is fair and equitable for all Canadians.

As New Democrats, we have those alternatives already, while the Liberals have to start a special committee to determine whether or not there is a way to beat the tax.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, another petition relates to the clawback on the old age security system.

Once again, the petitioners come from my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands. They protest the regressive system of withdrawal of old age security and the regressive measures of the government.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the third petition relates to the dismantling of the VIA Rail system. The Government of Canada is selling or transferring substantial parts of the VIA Rail system, a system which all of us, as Canadians, contributed to.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several citizens from central and eastern Ontario.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, to ensure that there is no taxation on goods and services such as haircuts, fast food, piano lessons and other non-luxury items, and to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will tax diapers and coffins, in other words, taxing Canadians words from the cradle to the grave.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table petitions signed by Canadian citizens from across Canada who call on this government to drop its plan to impose a tax on goods and services, especially as it applies to newspapers, magazines, books, and any printed matter that deals with the dissemination of culture in Canada. Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon the government to reverse this ill-considered decision as soon as possible.

[English]

GANNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting a petition on behalf of the people of Grand Manan Island. Grand Manan Island is in the Bay of Fundy.

The residents of Grand Manan Island are protesting the proposed destaffing of the lighthouse on Gannet Rock in the Bay of Fundy. That lighthouse was established in 1831.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain the current staffing of the Gannet Rock lighthouse. This is just one of many petitions I have presented regarding this subject.

• (1510 )

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, when a young person passes away as a result of a severe allergy reaction, many thousands of Canadians are moved to take action. One of the actions that has been taken is this petition which is signed by Canadians living in Scarborough, North York, Markham, London, and Ajax.

These petitioners are joined by the Allergy Information Association and call upon Parliament to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives to pre-packaged foods.

As well, the petitioners ask that restauranteurs and food retailers provide to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several constituents in the riding of Nepean. Your petitioners object to the GST, especially its application to books and all printed matter, and they ask the government to withdraw the tax. We heard the Prime Minister say he was considering this possibility. Your petitioners are most interested in what the Prime Minister said. I am sure these Canadians are among the 85 per cent who object to this unfair tax.

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and privilege to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by approximately 2,900 of my constituents in Oxford.

This petition is directed towards the Young Offenders Act and emphasizes that young people are responsible for their behaviour and should be held accountable in a manner appropriate to their age and maturity.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act, with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions which are signed by hundreds of Canadians from around Canada who ask the government to reconsider its crazy proposal to come in with the 7 per cent goods and services tax.

They believe that this tax is not only unfair, invisible, and double-tiered, but that it is a tax that is regressive. It will hit the poor people in the country the hardest and the poorest regions of the country the hardest.

The petitioners beg the government finally to come to its senses, to retrench its position on the GST, and to kill this tax.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from the area of London, Ontario.

These people have not given up their fight against the goods and services tax. They ask the government to review pushing this tax through, to back off on its position, and to bring in a tax that is more fair to all Canadians.

CABLE BROADCASTING INDUSTRY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on the day that we are about to debate the third reading of the Broadcasting Act, I am very pleased to present a huge petition, with 1,800 names from my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam and other places in the Greater Vancouver Area.

The petitioners states that the cable industry is the only territorial monopoly in Canada whose profits are unregulated it is making rates of return of about 32 per cent. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C-284, which happens to be my Private Members' Bill. This bill would apply a rate of return regulation. In other words, it would treat the cable industry just like the telephone industry. It would regulate it and reduce cable rates for ordinary Canadians in the country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am happy to place before the House a number of petitions from people in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood who still believe that the goods and services tax can be defeated. They hopefully request that the government will take the necessary time to study the single tax as a constructive alternative to the GST.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I know the parliamentary secretary has applied himself with diligence in trying to get the answers to the Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers that I placed on the Order Paper at the beginning of this month. Thirty-one days have elapsed. There was a notice period provided before that. On October 17, I rose on a similar point. The parliamentary secretary said that he was doing everything he could to ensure that we got the highest quality answer.

I know that he may not have been able to get the answer, but I tell him in the spirit of reason and in appealing to his reasonableness and kindness, I wonder if he would agree today to adopt the two motions as orders of the House for the production of these papers. I am quite prepared to wait for a couple of weeks more for him to dig them out and table them in the House. Perhaps we could adopt the orders today and then there would be a House order demanding the production of the papers. That is all I am really asking for. If we have got the order, I am quite content.

I know the parliamentary secretary has researched this and I know he knows that the motions are asking for something that is in his power to give. Would he consent to adopting the motions today?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, flattery will get you a lot of places, but that is one thing I just cannot concede to.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on the same point of order. I have a request for the Production of Papers dated September 27.

Here again, it seems to me it would be a sign of co-operation on the government side, if these papers do exist, to make them available to us. The papers are very simple. All I am asking is for copies of correspondence from His Excellency and Her Majesty the Queen with regard to Section 26 of the BNA act. It is not very complicated.

If there is no correspondence, then say so. But if there is, then we can have an Orders of the Day maybe to debate that later on this day.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, knowing how astute and studious my friend is, I knew that he would be asking this question today. I did check once again to see where this information is. I am told that the the word "soon" does apply in this case.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all motions for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunications, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: There are 50 report stage motions set down on the Notice Paper in amendment to Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunications.

[Translation]

All of these motions are standing in the names of the Honourable Members for Mount-Royal, for Beaches-Woodbine, for Port Moody-Coquitlam and for Edmonton South-West.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, and 48 are in order and will be grouped for debate. Motion No. 3, while moved, debated, and negatived in committee, I have decided to accept as part of this grouping. I have done so as a result of representations from several hon. members about the significance of the motion. A vote on Motion No. 1 will be applied to Motions Nos. 3, 4, and 5. Motions Nos. 2 and 48 will be voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 6, 31, 35, 39, 49, and 50 are acceptable and each will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 7, 25, and 38 will not be selected for debate as these motions were moved, debated and negatived in committee.

[Translation]

Motions numbered 8, 9 and 10 are in order and will be grouped for debate. A vote on motion numbered 8 will be applied to motion numbered 10. There will be a seperate vote on motion numbered 9.

[English]

Motions Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 42, and 43 are related. Motion No. 11 was moved, debated and negatived in committee and Motion No. 43 is similar to it. The other motions are, in effect, a break out of the elements of Motion No. 11. After deliberation and consultation, I have decided not to select either of Motions Nos. 11 or 43, but I will select Motions Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 42. They will be grouped for debate but they will be voted on separately. Motions Nos. 16 and 17 are generally the same. Normally, neither would be selected at this stage as a motion identical to Motion No. 16 was moved, debated and negatived in committee.

• (1520)

Representations, however, from all sides of the House have emphasized the importance of this subject, and I have decided to allow Motion No. 17 to go forward for debate. I must also point out to the House that Motion No. 30 deals with national unity, as does Motion No. 17. These two motions will therefore be grouped for debate but will be voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motions numbered 18, 19, 20 and 21 are in order. They will be grouped for debate and will be voted on separately except that a vote on motion numbered 20 will be applied to motion numbered 21.

[English]

Motions Nos. 22 and 23 are in order and will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 22 will be applied to Motion No. 23.

Motions Nos. 24, 26, 27 and 28, all dealing with distribution undertakings, are acceptable and will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Motion No. 29, identical to Motion No. 28, will not be selected.

[Translation]

Motions numbered 32, 33 and 34 are in order and will be debated together but voted on separately.

Motions numbered 36 and 37 are identical and therefore, I will select motion numbered 36. It will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 40 and 41 are also identical, and I will select for proposal to the House Motion No. 40. It will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 44, 45, 46 and 47 will be grouped for debate. The vote on motion No. 44 will be applied to Motions Nos. 45, 46 and 47. A recapitulation of this ruling is available from officers at the Table.

I will now propose the first grouping Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 48 to the House.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, first of all, and I think I can speak for all of us who will take part in this debate, I would like to thank you and the table officers for the fine work in putting this together, and some fast work too, because I understand the government got in some motions that were pretty close to the wire, as did others of us. I want to thank the table officers, through you, Mr. Speaker, for their good work here.

I have one problem in a sense with Motion No. 6. I have a speaker who has to get to a committee, and I wonder if it will be possible to have the consent of the House, if that is in order, to have Motion No. 6 debated with the first group of motions, although I understand it would be voted separately? Could I ask for that?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has asked the House for consent. I am in the hands of the House. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be consent. It may be some time before the debate would get to it in any event. Perhaps the hon. member might be able to make some other arrangement.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 7 to 15 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

" "broadcasting" means any radiocommunication in which the transmissions are intended for direct reception by the general public, whether or not such transmissions are encrypted;"

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 28 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"another undertaking or person,".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 32 to 35 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"enlighten or entertain;".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 43 to 46 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

" "radiocommunication" means any transmission, emission or reception of signs, signals, writing, images, sounds or intelligence of any nature by means of electromagnetic waves of frequencies lower than 3000 GHz propagated in space without artificial guide;".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 3 to 6 at page 3.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications) moved:

That Bill C–40 be amended in Clause 81 by striking out lines 4 to 7 at page 50.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I will look with a great deal of interest at the amendment placed before us by the government, as I have just seen it this morning.

In the meantime, I would like to generally address this bill. The section that is being discussed now is in Part I and it is the definition section of the bill. I would suggest that it is a reflection of the problems with this bill. It is the key reason why this bill is flawed and unacceptable.

Unfortunately, although desperately needed in many of the new changes that have been made—and I think the committee under its several chairman did an outstanding job as well as the legislative committee—the government put in definitions that make it like building your Canadian house on the San Andreas fault. It is on a faulty foundation. It has been built with the potential to crack and split so that the balkanization of this country occurs rather than using this very powerful communication tool, this wonderful potential of infrastructure, or as the Prime Minister called it, "the central nervous system of our society", which will promote and communicate cultural values to our young generation, in particular. It will be maintained under federal jurisdiction to ensure that we have a common interest in common policies and a common modality of operation from coast to coast on all three sides.

That is not the case. Bill C–40 attempts to redefine broadcasting, thereby touching provincial jurisdiction in the way that it has been done. This could result in a provincial challenge to this jurisdiction. The problem is further compounded by a move to separate cable services—it is referred to as the undertakings—into programming and non–programming functions. This is a rejection, as the government well knows, of conventional legal practice which regards such undertakings as indivisible.

This principle lies at the very heart of the CRTC's ability to regulate broadcasting to balance services, costs, benefits and to ensure that Canadians have reasonable access and choice, regardless of whether they are looking at alpha numeric text, whether they are seeing stationary or moving objects, whether they are going to be entertained or informed or whatever the case may be.

This government knows very well that some years ago the Government of Quebec indicated its interest in regulating communications beginning with cable television. Recently, with the destabilizing factors that are going on in our society, and the questions that flowed from Meech Lake and everything else, we had some very serious concerns. Then there was the provincial minister of communications of Quebec expressing serious reservations about this being maintained in the federal jurisdiction. In her view, and she spoke quite candidly and openly, broadcasting and communication functions are culturally relative. It was her view, and I presume she was expressing the view of the Government of Quebec, that this was an exclusive jurisdiction belonging to the province of Quebec.

Constitutional experts have already pointed out that the challenges to federal jurisdiction in areas like broadcasting will now become inevitable because Bill C–40 seems designed to weaken any possible defence and indeed, to set the stage, for a devolution of authority and indeed the balkanization of service which would inevitably follow.

I suggest that this is sad. We are all very much aware that, as a general rule of statutory interpretation, when a term is changed in law, a new meaning could be ascribed to the changed term. This is very disconcerting.

We struggled long to ensure a balance of broadcasting services and programming choices across this immense land of ours. It is an equity that is still not fully balanced in terms of interests and resources, but we are getting there. We are getting very good.

Only if one would contemplate circumstances in which neither Canadian ownership nor Canadian programming is any longer relevant or important does this kind of voluntary abdication of the federal role make any kind of sense at all.

Regarding what I was referring to with respect to the splitting of the undertaking or the splitting up of the cable services, this proposed act would create a constitutional issue and give rise to dual regulation by splitting this whole undertaking into two parts: programming and non–programming.

I am going to quote from the CRTC, the regulator, which is a quasi–judicial court which came before the legislative committee. In fact, it has come before us on two occasions and said to us: "Be very cautious. Be very careful. You have changed the rules of the game. You have now taken the non–programming part out of the system."

This very arbitrary split is serious, and I would like to explain why. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that for constitutional purposes, broadcasting undertakings are not divisible into their component parts. That is what the Supreme Court said, the rationale being that as far as possible, no single undertaking should be subject to two separate masters or jurisdictions.

This government was well aware of that. In fact, it made provisions further on in the bill in clause 85, or 87 since we have changed the numbers, that it would now fall under other provisions.

The proposed legislation would require such a split and therefore would reopen the debate over constitutional jurisdiction, especially with regard to cable distribution systems.

The proposed act implicitly states that it does not agree with the 1932 Privy Council radio reference case which assigned federal jurisdiction through two arguments: that of peace, order and good government as well as that of radio waves which are interprovincial and international. They have suggested that this is wrong.

Second, the proposed act implicitly states again that the Supreme Court of Canada was wrong when it concluded that undertakings could not or should not be split. As the Supreme Court did decide in both the Dionne and the Capital Cities cases. It also said that with respect to the AGT, the Alberta Government Telephone case.

Legislation now invites provinces and others to start new litigation, but with federal jurisdiction on much weaker ground because the legislation itself admits that a split is a practicable alternative. I find that sad.

One example, typical of the problems associated with the splitting of undertakings, is the following. Engineering experts have advised us that the intellectual matter contained in the vertical blanking intervals of a television signal can be considered to be separate and apart from the main transmission. That is all gobbledegook to many of us.

What it literally means is that the broadcasters use this blanking interval to distribute closed captioned, alpha numeric material for the hearing impaired. The definition of "program" will therefore mean that the commission will lose its jurisdiction over this very important aspect of broadcasting.

It is rather ludicrous, because we just finished bringing the whole question of hearing impaired into the bill. So now we put it in. We take it out. We play games with it without even thinking of the consequences. It is really a sad state.

It should also be remembered that if alpha numeric material is not regulated, then alpha numeric networks could be freely set up and such operations could be owned by foreign interests. I sincerely invite the parliamentary secretary and, through him, the minister to rethink the serious implications of what they have done in their definition section. Without maintaining the jurisdiction of the commission as it is under the present broadcasting act, they have put this whole system in jeopardy and nonprogramming activities of cable licensees could fall outside the jurisdiction of this law.

I suggest that one regulator with jurisdiction over the entire undertaking would be able to ensure that programming has its primary place in the system. The CRTC could examine and then decide to exempt under clause 9.4 of the bill, and that would look after the concerns that we have if we return to the original definition.

Mr. Speaker, what is this TV set? I ask you that. What does the TV set in your home do? It informs you, it entertains you, it enlightens you, it gives you the weather, it gives you the stock market, the news, laughs through comedy, tears through drama, it educates you and your children. The minute you turn on your set it impacts on your life. It has a very special kind of place. You can even be a couch potato and enjoy it.

It is also a business, but it is a very special business that must be so treated whether it is home-shopping services, whether it is your favourite TV or movie, whether it is your favourite program such as Lance et Compte, E.N.G., Street Legal, Le Point, that is not the issue.

The government's attempt to produce a technology-neutral bill that is supposed to survive the time and introduction of new technologies is going to result in serious concerns and litigation. I would like to recommend strongly that we go back to the original definition so that we do not need to worry that this well-designed Canadian broadcasting system which can establish the unique cultural identity of our country in any man's language is ever put into jeopardy.

Therefore, I would move that Liberal Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 be reinserted in the definitions found in the 1968 Broadcasting Act. They have stood the test of time. I would suggest that in terms of Canadian content and the potential to siphon out much-needed advertising revenue dollars which are needed for Canadian programs can be more carefully reviewed by the CRTC. I remind this government that this is not the act for the sale of Canada. This is an act for the Canadian broadcasting system which impacts on the lives of our children and determines our future and who we are as a people.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill as a former NDP communications critic, moved on into the justice area, but I have with me my friend from Okanagan—Shuswap who—

Mr. Marchi: Are you still NDP?

Mr. Waddell: Yes, I am still NDP and proud of it, my friend. Proud of it.

My colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap, who is now the critic, will be working with me on this bill. This bill has been before us for a long time. It is a very complicated bill.

What we are going to try to do from the NDP perspective is to try to make it comprehensible to the average person who may be watching this debate, reading about it, or sitting here following it. We undertake to try and do that to the best of our ability.

The bill, as the previous Liberal member mentioned, is of immense importance. We do watch TV for news, entertainment, education, information, and soon we are going to be watching it and using it to order our pizzas, to do our banking, order our groceries. Indeed, we will even be able to replay our favourite hockey game, the hockey goal. When my Vancouver Canucks beat your team there in Edmonton, Mr. Speaker, occasionally, we will be able to replay the plays even in our own house. We see that kind of new technology that is always coming in.

There is immense power and immense money involved in communications and that is why this bill is of immense importance.

I want to outline a little bit, before getting to the first stage of amendment, the history of the bill. It has been a very long road indeed.

• (1540 )

In May 1985 the minister, who was also the minister then, created a task force on broadcasting, which became known as the Caplan–Sauvageau report. The task force reported in September 1986. In May 1988 the 15th standing committee report was a major report on broadcasting. In June 1988 the then Minister of Communications, Flora MacDonald tabled Bill C–136, which was the Broadcast Act. She also tabled Canadian Voices, Canadian Choices, a broadcasting policy document.

From July to August 1988, hearings were held on Bill C–136. We had 15 meetings, heard numerous witnesses and considered dozens of amendments. I am pleased to say that the government accepted six NDP amendments and two Liberal amendments, which is kind of unusual, but the way committees should work.

Our party's amendments were successful on matters dealing with multiculturalism, regional representations, equal rights for women and other groups, and other issues. In September 1988 we had six days of debate on the report stage. There were 92 opposition amendments and while some minor amendments were accepted, the government rejected the major amendments on the bill.

The bill passed third reading on September 28, 1988—that is about two years ago—and the bill died in the Senate three days later when the Prime Minister called an election which, unfortunately, he won.

In October 1989 the bill was back. This time it was called Bill C–40. It is essentially the same bill with five or six changes. I know the parliamentary secretary, my good friend, the member from Edmonton, has done a yeoman's job on this bill, and before that, in committee. The government should take notice of this fellow from Alberta. He is not in my party, but he has done a very good job in this House, and in committee beforehand.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Waddell: This bill passed second reading in December 1989. From January to March it was in a legislative committee. There were 65 amendments presented by my colleague for Mount Royal, the Liberal critic, and myself. Most were rejected, although I did manage to get the support of government backbenchers to pass a community broadcasting amendment over the government's objection. It was a great victory for me. Such things do backbenchers live for in this House. It was passed.

The major issues in the debate that we have been presenting are four. First, this government is Meeching and leaching the CBC. Leaching it by taking all the money away and not giving it enough money. "Meeching" it by taking away its ability to have a national mandate for national unity and by splitting the board into English and French. There used to be one board, now it is splitting it up. I call that "Meeching" the bill. There will be much debate about this later on.

Second, the cable industry is the big winner. I feel a little bit like the David against the Goliath of the cable industry here, but David is making a little progress. We want the cable industry regulated, like the phone company, so that people will pay decent cable bills. They keep going up and up and up.

Today I presented a petition with about 1,800 signatures. My colleague for Okanagan—Shuswap and I have had petitions from all over this country saying, "Let's regulate the cable industry, like we regulate the TV industry", but unfortunately this bill makes it pretty easy for the cable industry, and it gets off. They can even originate programming, so they are the big winners in this bill.

I have some amendments to level the playing field a little bit. That is what appeals to Conservatives, levelling the playing field, and that is what we are trying to do by some of these amendments.

Third, private television has not been doing its job in presenting Canadian programming, so we have some amendments to make them do that job, since they have the rights to the airwaves.

Fourth, the government is threatening, in our view, the independence of the CRTC, which is the body that regulates radio and television. In making this point, we have some reason to be critical of the commission, but we are going to advocate specific remedies to deal with this. Those will be our amendments.

Now let me just speak briefly to the member for Mount Royal's first group of amendments. I also have some in that group. Basically, by bringing forward Motion No. 3, the hon. member is attempting to delete the exemption from the definition of program for visual images made up largely of alpha numeric text. This is a dangerous exemption, and we support its deletion through this amendment.

Let me try to explain what that means. The government is attempting, by its new definition, to get the CRTC out of the business of regulating services, such as real estate advertising. You see that now on your TV. This potentially exempts such undertakings from Canadian content and ownership provisions. Everything that appears on television, we believe, should have reason to be there, and should either be licensed or not by regulatory authority. There is the potential conflict between regulated channels and non-regulated, or alpha numeric channels, for positions on the television dial.

Let me translate that into English. It means that on the TV dial there is CTV, CBC, but also real estate asking people to buy this and that. What the government does not want to do is regulate that real estate or shopping, or whatever. We think it should be regulated by the CRTC because everything on the dial should be regulated. It should be regulated because that ensures Canadian content. It ensure good taste. It ensures good quality of broadcasting. That is what this amendment is about. That is why we support the amendment of the hon. member for Mount Royal, which is the same amendment we have produced.

I will now sit down, having outlined the nature of our position on the bill. I do not know if I have to move a motion on my amendments in the first grouping, but if I do, I will.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to revisit these issues. As the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has indicated, we have been here before, and this time maybe we will get it done.

There was a distinguished Canadian broadcaster, who at one point in some discussions leading to the formation of broadcasting policy by the former minister, the Hon. Flora MacDonald, said to the minister, "Here's my advice, Minister. What I believe you ought to do is to repass the old bill and put a clause at the end saying 'this time we mean it'." There was a lot of pith in that comment.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Mount Royal and the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam for the contributions they made to this bill, the policy we have now and to where we are going. There are other members here in the House who have made like contributions, but I think even the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam will forgive me for a special mention of the hon. member Mount Royal, who has been at this at least as long as I have, and has truly come to these issues with passion, with commitment and with a growing depth of understanding of these issues.

Motions numbered 1, 3, 4, and 5 propose to amend three terms defined in the bill's interpretation clause with respect to the broadcasting, program and radio waves and to remove a subclause clarifying the meaning to be given to other means of telecommunication as it appears in the definition of broadcasting. These definitions are crucial to the bill since they serve to define the scope and range of activities which it governs.

First, it is important to know that the definitions are interrelated in that the definition of broadcasting is limited by its inclusion of the terms program and radio waves. This limitation is as intended.

Technological developments have broadened the range and types of information services that can be delivered to the home over telephone wires, by cable and fibre to television screens. Many of these services cannot properly be called broadcasting, and those services should not be regulated under this bill. This legislation is not about information services, which are different in nature from broadcasting. The law must be clear on that point.

On the one hand, this bill is about television programs and radio programs. We want to assure that these activities are regulated because they are cultural in nature and they provide a public service essential to the maintenance and enhancement of national identity and cultural sovereignty.

• (1550 )

On the other hand, there is quickly emerging a whole range of new information based services: interactive services, data base services and so on. These are mostly business services, weather services, shopping and real estate services, home security services and the like. These types of activities are not now regulated. The vast majority of these new services are not of a high cultural impact. The mere fact that they may be offered by way of a technology, which until recently has been used primarily for broadcasting, does not in our view constitute grounds for regulation.

The Broadcasting Act should not become an instrument for inhibiting the evolution of new information based services. It is for this reason that the bill has been devised in a technology neutral fashion, focusing on the activities to be regulated, rather than on the technology used for distribution.

That being said, it is important to note that the bill protects the integrity of the broadcasting system in two fundamental ways. First of all, distribution undertakings, such as cable companies, are required to give priority to the carriage of Canadian programming services and in particular to the carriage of local Canadian stations. Second, the CRTC is given express authority to require distribution undertakings to give priority to the carriage of broadcasting.

It has been claimed that the new definitions could give rise to jurisdictional battles over the regulation of broadcasting undertakings. Yet time and time again the courts have confirmed federal jurisdiction over broadcasting, and recently the Supreme Court confirmed federal jurisdiction over telecommunications. This bill does not jeopardize jurisdiction in any way.

This bill gives the CRTC clear guidelines about which activities are to be regulated as broadcasting. It also gives the commission the latitude it needs to determine how best to regulate undertakings which eventually become involved in both types of activities.

We cannot cling to outdated technological limitations as a basis for regulating a changing environment. The technologies used for broadcasting and telecommunications are converging and this trend appears to be inevitable.

We believe that it is entirely appropriate for legislation to state clearly how each of these distinct activities is to be regulated. We also believe that it is appropriate to have the same regulator govern both activities. The combined effect of amendments Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5 would be to leave unchanged the wide definitions in the 1968 Broadcasting Act. That would sweep into the scope of the new act many new services which were not foreseen in 1968 and for which there is little or no basis for regulation, broadcasting style.

In the face of technological growth, this approach takes the attitude, "When in doubt regulate". We believe that such an approach is not in the best interest of Canadians.

In our view the new definitions in Bill C–40 provide a more credible and solid basis for the regulation of broadcasting, while at the same time encouraging the evolution of new and exciting information services and the economic development that they entail.

With regard to Motion No. 2, this is a technical amendment and it was brought to the government's attention during the committee study of this bill, that the new definition of the term "network" could be improved to ensure that it covers any arrangement where control over all or any part of the program schedule is delegated to another body. It was pointed out that the existing wording refers only to situations where this control is delegated to another undertaking. In fact, however, this control can be delegated to a body not licensed as a broadcasting undertaking.

Upon further reflection the government concurred that amending the definition to include delegations of this type would more accurately reflect the realities of today's often complex corporate structures in the broadcasting system and accordingly, the government proposes that this amendment be made.

Finally, with regard to Motion No. 48, this motion proposes amendment of a clause which itself amends another piece of legislation. I am sure you are still with me, Mr. Speaker, the Radiocommunication Act. The purpose of the clause in general is to ensure that the new definitions in the broadcasting legislation line up with those in the Radiocommunication Act, since many enterprises must operate under both.

The Radiocommunication Act governs use of the airways for all kinds of purposes, including broadcasting and broadcasters are required to comply with technical standards established under this legislation before they can obtain a broadcasting licence under the Broadcasting Act. A number of changes were made to the Radiocommunication Act amendments at the committee stage. In the process of inserting these changes, the definition of radio wave, which does appear in the broadcasting definitions, was inadvertently repeated in this clause. This definition is not required here since the term "radio waves" is not used in the Radiocommunication Act. The effect of Motion No. 48 is to remove it.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the parliamentary secretary, who I think has done a yeoman's job, as have my colleague from Montreal and the gentleman from the New Democratic Party. I think all of them have worked very hard. If we have disagreements, which we do, it has nothing to do with personality.

I think the parliamentary secretary would like to leave us with the notion that all of this is very technical stuff. We are into a new broadcasting age, a new communication age, a new telecommunication age when all we are doing is changing definitions and updating the legislation which is all very technical stuff.

However, there is much more to it. Politics is involved. Let me explain. In The Globe and Mail just yesterday this government was described, and I usually do not subscribe to this particular columnist's opinion, but this columnist said that this was the most right wing government since R. B. Bennett. You would remember R. B. Bennett, wouldn't you, Mr. Speaker? Even I do. It was the most right wing government in the country.

When this government came to power six years ago it should have put out a shingle saying, "We are going to tear down the institutions of this country. We are going to put holes into the fabric of this country. Whatever was built up the last 40, 50 or 60 years, we are going to tear it down." We have seen it in spades all over.

It is found in this broadcast bill. The government is going to take the mandate of national unity away from the CBC. It is going to split the CBC board into two component parts, one for English and one for French. It is going to break the CRTC up into panels and make these panels into regional monsters. It is going to be wonderful for national unity. It is going to be great for governing this country.

It is already difficult to govern this country. This government is going to make it even worse. In fact, in a way, it has given up on governing the country. It would rather just give it to the market system and turn it over to the capitalists, or give it over to the multinationals, they can run the country better. If people believe that, I have swampland in Florida and I have fairy tales that will make one sleep at night for hours and hours.

Let us define broadcasting. What is the new Broadcasting Act going to do? It is going to balkanize the jurisdiction and services. It is going to split cable services with non-programming on one side and programming on the other. As my esteemed colleague from Montreal says, "What if you get this kind of split in cable services?" One is going to have home shopping on one side, along with real estate services and home security—that will all be very rich and profitable—then siphon off money from the other side, which will be programming.

Right? Is that the kind of situation that we want? I do not think so. We are going to balkanize the service and balkanize the jurisdiction.

The CRTC has, over the last number of years, developed a fairly good reputation as a strong national institution. Do we want to harm that institution? Do we want to weaken that institution? I do not think so.

I would like to interject with this. My hon. colleague from Montreal asked for some very germane information pertaining to this piece of legislation.

• (1600 )

In fact, my esteemed colleague from Montreal asked for the legal opinions from the department. Mr. Speaker, you would not think that would be very difficult. You would think we would all want to be a little bit more enlightened. We never got them. We are still waiting.

Not only that, but my esteemed colleague from Montreal also filed an access to information request. Guess what? We are still waiting. The question is: What is the hon. parliamentary secretary hiding? What is the hon. Minister of Communications hiding? What is the government hiding? God only knows. When it comes to asking for some, what we would consider to be, legitimate information, the government is not forthcoming.

I think it is absolutely important. It is paramount in the country, particularly at this time, that we keep our national institutions strong and viable. If we do not, the country is going to be in a lot more trouble than it is right now. There are forces at work in the country, right now, right in the House. They would love to undermine the country. They would like to break the underpinnings of this nation. We find them all over the country and in almost every nook and cranny of every institution. We cannot succumb to that, because if we do, the country has not got long to last.

We spent a long time, over 100 years, building up a great country and strong institutions that bind the nation together. It is a huge country and sparsely populated. We need these ties and bonds to keep the country together and to help it grow in unity.

We do not see in this piece of legislation that that is being pursued. The strong central institutions that the country requires are not reflected in this piece of legislation. We do not see it in the new definition of broadcasting. We do not see it in the national unity mandate for the CBC. That mandate would be taken away. We do not see it in the splitting of CBC board of directors. We do not see it in Balkanizing the CRTC.

We think the government has made a serious mistake, a mis-step, if you wish. It is consistent with its ideology, but it is a serious mistake. We would submit that it go back to the original definition. It has served us well. There is no need to fiddle with this. It is risky. It is dangerous, and it will serve no good.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address the bill at this stage.

It is quite a comprehensive document. As the newly appointed critic for communications, arts and culture, I have had to burn the midnight oil to come up to speed on a lot of this, which amounts to a very technical and technological bill, to say the least.

My colleagues and I in the New Democratic caucus are certainly relieved to have this bill finally come back before the House. As my colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, was pointing out earlier, this bill has been a long time coming. We have seen it at least partially presented in the last Parliament when it went through three readings in this House and finally to the Senate. Essentially, it died on the Order Paper in the Senate at that time.

Now, the bill in somewhat amended form was brought back to this House last November for initial debate and was stalled at that time because of the government's preoccupation with the whole Meech Lake fiasco. All of us in the New Democratic caucus feel very strongly that the country needs a revised and comprehensive Broadcasting Act.

The current act takes us way back to 1968 and much has happened, as we all know, since that time. We have been inundated with technological change and a technological revolution that has been taking place in the country over 10 or 12 years. We have seen the introduction and the very rapid growth of a cable industry that was almost unheard of at that time. There is a real need for a serious look at the legislation and a serious attempt to update and modernize the legislation in terms of today's technology.

The legislation we have before us, although it has some glitches and wrinkles we hope these amendments will be able to smooth out, is very, very critical for Canada, because broadcasting touches all of our lives. It does not matter what age we are at or where we are at in the country, broadcasting touches all of us just about every day. It is an extremely important tool for building a consensus of identity in the country and for building a consensus for national unity in the country and, believe me, we certainly need a consensus on national unity at this point.

Broadcasting to the 1990s is really what railways were to Canada in the 1800s. It is a mechanism which binds the country together. It ties us together and it builds a family relationship from the east coast to the west coast. Broadcasting is essentially crucial to our democratic process.

Over half of Canadians say that broadcasting is their principal source of news and information, and over 95 per cent of Canadians are radio listeners. That is why, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, this legislation is so critical and that is why we have taken very, very seriously, as opposition critics, our challenge to make sure that the legislation before the House at the moment is fine-tuned and honed, so that it can do the best job possible in light of technological changes today.

We are presenting 12 or so amendments at this stage, and there are a number of others which will be debated also. But these amendments can be grouped into four main themes or objectives in terms of what we see needs to be beefed up in the current legislation.

First, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as my colleague pointed out earlier, is being both Meeched and leached. It is being leached in that it is being drained of the life blood needed for the corporation to do the kind of job that it is mandated to do. It needs the kind of funding that is not available through the current legislation. It is being Meeched in the terms that it is being divided, as was stated earlier, into two entities. Our amendments will try to strengthen the CBC mandate and to stop government steps which we feel are working to remove or water down the national unity concept that is part of this bill and, also, to split the CBC board into French and English units which we feel may be essentially counterproductive.

On the second front, the cable industry is really the big winner in this bill. Our amendments will hopefully present our position that the industry should be regulated as a carrier with rate of return legislation. Its ability to originate programs should also be limited, as should its—at this point, anyway—almost unrestricted ability to import foreign programming.

• (1610 )

On a third front, Mr. Speaker, are the private broadcasters. In Canada, private television has not been doing the kind of job in terms of creating truly Canadian programming that it should be doing. It has not been fulfilling that very important mandate in terms of broadcasting as a tool for nation-building. It has been falling down in that area, and I think that there needs to be safeguards in this legislation to make sure that it does fulfil that mandate.

The fourth point is with regard to the CRTC. Through this legislation, the government essentially is threatening to compromise the independence of the commission which is very vital in terms of the issues facing the broadcasting industry in Canada today. In making this point, I hope that we will also be able to present reasons to be critical of the commission, to advocate the commission as it will be structured, and to advocate specific legislative remedies that we feel will give it the correct direction.

I know my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, but in terms of the motions before us, I want to speak specifically in regard to the first group of motions.

This group of amendments basically deals with the definition section within the bill. Motion Nos. 1, 4, and 5 deal basically with a possible threat to Canada's jurisdiction over broadcasting. Motion No. 3 is identical to the one that was presented by my colleague at the committee stage. It essentially opposes the government's measures to separate the services provided by broadcasters into programming and non-programming areas.

With respect to Motion Nos. 1, 4, and 5, I just want to read a comment made by the CRTC in a brief presented to the committee earlier. It states says that the new act may, through the definition of broadcasting, lead to a reopening of now judicially subtle federal-provincial disputes over broadcasting, stirring up old wounds and legal issues. We can see that some of the directions in which this bill takes us are clearly running us into some troubled waters.

I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker. As the debate unfolds, I will have opportunity to comment in more detail on the many amendments are being presented by my colleagues, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, and the Liberal member for Mount Royal.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we are at a time in our history when we almost seem to be going through a minor nervous breakdown in the country. There is so much depression out there. The economy is not working for us.

An hon. member: It's true.

Mr. Mills: Yes, it is true. It is pretty eerie. To spend a weekend in Toronto and then come back here is like being in two different countries.

Traditionally in this country, the Broadcasting Act has been an instrument of national unity. It has been an agent for galvanizing the will of the country. I cannot understand why the government wants to remove those words, especially at a time when we are all so fragile.

I think of situations that have happened in the country in the past when we decentralized certain activities of the national government to the province. Never once did the province take a pass on the responsibilities that we gave to them. They maintained those powers and they exercised them with all of the resources that they have.

What concerns me is when we take a broadcast bill, such as Bill C-40, and remove the words "for the promotion of national unity", we are going to have jurisdictional disputes. Suddenly we will have a situation where the Government of Canada will have a particular point of view on an issue and a particular province will have its own definition of what its priority objective is all about. In a cultural objective, whose will is going to reign supreme? Is it going to be the national will? Or will the national will be subservient to the provincial definition?

I am very nervous because there are broadcasting situations that are evolving right now where the regulator is telling broadcasters that their English-French component of music, say, will be 60 per cent English and 40 per cent francophone. After two or three months the owners of the radio station will come back to the regulator, the CRTC, and they will say: "I can't make a go of it with 60 per cent English. I need 90 per cent French and 10 per cent English." But the regulator will say: "Well, I am sorry. We are the ones that give this definition."

The next thing we know, we are going to be in the Supreme Court where we are going to have the national regulator, the CRTC, going to court with a provincially operated jurisdiction. The CRTC's traditional role has been through the Broadcasting Act to be concerned for the national good and national unity.

Under this new formula the provincial jurisdiction, I believe, has a valid case, because we are really saying in this act that it is the provincial cultural thrust that we must become more extremely sensitized to. Once precedent is set, Mr. Speaker, in a court like this that, we will ultimately have a situation where there will be eight or ten different cultural ghettos all across the country, The CRTC will have absolutely no ability to regulate a national thread or a national will. It will have no ability to drop the hammer and say: "Look, there are things that are good in Halifax that are good in Toronto, and that are good in Vancouver." In other words, the commonness that makes us good will no longer be there and no longer can be regulated.

Because of the very special power that the Broadcasting Act has, whether it is cable, television, or radio, I think we are really putting ourselves into a very precarious situation by not putting up a very strong objection to the words "national unity" being removed from this bill.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise today to speak in support of the Liberal motions, particularly those motions that relate to the question of the CBC and broadcasting remaining in the federal jurisdiction.

What we are talking about here is a question of national unity. We are talking about an instrument of national unity, a tradition of national unity, and an institution that Canadians have looked upon since its invention as an instrument of national unity.

Later in these motions there will be specific references made to withdrawing the term that calls for the CBC to be an instrument of national unity from the Broadcast Act. I consider that, and I know that millions of Canadians would agree, to be a travesty. I consider it to be a form of sale of our birth right.

I remember 15 years ago, the first time I left Halifax and moved to British Columbia in my first job after I finished university, being particularly home sick, even though the west coast is a lovely place. I can remember listening to CBC with even more of a fervour than I did at home because it reminded me on a daily basis that this was one country from coast to coast. Listening to the news, The World at Eight every morning, listening to As it Happens every night at six, hearing the same voices giving the same news items, the same stories, the same programming right across the country was a reassuring event.

Along with that, before I left the maritimes to go to the west coast, I had been in graduate school in Great Britain. I can tell you again that the Canadians would stay up until all hours to get Radio Canada International to hear our own news, to listen to hockey games, to keep our contacts with our own sense of Canadianism that Canadian broadcasting has always given us.

For my generation, the post-war baby boom generation, we began with radio and we set wave into television. Again, I remember things that reinforced my sense of Canadianism that came from the various broadcasting institutions of this country.

I remember as a small child watching a program about children in Winnipeg. That is a city that I would not visit until I was in my late twenties, but when I got there I recognized Golden Boy, and I knew how cold it was on the corner of Portage and Main in the winter.

I look at what this bill will do to this institution of Canadian unity. I am sad and I am shocked. I look at the various things that this government wants to do and I see it as part of the pattern that we have all been forced to live with since this government was unfortunately re-elected in 1988. What we see is a wholesale destruction of Canadian institutions.

One of the other things I look at here is the separation of the CBC board into two standing committees; one in English, one in French. That is really Canadian apartheid. We sit here today, knowing that our whole future constitutionally as Canadians is in difficulty, to understate the case, in jeopardy, not to overstate it. Instead of ensuring the ongoing health and welfare of an institution that can be a major force for Canadian unity, we are again trying to divide and compromise this nation.

We have to listen to each other in every region and every province. One of the best ways for listening to each other is through the use of our broadcast institutions and in particular, from my point of view, through the use of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

When the Caplan-Sauvageau committee recommended the removal of the term "a force for Canadian unity" from the Broadcasting Act, they made a mistake. They made a mistake so grievous in nature that we are all going to be living with its ramifications for a long time to come. One of the things they said was that they felt that the use of the CBC, or using those terms as a force for Canadian unity, would hinder programming that could reflect the multicultural aspects of Canada, a linguistic duality, and so on. Mr. Speaker, where I come from in the province of Nova Scotia, they would have hard terms for that. The best way I can put it is to say that it is a lot of codswallop.

Why should we think that being a force for Canadian unity will diminish anyone else? Why did our ancestors come here? Why did we come here, in the case of some of our members that sit in the House? Why do people want to live in Canada? Because it is a wonderful country, because it is a diverse country, because it has all these bizarre and strange regional poles and pushes, and because we spent a great deal of our time contemplating our differences as opposed to thanking God for our blessings. But, people love this country in every single province, and they love it through their national institutions. They do not need to be told that being in favour of Canadian unity and pushing for Canadian unity is going to somehow diminish them as members of their own particular cultural groups. I cannot see how anyone could possibly make a case for that at the best of times.

I remember a long time ago being at a meeting of young people in Nova Scotia and a young man from the highlands of Cape Breton was discussing with another young man, who was the son of new Canadians. He had been born in Canada but his parents had come from western Europe. The young man of Scottish descent, in the accent that I will not attempt to reproduce, but it is a beautiful Cape Breton accent—it is very much like my colleague from Dartmouth actually—said: "If you want to know how to preserve your culture, come to us in Cape Breton and we will show you". It is very true. With regard to the Cape Breton culture, in the words of that very famous, and justly so, son of Cape Breton, Hugh MacLellan, the incidence of the kilt in Cape Breton arose commensurately with the incidence of the tourist. But Scottish culture in Cape Breton is strong, and one of the reasons it is strong is the CBC policy for Gaelic programming on a weekly basis on CBC Radio in Sydney.

The CBC was a great force in creating the Department of Celtic Studies at St. Francis Xavier University, with which some people even on the other side of the House have more than a nodding acquaintance.

In closing, let me merely say that it is stuff and nonsense to suggest that being a force for Canadian unity could possibly hinder any Canadian's development, self-expression or cultural wholeness. The federal jurisdiction must be maintained if the CBC and broadcasting in Canada is to retain the moral authority that it should have and if Canada is to have a way to speak, and Canadians are to have a way to speak to each other for the rest of what could be a wonderful future.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of the opportunity to speak briefly about Bill C-40.

Let me just say, in listening to the eloquent words of my colleagues, the hon. member for Mount Royal, the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and others who have spoken about their concerns for national unity, the implications for national unity, and the implications for federal jurisdiction as a consequence of the passage of this bill as proposed, it strikes me as incredibly ironic that today we, in Parliament, have been given notice that the government will shortly put forward a motion for consideration by Parliament a federal initiative to deal with the question of constitutional renewal in Canada.

• (1630)

We are told that tomorrow the Prime Minister will speak to the House on that subject, that there is on the part of the government a recognition that in the vacuum of leadership that has been the reality here in Ottawa vis-à-vis the Constitution and post Meech Lake, that there is in the country an exercise in Quebec that is now under way.

There is an exercise in the maritimes under way. There may be one beginning in Ontario. The western premiers are doing their thing with respect to the future of the country. Suddenly, there is an understanding that the country cannot be defined from the perspective of a particular region or province. It has to be defined in the place and from the jurisdiction where every voice and every region is represented and where true consensus can be found, the Parliament of Canada.

The Prime Minister says: "Tomorrow, I put down a motion and tomorrow I, the Prime Minister, begin the debate." How ironic that against that backdrop, that recognition that the country more than ever is Balkanized, divided, needs national institutions, against that backdrop today before us in the House is a bill having to do with the future of broadcasting in Canada which contributes to the Balkanization of Canada that has given rise to the need to have a debate starting tomorrow.

That is why members of the opposition, my colleague the critic and member for Mount Royal, will be proposing so many important amendments to this broadcasting bill. I tell you this bill as drafted and as it sits is not acceptable to my colleague. It is not acceptable to the Liberal Party, because this bill is not a contributor to the kind of solution the Prime Minister says he wants for the deep division and wounds that have scarred the soul of Canada. It does not contribute to healing.

It contributes to further division. We make a plea to members opposite to understand this is not just a parliamentary exercise. This is not a critic undertaking her responsibility to examine a bill and to make some proposals so we can say at the end of the day: "We did our job." This is a heartfelt plea to understand the consequence and the importance of broadcasting in Canada.

Fundamentally, Mr. Speaker, when you strip away the institutions, when you privatize the Petro-Canadas, the Air Canadas, the post office, when you take down the federal flag in the smallest community in the last point on the east coast of Newfoundland, the only mirror and symbol of the nation that is left is the ability through the CBC to come into the hearts and homes of Canadians no matter where they live and to hold up the mirror no matter where they live in Canadian society. That is what the CBC is, a huge mirror.

Sometimes it tilts on the Atlantic. Sometimes it tilts on Quebec. Other days Ontario and sometimes, the west. It reflects ourselves back at us. We do not always like what we see. We do not always even agree with what we see, but it is a focus on Canada. It is a mandate that includes the concept and the responsibility to contribute to national unity.

Do you know what, Mr. Speaker? My riding is in the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland: Port au Choix, Cook's Harbour, Croque, Griguet or Harbour Deep, a place you can only reach by boat or by airplane. Only 200 souls live in Harbour Deep.

There is no Global, because there is no advertising revenue. There is no CTV—I do not blame them—because there is no advertising revenue. There is no cable television—I do not blame them—because there is no advertising revenue.

Harbour Deep is connected with its country. It is connected with Canada. There is no post office there anymore either. It is connected with Canada, because it receives the CBC. Why does it receive the CBC? Because the CBC is mandated to be there. Cynics could suggest this bill is the first step on the road to privatization of the CBC.

We hear those who do not understand Canada, who have never seen beyond the concrete and glass towers of our large and sometimes beautiful and wonderful urban centres that there is another Canada. They talk about the CBC budget of $1.3 billion. They say: "Look at CTV. Look at how much cheaper it is. Look at Global. Look at the American networks. Look at cable. What do we have the CBC for? We can put junk programming in front of our children and the families of this nation without the CBC" but, Mr. Speaker, none of them will be found in the smaller communities of this nation. None of them will turn the mirror and reflect this country back to the Canadians who live in the rural communities of this nation, in our north, in the west, in the Atlantic, in northern Ontario, and northern Quebec. None of them will be present, or have the mandate to be present, and more important—and this is most important—none of the other networks will reflect those tiny communities back to Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, or Ottawa.

That is the nature of the institution that is CBC. That is the importance of it, giving the country an opportunity to understand itself, to share each other's problem and potential, to share each other's joy, each other's culture, and language, and song, and tradition, and history, and aspirations.

This bill is not a regulatory exercise, a tinker here, and a tinker there. It is not a response to a private sector whose mandate is the bottom line.

The airwaves do not belong to the shareholders of a private concern. They belong to me. They belong to 26 million Canadians no matter where they live and they are held in trust by the government, by the Minister of Communications on behalf of 26 million Canadians who own the airwaves, and the government has to exercise that trust on behalf of all Canadians with care.

I say again at a time when already in this country we increasingly reflect almost a modern-day tower of Babylon, where people are speaking in every region, each with a different message, speaking at each other but not to each other, making noise but not listening. The nature of the broadcasting régime in Canada becomes very important. What is particularly important is the nature of the CBC.

The fabric of this country is rendered, it is torn, it is held only in this day of great cynicism and as my friend from Broadview—Greenwood said, great depression, by a few threads. Some of those threads, are the CBC. We sever them at our peril.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I only want to speak two or three minutes. It is not my intention to delay the vote on this particular motion which I hope will take place in two or three minutes.

I did want to take the opportunity to congratulate the previous speaker because he spoke of something which is important in my part of the country as well. I think it is important for all of us.

I also want to take a brief moment to congratulate the member for Mount Royal for her efforts in improving the proposals of the government in this regard. The member for Mount Royal is quite expert on such issues and she has acquired a reputation here on Parliament Hill in terms of her knowledge of communications, the arts, and culture.

I want the House to know how important it is for us as a country to continue to have a good and viable national broadcasting system. The member for Humber—St.

Barbe—Baie Verte said eloquently some moments ago that in certain parts of this country it is indeed difficult to have access to programming other than what is produced by the CBC. Of course he was referring to Canadian programming.

In some communities it goes beyond that because in fact you either get that or nothing at all.

• (1640 )

Let us use as an example my own constituency in which, of course, programming is available even without the CBC. Some areas are well equipped with cable television. In other areas, not nearly so lucky, the major Canadian networks are generally available. I am referring to the commercial types.

What is important for us to remember, I feel, is that even for those areas that are well served by the private sector in terms of providing radio or television programming, it is economical for them to purchase their programming elsewhere, rather than produce their own. There is what I would call an almost irresistible temptation not to produce anything and simply to purchase it. When I refer to purchasing it—particularly in the English language—it all comes from the same place, that is of course south of the border.

[Translation]

The situation is somewhat different with French programming because we have two options. Programming is either produced here in Canada—mainly, but not exclusively, in Quebec—or imported from Europe, because our U.S. giant has yet to find an efficient way to produce French programming. However, even in that case, Mr. Speaker, there is an additional dimension. U.S. programming is purchased and a so-called voice-over is added, which means that what we hear is a Translation of the English version.

What we see in French and in English, but especially in English, is programming that makes our young people experts on Detroit or Miami, while they are incapable of telling us what Winnipeg, and in some cases Montreal or any number of other Canadian cities even look like.

[English]

That contributes to the lack of knowledge that we have of each other as Canadians, that the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte was referring to in his excellent discourse a few moments ago. The fact that we know through television cities in a different country and landscape in a different country far better than we know our own in Canada.

I had occasion not long ago to visit the constituency of Churchill in Manitoba, a place I had never been. I saw there something absolutely beautiful, something that 99 per cent of Canadians and probably even a greater percentage have never seen—possibly never will see—that beautiful tundra landscape and the land of the polar bears.

I had never seen that in television programming except for one day last year when the polar bears all went into the community of Churchill. It made The National that night. Three or four days later, most people did not remember that event. When I described my experience of having visited that community some weeks ago to my constituents, most of them did not remember that feature of roughly the same time last year on our national, publicly-owned television because, of course, it is something that only happened once, and we are not reminded of it.

Compare that to what I call the Miami Vice phenomenon, where the streets of Miami and other cities in south Florida are seen on a weekly basis on television simply because that is part of a regular program which is produced for a very vast audience in the United States and then is sold at a relatively low cost to Canadians because of the very low unit cost of producing it.

This has a dual problem for broadcasters because the program is relatively cheap to buy from elsewhere, and because it is seen on the cablevision channels on the U.S. side and transmitted here—it is available to U.S. channels anyway—it gives the broadcasters two reasons to show them to us on our Canadian television stations and networks.

The point I am making is that there is a tremendous need for us as Canadians to realize how precious our institutions are and how important it is for us to cherish them and to try to improve them. From time to time members of this House are critical of the CBC. They will say that their leader or themselves or someone else did not get favourable coverage, the CBC costs a lot to maintain anyway and so on, therefore why do we have it. It goes beyond whether or not on a particular day one of us got good or bad television coverage on the news. It goes more to the proposition that we need that institution for our national unity.

We need the CBC and public broadcasting generally, that includes TV Ontario and others as well. We need them as an instrument of national unity. We need them at a time, that again was described by my colleague, when we see the flag of Canada on the post office being removed. We need that at a time when other instruments of national unity are being destroyed or privatized or altered by the government.

I say this to the government across the way, but I say it to all of us as parliamentarians, that we must do our utmost to cherish those institutions that have kept us together. These institutions are even more important in an age of advancing telecommunications, institutions that can contribute to keeping us together and united in the future.

[Translation]

I realize I may have taken up more than my intended two or three minutes, Mr. Speaker, but I did not intend to speak to all the motions. I simply wanted to inform the parliamentary secretary and other members that I consider these instruments to be very important and that I wish everybody would realize that we have the tools to help build our national unity. Safeguard it, improve it, but let's not do anything to diminish or destroy it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to recap by saying a vote on Motion No. 1 will be applied to Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 and Motions Nos. 2 and 48 will be voted on separately.

The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 2 standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 2 agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 48 standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion No. 48 agreed to.

• (1650 )

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, normally at this point we would be proceeding to Motion No. 6. I think you will find that there is consent to delay consideration of Motion No. 6 until after we have dealt with the next cluster of motions in order to accommodate the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will proceed with Motions Nos. 8, 9, and 10, which are grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 8 will be applied to Motion No. 10. Motion No. 9 will be voted on separately.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-40 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 18 and 19 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"provide programming that is predominantly Canadian, using predominantly Canadian crea-".

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-40 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out line 21 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"and presentation of programming, in particular in the prime viewing hours between 19:00 and 23:00 hours on television, unless".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-40 be amended in Clause 3 by adding immediately after line 5 at page 5 the following:

"(vi) provide a reasonable opportunity for the public to view the productions of Canada's autonomous public film producer and distributor, the National Film Board of Canada;".

She said: Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting aspects of having worked so closely with the parliamentary secretary, with the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and my other colleagues in this House, has been the sense of putting aside ideological differences as we examined the Caplan-Sauvageau report minutely. We came up with recommendations that jointly we felt were in the best interests of Canada and the Canadian broadcasting system, whether it be the public or private sector or the educational or community sector. We were all very aware of the sensitivity and the impact that this particular medium has on the way of life of all Canadians and its impact on children, in particular.

I remember when we were at Meech Lake for the decisions as to how we were going to deal with these various amendments and suggestions that had been so carefully considered by Caplan-Sauvageau. One of them related to the predominantly Canadian content of our television system. When one turns on the television set, one has to ask a question. How much of what we are watching is Canadian and how much do people realize is not Canadian? When your children think that Rambo is a great Canadian hero, we must ask ourselves some questions. It is really serious when it gets to the point when they do not know whether Ronald Reagan was the president of Canada or the President of the United States and Mr. Mulroney was busy singing and dancing with Irish eyes a' twinkling. It is a serious matter that this Conservative government ought to take into consideration.

The future of who we are and what we will be is what is going to come through on this very pervasive medium. The committee determined that television should be predominantly Canadian, in terms of the hardware, the lights, the camera and the action, but also in terms of the software, or the intellectual material that was going to be included on our screens.

What was important was that our writers, books and scripts would see the light of day and that our singers and songwriters voices would be heard and that we would have our actors and our actresses on the stage and screen. They would not be there in exclusivity because Canadians do not live in a narrow, confined world.

Canadians are globetrotters, Canadians are producers of all kinds of wonderful material that can compete anywhere in the world, whether it is in the field of song, dance, literature, music, we are wonderfully competitive. But we need access to the medium so we can produce and control some of the distribution of these things, so we can have the materials that will allow us to have a predominantly Canadian presence.

In a world where we watch television as our major leisure activity, where we spend more than 24 hours a week before our TV set, and our Canadian children spend more than 1,000 hours watching television as compared to only 800 hours in school—and sometimes I wonder what they learn in school because what they bring home as values is what they see on that screen—if we do not stop to consider the Canadian way of life, a less violent way of life, a more accommodating way of life, a highly multicultural, multiracial way of life, which has respect for diversity, respect for cultural differences, respect for linguistic differences and the promotion of those values, then how do we expect our children from east to west to maintain that difference on the global map if we do not include predominant Canadian material?

While 95 per cent of Canadians listen to radio, they hear an awful lot more Canadian content material than they do on their television sets. Seventy-one per cent of all programs viewed by Canadians on English television are primarily American. What does that do to our thinking? What does that do to our vision of ourselves, our pride of self, our heritage, the development of our own heroes? Ninety-seven per cent of our screen time is made up with foreign, primarily American material. It is big business. It is billions and billions and billions of dollars of business. Well, let's keep a few of those billions here and use them to promote Canadian content.

Seventy-five per cent of our book market, 71 per cent of our periodical market, consists of imported foreign products.

[Translation]

I wish we could have a measure of protection the way we have in French, even it is not 100 per cent, which of course we would prefer, but at least in French we have some measure of protection and we are proud to be Quebecers, Canadians, French Canadians, because of the quality programming that is produced right here.

[English]

We on the English speaking side are so busy trying to be the American dream because we think that we can market that product, which is really a camouflaged American product, not as first class but as second class, and the minute Canadians produce first class programming and Canadians fall in love and understand the nature of the program produced, all of a sudden, we hit the Cannes Festival and we are very successful, we hit the Montreal Film Festival and we are very successful, we hit all international festivals and our products sell.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that we need this amendment that I have brought in here that does not allow our cable companies and our broadcasters to weasel out and buy less expensive, not that they are less quality, but less expensive American programs, because they are trying to globalize the world of television and have that income flow to them.

More important, we have to be able to produce our own Canadian shows so that we can have access to top quality material. At the same time, I add my voice to that of the National Film Board when they appeared before us. I cannot for the life of me understand why this government is not prepared to accept the National Film Board's material as a partner in the development of this Canadian content, they have won more Oscars, more international awards than any other agency in this country, or any private sector. We should be so impressed with its accomplishments, particularly in the women's field where Studio D has won international acclaim. I cannot understand why the government is so stubborn that it cannot take an opposition motion that makes good solid sense and include it in this bill so we can have a better made-in-Canada operation. That is the goal of the Canadian broadcasting bill, to have a Canadian broadcasting system.

I will take just a couple more minutes to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that I would sincerely hope that the government will change its mind and include the National Film Board, with its thousands of wonderful creative programs that look at all the issues that are important to Canada and to Canadians, seen through Canadian eyes, written about by Canadian writers, and add that in the distribution to our screen.

I would call on the government to show an openness of mind and spirit and to accept "predominantly Canadian" which it accepted itself at a unanimously tabled document by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this group of amendments. Motions Nos. 8, 9, and 10 are grouped for debate.

Motion No. 8 is the motion of the member for Mount Royal to whom I should also pay tribute for her great work in this area over a number of years. She has been on the communications committee longer than I was and has done a lot of work on this matter.

Having said that I would point out, with a bit of a twinkle in my eye, that my Motion No. 9 is a little bit more specific than her motion. Her motion would substitute:

"provide programming that is predominantly Canadian, using predominantly Canadian crea–"

My amendment states:

"and presentation of programming, in particular in prime viewing time between 19:00 and 23:00 hours on television, unless"

Here is the problem that has been pointed out by all sorts of committees. Canadian television stations, both public and private, but especially private, are not producing enough Canadian content, enough Canadian drama, good Canadian programs. They are making progress, partly through what we as MPs have been doing telling them in committee, but they have not been producing the kind of programming that is necessary. Let me say a little bit about that.

The amendment deals with the amount of Canadian content presented in prime time—that is what we are concerned about—by private broadcasters. At present the rule states that 60 per cent of Canadian programming is required in an 18–hour broadcast day, from 6 a.m. to 1 a.m., calculated over a year. That is the rule.

In the evening, 6 p.m. to 12 p.m.—notice that broad time— public networks must present 60 per cent Canadian content and private broadcasters must present 50 per cent. The problem lies in the definition of prime time.

In television circles, in the industry, the real prime time is between 7 p.m. and 11 p.m. I see the member for Hamilton—Wentworth over there. He knows this area very well and I think he would concur with what I am saying. The CRTC's definition has effectively allowed private television to get around its obligations by providing news between 6 p.m. and 7 p.m. and 11 p.m. and 12 p.m. People who are watching this in British Columbia, my home province, know that B.C.–TV news, for example, is big between 6 p.m. and 7 p.m. and 11 p.m. and 12 p.m.

In the remaining four hours, only 25 per cent Canadian content is needed on average to meet this requirement. The result is American sitcoms. There are a lot of them on private stations, and not Canadian drama. Moreover, the reporting periods for measuring Canadian content have been changed from the CRTC from monthly to quarterly to annually. This has allowed private broadcasters to dump much of the Canadian content in the summer months, so it is even worse.

Let us look at drama, because this is the real domination. I will just give some examples. We looked at this. From 6 a.m. to 2 a.m. viewing, it was 30 per cent Canadian and 68 per cent U.S and for 7 p.m. to 11 p.m., it was 24 per cent Canadian and 74 per cent U.S. By programming type it was, for the news, 92 per cent Canadian and 8 per cent foreign. So Canadians are watching Canadian news. For public affairs, it was 68 per cent Canadian and 32 per cent foreign. When it gets down to drama, it is 4 per cent Canadian and 96 per cent foreign. That is where it really shows up.

For the average anglophone teenager, 80 per cent of their viewing time is spent watching foreign programs.

[Translation]

I see my friend and colleague, the NDP member for Quebec. In Quebec, for Francophones, for young Francophones, it is 50 per cent.

[English]

Francophone teenagers spend 50 per cent of their viewing time watching foreign programming. For young people particularly, and Canadians generally, when it comes to movies and drama, it is 4 per cent Canadian and 97 per cent foreign. In terms of variety, music and quizzes, it is 22 per cent Canadian and 78 per cent foreign. This is an area that we have to make progress in.

According to the task force on broadcasting, of the 52,000 hours of English television programming available to the average Canadian family, barely 370 hours are Canadian drama. That is 370 hours out of 5,200 hours. In French language television, it is 27,000 hours. That is a bit better, but it is 630 hours of Canadian drama. Ninety–eight per cent of all drama on English television is foreign. You can see the problem. Every report on broadcasting in recent years has agreed that the private sector is not doing its job in producing Canadian programming.

I am not naive, Mr. Speaker. I know how difficult it is to produce Canadian programming and how much more expensive it is to produce a half hour of Canadian drama as opposed to buying Dallas or MASH or some other American program. One has to sympathize, but one also has to say to Canadian private broadcasters: "Come on. You've got to do better. You've got to do more. You are making good money from the airwaves, you've got to produce more drama."

Gerry Caplan, testifying before a House committee said:

> We have a broadcasting system that, when most Canadians are watching it each night, feeds them a daily diet of predominantly, indeed overwhelmingly American programming in the name of meeting the objectives of the Broadcast Act.

The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, which my friend, the parliamentary secretary, chaired, stated:

> The Committee considers it evident that private television has been making an insufficient contribution—The private sector is earning 50 per cent return on investment.

The brief of ACTRA also suggested that there were good profits, but not enough Canadian content.

The government's response to the private sector, which in television especially is making significant profits using the public airways and yet not doing its job in producing Canadian programs, is minimal. They have ignored the task force in broadcasting which called for 45 per cent Canadian content between 7 and 11 p.m. The only response in this bill is found in clause 11 where the government proposes to the CRTC the possibility of a performance incentive. It laid out how that scheme would work in their policy document, Canadian Voices, Canadian Choices, which it tabled with the bill.

There has not been a single witness before the legislative committee on either one of these two bills who thinks this scheme will work. Not the unions, not ACTRA or CUPE, not the private sector, Western International Communications, Canadian Association of Broadcasters, and so on—and not the commission. Nobody. At best, they all said it would be little more than a licensing fee.

We have a scheme here. I will call it performance incentive. No one supports it, but it is still in the bill. My amendment here would specifically in this timeframe require a percentage of Canadian content. I suggest that is the way to go.

• (1710)

The motion is also necessary because the commission has refused to get tough with the private sector on content issues. Despite this appalling record of promises broken, the condition of licence is not lived up to by private broadcasters. I challenge anyone to find a private sector broadcaster whose licence has been revoked by the CRTC. There is not one.

The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture doubted the commission would ever revoke a licence. It stated: "We do not believe that the commission will in fact suspend the licence of a network broadcaster". This is why we need an explicit direction in this legislation.

This amendment reflects the spirit of many briefs to the legislative committee and the Caplan–Sauvageau report. If private broadcasters are forced to present Canadian programs in prime time, they will have no choice in my view but to produce quality programs in order to gain advertising revenue. This is the thrust of this amendment. I think members should support it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand today to address the proposed amendments to the broadcast bill, Bill C–40, specifically the predominantly Canadian content and the role of the National Film Board. The predominantly Canadian content and an important role for the National Film Board are the two critical issues.

Before I get into a precise argument with respect to those amendments, I do want to point out that I obviously have a number of other concerns about this bill. I am quite certain that the new definition will be challenged and clearly the most important question being raised is whether or not there will be a federal role for communications as a result of what is happening.

There is concern as well with the regionalization of services and whether or not there will be a number of fiefdoms that will created that will further weaken the country. Those are concerns that need to be raised because they are clearly extremely legitimate.

The whole notion of separating the English and the French is one where I have personally mixed feelings because clearly I would have believed and I wanted to believe, if there was one level of government that could have institutions where those two groups could work in harmony together and synergize, it would be at the federal level. I suspect that this is probably being done because there is some unhappiness. There is something at work there that is not positive at this particular point in time, otherwise it would not be doing it.

I have another concern that is related to that one. If that happens, as is proposed, how will this contribute to a possible new definition of Canada? Will it go a long way toward defining Canada as two solitudes, an English one and a French one? With respect to the French one, are we going to be primarily concerned about the French in Quebec as we ought to be to a significant degree by virtue of the numbers there? Are we going to abandon, or forget, or be less sensitive to les francophones hors Québec?

[Translation]

Why more Canadian content and why involve the National Film Board of Canada?

[English]

I want to look at the power of the media, the power of television and radio. We know that we need information on an increasingly regular and important basis. We recognize that our attitudes are formed by the knowledge and the information that we receive. We know as well that it is important to have Canadian information, Canadian content so that we can form attitudes about ourselves as Canadians, about the role that we occupy in this world in juxtaposition to other countries, and about the kind of economic, social and cultural development that we want for our nation. Where do we want to go as a nation?

Clearly, those are the kinds of questions that we are going to be exposed to by television and radio. Clearly, if the content, the attitudes, and the values are Canadian, that is going to be extremely helpful. If it were not, what kinds of conclusions are we going to reach? We need to talk to each other, as many of my colleagues have said. We need to recognize that we have important regions, such as the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, the Atlantic provinces, our western provinces, and our great north. Will this contribute to helping us to reach out and to talk to each other? Will this kind of orientation that we are taking now prevent us from realizing the true nature of Canada, not only with regard to these five regions of which I speak, but our aboriginal people. Clearly, our aboriginal people are unique in many ways to the country. We have an important French language population. It is roughly 7 million Canadians. We have a number of important people who come from groups other than aboriginal, French, or English. Clearly we also have the majority group, the English. Will this bill really contribute to identifying those particularly unique groups, and let us talk together and build a stronger nation? Those are questions that are a real concern to me.

One of my colleagues mentioned this particular institution, the CBC, and communications, in general, as potential instruments to national unity. It can be if it is handled appropriately, but will it be?

Why is it that we, as politicians, are often anxious to get in front of the camera and to be listened to on the radio? It is because we recognize the power of the media. We recognize what radio and television can do for us, for our parties, and for our ideas. If it can do that for us, it can do a lot for the country. Let us review some of the facts that some of our colleagues have shared. They are important because they emphasize and corroborate the points that I am making with respect to the power of the media.

Children watch roughly 1,000 hours of television, roughly the same amount of time that they spend in school and perhaps a bit more. Ninety-five per cent of Canadians listen to the radio 18 hours a week. That is almost as much time listening to the radio. Fifty per cent of Canadians use as a principle source of information, radio and television; 75 per cent of our books now used and read are non-Canadian; 70 per cent of our periodicals are foreign; and adult Canadians who listen to English language television and radio are listening to 70 per cent non-Canadian content.

These are really very powerful facts that speak to this dimension that we are trying to discuss today. That is, the need to have additional Canadian content and to involve the National Film Board which is a unique instrument to speak eloquently about some of the specific and particular features of our nation.

We need news and programs which are Canadian based and which have Canadian values. We want our own performers. We want to see them, encourage them, and develop them. Let us recognize that within that whole industry, there are important jobs for Canadians. If I have a choice, and without wanting to take anything away from anybody, I would want Canadians to get special and preferential treatment in this particular area.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as I just said, this bill is less than perfect in a number of ways. First of all, there is a new definition I think will cause some serious trouble. The main question we must ask ourselves now is: will there always be a major role for the federal government in communications?

I also think that although regionalization may be positive, it can also have a negative impact. I am really afraid that if the country is divided into five regions, we will not communicate often enough and there will be major differences that will cause serious trouble in this country.

As I said earlier, as a Francophone by birth, as a French Canadian, I wonder, if the federal government does not have an institution where Anglophones and Francophones can work together in harmony and can both help to create a favourable climate for generating new ideas and stimulating creativity, what level of government will be able to do that and how Francophones outside Quebec will be treated if we go ahead with this bill.

• (1720 )

[English]

I notice that I am coming to the end of my time, and I shall terminate with one comment.

Some people would say—I do not say it unkindly—that this fits "the Tory way". It is the dismantling of what we have known to be Canada. We have seen the dismantling of VIA Rail, Air Canada and the sale of Petro-Canada. Now, people are concerned as to whether or not this will lead to privatization, whether or not this will in fact be a continuation of the Tory vision of Canada. I hope not.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support these amendments.

The words "predominantly Canadian" should be words that make us very proud. In my previous life, in my normal life—all of us had a normal life before we came to this institution—

Mr. Boudria: Maybe this is incarnation.

Ms. Clancy: No. Same incarnation.

One of the things that I did was to work as an actress mostly on stage, but also on television and radio. It was not a full-time occupation. It was an avocation, but it gave me the opportunity to meet and to know some of the absolutely incredibly creative people who make up the world surrounding theatre, broadcasting, writing, producing and directing in this country.

As well, I spent four years doing political broadcasting on the CBC. That, too, introduced me to a wealth of people in the area of public affairs programming, again on the CBC.

Over the years, in the creative arts in Canada in particular, in the last 20 years we have seen a real sea of change for Canadians. Young people who wanted to write, act, produce and direct were no longer convinced that they had to leave here and go to the United States, not just to make a success but to make a living.

They were discovering that, because of rules relating to Canadian content, they could stay in Canada. Indeed, there were even people who had the temerity to set up television studios, to create television programs and do advertising, make films and so on in Nova Scotia. Imagine having a creative ability and being able to stay in the province of Nova Scotia to make a living. What a miraculous development this was for people with the creative urge.

I spoke before on the question of the federal jurisdiction and what it means to Canadian unity. I think the words "predominantly Canadian" relate more to a sense of Canadian self-knowledge and Canadian pride. I am sure that every one of us in this House has, at one time or another, listened to those wonderful radio programs on the CBC that deal with the antics of those of us who sit here in this Chamber.

I would bet that even when the barbs fly your way, Mr. Speaker, you would rather hear jokes relating to Canadian politicians than jokes relating to George Bush. You would rather hear satire based on the Canadian political experience than on the British, the American or whatever. I think those are givens for Canadian citizens.

More important, they form a basis of our Canadian identity and reality for our children so that they do not make all of their decisions and choices in life based on what is essentially a foreign culture.

In the early days of CBC television programming, again I remember—I am not going to get into the Winnipeg bit again because if I do I will only get heckled by my own side—the programs for children. I remember

Uncle Chichimus, for example, which was a puppet show that long predated—

Mr. Harvard: Howdy-doody.

Ms. Clancy: Howdy-doody, indeed, although that was a direct steal from the Americans.

I remember Chez Helene which for many Canadian anglophone children was the first place that they learned simple French words. They learned how to count in French. They learned the fact that there were two languages in this country, and it was a tremendous opening, a tremendous bridge between what my colleague from St. Boniface referred to as our two solitudes.

I want to refer very briefly to the amendment of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam and say that we support this in our party as well, but we would remind the House that while it is important to have predominantly Canadian content in prime time viewing, it is important to keep Canadian content throughout the day in our television because children watch more than just prime time. Women at home watch more than just prime time. Senior citizens watch more than just prime time.

It is absolutely essential that the majority of those programs continue to make use of the Canadian experience and Canadian creative ability. To waste that is really a scandal and a terrible misuse of the resources that we have in this country.

I want to say that we all know, as ACTRA has said, that Canada is a culturally occupied country. This is something that we were seeing turn around over the last 20 years. We were seeing a change, as I said before a see-change, in the attitudes of Canadians toward their own programming.

I remember very well 30 years ago if you saw something coming on that was supposedly a CBC production—well in Nova Scotia we did not have the cable channels that we have now. It was CBC or nothing as my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said.

Mr. Comuzzi: CTV.

Ms. Clancy: No, we did not get CTV until the mid-1960s. Thank you, my colleague from Thunder Bay.

We did not watch because we had been conditioned to think that if it was Canadian, it was somehow inferior. I believe that Canadians have been reconditioned. I am not saying that everything that gets produced in this country is good. Far from it. But let us have the opportunity to be good, to be mediocre, to be indifferent. Let us have the opportunity and let Canadian talent, Canadian ability, and Canadian creativity shape this cultural institution, shape what we and what our children will be watching on television.

I believe, and I suspect that most members of this House would agree with me, we might be quite a bit better. We certainly could not be a whole lot worse.

I also want to speak briefly on the whole question of the amendment relating to the National Film Board. The National Film Board is a treasure in this country, beyond counting. My colleague from Mount Royal talked about Studio D and some of the films that have been made by Studio D. One of the films, Black Mother, Black Daughter spoke eloquently to the situation relating to black women in my community of Halifax-Dartmouth where 95 per cent of the indigenous black population of Canada live. This is also the same studio that made the film Not a Love Story which is recognized world-wide as a major instrument in the fight against pornography and the fight against the stereotyping of women.

Along with that we have the wonderful film Speaking our Piece which brought Canadian women together with women in the Soviet Union in the quest for peace, and we have the equally wonderful film against nuclear proliferation called If You Love this Planet.

If the National Film Board is not to be included in this bill, I do not know where we are going and I do not know what has happened to the compass of the cultural fate of this country. It is clear that if we can leave the National Film Board out of the broadcast bill, if we can leave the National Film Board out of our future plans for the cultural enrichment of this country, for the cultural planning of this country, then our cultural ship is sinking.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the next speaker, a point of order by the hon. member for Calgary West, the Government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to Presenting Reports from Committees, and I think you will find that that consent exists.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed, and so ordered.

BROADCASTING ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunications, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and on Motions Nos. 8 and 10 of Mrs. Finestone (p.14956), and on Motion No. 9 of Mr. Waddell (p.14956).

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, in the cluster of motions that we are now debating is Motion No. 7, which can be summed up in one sentence. The amendment would require that not only the resources being used to create the programming be predominantly Canadian, but that the programming carried by broadcasters be predominantly Canadian.

What does that mean? It means that it is not only our desire to have producers, directors, writers, actors and actresses, all of them Canadian, but we also want to see in the final product a Canadian program on the screen. In other words, we want to see Canada on the screen. We want to see and experience our joys and wonders, our happiness, our controversies, our conflicts, our hurts, and our sorrows. We want to see literally the heart and soul of Canada on our television screens. That is what this proposed amendment is all about.

It is wonderful in terms of employment and creativity to have Canadians employed in the industry, and hopefully they are doing it for the Canadian market, not just for the world market, but Canadians have to feel that the final product is indeed Canadian and reflects their culture and their country.

That is why, for example, I hoped that the National Film Board would be written into Bill C–40, because as my colleague from Halifax said a few moments ago, the National Film Board is a treasure. It is one of the great Canadian institutions developed over a number of decades, and its product, its great works, should have access to our television screens, not only the CBC, but CTV and Global, all the independent stations. That is the way we should go. The National Film Board should be given that opportunity and access. Bill C–40 will not do anything for that.

It has been mentioned on a number of occasions how much we use radio and television in this country, how pervasive it is, how much we use it. For example, and this perhaps has already been pointed out, watching television is the number one leisure activity for Canadians. I am not sure whether that is a happy fact, but it is a fact. I can also tell you that we spend more than 24 hours each week, on average, in front of the television screen. I do not think that is a happy fact at all. Canadians would be better off with a more varied kind of leisure activity.

Spending that much time watching television is far too much.

Canadian children watch almost 1,000 hours of television compared to the 800 hours they spend in school. That is not good. Canadian children spend far too much time before television screens. However, having said that, even if we can be concerned about Canadians watching too much television, one would hope that at least the programs that they are watching would be Canadian in the main. That is not true.

It has already been said and pointed out on a number of occasions, and this quote is attributed to ACTRA, "that Canada is a culturally occupied country". It is so true. If we had visitors from another planet visiting this great country, I am sure that they would be shocked if they were told that 71 per cent of all programs viewed by Canadians on English television, are primarily American. I am quite sure that if our visitors from another planet were told that, they would say: "Are they crazy? Have they gone mad? This is a wonderful country." Yet, we allow this kind of thing to happen to us.

If we told our visitors from another planet that 97 per cent of screen time in Canadian cinemas is devoted to foreign material, primarily American movies, what would our visitors from another planet say? They would probably say: "Are they gone mad or are they absolutely crazy?" But it is a fact. What if we told our visitors from another planet that 75 per cent of our domestic book market and 71 per cent of our periodical market consists of imported foreign products. That is mostly American. What would they say? They would ask: "Have you gone crazy? Are you nuts?" That is what they would say.

Let me point out one more thing. What if they were told that 85 per cent of Canada's sale of records and tapes, manufactured in Canada, are from imported master tapes? If our visitors from another planet were told that, they would flip right out and would be asking if we were mad, crazy or nuts.

That is one of the sad parts of the Canadian story that we have not come to grips with. It is absolutely insane that we allow this kind of dumping of American programming into the Canadian market. It is not good for this country.

If it is looked at in a broader context, it really does not come as any surprise. We do this to ourselves all the time. For example, recently we had our government sell Air Canada, a proud national airline. It sold it off and is shameless for doing it. Now it is going to sell a part of Petro–Canada. If it had its own way, the whole lot would be sold tomorrow morning. The only window that we have, as a government and as a public policy instrument, on the petroleum industry, this Conservative government is going to get rid of, maybe not all at once but it is going to be sold. There is a lot more because it is all interconnected, it is all related. This is a government that decided we are going to share our energy resources with the Americans. Why, we will even go beyond using good business sense, even in a moment of deprivation, even if we were facing shortages. We will share our energy. We will share our natural gas. We will share our oil with the Americans. Not only that, it eviscerated the National Energy Board. It took the guts right out of it. It just pulled the entrails right out of the NEB and said, "When it comes to natural gas exports, it does not have to have any net benefit to Canada, not at all".

Let me get back to this bill. It seems to me that this bill does not serve the broadcasting system, it does not serve productions and it certainly does not serve increasing Canadian content on our television screens. I would have thought that this kind of an amendment would be quite acceptable.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I just want to put a few facts on the record in connection with this cluster of amendments. Just before doing it, I want to comment. The hon. member for Winnipeg St. James was alluding to people from Mars, which does not surprise me. I was reminded of the fact that the last time we had a man from Mars routine on radio in this country, which I believe was in 1938, the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission ruled that those political commercials, which they were at the time, which were voiced by Messrs. Aberhart and Manning, were improper. Questionable though they may have been in their content, fortunately that is not something that would happen today because we have a much more liberal interpretation of free speech.

The amendments that we have before us have been the subject of much debate during the consideration of both this present bill and its predecessor, Bill C–136. It replaces a reference in the current Broadcasting Act to the effect that the programming provided by the Canadian broadcasting system should be of high standard, using predominantly Canadian creative and other resources. In other words, to meet the letter of the law at the moment, a broadcaster must have predominantly Canadian employees and spend Canadian money.

In Bill C-136 this provision was replaced with the following formulation: "Each element of the Canadian broadcasting system shall contribute in an appropriate manner to the creation and presentation of Canadian programming making maximum use of Canadian creative and other resources". The application of Canadian resources was thus specifically tied to the production of Canadian programming. The word "predominant" was replaced with the word "maximum" clearly indicating that simple predominance would not suffice in circumstances where the broadcaster could do more.

The expression "in an appropriate manner" recognized the emergence of new services such as TV5 which have had as their raison d'etat the presentation of a large amount of non-Canadian programming for special audiences. A blanket requirement that all licensees present predominantly Canadian programming would eliminate such services from the Canadian broadcasting system.

Even this stronger wording was improved upon during committee study of Bill C-136 where the paragraph was replaced with the formulation now under consideration. The amended wording now reads: "Each broadcasting undertaking shall make maximum use and in no case less than predominant use of Canadian creative and other resources in the creation and presentation of programming unless the nature of the service provided by the undertaking, such as specialized content or format, or the use of languages other than French or English, renders that use impracticable, in which case the undertaking shall make the greatest practical use of those resources".

The formulation now in the legislation is identical to that passed by this House on September 28, 1988. Under the circumstances it is difficult to understand why one would wish to revert to language which does not compel broadcasters to do as much Canadian programming as possible.

As for the suggestion that a specific reference be included to ensure application of this standard to the presentation of programming in prime viewing hours, the paragraph as worded already encourages such an application. The CRTC is in the business of making regulations detailing the Canadian content requirements in prime time. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think that is the proper approach.

The legislation sets out the general standard, and the regulator adds a further degree of specificity, taking into account changing industry viewing patterns and so on.

Who is to say that prime time, given sociological change during the life of this bill, might shift as indeed it has shifted in my lifetime. I recall that prime time radio hours were the evening when people would cluster around their radio sets in the family home. I remember that well, and I believe even my colleague from Mount Royal may remember it if she thinks back far enough.

The obligations in this legislation are already much more stringent than those they replace. In my view, the clause we are discussing will do the job it is intended to do, and no further amendments are necessary.

With regard to the amendment on the National Film Board, nothing in the current act or in this bill inhibits the National Film Board from finding broadcast windows for its productions. Indeed, many NFB productions suitable for broadcast have found broadcasters willing to present them.

Currently, NFB documentaries and dramas are often shown, for example, on Vision TV. Moreover, the board has coproduced prime time dramas with the CBC and with other broadcasters.

However, it is important to note that the NFB does not have a broadcasting mandate and is not required to present balanced views in its productions. In actual fact, most NFB productions reflect a strong point of view in the treatment of their subject. That is the nature of documentaries.

While this makes for provocative, stimulating and often award winning films, it does not always make programs suitable for broadcast. Indeed, a common problem that broadcasters have faced in considering NFB productions is the need to find and to set aside equal time for programs with opposing viewpoints.

Broadcasters are the persons licensed to make programming decisions. It would seriously undermine the accountability expected from broadcasters to authorize unlicensed entities, however worthy, and to make use of the broadcasting system as a legislatively mandated outlet for their work.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to support Motions Nos. 8 and 9 to amend this bill, especially because as a member from Quebec, I think it is extremely important to have Canadian content in CBC programming. However, I am prepared to go even further, Mr. Speaker. I think it is essential, if we agree that we should have Canadian content in our programming, to include in our programming policy a preference for a French news network that would broadcast on a continuous basis, what in English is called an all news network or all news programming. We don't have this yet in French. My French-speaking colleagues are no doubt aware of the fact that this kind of programming exists in English but not in French. And when we talk about Quebec as a distinct society, why is Quebec distinct? It is distinct because French is spoken, because we have a French culture, because our laws are different, being based on the Civil Code. That is why, when we are talking about content, we must provide a framework for this content in the form of an all news network in French.

I see here in the House some of my friends who are also former journalists with the electronic media, and they know very well that the general public is extremely interested in the news. That is why, the all news network, all news programming, is so popular among Anglophones. The News World Network is very popular, but in Quebec no such service exists. In other words, this type of service is extremely important.

However, there are other reasons why I feel Canadian content is important when setting up an all news network in French. Now that the government is adopting or imposing legislation to introduce the goods and services tax, better known as the GST, people will read fewer books, and some people have said that book sales will drop by 25 per cent. This means that if Canada has an illiteracy rate that varies between 25 and 28 per cent, more and more people will get their information from news broadcasts on radio and especially on television.

I entirely agree with the focus of Motions Nos. 8 and 9, which is to increase Canadian content, but I think this should start with an all-news network in French to meet the needs of Quebecers and French-speaking Canadians who want to know what is going on in the world and Canada, and want to hear it in French. This is very important.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, I must say that although I am in favour of Canadian content with an all-news network in French as a starting point, I feel some concern that the news may be biased and lack objectivity. Why? Because Radio-Canada may become compelled to act according to criteria that disturb me, and I am referring to the one about national unity we find in the bill.

I am all for national unity, and I imagine my colleagues are as well. We are all in favour of national unity. Members here in Ottawa are all in favour. As a former journalist, I worked for Radio-Canada in Quebec City for three years, in French, and I worked in English at CFCF, as the hon. member is aware. I also worked at the Gazette as a columnist and, finally, I worked at CKVL Radio in Montreal. That a bill should contain a clause that includes promoting national unity as part of the mandate of a network like Radio-Canada, gives me the shivers. Not because I am against Canadian unity but because I am a journalist. I think I understand what people, like my Liberal colleagues want to do. They want to make this dream come true of Canadians living in harmony from coast to coast. That will never happen! There will always be dynamic tension between West and East and between Anglophones and Francophones. That is only normal. That is what Canada is about. It is a little like political parties that get splintered. This is a pretty accurate analogy of the fragmentation of our society into West and East, Francophones and Anglophones.

It is not necessarily a bad thing. In fact it is positive. That is why I think the Canadian content rule is very good, and I agree it is important, but I have some reservations about promoting Canadian unity. As a journalist, I feel that the main objective of a news broadcast should be to present the news honestly, clearly, accurately and quickly.

I think that if we accept these criteria, we will improve our services at Radio–Canada and at the same time, we trust journalists and Canadians to decide what they want.

In concluding, I would like to say that John Milton, in his famous pamphlet Areopagitica, said: "Let (Truth) and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?" That is the CBC's mission, and that is why I feel that I must support Motions Nos. 8 and 9 because we need more Canadian content and more unbiased content.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it is a great pleasure to join this debate in the criticism of the bill, as organized by the member for Mount Royal. There are some excellent criticisms.

In ending the debate today, I would like to say that I am not too sure I am facing a government any more. Lately, it does not matter what I am talking about in the House, I am finding that this government is destroying the underpinnings of our country.

Yesterday I was speaking about financial institutions and the changes the government is suggesting there. It is just terrible what it has been doing. It does not matter what we stand up to talk about because this group across from us simply do not understand Canada—at least not the Canada this party has tried to build, a country that we are very proud of. The cornerstone of that country has been CBC and the promotion of Canadian content.

As a consumer of the CBC and as one who listens to it and who enjoys CBC very much, I cannot understand how this government would do anything to undermine its mandate. There is a national purpose to the CBC. That is why we created it. It has been over 50 years in operation and is a corporation which, like any other Crown Corporation, has had its ups and downs. It never wavered from the commitment made by its employees to try to do the best to ensure that Canadians received the same message from one part of the country to the other.

Those of us who travelled across the country and have had the good fortune to live in many regions of the country, understand just how CBC pulls us together. I can tell you that before I took on this life as a member of Parliament, I used to contribute to a show on CBC, the radio show with the host Jack Farr, a very entertaining show. I was always amazed that people from the four corners of the country had heard that program. No matter what the item was, they managed to be entertained. It gave me a feeling that this country was more than just dollars and cents, but that there was a purpose to this country, a purpose that people enjoy.

I am just beginning to show how this piece of legislation—

PRIVILEGE

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Wednesday, October 3, 1990 the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park rose on a question of privilege concerning the meaning of the oath of allegiance taken by all duly elected members and the duties and obligations of members relating thereto.

The Chair undertook to consider the matter carefully and to return to the House. I am now prepared to rule on the matter. The ruling I am about to deliver will touch not only on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, but on other important issues raised by other hon. members during the discussion which ensued.

Let me preface my decision by saying that as your Speaker I am well aware of the importance of this matter, not only to hon. members, but to constituents across the country. Events of recent months have once again sharpened the focus of the Canadian public on members of this Chamber and the role they play in Parliament. Many constituents have contacted their members of Parliament to express their views. Though their views may differ and differ sharply, the passion with which they hold those views is striking. Indeed, it is precisely because these views are so passionately held that the real issue can sometimes be obscured. The Chair hopes today to clarify the situation for hon. members and perhaps no less importantly for the public who are watching us.

[Translation]

First, the Chair will deal with the precise point at issue, namely the validity of th Oath of Allegiance taken by the hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

As all hon. members are aware, Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 requires all Members of Parliament to take an Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen or to make an affirmation in lieu thereof before being allowed to sit or vote in the House of Commons. The wording of the oath dates back to 1867 and derives from the oath then used in the British Parliament. It reads as follows:

[English]

I—

—and the person's name is given—

—do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II.

I point out that that is the oath and it is limited to these very brief words.

Thus, the taking of the oath is a constitutional requirement and only those members who have taken and subscribed to the oath are allowed to take the seats in the House of Commons.

As Beauchesne pointed out in the fourth edition of his of Rules and Forms for the House of Commons of Canada, Citation 16(1):

It is not the oath that makes a person a Member of the House. He must be a Member before being sworn in—The object of the oath is to allow the Member to take his seat in the House.

[Translation]

On August 27, 1990 the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, duly elected by his constituents on August 13, made a solemn affirmation and signed the Test Roll. In so doing, like all other hon. members, he became entitled to take his place in the House and on September 24, 1990, when the House resumed sitting, the hon. member was introduced and took his seat.

The current controversy springs from events of September 23, 1990. On September 23, the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie made another statement outside this Chamber expressing his loyalty to the people of Québec. This statement, as the hon. member for Shefford has pointed out, is very similar to one of two oaths taken by members of the National Assembly of Québec. The hon. member for Shefford sees no contradiction there. He argues, "—l'un n'empêche pas l'autre."

But this viewpoint is not universally shared. Others contend—contentions that have been fueled by media reports and commentary—that the events of September 23 cast doubt on the legitimacy of the oath taken August 27.

[English]

Your Speaker is not empowered to make a judgment on the circumstances or the sincerity with which a duly elected member takes the oath of allegiance. The significance of the oath to each member is a matter of conscience and so it must remain.

The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie has stated very clearly in the House that he has in no way repudiated the oath of allegiance he took on August 27. The hon. member said:

[Translation]

> I never mocked the Canadian Parliament nor the Queen. I swore the oath of allegiance with all due regard for the democratic institution that the Canadian Parliament is.

[English]

Whatever construction the media has put on the situation, whatever the perception or misperception of the events of September 23, it is a fundamental principle and long-established convention of the House to accept as true the word of an hon. member. The Chair must therefore conclude that there has been no breach of privilege as contempt.

[Translation]

That being said, it is important to view this situation in its entirety. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie has been unambiguous on his perspective and that of his colleagues:

> We insisted that it is with the outmost respect for Canadian Parliamentary institutions that we are sitting here, while insisting that we would strive to achieve Quebec's sovereignty as soon as possible.

[English]

As the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has eloquently stated, the fact that an hon. member holds views which are vigorously opposed by other hon. members can in no sense be allowed to detract from his right to present them.

A historical perspective on parliament here in Canada and in Great Britain reveals ample precedent for the presence in the House of duly elected members whose ultimate goal may be at odds with, even inimical to, the constitutional status quo.

Only the House can examine the conduct of its members and only the House can take action if it decides action is required. Should the House decide that an hon. member has in some way committed a contempt, then it is for the House to take the appropriate steps.

The Chair wishes to thank all hon. members who participated in the discussion of these important matters. The freedom of all members of the House to represent their constituents and to perform their duties is a cherished right. The Chair hopes that the airing of these issues has helped to clarify the situation so that the work of the House can carry on in the best traditions of this place. I thank hon. members.

PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Ottawa and Nepean who object to the goods and services tax. In particular, they object in so far as it applies to books and the printed word.

These petitioners note that books have been free of tax in Canada since Confederation. Indeed, I think it is a fact that they are free of tax in almost every other civilized country on earth, but now this Tory government is going to impose a goods and services tax on books and the printed word.

These petitioners, like so many millions of other Canadians, are opposed to this tax. They call upon the Parliament of Canada to reject the tax.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to place before this House petitions from many people from my riding who are urging the government to honour the commitment it made in October 1988 when it put funds forward to begin the cleanup of the hot spots in the Lake Ontario area.

Of course, the worst of those hot spots is the Don River which flows through my riding. We are hoping that the government will soon honour its commitment to begin that process.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions signed by hundreds of Canadians from Halifax, Dartmouth, Winnipeg, Fredericton, New Brunswick and Ottawa in which these people state that they are appalled at the imposition of the GST on books and magazines.

They call upon Parliament to reaffirm historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

They add most particularly that it is an egregious error to tax such books as the Bible and the Koran.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, we were just discussing the fact that the Bible and the Koran are being taxed by this new nefarious and poorly conceived tax, the goods and services tax which, as you know, is so regressive. It is hurting the people across this land, and they do not want it.

I have hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of petitions from Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Northwest Territories, ad infinitum. The petitioners do not want this tax on books.

As my colleague so aptly said: "Not on the Bible; not on the Koran; not on anything whether it is plain literature, religious literature, a magazine, a book or a newspaper." Get rid of the GST.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions with several hundred names on them.

The petitions are from a number of communities throughout the Algoma—Manitoulin area including Tehkummah, McKerrow, Espanola and other communities, calling on the government to withdraw the goods and services tax.

It would have to do that in the Senate now, because the bill has passed here, but these constituents of mine and other people are fully opposed to it. They want the bill and the tax withdrawn. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the public opinion polls this morning, 75 per cent of Canadians want the tax defeated.

• (1120)

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present three petitions today, all asking the Government of Canada to withdraw the imposition of the government's goods and services tax as it relates to books and literature. The petitioners are from such communities in Atlantic Canada as Halifax, Dartmouth, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, as well as individuals in Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, we urge once again that the Government of Canada see its way clear to axe the tax and to prevent the GST from being presented on books and literature in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table in the House today a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, to the effect that proposing a tax on books, newspapers and magazines is a measure that is absolutely regressive. Your petitioners, in fact there are several dozen here, maintain that the free circulation of printed matter is the cornerstone of our democracy, our culture and our education. They claim that an educated and productive society would be adversely affected by a measure that would impose a tax on books.

Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to confirm the principles which, for many years, have formed the basis for exempting printed matter and to provide for such exemption in the GST bill to be implemented on January 1, 1991. Otherwise, this government will go down in history as the government that put a tax on books, reading and knowledge.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present these petitions on behalf of western Canadians. It is inconceivable to these Canadians that with the high rate of illiteracy and all of the efforts and resources going to that, the government would put a further tax on books, especially in my area in the north where reading is one of the delights of western Canadians. A tax such as this will not be tolerated by them.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by people from all over Ontario, as it applies to the goods and services tax on books and literature. These people call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and the regulations.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too take pleasure in presenting to the House a petition from people in St. John's, Mount Pearl, Manuels, Topsail, Portugal Cove and yes, Mr. Speaker, from Paradise itself. These people in Paradise and elsewhere are outraged by what is an outrage. They have given me a petition to present to this House, knowing that the Government of Canada has never, since Confederation, done what this government is about to do. That Confederation was the one in 1867. The real one, of course, was in 1949 when two countries came together, but they are talking about the first one.

They are saying that never in all that time have we taxed the Bible. Never have we taxed learning. Now, this crowd, in addition to running us into the ground want to make us Godless and illiterate, as well.

I support the petition completely and ask that the government mend its ways and stop taxing the Bible and books. Do not be such cowards.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present two petitions today. First, I have a petition here signed by 553 residents of Edmonton and surrounding areas. All of these people are unanimous, as are countless tens of thousands before them, in calling on the government to reject the proposal for a goods and services tax and cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the burden of tax on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of real tax reform.

CABLE BROADCAST INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): While I am on my feet and apropos some business that will be before the House today, I would like to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians. They point out that cable companies made an average of 32 per cent profit on fixed assets in 1988 or more than twice the level of the regulated telephone companies. They point out as well that cable prices increased by 6 per cent annually between 1984 and 1988 and by 29 per cent over 18 months during 1988–89 at a time when telephone prices actually dropped.

For these reasons the petitioners are calling upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284 and apply a rate–of–return regulation to the cable industry.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, apropos to that last petition, I have a similar petition. Phone rates are regulated; cable rates are not. The New Democratic Party and thousands of petitioners say: "Why not?" We have petitions from all over the country. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284, which is my Private Member's Bill on regulating the cable rate, and apply rate–of–return regulations to the cable industry so that cable rates can be regulated like telephone rates.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition signed by numerous Canadians who point out that cable prices increased by 6 per cent annually between 1984 and 1988 and by 29 per cent over 18 months during 1988–89 at a time when telephone prices actually dropped. The petitioners join with others in calling upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284 and apply rate–of–return regulations to the cable industry.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a petition that has been certified under Standing Order 36 as correct to form and content. The petitioners, who are from across Canada, raise their concern about the fact that the cable industry is the only territorial monopoly in Canada whose profits are unregulated. They also point that the cable companies made an average of 32 per cent profit on fixed assets in 1988, more than twice the level of the regulated telephone companies and, if I may add, almost three times as much as the natural gas utilities in the province of Ontario are allowed to make.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284 in the name of my colleague, and apply rate–of–return regulations to the cable industry. I think these people deserve a fair deal.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under Standing Order 36. It is with a great deal of pleasure that I present this petition signed by numerous Canadians who have seen charges by the cable television industry increase without any apparent control over the last few years. What the petitioners are asking for is a fair deal. They are asking Parliament to pass Bill C–284 and apply rate–of–return regulations to the cable industry.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. The first one, pursuant to Standing Order 36, is like the others, calling on Parliament to regulate the cable industry the same as the telephone industry is regulated. The petitioners call upon Parliament to adopt Bill C–284 in the name of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, and apply rate–of–return regulations to the cable industry.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): The second petitioner, Mr. Speaker, I add to the thousands of names that I have already submitted in petitioners of people who are against the goods and services tax.

These petitioners, like thousands and thousands of others, millions across Canada, and in the latest Gallup poll 76 per cent, show that they are against this particular goods and services tax. They are calling upon Parliament to stop the proposal and asking the government to at least delay the implementation until it can guarantee that the Canadian taxpayers will not face another tax rip–off.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my pleasure to present petitions by New Brunswickers and from people all across Canada who are strongly opposed to the GST and, more particularly, opposed to the tax on written materials, and so it is a pleasure to present this petition.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg–St. James): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to present a number of petitions on behalf of Manitobans who are deeply concerned about the application of the GST to books, magazines and newspapers.

• (1130)

They point out that this has never happened in the history of Canada. They would also like parliamentarians to understand that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, of our culture and of our educational system, and that the application of the GST would be counterproductive.

They humbly pray and call upon all of us in the House of Commons to reaffirm this historic principle embodied in tax–free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BROADCASTING ACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 31, consideration of Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; Motion Nos. 8 and 10 of Mrs. Finestone (p. 14956); and Motion No. 9 of Mr. Waddell (p. 14956).

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the member for Mount Royal for the fabulous job she has been doing in shepherding this bill through the House over the last year.

It has been a very tough bill to handle especially from opposition, because we have talked about many aspects of this bill that disturb us. Most of us on this side of the House believe in a strong national government. We believe that the Broadcast Act traditionally has been an instrument that has allowed us to promote things like national unity. The Broadcast Act, therefore, has helped as a galvanizer in this country. Now we see the government trying to take out the words national unity.

Specifically I am speaking today on three separate motions. In one of the motions put forward by my colleague she wants Bill C-40 to be amended in clause 2 as follows:

> "provide programming that is predominantly Canadian, using predominantly Canadian creativity".

The motion of the member of Port Moody—Coquitlam talks about the following:

> "and presentation of programming, in particular in the prime viewing hours between 19:00 and 23:00 hours on television, unless".

Finally, Motion No. 10 indicates the following:

> "(vi) provide a reasonable opportunity for the public to view the productions of Canada's autonomous public film producer and distributor, the National Film Board of Canada;".

Mr. Speaker, you have to understand that in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood there are close to 2,700 people employed in this industry. My riding is the riding of Degrassi Streets. My riding is the riding of Night Heat. My riding is where John Candy and Mike Ontkean got their start.

A small divergent point on Mike Ontkean, I can remember when I was younger playing hockey at St. Mike's and sitting in the dressing room with Mike Ontkean. This is back in the early 1960s. Different people would talk about where their dreams were and what their hopes were. Most of us wanted to go on and play NHL hockey. Very few of us wanted to go to college. Mike Ontkean would sit in the corner of the dressing room and say: "I want to be a movie star". We used to laugh at him and we used to tease him. The bottom line is that at that time the thought of a Canadian wanting to be a Canadian movie star was not taken very seriously.

I would like to suggest that part of the problem we have in this country is that very few of us think we can become movie stars. Very few people think they can become artists who can go beyond our own community and on to the world stage.

I am concerned that Bill C-40 does not do anything to encourage this. We now have artists in this country like Kim Mitchell and Blue Rodeo, and on and on the list goes, who have made it on the world screen and stage; but they needed that push and that self-confidence from home.

In my riding we have the largest movie studios in all of Canada, Cinevision. However, if one goes down to Cinevision and sees the various crafts that are producing and working on these films, one finds out that 90 per cent of them are not Canadian. They are in fact from every part of the world.

I believe that this bill does nothing to promote Canadian talent. It does nothing to encourage Canadian talent. It does nothing to give them the following feeling: "Look, my name is Mike Ontkean. I can play side by side on Twin Peaks. I can play side by side with Paul Newman" We have an inferior complex in this country, and this broadcast instrument, Bill C–40, does not really do anything to minimize that feeling.

I also want to touch on the National Film Board. Some of the finest work in North America is in the National Film Board. What do we do with the National Film Board? It is sitting in a building, in a warehouse, down on a corner about a mile from here. It is shrouded in mystery. Very few people would even know it exists. Even the lighting on the building is atrocious. There is absolutely no super marketing plan to put the product of these great cinematographers out to work. When the cinematographers of our country apply for help from a place like the National Film Board or Telefilm, we make them feel like beggars rather than world–class artists.

Bill C–40 is a very important instrument in making sure that the cultural talent in this country is unleashed to its full potential. It can be done only by giving it the necessary recognition, by giving in the necessary support and by all of us waking up and realizing that we have a world–class entertainment industry that can by syndicated all over the world.

It is only when we in the House collectively believe in a Mike Ontkean who sits in a dressing room at 15 years old and says: "I am going to be a movie star". It is only when we realize: "Hey, if he is persistent and if we in Canada give him that encouragement, he could be a movie star". It is only when that thought process permeates all things we do in our lives, especially the instrument called the Broadcast Act, that the great cultural resource of this country will be fully utilized.

I urge the member for Edmonton Southwest to work with my colleague to ensure that we make this new Broadcast Act something very special, something of which we can all be proud.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the House that a vote on Motion No. 8 will apply to Motion No. 10, and on Motion No. 9 there will be a separate vote.

The question is on Motion No. 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 9 standing in the name of hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-40 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 6 at page 3 the following:

"(3) For the purposes of this Act, a multiple dwelling unit grouped as a condominium complex is deemed to be one permanent residence on such terms and conditions as the Commission deems appropriate."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the act moved by me is exactly the same as the amendment I moved on similar legislation. In fact it was exactly the same legislation, then known as Bill C-136.

The reason for the amendment is that many condominium home owners are very concerned about a proposal in the bill under clause 2(1)(a) which deals with how the bill could be interpreted at some future date.

The concern was initially raised with me by Mr. Ernie Loder on behalf of the TV Communications Committee of York Condominium Corporation No. 76, more commonly known in my constituency as Massey Square. He not only raised it with me but raised it with a number of members of the House. At the outset I thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications for taking the time, quite a considerable amount of time actually, to sit down with myself and Mr. Loder to listen to the concerns of these condominium owners.

The concerns that condominium owners have is that they are being treated or appear to being treated quite differently from the home owner who may install an antenna or a dish receiver on top of an individual dwelling house to receive a signal. Condominium owners who do exactly the same thing to share the same signal going through all the condominium homes may be treated differently under this act and may be considered a commercial distribution at some point. They feel that this is discrimination.

The minister, as did his predecessor, sent out a letter to a number of people who had raised these concerns with him. I think it may be worth while to read the letter itself into the record. It not only explains the problem; it explains the government's attitude toward the problem. However, it does not deal with a future decision that the CRTC may make under extensive lobbying by the cable industry. I will read the pertinent parts of the letter from the minister to a number of my constituents. It starts by saying:

Firstly, you should know that, at present, condominiums which install a roof-top antenna or satellite dish and distribute the signals they receive throughout the condominium building are covered by the existing Broadcasting Act (1968) as "Broadcasting Receiving Undertakings". These master antenna television (MATV) systems, as they are known, are therefore subject to licensing and regulation by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC). However, it is the policy of the government and the CRTC to exempt MATV systems from having to obtain a licence provided that they they meet certain conditions.

These conditions reflect objectives of Canadian broadcasting policy. Firstly, they are intended to ensure that those receiving television services in this manner will be offered a range of Canadian broadcasting services as well as any available foreign services.

Secondly, in light of the CRTC's responsibility to regulate and supervise the broadcasting system as a whole, the conditions for exemption are designed to ensure that fair competition exists between cable operators and MATV operators and that their respective subscribers are fairly treated.

Recent amendments to these conditions for exemption make it clear that condominium owners have several options in obtaining television services. They may run their own MATV system; they may contract an outside MATV operator to run their system for them, at a negotiated rate; or, they may choose to subscribe to the local cable service. If they choose either MATV option, no licence is required as long as they respect the conditions of the exemption.

Nothing in the new broadcasting legislation could change this situation. Let me stress that the Bill contains no provisions which would force condominiums to close down their MATV systems and deal with cable operators, nor are there any provisions which would cause the CRTC to make its exemption criteria for MATV systems more rigid.

On the contrary, by identifying MATV systems as the distribution services which they are, the new legislation would legitimize these systems and clearly recognize them as part of the broadcasting system as a whole. Furthermore, the Bill would expand the CRTC's ability to use its exemption power. Accordingly, under the proposed legislation, condominiums which are currently exempted from licensing should expect that they will continue to be exempted.

Finally, it has been said that the Bill treats condominiums and apartments differently from single-family homes. This, too, is inaccurate. Should a group of home-owners decide to use one antenna or satellite dish to service, for example, all of the homes on one street, that system would be subject to the same CRTC regulations as similar arrangements in condominiums. On the other hand, like owners of detached houses, condominium owners whose circumstances and condominium rules permit, as with some townhouses for example, may install an antenna or satellite dish for personal use only within their own homes without being subject to regulation. Again, the Bill applies fairly to all Canadians.

It would seem that the present exemptions have caused some operators of MATV systems to believe that they are not covered by the existing Act. They consequently fear that new legislation will change their present status and have advised condominium owners accordingly.

> As I have explained, these concerns are simply unfounded. The government is confident that, under the new legislation, condominium owners will continue to exercise the range of choices available to them with the approval of government laws and regulations.

It is signed by the Minister of Communications, the Hon. Marcel Masse.

There are some caveats in this letter which make condominium owners very nervous.

• (1150 )

As we heard earlier today when petitions were being presented to the House in support of the private member's bill of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam, cable companies are very powerful organizations.

If at some future date they can summon up an argument that shows the condominium homeowners are using a system that treats cable companies or co–operative housing units unfairly, I am quite sure that the CRTC may be sympathetic to that kind of an argument. That is what is of great concern to condominium owners and co–op housing groups.

Two years ago when this amendment was before the House when the same bill under a different name was being debated, the government members ganged up to defeat the amendment. I would hope, with the passage of time, they would have had an opportunity to reflect on these concerns and will support the amendment at this time.

If the amendment is adopted by the House, all the House will be doing is clearly recognizing that condominium homeowners are exactly the same type of people who choose to live in single family dwellings. They are no different. They are not commercial enterprises in the sense, Mr. Speaker, that you would apply to the cable industry.

They are individual homeowners who pay individual property taxes unlike apartment dwellers. They should be treated as individual homeowners, and treated fairly by the government.

A question came up in committee, for example, that if Conrad Black had a mansion with 100 rooms in it, had a satellite dish on the roof and fed a signal into every one of these rooms, how would he be treated? The answer came back, as a single home owner. However, if we took a cable and ran it to a garage where someone else was using it, it would be considered as a commercial enterprise. I think that is the dumbest, most illogical approach to the concerns that these people have.

All I would ask is that the House give serious consideration to these concerns.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Beaches—Woodbine for placing before this House an issue that really needed to be addressed in a very serious manner.

One of the reasons I have often had complaints—I would agree with the people who have complained—is the fact that bills are unclear. The intent of the legislators is left open to question.

This is a perfect example of where lack of clarity and foresight in a bill by the minister and by the government leaves up to question the place of condominiums. As a matter of fact, it also leaves in the air the question of apartment buildings which, for those who are listening and for those who want to know, are exempted as long as they abide by the rules and the regulations which the CRTC has in place for cable companies.

Mr. Speaker, if one lives in an apartment building, one should have the same access as any other person in a private home to all the channels which are allowable by law through a cable company.

By the way, the interesting part about that is I am aware of a number of apartment buildings right in my own city where that is not the case. I do wish that the apartment dwellers in those buildings would write the CRTC, call their local people and be in touch with the local cable companies if the apartment building is charging them a fee and they are getting services like HBO and ESPN. They are outside of the law, and are not acting as good citizens. In actual fact, they are taking money out of the Canadian broadcasting system and the development of the talent and skills that my colleague from Toronto alluded to earlier.

I appreciate this particular amendment because it concerns condominiums. Condominiums are basically homes that are built either one on top of each other, or collectively, but they are privately owned.

The former Minister of Communications wrote a letter, as I recall, to respond to a number of groups that appeared before us. One in particular was Mr. Loder, who appeared to talk about exemptions for condominiums. The minister was finally forced under Bill C–136 to clarify the absence of intent within that bill with respect to MATV systems and their regulatory status. We would think that this minister would have learned. I would hope that the parliamentary secretary, who understands the issues very thoroughly and has been extremely co–operative, would see the value of the amendment of my colleague, the member for Beaches—Woodbine.

The minister of the day on Bill C–136 said: "I would like to address an issue raised recently by people living in apartments and condominiums who use satellite dishes to receive broadcasting signals". By the way, satellite dishes in apartment buildings also use a master antennae TV system which is a very similar idea. "There is concern that the broadcasting bill will in some way impose restrictive regulations or limit their viewing choices. This fear is simply unfounded. At present, condominiums which install a roof–top antennae or a satellite dish and distribute the signals they receive throughout the condominium building are covered by the existing Broadcasting Act as broadcasting receiving undertakings".

That means it is just the hardware. "They are subject to CRTC regulations and the possibility of fines for non–compliance. However, the CRTC has chosen to exempt such systems from licensing requirements provided they meet certain criteria, such as carrying local Canadian signals. Nothing in Bill C–136", nor in this Bill C–40, "would change this situation. There are no provisions which would cause the CRTC to make its exemption criteria more rigid. Indeed, the bill expands the commission's ability to use its exemption power. Condominiums", and I presume that that follows for apartments, because that is how the minister read it before, "which are presently exempted from licensing should expect that they will continue to be exempted. I believe the present exemptions have apparently caused some condominium owners to believe that they are not covered by the existing act. They consequently fear", at that time Bill C–136 and I say it for Bill C–40, "it will change their present status. As I have indicated, this is not at all the case".

To make this very clear for lawyers who do not necessarily follow all bills, and for people who like to read bills and have the government will expressed, I would suggest this is an amendment that I think we could support with a great deal of comfort and I hope the government will so see that direction.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to what my colleagues opposite said in connection with the amendment put forward by the member for Beaches—Woodbine, who has been very deeply involved in this issue. Indeed, he did bring Mr. Loder to my office and we had a thorough discussion on the matter.

What I tried to impress upon the hon. member's constituent is that the intention is to have a minimum of regulation and a maximum of exemption provided, that those who are involved accept the basic rules of the system and that is, to guarantee access of Canadian services particularly and not to frustrate the goals of the system by giving access to condominium owners signals which other Canadians are not entitled to have.

This motion attempts to put into law something which is fundamentally a regulatory matter. Bill C–40 leaves unchanged the status of satellite master antennae systems which many condominium corporations operate. Under this bill, as under the current Broadcasting Act, SMATV systems, as they are called are subject to licensing and regulation. However, under the existing act, the CRTC has chosen to exempt them from licensing provided that they meet certain criteria. Nothing in Bill C–40 would alter this approach. To the contrary, the bill encourages the commission to exempt services from licensing wherever it deems this to be appropriate.

• (1200)

In each case, the current act and Bill C–40 ensure that the CRTC is able to regulate such systems and require, regardless of the particular circumstances, that Canadians served by such systems will have access to Canadian programming services. That is the primary reason for regulation of all broadcasting distribution systems. The bottom line here is access to Canadian programming. In our view, the law should apply equally to all systems which serve more than one household and condominium complexes should not be singled out for exemption.

SMATV systems can be very small, serving only a few subscribers, or they may be as large as a cable company, serving 1,500 households or more. Furthermore, they may be operated not only by condominium complexes, but also by apartment buildings, hotels and even small rural communities.

It is up to the regulator to determine how to interpret the law and adopt appropriate regulations which recognize the particular circumstances of the many and varied types of distribution services, whether they are non-profit co-operatives or profit-oriented commercial organizations.

The CRTC has until now, and I have every reason to believe will continue in the future, to adjust the regulatory burden to meet particular circumstances. This bill, I submit, encourages the commission to continue that practice.

Some hon. members: Question.

"Governor in Council to carry out."

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting group of subjects that we are covering in this particular debate. We are looking at the definitions of those kinds of channels within the construction of this bill within the concepts of what a Canadian broadcasting system is and what the public service Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ought to incorporate.

It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the debate with the government on each one of the services we are going to talk about this morning will indicate why the government has been short-sighted in the context of this particular bill. I believe each one of these services is key to Canadian unity, to Canadians' concepts of each other, and to Canadians specifically knowing about themselves through some of the more formalistic ways of presentation on the screen.

This series of amendments is to ensure the continued presence of the parliamentary service, Radio Canada International, the all-news service in English and in French, and a northern service. All of these services are important to a country which is so geographically large and would serve to unite Canadians from one region to another. This admission, I believe, is contrary to the unanimous recommendations of the report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

I find that rather ironic given the news in many newspapers this morning. The headline in The Ottawa Citizen states:

> PM to Unveil Unity Initiatives. Committee to Consult Canadians on Future.

What is a better mechanism than the parliamentary channel? It sometimes makes people very angry and sometimes makes people laugh. Sometimes people say that this is a circus in here because they do not watch other than that 45-minute thrust and parry that is really a question and no answer period. That is what people see.

If we want people to know what Canadians are doing from coast to coast and if we want to feel what Canadians are feeling in the regions, what better vehicle have we than the parliamentary channel which we can use after hours when the House is closed?

We are going on a week's recess to catch up with work in our ridings and offices. Why can we not be using that time productively in the interests of Canadians and under the guidance of the Chair? Why are we considering privatizing it or going into a co-production with the private sector on this parliamentary channel?

This is an expression of a form of democracy that the world is looking at. It is one of a number of forms of democracy and, as newly emerging nations come on the scene, their representatives come here to visit. The House of Commons through the Speaker sponsored one of our table officers to write about democracy. It hosted the Russian delegation that was here, the German delegation from East Germany, the Hungarian delegation, the Romanian, and the Polish delegations who are coming here to examine the way our democracy works. Would it not be a good idea if the way our democracy works was shown on the screen?

If we are going to have this constitutional committee that is going to go and have a constitutional crisis attack, maybe we should have the country watching what is going on. Let us see what this committee on national unity from the grassroots is saying across this land. Perhaps the unity that we are looking for in the bill and in the country at a moment of really serious concern will come to the fore.

With respect to the other channels that are equally important, I have an amendment that relates to English and French all-news services. The CBC's news service is absolutely wonderful. We have done away with that horrendous, seven-second clip and journalist overvoice for the rest that interprets what you and I are saying in the House, and we have in depth coverage.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary channel, which is seen as such a valuable tool as well as CBC's all-news service, is going into the U.S. cable satellite public affairs network on C-SPAN. It frequently carries these parliamentary proceedings. It has 55 million subscribers.

New York State has launched a parliamentary network project into 18,000 schools and universities, the English channel for the social studies faculty and the French channel for languages. The project is being monitored for possible expansion into the states.

• (1210)

The Americans are going to be looking at us and we are so busy watching American movies and American news and American everything else, that we forget to do something for ourselves. We are so short-sighted in the manner in which we handle this very vital, nervous, sensitive, important tool—the software, the brainware, or the vehicle that can get through to the public, that television set which is just a piece of hardware until one pushes a button and then it becomes alive. It can promote the kinds of things that we want.

I know my colleagues are going to give some serious information about the all-news service and the northern service. My colleague from Winnipeg and I were up in Iqaluit. He will share with you the very exciting information that we learned about the private and public sector networks with respect to the Inuit people. Inuit from Greenland, Russia, Alaska, and Canada shared through that channel which has now been slashed. I will leave that part to the hon. member.

With regard to Radio Canada International, I am going to be forever grateful to my colleague from Saint-Maurice who, I think, may have had an impact on the minister because he came from the parliamentary benches on the government side. This service is the mechanism by which Canadians who are living and working overseas keep in touch with Canada. It is the way that many countries and many nations see this wonderful country and hear news from a middle power's point of view.

These are important institutions that should be put into the bill and should be permanently funded and permanently recognized within a Canadian broadcasting system, and under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Waddell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have a problem and perhaps the Chair could help me out.

One of the amendments, namely Motion No. 14, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal, in English reads that the clause be amended and:

> "(m) the Corporation should provide an all-news service in English and French subject to such applicable statutes and regulations as the Governor in Council may deem necessary;".

[Translation]

The French version reads as follows:

> «m) la Société devrait offrir un service d'information continue assujetti aux lois et règlements applicables que le gouverneur en conseil juge nécessaires;»

I may not be very fluent in French, but I do not see here the words "—un service d'information [—en anglais et français—]". We now have a service in English, but none in French.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am pleased that the hon. member has brought it to our attention. We will have a look at it and then come back for a ruling or a legal translation.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment on what was said by the previous speaker about this motion, I agree there is no indication in the French version. I read the amendments only in French, because that is my mother tongue, and there is no reference to a French network. There was no indication that, as the hon. member for Mount Royal suggested, and rightly so, a French all-news network should be added. The French version does not say the same thing at all, if we compare the two texts. This is very disturbing because it prevented us from—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will examine the bill and then come back and check the legal translation of that particular motion, that is, Motion No. 14.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to thank my hon. colleague for bringing that to our attention.

[Translation]

However, the hon. member who just spoke should realize he did not have to wait for a translation to confirm that the Broadcasting Act contains certain provisions and make his comments accordingly.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I always check the French version. And today, we see that the French does not say the same thing as the English version. I am very disappointed. We will have to do something about this, because as members from Quebec, we prefer to read these texts in our mother tongue, and we would like to see this motion corrected.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will check the lines and the legal translation of them. We will then come back and check the whole motion and transcript.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on another point of order.

Mr. Waddell: No, Mr. Speaker, I was going to suggest that I have a 10-minute speech, and I could deal with that while the Chair is having a further look at the matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): My understanding is that there is really no problem as far as the translation if you look at the bill and the meaning of the motion. You are comparing the lines as the English is compared to the French. I think that if you read the whole text of the motion in the bill, you will find that there is no problem with the translation. But, we will check it, and come back to hon. members. I am pleased that hon. members have brought it to my attention.

Does the hon. member for Richelieu have another point of order, and if he does, will he please sit down first before I recognize him? Please sit.

Is it a point of order that the hon. member wishes to raise? I will recognize him on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I get the impression, Mr. Speaker, that you are glossing over the comments we just made. This is very serious, because I wonder how, in any case, we could postpone debate on Motion No. 14 since we now know the substance of the motion and the hon. member's intent.

We approve, in fact I fully support the amendment moved by the hon. member, except that when I read it in French, the text says that only—listen carefully: "—un service d'information continue assujetti—". So I thought this was a reference to the existing English network. In the English version, however, it says "—in English and French—", implying that another network should be added. That makes all the difference!

Members from Quebec, in the Progressive Conservative Party, the Bloc quebecois or the Liberal Party, would have liked to intervene in this debate and of course support this amendment, in order to oblige the government to provide two networks, one French and one English, in the all-news field. The amendment failed to specify that, so that today, we have been caught unaware, that is if we only read the amendments, and of course we can't read all the bills every day. But if we read only the amendment, it will be difficult to intervene rapidly, since the debate on this series of amendments will end at one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to consider a solution that would allow us to debate this motion at greater length at another time.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, this is not a government amendment. On the point of order, I believe the principle that has been expressed is accurate. I think it is a valid point of order. I think that the French version does not convey the same meaning as the English version. It falls far short of doing that, and I would urge you, Sir, and those who so capably assist you, to deal with the matter expeditiously so that as the debate proceeds an opinion can be sought from the Chair so whatever appropriate corrective measures can be taken so that we will be dealing with the amendment having the same meaning in both languages. I think that is a fundamental principle of this place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is exactly what we plan to do. I appreciate the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Richelieu, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, and the hon. member for Mount Royal for bringing it to the attention of the Chair. I always feel that the legal translation, both English and French, may be a little different but it still comes out to the same thing. But we will at least have a look at it and get back to the hon. member.

I have to recognize somebody else on debate. A point of order?

Mrs. Finestone: —Chair or the Table with a sense of clarity. As it was my amendment, I can tell you that the intent is as expressed in motion No. 14(m) and it was with respect to English and French subject to the applicable statutes so that we could have a continuous all-news service in both languages. If there needs to be any clarity or assurance there, may I assure you that that was my intent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is one explanation for it. Therefore, I will now recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, just to point out again that what has happened here is that the member for Mount Royal, the Liberal critic, has moved a number of amendments, Nos. 12, 13, 14, and 15.

They basically encompass a series of things. I tried to express them in my amendment, No. 11, which has been ruled out because the other amendments have it. Basically it encompasses the four areas, that the corporation, the CBC, should provide services including a parliamentary network—that is one of the amendments here—an international radio network, Radio-Canada International, a northern service, and an all-news network in English and in French, en anglais et en français.

Let me deal first with the problem of the all-news service. The problem is this, Mr. Speaker. We have an all-news service in English. I think it has been pretty successful. People have been watching it. Indeed, one journalist from The Toronto Star once said to me: "Gee, how did we ever conduct ourselves before without this all-news network because it keeps you so tuned in to what is going on".

A good example is this summer in Oka where English-Canadian viewers had excellent coverage of the Oka crisis through Newsworld, while Canadians in Quebec had to settle for the regular nightly newscast. That was an area where we could have used a French-language news service in French.

The difficulty is that it is a smaller market. That is the problem. We think that it is incumbent upon the government and the CBC, it is important, it is no less important, and there should be—

[Translation]

—we must also have a French news network. The NDP is in favour of such a network.

[English]

I want to speak generally of the CBC, and this is very important because apropos we are going to hear the Prime Minister this afternoon speak on the Constitution, trying to get the country back together again.

He should look right at some of the things he has done to pull the country apart. One thing he has done is he has in fact wounded badly the CBC, another instrument of national unity.

We have cut back on railways in this country. We are privatizing Petro-Canada. We cut back on a number of symbols and instruments of national unity. One of the great symbols of national unity is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I have heard many Liberal members speak. I appreciate they are speaking on the national unity clause. There has been a lot of rhetoric. I am as guilty as anyone else of a lot of rhetoric. But I think we have to get into some facts.. Hon. members opposite said they can agree with that.

Here are the facts. I looked at the CBC expenditures. That is where it really matters. There is not much point in giving the CBC a wide mandate if you do not give it the resources.

[Translation]

I see the hon. member for Richelieu. I said that we support an all-news network in French and also in English.

[English]

I am also saying that if you give CBC and Radio-Canada a mandate, you have to give them some money to implement it.

I figured it out in 1988 dollars.

Here is 1984-85 to the CBC: $943.3 million in operations. Commercial revenue was $265 million. That is 20.3 per cent of its percentage of commercial revenues to the future revenue.

Let us go through 1985-86. It becomes $879 million. The year 1986-87, $849 million—this is the operations—The year 1987-88, $828 million; 1988-89, $814 million; 1989-90, $812 million.

The Mulroney government is reducing the amount of money given to the CBC. Look at the commercial revenue: $265 million, 1984-85; 1985-86, $268 million; 1986-87, $287 million; 1987-88, $338 million; 1988-89, $363 million; 1989-90, $374 million.

It goes from a percentage of 20 per cent of the commercial revenues to the total revenues. It becomes 22, 23, 26, 28, 28.8 per cent. In other words, the CBC is becoming more and more commercial: Less government money, more commercial money.

As it is done, the network becomes more and more like a regular station. Canadians are going to have 40 choices in the future, and the CBC will be no different than the others. They will see a little logo that says: CBC. Mark my words, Mr. Speaker.

It is setting it up to look like another American station, or a Canadian private station. It is setting it up to privatize it, and we are going to lose one of the big parts.

An hon. member: They said that with PetroCan.

Mr. Waddell: I know they laughed and said that with PetroCan, and now they are going to privatize Petro-Canada.

This represents the commercialization of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The CBC is being asked to operate more and more like a commercial network.

I put a question at the licence renewal of the CBC to the CBC vice-president and to the standing committee in May. The CBC vice-president Michael McEwen said the following in answer to a question from me: "You are right. We are getting squeezed, and each year we have to factor in how we are going to do that."

This year, 1989-90, it lost a 1 per cent real cut across the radio system. It managed to sustain its activity for one more year. As the president, Mr. Veilleux said: "If we keep going, something is going to have to give." Then, Mr. Speaker, you talk about making decisions. "Do you change the nature of how you express all your services? Do you lose some service? Do you lop off an arm, rather than deleting the whole thing? These are the issues we are going to have to deal with if we keep heading down this road."

The Minister of Communications came before committee and actually said: "Maybe we will get rid of all the advertising revenue." People went pale around the room: $330 million if we get rid of the CBC. The minister does not know what he is doing. This government does not know what it is doing with respect to the CBC.

At one moment, it is asking for more commercial revenue and the next moment, it thought: "Well, we will just give it up." It is not rational in dealing with it. It is inconsistent. I think it is time that the Minister of Communications was moved to another portfolio. This is very serious.

What is happening at the CBC is more re-runs, more American programs, abandonment of the goal of 95 per cent Canadian content and furthermore, more centralization in Toronto.

The parliamentary secretary can get up and quote capital budgets. The capital budget has gone up from $93 million to $113 million, but that capital budget is basically based in purchasing in Toronto, which is almost like a commercialization or a real estate project in Toronto if you like.

The CBC is becoming more Torontonian, because it has become more concentrated in Toronto. There are cut-backs in the regions. Again, that is taking the CBC away from its goal of national unity. You do not have to get up and put rhetoric in all this, you can put it right down to facts.

The cut-backs in operations, I set them up and I challenge the parliamentary secretary to rebut those figures. You can say how it has become more commercialized. There is more revenue from commercial revenues: from 20 to 28 per cent. I challenge him to rebut that.

Third, Mr. Speaker, you can see how it has been taken in from the regions and concentrated in the centre.

• (1230 )

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the bill before the House, Bill C-40, the broadcasting bill.

More than 98 per cent of Canadians living in the north have access to the CBC Northern Service, covering more than 4 million square kilometres including Yukon, Northwest Territories, and northern Quebec. The northern population of about 100,000 includes Inuit, Indian, Dene Métis and non-native groups. Service is provided in seven different languages including Inuktitut, Dog Rib, Chippewan, Slavey, Whichen, Cree, and Nuvialiktun.

As well the CBC Northern Service produces recordings of native singers and musicians. The total in the spring of 1989 were 42 recordings. This is an opportunity for people who have a specific ability in the arts to express it through this particular mechanism provided by CBC. It is one that is much valued and I think maximized to its most positive benefit for the people in the north and for Canada as an expression of Canadianism.

Communication and transportation are the two most critical services northerners depend on. People in the north depend on radio for vital information for their safety and in many cases for their survival. Whether people are on the land or in their camps or on the trap line or driving on a remote highway, they have a radio because they need to know the weather conditions, the thickness of the ice, the current of a river, the state of the road, and the temperature. Communications for the north is not a luxury. It is essentially a necessity for survival.

In the coming years Canadians are going to witness many changes in one of our greatest national institutions, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Since 1984 the government has consistently slashed CBC funding and Michael Wilson's recent federal budget announced a further $140 million in funding cuts over the next five years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the member's attention that it is the Minister of Finance. Please do not name the person.

Ms. Blondin: I would like to express the importance that people put on the whole element of communication as it relates to air safety. There was a program termed the CBC weather program. There was supposed to be an allocation of approximately $400,000 to that program. That program was cut. That funding was denied. The air industry in that particular area of the north in which I reside in Western Arctic was very upset about it. The majority of my constituents depend on air travel. They do not have the luxury of buses, trains or highways. If there are highways in some of the area that I represent, they are winter roads; they are seasonal.

The importance of communications for the purpose of air safety is paramount. I must say that communication is the issue surrounding the problem with service at the Fort Franklin airport, an issue that has become prominent of late. A plane crash in 1984 killed seven people in that community. It was CBC that carried this tragic news and told the north that had there been the proper weather and communications services this would not have occurred. It would have helped to avoid this very serious and tragic accident. The Canadian Aviation Safety Board reported the accident may have been prevented if there had been proper weather and communication services.

The minister of state yesterday stated in this House that his information indicates Fort Franklin does not need communication and weather service. So they cancelled the contract yesterday. For the sake of $35,000 this government is willing to jeopardize the lives of northerners who totally depend on air travel. Air travel is not to be separated from communications. We needed that service. We needed that $400,000. We needed the money.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With great respect to the hon. member who I know and admire, I would like to have the hon. member get to the point of these amendments.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Edwards: The issue that she is dealing with is very significant, having to do with air traffic and safety in the north. If it is related to these amendments, fine, but I have not heard the connection yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure the hon. member will get to the connection. The hon. member for Western Arctic.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, CBC has a weather channel and weather is very important. CBC in the south may be for entertainment purposes, maybe for enlightenment. In the north CBC services are a matter of necessity.

Mrs. Finestone: That's right.

Ms. Blondin: They provide information for the purpose of survival for people in the north.

Mrs. Finestone: Absolutely.

Ms. Blondin: I am sure that is something the hon. member opposite will appreciate, if he is willing to listen to what I have to say or to what the people I represent have to say.

This is what they have to say. Lois Hill, pilot/base manager from Norman Wells said:

> On-location weather reporting is extremely valuable to our company's operations—Many of our chartered flights take us to the Fort Franklin area. The large body of water/ice which makes up Great Bear Lake causes anomalies in local weather patterns which are difficult to predict.

Ed Phillips from Air Sahtu in Fort Franklin referred to the real irony of the letter from Transport. I know that the whole issue of communications is inextricably intertwined, that we cannot separate the two. The people were very aggrieved when the $400,000 was not reallocated for the weather service that CBC offered. I have a list of the names of the helicopter and airplane pilots who were very upset. The real irony was that the letter arrived on October 9, 1990. He continued:

—the anniversary date of the tragic Twin Otter crash here that claimed seven lives. We have enclosed copies of relevant sections of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board's review of this accident and their recommendations. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that the accident was avoidable, had there been qualified weather reporting and communications here.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened with care to what the hon. member is saying, and she has a valid issue. This service may indeed be provided under contract by the CBC, but it is a transport issue and totally unrelated to the consideration of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Will the hon. member for Western Arctic please complete her statement?

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, might I say to you and through you to hon. members of this House that CBC provides a service to the people in the north unlike any service it provides in southern Canada. It provides the communication of information for the survival of these people. What happens is that when that line of communication is severed there is the jeopardy of lives. That is exactly what I am saying.

I am sure it is not the intention of any government to jeopardize the lives of any of the Canadians in any other area, but what I cannot understand is why there was no reallocation for a service that is considered basic or fundamental to every other part of this country. Why was that cancelled?

What my constituents and I would like to hear is that the government is sincere and wants to service the north, not only in terms of communications but in every other way. For years in my constituency we never had television. We had CBC radio. The umbilical cord of the north is CBC. It has carried messages to the trap line, to the unilingual person, because it provides that kind of service.

However, the most important service it provided for this one particular group was weather information. There are no roads. I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, it is very important for these people. These people would like the government to reinstate and establish that there is a firm commitment to the north in terms of communications and other services. We are off the transportation grid essentially. Being the same does not make us equal. Sometimes it takes extraordinary measures to achieve equality, and that is something that has to be recognized.

I think we can have what I would say is a role model for communications in the north. We have trained many people who have left the north and have become outstanding national reporters. The north is a wonderful training ground. It has cultural diversity. The challenge of meeting the multi-lingual system in the north was something that definitely was used as a training ground by journalists coming to the north.

This particular item of communication, transportation and survival is not a light subject. It is something that is very serious. It is something about which the helicopters and airplane pilots delivered a message to my office saying that they were worried. We do not undervalue the commitment or the efforts of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over the years. We appreciate it, but we also value certain aspects of it because they relate directly to the livelihood and the well-being of those people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, I would just like to go back to Motion No. 14. I think the gremlins were at work yesterday. Being Halloween, I am sure this is what happened. I think we should insert—

[Translation]

"La Société devrait offrir [—en français et en anglais—].

[English]

I am sure that will settle the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 14, in the name of my colleague form Mount Royal, has already caused a great deal of comment today. Nevertheless, I want to speak to this particular motion as well. The hon. member from Mount Royal, who worked very hard on the legislative committee on Bill C-40, should bear in mind that the CBC did not need legislation to create CBC News World. It did not need special legislation. And I may add that we on this side of the House are also in favour of letting Radio Canada create a French 24-hour all-news service. In fact, we voiced our disappointment when the CRTC rejected Radio-Canada's initial application. It seems that Radio-Canada is now preparing a new application which, I am sure, will meet the CRTC's objective criteria, so that Canada's French-speaking audience will have access to the same kind of service that Anglophones enjoy at the present time.

Francophones in this country, Mr. Speaker, did not appreciate the fact that during the Meech Lake talks and the crisis with the Mohawks in Oka, they had to rely on CBC News World in English, since we did not have the equivalent service in French. Bearing this in mind, I earnestly hope Radio-Canada will soon be able to submit its proposal to the CRTC.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition motions now before the House are in fact aimed at enshrining in the Act a formal obligation for the CBC to continue to provide four services it provides at the present time, including Radio Canada International, the Northern service referred to by the hon. member for Western Arctic, the Parliamentary Channel, the all-news service and as well as one that has yet to be created, the French news channel. Or will it be a bilingual channel? Why not?

At this time, Mr. Speaker, none of these services is part of the mandate of the CBC as defined in the Act. Although the present legislation contains a provision under which the Corporation, as an agent of Her Majesty, is to offer an international service, Radio Canada International, a service offered under this specific provision, was established by order in council. Would it not appropriate to enshrine all these services and others as well, Mr. Speaker, in the mandate given the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Of course members on this side of the House agree these are all excellent, quality services, and we would like to see them maintained, unless due to unforeseen circumstances the Corporation had to change its priorities.

What could these famous circumstances be? The first example that springs immediately to mind is the proposition considered by this House in recent months whereby a consortium of cable companies might broadcast parliamentary debates. Should the House be prevented from accepting this suggestion which would enable the CBC to save money, something which would undeniably make for judicious use of resources because the CBC was given the legislative mandate to carry the parliamentary proceedings?

[English]

What about the all-news service? The CBC started the service calculating that it would be entirely self-supporting and it was licensed on that basis. The CBC obviously had no desire to provide such a service if it would siphon resources from the basic service. The government's acquisitions in this new venture were similarly based on the CBC commitment that all-news would not siphon resources away from the basic service which, as we all know, is stretched to the limit now. Should we now insert a provision into the legislation which would permit exactly this to happen?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, CBC International is altogether different from northern services, or from the 24-hour French news service, CBC Newsworld and the parliamentary broadcasting system. What is the difference, Mr. Speaker? Quite simply, all these networks are first and foremost serving their Canadian audience, whereas CBC International is intended almost exclusively for Canadians abroad and listeners in foreign countries. Here is one example.

CBC International reaches millions of listeners in eastern countries, particularly the Soviet Union, the Baltic States, and Czechoslovakia. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Canadians might be surprised to learn that CBC International attracts more listeners than the CBC network does right here in Canada. This is why CBC International has always rated so high.

When in Cuba recently I had an opportunity to talk to ordinary Cuban citizens and they told me their only reliable sources of information in Spanish are the CBC International network and the Voice of America.

I think this international service must be maintained. As I suggested during the legislative committee hearings on Bill C-40, it should be given official legislative recognition so that no government—this or any future government—would be able to abolish it through an order in council. The government would have to debate the issue in Parliament because this is the kind of service offered by nearly all countries of the world.

In this respect I think a difference has to be made between CBC International and the other services. There is something I want to repeat so that it be quite clear. We on this side of the House—and I think I speak for all my colleagues—want early CRTC approval for the French version of the all news channel. But, and I end on this note, Mr. Speaker, CBC management did not need legislation to set up the CBC Newsworld network, and I do not see why we would need a law to have the same service in French.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg–St. James): Mr. Speaker, please remind me when I have two minutes left so I can give it to my hon. colleague from Halifax.

I would like to make an observation before I make comments with respect to this cluster of motions. Finally, we have heard from a Conservative backbencher.

We have before us now one of the most important bills, C–40, to come before Parliament in this session. I was beginning to wonder where the Tories had gone. Have they vanished? Have they left this planet altogether? Are we to believe that the Tories do not care about this bill? Are we to believe that they do not care about national unity and taking the national unity mandate away from the CBC? Are we to believe that they do not care about balkanizing the CRTC? Are we to believe that the Conservative Party and the backbenchers are not concerned about splitting the CBC board in two? Have these backbenchers become such lap dogs for the Prime Minister that they will not get off their hind ends and speak to this bill?

• (1250)

An hon. member: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, please tell the man to just cool it a little. It really concerns me that these people are not taking part in this debate because I know that they are not all happy with this bill. I can tell you that the hon. parliamentary secretary is not a happy camper these days. He is glum, he is gloomy, because he knows that the government is trying to ram this bill, which is flawed to its core, through the House. Some of the people on that side of the House have a terrible case of political indigestion, but nevertheless, it is indigestion.

I want to make that observation because I think it is highly relevant and germane. I want the Canadian people to understand that they are over there silent and sitting on their hands doing absolutely nothing. I can assure the House that in their private offices, they are complaining and grumbling.

We have to be concerned that particular CBC services such as the northern service, the parliamentary service, the international service and the all–news channel, are not recognized services within Bill C–40. These are absolutely vital services, not only of the CBC but for national unity. These are absolute vital services for national unity.

We have already heard words of support for the all–news channel of the CBC. It has done a tremendous service and I hope that it will grow. One of my concerns is that if these services are not given what you might call statute protection in the bill, then with a government that has no faith in the public sector, public utilities or public ownership, that some day—and this might be a little bit of hyperbole— we may wake up and find that all these magnificent services have vanished or have been reduced to such a level, so crippled that they are not worth anything.

My hon. friend from Port Moody—Coquitlam mentioned how the CBC has been diminished by this government. It is absolutely true. I think it is extremely important that these services be ongoing and given legislative protection because they need funding, more funding than they have now. I think all Canadians who support the CBC—and most Canadians do—would feel much more comfortable if those important services were written into Bill C–40.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give my time over to my esteemed colleague.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Please start. It is All Saints Day. Let us have a little calm in this Chamber.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague from Winnipeg–St. James for giving me the opportunity to make a few comments on these particular amendments.

[Translation]

Twenty–three years ago today, Mr. Speaker, the honourable Judy Lamarsh opened the debate on the broadcasting legislation.

[English]

In other words, 23 years ago today in this Chamber, the Hon. Judy Lamarsh brought in the first broadcasting bill. I think the time has come to renew that bill, bring that bill forward and this time let us get it right.

On this particular set of motions and amendments, we have a number of concerns. My friend and colleague from Western Arctic spoke very eloquently on the whole question of the northern service. In speaking to these amendments yesterday, and I hope at future times, we keep bringing up the subject of national unity and how the CBC is a force for national unity.

Since I became a member of this House, I have been very fortunate in that I have been able to travel in the north. Without the unifying factor of the CBC, without the CBC's broadcasting abilities in northern Canada, what would be the unifying factor in northern Canada? It would be that most northern televisions have access to Detroit cable stations. Somehow, close as Detroit is to Windsor, it does not quite do the same job. We do not need American television as the only link in a broadcast sense, in a television sense to our northern citizens.

I spoke a bit yesterday about the need for the inclusion of Radio Canada International. When I was a graduate student in the United Kingdom, as I said, I and my Canadian friends would wake ourselves up at three o'clock in the morning to hear the Stanley Cup play-offs. We would get up at odd hours to hear As It Happens, to hear various and sundry other public affairs programming from Radio Canada International because that was our link to our home country.

Above and beyond that, and important as it is for Canadian nationals living abroad, the other important service that Radio Canada International provides for Canadians as a group is it presents a picture of us to the international community. When they hear top-notch public affairs programs, such as Sunday Morning, such as As It Happens and various and sundry others; Ideas is another one that springs to mind that is frequently replayed on Radio Canada International, it creates for us an image that I suspect most Canadians would be proud to own.

To leave this out of the broadcasting bill, to just pass over this institution, which means so much to Canadian prestige, is I think a terrible oversight.

I want to conclude by a saying a little bit about the parliamentary service. The parliamentary service is something that is very dear to all of us. Clearly it is a link for every one of us in this House to our constituents and to people across the country. If the idea of omitting the parliamentary service as well from this bill is the beginning of privatization of the coverage of the House of Commons, then this is indeed a frightening and ominous decision.

People across this country watch this channel. I think every one of us knows this, sometimes to our sorrow and sometimes to our pleasure, that many, many of our constituents watch the parliamentary network to keep abreast of what is happening in debate, to ensure that they are as well informed as they wish to be about the doings of Parliament. I am sure that most of my colleagues in this Chamber would agree that from time to time they hear from their constituents about something we have said or some comment we have made that has not gone unnoticed by the people at home.

The only way to maintain this, away from the possibilities of conflict of interest, et cetera, is to keep this service in and under the aegis of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a Crown corporation. That is the only way to ensure that the parliamentary service does not either diminish in its coverage or that various and sundry abuses, which could arise from privatization, do not take place.

The other thing that I wanted to discuss is the whole question of the news service.

The news service in both languages is crucial because of the opportunity it gives Canadians to see an in-depth look at the news. We are not restricted to the 30-second clip or the seven-second clip. One gets in-depth coverage and one has some idea of what is going on behind the news story. It should be available in both languages. It should be the right of all Canadians to hear news coverage in both languages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, Canadians condemn another racist attack on Jews in Canada.

Last Friday evening, when the Jewish Sabbath had begun, a group of teenagers attacked seven Hasidic Jewish men in Outremont. The men wore traditional long coats and fur trimmed hats. They were plainly Jews going about their religion in a district where 2,500 orthodox Jews live. Hasidic Jews are known for their non-violent way of life. The teenagers, boys and girls from the south shore district, punched and kicked the men, broke the glasses of one and took his shtreimel, his traditional hat. There is no report of money being demanded or taken.

Considering that the Ku Klux Klan recently set up a chapter in the area, one must agree with Professor Julien Bauer of the Université du Québec à Montréal who said: "It's not a coincidence, it's pure racism."

Mr. Speaker, this is a threat to every Canadian.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I recently visited an office furniture manufacturing company operating in my riding. The name of the company is Meubles et Fonctions D.L. Inc.

This business founded in 1977 by two twenty year old young men now employs 50 or so people to produce and install their product across Canada and produces about a hundred desks daily. They also conceived a lign of ergonomic desks, that is to say workstations completely adaptable to the user's needs, which caters to future needs in office automation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that young people such as Mr. Michel Lapointe and Mr. Yvon Denis, the president and vice-president of the company, who are now 33 and 34 years old respectively, are an important asset for our country and deserve our support to make their business grow even more.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the recent report of Dr. Charles MacMillan to the Council of Maritime Premiers calling for economic unity among the maritime provinces is timely and appropriate.

With trade barriers coming down around the world, it is time for the maritime provinces to follow suit. Trade and commerce between the provinces is currently discouraged by regulations affecting agriculture, transportation, safety, tendering, sales tax, and on and on.

If Atlantic Canada intends to be an equal partner in Canada, it must first remove the trade barriers and maximize the economic opportunities available right at our very own doorstep. I encourage the Council of Maritime Premiers to push ahead with these plans, and I will work towards this goal myself.

SUICIDE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, on October 28 to October 31, the Canadian Association for Suicide Prevention conference was held in Vancouver. I attended as a board member but also as having lost two brothers to suicide.

Suicide is a major health problem and is second only to accidents as a cause of death for young people in Canada. Canada's suicide rate is consistently higher than the suicide rate in the United States, and it is costly to society. It will not go away, and there is genuine fear out there that too little attention is being paid to the issue.

The theme for the conference was "lifting the silence" and that is what we have to do.

Seven years of hard work had gone into producing Suicide in Canada, a national task force report. It remains unclear as to how many of its recommendations have been implemented. It is known that for every successful suicide, there are numerous other attempts. Surely this tells us that a greater number of our citizens are living lives of quiet desperation, facing an intolerable level of psychological pain. The report's recommendations must be acted upon, because we are losing our best resources, the people, to suicide.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): This year's theme of Canada Career Week: "Managing Your Career to Manage Your Life", is of particular importance for high school students.

The drop-out rate is huge. One high school student out of three drops out of school before graduating.

Jobs in the 1990s require extensive training. More than two thirds of the jobs created by the year 2000 will require at least twelve years of post-secondary education as well as occupational training.

I urge the young Canadian in my riding and all young Canadians to take part in Canada Career Week, from October 28 to November 3, and attend the many events staged by schools and community organizations in conjunction with Canada Employment Centers so they can learn about the many opportunities open to them and make the necessary steps to embark upon an exciting career in line with their personal aspirations.

CFB CHATHAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, New Brunswickers, especially Miramichiers, have had enough of the juvenile foolishness of the Minister of Fisheries vis-à-vis the issue of the firing range for the low-level air defence school in Chatham.

This minister, who has political responsibility for New Brunswick and an obligation to do his best for her people, is now trying to kill a project which is vital to the people of Chatham and New Brunswick. It is also vital for low level air defence.

By his actions, this minister is putting in jeopardy the livelihood of at least 1,000 Miramichiers and an input of some $20 million a year into the local economy.

It is time now for the Prime Minister to take his minister aside and set him straight vis-à-vis his responsibilities to the people of New Brunswick. It is time for the Prime Minister, who in 1984 proclaimed Chatham as his hometown, to instruct this dilettante delinquent on his duties, or is this just another double cross?

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): As was pointed out in the House on a previous occasion, Mr. Speaker, last Friday on the eve of the Sabbath, nine Hassidic Jews were attacked near their homes in Outremont. Apparently their aggressors are members of a gang of youths from outside the island of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, it really does not matter whether this attack or any similar premeditated or unpremeditated act of aggression is directed against members of the Orthodox Jewish community or any other group in our society. Outremont residents and hon. members alike deplore and unreservedly condemn these acts and their perpetrators. We ask that the full weight of the law be brought to bear by the authorities.

Mr. Speaker, the cultural diversity of the residents of Outremont is a source of wealth for all Canadian citizens. The mutual respect in which we live is too important to be taken for granted and requires our immediate attention.

[English]

I would urge all members of our society to continue working to better understand one another and to appreciate more fully the values and principles of human dignity and spirit we hold and share in common.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, after successive seasons of Grinches, Christmas is coming early to the hundreds of Canadians involved in grain production, handling, and transportation. The irony is, we do not know who the early Santa Claus is.

Has the Wheat Board made a $1 billion grain sale? Is it the Soviet Union and/or Brazil that is purchasing our grain?

Well, who is wearing the white whiskers does not matter, Mr. Speaker. What does matter is that farmers on the Prairies, grains handlers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, railroaders between the prairie elevators and Thunder Bay, and seafarers throughout the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway system will gain from this early Christmas present. So, too, will the elevator operators, the railroad companies, and the ship–owners, as well as municipalities, and federal and provincial governments, as Canadian workers are back on the job.

Yes, Canada, there is a Santa Claus. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is the highly regarded Canadian institution, the Canadian Wheat Board, that has done this job on our behalf. Thank you on behalf of all those who will benefit.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the tendency for Canadians who live along the Canada–U.S. border to shop regularly in the U.S. is increasing at an alarming rate.

A recent study has shown that this trend has taken between $300 million and $600 million annually out of the Ontario economy during the past three years. Among the many devastating effects of the GST will be a further price differentiation in retail products between Canada and the United States.

• (1410)

For the government merely to say that Canadian retailers must become more competitive is to ignore the many advantages that the U.S. retailer has over his Canadian counterpart. The 4 per cent to 5 per cent spread in interest rates, plus the effects of the pending GST, are only going to encourage further American retailers to target the Canadian shopper. Depressed Christmas sales plus the 7 per cent GST beginning on New Year's Day, will add up to an out of business sign for many small retailers in Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the hon. member has exceeded his time.

TRIBUTE TO LOUIS–FRANÇOIS GAGNON

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, Louis–François Gagnon is a young man from Mont–Laurier who, as a result of remarkable efforts and strong will, is on the verge of becoming an international celebrity on the downhill ski slopes.

Cities and regions that can claim to be home to such a leading and talented athlete are few and far between in Canada. Mont–Laurier and the neighbouring regions can do so. Through unrelenting and sustained work Louis–François Gagnon stands as an example for our youths and a first class representative on the international scene.

Aware that such endeavours require financial support, area residents have begun collecting funds to help finance the training of this outstanding athlete, and I commend them for that.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the Minister of Finance rose in the House to tell ordinary Canadians that "in my job on Bay Street I took a cut in salary."

The fact is that the Minister of Finance was Executive Vice–President of Dominion Securities when he took his cut in salary, a job that paid him approximately $100,000 a year, almost 20 years ago. Today, that would be approximately $350,000.

The finance minister's sob story that he had to surrender some of his champagne wishes and caviar dreams when he was a big shot on Bay Street just does not compare with the plight of working people and the hardship of thousands of Canadians who rely on food banks every month to put a meal on the table or Canadians who cannot afford a decent place to live.

The Minister of Finance showed an appalling and shocking insensitivity, and clearly demonstrated to all Canadians how totally out of touch the minister and the Mulroney government really is. The Minister of Finance should stand in his place, hang his head in shame, and apologize to Canadians—Canadians who are losing their jobs, their business, their farms—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

FESTIVAL DU CINÉMA INTERNATIONAL IN THE ABITIBI–TÉMISCAMINGUE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, today is the last day of the ninth Festival du Cinéma international in Rouyn–Noranda, in the Abitibi–Témiscamingue region. For the ninth consecutive year, the festival has been exceptionally well received. More than 90 films from 24 countries—a satisfying menu indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Jacques Matte and his team, as well as the army of volunteers who once again helped to make this event an unqualified success.

We also want to thank the people in the film industry who came from across the globe. Our thanks also to the media, to our sponsors, including Telefilm Canada and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. And above all, thanks to thousands of film buffs who by their diligent attendance have made the Festival du Cinéma International in Abitibi—Témiscamingue such a tremendous success.

UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today the United States has taken over the presidency of the Security Council of the United Nations as part of the monthly routine rotation of that office.

That the U.S. assumes this position at such a critical time in the gulf crisis is of great concern to many. The U.S.-led Operation Desert Shield, which has occurred outside the realm of the United Nations and the Security Council, raises questions about the commitment of the U.S. to give UN primacy in this conflict.

Last week we heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs admit publicly that his government would go to war without UN approval if necessary, in direct contradiction to his own previous statements that the Canadian policy should derive from the Security Council resolutions.

Now that the U.S. has taken over the presidency of the Security Council, I call on the U.S. to use its position on the council to encourage a UN command system in the gulf crisis.

I also call on the Canadian government, instead of threatening war, to use its own diplomacy and UN initiatives to find creative ways to ensure a peaceful resolution to the gulf crisis and the release of Canadian hostages in Irak.

TRADE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter addressed to the President of the United States, George Bush, Oval Office, White House, Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

Dear President Bush:

I understand that a bill sits on your desk in your oval office awaiting your signature.

This bill includes the Mack amendment which forbids Canadian subsidiaries of American parent companies from trading with Cuba.

Mr. President, you are no longer running the CIA and their covert operations in Canada and Latin America. As you sit at your desk I want you to remember that the Canadian Government is about the only crony who will follow your marching orders in good times and in bad times.

Mr. President, in spite of your obedient servant Brian Martin Joseph Mulroney from Baie Comeau, I can assure you that 26 million Canadians are resentful of this attempt to decide who we should trade with and you have no right, Mr. President, to tamper with our client list.

On behalf of my brothers and sisters in Canada, I urge you to respect our Canadian sovereignty and democracy.

Defiantly yours, John Rodriguez.

MEMBER FOR BURIN—ST. GEORGE'S

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Public Accounts for 1989-1990 list member's expenses, so it is easy to identify the member with the highest bill for travel expenses. Average travel expenses for private members were $35,000.

I found that travel expenses for former Tory MP Joe Price, who represented the federal riding of Burin—St. George's in Newfoundland, varied between $32,000 and $42,000 annually from 1984 to 1988, while his sucessor, the Liberal member for Burin—St. George's managed to spend $118,865 of taxpayers money over a period of 12 months.

This is unheard of for a private member in Ottawa, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that he prepared his claims in his office, not in his game room or bar!

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this week I and my colleagues have risen to proclaim Canada Career Week, a time to applaud our communities and inspire young people to finish their education.

Across Canada, teachers and parents, governments and business are urging students to work toward a career instead of dropping out of school.

Cobalt-Haileybury High School, in my riding of Timiskaming, has its share of drop-outs, but dozens of them are realizing their potential and we are bringing them back to the high school to finish grade 12 and learn a trade. They attend school two days a week and work three days for local tradespeople who employ them as apprentices. You have to be trained today and whatever the economic conditions are, funding is a major problem. This major project is funded under the government's Jobs Strategy "Innovations" program, until 1992, which embodies, I believe, the true spirit of Canada and Career week.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance will have noticed today that his induced retrenchment or his technical recession, as he has been calling our current economic situation, has just cost another 1,000 Canadians their livelihood with the announcement of lay-offs at Sears Canada. This is on top of 2,900 lost jobs at Air Canada; 900 at Worldways; 1,500 at CN; over 700 at MIL Shipbuilding; 650 at Harding Carpets, and on and on.

Canadians need more than yarns about the Minister's hard times on Bay Street. What plan does he have to help Canadians whose livelihoods have been taken away from them as a result of this economic recession? What is the government going to do?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, besides getting rid of the manufacturers' sales tax, which will of course put all our manufacturing sector in a much more competitive position—

An hon. member: Exactly. The opposition says no, but the manufacturers say yes.

Mr. Hockin: He asks specifically about Sears Canada and Harding Carpets. Sears Canada has no intention of closing any of its stores, contrary to the rumours in the media. The company, in fact, is making offers of early retirement to a number of employees, but plans no lay-offs.

In terms of Harding Carpets, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that negotiations are continuing with the bank, and it appears to be more hopeful today than it did yesterday.

• (1420 )

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I think what is profoundly disturbing to Canadians is that the Prime Minister has admitted that this recession was a planned recession. We know that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has said that this is not just a cyclical downturn. Then, this morning after meeting with the Minister of Finance, the social policy reform group said: "The minister was unwilling to make commitments to assist those people who will be most hurt by the recession".

[Translation]

My question to the Minister of Finance is this: Could he tell the House what steps he intents to take in view of the personal tragedies facing Canadians and the economic hardship resulting from his own policies? What is the government planning to do?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to say this to the junior finance critic, but he has distorted what the Prime Minister has said and he knows that. As far as the essence of his question and what the groups that I met with this morning have said to me, they are anxious to see a significant rise from the current level of programs that help those in greatest need.

I indicated to them that on the one hand we have those organizations saying that they would like to see a greater increase in safety net spending and on the other hand we have a deeply held point of view from other people who have looked at the arithmetic of deficits and deficit financing and have said that we must continue to deal in getting the deficit down.

I would like very much to increase the safety net spending. I would like to be able to help all the people as much as they feel that we should be helping all those people who are losing their jobs. But we simply cannot do so and still maintain our commitment to get the deficit down because we know that getting the deficit down will help us get interest rates down. Getting interest rates down will help improve the performance of the economy and help people in all parts of the country with a healthier economic environment.

That is the difficulty. That is the balance that we have to find as governments. We are working hard in the consultations that we are having to find that correct balance and that is the purpose of the consultations I had this morning with the social policy groups.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of who is distorting what. It is a question of the people of Canada asking the Minister of Finance to be accountable for his policies and to state how he is going to get us out of the mess he has got us in.

He likes to quote the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He will know that they have come up with a competitiveness index that showed that Canada's competitive relationship with the other G–7 countries has fallen drastically since 1984. What policies does the minister have to improve our competitiveness with respect to those countries? What is he going to do about the widening productivity gap? What is he going to do about the permanent job loss that has occurred as a result of his policies?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be accountable for my policies, the policies I am responsible for in this government any time, any place in Canada. I have done that and I will continue to do that on an ongoing basis.

The hon. member refers to a productivity index. There are other productivity indices as well. The World Economic Forum, which measures the competitiveness of some hundred countries, put us as a country I think it was in the eleventh place in 1983 or 1984. The latest number they have had I believe was in fifth place. Looking at the broadest possible range of measures of competitiveness, broader than that of the manufacturers' association, we have improved our competitive position during that time.

He talks about what we are doing to improve our productivity. That is the essence of the government policy we have been following. The deregulation of the energy sector, the transportation section, the financial services sector, privatization, tax reform for both income tax and sales tax, and the hon. member knows that one of the key elements of the GST reform is to improve the productivity of our manufacturing resource sectors so that they can compete more effectively in international markets. He should come straight with the goods.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. This morning the minister met with the social policy reform group concerning his upcoming budget.

Lise Corbeil Vincent of the National Anti-Poverty Organization explained to the minister, and I quote: "Poor Canadians will be hit hardest by the recession, rising unemployment and inflation". They will have no choice but to rely on the different programs that form Canada's social safety net. Will the minister commit himself in the House today to stop his relentless assault on Canada's social programs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no relentless assault on Canada's social programs.

If the hon. member would state what we stated clearly in the last number of budgets, where we have been cutting spending is to avoid to the maximum extent possible hitting those safety net programs. This year spending in the federal government will go up $3.2 billion. Three billion dollars of the $3.2 billion is payments to senior citizens, family allowances, unemployment insurance benefits, veterans pensions and allowances, payments of equalization to low-income provinces, social welfare payments that we share 50-50 with low-income provinces, payments to Indian peoples on health care, education and housing. That demonstrates that we have not changed any of those programs. We are fully committed to those and to suggest otherwise is also a distortion.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, Canadians do not need the minister's 25 per cent solutions.

I have a supplementary question. The social policy group also correctly pointed out, and I quote: "The federal government has cut billions from social spending and raised billions more through income taxes by partially deindexing the tax system and key social programs". When will the minister resist his impulse to help his Bay Street buddies and start helping some of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians that he has put out of work because of his ill-conceived economic programs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the preamble to that question is again riddled with distortion. If the hon. member looks at the policies we have been following as a government, he will see that with things such as a refundable sales tax credit, the substantial increase in the child tax credit, and the effects of income tax reform have been designed so that people in upper income tax brackets are paying a greater share of the tax burden of this country, a significantly greater share of the tax burden than was the case when we came into office.

This is a clear indication of our commitment to those social safety net programs and a desire to make those programs work, not have the effect of helping those people in upper income brackets such as the members of the Liberal Party have who have continually opposed the tax-back of the old age security for those who earn more than $50,000. That is an example of how we are targeting—

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Later today we are going to be discussing national unity and, hopefully, the willingness on the part of this government to listen to what Canadians have to say. I would point out to the Deputy Prime Minister that for fishermen, farmers and working people throughout this country, those hundreds of people who are being laid off every month, the issue of the day is how they are going to make it from day to day, how they are going to continue to raise their families, stay in business and pay their bills.

It has taken years for this government to finally come to the realization that it is important to listen to Canadians. But the 1 million unemployed Canadians do not have the time to wait. So, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, what about listening to Canadians now, withdraw the GST, listen to Canadians, lower interest rates, listen to Canadians and listen to what Canadians are saying about the economic strategy of this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is not anyone on this side of the House who is happy about the fact that there are about 1 million people unemployed today. But, I will tell you what we are happy about, the fact that there are more than 1.5 million people who are employed today who were not employed six years ago. That is a measure of the economic programs that we are following.

• (1430)

The Leader of the New Democratic Party says that we should not go ahead with the GST because it will hurt low income people. That is a distortion of the policy of the government, because the GST credit, which is going to be paid by cheque four times a year starting this December, before the GST goes into effect, will offset the impact of sales tax reform so that families who are earning less than $30,000 will be better off after sales tax reform than is the case today.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This government's economic policies have not only failed; they have sold Canadians down the river. If this government had listened to what Canadians said, we would not be in the position that we are in now.

[Translation]

The best thing the government could do today to bring Canadian men and women together and unite them in pride and hope would be to listen to our poor families who are overburdened with taxes. My question is directed therefore to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Is he finally going to listen and withdraw its GST? Is he going at last to impose a minimum tax on profit making corporations which are currently paying no tax at all?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that our policies have failed. How is it, then, if with failed policies we are number two right after Japan in economic growth from 1984 right through to the end of 1989? How is it that if our policies have failed we are number one of the major industrialized countries in job creation? The policies of this government have been working.

The Leader of the NDP says that we should scrap the GST. She is concerned about the economy. We should listen to what experts have been saying who understand the tax system in this country, what they have been saying since 1940 and again in 1956, 1963, 1966, 1976, and 1983. People time and time again have said: "Scrap the existing federal sales tax, put in a new type of consumption tax, and the result will be a healthier economy".

If the hon. member wants to go back in the last little while, let me ask the Liberal members of Parliament, what is Jean Chrétien saying now? Last week—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

We will be debating, as I said earlier in this House today, Canadian unity and listening to Canadians. Three days ago when I was in Newfoundland, I met with workers from Grand Bank, Newfoundland who want to be listened to also. For these people and thousands like them, their way of life is being devastated because this government's economic policy has been to turn the fisheries over to the corporations and not to operate in Canadians' interest.

Right now there is a conference going on in Ottawa on sustainable development in fisheries. Why did the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans refuse to invite anyone from the unions representing fishermen and plant workers? Why won't he listen to these experts? Why won't he listen to the people who know the industry, who do it every day?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, if the only purpose of that hon. member is to try to picture this minister of fisheries as a person who is not listening to fishermen in the regions of Atlantic Canada, I think she is not at all in tune with the facts.

I constantly deal with fishermen and with the unions of Newfoundland and Labrador, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, P.E.I., and even on the west coast.

This hon. member grandstands in the House and wants to pretend that the downturn in the Atlantic fishery is because of economic mismanagement.

I would just like to remind her that at no time have we ever reduced the inshore allowance of the people with whom she met. We have reduced the quotas of the big corporations, but never the inshore allowance of inshore fishermen. How can she stand in this House and blabber these comments that do not make sense at all?

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the MIL Corporation announced that it was planning to lay off 700 workers in Tracy, Quebec, including 400 this coming December, bringing to over 12,000 the number of workers laid off in the Montreal area this past year. Meanwhile, the government has decided to make major cuts in the unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Speaker, when will the government take seriously the unemployment situation in Quebec and change its disastrous policies? When can we expect an economic expansion policy instead of a recession policy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might ask the Quebec government why it has harmonized its sales tax with the goods and services tax. There are very important economic benefits to be gained by the people in the province of Quebec by a province taking that attitude.

If the hon. member is worried about economic growth, he should go right down the hall now to the Senate and ask Senator Gigantes why he is reading his book. He spent over six hours simply reading his book into the record of the Senate.

For what reason? The only reason I can gather that he would read this in English into the microphone of the Senate is so he could get a free translation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, none of that is helping the thousands of people who are losing their jobs. None of that is helping.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, yesterday there were 700 lay-offs at MIL in Sorel and there were 12,000 lay-offs this year in the region of Montreal: Via Rail, Domtar, Vickers, Simpsons, General Electric, Gillette, Marconi, Weston Foods, Goodyear, Pascals, Valmet Dominion, Clairol, and Miracle Mart.

When is the minister going to stop giving us that bunk and start doing something to help people in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that Senator Gigantes is doing nothing to help the unemployed workers in this country.

He mentioned these companies, the company in Sorel and Vickers, Gillette and Marconi. All of those companies would be helped by the goods and services tax.

They will be helped because they are competing against imports. They will be helped because they are exporting companies. It is accepted by every economist in this country that that type of organization is helped by the GST.

Let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker. What does this mean here? Last weekend we had a strong Jean Chrétien saying: "This GST won't see the light of day after I am elected."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But then, when pressed on what he would do to find the $20 billion and what he would do to replace the GST, what did he say: "I never said I would repeal the GST the first day I got into office."

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

The Auditor General said this week that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions needs a better early warning system to sound the alarm when financial institutions are in trouble.

What specific action will the minister take to improve the warning system? Will he admit that his government has been hindering the superintendent's efforts by taking so long to bring in modern financial institutional legislation?

• (1440 )

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the hon. member is drawing a lot of conclusions from the Auditor General's report.

I think the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is running a very fine shop. We have modernized it and have given him additional power. He has been very involved in all reform.

I think the hon. member should see what has happened since the Auditor General went to visit that institution. The superintendent reports to me regularly. He has been taking very precise measures to remain on top of things, and he is on top of things.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel I am drawing conclusions. The complaints are there for anybody to read.

Also the Auditor General has said on page 584 of his report that one of the reasons the superintendent is having problems is that this government has taken so long to bring in modern trust and loan company legislation.

Will the minister not admit that his government's inaction has reduced the effectiveness of the superintendent's office? Will he also tell the House what he is going to do about the Auditor General's recommendations that are not covered by Bill C-83?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): It is of course essential, Mr. Speaker, that the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions runs a very important shop for our financial institutions.

They have been involved daily on all reform. They have been with us and have been the best advisers we have ever had. We have made major changes. They have all the means that they need to have because they recuperate their funding from the institutions themselves. In no way have we hindered them. On the contrary, we are prepared to work with them to be sure that this country has the best system of supervision it is possible to have.

HAVILLAND

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology or, rather, his surrogate.

Today, the CAW is taking the government to court to ensure enforcement of contract provisions agreed to between the government and Boeing Corporation which were intended to ensure that airplane production, research and development, and jobs would remain at de Havilland in Canada.

My question to the minister is quite simple. Why should Canadian workers be forced to take their own government to court to ensure that when de Havilland is acquired by two foreign governments the jobs of Canadians will not be threatened?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the House knows, and I hope the hon. member knows, that when this particular company was sold it was sold to Boeing Corporation, which is one of the best marketing companies in the world. Since then, the order book for that particular company has grown and grown through de Havilland.

However, they have decided that given the kind of market they want to be in they would like to make the sale. They are going to look at potential buyers. They have brought this company to a state of health which is much better than it ever was before it was originally sold to Boeing. When the offer to purchase comes, of course Investment Canada will look at it to see that it is a net benefit to Canada.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the minister's surrogate evidently agrees with the minister who, in a meeting with the CAW, is quoted as having said that Boeing owns the plant and can do whatever it wants to do.

Is that how the minister sees his job, to very nearly give away de Havilland, hand over about $200 million of taxpayers money to Boeing Construction, and then for the government to sit on its collective butt while Canadian jobs are given away?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member calls creating over 1,500 jobs at de Havilland in the last three years sitting on its butt, I do not know what he is talking about.

The hon. member knows—and he talks a bit like a surrogate for the CAW when he asks his question that this particular matter is before the courts. He also knows that in his question there were three hypotheticals. We do not even have a sale yet and we have this particular matter before the court.

GOVERNMENT INFORMATION SYSTEMS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. The Auditor General's report was quite clear and explicit concerning the use of computers, especially dealing with the threats and risks of illegal computer penetration and infestation, as well as safeguarding the data which are so vital for the delivery of government services. Can the Minister tell us why, after five years of warning, this situation still exists?

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Ministry of Supply and Services regularly checks the security of the computers. He should also be assured that it is only very low level intelligence that is in any of those computers because it is kept in our own secure places rather than contracting it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Having read the Auditor General's report, Mr. Speaker, I just cannot believe the Minister's reply. It's a fact, there was carelessness. When are you going to correct this situation in order to safeguard the confidentiality of computer information involving with thousands of Canadians? Is the Auditor General's report completely wrong?

[English]

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, all of the extremely important information which we have is kept on our own computers. The material that is contracted out is of a lower level of security. I want to tell the hon. member that every area that is contracted out to is regularly inspected for security and this has been the case for the last five years.

TRADE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question was to the Minister of Finance but since he is not here I will direct it to the junior Minister of Finance.

The reason Canadians from border communities are shopping in the United States is a matter of cost. The GST will add to that problem by removing a 13.5 per cent tax on manufactured goods and replacing it with a 7 per cent tax, a 6.5 per cent tax benefit to cross border shoppers.

Does the minister realize what that cost is in terms of Canadian business? Will the minister save hundreds of border community businesses and get rid of the GST?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, there are always border problems in a country like Canada which has such an extensive border between the two countries.

The GST will improve the situation of Canadian businesses and their competition with the United States. He himself admits it will improve their competition capacity with the Americans.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the junior minister should be aware that $2 billion—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we should exercise proper and polite reference to each other. I know the hon. member would want to agree with me on that.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I was following the Minister of Finance's lead to our critic.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member can set a great example for everybody.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the minister should be aware that $2 billion will leave Canada to the U.S. in business. In Windsor and Essex county, $1.5 million per week goes into U.S. business. This is no small leak, it is a major flood and a loss of tremendous dollars to merchants at the border. Now that the minister knows the impact and how the GST will devastate border towns, will he remove the GST?

• (1450 )

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just does not seem to be making any sense. If he had done his research he would know that the rates will be reduced on Canadian manufactured products from 13.5 per cent to 7 per cent. He should know that it is going to make the product cheaper to the consumer. The savings will then be passed on to the consumer.

He would also know that the GST will create $9 billion of new economic activity and make Canadian businesses and manufacturers more competitive. He would also know that there are many other reas[illegible] ucts in the United States at this point in time are [illegible] of which is because of our high dollar.

Because of the fiscal and monetary policies of this government, we will see the dollar slowly start to reduce its level as interest rates go down, which is the prediction for next year. The GST itself will make Canadian competitors more competitive in order for us to be able—

Some hon. members: Order.

AIRPORTS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Transport Canada has recently announced its intention to increase landing fees at airports across Canada on a standardized rate for weight basis. This apparently is only one of a series of cost recovery programs to be implemented on April 1, 1991.

The impact of these increases will be disproportionately severe on the smaller airports throughout the country and bear particularly adverse prospects for Atlantic Canada where air travel is now our most important travel link.

For example, a British Aerospace 146 jet landing at Halifax will have a fee of $319.20 versus a charge in Vancouver of only $98.70 and in Toronto of $100.

Given estimates by the regional airlines in the Atlantic region that these charges plus escalating fuel costs will increase ticket prices by as much as 25 per cent, will the minister reconsider and delay and defer the introduction of the proposed new cost recovery program at least until the royal commission on passenger transportation has completed its work?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. We are, as he indicated, engaged in a consultation process in both the marine and the aviation modules. The original date for [illegible] request for consultation from [illegible]ber 1. Last week I announced [illegible]fs to be received by me [illegible], 1991. I will certainly take the representations of the aviation industry into account.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the giant political crocodile, known as Rafferty–Alameda, permanently scarred the reputations of two ministers of the environment and today apparently willingly claimed the third.

Would the Minister of Justice kindly explain to the House why the federal government today sought and obtained an adjournment upon its own application for an injunction to halt construction, when its own evidence just one week ago today was that the present construction all of the past week and the construction going on today will cause irrevocable damage to the environment?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the adjournment was sought because our counsel received the day before the hearing an enormous volume of documentation from the province of Saskatchewan which required review before we could make a presentation in court.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, surprise, surprise! When a small group of dam promoters fling muck in the form of affidavits and allegations, construction of the project continues and could in fact be completed before the court rules for a third time to halt the dam. Does the minister really expect Canadians to believe that the political stench rising now results from anything other than a backroom deal and the likelihood that all of James Bay II will proceed without ever having an assessment, meaning that this government simply puts megaprojects first and environment last? Let us call a spade a spade.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, aside from the obvious offensiveness of the question, the hon. member may be comfortable making public statements without reference to the facts or without reviewing important documentations. I do not think that practitioners in front of the bar find that very advisable and no lawyer representing the Government of Canada would do that.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State responsible for grains and oilseeds.

After a very difficult spring, farmers on the prairies took off bumper crops this year. They are now expressing a very serious concern with sales. There are conflicting reports coming out. Some reports say the board is selling grain, other reports say the board is not selling grain. Farmers are legitimately concerned and we are all getting a number of questions.

I would like to ask the minister what are the facts about grain sales? What are he and his officials doing? Is he going to be able to sell the product?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises an issue of concern. I can tell him without commenting specifically on sales that the Wheat Board regularly sells to 60 countries around the world. It has been doing a good job and as a result of its ongoing sales efforts it looks like we are going to have very good grain movement right into the new year.

The hon. member should know that the board has taken up all of its options as far as Great Lakes shipping capacity to the end of the shipping season. It has asked the railways to give it all of their rolling stock right into February. With that, and with the cash advances in place, it looks like we are going to have very good grain movement well into the new year. That should put us in good position to exceed the exports we had last year.

ITALIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I address my question to the Secretary of State.

On May 23 I asked the Prime Minister what the government planned to do in terms of the request by the National Congress of Italian Canadians on Italian Canadian redress. He responded by saying: "The Government of Canada is seized of the matter and we will deal with it urgently and efficiently".

Is the government now in a position to make good on this commitment and if so, will the minister share with this House the elements of the process and package as his government did with the Japanese Canadian redress issue.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the government has listened very carefully and is examining the proposals that have been submitted. We will provide further information at the appropriate time.

[Translation]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

This coming weekend the Prime Minister is expected to address the Congress of Italian Canadians in Toronto. Considering that this event has stirred very legitimate hopes within the community and that the Prime Minister's Office will not release the text of the speech, why did the government choose to treat this very delicate question as a state secret instead of openly discussing its projects with Canadians and hon. members so as to find a solution that is acceptable to all parties involved and to all Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same, in both official languages. We heard the representations of the communities involved and we considered their propositions. As I said in English, we will provide more details at the appropriate time.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and Minister of State for Transport.

Next Monday the House will vote on the non-use of scabs in labour disputes involving Crown corporations. It stands to reason that after second reading there will be unnimous consent to amend the legislation with a view to banning the use of scabs when the people involved are federal employees or workers governed by a federal charter.

With that in mind and heedful of statements made by the hon. members for Laval-Est, Sherbrooke, Abitibi and Jonquière in support of this bill, would the minister support the bill and urge his colleagues to vote in favour of the bill on Monday?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. This weekend in Geneva, trade ministers from 29 countries, including Canada, will be meeting in an effort to break the GATT deadlock primarily involving agriculture subsidies.

Given our own trade minister's embarrassment over the fact that his government actually provides assistance to farmers, and given the refusal of the Minister of Agriculture refusal to defend Canada's true level of support, can the minister guarantee that the trade minister will not give up and will not further reduce support to Canadian agriculture and add even more to Canada's give-up list?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the House has noticed, Canada already has a very widely admired offer on the table at Geneva with respect to agricultural matters which, if accepted by the other people engaged in negotiations, will do a great deal for Canadian agriculture.

The hon. gentleman should be trying to put some pressure—and God knows he can't exert very much—on the European Community which has thrown a roadblock at the whole process of reform of agricultural trade in the world. Why does he not direct a question to the east—

Mr. Speaker: A very short single question.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the government's new unemployment legislation is not only untimely given the recession, but its implementation is a nightmare in certain cases.

Since the government has collected higher premiums as of January 1, 1990 and given the lack of affordable day care facilities for Canadian families, particularly during hard times such as these, will the minister give Canadian families what they paid for since January, 1990 and make the parental benefits retroactive to that date?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the members' attention the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Titus Allooloo, Minister Responsible for Culture, Communication and Renewable Resources of Canada's Northwest Territories.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I wish also to bring to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Dr. France Bucar, President of the Parliament of the Republic of Slovania.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members would want me to also recognize the presence in the gallery of a very distinguished parliamentarian and old friend of all of us, the Hon. George Hees.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I warn my hon. friend that is a hard act to follow.

Mr. Gauthier: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, as usual on Thursdays we ask the government to tell us the legislative menu the government has in mind for the next few days. Would it be possible to know what the House can expect tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I should be asking the hon. House Leader what will happen tomorrow, because he knows it is our intent that it be an allotted day and we wait with interest for his motion.

On Monday, we will proceed with second reading on Bill C-81, dealing with UN conventions on contracts; second reading on Bill C-82, having to do with port wardens in the province of Quebec; and, hopefully, second reading on Bill C-73, Crown corporations dissolution. On Tuesday, we will continue with what might be left over from Monday, plus hopefully complete second reading of Bill C-83, the Trust and Loan Companies Act, and on Wednesday—at this time it is more probable than assured—probably second reading on Bill C-85, dealing with airport development.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and it is related to the same question of the week's business.

Some weeks ago the government introduced Bill C-86, which would permit more Canadian families to receive prepayment of the child tax credit. At that time the Department of Finance indicated that it wished to bring the bill in so we could send out those cheques in November.

Can the Government House Leader indicate whether or not he anticipates calling Bill C-86 for debate before the recess on November 9, or whether he anticipates it coming in before Christmas so these cheques can be sent out prior to the Christmas recess?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear of the hon. member's concern for this legislation. I welcome the opportunity to sit down with him and colleagues in the Liberal Party to discuss how we might proceed with that legislation through all three stages.

As the hon. member knows, there is never reluctance on this side of the House to proceed as rapidly as possible with all legislation on the Order Paper.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to call a motion standing in my name this afternoon, respecting an initiative on the future of Confederation. The Prime Minister will be the lead-off speaker on this motion.

CONFEDERATION

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That this House calls upon the government to bring forward an initiative to address the future of Confederation.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to advise the House and Canadians of the creation of a Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. With the permission of the House I will be pleased to table the terms of reference of the forum and its membership at the conclusion of my remarks.

This will be an independent body of eminent Canadians who will launch a dialogue with people across the country and help create a new consensus about Canada and, hopefully, about our future. The situation is urgent and I think that all members, irrespective of political party, recognize that the problem is serious.

Canada is running the risk of fracturing along the linguistic and regional fault lines that have run deep throughout our history. A major fault line along the Ottawa River was created in a space of 25 years, two centuries ago, with the fall of New France and the arrival of waves of United Empire Loyalists in Upper Canada.

• (1510 )

Since then, that fault line has been the most active and in many ways, the most dangerous. We all remember the statement, "the two nations warring in the bosom of the single state" that Lord Durham reported he had found. There was the hanging of Louis Riel; the conscription crisis and riots; the October crisis in 1970; the election of a government in the province of Quebec in 1976 committed to the dismemberment of the nation; the referendum of 1980; the patriation of the Constitution in 1982; and the failure to ratify the Meech Accord after it had been approved unanimously by all governments and all parties in the House of Commons.

There has been activity over the decades across other fault lines as well, notably between central Canada, and east and west, as a result of the National Policy, the ownership of lands and natural resources, transportation policy, the energy program, and decade after decade of substantial and ongoing injustice that was sustained by native peoples in Canada.

[Translation]

And new tremors emanated this summer from Oka and from the foothills of the Rockies. Over time, all of these stresses have loosened the ties that bind Confederation together. There is little time left before the next potential shock—the tabling in the Spring of Quebec's Bélanger–Campeau Commission report. Meanwhile we have lost much of the consensus we had on what kind of country Canada is—on what we all should be able to expect from our country and what we all should be prepared to do for our country. Attitudes shape decisions and decisions have consequences.

The patriation of the Constitution in 1982 without Quebec's endorsement has had serious consequences for the attachment of Quebecers to Canada. The collapse of the Mecch Lake Accord, after it had been unanimously agreed to by all governments in Canada, has further weakened that attachement.

[English]

The failure of four First Ministers' Constitutional Conferences to resolve the issue of aboriginal self–government has provoked serious dissatisfaction very apparent across the country this last summer.

Economic policies that for decades protected central Canada at the expense of western Canada have had an important impact on the attitudes of western Canadians toward national institutions.

Atlantic Canadians have felt that their interests have too often trailed those of other parts of the country and frequently, in this particular perception as in many others, Atlantic Canadians were right.

A steady diet of often needlessly unproductive wrangling in the House of Commons and the regrettable spectacle that Canadians witnessed in the Senate last month are having dangerous effects on the credibility of our entire political process, as well as on the credibility of all people who participate in that process of any political party and from any region of the country.

Economic policies in recent decades, which gave Canadians much more than they paid for in taxes, are now having grave consequences. The bills are now coming in: a huge national debt, dependence on foreign borrowing, increased taxes, and cuts in government services as Canada struggles to pay the compound interest on large public borrowings when the federal government needs its economic strength.

Ottawa is striving to restore discipline to the fiscal situation of the nation. I think, irrespective of the government that might be here, that obligation would remain the same. More important, and the reason for its political implication, is that this financial status seriously inhibits the capacity of any federal government to use economic levers that might strengthen the federation, redress disparities or lessen the sense of grievance that individuals and communities and regions across Canada often and legitimately feel.

The challenge before all Canadians is simple. I exclude no one, certainly not myself, to have the clear headedness to learn these important lessons and the wisdom not to make the same mistakes again.

[Translation]

It is time we all did some real soul–searching. The future of Canada depends upon the answers to some very simple but very important questions. Do we all still want to live together? What kind of country do we want? Do Canadians still have common values and hopes and interests? Can Quebec, as the only predominantly French–speaking province in Canada, find cultural security and respect for its identity within our federal system?

[English]

Can the sense of western alienation be allayed by realistic and fundamental attitudinal changes elsewhere in the nation? In a country where all citizens are equal, how can the needs of the less populous regions and language minorities, and aboriginal peoples, be appropriately and perhaps permanently accommodated?

Does the present distribution of powers among federal and provincial and local governments still make sense in spite of the fact that many of them have been unchanged for 125 years, while the country and the world has undergone revolution after revolution? We have remained with many of the same powers that were imputed to one level of government or another.

What reforms should we all make so that parliamentary institutions, including the Senate, work better and reflect the interests of all Canadians, rural and urban, west and east, and north?

In a country that prides itself on its human rights record, should legislatures have the power to override the Charter of Rights and overrule the fundamental rights of Canadians? Has our pride and our multiculturalism focused too much attention on our differences and begun to be a problem for a common Canadian identity?

Can Canada's aboriginal peoples preserve their heritage and at the same time share fully in the opportunities and responsibilities of contemporary life? In Canada's modern economy, what is best done by governments, and what by individual Canadians themselves?

[Translation]

In a country that depends on trade for over 30 per cent of its income, one of the highest such percentages in the world, why are so many industries so lax in upgrading their productivity to meet the competition?

Why have barriers to trade between Canadian provinces stood for generation after generation while the free trade agreement with the United States of America was concluded in 27 months?

These are critical questions that affect the lives and prospects of all Canadians. We have to answer them frankly if we are going to establish a consensus of common interest and common purpose in this country. There is no doubt in my mind that a renewed consensus can be built.

Putting our current problems into historical perspective helps. As disquieting as the current period is for our country. Canada has overcome difficult challenges in the past. The Constitutional Act of 1791 led to a long period of political unrest, including the rebellions of 1837. The forced union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1840 led to conflict and the arson of the Parliament building in 1849.

• (1520)

[English]

The British North America Act itself was preceded by a bitter and almost decade-long debate. Confederation, when it finally did come, was at the same time an act of separation of Upper and Lower Canada and an act of unification. And the system of government agreed upon, federalism, was itself a sharing of sovereignty.

We tend to forget that in the first Parliament in 1867 there were 18 separatist members, all of them from Nova Scotia. Twenty years later, according to Laurier: "The province of Manitoba is in open revolt. The province of Nova Scotia demands its separation from Confederation—from east to west and from north to south—prevailing feeling is one of unrest and uneasiness, of discontent and irritation".

Three years later in 1890, exactly a hundred years ago, Laurier had occasion to warn all Canadians: "We have come to a period in the history of this young country when premature disillusion now seems to be at hand".

The weakening of the imperial links with Britain at the turn of the century, the sending of Canadian servicemen into two world wars and into Korea, the flag debate in 1965, the Quebec referendum in 1980, the patriation of the Constitution in 1982 without Quebec's endorsement, all stimulated profound division and bitter debate in the country.

In fact no issue has been more divisive or debated, more bitter, than creating a made-in-Canada formula to amend Canada's Constitution. The process started in 1926 with the Balfour report and the relationship of the British Dominions to the Crown and to the United Kingdom. The required unanimous consent of the federal and provincial governments eluded successive patriation attempts and our Constitution remained an act of the British Parliament and could be amended only in the United Kingdom.

Important amendments to the Canadian Constitution were in fact secured through this route, including the transfer of jurisdiction over unemployment insurance to the federal government in 1940.

[Translation]

But in 1981, in the wake of the 1980 referendum in Quebec, the momentous decision was taken to bring our Constitution home without unanimous consent, specifically without the consent of Quebec.

An important element in the victory of the federalist side in Quebec was a commitment by the then Prime Minister to renew federalism—that a «no vote» was not a vote for the status quo.

Few, if any, who fought for Canada in that difficult referendum a decade ago ever thought that the reform would eventually be carried out in such a way as to attract the support of all the provinces—except Quebec.

Perphaps things might have turned out differently if the Canadian Government had waited to ascertain if the leader of the federalist side, Mr. Claude Ryan, would win the next provincial election. The next election was but a few months away. So why not wait and see whether the leader of the Liberal Party could succeed?

But the decision was made to proceed without the approval of Quebec's national assembly. And the Parti Québécois, a political party committed to the dismemberment of Canada, was re-elected to office with 49 percent of the popular vote. That was almost 10 years ago.

Obviously, Canada's problems in this area of our national life did not begin last summer. As it turned out, the opportunity to negotiate with a federalist Premier in Quebec, did not come again until 1986, when all 10 Premiers agreed to bring Quebec back into the Constitutional family. The Meech Lake Accord—a modest set of five constitutional changes—was the result.

The failure of two provincial legislatures to pass the Meech Lake Accord in June ended a chapter in Canada's continuing search for constitutional reform. It did not mean, however, that we should close the books on Canada. It did mean that we had entered a new and more dangerous period in our national life.

[English]

Danger and opportunity are often two sides of the same coin. The danger we face gives us the opportunity to rethink our system and to chart a brand new future for our country.

The starting point is recognition of the value of what we have achieved together as a country. Partly because we came together and stayed together as an act of will rather than in the fires and the destruction of war and partly because we co-exist in North America with the world's most powerful nation, we Canadians tend to undervalue our own achievements and our own accomplishments.

As we think about our future we would perhaps be wise, as Robbie Burns put it, to see ourselves as others see us. We need to reflect on the extraordinary benefits that Canadian citizenship brings to us all. Wherever we come from, whatever language we speak, in whatever region we live, Canada is not perfect but it is one of the most magnificent nations on the face of this earth.

We need to recognize that during a century when the extremes of nationalism and racism have taken 100 million lives and caused incalculable suffering to humanity, we here in Canada, with our faults and our imperfections, managed to build one of the most civil, cosmopolitan and one of the most admired nations on earth.

We need to remind ourselves that our system of justice which guarantees equality before the law for every Canadian is widely respected around the world. We need to stop and think that with a population of only 26 million, that ranks somewhere in the neighbourhood of 31st or 32nd in the world, we have overcome both a forbidding climate and rugged geography to build the eighth largest economy in the entire world. While many countries struggle just to put bread on their tables for their citizens, we continue to enjoy, despite our economic problems, a broad range of social services and one of the best standards of living anywhere in the world.

While industrialization came at a substantial cost to Canada's natural environment, Canadians are adopting a new ethic of sustainable development and enjoying cleaner air and clearer water and better health and a better quality of life than most people on earth dare dream of.

We need to appreciate that while Canada achieved recognition as a middle power following the Second World War, Canada now enjoys substantial international influence and respect and more capacity than ever before to advance and protect the interests of all Canadians, French speaking and English speaking Canadians.

[Translation]

Canada is the only country that is a member of G–7 leading industrial countries, of the Commonwealth and of la Francophonie; Canada is completing a term as a member of the U.N. Security Council.

[English]

Membership in the Group of Seven leading industrial countries gives Canada a role at the table where the major international, political and economic issues are dealt with.

Millions of people all over the world are literally lining up to come to Canada because successive generations of Canadians have succeeded in building a tolerant, democratic, peaceful and very, very prosperous country. That is what we have now, and that is what we risk losing.

I know that many Canadians are preoccupied, and properly so, with the state of the economy, but I also know that national unity and economic prosperity go hand in hand. Uncertainty about Canada's future would deter investment and make our economic problems even harder to solve. We need a renewed consensus to take us into the 21st century.

I am pleased therefore to announce today that the government is launching a major initiative to promote a discussion among Canadians on the future of Confederation.

This process will be led by Mr. Keith Spicer, who resigned today as Chairman of the CRTC, for the period required to undertake this crucial new assignment. I know that all members wish him well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: He will be assisted by an executive advisory group consisting of: Richard Cashin, President of the Fishermen's Food and Allied Workers' Union in Newfoundland; Carol Corcoran, a barrister and solicitor and acting band manager of the Fort Nelson Indian Band and a former chief of the band; Fil Fraser, Chief Commissioner of the Alberta Human Rights Foundation; Thomas Kierans, President of the C. D. Howe Institute;

[Translation]

Robert Normand, a former Deputy Minister of Finance in the Quebec government, chairman and editor of Le Soleil.

[English]

Helena Zukowski, screenwriter and author;

[Translation]

Thérèse Paquet–Sévigny, Under–Secretary General of the United Nations; Roger Tassé, a former Deputy Minister of Justice, and Executive Vice–President of Bell Canada;

[English]

Susan Van de Velde, farmer and community activist; Elsie Wayne, mayor of Saint John, New Brunswick; and Jack Webster, broadcaster, journalist and author.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: If any member of this House of Commons from any party appears before that commission and can get a word in edgewise, let me know.

I think, however, it is fair to say they are a remarkable group of men and women from across Canada. I know they are going to undertake this crucial enterprise and bring it home with success. I know that all members of the House of Commons wish them well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Quebec, Alberta and New Brunswick have established commissions to consider their own futures and some other provinces are planning to do so, as well. Our initiative will complement not compete with these undertakings—but the Government of Canada represents all Canadians and the Forum will be seeking to develop a national consensus.

This is not a traditional Royal Commission. The goal is for Canadians to talk not just to an appointed panel but to each other about the country's future.

Consensus is created by people; we have all learned that it cannot be imposed by governments. This is an initiative for the people and of the people. Our objective is to get Canadians talking to each other about the values and characteristics and fundamental interests of this country.

[English]

Canadian unity and Canada's economic prosperity in a highly competitive world are linked. The forum will invite Canadians to talk about that too. Canadians will be invited to discuss the relationship between Quebec and the rest of the country, and the accommodations required in today's Canada for the needs of both linguistic majorities and minorities to be respected. Canadians will be encouraged to re-examine the impact of regionalism and of multiculturalism on Canadian unity and on economic development.

The forum will facilitate contacts between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians to discuss how the aspirations of Canada's first peoples can be met within the Canadian Constitution.

Canadians will be invited to consider what in contemporary society is best done by governments and what by individual Canadians themselves. Canadians will be invited to discuss as well the questions that underlie all of these issues: how to ensure that the country's institutions, particularly Parliament, designed in the 19th century, will work effectively and well in the 21st century and, at the same time, whether the division of responsibilities among the federal and provincial governments needs to be changed. If so, how and when?

We hope that this process will help bring Canadians together and help us come to a common understanding on what we can expect from our country and what we owe to our country.

This is not going to be a formal process designed for high priced consultants and high pressure interest groups. It will be informal and easily accessible to as many Canadians as possible from all walks of life. Every Canadian who wants to will be able to have a say.

[Translation]

The Forum will reach out to the people, not wait for people to come to it. It will travel to every province in the country and the territories. It will bring groups of Canadians together to meet and talk with each other—to unterstand each other's concerns and hopes and priorities.

It will, also convene regional meetings, hold public debates and solicit views of Canadians in writing. It will use modern Canadian communications technology, today's electronic railroads, to bring people together. With the extraordinary communication technology now available in Canada, it is possible to listen to and involve almost all Canadians in this great national debate. This is what this government and this Parliament want.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Spicer will report to the government on the Forum's findings by next June 30.

[English]

The government will not control the forum or seek in any way to dictate its findings, but I intend to state my own views from time to time, as I know other party leaders and indeed all members of the House of Commons will either do before the commission or seek to do across the country.

I stand for a strong, united Canada that is fair, tolerant and free. I stand for Canada that is great enough and confident enough to assure Quebec its place as a full, respected and valued partner, confirmed eventually by Quebec's willing endorsement of all of Canada's constitutional instruments so that all Quebecers feel a full and irretrievable commitment to this nation called Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1540 )

Mr. Mulroney: I stand for a Canada that is flexible enough to reorganize itself to adapt to the times and whose national institutions, including both Houses of Parliament but especially the Senate, can be reformed to serve the interests of all Canadians more fairly and more effectively.

I stand for a Canada that speaks abroad with one voice, that can protect the nation's sovereignty and security and that can play a constructive role in the world. I stand for a fiscally sound and economically competitive Canada whose development respects our natural environment.

I stand for a compassionate Canada that gives all of its people the opportunities they need to develop and prosper and gives the needy the support they require to live and grow old with dignity. I stand for a new deal for Canada's first peoples, one that will at last translate promises into reality.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I stand for a new approach to education that respects traditional rights but that sets standards that allow our children to keep up with their counterparts abroad who continue to move swiftly ahead of many of our Canadian children in schools.

[Translation]

I stand for a Canada whose basic characteristics and values are reflected in a modern Constitution, supported by all Canadians. It is the Canadian people, the concrete and steel of our national existence, who can hold this country together.

We are living through a historic moment of extraordinary and beneficial change in the world. In Eastern Europe, the dead weight of communist ideology is being rejected by people eager for the freedoms and responsibilities of democracy and free markets. In Western Europe, progress towards political and economic integration is accelerating.

In 1992, 340 million Europeans will complete their reorganization into a single market. In 1994, the Europeans are planning to set up one European central bank. By 1999, the Europeans plan to create a common currency.

In Canada, we have had a common market since 1867. We have had a common currency since 1870. We have had one central bank since 1934. We already have much of what the Europeans are now trying to build.

In Europe, the movement is inexorably towards political an economic integration and unambiguously away from the sovereignty of individual nations. Indeed, as EC president Jacques Delors has predicted: «Eighty percent of all economic and social legislation» in Europe will eventually originate in Brussels, and not in national capitals such as Paris, London or Rome.

Surely, the direction could not be clearer. In voluntarily relinquishing sovereignty, in many vital areas, European Governments are reversing the trend of centuries.

They are making these historic reforms because they believe in them. Surely, French President François Mitterand is one of the main architects and leader of all those changes in Europe. Why did he make this choice? Because he believes that, in the competitive world which is emerging, greater unity and more integration will raise the standards of living of their people and provide them with greater economic opportunity and greater social justice.

[English]

The most powerful economy in the world, the United States, is a federation and the richest market in the world, the European Community, is on a rapid and determined course toward economic and political integration.

There would appear, Mr. Speaker, to be little discernible advantage for Canadians who already enjoy the benefits of federalism to turn their backs on that system at the very moment that it has become most attractive to growing numbers of nations. Helmut Kohl, Margaret Thatcher, and François Mitterrand, and the leaders of 340 million Europeans and others who seek to join are moving more and more towards an integrated economy, more and more towards the equivalent of a political federation. We have that fundamental here and yet some are asking us to chuck it out and replace it with something that has yet to be defined. I say we have something good. Let us build on it. Let us improve it, and let us make it better for all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Canada's system of government has been beneficial to every province and to all Canadians. But our system is far from perfect. It has given rise to demands for fairer representation and calls for more responsive administration. One hears the call for help from western Canada, and from the east. One hears it in Ontario, in the north, and elsewhere.

Canada has also heard statements of hope and expressions of despair from many Quebecers. All are genuine. This problem must be dealt with. It is not going to go away. It is time to consider making reforms to our system of government, bold and far–reaching and unprecedented, if need be.

But to build a new and better Canada does not mean, however, asking our fellow citizens, French speaking or English speaking, to abandon the gains of a century to fight the tides of history and to put their hopes in an uncertain and narrowing future. I believe that we have within our grasp the possibility of rebuilding one of the most magnificent nations on the face of this earth, which provides for the beauties of its citizenship equally to French and English speaking Canadians, to new Canadians and old. That was the promise of Confederation, and we can deliver now on the promise of that Confederation to all citizens in Canada today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: As Prime Minister, I am totally devoted to the unity of Canada, and as a Canadian I believe deeply in the fundamental decency and extraordinary potential of this country.

The initiatives that we took at Meech Lake, which were not easy—

[Translation]

I heard some of the Liberal members laugh when we were talking about Canadian unity. But all the members of this House have supported it, including the hon. member for Hamilton East who showed leadership by having the courage to rise in support of a proposal which, although flawed, was designed to promote unity among the Canadian people. We failed with the Meech Lake Accord but it does not mean that we compromised the country's future. And I think that, with the level of co-operation in this House and with the Canadian people's deep commitment to fundamental values, we can revive the soul of this great nation and rebuild Canada for tomorrow.

[English]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the partnership of Macdonald and Cartier, of English speaking and French speaking Canadians was real. I believe that respect for that partnership and respect for the French and English languages that have become official languages of this country constitute an indispensable cornerstone of our political and cultural sovereignty.

• (1550)

The French language and culture—and I am saying it in English to make sure it is clearly understood—has enriched the identity of Canada, as surely as the English language has and every member of this House should stand for that fundamental principle.

So, Mr. Speaker, I put my faith in the resilience and common sense and optimism of the Canadian people. These are the strengths that will anchor the coming discussions and make flexibility and accommodation possible.

Canada is simply, Mr. Speaker, an act of will. It lives in the minds and hearts of all Canadians, and Canada will endure only if Canadians want it to. I sense, even in the moments of difficulty, a will for unity across the country and I am sure that we are capable of finding a way.

I believe that it takes major changes. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if it takes major changes to hold this country together, Canadians want those changes made. I believe that if it takes a new process to achieve those changes, Canadians want a new process designed. With the initiative the government is announcing today, I am signalling our determination to listen to Canadians, to listen carefully to Canadians, wherever they live across Canada and to work with them in building the Canada of the 21st century.

The wounds of past grievances are deep, but if we co-operate we can heal them. The gulfs created by our current disagreements are wide, but together we can bridge them, and the tests imposed by emerging global challenges will be difficult, but together we can pass them. Our parents and grandparents confronted and resolved the issues of their day and turned over to us one of the best countries in the world.

[Translation]

The Canada that emerges from the current process of change and renewal will be far different than the one we inherited.

Mr. Lapierre: It is too late.

Mr. Mulroney: The hon. member for Shefford says that it is too late. It is not. I will simply tell him that if we work together, we will give our children a country that is extraordinary and viable and that they will be proud to call their fatherland, Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I appeal to members on both sides of the House and to Canadians from St. John's to Trois-Rivières to Orillia to Victoria. It is time to repay Canada for all that has been given to us, handed to us, handed over to us without the slightest effort on our part, with the possible exception of being born in this country or having the good sense to come to it. It is time to do justice to the dreams of our founders and to the courage of the men and women from countries around the world who came to Canada to build this country.

Mr. Speaker, my plea is simple. Let us work together, English and French speaking Canadians, new Canadians and native born, to give our children one united Canada where justice prevails and freedom always rings out.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I wish to table, in both official languages, the terms of reference of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, and its membership.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in this autumn of discontent, it is not only the constitutional future of Canada that is in question, it is the very future of our country itself. The policies of this Conservative Prime Minister and his government have shaken the foundations of this country. These policies have called into question Canada's ability to face the enormous challenges that are now on our doorstep.

[Translation]

All Canadian regions are telling us clearly they are dissatisfied. Many Canadians are questioning not only government policies but the political institutions themselves.

[English]

The loss of confidence of many Canadians in our political institutions runs deep. It goes well beyond the division of powers between the two levels of government. People are losing confidence in the ability of these institutions to deal with the historic changes taking place in Canada, and around the world.

At a time when the world is coming together, the risks are growing that Canada will drift apart. At one time, Canadians had a sense of common purpose and common enterprise. Those shared beliefs helped us to build a country that has been a global economic and political leader.

We should remember how we forged this country out of an unforgiving climate and against very strong north–south currents. The time has come to reflect on where we have been and where we are going as a nation.

[Translation]

Since the beginning our society has been characterized by the coexistence of two language groups unlike anything else. The association of English–and French–speaking Canadians is a foundation of our country's evolution. This association has led us to find specifically Canadian solutions to our problems, to create our own institutions and to continue building our country in our own way.

[English]

On this foundation, including that provided by our aboriginal peoples, we have built a multicultural and a pluralist society. People from all corners of the world have come, as did my own parents, to help build a better society, a better country, better lives for themselves and their children. Tolerance and accommodation of differing views and beliefs have been important to all Canadians. These very principles are enshrined in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Canadians have always had a special respect for diversity. It is an asset and a source of strength and enrichment.

I believe that the Canadian challenge has been to reach for an ideal, while recognizing that we might never attain it. We have never measured the success of the Canadian experience by asking if it has ever been completed. Until recently, our progress as a nation has been in many ways the envy of the world. We persevered. We reached for new heights. We built a strong and a thriving nation.

• (1600)

Consider our social infrastructure. Although it is under stress, and in my view under attack from this Conservative government, it is a system to which all Canadians must have access. It is a system to which many millions of Americans wish they had access. Our social safety net has been the product of an approach championed over the years by Liberals. It has been a system based on Canada's prosperity and Canada's generosity.

[Translation]

Quebec has also made remarkable progress in every area since Confederation and especially since the '60s. Its economic and cultural accomplishments in the last 30 years have been outstanding. From its performers to the economic progress made possible by its own people and the success enjoyed by its university graduates, Quebec has changed for the better.

I remind you that Quebec has grown within the Canadian context. Is it logical, Mr. Speaker, for Quebecers to suddenly renounce this country because the current Prime Minister has failed in his Constitutional reform project?

[English]

Ours is a large and diverse country. It is understandable that, from time to time, some Canadians may question the values that unite us. That is why throughout our history it has been the duty of prime ministers to remind us of our shared values, to inspire us, and to motivate us to work together.

There is nothing wrong with Canadians and their values. What has been missing has been the right kind of national leadership right now, the right kind of national leadership based on building and finding consensus. Regrettably, this Prime Minister has too often failed to appreciate, to communicate, and to build on our shared national values. As a result, there is now division and disarray in all parts of our great country.

This Prime Minister has abandoned his duty to provide leadership built on consensus. When the all-party special committee, the Charest committee, tried to find a way out of last spring's constitutional impasse, the Prime Minister hesitated and then simply rejected its findings out of hand. He did not have a solution that reflected the concerns of Canadians. This Prime Minister was not interested in what Canadians thought. This Prime Minister rolled the dice with Canada's future. He even bragged about it. His way was secret deals, brinkmanship, and more brinkmanship, but certainly not leadership.

In short, this Prime Minister has failed to show any leadership in one of our country's most desperate hours of need and in the past months we have all been paying the price of his failure.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): He and his government have been dismantling the institutions that have made Canada among the greatest nations on earth. Our social safety net, our national transportation system, our shared values of compassion, sharing, tolerance and equality of opportunity—all are slipping away under this government.

This is a dramatic departure from the great prime ministers of our past. Those prime ministers all understood that Canada is more than the sum of its parts. It is more than a community of communities. A strong national government has always been necessary to meet the great challenges of the day and to work for the benefit of all the regions of the country. A strong national government is essential to meet the challenges now before us as a nation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Today, the Prime Minister has finally admitted that his past approach to constitutional reform was fundamentally flawed. By this motion, the Prime Minister has finally admitted that rolling the dice just does not work when the future of our country is at stake.

The Liberal Party of Canada is encouraged to see that the government is committing itself to listening to Canadians for once. The commission he announced that will travel the country to seek out Canadians' views on the state of the nation must, however, be more than simply a public relations exercise. Canadians who appear before the commission must be given ample opportunity to give full expression to their views. There should be no more insiders or outsiders. When the very fabric of the nation is on the line, the views of every Canadian do matter. Every Canadian has a right to be heard and, this time, all Canadians have to be insiders.

Meaningful constitutional reform is not accomplished behind closed doors with only a few select participants. If it is to be successful, reform must be built upon the shared values of all Canadians.

We do have some concerns about what we know, so far, about the government's proposal. One is a concern that the commission may hear only from well organized special interest associations or elite groups with special access. Who will speak for the ones who have no collective voice? Who will speak for the single parents, the poor, the sick, the workers whose jobs have moved to the United States or Mexico, and those Canadians in remote parts of this land?

Liberals are also concerned that once it has listened to Canadians, the commission should be able to work to present a comprehensive final report to Parliament. The commission should have enough time to do its deliberations properly and to prepare its report. That report must truly reflect the views of all those Canadians who have appeared before the commission.

This must not simply be an opportunity for people to blow off some steam while the real work is done by the Prime Minister once again behind closed doors. We need a serious dialogue if we are to get out of the malaise now gripping the country, the malaise the government has been unable to contain, and in fact for which it has been a major contributor.

A constitution is both a political statement and a legal document. It is more than just a piece of paper. A constitution embodies and reflects the shared values of our society. It sets out the legal framework for the structure of our society. Unlike labour and business agreements which have limited terms and can easily be changed, constitutions are difficult to change once made, as they should be.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, those who deal with fundamental values and political institutions, and try to preserve our society's most sensitive balance, must act with careful consideration. These changes are meant to last a long time. We must write them properly before adopting them and not the other way around. If there are errors in the draft resolution, it would be irresponsible not to correct them before the changes become effective.

[English]

Canadians want more than a travelling constitutional road show. They want a chance to be heard even after that commission is finished. No more secret meetings, no more secret deals, and no more manipulation and intimidation. Canadians want this Prime Minister to listen to them. They want meaningful reform.

• (1610)

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this time, the Canadian people will be called upon to play an active and constructive role.

[English]

This time the concerns of all Canadians—our aboriginal peoples, women, people of every origin—and the concerns of all our regions must be reflected in any decisions taken by governments.

We must never forget that constitutional reform must, above all, have the goal of preserving our country and thereby improving the well-being of all Canadians. It must reaffirm the values shared by Canadians wherever they live in this great land. It must help us all to achieve the goal of social justice that makes up the very core of the Canadian identity.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are strongly committed to our principles as Liberal and as Canadians. We are proud to be Canadians and we will promote our concept of Canada across the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, Canada is not static. The Liberal Party of Canada has understood this for a long time, despite what our opponents say. The Liberal Party has never been and will never be in favor of the status quo.

Mr. Speaker, our institutions must change, adapt and improve.

[English]

In the words of Jean Chrétien, the Leader of the Liberal Party, the solutions we seek should respect at least three fundamental principles.

> First, they must be compatible with the very nature of Canada which finds its raison d'être in sharing, diversity, and respect for the rights of individuals.
> Second, they must result in the reform of our political institutions, including the Senate, to ensure that the distinct concerns of our four great regions, the Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario, and the west, are respected.
> Third, they must favour the renewal and modernization of our economy to create economic policies that will allow us to be competitive in the world of tomorrow.

In summary, and by way of conclusion, the process announced by the Prime Minister today is fraught with both opportunity and danger. The process of last spring ultimately failed because the people of Canada felt like mere observers, rather than full participants in that constitutional process. Surely the message of the events of last spring is that constitutions cannot be made behind closed doors in this country.

Consultation means more than the right of simply being heard either before or after the fact. Consultation must mean the right of the people of Canada to scrutinize and have input into specific constitutional proposals whenever they are presented by the government.

True consultation, true public participation, must be based on the notion that constitutional proposals by governments are not carved in stone. They can be altered. They can be changed as a direct consequence of public input.

We do welcome the process announced today by the Prime Minister. We see an important opportunity for public dialogue. We see an opportunity to foster understanding and consensus in the country. We also see some danger. This process is and can be only a first step. It must be followed by an open constitutional process. Once new and specific constitutional proposals are formulated by the federal government, that government must go back to the people of Canada again. It will not be acceptable for it to say to Canadians: "You have had your chance to be heard in the winter and spring of 1990 and now we, the federal government, are going back behind closed doors again."

Mr. Speaker, the days of "my way, or no way," are over.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is no longer acceptable in this country to settle for a consensus of 11 men meeting in secret after the citizens' forum announced by the Prime Minister has reported.

True consensus, national consensus, will only be found in and through the hearts, minds and souls of Canadians. Let us recognize in this the autumn of our discontent that we must not fail again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address some remarks today in response to the Prime Minister and to say that I think that finally an initiative has begun which will begin the dialogue in Canada.

[Translation]

Let me say first of all that I support all initiatives related to Canada's future. It is time to initiate a dialogue. With Meech Lake, Canadians lived through the most traumatic experiences ever seen in this country's recent history.

[English]

The Prime Minister said today that he wants to open up the constitutional process and implies that he is prepared to change the old style politics of behind closed doors decision-making.

[Translation]

I welcome these statements but, once again, I fear that the Prime Minister's rhetoric may not reflect his actions. He had four months to decide who to appoint to the Commission and to consult with various groups. He had four months to allow these groups to elect representatives who might have become members of the Commission.

[English]

There was an opportunity, Mr. Speaker. I think, if I may make reference to the commission itself, it has a good representation. My quarrel is not with the individuals who are on that commission, but the Prime Minister had an opportunity to fundamentally change the system in terms of opening up the process.

Let me give you a couple of examples, Mr. Speaker. Surely a commission like this should have been above partisan concerns, and I am not suggesting that the people who are appointed were necessarily partisan appointments. But the process could have changed if the Prime Minister had perhaps consulted—at least he did not consult me as leader of the New Democratic Party—about the kind of commission, about the terms of reference, that we as a party would like to see. That would have been a fundamental change in the old style of politics.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: There is another way that the Prime Minister could have changed the old system fundamentally by saying to different groups in our society: "Could you elect, or could you nominate persons to represent your particular interest—business, labour, aboriginal people".

Also, I regret, Mr. Speaker, that once again there is no representative from the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, one-third of Canada's land mass. I would like to say that there is a particular point of view from the north that I feel should be represented in such a constitutional committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, long before I became leader of my party, I was talking about opening up the constitutional decision-making process. As a Northerner, I was always frustrated at the governments that refused to consult us, that acted as if Northerners did not exist.

[English]

Therefore, it is regrettable, Mr. Speaker, that there was no one from the Yukon or the Northwest Territories on this commission. I would ask the Prime Minister if he would reconsider that and consider someone from the north to be included in this commission. The Constitution building of this country clearly must become an inclusive process. A constitution cannot simply meet a legal test but must indeed meet the test of the people for whom that constitution and with whom that constitution is formed.

• (1620)

Last June I raised the idea in this House of a constituent assembly on the Constitution.

[Translation]

I was commenting that Canada needs such a renewal. Aboriginal people, women, labour, business and religious groups, as well as intellectuals must have their say on the Constitution we are creating.

[English]

I am pleased that at least this is a beginning on that idea which I presented last spring. There is more to the unity of Canada than a constitution. I want to remind Canadians that it is this Prime Minister who appointed eight GST senators to the Senate and who now says that he wants to see it change in those institutions, as does the New Democratic Party. That is why we have initiated a committee of the New Democratic Party on reform of parliamentary institutions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is this Prime Minister who totally ignores the opinion of most people and refuses to withdraw the GST. He does not have a good reputation when it comes to listening and consulting.

[English]

I hope this will be a change, but I say again that the unity of the country is just not found only in a constitution. When people from outside the country look at our country, they often judge it on three characteristics: the rich culture and language of Quebec; aboriginal people, the First Nations of our country and; the north and the territories.

It is exactly on those three areas that we in Canada have failed to come together. That must be the challenge for this committee and for all Canadians. It is not sufficient just simply to have a committee of eminent persons—whom I am sure will work very hard and do a good job—but it is not just enough to have a committee that goes out to speak to Canadians. If we are truly to work for Canadian unity, we have to continue to find ways for Canadians to dialogue with each other.

One of the fundamental problems that we have in Canada is that in this diverse country due to the distances between communities, the people in Newfoundland often do not know the people of the Northwest Territories, the people in British Columbia, the people in Quebec and so on. We have to find ways in order to also bring about that kind of unity. There are many ways that one can do that. One can do that through communications systems.

It is ironic that at the same time that the Prime Minister is standing before us in this House and saying that he wants to work for the unity of Canada—and I believe him—at the same time there is a communications bill before this House that says that the CBC will no longer have a mandate to promote national unity. Let us have some consistency here, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: If the Prime Minister is serious about making his government open and honest, he should create a parliamentary committee on the Constitution and submit the commission's report to the committee for review.

[English]

In the spring I had proposed that we should establish a standing committee on the Constitution. Clearly, this would have been a way, since the repatriation of the Constitution, to have continued the dialogue and initiated dialogue throughout Canada. That was not done then. That was not done when I suggested it again to this government in the spring. Again, I would urge the Prime Minister and his government to consider the establishment of a standing committee on the Constitution so that members of Parliament also can be continuing to work on the Constitution of our country.

As I said, it is not simply enough for a group of Canadians to travel the country, but to find ways to bring people together in our country. I talked about the cuts to the CBC. I could have mentioned also the cuts to VIA Rail, which is another way from east to west that maintained some unity in our country.

This government has cut exchange programs from high school students. These are the things that bring people together. We should be developing initiatives for our young people to meet each other and have a dialogue, not simply to cut them back.

It is also a government that has cut aboriginal communications and women's groups communications. The government must be consistent here. If the government is truly dedicated to promoting Canadian unity, yes, it is the Constitution that is important, but it is just as important to make sure that groups can communicate with one another and that we can come to know each other.

There are other problems that are creating a lack of unity in this country today; that is, the economic situation of this country. The trade deal with the United States and the proposed trade deal with Mexico has already caused the loss of some 165,000 jobs in Canada. Every day, we read of yet another series of lay-offs: hundreds, and sometimes in the thousands.

The Prime Minister said that we are a rich country. I agree. As a rich country, we must hang our head in shame, and this government must hang its head in shame when one in six of our children still lives in poverty, when rural communities on the west and east coasts, and in central Canada, are being devastated by the economic policies of this government.

We know that in this country small business is one of the greatest creators of job opportunities. Yet small business itself is being devastated by the economic policies of this government. This is not the action of a government dedicated to unity. We must redress the imbalance in our economic system.

I say to the Prime Minister: Regional discontent in Canada, the disparity between the rich and poor does not simply lie with the constitutional structure. It is a product of economic and social policies. During the trade debate, we were very clear in this party about our concern for our natural resources, for our renewable resources and non-renewable resources.

We were very concerned about protecting the social programs. What has happened? Unemployment insurance has been privatized. Fish stocks have been devastated. Environmental review has really just become a shell and not a real environmental review. Things that will bring this country together are the shared and common values, as the other speakers have said, but those shared and common values must be represented as well by a shared and common responsibility, and a government that will stand up for the public interest, the public good and listen to all Canadians, and not just to the corporate voice.

How can we have fairness? How can we have unity in this country when women still are not paid equally with men, we still do not have adequate child care for our children nor, in fact, for many children even the basic necessities of life, shelter and food? How can unity be promoted in this country when every day there are more unemployed, more of our Canadian heritage is being sold to foreign interests and our sovereignty is compromised by another country?

This government has no full employment policy. In fact, in subsequent budgets the government has shown what the level of unemployment will be. Of course it has always underestimated it.

• (1630)

However, if this government were committed to Canadians and the Canadian interest, we would see policies of full employment. We would see policies of putting the environment before the interest of profit. We would see a government that says: "We are going to stand up for the public interest. We are not going to sell off Petro-Canada. We are not going to try to sell it back to Canadians and then sell a percentage to foreign owners. We are going to say that Canadian resources belong to Canadians, and they will be operated in the interests of Canadians".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Those are the actions of a government that cares about Canadians, that cares about unity. The commission that has been appointed is a good step to begin the kind of dialogue, but it cannot just be the exclusivity of that commission.

I would like to see the government take action, as well as dialogue, and listen to Canadians to create ways for Canadians from coast to coast to coast to talk with each other and to learn about each other in French, in English, in aboriginal languages, in all of the languages people are most comfortable with.

Canada, as it is today, is still a very rich and prosperous country. We are rich not only in resources but in ideas. We are rich in cultures. We are richer for having Quebec as part of Canada. We are rich because of the north, because of the first nations of this country, because of the number of people who have chosen Canada as their home.

Yes, we have a financial deficit, but we have an even greater deficit if we do not all work to preserve this country, to pass this country on to our children, and to say that the worst deficit is the person who is homeless, the person without enough to eat, the young person who has no hope for a job in the future.

In order to bring us together, we must indeed resolve a Constitution that provides for equity and fairness from coast to coast in this country, equity between races, between language, between provinces and territories, between men and women. I believe very strongly that we can do this, because what Canadians do not have a deficit of is the spirit and the will. We have much to learn from each other. People in the Yukon have a lot to learn from people in Quebec, and vice-versa. That is true for across this country.

[Translation]

In spite of all these flaws and injustices, our country is still a great accomplishment: a meeting of various cultures and people separated by great distances, of communities united in their efforts to achieve the same goal.

[English]

We will await the terms of reference of this committee. I hope the Prime Minister will ensure that we do have a standing committee on the Constitution, that we do expand the process, and that we are able as parliamentarians to share in an ongoing way in the discussion of the committee's work. I would ask that the Prime Minister ensures that this committee will report not just to himself but to all parliamentarians and to all Canadians in a public and an open manner.

There are many things that we have to resolve. There is one thing I am sure that all parties can agree on, and that is that we must not lose what those before us have built and we must not give away what those of us hold in trust.

I wish the commission well. We in the New Democratic Party will participate in any way that we can across this country. I believe that we can create a more caring and compassionate country. I urge the Prime Minister not only to open the dialogue on constitutional matters but on economic, social and environmental issues that are of concern to all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—the environment; the hon. member for Hamilton East—the environment; the hon. member for Chambly—the environment.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to make a few comments following the speech by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and I must say that unlike the hon. member, I do not think this committee will accomplish anything of any substance, and that basically, it amounts to an admission of weakness by the government.

It is as though the government had shed its responsibilities and leadership and handed them over to the local quilting club and the kitchen-meeting circuit.

Mr. Speaker, should Canada's future be put in the hands of the non-elected? I wonder why the Prime Minister didn't ask the senators to be in charge of this committee. That would be just as democratic as what he announced this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, I think the speeches by the various party leaders were the kind of speech they would have made in 1980. Ten years later, it is too late to decide to listen and respond to the question "what does Quebec want?". It is even worse this time, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec Round has been deep-sixed, and Quebec's legitimate demands, which are a prerequisite for any negotiations, will now be swallowed up by the demands of all Canadians.

The Prime Minister's failure to achieve national reconciliation has now been transmogrified into a kind of mini-committee which, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, will show Quebecers the utter lack of understanding that exists vis-à-vis Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct impression that if all the hearings are televised, they will prove to be Quebec sovereignty's best ally. I am convinced that night after night in the months to come, television will show Quebecers intolerance, lack of understanding and a refusal to accommodate our distinct identity.

And this is unfortunate.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is very sensitive to Quebec issues and who will rise later on, must realize that what we will get before this committee is a demonstration of ill-will. Actually, we should be relieved at the federal government's lack of imagination.

What I want to say, to the Prime Minister and to this House, is that we are not impressed at all by this diversion, and that the real purpose of this committee is not nation building but to provide a media event for the Prime Minister's weekend convention. We are only too aware that this is all part of a plan to shut up the Quebec Conservative Party and give them something to chew on during the weekend.

Mr. Speaker, I think this House is very disappointed in the government's lack of initiative. On the other hand, we see this committee as an opportunity for English Canada to do some soul-searching. That is good news. But in any case, it's too late, so use this committee to decide how you intend to negotiate with a sovereign Quebec.

If the committee really wants to fulfil its mandate and listen to the concerns of Canadians, it must be prepared for the choice Quebecers will make, irrespective of its findings.

Mr. Speaker, these comments were made subsequent to what was said by the Leader of the NDP, and I thank you for giving me this opportunity.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I did not make a speech for 1980. I think we must look to the future.

Neither I nor my party are separatists. We intend to work together with all Canadians for the future of this country, a united country that is a reflection of our cultural diversity. I am proud of the fact that, for 25 years, my party has supported the concept of Quebec as a distinct society, and we will continue to support that concept, as well as the rights of natives, women, and the other provinces and territories, so that they will all have a place in Canada.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that what the Prime Minister said in this House at a very important moment in our history was well received, both by the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I deeply regret that among all these efforts to restore Canadian unity, efforts that may be a bit late in some cases but that are nevertheless being made by the Prime Minister at this time, the only strident note was struck by a member who seeks what he calls Quebec's sovereignty. I believe it is still possible to say that Canada, the Canadian federal system, provides the best guarantee for the survival of Francophones living in the province of Quebec, and that the federal structure is still the best system of government for the legitimate aspirations of Quebecers.

If some members in the Parliament of this country appear to have lost confidence in Canada, I find that regrettable. I think they are doing a disservice to the people of Quebec by taking a defeatist and pessimistic stance with respect to Canadian institutions that have admirably safeguarded the survival of French and French culture over the years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: Although today, the Prime Minister has decided to let a group of citizens take over part of his responsibilities, I hope that following the work done by this group of eminent Canadians, the Prime Minister will be able to take a more enlightened approach to the kind of solutions he will put before Canadians and the provincial Premiers, in the interests of our country. Nevertheless, I applaud the action taken today. I have the greatest regard for Mr. Keith Spicer whom I have known for a long time, and I think he will do an excellent job as chairman of the forum. I wish him the best of luck. On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, I want to congratulate those who have agreed to serve with Mr. Spicer on this forum, and I think that although what they do will not provide the final answer to Canadian problems, the forum will most certainly provide a vehicle for as many Canadians as possible to express their views in the interests of unity, which I think is essential for the many Quebecers who, I am convinced have not lost confidence in Canadian unity.

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reiterate once again that my party and I are absolutely committed to doing what we can to leave to our children the country that we inherited.

That does not mean it is the same country and the same status quo. It means that we can find new ways to relate to one another, that we can find ways and probably better ways to recognize and respect one another.

I am proud to participate in that process. The initiative of the Prime Minister may not have been the one that I would have taken necessarily, and as I pointed out in my speech, it could have been done in some other ways. We have begun the dialogue. It is important now for all parliamentarians of goodwill who want to work for this country to support that process.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate. May I say on behalf of my colleagues in the government how pleased I am at the support that has been expressed by the leaders of the other parties in the House for this initiative.

As we all know—no one knows it more dramatically than those of us who are in politics—we live in a cynical time. There have been some expressions of doubt about how this commission will proceed, how this forum will affect debate. I think it should be judged by its work.

It has been established by this government in recognition of some profound changes in the attitudes of Canadians towards Canada, and based upon a determination to do what we can at this critical time in the country, to ensure not only that Canadians participate, because that is simply a question of process—an important question but a question of process—but also to ensure that as we move forward from what I believe is genuinely a turning point in the history of this country, we all of us have the benefit of the best and considered advice of people across the country whose concern about their country we should never underestimate.

When I go home to my constituency or when I speak to Canadians across the country, I am always encouraged by the evidence that I find of the degree to which men and women, who have other things to do, think about this country, value it, have dreams and aspirations as to what it can become.

The question was raised as to the public nature of this process. It will be very public, very open. That is its design. The Prime Minister spoke quite accurately when he said that our purpose here is to put in place a system. I think this is the first time something like this has ever been done by any country anywhere, a system that will encourage people everywhere in the country, communities across the land, to speak and work together about what we want to make of this nation.

I think it appropriate to make the case that in times of great trouble in the country, and obviously we are facing times of great trouble in this country, the easy thing is to retreat to nostalgia or to simply put one's head down and say, "There is nothing we can do about that". The other easy thing, of course, is to attack other Canadians. I remember the words of a distinguished former leader of my party, former Leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Robert Stanfield, who observed once that nothing is easier in Canada than to unite most of Canada against some of Canada. That of course is easy. It has always been easy and it has never been worthy. That temptation may be there for some in the country. It is a temptation that I think the great majority of members of this Parliament, and certainly I believe the great majority of the citizens of my part of Canada, in western Canada, will want to turn aside.

I congratulate the Prime Minister, not only on bringing this in, but having the imagination at this time of great crisis in the country to be prepared to look at new models, to recognize that there are faults in all of us and that we are only going to be able to make the most of this extraordinary country if we recognize some of those faults and are prepared to adopt new ways of defining together the nature of the country.

Along with a number of other members—

[Translation]

I must add something because my friend, the hon. member for Shefford, used the word "intolerance". He was the only one to use it in this debate. He thinks the public hearings will indicate a feeling of intolerance across Canada. I doubt it but we will see.

I think this process will reveal neither intolerance nor hatred but a much more positive attitude toward Canada by citizens from Quebec and Alberta among others. He does not agree with me at the moment, but I intend to wait for the process to indicate what Canadians really think.

• (1650)

I am convinced that Canadians want a country known for its tolerance.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, with a number of other members, I celebrated—one is never sure whether it was an honour the other night—the eighteenth anniversary of my election to the House of Commons. I have to say that in that period of time, and in the time in which I was honoured to work in public life before that, I do not think there has ever been a period in which one could be less certain about what would happen to this country, or, indeed, the challenges that were facing the nation were greater than they are now.

I have had the privilege over that time to take part in the great national debates that have shaped the country. I had the privilege, along with others who were in the House, who are in the House now with the Prime Minister, to take part directly and personally in the debate in Quebec during the referendum.

I have had the opportunity, sometimes uncomfortably, to have to defend the politics of national unity, to have to defend the Official Languages Act and other instruments across the country. I have done that with pride.

I think we are now at a time in which there has been quite a profound change in the attitudes of Canadians towards the country. Let me speak for my part of the country. I believe that the reaction in my part of the country to the Meech process was that there were opponents there, large numbers of opponents.

I believe at the end of the day they were, in fact, not opposed to the idea of a distinct society. There will always be some in western Canada who worry about that view and there will always be people there who seek to exploit them. But I think that that was not the principal concern at the end. At the end it was a concern of process. I think people did genuinely feel that the process that had worked for years excluded them, that there was something wrong with the institution of federal-provincial relations.

Certainly in my part of the country there is a profound sense that there is something wrong with our parliamentary institutions, more the other place than ours, but both our places, a sense that these institutions do not reflect the real requirements of a country that has become, among other things, much more educated, much more sophisticated, in which people have a much greater capacity to take decisions themselves as to the future of the country.

By the failure of the Meech Lake process, there was brought into sharp focus, in western Canada at least, a profound dissatisfaction with the way the country works; not a dissatisfaction with Canada, but a dissatisfaction with the way the country works. To any of us who have had the privilege of being acquainted with Quebec, that part of Canada, there was a profound disappointment at the rejection of Meech Lake, and some sense that Canada had turned away from Quebec.

I thought that one of the most important questions that was posed in the immediate aftermath of Meech Lake was a question posed, not by a member of this House, but by the Liberal Prime Minister of the province of Quebec. He made the observation—I believe it was on the floor of the National Assembly of Quebec, that for a long time the question had been, "What does Quebec want?". Now the question is, "What does Canada want?".

Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question, a question for Yellowhead in Alberta, a good question for Quebec, a good question for Toronto, a good question for the north, for Halifax, for everywhere in the country, because we are facing a time when we have to answer that question.

What is it that this country wants? We know our history. As the Prime Minister outlined with such eloquence today in the House of Commons, it has been a history that, of course, has been marked by differences, divisions, and very often, by danger.

We know that history. And we know that we have formed out of that history a quite extraordinary society, a society that is marked as almost no other in the world is, by a tradition of diversity, a capacity to reflect a wide range of cultures and traditions here within the context of one nation. But how does that apply to the world we are facing now? I think those are questions which should not be looked at as constitutional questions because they are not narrowly constitutional. Those are questions about who we are as a country. Of course it is important that parliamentarians address those questions, as all of us do, but it is also important that the people of Canada, whose country this is, have the opportunity in a formal, organized way to address those kinds of questions. This process is not simply to travel the country.

The Prime Minister made it abundantly clear that this is not a royal commission like others. Other royal commissions hear briefs by formal groups, bear presentations to government. What this is designed to do is to make it more possible, to encourage individual Canadians to speak with other individual Canadians; people who may not have met one another before, people who come from different cultures and people who have different ways of looking at the country. This commission is not to celebrate or to deepen our differences, but to find ways by bringing together the quite remarkable diversity of this country, we can define what kind of nation we want to have by the year 2000, what kind of nation we want to have as we face the extraordinary new challenges the world poses to all civilized societies.

If I may revert to my role as the foreign minister of the country, that is important to us, and we should never forget it in this House. It is also fundamentally important to other peoples in the world.

The Prime Minister evoked that great Irish poet, Robbie Burns—

An hon. member: With a Scottish accent.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Well, I thought I could get away with a bit of humour, but I see that I have as much luck in the House as I do in the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question that other countries of the world take great confidence from the success Canada has made of bringing together diversity. Indeed, there is no question that if we continue the role of leadership that is open to us, both practical leadership, the kind of which I speak, and moral leadership, of the kind which others in the House speak of more often, our capacity for that kind of leadership will extend quite dramatically if we are capable of continuing and extending into the new world of the future the quite remarkable ability to bring together differences that we have here. Nor is this process designed simply to be about constitutions, which are formal things. What this is designed to do is encourage Canadians to think about the kind of country we want our constitutions to reflect and to express.

There will be times for constitutional discussion. There will be times for lawyers. This is a time for ordinary Canadians who have views about their country to think what those views should be and about what the country should be and try to find some ways in which we can come together. We face fundamental historic challenges, as we always have, in relation to French and English speaking Canadians. Those have always been serious and they are now. They are a great challenge.

The debate is larger now. The debate is also a debate, not simply about the role of Canadians of French or English speaking origin in this country, but also the role of Canadians of other origins. To an increasing degree it is a debate, at least from my part of the country, about how different regions can find their expression and find their future and find a sense of continuing identification in their country, Canada.

It is a matter of irony to some, and of more acute concern to others, that in this government which has been able to act on the agenda of western Canada, getting rid of the national energy program, getting rid of the foreign investment review agency, getting rid of a number of the instances which had been such a source of antagonism towards the centre in western Canada. Even though all of those individual programs are gone now, there is still unquestionably a sense of alienation in that region. There is still unquestionably a sense in western Canada that the goals of that region are not reflected in the nation as much as they should be. So the challenge now is to look beyond the question of dealing with specific policy changes, and to take a look at the institutions of the country to see how well they serve us and how they can be changed.

It would be presumptuous of us to assume that we are the only ones—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I must interrupt the hon. gentleman. He will have six minutes remaining, plus 10 minutes questions and comments the next time the debate is before the House.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved that Bill C–273, an act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this bill which received first reading on November 7, 1989, it is worthwhile to think back to the events that occurred one month later. At the University of Montreal in the faculty of engineering on December 6, Marc Lepine entered, bearing a semi–automatic hunting rifle. By the time he had finished his carnage, he had killed 14 women, wounded 13 other people, and taken his own life.

The purpose of this bill is not to address directly the issue of Marc Lepine, but it does address the issue of gun control. It asserts, by the very virtue of its having been presented here, my belief that gun control not only is in the interests of Canada, and the public in Canada, but it prevents incidents such as that that occurred at the University of Montreal from occurring as frequently or as regularly as might otherwise be the case.

I am not unaware that this kind of legislation tends to be controversial. It certainly attracts correspondence, as I can attest to myself, from those throughout Canada who think that in fact there should be freer access to firearms. With respect, I disagree with those people and I believe the somewhat modest changes in the firearms acquisition certificate system that I am proposing in the present bill, not only make sense, but would improve the bill and the law in Canada. This bill is an improvement in several ways over the legislation which the government brought forward in Bill C–80.

Just to give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, of the perspective that I have on this, think of some of these things that have happened.

Last year, during the first week of hunting season in the counties of Grey and Bruce, eight hunters were charged with firearm–related offences.

In Manitoba, August 1989, Winnipeg police conducted a three–month under–cover operation that showed that 12 gun store employees sold guns to under–cover police officers, even though they did not have the proper certification. In total, officers brought 12 guns, including two shotguns and various 22–calibre rifles from a dozen dealers.

Superintendent Wayne King of the Winnipeg police reported that in 1988, there were 96 cases of stolen certificates.

In St. Catharines, Ontario, a 14–year–old boy pleaded guilty to manslaughter when he shot his friend after taking a pistol from his father's gun case. Before the shooting, the youth wandered around his neighbourhood randomly firing the handgun, narrowly missing a mother and daughter sitting in their living room. The court was told that he shot a boy once in the chest and once in the back of the head as he lay on the ground. "He had a couple of beers and was acting goofy, so I shot him." On it goes.

In Canada, criminological research published in the Canadian Journal of Criminology shows that there has been a remarkable decline in armed robberies and homicides with handguns since gun controls were introduced in 1978. In addition, the findings indicate that there is no support for the hypothesis that restrictions on guns lead to an increase in homicides and assaults with non–shooting weapons such as knives. There is research that bears that out, particularly in the United States. I am referring to some research performed by Franklin Zimring and Gordon Hawkins who wrote The Citizen's Guide to Gun Control. This is what they found in the United States. In Detroit, which has experienced a substantial build-up of guns from 1965 to 1968, the number of gun permits issued increased tenfold. During the same period, robberies committed with guns increased at twice the rate of non-gun robberies.

When they examined the issue between regions, they reported that gun homicides and gun assaults parallel gun ownership. Crimes are higher in regions that have higher gun ownership. Between cities, the same analysis proved to be correct. They compared Houston, St. Louis, Atlanta, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Pittsburgh, Boston, and New York.

They also examined the question that, if guns were scarce and would-be killers had to find other weapons, that there would be as many deaths. In fact this proved not to be the case. They discovered that gun wounds were over five times more likely to cause death than stab wounds. Guns have greater range, are less easily warded off, and require less physical and psychological strength than other weapons.

Similar research findings exist in Australia. The New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research bears this out.

Needless to say, England is an example where it is very difficult to obtain firearms and in fact even police in the United Kingdom do not bear fire arms in the ordinary course. The crime statistics bear out the fact that this kind of control results in fewer crimes.

This is all in the context of what is easily discoverable by looking at our newspapers. I have pulled some clippings, all of which are from since first reading of this bill. "Woman shot in hand while deer hunting". "Car gets hit by stray bullet". "Deer decoy sets bait for illegal hunters". "Hunter killed in Dunedin". "Hunter fined in shooting death in Walkerton". A reward is offered in Cambridge, Ontario, by a farmer who is trying to track down those responsible for blasting two of his horses with a shotgun.

And it goes on: "Vancouver mayor and police target guns". "Boys with handgun try to hold up store". "Bus boy captures suspect after shoot-out"—this is in Ottawa. "Man charged in shooting in North York". "Rifle is stolen in break-in in Huron Township". "Richmond Hill man shot while hunting". "Gun fires accidentally in gas bar robbery in Scarborough". "Thief on probation", in Chatham, Ontario, where a 19-year old man robbed a firearm store at gunpoint less than three weeks after being placed on probation. And on it goes, Mr. Speaker, on and on. These examples of criminal activity occurring in Canada with firearms.

What I would like to bring forward to your attention, Mr. Speaker, are the simple elements that I have suggested in Bill C-273. I do not suggest for a moment that this is all that needs to be done to amend the gun control provisions of our country. There are many elements of Bill C-80, the government's bill, that I think are good. I do not think it goes far enough in other ways. We are not debating Bill C-80 here today. But I have suggested just a few changes to the firearms acquisition certificate system in Bill C-273 that I think will make an improvement to the system we have got.

First, I suggested that the age for obtaining a firearms acquisition certificate be increased to the age of majority in Canada, 18 years of age.

Do you know what happened, Mr. Speaker, in this city, in Ottawa? A mother was contacted by city police after her 16-year old had applied, without her knowledge, for a firearms acquisition certificate. The police contacted her as a matter of courtesy to let her know that her son had applied for this certificate. It was not necessary for the police to do so, and under the existing law it is possible for a 16-year-old, without parental knowledge or consent, for the payment of a $10 fee, to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate that would enable him or her to go into a Canadian Tire store or other gun seller and purchase a firearm in Canada. Essentially, it is the same way Mark Lepine did, although he at least was over the age of 18.

• (1710)

Second, I propose when an applicant wishes to obtain a firearms acquisition certificate, in addition to the other requirements of the law, that he be able to prove in a satisfactory way to the police that he is able to provide secure storage facilities for the firearm. The reality is that many, many firearms offences occur in Canada with stolen firearms. I realize there will be some enforcement problems with this provision, but I am asking that the government put forward regulations that would define as a minimum the secure storage requirements in a person's residence for a firearm for which a certificate has been issued. It should be secure, it should be locked, and they should be able to provide evidence that that is the case.

It would be a minimum, if a firearm were reported stolen from a principal residence, that evidence of break in of a secure storage device be proven, and for those who have concerns about children using firearms that are owned by their parents, it would enable them to have the comfort of knowing at least the parents were under some legal obligation to establish that they had a secure means of storing the firearm.

The next thing I propose with this bill is that the fee for a firearms acquisition certificate be increased from $10 to $100. We could argue about the amount. In Bill C–80, the government proposes $50. It just strikes me that the fee of $10 is so ridiculously low that it does not come close to generating revenue to pay for the system of firearm acquisition certificates. It is a simple matter to me that if we agree that such a system should exist in Canada, then those who wish to possess firearms should pay for the system and support it with their fees. So, $100 is what I suggest. The government suggests $50. It seems to me that an increase is clearly warranted.

The next suggestion I make is that the firearms acquisition certificate identify the type of firearm in relation to which it is issued and be valid in respect of one such firearm. The importance of this is that currently when an individual obtains a certificate, they are able to go out and acquire as many firearms as they wish with that certificate. Consequently, when the police are contacted with respect to a quarrel in a residence, they may from their computers be able to determine that a firearm acquisition certificate has been issued to a person residing at that address. When they arrive at that address, they do not know if there is one solitary weapon or firearm, or perhaps a whole arsenal, behind its doors and windows. It strikes me that in our society we require people to have one ownership certificate for each motor vehicle they possess. I fail to understand why we would not require a similar law for each firearm that they possess.

I have taken the trouble with the provisions of this bill to seek out the reaction of police forces across Canada. What I have discovered is that by and large police forces have been eager to support the provisions of Bill C–273. I will not endeavour to review all of the correspondence that I have received. I have received it from every part of Canada. I will give some examples:

[Translation]

For example, William D. Patterson, from Mascouche, Quebec, says: "We want to inform you of our support for the reforms proposed in Bill C–273 and we wish you good luck in your efforts."

[English]

Similarly, D. J. Crowell, chief of police in Kentville, Nova Scotia, regarding the proposed changes in Bill C–273: "Please be advised that I support these changes fully." Similarly, from David J. Sherwood, chief of police in Saint John, New Brunswick: "considering that guns play a large part in the occurence of crime in our country, I most certainly will lend support to your proposed changes in Bill C–273."

[Translation]

Normand Bergeron, a police officer in Quebec City, writes: "We fully support Bill C–273 on gun control."

Christian Harvey, from Chicoutimi, Quebec, says: "I can assure you of my support for the proposed reforms—"

[English]

There is correspondence from Trois–Rivières, Leamington, Barrie, Bradford, Ontario, New Westminster, B.C., Victoria, B.C. There are many others who support these reforms.

When one considers the fact that crime with firearms continues to increase at an alarming rate in Canada, one thinks of the unnecessary deaths of many people. I suggest that these somewhat modest reforms ought to be accepted in our society.

I would like to respond briefly to the argument that is undoubtedly going to be made by those who oppose stricter firearms control, that criminals do not apply for firearms acquisition certificates. Some people will say: "If you are going to commit a crime, one does not go out and apply for a certificate to get a gun." I think Marc Lepine is very good evidence that that is not necessarily the case.

Furthermore, this view ignores the reality which is made clear by criminological research. The majority of homicides in Canada occur among friends and in domestic situations. The Canadian Centre of Justice Statistics shows by its data that the weapon used most frequently to kill women and children in the home is a gun, usually one purchased for hunting purposes.

It is a simple proposition. Gun control works. There are some problems with the framework of law that is currently in Canada. Some modifications are called for and the government acknowledges that with Bill C-80. I propose a few which are similar and some which are different from what it is proposing. In the final analysis, these amendments make sense.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as justice critic of the New Democratic Party to speak briefly on this private members' bill.

I would like to comment generally on gun control and then I will comment, clause by clause, on the bill put forward by hon. member for Ottawa South.

I refer to a story by Peter O'Neill of the The Vancouver Sun, Ottawa bureau. It appeared in the Victoria Times Columnist recently. It states: "Gun control legislation faces death, Ottawa. The federal government's controversial gun control legislation may die along with the current parliamentary session, Justice Minister Kim Campbell said Monday". It goes on: "Campbell said she would discuss with her Conservative colleagues next week whether there is still time to hold public hearings to get the bill through the Commons." It has almost been a year now since the 14 women were killed at the École polytechnique in Montreal by the crazed man Marc Lepine. There was a great outcry to deal with an update of gun control. The government promised that.

• (1720)

I just want to say that the government has been very gutless here. It is a broad gutlessness if you like, Mr. Speaker, because not only has it failed to deal with a bill, but it has have failed to even deal with a bill from both sides, from not only the people who oppose it, but the people who are for gun control.

I believe that there is a way here in which we can have stronger gun control that will stop crazy people, criminals and people in a fit of passion from getting guns and will keep Canada different than the United States, where they have 45 million handguns, but will also protect our traditional ways of life in the north among hunters, fishermen and trappers and so on.

I want to address some of these concerns. I think the Minister of Justice is gutless in not dealing properly with gun control. I am putting her on notice, come the one year anniversary of the Montreal killings, I will be putting a question to her as to what has happened with her bill and what she has done.

I want to say this to the hon. member for Ottawa South. In the little experience I have had, as justice critic and looking into this gun control legislation, I visited the RCMP and saw all the different guns. I went into the firing range and fired an Uzi and I looked at all the pistols they had seized and everything. I went through the act and I tried to come to terms with all the technical matters of the act. There are some problems with this bill. Let me just outline them.

The first one is you need a firearms acquisition certificate to get a gun now, unless your gun is grandfathered before the law came in during the late seventies. You raise the age to 18. You have got a problem. What about in rural Canada? I say this to the member, and I hope he is listening. I have noticed and you must notice, there is a difference between the people who live in Ottawa South, or the centre of Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal and those who live in the rural areas. Whereas, like my friend right next to me here has, let us say, a 16 year old son who wants to go hunting with him. What we have to consider in that area is whether that is going to be an impossible prohibition to those younger people who may in the rural areas be like 18 year olds, in fact, have grown up in many ways and are responsible. I would want to look at that very carefully.

The second part of his bill I like very much, the fact that the applicant should provide secure storage facilities. I think any reasonable person, that is who we are trying to deal with in these firearm certificates, would do this. I think that is a good part of his bill. I think the government should consider that and indeed, I will consider it closely when we are debating the government's bill, if we ever get to debate it, Bill C-80.

The third part of his bill suggests the fee go from $10 to $100 to get one of these certificates. The government's bill would have it go to $50. You have to look at what the intention is here. What is the intention? Is the intention really to generate revenue? On the intention of the firearms acquisition certificate and whatever fee should be attached to it, I think what we are looking at is to make sure responsible people get a certificate and therefore, get the guns and not people who are emotional, temporarily crazy, have a bad history or have a criminal background.

I think we would be best not clouding the matter with fees that sometimes that could be too high. For example, my friend here tells me that he has got a couple of guns: one gun to hunt moose and another gun to hunt partridge. If he took his son along with him, he would need a firearms acquisition certificate. That would be $400. It might get too expensive, so I make a plea.

I make a plea. Those people who are anti-gun control are flooding the Deputy Prime Minister's office with "stop this bill", Bill C-80, the government's bill. They do not want to see gun control. I say to those people, please accept that I think the majority of the people in this country want to see gun control and a good strong gun control.

Those people who are for gun control, like the hon. member who has just spoken, while being strong in the position—and I put myself in this position as well—let us be realistic. Let us get a system that recognizes urban rural differences. Let us be flexible enough that we can accommodate hunters, trappers, collectors and so on, so that we can bring them on board with gun control. That would be the real genius.

If the Minister of Justice and the government were listening, they would take the best from this hon. member's bill, the best from some of the bills that were presented the other day. They would bring their bill down quickly. They would hold hearings right away to bring in all the gun clubs and the other people, because this is really important. They would bring in as many different points as possible and they would fashion a real workable gun control legislation in this country. I think that is what the hon. member for Ottawa South wants to see and that is what we in the New Democratic Party want to see as well.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in this debate tonight and respond to the hon. member for Ottawa South in relation to his bill, Bill C-273.

The question does come down to what is effective gun control? There is not a member in this House who does not recognize the need for effective gun control, whether it be NDP, Liberal or members from my party. We do not argue that.

In a free society, obviously it brings another dimension into the argument as to how free a society can we have. Do we want a system as they have in the United States of America where I believe you can own just about any kind of a gun with virtually no restrictions at all. If you look at the statistics in that country, I think that most of us would agree that it is probably too free a system, that you do pay a price in society for having guns available to the extent that they do have in the United States.

I do not think we want to take that route for one minute, Mr. Speaker, because the system south of the border is broken down to the lowest common denominator. It is too easy.

If you examine our gun control law in this country, you will find that it is very effective. It has achieved the type of things that we wanted to achieve. It has allowed the law-abiding Canadian to have and use guns for recreational purposes and for purposes that we see day-in and day-out in ridings such as mine, a rural riding.

In my riding, for example, there would be very few households where they would not have a gun. The problems attached to the ownership of those guns are virtually non-existent, although problems do occur from time to time.

The question is, how do we keep those problems from occurring? What what type of restrictions do we put on the average Canadian? What type of a society do we create to stifle or eliminate those types of problems from occurring?

If you examine the present law that we have in Canada, Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that it is pretty effective. Let us take a look at what we do have.

We do have a firearms acquisition certificate, known as the FAC. That certificate ensures that new gun owners are screened. It ensures that those who acquire guns on a regular basis are rescreened every five years. What does that mean? We have some safeguards built into the system so that not just anyone can walk in and purchase a gun. I am the first to admit that the screening process can be improved upon, and it will be improved upon by Bill C–80.

• (1730)

Also, the law restricts access to persons under the age of 16, except in cases where the child is under the supervision of an adult or in a few cases where the gun is a necessary part of the hunting or trapping life of that family. We do have restrictions and we do have a system in this country that is probably the best in the western world.

Firearms that are more likely to be used in crime are subject to even more restrictions. Handguns have to be registered with the RCMP and require special possession permits. Machine guns, sawed–off rifles, and shotguns are strictly prohibited, period.

Special offences and sentencing powers are in place to provide additional punishment for those who violate gun control laws or use firearms to commit other crimes.

Those are just some of the provisions within our existing legislation which make our legislation different from that of the country to the south that the hon. member mentioned in his remarks. There is a big difference. I do not think we can sensationalize this issue and I do not think we should, but there is a marked difference between the system we have and the system it has.

We must remind ourselves that from time to time our system has to be reviewed. I do not argue that. That is exactly what we are doing in Bill C–80.

Some of the amendments the member for Ottawa South is putting forward are worth examination. Let us take a look at those. One of his amendments would require applicants for a firearms acquisition certificate to establish that they have a safe place to store a gun. No one would argue with that.

To drive home the importance of a safe storage area for a gun, the other evening on the radio a young father was interviewed, 25 years old or so, whose little 3–year old boy was accidentally shot by the father through the mishandling of a gun in their own home. The first thing he mentioned was the safe storage of guns. No one would argue with that. It is reasonable.

The member also mentioned the increase in the licensing fee, the FAC, to $100 per certificate. I think that $100 is an unreasonable amount if we look at a cross–section of the country and areas in rural parts of New Brunswick and of Ontario that are using guns for hunting and in trapping situations. There are still a few trappers left in this country.

Under the new system the member would propose, it would mean to a gun collector a $100 fee for each transaction. It is putting restrictions on bona fide gun collectors. I think that is most unreasonable. His system would also require a new FAC on every purchase made. Under Bill C–80—and if the amendments the member brought forward became part of this bill—we would have a 28–day waiting period for each and every acquisition along with the $100 fee; most unreasonable.

Our present system is not to deter gun owners, but to screen out and deter only those who should not have access to guns for reasons of their own safety or the safety of others. That is what we have to attempt to do, and that is what we will do within Bill C–80.

The value of this debate and the value of some of the amendments that the hon. member for Ottawa South makes will come out in the legislative hearings on Bill C–80. It would be right if the member would bring those forward so that we could openly discuss, debate and modify some of his suggestions. None of us will argue with a safer gun law in this country.

Some of the hon. member's proposals can fit into our existing system but some clearly cannot. For that reason I cannot support his bill, and I urge my colleagues in the House to reject his amendments as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott–Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise this afternoon to support the motion put forward by my colleague from Ottawa South requesting that Bill C–273 be adopted.

There are serious questions we have to ask ourselves in this country. Why is it easier to buy a gun than a case of beer in Canada? For instance, a 17–year old Canadian can apply for a firearm acquisition certificate without even asking his parent or another authority for their consent, as my hon. colleague from Ottawa South indicated a moment ago. But, coming back to my example, you do not need one to get a case of beer.

In our society, it is not forbidden to hunt while drunk.

[English]

That is important. It is not an offence in Canada to hunt while drunk. There is no such offence in this country. It is only illegal to point your gun at something once you are drunk. You could walk around in the bush with a loaded gun on your back and be drunk, provided you can stand up, and that is not an offence. There has to be something wrong with our laws when that kind of nonsense is allowed to happen. You can probably buy a case of dynamite easier than you can buy a case of beer. What is wrong with us?

We have a proposal today by a colleague to tighten up slightly—and it is only slightly; let us not kid ourselves—our gun legislation in this country. We are proposing under this bill to have one firearms acquisition certificate per purchase of gun. Does that not sound reasonable? Every time you buy a new gun, you go to ask the police and the authorities whether you are fit to own one.

[Translation]

The existing legislation states that the certificate shall remain in force for five years. How are we to know, Mr. Speaker, if you or I will still be fit to own a gun four years and 364 days from now?

I sometimes wonder if I will still have all my wits from one week to the next! I surely am in no position to tell what will be the case four years and a half or five years minus one day from now.

[English]

Yet, five years from now or five years less a day I could use a firearms acquisition certificate that I bought today and buy my 499th gun with it. That is not against the law. Why do we need firearms legislation?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, one third of the homicides reported in Canada in 1989 were committed with a firearm. Of the 218 homicides by gun, 44 per cent were committed with a rifle, 25 per cent with a handgun, 17 per cent with a shotgun and 2 per cent with a sawed-off rifle or shotgun. These are very sad statistics.

[English]

A few years ago I read in a United States magazine about fire arms incidents there. Of course they are far worse there than they are here, but I think the message was obvious. It said, and I paraphrase because I do not remember the numbers exactly, that last year in Britain there were 250 homicides by guns; in France there were 300; in another European country there were so many; and in the United States there were 10,552 or something to that effect. It ended by saying: "God bless America."

The same article made an important point. Of all the United States presidents who were murdered, assassinated, or on which there was an attempt against their life, every single one of them was with a firearm. No U.S. president was stabbed. No U.S. president was ever attacked with any other kind of a weapon than a firearm.

In this country we have only lost one national political figure, and his statue is right at the back of this building. It was Thomas D'Arcy McGee, and Thomas D'Arcy McGee regrettably was shot.

Is it not time we started to learn from what we know so well?

[Translation]

I have here a letter signed by Mr. Michel Denis, the Chief of Police of Hawksbury, in my riding. This letter was adressed to my colleague from Ottawa South, who sponsored this bill.

It reads:

[English]

Dear Sir:

I read with considerable interest your proposed Bill C-273 regarding gun control.

We the Hawkesbury Police Force fully support your position. This position enables us to ensure a better protection to our communities.

We commend you for bringing this position so strongly to the attention of our parliamentary system.

It is signed, as I said previously, by the Chief of Police, Michel Denis.

This government might well talk this bill out today or it might defeat it, as I suppose is its right and as is our right as parliamentarians to approve or reject legislation in this House.

Let us think what is at stake. Let us remember that this is not stopping the ownership of guns. This is tightening up on rules which are way too loose in Canada. In the process, we could all contribute a bit toward saving the lives of people who are being killed by the discharge of firearms in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the motion under consideration today gives us a welcome opportunity to debate an issue of utmost importance to Canadians—rising crime or violence in our society.

For openers, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that I totally disagree with the propositions advocated by the hon. member for Ottawa South in his motion today. And I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is important that I explain why I am so strongly opposed to some of the points raised in the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa South.

I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that it all depends on the way we look at our country as a society. I suggest he will be the first to admit that a city like Ottawa may not be the most violent or a place where crime is rampant.

We hear about the odd fight now and then in this city. There are cities where criminality is a lot more apparent. I should like to invite the hon. member for Ottawa South to visit my riding of Abitibi—Témiscamingue, for I am sure he will agree that my region has often been described as a hunter's paradise. If the hon. member were to come with me to Abitibi—Témiscamingue in places like Rouyn—Noranda, Val-d'Or or Senneterre and tell the people there that it will be more difficult to obtain firearms, their reaction would be to want to walk down the street with the head of the hon. member instead of the horns of a deer. Back home it is unthinkable that we would tell 150,000 people that we want to make it harder for them to buy firearms. I can tell the hon. member for Ottawa South that people in my neck of the woods are born in houses full of firearms and that my region is indeed one of the most pacifist in Canada simply because people are used to firearms.

They know that a firearm can be the source of great enjoyment, yet that it can also be an extremely dangerous tool which has to be put in a secure place in the home. That is the point I want to get across to the member for Ottawa South. We have to be careful if we are thinking of imposing coercive measures on all Canadians, because all Canadians are not prone to indulge in crime or violence. I understand the intention of the hon. member when he makes this proposition, but I want to tell him that these would be quite restrictive measures in the case of a good many Canadians who are not violent by nature.

With respect to crime, the member for Ottawa South will agree with me that despicable murders are committed on a regular basis. Practically every day we hear about this sort of thing through newspapers and TV reports. But perhaps we should denounce more openly some of the papers that have a large circulation precisely because they specialize in crimes of this nature. I am not saying that we should hide those, but I say that some media give a lot of coverage to those cases. Every day, they show people covered with blood, people killed, and I tell myself that what we should be eliminating from this country are the causes that breed that kind of violence. We touched on those causes earlier. Poverty breeds violence. The member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was referring to drugs and alcohol. Many things drive people to violence and, Mr. Speaker, it is not because they will not find a firearm that they will not be violent. Violence can be done with a knife, a hammer or a rope, and people bent on violence will commit it, whatever tool or means are available to them.

So, Mr. Speaker, the object of my intervention is to say to the member from Ottawa South that we have to be very careful, because there are people in this country who can— He mentioned police forces which agreed with his petition, I can understand that. But surely, thousands and thousands of other police forces did not state their opinion on the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa South. I am quite sure that in an area like mine, a motion like this would not be readily accepted. I say to the hon. member for Ottawa South that this is rather like a social debate. Statistics may show that crime is on the rise, but I think we should work more on the causes than on the weapons themselves, because when one is determined to commit violence, one will find the means.

I have got here very interesting statistics. I would like to give you, Mr. Speaker, statistics which I had on the number of applications received by the RCMP in 1989. I think they received about 200,000 applications, I can't find the exact figure but it was something like 200,000 applications. If the RCMP had to examine carefully every one of these applications, Mr. Speaker, if they had to go and check where these firearms were going to be stored, they would be faced with an incredible task and while they would be doing this, they would not be working on preventing other crimes. Drugs would be rampant, dealers would push drugs freely as members of the force would be tied-up with other tasks.

• (1750)

The hon. member has alluded to the way firearms are categorized in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, you know that most firearms in Canada belong to the unrestricted category and can be acquired without restrictions. There are also more dangerous firearms that are mentioned in Bill C-80. I think that the hon. member for Ottawa South knows that Bill C-80 is nevertheless providing for important measures to limit the access to dangerous firearms; those firearms are all the same used for legitimate purposes and are part of restricted firearms and there are firearms that do not serve any legitimate purposes such as machine guns and truncated shot guns that are among prohibited firearms.

One of the reasons of such a classification of firearms is to allow people who control firearms and enforce the law to concentrate their limited resources to controlling those firearms that are most dangerous to society.

The law provides that the majority of resources assigned to selection and enforcement be concentrated on high-risk firearms and owners. We select all new owners of firearms and require that people who want to acquire a firearm go through an additional selection test and register their firearms.

Another reason in support of the current classification is to minimize the impact of legal restrictions on the activities of most firearms users who use hunting rifles and unrestricted guns for recreational or hunting purposes.

The proposed amendments which the Minister of Justice will introduce respect this classification.

Bill C-80 includes compulsory provisions concerning the secure storage of weapons, but they refer to collectors of restricted weapons, not to those who apply for firearms acquisition certificates.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, before I yield to another member eager to deal with this issue, I should like to tell the hon. member for Ottawa South that Canadians who own firearms are law abiding citizens and make sure that Canada is a safe place for all. Mr. Speaker, they will certainly support all reasonable and efficient methods to help make a selection among all applicants for firearms acquisition certificates, but they should not be expected to support unreasonable or unworkable measures.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the provisions of this bill are not justified, at least to my mind—I think I indicated earlier the reasons why I am against it, as the elected representative of an area which would be greatly affected if firearm acquisition was made more difficult. The situation would be unacceptable and, for this reason, I feel that the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Ottawa South is unreasonable because it helps very little in the development of efficient safety standards which would apply throughout the land and that the provisions would be difficult to enforce because it would increase the workload of the various police forces with very few real benefits.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I find the motion of the Hon. Member for Ottawa South absolutely unacceptable and I consider it in a sense as a slap on the face of a great many Canadians who are responsible people and who do not deserve such coercive legislation as this.

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to join in this debate on firearms. It is a subject which I have spoken quite a bit about lately, not just in connection with this private member's bill, but Bill C-80 which is currently before the House.

As one of the members indicated earlier, one of the truisms on the subject of guns in Canada is that their ownership is a privilege. I think most people are aware that in the United States the ownership of firearms is a right, it is constitutionally enshrined. Not so in Canada. We have had a different history, a different development in this area. It is a privilege and as such, it is a privilege that governments for many, many years have taken an interest in and one that quite legitimately is the subject of debate in this House. I was somewhat surprised to hear the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell say that it was easier to buy a gun in Canada than it is to buy a case of beer. That is absolute nonsense.

I see the member for Timiskaming beside me nodding his head. It is quite obvious that the representative of the Liberal Party is not a gun owner because one of the things I discovered from talking with various groups during the lead-up to Bill C-80 is that there are all kinds of procedural and administrative wrangles and difficulties that an individual must go through.

One of the things that struck me that Bill C-80 could do would be to clear up up some of the administrative difficulties faced by legitimate hunters and sportsmen in Canada by having a discussion of this matter in Parliament.

I was shocked as well to hear the comments made by the members of the New Democratic Party. They said it has taken too long, the minister is gutless, how come it took a year to come up with this bill? Well you cannot have it both ways. If a bill is introduced into Parliament and there have been no consultations, the NDP jumps up and down, screams and yells, and says: "You should have consulted with people. How come you did not get together with the various interest groups and individuals across Canada before you presented this bill?"

So that is exactly what we did with Bill C-80. I know, because I was a part of the discussions. The former Minister of Justice, the present transport minister, during the course of the previous summer invited major national groups who have a particular interest in this subject to sit down to discuss their concerns. I was very pleased and privileged to sit in on those discussions so I can tell you what they had to say. Unlike the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who thinks it is a simple job, a simple business, to own a gun, they had many legitimate complaints of an administrative type that I was pleased to see incorporated into Bill C-80.

When the present Minister of Justice assumed her responsibility she continued the process. She did not start over again because she and the members on this side wanted to present a bill to Parliament, but she continued the process. She heard from groups that had not been heard from by with the previous Minister of Justice.

Now there is a problem with that with the NDP. You heard them, Mr. Speaker. They said that it is a terrible thing to do, a terrible thing to be consulting with people before you bring legislation into this House. I could not disagree more with the members of the NDP on that.

I was pleased as well that we tabled this bill right before the House ended, because in my opinion it provided an opportunity for sportsmen, hunters, pistol clubs, and other interested individuals over the course of the summer when they would be getting together to have a look at this bill. I see the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that he is as vocal on this subject as he is on acid rain and on every issue in our caucus. He has spoken to me about this. And I see the member for Macleod who was good enough to invite me out to his riding several weeks ago to talk on this subject. What I said to them is that this bill is not written in stone.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have sat on every legislative committee in the justice area since 1984. There has not been one bill that has gone through that has not been changed at the committee stage, or at the report stage, and Bill C-80 is not going to be the first one.

So I say to the members of the NDP and the members of the Liberal Party that if they want to see action on Bill C-80, if they want to see action on all the bills that are before this House, go down and talk to their good friends in the Senate. That is where the log jam is. The members of the New Democratic Party know that very well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to be able to raise again the question about the spill of radioactive waste at Wollaston Lake which occurred last November 7, 1989, almost a year ago.

• (1800 )

One of the reasons I have to keep raising this question is that the story first broke on November 9, which was a very significant day in world history. It was the day the Berlin Wall came down, and of course the media cared about little else. Therefore this story never became as prominent as it otherwise would have.

What in fact happened was that two million litres of contaminated radioactive mine waste was spilled into Wollaston Lake. The spill that went unreported for 15 hours. It would likely never have become known to the public if the chief of the Hatchet Lake Band on Wollaston Lake had not flown over the area. Being a former miner himself, he recognized what was happening and phoned us. Certainly the environmental authorities had been notified by that time, but the community had not been notified. This whole series of events left the people of Wollaston Lake very much wondering what was happening to their environment.

I had an opportunity to visit the site shortly thereafter with the MLA for the area, Keith Goulet, and with officials from the town and from the band. What we saw there was really appalling. One would not run a farm dugout system or a farm sewer system—and that is what I know better as a farmer—in the same way as this very sensitive disposal system was being run. What really caught my attention was an automated warning system which was to back up visual inspection every hour, and 11 inspections were missed. That system had been disconnected since 1985, for about four years. The Atomic Energy Control Board had been inspecting this system that whole time and had never discovered the disconnection.

The chief issued a call for a public inquiry. He wanted to know what was the role of the regulators in the area. In other words, who regulates the regulators? Is the Atomic Energy Control Board doing a proper job of looking after things? Shortly after we saw headlines such as "Staff levels too low to prevent spills, AECB" on November 24. That is the kind of question that arose.

The chief also wanted to know what the role was of aboriginal people in resource development. These things are happening all around them on their traditional lands, affecting their environment in a permanent way. They have very little economic opportunity and no jobs. Right now there is no one from Wollaston working in Rabbit Lake 18 miles across the lake.

What is the role of the local community in the protection of its environment? After all, they have lived there for so long and will live there long after. They know an awful lot more about the natural environment than some well meaning researcher who comes there from time to time to take a sample.

There was a lot of support for this inquiry, all the way from the United Steelworkers of Canada to church groups, Greenpeace, health professional organizations and many others. Petitions are still coming in.

I asked my initial question on February 19 about how the inquiry was coming and received no real reply. Finally on September 6, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied to Chief Ed Benoanie of the Hatchet Lake Band. He essentially said not to worry, that there were a few fiddles and diddles that they would make to improve things, and then a good system would be perfect.

Perhaps I could just quote from the minister's letter. He said:

> Cameco acknowledged responsibility for the spill, pleading guilty to charges laid under the Atomic Energy Control Act and paying the maximum fine of $10,000.

A maximum fine of $10,000 is a pitiful joke. Everybody knows what a $10,000 fine for virtually unlimited degradation of the environment means to a huge industry like this one in this day and age. In fact it was for two charges at $5,000 each, twice that for smoking on Parliament Hill.

We are operating here under an act that was written in 1946. That act has not been looked at, and no one here is talking about revising that antiquated act.

The minister states further that a full investigation has been carried out, that all reports regarding the spill indicate no problem, and that extensive water samples have shown that the level of contaminants in the lake and the stream leading to the lake did not exceed limits specified in drinking water standards. The local community has some real questions about how those tests were done. They live there. They know what the ice and flow patterns are. This was done in tricky ice conditions. The people do not think it was done properly and would like to see it done again, and what would be involved in that kind of sampling.

• (1805)

Then it said:

> I know that Board members met with you in Ottawa to discuss the situation. The Board recognizes that there were weaknesses—

They are going to correct them. And then they said that:

> —the Board will be holding a meeting in your community to follow up on developments and to deal with other concerns.

Essentially all the board did was listen politely and announce that the mine was going to reopen with no discussion with the community at all. The community had no input into that decision that it felt had any kind of meaning whatsoever.

Then he said:

> In 1978 the Bayda Commission released the results of an in-depth report of the environmental, health, safety, social and economic effects of the Cluff Lake mine and cleared the way for expansion of the uranium industry in Saskatchewan.

If I could quote from Chief Benoanie's reply to the minister, he said:

> The Bayda Commission and the Key Lake Board of Inquiry did not even look at aboriginal rights, and they did not involve my people, nor deal with the already operating Rabbit Lake mine. The 300-plus page Bayda Commission report has only half a page dealing with aboriginal and treaty rights: in fact, it recommends that another inquiry deal with these issues.

Then the minister goes on to talk about an AECB inquiry. That, in fact, did not do an original research, but just pulled together a few existing facts and figures.

The minister then tries to make people feel better, and he says that if there is any future developments, and there are some being talked about, then we can have some EARP hearings.

I think the credibility of EARP hearings is well known to the people. I ask the parliamentary secretary to please reply to how these questions are going to be dealt with.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, since this issue was first raised in the House last February, a number of developments have occurred. I would like to review just a few of them, but I would like to table an update from more or less the first part of November 1989 through today's recent communique.

For the record, I would like to make a few points. In his letter of September 6, 1990, the minister outlined the facts surrounding the spill. He also stated that he saw no need for a public inquiry into uranium mining in northern Canada since there had already been several public inquiries on this matter, and there would be future opportunities for assessment of the new mining projects. For example, in 1978, the Bayda commission released the results of an in-depth report of the environmental, health, safety, social and economic effects of the Cluff Lake Mine.

The minister stated that the conclusions from past in-depth inquiries into uranium mining, combined with the upcoming opportunities for public input during the EARP process related to potential new uranium mining ventures, and the commitment of the AECB to open lines of communication suggest that, at this time, a further inquiry into uranium mining in northern Canada is not necessary.

On October 4, 1990, the Atomic Energy Control Board held its meeting in Wollaston Post. Three major concerns of the native population were raised: more hiring of natives by the company, implementation of a financial scheme for profit sharing with the native population, and an inquiry into uranium mining. The AECB replied that these topics were out of the scope of their mandate.

After hearing all interested parties, the board decided to renew the company's licence.

At this point, it would be imprudent to comment further on this issue since it is scheduled to be dealt with in the court in Saskatchewan on January 17, 1991.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to table these documents for the hon. member so that they are on the record.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to repeat the question I put to the minister of Environment and which was answered by another minister, the Secretary of State. I am not satisfied with the answer I received. That question had been asked during the fire in Saint-Amable. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that many thousands of used tires burned at a depot located in Saint-Amable, which is about 15 kilometers away from my constituency of Chambly.

• (1810)

I do not like the answer the minister gave me. In fact, he said it was a provincial matter and that the problem was under consideration. He tried to reassure me by saying that during the fire everything was being done to co-operate with the provincial authorities.

I am glad the government was finally able to put out that fire. It seems to me, based on this incident that the government takes action after the fact. But often these situations are the result of a lack of leadership on the part of the federal government and also of jurisdictional disputes between the federal and provincial governments. So, while Canada expects some leadership from this Conservative government, all we see, day after day, is a government which can only act it seems after the fact. PIC/mv

This is not what a government should be. A government should have the will to prevent this kind of problem. Saint-Amable, is only a symptome of the government who likes to play fireman instead of tackling the problem at the base. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I felt like hell listening to the answer from the Minister. I was upset because I was expecting better than that. I can tell you how upset people in my riding were by mentioning some polls, whether people talk about governments not only the Federal government but also the Provincial government because each one arise to blame the other. The problem Mr. Speaker is easy to understand. People are upset by the lack of action, the same old excuses that we have been hearing for so long: this is not our jurisdiction, we are waiting for the conclusion of studies. We have had plenty of studies, consultations and talks on the environment. But this government has not taken any action to regain public confidence.

I can give an example to show you how serious this is. The Désourdy Company in my riding is a responsible, respectable company that wants to dig what it calls a garbage enhancement site but which I call a landfill site. This does not require any environmental impact study. It is neither a provincial nor a municipal responsibility and it seems, according to a ruling I disagree with, it is not a federal one either. But, once the ground water is contaminated, the federal, provincial and municipal governments will have no choice but to try to contain the damages because they were unable to prevent the problem.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, I could talk to you about pesticides. Maybe you have pesticides on your lawn because you want to have a beautiful lawn, but pesticides that get into and contaminate our water are a serious problem. The federal government has had this issue under study. We don't have much control over the enforcement of federal regulations on the use of pesticides by consumers.

So, in summary, I would like to say that I refuse to accept the rationalization by this government that the Saint-Amable fire was because of a jurisdiction problem or because they did not make enough studies. The time for studies is over. The time has now come for action.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the tire fires earlier this year in Hagersville, Ontario, and Saint-Amable, Quebec, showed that federal-provincial co-operation is necessary to clean up the problem of scrap tires in Canada. Those fires heightened public awareness about the need for co-operative action to ensure the safe outdoor storage of used tires and to address the overall issue of used tire management.

Program and policy development has been ongoing. Twenty-six million used tires are discarded each year in Canada. About 20 per cent of those 26 million tires are recuperated through second hand sales and recycling the rubber into floor mats. That leaves 20 million to 21 million used tires to be disposed of in other ways. Even before the Hagersville fire in February, Environment Canada was funding research projects into alternative uses for scrap tires.

Following the Hagersville fire, all environment ministers agreed at a meeting in Vancouver to set up a federal-provincial working group to review scrap tire storage management, disposal and processing. That working group, chaired by the Ontario minister, met over the summer and its final report will be considered by ministers at the November 28 and 29 meeting of the Canadian Council of Environment Ministers. The working group was also to look at interim guidelines for outdoor storage of tires. It should be noted that Quebec and Ontario have already taken action following the tire fires in their jurisdiction.

Reuse and recycling of these scrap tires is the long-term answer being sought by the federal and provincial governments. In the short term, Environment Canada is looking closely at cement kilns as a method for disposing of used tires.

The use of cement kilns was the subject of a special half day workshop at the recent Canadian Waste Management Conference in St. John's, Newfoundland. If all cement kilns were to utilize used tires for 20 per cent of their energy needs, their capacity would be sufficient to use all the incoming flow of tires. Information provided by the industry suggests that no increase in emissions is expected from the utilisation of used tires as an alternative fuel. This claim will be verified by conducting certified combustion testing.

As well, the associate committee on the National Fire Code, sponsored by the National Research Council, is developing guidelines for outdoor storage of used tires. The committee is reviewing existing international regulations applicable to outside storage of scrap tires to see what can be applied to Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is particularly relevant that the questions being raised tonight all deal with the issue of the environment.

I remember in 1988, just prior to the last election, the Prime Minister came into the Hamilton area and visited the Canada Centre for Inland Waters. He stated that his number one priority over the next number of years was going to be the environment. Since then we have had the debacle of the tire fires.

When the member says that 20 per cent of the tires are being recycled, in fact, there is technology available that could use all of those tires. They are currently being shipped to the United States, ground up to be used in combination with building materials for roads, and shipped back to Canada. Why, as Canadians, are we not taking advantage of the recycling of our tires and of new technology in building our road surfaces? Why are we leaving that to the Americans?

I asked to have leave under this particular section of the act because I was extremely dissatisfied with another environmental question that the government dealt with last spring. That question dealt with the issue of acid rain.

For a number of years the Prime Minister has been promising trans-border action on acid rain. We know that the U.S. Clean Air Act has passed and we are still waiting for action from this Prime Minister and this government on the issue of trans-border acid rain. Acid rain does not carry a passport. Even though we welcome the initiatives of the U.S. Clean Air Act, we are extremely concerned that unless there is a bilateral agreement negotiated between Canada and the United States to supplement that of the U.S. Clean Air Act and Canadian initiatives, we will continue to see Canada rained down upon by American acid rain.

If we examine the government's environmental record, even as we speak today, Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians from coast to coast were shocked to hear that the Minister of the Environment and the government have actually applied for a stay to their own injunction on the construction of the Rafferty—Alameda. The Minister of the Environment staked his reputation on the fact that he was going to talk tough to the Saskatchewan government on this particular issue and, as in so many other tests, he has caved in.

[Translation]

I think the decision by the department of the Environnemnt not to proceed with the injunction against the Rafferty–Alameda project is proof enough that the government has no environnmental policy. It all started with the former minister of the Environment, Lucien Bouchard, who was not prepared to take decisions about major environmental issues. Now that he has joined another political party, he does a complete about–turn. But it all started with a bad minister of the Environment, M. Bouchard, and it continues with another bad minister of the Environment, M. de Cotret.

It is incredible, after everything he said in this House last week, that is the real test of his leadership would be the Rafferty–Alameda project, that he should eventually decide to do nothing. And provided that he procrastinates long enough, he knows that the project will be completed.

Mr. Speaker, we know that, on environmental matters, Canadians are much ahead of the government. In the case of acid rain, for example, why did we not get the opportunity to sign a bilateral agreement with the Americans?

We know that in the Eastern townships, some sugarbushes are losing their trees to acid rain not from Canada, but from the United States. We also know that acid rain has no passport and that the only way to deal with this problem is to set here in Canada federal standards similar to the ones provided in the U.S. Clean Air Act. At the same time, we must absolutely get a bilateral agreement to set international standards on this important environmental issue. Otherwise, it would only be false rhetoric by Mr. Bouchard and his successor, the new minister, Mr. de Cotret.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton East concerning acid rain control legislation in the United States.

The Government of Canada was very happy to see both the United States Senate and the House of Representatives pass a comprehensive package of amendments to the U.S. Clean Air Act this past weekend.

The legislation that has been passed by the Congress and the House of Representatives required a 10 million ton reduction of emissions and caps emissions at the reduced level. The legislation also contains comprehensive provisions and monitoring compliance with these requirements.

I would like to remind the members that Canada's legislative interests in the U.S. acid rain controls has always focused on the need to reduce the amount of acid rain pollution from U.S. sources that crosses our border each year. In this regard, Environment Canada has used its computer models to show that an American control program similar to the one adopted by the American Congress and the House of Representatives, which would meet Canada's environmental need to the trans–boundary flows reduced to no more than 2 million tonnes annually.

The trading provisions contained in the legislation should actually benefit Canada, since the lowest cost emission reductions can be obtained in the Ohio River Valley, which is the region that most heavily impacts on Canada. In addition, many of the power plants in the valley export their electricity to other regions. This means that the emission trading provisions could result in increased emission reductions in the valley because of the straight economics of trading into the valley and by virtue of governors attempting to pass pollution control costs to out of state customers.

Mr. Speaker, there is a lot more that I could say. The passage of this legislation should allow Canada and the U.S. to negotiate to conclude the bilateral agreement on trans–boundary air pollution by the end of this year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.24 p.m.

CANADA–U.S. AIR TRANSPORT SERVICES

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, a few days ago the House passed a motion regarding the creation of a transport–related committee. There were some errors in that motion. It is necessary for me once again to ask the consent of the House for the motion to replace it. I believe that you will find consent for this motion. I move:

That, further to the Order adopted on Monday, October 29, 1990,

A Special Committee of the House of Commons on Canada–United States air transport services be appointed;

That the Committee have all the powers of a Standing Committee;

That the Committee have the power to travel and adjourn from place to place within Canada and to travel to Washington and that the necessary staff do accompany the Committee; and

That the Committee submit its report no later than January 15, 1991, provided that, if the House is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there consent?

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, we will give consent.

Mr. Edmonston: Madam Speaker, there is consent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk) moved:

That this House urge that in the upcoming GATT negotiations and in over–all economic policies, the government recognize the essential role played by farmers in maintaining the Canadian way of life and urge the government to uphold the principles of supply management, to maintain the "safety nets" to provide a stable and fair return for all sectors involved in food production, to adopt policies encouraging sustainable development in farming practices, and to recognize the vital role played by agricultural communities to the over–all economy and the well–being of all Canadians.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some discussions in this party about the length of speeches today. As you know, our speeches are normally 20 minutes, with a 10 minute question and comment period. I would ask that, insofar as the Official Opposition is concerned, we would have 10 minute speeches with a 5 minute question and comment period throughout the day, whenever one of our speakers is recognized.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, it is our tradition on this side of the House to allow the opposition parties to do that if they so wish. We would once again offer our consent for that today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If any other members wish to avail themselves of the same situation regarding the sharing of time, I would be grateful if they would mention it to the Speaker.

• (1010 )

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, there is a serious crisis in our agricultural industry and rural Canada is suffering. At no time in recent history since the Depression have farmers been in such dire straits and Canadians want to know what the government is doing about it.

The production of food has always been a challenge, a challenge which farmers have continually met with adaptability and, I must say, much courage. Farm families have always had to deal with uncertainty, uncertainty caused by weather and by depressed markets.

Wheat farmers have just finished a harvest of bumper crops but with increasingly low prices we continually have reports of producers who will be forced off the land before this fall.

The government continues to talk about a new vision in agriculture in Canada. It is this new vision that has farmers concerned. What does the government mean by this new vision? One of the main corner-stones of this vision, as outlined in the government's Growing Together proposal, is centred around greater self-reliance in the agri-food industry.

Low prices are a result of a number of factors: continued U.S. and European export subsidies, the embargo against Iraq, the likelihood of a record world crop this year, and a stronger Canadian dollar. The farmer has no control over any of these.

In order to prevent financial disaster in rural Ontario and Canada, the federal government must step in now. An announcement of a special grains program to compensate for the effects of the embargo and/or an interim payment of at least $15 to $20 per tonne under the Agricultural Stabilization Act is essential. This government cannot continue to play this wait-and-see game. For too long now, farmers have been put off to face their bankers alone and to try to provide for their families with incomes far below the cost required to put food on the tables of our nation.

The government continually tries to assure farmers that greater self-reliance does not mean eliminating government support. Yet, what are farmers to expect when, in the last budget, the federal government cut down its share of the crop insurance cost-sharing program, terminated the at and east, terminated the branch line rehabilitation program, removed the interest-free provision on the prairie grains advanced payments, and eliminated the special dairy export? The budget for the Canadian Dairy Commission's skim milk powder marketing costs and CDC operating costs were abolished. The commodity-based program which provided subsidized loans to low-equity Farm Credit Corporation clients in financial difficulty was abolished. The rebate of the excise tax for on-farm fuel was abolished. This is the type of support that this government promises, the policy of abandonment. Or is this, Madam Speaker, the policy of self-reliance?

To make matters worse, farmers like other Canadians are reeling from the government's policies of high interest rates. Increased fuel prices add an additional financial burden to an industry floundering to keep its head above water.

The government fails to realize or even admit the serious financial stress being experienced by our grain, oilseeds, horticultural, and livestock producers. The situation is acute and, although a direct consequence of low prices and actions by foreign governments, the federal government must also bear its share of responsibility for the failure to present proper safety net support programs to correct for the resulting income deprivation experienced by our Canadian farmers.

Producers welcome the opportunity to provide remedies to the safety net committee's reports. However, the report and all the work and effort of the past months will only work and only be worth-while if these proposals are implemented beginning in the 1991-92 crop year and if the costs to producers are held to a maximum of one-third of the total premium cost, in order to assure a high participation rate by our farmers.

It is imperative the gross revenue insurance plan, GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA, programs proposed by the grain and oilseeds safety net committee, give the same support benefits to on-farm-fed and grain crop silage as with commercially marketed grain. It is also critical that safety net support, whether in the form of GRIP or NISA, or both, be offered to horticultural producers, many of whom are ineligible for any type of stabilization or crop insurance programs at present.

Equally important is that the financial shortfalls experienced in 1989–90 and 1990–91 be addressed if many farmers are going to be around in order to participate in these safety net programs.

I must commend the Minister of Agriculture for backing down from his previous short-sighted decision to eliminate the interest-free cash advances. His recent decision to reinstate interest-free cash advances for the first $50,000 advance for grain, oilseed and horticultural growers for 1990–91 is long overdue. This decision will partially alleviate the cash flow needs this fall, but to impose the same ceiling on the amount of interest-free assistance for multi-farmer units, such as partnerships or family corporations, as they do for individual operations will unfairly penalize those farmers who have chosen to farm collectively.

I hope the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture are listening as this change of heart will only delay and not prevent the financial stresses associated with the low prices of 1990–91. These interest-free cash advances will not negate the need for another ad hoc program in 1990–91.

It is good to see that this government has admitted it was wrong. While they are still at it, perhaps the Minister of Finance will admit that he is wrong about the GST and withdraw it. Speaking of the GST, it is just one more cross that Canadian farmers have to bear.

Farmers can carry a heavier load. They are already bearing more than their share. This is what I mean by the government recognizing the essential role played by our farmers and the vital role played by agricultural communities to the over-all economy and the well-being of all Canadians. This government will try to say it has supported our agricultural industry, but actions speak louder than words. The previous examples clearly do not substantiate these claims.

What about their new vision for agriculture respecting our supply managed sector? Again, they claim to fully support supply management. Their Growing Together paper stated, and I quote: "The national supply-management system is a uniquely Canadian system designed to strengthen farmer bargaining power and stabilize prices. It has been highly successful at reducing producer risk, increasing stability and providing market security". I agree. Is that not what we are trying to accomplish in all other sectors?

In the GATT negotiations it appears that all the programs are on the table. We have a trade minister who tells the Minister of Agriculture that he should be ashamed of the amount of money we spend to assist farmers. How can we expect negotiators to stand up for Canadian farmers when the minister they report to thinks farmers are getting too much money? With a trade minister like that on our side at the bargaining table, who needs opponents? It is no wonder we got such a bad deal with the free trade agreement.

To add insult to injury, we have a Minister of Agriculture who gave misleading agricultural subsidy figures to GATT. When supply management was first implemented under GATT, it was understood that subsidies were something that came out of the tax base, but now the U.S. in particular is trying to argue that if consumers pay more than the world price, that is a subsidy. That is economic nonsense and this government seems to be falling for it.

The minister knows that it is inaccurate and unfair to see the price differential between Canadian and world milk prices as a subsidy for dairy farmers. Such a calculation is irrelevant and unfair because the world prices reflect dumping by countries of their subsidized surplus production. The fact is that world prices are far below the actual production costs for most dairy producing countries.

Our supply management system was implemented within the international law under Article XI of GATT. We have every right to keep our system as is, but instead of defending our rights to maintain our supply management, they have undermined our own negotiating position. Our system produces a high quality production for our market at a fair and reasonable price to the consumer and provides a fair return to the producer as well. Perhaps equally important is Canada is now nearly self-sufficient in dairy products.

There is so much more I could say about the desperate needs of our agricultural sector, but my time is short. The most important industry in Canada is food production. Farmers are only asking for what other Canadians want; the right to earn a good living and support their families.

• (1020 )

By hard work and struggling, we have built an agricultural industry that is envied the world over. We must not allow it to be destroyed by short sighted policies and short sighted politicians.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for beginning this debate today on a sector of our economy that is vital.

The question that I would like to address to my colleague has to do with the youth who seem to be leaving farms right across the country. In our area in southern Ontario, the attractiveness of large industry is pulling experienced youth away from the farm.

Mothers and fathers who are just about at that age when they would like to take life a little easier are finding that they cannot take it easier because the resources are not there to help continue the life on the farm to help it become productive.

He, being a young farmer, knows well of these problems. I would like to ask him, and I would like to ask other members throughout the day as well, what things we in the national government Chamber could be doing to try to bring some excitement, purpose and vocation back to agriculture and farming in this country.

How do we bring youth back to agriculture in this country?

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for such understanding of agriculture. Many may not know, but my colleague is a farmer. He shows a lot of interest in that area.

That is one of the biggest problems we have in Canadian agricultural communities today: the problem of youth and why youth will continue to farm in the conditions that their parents and their forefathers have farmed before.

My colleague is right when he says that it is difficult for young farmers to get into farming, or to stay in farming. My colleagues across the way know that, without the policies and the programs that governments provide because of the world situation in farming, many young people would not be eligible to farm.

There are a number of new ideas and new thoughts out there. I will give credit where credit is due. A lot of new ideas have come out with this Growing Together paper. A lot of people have got together.

All over the province of Ontario, too, different farm groups have got together to try to come up with new ideas to keep our youth in farming. We in the Liberal Party have formed a group to sit down to talk with farmers to develop these new ideas in new ways that will keep our youth in farming. Obviously, a lot of them have to do with providing the safety nets that are there in order to keep farmers on the land.

A lot of the problems with our youth in farming have to do with the fact that they cannot get proper funding. They deal with the same problems that all Canadians deal with: big businessmen and small businessmen in Canada, in trying to get access to proper funding to farm.

There have to be better ways for governments to signal to our young people that they will have stable supplies of money when they need it for many years down the line.

Unfortunately now, with the rises of interest rates and the volatility of our economic markets, those sorts of programs are not available. Those sorts of assurances to our young farmers are not available, so many of them are not getting into farming because, quite frankly, they do not have the security of moneys.

I thank my colleague for his question. I could go on an on, but I want to hear a question from the other side.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I appreciate being allowed a few minutes to consider this opposition motion and emphasize to the government, particularly at this critical time in the GATT negotiations, the need for the government to pursue with a good degree of vigour the fact that there are to be no new deals struck among the 96 or so countries that will be concluding the round of talks in Brussels in a few weeks. No new deals can be struck which will dismantle Canada's supply management programs.

Canadians face many tensions at this time in our history. We all find these very challenging. Sometimes we ask ourselves if anything at all is working any more. Well, I can tell you, Madam Speaker, some things still work and they work well. One of those things that is working well and has worked well for many years is Canada's supply managed programs which work in the milk industry for milk, milk products, and works in the egg industry for eggs, egg products and poultry.

The result is that since 1970, approximately 20 years now, Canadians have enjoyed a good supply of high quality basic food products at a price that they can afford. No one is being exploited, neither the producer nor the consumer. The system has operated for 20 years with maximum efficiency and maximum effectiveness. It behoves the government of the day on behalf of all to see that no deals are struck at GATT which will see us turning back the clock on the basis on which these primary foods are produced and marketed in this country.

Let us look back and see what advances have been made in the dairy industry for example. We will soon realize the importance of having success in the present managed supply system. I know what used to happen in the dairy industry. The great fluctuations in prices brought people into the industry for short periods of time if prices were favourable, only to see them retreat out of the industry very quickly when prices fell below production costs.

No businessman in any other industry in this country could or would stay in business for very long if he could not count on a projected minimum price for his product, a price that had some relation to the cost of manufacturing the product. He would also want to be sure that there was going to be an ongoing need for his product.

The managed supply system was designed specifically to fill both those needs. A price which was based on production costs and a mechanism to ensure that the product would be needed. Canadians believe it is important for this country to be self-sufficient, particularly in dairy products.

A national survey conducted by Goldfarb Consultants, a reputable firm, in May of this year came up with some very interesting statistics as to the appreciation which Canadians have for dairy farmers and the way they operate.

Mr. Bosley: It helps if you own the firm, doesn't it?

Mr. Jordan: If you are basically honest, it doesn't really matter who owns it.

Two or three interesting statistics came out of that in summary, I suppose, of all the data that was collected. Seventy per cent of Canadians say that all milk products should be produced in Canada. Thirty-four per cent of Canadians said that they can come from other countries, but they want fresh milk. Some 85 per cent of Canadians thought that the dairy industry in Canada was in excellent shape and that dairy farmers were very efficient. Another interesting statistic is that 76 per cent of Canadians said that they would be willing to pay more for Canadian dairy products to support the Canadian dairy industry.

• (1030)

In summary of this report, the overwhelming majority of Canadians, 94 per cent, believe that it is important for the dairy industry in Canada to remain self-sufficient, without any outside interference from other countries.

Canadians can be supportive of the present marketing systems because they know that for 20 years they have had at their disposal a good supply of excellent products at a bargain price. Only 14 per cent to 17 per cent of disposable income of Canadians is spent on food. It is the lowest in the world when we consider the quality of our food and the fact that we live under some fairly harsh weather conditions which often affect the cost of production.

The target price for industrial milk, which is set by the Canadian Dairy Commission, has increased by only 4.7 per cent over the past four years from July 1986 to July 1990. The Consumer Price Index over the same period increased 19.3 per cent. This is possible because Canadian farmers are among the most efficient in the world and Canadian consumers are benefiting from that efficiency.

A Canadian family of four buys on the average two dozen eggs per week. At $1.50 a dozen, it will cost that family $156 a year for a highly nutritious food in which there is no waste. Eggs come for the most part in their own package and leave very little environmental burden on the community. How can we be so fortunate? It is because Canadian farmers are among the most efficient in the world, and they have become that way under managed marketing systems.

That is why the Canadian negotiators at GATT have to be tough minded when it comes to any tendency to barter away our production and marketing systems which are working so well for the benefit of all Canadians, both producers and consumers.

Marketing boards have brought order and stability into one of Canada's most basic industries. Canadians who have benefited from these programs are urging the federal government to state unequivocally its commitment to the Canadian supply managed systems. A failure to do so would seriously compromise the trust placed by our farmers into the hands of those speaking on their behalf at the GATT negotiations. Canadians, both producers and consumers, will pay the price if we allow our managed marketing systems to be up for grabs.

I think my time is up by both clocks. I would be delighted to try and answer any questions.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his brilliant speech and his understanding of the Canadian farming situation.

Having a number of dairy farmers in his riding, he too has probably seen the number of editorials that have appeared in Canadian newspapers across Canada attacking our system of supply management, really attacking dairy farmers and calling them leeches on the system. I am wondering if the member would take this opportunity to give a short explanation to all Canadians of why our supply managed systems are so good and really tell Canadians that in fact they are not paying too much for their supply managed products.

Mr. Jordan: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question from my colleague.

Another of my colleagues asked what the young farmer is looking for today. Any youth starting into the dairy industry today is looking for some stability, some future. You cannot have stability if you are living in a fluctuated market. My experience was that when the price of milk was high people jumped in, and then got out of the industry. How could he, for example, plan and buy a tractor which he needs in his industry and finance it over a period of years, as most of them have to do today and as we have all had to do? How could he possibly have that kind of faith when he can see absolutely no future stability in the industry?

Those who would criticize the Milk Marketing Board really do not understand how it works. The only time there is an increase from the man who has his $300,000, $400,000 or $500,000 investment is when there is an increase in his costs. If he wants to make a little more money just so he will not stifle initiative, he can make more money if he becomes more efficient. That is why it is reflected in those few statistics I gave. The initiative is there to become very efficient. I think this would induce young people into the industry. There is some incentive, stability, and some reason for them to become efficient. They like the challenge, and I think they will come into the industry on that basis.

If we throw it to the wolves as it used to be when the price was up and down and depend on another country, can we imagine a country like Canada depending on a neighbour, even with the best of intentions, to supply some of our basic foods? What a disgrace that would be.

I am using the Milk Marketing Board as an example. I think we have the largest egg producer in North America in my riding. The same applies to the egg industry also. There is a good supply. The quality is excellent and the price is right.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise and speak to this motion before the House today.

The member for Haldimand—Norfolk is asking this House, through the GATT negotiations and in over-all economic policies, to recognize the vital and valuable role farmers play in maintaining the Canadian way of life.

I would suggest that this government's record stands as proof that the well-being of Canadian farmers has been a priority in the past and will continue to be a priority in the future.

Between 1984 and 1989, direct and indirect federal expenditures in agriculture totalled almost $22 billion. Again, in 1990, we have undertaken various initiatives, including $500 million in direct cash payments to help with the cash flow assistance. Also, we are providing an interest relief program of up to $95 million for this current crop year for grains and oilseeds producers.

That kind of support for farmers is unprecedented in Canadian history. That kind of support clearly shows our commitment to farmers and our recognition of the importance of maintaining that Canadian way of life we speak of. Our commitment goes beyond dollars and cents. While we have willingly used the federal Treasury to offset farm income problems, we have also undertaken two major initiatives to ensure the long-term well-being of the Canadian agricultural sector.

Domestically we are in the midst of a major agrifood policy review. It has brought all the partners in the agrifood sector together to define policy options that will ensure this $50 billion industry can keep pace in this rapidly changing world.

Through that policy review, we are looking at ways to ensure the industry is market responsive, self-reliant, regionally sensitive, and environmentally sustainable. Those four pillars, as they are known, are the foundation of a healthy and durable agrifood industry.

• (1040)

As part of the review, a government/industry task force has designed a new safety net system that will give farmers predictability and stability over the long term. This will help to address some of the concerns that the previous speakers have been raising in their speeches. Such a system will allow us to get away from the ad hoc kind of assistance we have had to provide in recent years, ad hoc assistance that has treated the symptoms and not the problem. It is difficult to farm in that type of environment when one cannot predict into the long term. We believe that the safety nets that are being put forward will assist in giving it that stability that is required.

It is hoped that these new safety nets will be in place for the grains and oilseeds sector for the next crop year. If there is a willingness of all members of this House of Commons to put that system into place for the 1991 crop year, I believe we can get that work done and I believe we have an obligation to do that.

It is also hoped that the next crop year will find us well on our way to a fair and equitable world trade environment. It is most important as well that we deal with that world trade environment. To that end, Canada has played a major role in having agriculture included in the Uruguay round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

This initiative at the international level is also crucial to the long-term well-being of our agrifood sector. We need a new world trading order in agriculture if we are to get away from the foolish subsidy battles that have hurt our grains and oilseeds sector so badly. We need a new world trading order that will allow our supply management sectors to operate under clearly defined rules. We need a new world trading order if our rural communities are to grow and to prosper.

The Uruguay round is scheduled to end in December, and Canada has firmly stated its goals in these negotiations. In particular, we are seeking the elimination of export subsidies, a substantial reduction in internal subsidies, improved market access, greater security for supply management through a clarified and strengthened Article XI, and development of rules on health and sanitary measures so they are not misused as disguised barriers to trade, which is so often the case today.

Our offer which we tabled in Geneva on October 15 was developed in close consultation with the agrifood industry and the provincial governments. In fact industry leaders have widely praised our offer.

Jim Caldwell of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association had this to say about it:

> It is a well-balanced package. If other countries would agree, it would be a good start.

Albert Chambers of the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency said:

> It's what we expected. Poultry and egg producers would have little or nothing to complain about.

We believe that we have developed a balanced position in these negotiations: an approach that reflects the fact our agrifood industry is both domestically oriented and also export oriented. If we can bring about an end to the destructive use of export subsidies, Canadian farmers will be able to compete fairly against other farmers and not the treasuries of other governments. If we can get Article XI strengthened and clarified, our farmers can operate supply management programs secure in the knowledge that they are complying with internationally accepted rules.

Clearly a successful agreement on agriculture in the Uruguay round must be of benefit to all Canadian agriculture. We cannot pick and choose. It has to be of benefit to all of the agricultural sector.

As the December deadline for the Uruguay round approaches, we plan to continue our close consultation with the industry. We want what is best for the industry, and that means a world trade environment that is fair and equitable.

We are disappointed that the Europeans have yet to table their offer. We are extremely disappointed that both the Europeans and the Americans have upped their use of export subsidies. Hopefully both are only flexing their muscles as we head toward the crucial stage of the negotiations.

Canada is committed to seeing this trade war brought to an end. We can only hope that other trading nations share in that commitment.

A successful end to the Uruguay round will help to ensure a bright future for our agrifood sector. This in turn will ensure a bright future for our over-all economy. After all, we cannot forget that our agrifood sector is responsible for about 10 per cent of our gross domestic product and employs more than 14 per cent of Canadians.

This government recognizes the importance of this industry. That is why we are doing our best to ensure the Uruguay round is successful. That is why we are in the midst of a major domestic agrifood policy review. We want to ensure this industry has a stable and predictable future. We want to ensure this industry can grow and prosper, because as this industry grows and prospers, so does Canada.

I hope, with the various speeches from the different parties that will be given in this House, we can come up with some very positive, workable solutions because we know how important the agrifood sector is to this great nation of Canada. It has developed this country in the early production of food.

We have the ability to produce much beyond our domestic requirements and we know that much of the world requires food. We also know that many countries of the world which require that food have an inability to pay. We have to work out some solutions in order to keep a strong viable agriculture sector, while keeping in mind that there are others in this world who are not as fortunate as we are.

I hope when members are turning their thoughts toward agriculture in this country that they keep that in mind. By working together, as we did with our Growing Together task force paper, we will bring together not only the politicians but governments at all levels. It will affect trade in all sectors, right to the grassroots. People were talking about the well-being of the agrifood sector and their representatives resulting in wonderful co-operation and excellent consultations. We believe that we are developing, not only at GATT, but in this country, a better understanding among all the players. By doing that, everyone will prosper because if agriculture prospers in this country, all of us will prosper.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to salute the member for Huron—Bruce. Many of us realize that he is a farmer and he has accomplished a lot in this sector over the years.

I would like to come back to the question that I asked my colleague. He knows that we are at the crossroads right now in this very important sector. He has spent many years and has enjoyed and inspired many others to get involved in this sector. What does he think we should be doing to create the excitement and interest for young people to work and live on farms and for those who have money to invest in farms?

Five or six years ago in this House, if one asked someone if they would be interested in going into environmental studies, 9 out of 10 of our youth would run the other way. They did not recognize the importance of the environment.

Today we have a sector, agriculture, that is going to be feeding the world over the next 10 to 15 years. For some unknown reason we cannot seem to get our youth turned on and interested in making the commitment to the vocation of farming. I stress vocation because it really is not like an office tower job on Bay Street or St. Catherines Street where one works nine to five. It is a full and total commitment.

What I would like to hear from this member, who has owned and operated a farm successfully most of his life, are his thoughts as to what we should be doing to bring youth back to farming?

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It does give us the option to address a particular issue which concerns all of us. It is not a new concern. This is something that has happened over a number of years. All of us in this House who represent rural ridings ask many times how a young person can enter into the farm sector.

There is a new generation of farmers approaching. There is also a generation that is already there. That does not mean there are still not difficult challenges that they must face. These have been difficult and we must recognize that. Farm incomes have been low and expenses have been high. Many of these people have trimmed their costs to the bare bones as much as possible. Very often they have not had adequate support from their operations to give them the type of living that some other people in the country have and enjoy. We have to start with the problem, and the problem is that there has not been the stability that is required in agriculture. We know ad hoc programs will get one through for today and for a short period but not in the long term. We believe with the Growing Together paper and the work that is evolving from that paper, particularly that which will address the farm finance sector, that we need long-term, predictable programs, such as the safety nets that would be of assistance in making that commitment to the future of agriculture.

I do believe there are many young people in this country who would love to enter into the vocation of farming either on the family farm or young people who are new entrants. We know that at agricultural colleges the enrolment is maintained, and that there is an interest in the agrifood business and so we believe the will is still there. With the safety nets, before one plants a crop one can predict what one's income will be for that year. That makes the borrower feel comfortable and it also makes the lender feel more comfortable. Perhaps a preferred rate could be established if everybody feels comfortable in this situation. That is one of the first steps toward some of the stability that is really needed.

We also have been unable to predict the grains and oilseeds sector because of the lack of a world agreement. I am sure everyone has witnessed what has happened over the last number of years. In 1989, the grain producing nations of the world transferred something like $245 billion U.S. to the farm sector. It is embarrassing when we think of what that is doing; and still, a third of the people in this world are going to bed hungry every night. That is something we have to address as well.

To come back to the hon. member's question, I believe that more young people will go into agriculture if we put the right policies in place. We have a task force on farm financing which is addressing new entrants to agriculture, not only youth but new entrants, which I believe is important. If we can come out with the proper programs, that will help.

There has always been a problem, for as long as I have farmed and that is all my life, of intergenerational transfer of land from one generation to the next. So if we can address that issue, without having to refinance the farm every generation, that would help us greatly as well. But the most important thing is that income should be predictable and be at a level that gives an opportunity for a reasonable living. This would be the most encouraging thing we could have happen for our young people.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to contribute a few comments to this debate on agriculture. Like you, Madam Speaker, I am very concerned about what is happening at the current GATT talks.

We will have to wait until the end of these talks to find out what the impact of agreements will be on Quebec producers, for instance, who share the same type of prosperous farming area, and we hope that will remain so.

For the benefit of hon. members, I want to say that thousands of farmers have written to us to express their concerns. I think it is absolutely vital, especially during this debate, to ensure that hon. members are aware of the legitimate demands of Quebec producers, demands that are summed up in three short paragraphs, Madam Speaker. First, it is clear that properly maintained and operated supply management systems, particularly as they apply to dairy, poultry and egg producers, are essential if we are to maintain balanced production and a measure of security for our farmers.

Of course, we cannot have a management system if we cannot control imports, and obviously, if import controls are replaced by a customs tariff, this would lead to a gradual dismantling of our supply management system.

Finally, Quebec producers are anxious to see their price and income stabilization programs maintained in their present form. As you know, Quebec has a program that is probably the most generous and best adapted to the present situation in agriculture, which means that maintaining crop insurance and farm credit programs must be one of the priorities at the current GATT talks. As we see it, these programs do not cause any distortion in production and marketing.

While the talks are taking place in Geneva, many farmers are very worried. They have substantial investments that are on the line, and the banks are getting nervous. I therefore hope the government will never consider signing an agreement that does not respect existing rights.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary, who is very well informed on this issue, is prepared to give us the assurance that the vested rights of Canadian farmers will not be tampered with.

[English]

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to once again state our position and support for Article XI which is the basis of our supply management sector, whether it is dairy or poultry.

We tabled our position after consulting fully with both of those industries. We have not wavered in any way from the position that was developed by those two sectors and we will maintain our position. We have no intention of moving from that position.

We have met constantly with the dairy producers and the poultry sector and their support has been very valuable to us in developing the position and maintaining it. It is very clear to the government that that is what we would like to have.

Madam Speaker, I wonder if it would be permissible if I could go back to the hon. member who was talking about young farmers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will have to interrupt the hon. member. The period for questions and comments has now expired. However, I would be quite prepared, if it is the pleasure of the House, to allow the parliamentary secretary to answer the questions.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cardiff: I thank you, Madam Speaker, and the House for that co–operation. I just want to say that the age distribution of farmers has been fairly constant since 1931. The proportion of farmers who were under 35 was actually higher in 1986 than in any census year between 1961 and 1976.

Also between 1981 and 1986, just over 28,000 individuals under the age of 35 started new farm businesses. I just thought the House would be interested in those statistics.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his comments. He knows, as I said, that I believe the papers are going in the right direction and we need more consultations with farmers. Quite frankly, farmers are asking whether or not the money is going to be there to back up all the promises that are coming out of these consultations.

The member is quite aware of what his colleague, the Minister for International Trade said in this House on October 15, as reported at page 14143 of Hansard:

> The Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed at the amount of assistance he is giving Canadian farmers.

I want to give the parliamentary secretary an opportunity to stand in this House today and to refute those statements, and to tell all Canadian farmers that in fact once all the consultations are finished, once all the programs are there and made available, that the money will be there to provide for these programs.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I would just like to state again that this government has been committed to agriculture ever since we took over the governing of this country in 1984. The programs we brought forward and the assistance we have given has been consistent and has always been there when the need was there. That will continue to be there as well.

Regardless of what the future holds, we believe that if we have proper negotiations, it will not require as many tax dollars to assist if we can bring some common sense to the world marketplace.

But I do say, and I will say again, that we will be there to support our agriculture sectors as we have in the past.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Yesterday, Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for regional development, the hon. Benoît Bouchard, was in Bonaventure in the riding of my colleague Darryl Gray where he announced the federal government's participation in the Atlantic salmon enhancement program in Quebec.

Under this joint federal-provincial agreement the Government of Canada contributes $12 million towards a program to restock Atlantic salmon rivers and develop sports fishing.

Madam Speaker, allow me to welcome this federal government initiative and pay tribute to the Quebec Federation of Atlantic Salmon. For a number of years now it has been playing a leading role in the preparation of this program, and it will continue to ensure that it is properly implemented.

WINNIPEG TAXATION CENTRE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, Canadians will know that the government since 1984 has increased taxation 32 times. If the goods and services tax were to be implemented, it would be number 33.

The government has shown an immense creativity in raising taxes, but there is a type of tax that we are not talking a great deal about and that is fee for service or charge-back for certain services. For example, there is a new twist now, charging employees for certain particular services.

Here is one example. There is a new parking policy which now requires employees to pay, and pay a lot, at the Winnipeg Taxation Centre. The parking facility there is really quite inadequate. There are not enough parking plugs and they have been requested over a year ago. Of course there are severe winter conditions there and if anyone doubts that I would invite them to come and pay a visit. These plugs were requested last year. To date nothing has been done. There are not enough spaces for employees. The centre is not centrally located, there is poor bus service, and no viable alternative for parking.

Apparently this is taking place in a number of cities across Canada and in a number of areas of government, not only at the Winnipeg Taxation Centre.

When will the government stop overtaxing Canadians? And when will it treat employees with fairness?

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, the residents of the riding of Saint-Maurice enthusiastically welcome the Prime Minister's announcement concerning the future of our country, and they intend to participate actively in this great national debate. We will remind our friends in English Canada that Quebec is a distinct society, a fact that will have to be recognized once and for all.

Unlike members of the Bloc québécois, most Quebec members will answer the Prime Minister's call. Our friends in the Bloc québécois should also make a positive contribution to this endeavour, if only because the interest of Quebecers—as long as they remain Canadians—is that the systems works.

My message to the member for Shefford and the member for Richelieu is that the role of members in the Canadian Parliament is to seek formulas likely to improve the country, not to plan sterile strategies to destroy it.

DALY BUILDING, OTTAWA

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, according to a report published in The Ottawa Citizen this week, the National Capital Commission seems ready to make some recommendations concerning the Daly Building.

In the past years the project has inspired heated debate on its heritage value and the viability of preserving it without major modifications despite its unsafe structure. Anyone walking by the south side of the building along Rideau Street can see that this eyesore's zero set-back makes any work being done around it dangerous and inconvenient.

There can be nothing gained in keeping the south side of the building intact. I call upon the NCC to heed the advice of experts presently involved in the project, to remove the dangerously substandard stones, to move the building much further away from the street, and to produce a replica of the original Chicago-style building constructed in 1905. All of this will thereby properly enhance the streetscape at the bottleneck of Confederation Square.

ETHANOL

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, as grain stocks in western Canada mount and world fuel prices rise due to the situation in the Middle East, it seems timely to consider the economic viability of increasing the production of ethanol, a gas extender produced by the fermentation of biomass feedstocks such as low quality grains.

Contained in the report of the Standing Committee of the Environment of October of this year is a recommendation which states: "Canadian energy policy-making must have as its most immediate focus the more efficient and conserving use of energy."

Ethanol blended fuels offer a wide range of advantages to the motor fuel producer, the marketer, the consumer, and the public at large. Ethanol is capable of dramatically reducing dependence on foreign oil and boosting our farm economy.

I urge fuel producers and the government to give serious consideration to the increasing of our production—

LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, considering the way it handled the Hibernia project and its opposition to the principle of anti-scab legislation proposed by a former Tory, the hon. member for Richelieu, this government has abandoned Quebec and Canadian workers. The irony and hypocrisy of it all! Francophone Tory members who don't even have the balls to defend the real interests of Quebecers!

I went to the Lévis—Lauzon shipyards and I heard and echoed the alarm sounded by Robert Monette, president of the union local at MIL Davie. The government had clearly missed the boat on the Hibernia project, and then we saw Tory masks drop a few days after Halloween, when they objected to the principle of anti-scab legislation. Today, we see the true face of these Tories, Madam Speaker, a face that is anti-union, anti-worker and anti-Quebec.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, today, the media reported that Quebec Minister Gil Rémillard was not satisfied with the federal government's contribution to regional development in Quebec.

The progress report for the 1988 Canada-Quebec agreement on regional economic development, dated September 30, 1990, contains the following information: In the resource regions, the federal government introduced programs with a total of $214.99 million, 75.9 per cent of the $283 million provided for these regions. Of that amount, 23.6 per cent or $66.91 million has already been committed, while the province has invested only $98.66 million, 48.6 per cent of a total of $203 million. Madam Speaker, only 2.6 per cent of this amount or $5.6 million has been committed.

In the central regions, the federal government has already committed $43.75 million, as opposed to the province's $3.52 millions.

Madam Speaker, Minister Rémillard's eloquence does not extend to figures, so I think he should learn quickly to give credit where credit is due, for the benefit of Quebecers.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, for the last two years, Prince Edward Island has suffered at the hands of Canada Post. We have seen closures of rural post offices, reduction in services, and most recently the cancellation of Saturday rural mail delivery.

It has reached the point that a two-tiered system is developing in types of services provided by the corporation. My constituents who live in rural route areas have discovered that not only are they deprived of Saturday rural delivery, but they cannot even pick up their mail from the post office on Saturdays.

Islanders deserve better treatment from Canada Post and the opportunity to voice their dissatisfaction with recent actions taken by the corporation. I urge the minister responsible for Canada Post to respond to my previous request that a committee be struck to examine the recent cuts and discrepancies in the corporation's activities in Prince Edward Island.

LITERACY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, we must continue our efforts to heighten public awareness and renew our joint commitment to improving the reading and writing skills of Canadian men and women.

According to a recent survey of literacy levels in Canada by Statistics Canada, 38 per cent of Canadian adults lack basic routine reading and mathematical skills.

International Literacy Year has provided opportunities for action, and people have become more aware of the problem. A special effort has been made to raise the literacy levels of Canadian men and women. However, we must not stop there. For 4.5 million Canadians, reading and writing is a daily recurring problem.

Madam Speaker, we cannot let all this human potential go to waste because of lack of skills. Our own development is at stake, both as individuals and as a nation.

THE FRASER RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the Fraser River is over 1,200 kilometres long and drains over 230,000 square kilometres of British Columbia. It is a vital part of the provincial ecosystem.

The lower Fraser is fortunate to have the Fraser River estuary management program to monitor the environmental health of the river as it empties into the lower mainland estuary. No such agency exists to provide a clear and effective plan to safeguard the future of the upper Fraser.

• (1110)

The upper Fraser requires a plan and a process to permit a better balance of economic and environmental considerations, as well as a framework for effective research and monitoring programs. We need to develop an integrated strategy to clean up the entire Fraser River and address critical issues such as water quality and the impact on the upper Fraser of industrial, forestry, and agricultural practices.

An upper Fraser management program could and should provide all agencies and non-governmental organizations interested in the Fraser River, an opportunity for input.

If the government is truly interested in—

CHILDREN

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak about a subject that is of importance to all Canadians.

Our children—the children of Canada and, indeed, the children of the earth—need our protection, our support, and our love.

I congratulate our Prime Minister for his efforts at the historic World Summit on Children at the United Nations. This hallmark event has raised children's rights to new heights and expectations.

I would like to thank the many persons in my constituency of Portage—Interlake who continue to drop off at my constituency office donations of children's necessities and cash to be donated to the many orphanages in the country of Romania. Their generosity will help these children and will not be forgotten.

Finally, I wish to welcome to this world one new Canadian, Cali Beryl Blank, the bouncing new daughter of Sheldon and Irene Blank of Winnipeg. May she grow up to know a better world for children than exists today.

NORDION INC.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of State for Privatization announced that he was seeking bids for the purchase of the shares of Nordion Inc., a subsidiary of Canada Development Investment Corporation.

The government is in danger of developing a bad habit for cutting bad backroom deals. The sale of Route Canada by CN was just one example of this. In this time of economic uncertainty, concrete steps must be taken to protect taxpayers and employees from unscrupulous purchasers dedicated to an asset strip of Nordion.

I urge the minister responsible to make public his ministry's current market appraisal of Nordion, as well as all bids submitted and not withdrawn, the agreement of purchase and sale, and the remuneration agreement with Wood Gundy, which is the bid manager, so that Canadians are not kept in the dark as this Crown corporation goes on the chopping block.

PARRSBORO FOSSIL MUSEUM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, I want to assure the House and the people interested in the Parrsboro Fossil Museum that the federal commitment to fund the museum is in place and confirmed. As well, I am pleased to report that Hon. Ron Giffin, Minister of Education for the Province of Nova Scotia, has confirmed the commitment of the province. Further, the private investor has committed to go ahead with the project as soon as possible.

Funding for the museum resulted from a unique agreement by several departments and levels of government and was only made possible by the participation of the private sector partner.

Although some opportunistic individuals have tried to create some negative publicity about the museum, we are all determined to succeed in this genuine historic project in an area of high unemployment. It will be the corner-stone of an economic turnaround for the area and the community is solidly behind the geological society in a very positive way.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I rise today to underline the fundamental importance of having representatives from Canada's northern territories on the recently formed Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future panel.

Surely, if we are to engage in a process of national renewal, it is essential that all regions of the country have a voice. I need not remind the House that the Yukon and Northwest Territories encompass one third of Canada's land mass. The Yukon and Northwest Territories were left out of the Meech Lake process.

The Prime Minister spoke yesterday of consultation from coast to coast. Well, I want to call on the Prime Minister for consultation from coast to coast to coast. I call on the Prime Minister today not to ignore the reality of Canada, to acknowledge Canada's majestic north, and to give the message to Canadians in the north that our views count and that our voice should be heard.

I call on the Prime Minister to ask for nominations from the Yukon and Northwest Territories to serve on this very important panel on national unity.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, Article 19 is an international London based anti-censorship monitoring organization. It has said recently that Canada's protection of freedom of information is too weak. The group in its report to the United Nations Human Rights Commission urged that federal budget cuts in programs to promote the use of aboriginal languages be reconsidered. During the recent Oka crisis, the news media's freedoms were severely diminished.

I would hope that the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs in its consideration of the events of this past summer at Kanesatake would take these and other words of censure from the international community into account.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have questions today for the Minister of the Environment on his handling of the Rafferty–Alameda dam project and what it says about his commitment and that of the government to having a sound environment for all Canadians.

Yesterday an affidavit was tabled in the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, sworn under oath by Premier Devine of Saskatchewan, in which the premier said that on September 5 he met with the minister in the minister's office and he and the minister agreed that the dam project would go ahead and there would be no environmental assessment completed until after the dams were completed. Yet the minister in this House on October 12 said and I quote: "There was no such agreement".

How could the minister tell the House that there was no such agreement when the premier of Saskatchewan swore under oath in an affidavit tabled in the Saskatchewan court that there was such an agreement and that he and the minister even shook hands on it?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to repeat for my hon. colleague that my position in this case has always been very straightforward. It has been to say that I wanted the process of a full review to be completed. There were documents that were filed late Wednesday afternoon in Saskatchewan before the court. I asked the court, through our legal counsel, to give me the time to respond to those documents. I intend to do so. I can also say that I maintain the position that I took before my colleagues in this House on October 12, saying that there was no such agreement.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have the premier's affidavit right here in my hand. In it the premier swears under oath that the minister made an agreement with him, which was repeated before officials at a luncheon, that the dam project could go ahead and there would be no assessment until the project was completed.

Will the minister swear his own affidavit under oath, setting out what he said here, and will he go to Saskatchewan immediately to allow himself to be cross-examined under oath about his affidavit?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I just said very clearly in my answer to the first question that the documents had been tabled before the bench very late Wednesday afternoon. We asked for an adjournment so that I would be in a position to provide the equivalent documents on the federal government's position, and I will do that. Those documents will be sworn and they will be deposited before the court this afternoon.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, if the minister and the government are fully committed to having an environmental review before the project goes ahead and if they want the court to prevent the project from going ahead before this has happened, why has the government, through its lawyers, asked the court for another six days delay before the case is heard?

I am told that earth moving equipment is working on the dam day and night, seven days a week. Even though the minister wants to file his own affidavit, why can the case not begin right now with the material that is already available? Does it not mean that the minister is not serious if the minister, through his lawyers, wants another six days before the case even begins to be heard?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is very simple. I have mentioned that twice now. I will mention it a third time to make sure that my hon. colleague opposite understands it.

The Government of Saskatchewan made available new materials to the court on Wednesday afternoon, roughly at four o'clock local time. We were advised of this new material. I think that it is only appropriate that on our side we have the opportunity to file equivalent material so that the court can reach a full and knowledgeable decision. That is what we are doing.

• (1120)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, in the affidavit filed by the president of SaskPower, Mr. George Hill, it is alleged that the minister stated that if the Rafferty Environmental Review Panel quit, "So be it".

Did the minister say, and I quote from the affidavit, "If in fact, it did quit, it would probably increase this minister's options". Did the minister say "he did not care" one way or the other.

Is there any limit to this minister's or this government's cynicism. Having said these things, does the minister believe that he will ever again be able to regain the credibility which is required to be the ultimate defender of the nation's environment?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I will repeat again, it is very clear. I want the process to be completed. That is why we have undertaken the moves that we are undertaking. I will be making a full declaration before the court in the form of an affidavit that will be tabled this afternoon.

Other than that, because the case is before the courts, I have no further answers to give.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, that is a cop-out, and the minister knows it.

Did the minister say to the premier of Saskatchewan that he should not communicate with this minister through his ministerial office because the minister cannot handle his own bureaucrats?

As a result, was subsequent correspondence between this minister and the premier of Saskatchewan not carried on through the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister? Was the Chief of Staff of the Prime Minister involved in this whole scene, as is alleged?

Is the Minister of the Environment, by his denials, not only impugning his own credibility, but impugning the credibility of his department? And now, is he not impugning the credibility of the office of the Prime Minister? Who, in heaven's name, are the Canadian people to believe?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is very clear: There was no agreement reached on September 5. We are before the courts. The affidavit will be filed this afternoon, and affidavits from many of the people that my hon. colleague has mentioned.

There was no agreement and we want the process respected. We want a full environmental review of the project before work is allowed to continue, pursuant to the only agreement that was ever signed between Canada and Saskatchewan which is the January 26, 1990, agreement.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, in the issue of the Rafferty-Alameda dam, what is at stake here is the credibility of this minister and government, the implications for future projects and the seriousness of this government to have a real environmental review process.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: For that reason, Madam Speaker, I believe the Minister of the Environment must clarify his actions for this House.

In the affidavit put forward by Premier Devine, he says that the hon. member for Souris—Moose Mountain, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, was aware of a deal that had been made.

I ask the Minister of the Environment, would the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister not have advised him on September 5 of this deal? Would the Principal Secretary of the Prime Minister not have advised him? Who is in charge here? Is the Minister of the Environment in charge? Can we trust him?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear. The meeting that was held on September 5 was attended by myself, people from Saskatchewan, some of my officials and some of my political staff. There was no agreement. I have made that very clear to this House. I repeat it right now.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Madam Speaker, for the Minister of the Environment. Clearly, there are two stories here. Rather than argue about the stories, the minister says he is going to file his own statement, I want to ask the minister about another matter.

The environmental review process to which he is said he is very committed to is very important to all Canadians in his implications for James Bay and his implications for other megaprojects.

The Minister of the Environment said the panel quit because they felt they could not work under the circumstances of the dam proceeding. I ask the Minister of the Environment if he has given consideration to appointing another panel. If so, who will be on that panel? Who has agreed to sit on that environmental panel?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, given that the purpose of this exercise is to ensure that we have a process that is carried out fully, certainly the answer to the question of whether or not I am looking at the appointment of another panel is yes, obviously, because that is the only way the process can be allowed to be completed.

I would also like to suggest to the hon. member opposite that, given that we have a guidelines order but no legislation to ensure that all major projects in this country are fully assessed from an environmental point of view before construction begins, I would certainly urge her party to support strongly Bill C–78, which is now before committee.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, a supplementary question. The minister well knows that there are more loopholes and more exemptions allowed under Bill C–78 than even under the current system.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, the Minister of the Environment says he is going to appoint a panel. We have construction continuing 24 hours a day. The project is continuing and the minister has asked for a further delay of six days. When is the Minister of the Environment going to appoint another panel? What is the date? Who has agreed to sit on this panel to review this project?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the whole purpose of our being in court is to seek an injunction so that the work will cease on the project at the moment and that will allow us, at that point, to appoint the new panel and to move along with the respect that we have, as a government, for the process of environmental review in this country.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the credibility of not only the Minister of the Environment but the whole government on this particular issue.

We have the sworn affidavit from the premier of the province of Saskatchewan who states, and I quote: "He", that is the federal Minister of the Environment, "invited me to shake hands on the agreement we had made, which we did". He further states, under oath, that the agreement was communicated not only to the member of Parliament for Souris—Moose Mountain but also to the Chief of Staff of the Prime Minister on that same day.

Now we have the Minister of the Environment, in the House, claiming no deal was made, and the premier of Saskatchewan stating that not only was a deal struck, it was communicated to the Chief of Staff of the Prime Minister. My question to the Acting Prime Minister is who is lying, the Minister of the Environment or the premier of Saskatchewan? Who is lying?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member may want to rephrase her question.

Ms. Copps: I will rephrase it then, Madam Speaker. My question to the Acting Prime Minister is who is not telling the truth?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, there was a meeting on September 5. We did discuss a number of issues. There was no agreement made to change the agreement that was signed on January 26, 1990. That is still the agreement that is in force. We want that agreement to be respected so that environmental concerns in this country can be met.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the minister is making a very serious allegation, that the premier of Saskatchewan was lying under oath. The Minister of the Environment continues to state that no such agreement was reached when, in fact, we have a sworn affidavit from the premier of Saskatchewan who states that not only was an agreement—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member put her question, please.

Ms. Copps: My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. If there is anybody on the government side of the House who cares about the environment, will they tell us who is telling the truth on this particular issue, the premier of Saskatchewan or the Minister of the Environment?

• (1130)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows the rules of the House better than her questions would suggest she does. She knows what language is unparliamentary. Also she has always had a very keen eye for language that might make the television news. She should subvert her interest in the television news to her interest in this parliamentary process.

The answer has been provided by the Minister of the Environment. There will be affidavits filed later in the day on behalf of the Government of Canada that will make the position of the Government of Canada very clear on the matter. She should not try to seize a momentary deadline because of the natural timetables that are involved in a court process.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, Manitobans cannot be and are not indifferent to what is going on in Saskatchewan. Manitobans are deeply concerned about what the Rafferty–Alameda dam project might do to water quality and water quantity in the Souris River on the Manitoba side of the border.

However, the environmental review panel has resigned; it is gone. Without the review panel in place, how does the Minister of the Environment plan to proceed with an assessment of any impact on the environment in Manitoba?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, that is the reason we are encouraged. We are encouraged because we want the agreement of January 26, 1990 respected. The reason that we are encouraged is also because the panel resigned once it found out that that agreement was not being respected.

Depending on the court's decision, then we would move very expeditiously to appoint a new panel to make sure that the work is completed and that the process of environmental review is fully respected in this instance.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Manitobans will want the minister to keep his promise on that.

The Rafferty–Alameda project was preceded by an agreement with the Americans. Canada promised to build the dam, to build it very quickly, and in return the Americans promised to kick in $41 million.

Now the federal government has lost control over the project. Besides, the agreement was signed before the environmental impact assessment.

Are we not headed for a possible international mess with the Americans and all because of the negligence of this government?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it became painfully apparent by late September—early October that the agreement which had been signed between Saskatchewan and Canada under the court order that had been issued for environmental assessment was not being respected.

We immediately moved to seek an injunction in court, and that is what we are proceeding to do, again to ensure that a full process of environmental review be conducted on the project according to the court order that was handed down back in December 1989.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Today is November 2. According to the affidavit, on September 5, on September 17, on September 28, on October 5, and again on October 10, the Saskatchewan government let the federal government know—either the minister himself, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister or the chief of staff of the Prime Minister—what its position was.

Why did the alarm bells not ring? Why did the federal government not have a position to defend the environment? Why was nothing done to defend the federal government position?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I just want to tell my hon. colleague that throughout that period there were ongoing discussions between the Government of Saskatchewan and myself to try to reach an agreement that would allow the panel and the process to be followed throughout.

Those conversations took place throughout September and early October. The last conversation was held the day when we had unfortunately to recognize that no accommodation could be reached, that the panel had resigned, and that we had to take hard action, namely seek an injunction in court.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

If the minister were aware—and he must have been after all those days of communications—that there was such a problem, why was nothing made public? Why was the public kept in the dark? Why were others not in a position to know that the environment was being threatened? Why were others not told that the Saskatchewan government believed it had a deal? Why was everything kept in the dark? Why was everything kept a secret? Why was the public not able to defend the environment, like this minister has refused to do?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, throughout this period the panel was going about its job according to its terms of reference to fulfil an environmental process which we feel is very important for Canadians and for people throughout the country. That panel was working and that work was advancing.

During that time we were trying to discuss with Saskatchewan some of the controversy that had emerged over the last six months. The work was being done and was proceeding.

We would like very much to be able to assure right now that that process be maintained and that work be completed.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

He will know that in paragraph 84 of the affidavit of George Hill he states: "When the meal was concluded, which would have been around 1.35, the minister asked the premier if there was anything further, and when the premier replied that there was not, the hon. Robert de Cotret invited the premier to shake hands on the deal which they had made, and the two of them so shook hands."

For the benefit of all Canadians, would the Minister of the Environment explain why he now denies that there was a secret deal with regard to this matter?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the member is quoting from the affidavit. The case is before the courts. I have indicated clearly to this House that I will be responding on behalf of the Government of Canada to these affidavits by an affidavit of my own this afternoon.

I would only hope that this matter can be resolved by the courts and not resolved in this kind of public discussion.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

I have an affidavit signed by the premier of Saskatchewan. Paragraph 18 reads in part: "On September 5, 1990 he telephoned and spoke with the honourable Len Gustafson, MP". He goes on to say, and I have the full extract here for the Acting Prime Minister: "I also kept my appointment with the chief of staff of the Prime Minister and I advised him of the agreement and the terms thereof. He informed me that he was pleased it was all behind us."

Would the Acting Prime Minister clarify the matter for all Canadians and admit to Canadians and to the House that there was a secret back room deal on this project?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the Whip on his appointment and on his enthusiasm. It is too bad that his facts are not consistent with his rhetoric.

Mr. Dingwall: You're calling the premier a liar?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, no. I don't use language like that. I leave that to the member for Hamilton East.

The hon. member, with doubtful propriety, has quoted an affidavit that is before a court on a matter that is also before the courts.

As my colleague, the Minister of the Environment has said, there was no deal. As he also said, there will be further affidavits filed this afternoon. Rather than seeking Andy Warhol's 15 seconds of fame on television at noon, the hon. member should let the court process carry forward.

MANDATE OF THE SPICER COMMISSION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

The terms of reference of the Spicer Commission are not clear, not by a long shot. Canadians have many questions concerning either the make-up of the commission or its work mandate.

I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Spicer Commission will be a substitute for the promise made by the government or the Prime Minister to appoint a national commission on native peoples affairs? And are we to infer that the Spicer Commission will replace or defer another government promise that Parliament will address the reform of this institution and this country, beginning with the Senate? Can we expect an early start on Senate reform?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we hope to see a reform in current Senate practices, and Canada would be well served if the Liberal senators were to drop their tactics aimed at stalling the proceedings of the Senate.

But of course the government and Parliament will have to take other measures to reform our institutions, not only the Senate but the Commons as well where changes are necessary, as they are with respect to other federal-provincial and Canadian practices.

We believe that such a great national debate should not be the exclusive preserve of parliamentarians. As MPs we do have a role to play, but then so do all Canadians. Given yesterday's announcement about the establishment of the Spicer Commission, the Canadian government is now in a good position to participate fully in the decision-making process involving the future of this country.

• (1140 )

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the Spicer task force may be good group therapy for the majority, but many of us in this country feel left out. The francophones outside Quebec, the people who live north of the 60th parallel and the multicultural groups feel left out of this commission.

I want to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister or the Prime Minister—

—"suppléant". I will use the French term. This is not stalling.

An hon. member: He is the one who is stalled.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Will his government consider enlarging that commission to include the people I have just referred to and, second, will the report of that commission be given to Parliament eventually for analysis and action?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I know that the quality of my French sometimes leaves something to be desired in the country—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It is better than your English.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It is better than my English, the former Primer Minister tells me. It is part of the rich diversity of Canada, and I am sure he would continue to encourage me to be inventive in my vocabulary if not in my response to questions.

The reason that we have established this commission is precisely because thousands, perhaps millions, of Canadians do in fact feel left out of decisions that affect the future of the country. I think that is a matter which has to be of concern to all of us who work within national institutions.

Our national institutions are obviously not working as well as they should. We have to continue to carry out our responsibilities in this place and in other national institutions, but we have to recognize the reality that Canadians feel left out, that they want an opportunity to participate in planning and deciding the future of this extraordinary country. We will all be the beneficiaries of that.

Are there likely to be changes in the composition of the panel that was established? No, there are not. Is there going to be a determined effort to ensure that every Canadian in every region from every background has the opportunity to participate fully in this process? Yes, there is. That is why we put it in—

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It is prompted by a report in today's papers that Quebec Government Minister Gil Rémillard is not satisfied with the federal performance concerning regional development in Quebec.

Can the minister tell the House the status of discussions on September 30 last concerning the 1988 Canada-Quebec agreement on the regional economic development of resource and central regions?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): First of all, Madam Speaker, Mr. Rémillard made a mistake yesterday because he referred to the $240 million forestry agreement when he should have mentioned the regional economic development agreement which has nothing to do with what we are talking about.

Second, with respect to the money spent by the federal government in Quebec and concerning the $800 million agreement, the federal government has earmarked about 76 per cent of the funds, and the Quebec government about 40 per cent. The federal government has spent about 25 per cent of the money, as compared to 2 per cent by the Quebec government.

From a federal standpoint the program is right on schedule and it is being implementd on a regular basis. Quebec government officials may choose to take a different approach as they see fit, but that is not our responsibility. Still I think Mr. Rémillard ought to get his figures straight before commenting on them.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. This morning's release of the tanker safety report spells out an urgent agenda for the protection of Canada's four coasts from tanker spills and dumping.

This morning at the press conference, the minister's talked in vague terms of studying, examining and assessing. The report predicts we can expect one major spill every year and it says we are utterly unprepared now.

Will the minister take immediate steps to obtain the necessary funds and staff to implement as much of the report as possible without having to proceed to legislation?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to take this opportunity on behalf of the government, and I think all Canadians, to thank David Brander-Smith and his panel for the report. It is certainly wide-ranging and very hard hitting and the government takes into account its recommendations. They are excellent.

We have only had the report for a short time, but my hon. friend makes the point that we should move as quickly as possible. Yes, we are. I think there are some things we can do to co-ordinate our responses between various departments to increase our surveillance and inspection. We will undertake to do those immediately. Vis-à-vis things that have been in the works for some time, I am pleased to advise my hon. friend that a $5.3 million installation of vessel traffic services will be made in Placentia Bay. That will be announced this afternoon by my hon. friend, the Minister for International Trade.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, the minister's response is a bit more positive than it was at the press conference this morning. I would encourage him to quickly prepare a plan and table it before Parliament.

I have a separate question for the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker. On Monday the National Transportation Agency issued a licence to kill VIA Rail services. VIA management can now reduce or eliminate routes without the bothersome process of actually asking the people affected what they think.

Will the minister make good on his government's alleged commitment to consultation? Will this government move to overturn the agency's decision?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I was hoping my friend would return to Brander-Smith so I can improve my answers.

No, I do not think that the decision will make any difference to the vigilance which the government will show toward all of the VIA routes in this country. The last VIA route cuts were as a result of a determination as to where we could best spend the taxpayers' money. I think the results speak for themselves and I should not be worried if I were the travelling public.

MARINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport and it concerns his government's plan to force Canadian shippers to pay user fees for the services of the Coast Guard.

Given the declining state of our shipping and harbour industry across Canada and the outright condemnation of this plan by the St. Lawrence Economic Development Council, how can the minister force Canadian shippers to pay these onerous user fees, knowing full well that this will destroy the competitiveness of the marine industry along the St. Lawrence Seaway, particularly in the province of Quebec which will be the hardest hit?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the government makes no apologies for looking at how we can best serve the shipping public and the Canadian taxpayer in organizing the Department of Transport. To that end we have looked at cost recovery and my hon. friend makes it sound as though it is a fait accompli. He knows very well that it is a consultation process. It is going on in the marine mode, it is going on in the aviation mode. Furthermore, my hon. friend also knows that the deadline for input to me was extended from November 1, 1990 to February 1, 1991 just last week.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): My supplementary is for the same minister. This government, through its ill-conceived policies, also makes no apologies for derailing our trains, grounding our planes and bringing our airlines to a halt, and now they are trying to sink the shipping industry.

Now that it is clear that these user fees will devastate the competitive edge of the marine industry, will he come to his senses and reject and revoke the implementation of these damaging user fees to the marine industry?

• (1150 )

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as of now there are no "these user fees". There is a consultation process with the industry under way. I will await the end of that consultation process before I make any decision. That is when the decision will be made, based on consultation, not the way the Liberal Party used to do it.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Employees at Pratt and Whitney were informed yesterday that there would be layoffs because of orders cancelled as a result of the recession created by this government.

Will the government announce policies directed at getting Canada out of this recession, in order to help these employees and thousands of other Canadians who are losing their jobs? Are you going to do something?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I agree, Pratt and Whitney made those announcements yesterday, but I wish my colleague would consider that since 1984, this company, located in Longueuil near Montreal, has considerably increased its work force and in fact has hired several thousand new workers.

It is a fact that at the present time, the aviation industry, and especially engine construction, is experiencing a slowdown, not just in Canada—because this is not specific to Canada—but throughout the world.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard: I find it rather amusing to see members of the Liberal Party so upset, because six years ago, Madam Speaker, in 1982, they cut 2,500 jobs!

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): The Liberal Party isn't upset. Thousands of workers are upset because they are losing their jobs as a result of this government's economic policies.

How many jobs do we have to lose before you decide to fire your incompetent minister of Finance?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): During the past six years, the Conservative government's economic policies have had positive results. Millions of jobs have been created. Of course, it is not the opposition's role to focus on the number of businesses that were created in Canada during that time.

We have every confidence in the Minister of Finance, far more than in the series of ministers of Finance we had under the previous Liberal government, Madam Speaker!

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry.

Our forests are in a crisis with the softwood lumber tariff and this government's high dollar, high interest rate policy. Forestry agreements which will help research and reforest our harvested areas expired months ago and we now learn that the minister has less than 30 per cent of the necessary funds to finance an agreement with British Columbia.

Why has the minister failed to sign an agreement, despite his many commitments that he would do so?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, we all know it takes two to tango and two to sign an agreement.

As my hon. friend knows—most Liberals might not know this, but that is a sort of a given.

An hon. member: Most people understand that.

Mr. Oberle: Most people understand that.

The fact of the matter is that we have had a very attractive offer, consistent with the strong commitment to forestry by the federal government, filed with the province of British Columbia and other provinces. I have announced recently that unless the offer is taken up that I would have to consider some other options.

I can inform my hon. friend that my counterpart in British Columbia has just recently sent me a letter expressing his interest in getting on with signing the agreement.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, it is about time we had some action from this government and the government of British Columbia on the forest agreements.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: The Auditor General's report states that plans for a national inventory of our forest resources are on hold because of the failure of the minister to sign these agreements with six provinces across the country.

The minister has already gone on the record saying that he would go it alone in British Columbia if an agreement was not signed. Will he go it alone across this country to ensure we get a proper inventory of our forest resource?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, one of the priorities and the principles that I have dictated be included in the new agreements deals very much with the requirement for longer term planning and for a more accurate data base.

Most provinces agree that this is one of the necessities and we are structuring the agreements to accommodate these kinds of things.

In terms of what the Auditor General said, I do not know what report my hon. friend read, but I could not find any text that would come anywhere close to what he is alleging.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Recently the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council added its voice to the rising chorus of those concerned about this government's transportation policies. The viability of the port of Halifax is being threatened by the ports in New York and U.S. rail lines. By the way, the port of Halifax contributes over half a billion dollars to the Atlantic economy and is responsible for thousands of jobs.

Will the minister finally address this pending economic disaster, order Canadian National Railways to upgrade its track between Montreal and Toronto, and take steps immediately to ensure that Ontario and Quebec bound container traffic is not being spirited away to the U.S. eastern seaboard ports.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I am fully aware, Madam Speaker, of the concerns of the east coast, especially the port of Halifax, vis-à-vis transportation. I have toured the port of Halifax by helicopter and I have met with the Harbour Port Commission. We discussed their concerns for the future.

We presently have under way an initiative which we think will be helpful vis-à-vis the co-ordination of the two modes, rail and port. I am sure that my hon. friend will be interested in what we are doing. We think we can make some progress down there.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, the time for action by this minister is now. He has been made aware of the problem over the last six months on a number of occasions.

If he needs any further evidence that the threat is real, and the threat is today, I have in my possession a document which was presented before the Interstate Commerce Commission by Hapag-Lloyd, who just happens to be the fourth largest shipper into the port of Halifax. Their submission was in support of Canadian Pacific's acquisition of the D & H rail line which runs from the port of New York to the Quebec border. In it, they say:

> Hapag-Lloyd is very interested in developing improved and competitive alternatives to the Canadian markets of Montreal and Toronto—we urge the Commission to grant swift approval to the transaction—

When will the minister start taking his job seriously and start protecting Canadian jobs, instead of transporting Canadian jobs in the marine industry to the ports in New York and New Jersey?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I want to advise the House, Madam Speaker, that I have been made aware of the concerns of the port of Halifax by colleagues on this side of the House. My hon. friend has never once raised them in this House.

I want to inform my hon. friend that CN is presently upgrading the line between Halifax and Montreal. Those things are already being acted upon.

An hon. member: That's right.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Earlier today the minister said in answer to a previous question that "the panel on the Rafferty-Alameda dam project was working". If the panel is working so well, can he tell us today why every single one of them quit?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the panel became increasingly concerned that work was continuing on the Rafferty dam beyond what they understood their terms of reference to be. At that point the panel quit.

• (1200 )

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

The affidavit by the Premier of Saskatchewan states: "I also kept my appointment with the chief of staff of the Prime Minister". Earlier today the Acting Prime Minister told us that there was no deal that was made and that was confirmed by the Minister of the Environment.

Could the minister please tell us what was the purpose of that meeting between Mr. Spector, the chief of staff of the office of the Prime Minister, and the Premier of Saskatchewan? What else was it for?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe that Mr. Spector was at that time the Deputy Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations. It would not be surprising that he would meet a provincial premier.

I think that if the hon. member, and indeed the House, would like to wait for the court process to carry forward in its normal process, they will find affidavits among others by Mr. Spector filed in the court.

BILL C-258

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, Bill C-258, an Act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities, was reviewed by a legislative committee on October 12, 1990.

As Chairman of this committee, I have the honour to present the Bill to the House, without amendment. I want to thank the hon. members for their diligent and conscientious work. Now that I have completed my job, I also want to thank the Speaker for giving me the honour of chairing this legislative committee.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-92, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I submit a petition from a number of petitioners from across Ontario concerning the issue of labelling of food products.

This petition is the result of some very severe allergy reactions that resulted in deaths of young people across Canada, and in particular Robyn Allen, age 15, who passed away as a result of food allergies.

The petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada and parliamentarians to amass legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods in place of the general classification. Also, the petitioners ask that restauranteurs and food retailers be required to provide customers with a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present the first in a whole series of petitions that I hope other members will be presenting. It is from volunteer fire departments in the province of Nova Scotia.

This particular petition is from the volunteer fire department in Bedford, Nova Scotia. This volunteer fire department has been there for a long period of time, as have volunteer fire departments been providing volunteer necessary services across the country.

They are asking the government to review its position whereby volunteer fire departments and other emergency services are now having to pay full licensing fees for all radio equipment that they have. The petitioners humbly ask the government to reconsider this policy. As volunteer fire services, they are finding that this increased fee, which they see as a tax, will take away from their effectiveness in providing safe and reliable service to their communities.

AGRICULTURAL SUPPLY MANAGEMENT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition to the House on behalf of several constituents of Stormont—Dundas who share in the concern of dairy and poultry farmers across Canada that their marketing systems may be in jeopardy due to the implementation of the free trade agreement and the current round of GATT negotiations.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to instruct the government to hold the Canadian supply-management system up as a sound method of agriculture to the rest of the world and for the federal government to protect the system in its entirety during the current round of GATT talks.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I have another petition I would like to table, pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is a privilege also to table this petition on behalf of my colleague from Mount Royal.

These petitioners from Toronto are very concerned about the tax on books and other publications. When we are trying to develop more literacy across the country, these petitioners are asking the government to reconsider applying a GST to reading materials.

VISITOR VISA APPLICATIONS AT THE HIGH COMMISSIONS IN ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN, AND NEW DELHI, INDIA

Question No. 372—Mr. Lee:

In 1989, for the High Commission in (a) Islamabad, Pakistan (b) New Delhi, India, how many visitors' visa applications were (i) received (ii) rejected (iii) approved (iv) issued?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): a) During 1989 the High Commission in Islamabad, Pakistan received 8274 visitor visa applications. During the same period, 4277 applicants were refused, and 7065 visas were issued.

b) In New Delhi during 1989, 29,241 visitor visa applications were received; 11,209 applicants were rejected, and 26,482 visas were issued.

Please note that statistics maintained do not identify "applications approved" as distinct from "visas issued".

STUDENT VISA APPLICATIONS AT THE COMMISSION IN HONG KONG AND THE HIGH COMMISSION IN NEW DELHI, INDIA

Question No. 373—Mr. Lee:

In 1989, for the High Commission in (a) Hongkong (b) New Delhi, India, how many student visa applications were (i) received (ii) rejected (iii) approved (iv) issued?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Following are statistics for students as requested:

| | Applications Received | Rejected | Visas Issued |
|---|---|---|---|
| (a) Hong Kong | 8,475 | 1,423 | 7,267 |
| (b) New Delhi | 645 | 67 | 457 |

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, it is with deep regret that I must raise another point of order following a verbal commitment by the Chair relating to the oral question period. Yesterday, my colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu, was allowed to ask a short question out of charity. Today you did the same thing for me.

My colleagues and myself met with the Speaker to ensure we are treated fairly in this House and allowed to ask real questions to the government. Again today, after you let us ask a short question, the Minister was allowed to go on and on while we could not even reply.

Madam Speaker, there was a formal agreement to give my colleagues and myself permission to ask questions, including a supplementary, like any other member of the opposition. After the Speaker ruled yesterday that we had the right to sit as full members of this House, I do not understand your attitude at all. It is strange but the same thing happens every time you are in the Chair.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lapierre: I would like to know, Madam Speaker, what is your own policy regarding the oral question period?

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate to the Chamber that we on this side believe in justice in Question Period as well.

I hope that in any ruling the Chair may make, it may take into account the fact that there are about 100 back-benchers on this side who would love nothing more than their fair share of questions every Question Period.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am startled, to say the least, by the hon. member for Shefford's comments, who refers both to today's events and to events that took place yesterday, when someone else was in the Chair. In any event, I will gladly discuss the issue with the hon. member in my chambers, which is the proper place for that. I think that the Canadian citizens and the members of this House will understand how sorry I am that the hon. member for Shefford chose not to ask a question when given the floor. That is his choice, not that of the Chair.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA PROJECT

Madam Deputy Speaker: A request having been made pursuant to Standing Order 52, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton East.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am rising to ask you to consider the possibility of an emergency debate on the issue of the construction of the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

In light of the revelations by way of sworn affidavit not only of the premier of Saskatchewan, but also in light of other affidavits, there appears to be a tremendous contradiction, and I am being charitable, between the position taken by the Minister of the Environment federally, and the premier of Saskatchewan on the issue of the Rafferty-Alameda.

One could argue that this matter will be dealt with in the course of the jurisprudence over the next few days. We heard from the Leader of the Opposition today that, as we speak, the equipment is continuing to work 24 hours a day seeking to complete construction of the Rafferty portion of the dam prior to the federal government taking any court action.

Not less than about 10 days ago in the House, we heard the Minister of the Environment state categorically that he was going to do everything in his power to immediately halt construction of the Rafferty-Alameda dam. Since that time, we have had a series of contradictory and confusing statements emanating directly from the minister and stall tactics on the part of the government. In particular, we have a situation where the federal Minister of the Environment, having promised in the House, that he personally was going to move to—

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have heard what the hon. member for Hamilton East was telling me and wanted to go on telling me. I think that all the members of this House as well as all Canadians are well aware of the importance of the environmental problems, especially as regards the Rafferty-Alameda dam right now. We have been discussing this issue for almost an hour and we discussed it for a full day very recently. This is no doubt an important question. I simply wanted to provide the hon. member with an explanation, even though I was not required to. However, I do not think that it would be appropriate to set aside the matters before the House today in order to have an emergency debate. Maybe some other time.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Speller (p. 15039)

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to respond on behalf of my party to the motion placed before the House by the member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

It is a very timely motion to be debating in the House as we witness the unfolding of the GATT negotiations on the one hand, and the extremely tough times which Canadian farm families are facing on the other.

Farming has never been easy in this country. The vagaries of weather and markets, and the mechanization of the farm industry and its effect on the farm community have all contributed to a great deal of uncertainty over the years and never made farming an easy way of life. However, the current crisis bears more serious attention than it has been getting. Part of the problem is that as the farm population dwindles, it becomes less and less significant, politically. Therefore, the issues pertaining to agriculture have received much less attention than they should have because of the very significant role of agriculture, not only in our national economy but particularly because of rural Canada where one-third of Canadians still live.

This decline goes all the way back to 1981. That is why I would like to put a few figures before the House that we, as members, might look at as we contemplate what is happening to the farm community.

For example, in 1989 farmers received only 80 per cent of the income for livestock and grains that they produced that they received in 1981. In other words, from 1981 to 1989, the amount that they received in cash for their production was only 80 per cent of the original figure. At the same time, production costs went up 150 per cent. So you can see that the gap between what farmers receive for their products, through the marketplace, as compared to what they have to pay in expenses has opened up very, very significantly.

This year alone we are looking at a 37 per cent drop in net farm income and a 60 per cent cut in the province of Saskatchewan, the province from which I come and where my father still farms and where I still live, a proud mortgage payer on a half section of land which I have at this point rented out.

This is not merely a statistical problem. This is very much a human problem. Obviously, when you go that long with such a big gap between income and expenses, the debt load piles up, particularly with the high interest rate policies which first Liberal governments and then Conservative governments have consistently pursued, ensuring that farmers who got into the industry, in the sixties to the mid-seventies, have continually been paying very high charges on the money that they have borrowed.

This has not only created uncertainty in the farm community, but it has now come to the point where the debt the younger generation is taking on is even dragging down their parents. Parents offer collateral for loans that the younger generation has taken on, never dreaming that their retirement incomes would suddenly be wiped out as creditors come calling. This is happening repeatedly throughout rural Canada.

As well, there is an increase in stress for farm families as income earners need to go to other provinces to bring home income to keep the farms going. This creates all kinds of stress, not only on the farm families but it also robs the community of its base of people who can keep community activities going. Furthermore, we have a real sense of hopelessness. Young people do not want to farm and are looking for the first opportunity to get off the farm if only they could get their money out. This is certainly not the kind of scenario where a vibrant, rural community can evolve.

Part of our problem is that we have always looked exclusively at agriculture and not looked at what is happening to the population. We have accepted this decline because we have not looked at the population and made the maintenance of a rural and farm population one of our goals and priorities as a society.

Part of the problem is that the real crisis with regard to the rural population has been masked somewhat by the phenomenon around urban centres where there has been a great deal of acreage development and a moving of people from the cities to the rural areas around cities. I certainly have no opposition to that. There are a lot of people who have done that around the city of Prince Albert. The community of Spruce Home, where I live, has a lot of people who have moved out from the city. Nevertheless, this inflates the rural numbers which show up in census figures while the actual fact is that the genuine rural community that is not influenced by an urban centre close by has been in deep trouble. For example, in Saskatchewan between 1981 and 1989 we have had a decrease of 1,000 farmers a year, down to 60,000, in spite of all the claims previous governments made to support the farming sector.

Currently, of those 60,000 farmers, 10,000 are living with the daily threat of foreclosure. They have received notice of foreclosure and are currently at some stage in the process of losing some or all of their farm assets. Those 10,000 farmers could well be gone in the very near future, given the cash flow situation on the prairies. It is a very cruel joke that there are wonderful crops of grain but there is no market for it and no money for it when it is sold.

This spills over into small-town Canada. If you look again at my home province of Saskatchewan, of the 701 communities there 303, almost half the communities in the province, the population has diminished since 1986. That represents failed businesses, closed schools, and a lack of services right across rural Saskatchewan. In many ways, this same situation pertains to many other parts of the country.

When we look at the whole process of what has happened to agriculture, we can look back to the year 1969 and the task force report on agriculture. That report essentially said that two out of three farmers were inefficient and had to go. The report was roundly condemned by all sectors of the farm community. It was never fully adopted by any government. Certainly, the Liberal government of the day did not embrace it with open arms and the Conservative government since then has not embraced it.

However, in my mind the policies included in that, the acceptance of the notion that two out of three farmers were inefficient and had to go, has served as the underpinning of agricultural policy in this country. The trend outlined in that task force report has clearly been operative since that time.

The rural community has finally recognized what is happening and is saying: "We have retreated long enough. We fought enough rear-guard actions. We have to draw the line". There will be no more retreat by rural Canadians when it comes to their way of life, their population and their future.

The motion deals with a number of underpinnings which have made it possible to maintain what we have now by way of a rural community, as well as in the future. Certainly, orderly marketing and supply management have worked in most respects very well. That is why I find it very distressing that they are under attack.

They are under attack by editorialists in this country. It is an ill-informed and virulent attack, reminiscent in many ways of the attack by Mrs. Beryl Plumptre and others during the late 1970s who were supposedly fighting inflation and were using that as a platform to attack farm incomes. Many Canadians believe that marketing boards never recovered from the attacks launched on it.

At the same time we have the waffling of a government that says on one hand it fully supports supply management, but on the other hand introduced a free trade agreement which allows much greater access of American exports into the Canadian market. That goes along with an equivalent producer subsidy analysis of farm subsidies at GATT which end up greatly distorting the true picture of subsidies in Canadian agriculture, because that formula includes the prices farmers get under supply-management as a subsidy. That is not correct at all. That is a price that is coming out of the marketplace and is not a subsidy. However, with the way we have allowed the GATT negotiations to proceed, that is considered a subsidy and something we are prepared to put on the table. When it comes to supply management and subsequent discussions, what we have to get away from, not only in this country but internationally is the whole beggar thy neighbor approach to world trade and agriculture where the multinational corporations are allowed to control the price of agriculture production around the world. They ratchet down the prices to farmers and ratchet up the input costs, leaving farmers poorer and competing with each other for a shrinking over-all farm dollar.

We do not want to make farmers in Europe, the United States or the Third World any poorer. I am worried that the so-called liberalization of trade that we see is essentially an abandonment of the world trade system to the multinational corporate sector and will do nothing but further depress farm incomes around the world.

Something that affects farmers in my part of the country very much is the whole question of the Crow benefit. The Crow rate was an historic agreement in this country. In my mind it was a part of the west's constitutional deal with Canada. It allowed us to move our product to export markets as part of a deal we had with the rest of Canada to make it viable to produce grain on the prairies. That was undermined by preceding Liberal governments which chipped away at it through the Western Grain Transportation Act.

The Crow benefit is under attack again. This is an attack that the farm community has almost unanimously resisted through their farm organizations. It is under attack through the transportation task force which very much distorted the whole grain transportation picture and its analysis. It came out with a very tilted kind of analysis in favour of a pay-the-producer type of regime. At the same time, our government bureaucrats and people making these decisions are continuing the undermining of the Crow benefit by using GATT as an excuse to get rid of the benefit to prairie farmers.

The point is that the U.S. or any of the other trading partners have never said that the Crow benefit is a problem to them. That is a problem we are imposing on ourselves.

The government argues that it has provided all kinds of money to agriculture over the last number of years and indeed it has. A lot of that money has been ad hoc. A lot of that money that has been given to the farming community shows that the government is essentially schizophrenic in its approach to agriculture. On the one hand there is a supposed commitment to supply management and orderly marketing. On the other hand, oats are removed from the Wheat Board and the free trade deal very soon will allow competition with the Wheat Board in our Canadian markets.

When it comes to grain, one sees the elimination of the fuel rebate, new costs to crop insurance and the flip-flop on grain cash advances which undermines orderly marketing. Then the government comes forward with task force reports. The farm community looks forward to these task force reports with some openness of mind and with some hope that a more coherent approach to agriculture will result.

To give credit to the government, the whole picture has not fully come into focus as yet. The Gross Revenue Income Plan, GRIP, reminds me very much of the plan that we proposed in the last federal election whereby grain producers would be assured the cost of production on their first $8,000 of production. That would be a guaranteed price on a guaranteed amount of production. It would give farmers certainty and it would be simple to administer. It was something the NDP proposed in the election and was very well received. The closer the GRIP program comes to that kind of concept, the better it will work.

The NISP, the Net Income Stabilization Plan, I fear is going to help only those farmers who already have a substantial net income. This would apply to the older farmers and leave the younger farmers in the situation where they are virtually as high and dry as they are now. If we look at what is happening in my own province of Saskatchewan, the average family income of the Saskatchewan farmer from agriculture this year will be $5,000. There is no family in Canada that can live on $5,000. Some immediate help is needed and also some long-term income insurance.

• (1230)

While I am speaking of the net farm income picture with regard to farm families, however, I would like to make note of another issue that is not often addressed in this House. That is the situation confronting the combined income farmers in this country. At least 50 per cent of the farmers by now rely to some degree or other on off-farm income to maintain their family income. This is hardly surprising when the income from farming averages $5,000.

What happens to these farmers is that they are subject to the Income Tax Act which does nothing but creates uncertainty for them through something called section 31 of the Income Tax Act. This section makes very uncertain whether farmers who have off-farm income can write off their farm losses against that income, something that every other business in this country can do. Farmers, however, are subject to section 31 of the Income Tax Act which allows Revenue Canada to determine whether that is a bona fide loss or not. It can adjust a farmer's taxation in accordance with its rulings which are very vague, which are very general, and which are very hard to apply in advance. In fact, Revenue Canada is able to go after a farmer for as long as four years after the last tax filing and reassess that farmer's income.

While farmers are putting their own money into their own income insurance plans and their own investment into their farms, they are doing so with the threat that the tax man can come along and lop off their heads in one fell swoop with application of section 31 of the Income Tax Act. I plead with this government to look at that act. As the farm income situation has worsened more and more farmers are vulnerable to that kind of situation, and it needs to be dealt with.

In the last minutes that I have left I would like to indicate briefly some of the policies that our party would like to advocate to ensure that there are no more retreats for rural Canada, that we do not have to turn around and fight any more rear guard actions.

First, we need to plough ahead with the whole safety net concept. We have to make sure that we recognize that this industry cannot be solely market driven, that there needs to be intervention by the public sector, that we need to work together co-operatively, and that the orderly marketing system is what is going to keep us afloat in the future.

These programs will not be in effect until next year, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture said. This year in Saskatchewan alone we need $1.1 billion to maintain the farmers there at their current very poor net income level. We need an immediate injection of cash into the farm community.

We need lower interest rates in the farm community. No sector has suffered more from high interest rates than the farm sector. We need reform of the Farm Credit Corporation so that it is not just acting like another lender out there in the marketplace and that in fact it uses its potential role to set up new farmers, to keep farmers in business, to provide long-term leasing provisions and to provide low interest rates so that farmers are not continually caught, generation after generation, paying interest on the farm debt, buying the farm from each other, and keeping each other at a low income level and in uncertainty generation after generation.

We need to make sure that our rural infrastructure does not deteriorate any further. We have to stop the closure of post offices which undermines rural communities. We have to make sure that rural services by VIA Rail and the rural highway system are maintained. We have to make sure that the co-operative sector is not sunk by the GST being applied to investments and to co-operative dividends so that rural communities and farmers can keep organizing co-operatives, as they have so successfully in the past to help themselves.

In conclusion, I am very happy that we have been able to address question. In this country people still want to farm. We have the land to farm on. The world still needs our food. All we lack is the vision or the political will to make sure that we maintain a vibrant farm community in the future.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I salute the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. When the member talked about a vision toward the end of his speech, I thought immediately of a saying of John F. Kennedy. When he decided to take on the space project in 1961 he said: "We are going to put a man on the moon". Nobody really knew the various technical ramifications and complexities involved in putting a man on the moon. But, because he had a vision, he was able to rally the people of the United States of America. People from all walks of life, professionals and school kids worked toward that common cause.

When I listened to the member today I heard about the various things we in this country have been doing for agriculture. He talked about the various aspects of life affected by agriculture. It seems that we have to develop a whole new equation, not unlike the equation that John F. Kennedy developed when he put a man on the moon.

Traditionally we have been a country where our thought process has been measuring strength by bankers we know and armaments we build, but maybe we should be shifting our thought process to becoming a nation that measures its strength by the mouths we feed and the environment we protect. When we get into a thought process where we measure our nation's strength by how many people we feed and how much environment we protect, we are talking about a totally new language.

The member was born, raised, and is now involved in this field. My question to him is: Is it not time that we should develop totally new approaches to measuring the strength of agriculture in our country, its role in our country and its relationships with other countries around the world and to measuring true strength in terms of a country?

Mr. Funk: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood very much for his very thoughtful question.

He captured in some ways where I believe we need to be heading. As I tried to outline in my speech, part of our problem has been that we lack that kind of a vision. We had it when we originally settled this country. John A. Macdonald's national policy was one of filling up the countryside. Nowadays we would apply an EARP process to the whole matter of cutting down trees, developing roads, and so on. Nevertheless, at that time we had a broad vision of the development of this country which really excited the imagination not only of the country but of the whole world as immigrants poured into this country. We developed rail networks and other infrastructure around the development of the rural community in its capacity to produce food not only for Canada but for the world.

Gradually we have lost that. It is hard to say whether it was the chicken or egg first in this case, whether we lost the vision and thus became vulnerable to death by a thousand wounds of the farm or rural community as one program and another were developed which undermined not only the economics and the population base but the broader vision of the rural community.

It is a very sound approach to analysing the future. I am glad in the sense that the government has included sustainability as part of the four pillars to which it wants to address itself. I have some skepticism about that, given the fact that the government's over-all approach is clearly one of having a more market driven economy and of letting the chips fall where they may, a kind of approach which many of us feel in no way will lead us toward a more sustainable future.

Nevertheless, it is on the table and part of that certainly has to be a new sense that we are protecting a large environment as well. We are not only producers of food. We are custodians of a vast percentage of the earth's land service. We have a trust. It is to look after this land not only for our own future populations but for the world at large so that it stays productive in future generations.

We can encompass that kind of vision. We can come to terms with what that really means and set some firm, concrete objective for ourselves in terms of no more rural depopulation, maintenance of rural services, or what we want to do as a society. I think we can make great progress.

Two very specific things need to be done right now to start that process along. First, I am very concerned that the task forces, as good as they are, have no unifying theme. No analysis is to be done or is available or nothing else is envisioned that will tie all those task forces together into a comprehensive view of where all this takes us. It is still going to be a fragmented approach as each task force reports in each sector.

We will not know whether we stay in retreat or whether in fact we move forward on a comprehensive basis, at least not on the basis of what is being done through the task forces.

The global view has to be included as part of the process, and that is not part of it. We need to tie together our thinking on rural development as well. There are a lot of very creative thinkers around this country, both in the academic community and in farm organizations such as the wheat pools, the Farmers' Union and a vast number of other farm organizations. Also there are some very creative thinkers at the community level.

People do not want to see these communities decline. They have good ideas.

We need to develop a mechanism to tie together rural development thinking and take it forward on a sustained basis, in a manner that we as parliamentarians can have input and show some national leadership to achieve what the member so eloquently suggested, a new vision whereby we measure ourselves by the mouths we feed and the environment we protect.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I just want to comment briefly on the hon. member's speech.

I was struck by the frankness and especially the depth of the hon. member's speech. I can say that as the member for Chambly, a riding next door to that of Madam Speaker, and in fact after actually living in Madam Speaker's riding, in the small town of Saint-Barnabé-Sud, I have known for a long time that farmers are extremely worried about— The Tories on the other side seem to think this is funny. I don't think it is funny at all.

The people in my riding and the town where I live, the farmers, are very worried. You can smile all you want. You can smile while you are the government, but you won't be there much longer!

What I was saying, Madam Speaker, is that the farmers are worried for two reasons: first, they see a government that poses a daily threat, with programs like the GST, with interest rates so high they can't even survive, and free trade, Madam Speaker. They already have a problem with the GATT talks, which according to Department of Agriculture are expected to cause general farm income to drop 25 percent this year. Madam Speaker, this is sickening.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member. The period for questions and comments has expired.

[English]

There is no time for a rebuttal. Debate, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to participate in this debate on the motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

We are talking today about the worry that Canadian farmers have concerning these negotiations on the GATT. Canadian farmers want us to be speaking in the House of Commons on the policies of this government with regard to agriculture. And, of course, as I said previously, they are extremely concerned.

[Translation]

Canadian dairy farmers, and especially those in Glengarry—Prescott-Russell, as I said earlier, feel threatened. There are about 1,000 dairy farmers in my riding. I see the Secretary of State for External Affairs across the way, and I know he is very familiar with the electoral district of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I have good reason to believe he visits my riding at least once a week, in fact just a few kilometres from my home.

He is familiar with farming in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. He has a chance to see farming firsthand, since it is the main industry in my riding.

Madam Speaker, Canadian farmers are worried about the message being sent by the government opposite. On October 15 in the House of Commons, the Minister for International Trade said, and I quote verbatim from Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, on October 1, we had to file at Geneva, together with other countries involved in this negotiation, an estimate of the costs of various programs in effect in Canada to assist agriculture. The total was $8.8 billion. The Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed at the amount of assistance he is giving Canadian farmers. It is a huge amount of assistance.

Madam Speaker, the Minister for International Trade may have said this jokingly, but I can assure you his comments are disturbing. I hope no one in this country shares the minister's view that we have $8.8 billion worth of farm subsidies, that we should be ashamed of the amount of assistance being given to Canadian farmers and that it is a huge amount. That is not true.

First of all, if we talk about Canadian dairy farmers and the net worth of the supply management systems in this country, the fact that the price paid to farmers or, if you prefer, the fact that farmers have a guaranteed income for their products, that is, a guaranteed income per unit, the more efficient they are, the bigger their profits. So what is guaranteed is not the farmer's profits but the price he gets for his milk, and that is calculated according to a formula based on production costs.

Some people have put a value of $2.2 billion on this. However, Madam Speaker, this is merely an assumption, because the federal government's grants to dairy farmers total $266 millions, which is only 10 per cent of that amount. There are those who would see this as a subsidy. I say it is a non-existent subsidy.

• (1250)

[English]

I have in front of me an article which appeared recently in The Ottawa Citizen. It is about a farmer by the name Nathan Harris from Renfrew county. Mr. Harris was complaining to The Ottawa Citizen about a story that had been written concerning subsidies to agriculture. He had been complaining with reason. I will read the article:

> Specifically, he was worried—not to say fuming just a bit—about an Oct. 17 column by Citizen columnist John Hay on the subject of farm subsidies.
> "This sort of report," said Harris, "is totally unacceptable."
> What particularly irked him was Hay's statement that Canadian dairy farmers "cream off" $2.2 billion a year in government subsidies. (Harris also wasn't very happy at Hay's description of Canada's dairy supply management program: "price-fixing and supply-rigging by marketing boards.")
> That subsidy figure was wildly inflated, said Harris. After all, there are about 36,000 dairy farmers in Canada and $2.2 billion would average out to something like $60,000 per farmer—
> The $2.2. billion—is not a government payment to dairy farmers. In fact, about 85 per cent of it—$1.87 billion—is accounted for by the difference between the Canadian domestic price and the prevailing world price for dairy products.

Obviously, Mr. Harris is quite correct in pointing out that dairy farmers do not get anything like that from the federal government. The article states further:

> Still, when I asked columnist Hay the source of his figures, his answer was immediate: "The government of Canada." The federal trade department—

That is the same department that is led by the Minister for International Trade who is telling us that the Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed of giving, according to him, so much help to the farming community. Jane Huntley of Dairy Farmers of Canada explained the facts. She stated:

This so-called prevailing world price for dairy products includes producer subsidies that other countries give to their producers. This has an effect of lowering the price artificially in those countries. The difference between our price and the artificially lowered price is deemed to be a subsidy.

It does not take an economic genius to know that that does not make sense. If their prices are artificially deflated, then surely we should not take the difference between them and our price in order to arrive at what is the so-called rightful price.

In any case, what difference does it make when our supply management system is designed to sustain our Canadian consumers and not for export. In other words, supply management is not a trade distortion measure. Because it is not, the whole point of what the Minister for International Trade said in reply to that question on October 15, 1990 in the House of Commons is wrong.

Those from other countries who are telling us that our dairy farmers are getting these kinds of subsidies are wrong. As I said previously, the dairy farmers of Canada get only about 10 to 15 per cent of the amount that some have claimed our farmers are getting.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, let us not misread public opinion in this country. I have here a document prepared by the Dairy Farmers of Canada concerning a poll carried out earlier this year by Goldfarb Consultants.

The findings by Goldfarb Consultants were as follows: 85 per cent of the people who responded to this poll described the job done by Canadian dairy farmers as either good or excellent; 77 per cent felt that Canadian dairy farmers did a job as good or better than their counterparts in other countries; 79 per cent felt that the lives of dairy farmers are very hard; and 94 per cent that dairy producers scrupulously meet the standards of the industry.

If I were a Tory member, Madam Speaker, I would envy these findings.

I can assure you that the level of trust which Canadian consumers have in our agricultural industry is far greater than their level of trust in the government opposite.

Madam Speaker, some may feel that it is not important for our industry to be self-reliant. Again, you know, the same poll revealed other interesting facts. To wit: 94 per cent of Canadians feel that it is important for the Canadian dairy industry to be self-reliant. The following question brought to light some interesting facts: What importance should the dairy industry have in Canada? One choice was: important enough to meet our own needs with surpluses to export. Seventy-five per cent of Canadians agreed with this statement. Madam Speaker, this demonstrates the Canadians' trust in the system.

To conclude, Madam Speaker, I should like to quote a statement which the Minister of Finance made on October 15 in this House, as reported on page 14138 in Hansard: "But you cannot go to heaven without dying." Madam Speaker, I can tell you that my colleagues and I will not allow Canadian farmers to die a slow death.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too am very pleased to be speaking in the House today in support my colleague's motion "that in the upcoming GATT negotiations and in over-all economic policies, the government recognize the essential role played by farmers in maintaining the Canadian way of life".

I believe it is essential that the government be given a strong message. The message is that Canada's farmers deserve our loyalty and our support, that the principles on which these people built their livelihoods must be maintained.

The GATT negotiations are on the minds of all Canadian farmers today. Agricultural subsidies are seen by many observers to be at the centre of the current round of GATT negotiations. Many questions still remain as to the possible outcome of these talks.

These questions, as we all know, have an enormous impact on our agricultural sector in Canada. There could be major repercussions for the farmers in my community of Nepean as an example.

Let me briefly outline the Canadian government's proposal that it took to the GATT negotiation table. The position is as follows. First, 100 per cent elimination of all existing export subsidies over a ten-year period; second, all non-tariff barriers, other than supply management will be converted to their tariff equivalents; third, new tariff equivalents will be reduced by 50 per cent over a ten-year period and at the end of the ten-year period no tariff will be greater than 20 per cent; fourth, eliminate meat import laws and replace them with the safeguard measures provided in Article XIX of the GATT; fifth, reduce by 50 per cent all trade distorting internal support programs over a ten-year period; sixth, double all allowable amounts of supply managed imports entering Canada to 5 per cent, subject to U.S. and EEC participation.

Madam Speaker, let me speak specifically to the issue of supply management. Let me preface it by saying that this position represents the minimum requirement for Canadian farmers.

The Canadian government has made the fundamental mistake, right from the outset, of offering 5 per cent on imports as their opening bid. According to the dairy industry, this is the bottom line position. I had occasion to sit at a meeting with half a dozen of the dairy farmers from my particular area of Ottawa-Carleton and they are very concerned about this. We will have to wait and see what will result from this blunder. I am standing here in the House today in order to encourage the government to hold to this bare minimum. There is no room for movement on this issue.

Canada's challenge at this point is to develop an economically viable agricultural industry that can compete successfully in a competitive and liberalized international trading environment. Canadian negotiators must keep this most basic goal in mind throughout the ongoing negotiating process.

• (1300)

Within this framework, Canada must work within the GATT, first, to create a fair and clear set of international trading rules for agriculture and, second, build a system where access to markets around the world would be increased through the reduction of world tariff and non-tariff barriers.

We, in the Liberal Party, feel it is through international trading arrangements that liberalization should occur, with less of a direct focus on the bilateral relationship with the United States. This is why the current Uruguay round of negotiations is so important. So far, the federal government has proven itself unable to get the backing for its Article XI proposal; far too willing to slash internal programs, including dairy programs by 50 per cent; and too agreeable in undermining supply management in Canada by negotiating the elimination of tariffs of all agricultural goods in the FTA.

It is essential for Canada to maintain its long held principles of supply management. In a country of this size, with pressures from all round, it is necessary to ensure the existence of safety nets. These safety nets are an essential part of the agricultural industry in Canada. Without them, the industry would be in quite dire circumstances. In order that a stable and secure agriculture industry be maintained in Canada, management must be sustained.

I also want to point out that it has not gone unnoticed that the federal government appears to be trying to play farm interests in the east against those in the west, in hopes of recovering western support. This is a very dangerous game. The federal government is not going to gain the support of one community at the expense of another community. This would fracture the Canadian farming community, and I consider this to be unacceptable and unprincipled. It is time for the federal government to adopt the role of a national, not regional, advocate.

The Canadian farmer deserves our support and a fair return on his investment of labour and love for farming. We should be refocusing our attention back towards self-sufficiency in food. This motion is an important symbol of our support for the Canadian farmers' efforts to feed Canadians in the years to come.

Canada has relied on its farmers in the past, and I believe that we will need to rely on them more in the future. It is up to us, here in this place, to show that we are on their side and that we want them to succeed.

In closing, I want to say that agriculture is an integral cog in the Canadian economy. Even more important, the Canadian farmer is of fundamental importance to the Canadian way of life and the well being of the Canadian nation.

It has been a real honour and a privilege to speak on this agricultural issue in the House today and to indicate my support to the farming industry here in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, earlier today I paid very close attention to the speeches of my two opposition colleagues, the one made by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and what was intended to be a speech by the member for Chambly. Mr. Speaker, what little hair I have on the head stood straight up.

I was very surprised to hear the hon. member for Chambly speak on agriculture in the House. I suspect he may never have seen a cow in his life and, in light of his remarks about farmers being against the GST, I would guess he knows precious little about the subject. Mr. Speaker, if anybody stands to benefit from the implementation of the GST, it has to be the farming community, and so far they have been enthusiastic about it.

As to my colleague the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, for whom I have a lot of respect and esteem, he at least—unlike the member for Chambly who just had the floor—knows what he is talking about because his riding is home to a good many agricultural producers. But that is as far as I can go in terms of congratulations to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. A moment ago he began preaching as he is wont to do, trying to tell us how considerate the Liberals are with farmers, how they see things, and how they have now discovered the pressing needs of the agricultural community in Quebec and in Canada.

Strange that we should hear that from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell. I can still remember back in 1983 when Jean Chrétien was the member for Saint-Maurice. Fed up because local farmers had demonstrated in front of his Shawinigan riding office he said to the newspapermen: "Farmers are a bunch of cry babies, and there is nothing we can do for them. The more they get, the more they want". That was Jean Chrétien's position in 1983-84. All of a sudden, Mr. Speaker, we find out that the Liberals are fascinated by agricultural issues.

I would suggest that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell review his speech, and while he is at it he should give a few pointers on agriculture to the member for Chambly who is in the House and who earlier made the worst speech on agriculture that I have heard so far in this session. I urge him to get together with his colleague in the agricultural caucus and ask for a few hints. Then he could come back to see me because back home we are familiar with the problems experienced by the farming community. In Saint-Maurice I have producers from practically all the farm specialties you are likely to see in Quebec.

The member for Chambly was making comparisons and concluded that agriculture is on the brink of disaster. He was referring to the riding of our Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, which happens to be next to his. Now and then he would be well advised to look around when he goes to Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of people who are unaware of this fact I can tell you that Saint-Hyacinthe agricultural producers are the richest and most highly rated. They are Quebec's producers who live in total prosperity and, in terms of agriculture, the riding stands second to none. That is a fact. We know these people have managed to rationalize their operations over the years, with the result that the Saint-Hyacinthe region has become extremely prosperous indeed. This should be obvious to anyone who visits the town of Saint-Hyacinthe the surrounding area, Mr. Speaker.

Next time, I suggest that before the hon. member for Chambly, rises in the House to speak to a subject he is totally unfamiliar with, he should at least do his homework. I realize members cannot be expected to know everything, Mr. Speaker. However, when a member takes the trouble to rise in the House to speak in debate as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott-Russell did earlier, although I do not agree with the hon. member, at least he knows about farming. And I wish the hon. member for Chambly would get this straight. A member does not take the floor just to provide window dressing, because he happens to be the only member from Quebec in his caucus. A member rises in the House when he has something worthwhile to say.

Mr. Speaker, today, I would like the House to consider for a moment the position being defended by Canadian negotiators in the last stretch of the Uruguay Round which is drawing to a close after four years of intense discussions by 98 GATT member states.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, although agriculture represents only of 15 negotiating groups in this GATT round, it has become the focus of attention because of its efforts to get out of the present impasse. The problem is due mainly to the failure of major farm product exporting and importing countries to establish some order in a market that is characterized by anarchy. The situation is also due to a lack of clearcut rules applying to all partners in the agricultural sector.

In accordance with the instructions issued by the president of the negotiating group on agriculture, on October 15 our country tabled its detailed proposal for use in the multilateral talks on agricultural trade. I may recall that this is merely an initial proposal, conditional on the commitment of other trading partners to clean up their agricultural trading practices.

Canada's proposal consists of four main components, to be implemented over a period of ten years. Mr. Speaker, I noticed the hon. member for Chambly was listening carefully to what I was saying. I may add, for his benefit, that what is important for Quebec farmers is that negotiations are taking place, and Canada is not the only country involved. Ninety-eight other countries are involved in the talks. So why the defeatist attitude? Why these cries of gloom and doom about the future of agriculture in Quebec and Canada?

When he came to Saint-Tite, in the Champlain riding, he said that as far as farming was concerned, within six months of the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement, Saint-Tite would become a ghost town. Well, today, in Saint-Tite and everywhere else in the Quebec heart land, farmers are living well; granted, they may be worried, but they trust us and know for sure that the government of Canada will stand steadfast in supporting them.

Having briefly described where I stand on this issue, Mr. Speaker, I thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hudon): Does the hon. member for Chambly wish to comment?

M. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian public in general must have been enlightened when they heard my friend the hon. member for Saint-Maurice. The way he took me to task is quite revealing about himself and his government. I must say that I understand, for I realize that my hon. colleague is very busy, having a great many things to do. He is very fond of his colleagues, and that is the reason why he spoke constantly while I was on my feet.

Mr. Pronovost: We indulge in psychology!

Mr. Edmonston: I am not sure he heard me. I am not sure either of his open mindedness. When dealing with the farm industry, I would say he demonstrated a certain narrow mindedness, if not out-right arrogance. Let me show you. He said: "The hon. member for Chambly is talking through his hat, but as representative of the Saint-Maurice riding, I do, and things are just fine". Frankly, Mr. Speaker, things are going badly! If I could only catch my hon. colleague's attention for one minute, I should like him to answer a question: Would you deny, in the House today, that the Minister of Agriculture has already predicted a 25 per cent loss of revenues in the farm industry? Twenty-five per cent! This information does not come from an Edmonston's report but a government's report. Find out for yourself! That is a fact. Of course there are farms in Saint-Hyacinthe which are doing well. But there are others, in Chambly and elsewhere, where the situation is bad, as the people will tell the hon. member for Saint-Maurice. Mr. Speaker, Jacques Proulx, of the UPA, will tell him that the situation is bad. Mr. and Mrs. Lareau are working a farm in my riding with their two sons, David and Martin.

This may seems strange to my hon. friend who will certainly refuse to believe me, but I spent a whole day working on Mr. and Mrs. Lareau's farm to find out what it meant to work on a dairy farm. Mr. Speaker, I had never worked on a farm. I am a newspaperman, a city boy. It is true. I am not trying to hide it.

Mr. Holtmann: Milk comes from cows!

Mr. Edmonston: That is right. But once elected, I decided that if ever I had to talk about the farm industry and other related problems, I should have a certain knowledge of the subject. Today, however, I don't think that the farmers both in Saint-Hyacinthe and Chambly deserved my colleague's remarks which were full of arrogance and showed a complete lack of information.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hudon): The hon. member for Saint-Maurice. A short reply please.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, even though I would have liked to give a more complete answer.

First of all, he accused me of attacking him. The hon. member for Chambly was the first one to rise in this House to unfairly attack government policies without valid arguments by talking about the GST, which will in fact benefit the agricultural sector in general, as the Quebec farmers union publicly recognizes. It is the kind of thing the hon. member for Chambly said to us.

Since he is a lemon expert, he should stick to his specialty and only take part in debates on the subject of defective cars. But, if he does not know anything about agricultural issues, he should leave the floor to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, to my colleague, the hon. member for Drummond, or to other knowledgeable members of this House instead of talking nonsense as he is doing today. It is quite regrettable, and he is misleading Quebec farmers.

[English]

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to state that it is admirable that my hon. colleague from the New Democratic Party would even enter the debate on agriculture. He recognizes that agriculture and agricultural issues are important to all Canadians. I welcome his intervention, but it is too bad that sometimes we have to get on a personality debate. I do not think that really adds to what we are trying to achieve here.

With respect to safety nets in the agricultural sector, I think the real safety net that Canadian farmers have today are the ministers responsible for agriculture, and the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister who made agriculture the subject of the GATT debate today under the Uruguay round. That is a safety net that no one opposite mentioned. In fact, it was the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds who came up with some very imaginative programs to assist Canadian farmers under terms that they would not be addressed under the present safety net systems or Western Grain Stabilization.

We have to remind Canadians that it was running deep in the hole financially and we as a government bailed it out. That was money that—

Mr. Funk: The farmers bailed it out.

Mr. Holtmann: And the government of Canada through the taxpayers of Canada bailed out the Western Grain Stabilization program. It was not an insignificant amount; hundreds of millions of dollars went into this.

Let us look at some of the other programs to deal with difficult times. It was the safety net thinking of the Minister of Agriculture that led him, with the approval of the Prime Minister, to spend $2.1 billion on special grains programs. That program alone probably saved more western farmers than almost any other program since World War II. That was a very, very significant program, paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. We admit it was ad hoc. Ad hoc programs are not the ones easily dealt with. It takes a tremendous amount of cash from the treasury. Clearly, we cannot forget that the safety net this country has does lie in the hands of a few men in control of our Department of Agriculture.

There can be criticism. I was in the House in the previous Parliament when, after announcing the few hundreds of millions of dollars in this program, the people in the opposition shouted that we should spend more. They were not even thinking that it does come from the taxpayers.

Earlier I heard the member from Saskatchewan saying that we need lots of low credit and lots of programs. Everything is "government will save the day for all the farmers". That is the sound of the old farmer's union group. There were a lot of people who knew how to become efficient farmers without first crying to the government.

Mr. Funk: A lot of them were farmer's union members.

• (1320 )

Mr. Holtmann: Farmers do not like to cry to the government. They like to make their own money and they like to be able to be in the free market system. This government is trying everything to get them back to the free market system and fair trade, to bring some sense to agricultural trade under GATT.

We have had to put some subsidization out. Let us not forget that the provinces were there, too, subsidizing, countering each other within this country. They are not innocent in putting money out to farmers. Maybe they have to, but we do not within our own country have a level playing field with regard to agricultural subsidies. I think that has to be addressed. I believe the first ministers of this country should get together from time to time and try to put in an equal program, not one that encourages artificial production at times, but something that gives us a level playing field.

When it comes to the politics of agriculture and what we should do in the future, we all know there is a new, you might say, right-wing party in western Canada called the Reform Party. It wants to make great inroads. Just south of my constituency, the leader, Mr. Preston Manning, asks the public to help him form an agricultural policy. It was reported on October 27 that at two meetings he is reported as having "stressed the importance of reducing government spending".

This is quite unique because some of the farming community would like to support this new initiative of the Reform Party, but if it looked at it very closely, it is actually the total opposite of what the New Democrats want to do, which would probably be to double expenditures in agriculture. We have the Reform Party which is going to start cutting what we have.

Look at some of the programs which we did put into place, such as the agri-food programs to assist agricultural production and innovation or the drought assistance program. We had a terrible drought. The hon. member from Saskatchewan knows how severe the drought was. The Government of Canada came in with $500 million or $850 million and then another $500 million this spring to assist those in those particular areas. The Reform Party would have reduced that amount and, I suppose, members sitting in the seats opposite would have doubled that amount and just run the deficit wild.

Mr. Fisher: We'll speak for ourselves. You tell us your policy.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will have a time to get up and reflect on the agricultural policy and I am sure he would want to do so. But these are some of the facts that we have to look at.

We have a tremendous crop this year and low world prices. But where is the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds? I tell you, he is out selling the crop for us. I mean, he has done so much to sell the grain of this country. In fact, yesterday—

Mr. Fisher: Caused by the free market.

Mr. Holtmann: Well, there you have it, the New Democrats are going to be the next salesmen of our grain, in some market that is artificial as can be. They are going to find people to double the price of grain when it is at maybe $150 a tonne; they will find markets for it at $300 a tonne. That is the kind of logic we get from across the way. A free market is just that. It is there and you have to be competitive in it. Obviously, the subsidies of the Europeans do not exactly help us in this particular case.

The minister, knowing full well the difficulties, has been out there and yesterday made the suggestion that it looks like we are going to have a very good grain movement right into the new year. The hon. member should know the board has taken up all its options. I guess they cannot reveal the exact nature of the sale but I want to tell you, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, by the way, has a farm of his own and if anybody can understand the plight of the farmer, it is our Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. He has his fingers right down in the soil. He knows about the potatoes grown and the grain grown and the problems faced, because he has faced them himself.

Earlier on we heard an allegation that the goods and services tax is going to cost the farmers a lot of money. Here is something that ought to be considered. In fact, the Minister of Finance very clearly said, and this has been accepted by farmers, that the farmers would reduce their costs of production by $250 million with the goods and services tax. I can assure you that his predictions have been almost always right on while he has been the finance minister of this House of Commons for the last six years, not like the projections from across the way; not the absolutely ridiculous statements that came from across the way. He has been right on. Farmers will welcome this tax to reduce their input costs, as they should.

Certainly they will deny that this is likely going to happen, but the facts bear it out. Go to your farm dealers and find out what is going to happen to machine costs. They are going to go down. Input costs for fertilizers and chemicals will all go down, but I do not hear anybody speaking about that.

Mr. Funk: How about the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I see you motioning that my time is up. In closing, let me say that farmers do face some difficult times, but it is this administration which in the past was able to make and assess programs to the benefit of farmers, and they know it.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Portage—Interlake, the place where they closed the base. The officials from that town are writing all the members of Parliament to help the member's town get some business going. They must wonder what their own member has done on their own behalf if they are having to recruit all 295 of us to intervene.

Mr. Holtmann: We'll take all the help we can get.

Mr. Funk: This is about as contradictory as the member's remarks were. I think he got carried away in a flight of rhetoric and accused the members opposite of advocating a position where the government is going to run everything, pay everything and where there is going to be an unlimited amount of taxpayers' money sloshing through the farm sector and somehow or other tied in with some ancient sins of the National Farmers Union.

If the hon. member wants to attack the National Farmers Union and the wheat pools of this country and the orderly marketing system that those organizations have advocated through the years, he should come out and do so directly.

What this debate is all about today is whether or not we are going to maintain an orderly marketing system based on the Wheat Board, the marketing boards and those kinds of institutions which make sure that we do not have to come in constantly with government money, that the market works for the farmer, not against the farmer, that the farmer is not the total victim of weather and international situations, and so on.

It used to be that governments in this country were good at working the international market to Canada's benefit, something we seem to have lost over the last 10 years.

At the same time the member pledges firm allegiance to the free market system, saying that this is going to solve all our problems, he turns around and brags about the billions of dollars increasing adherence to the free market system has cost us. Certainly it is not only our adherence to the free market system, it is the free market system that the United States of America is supposedly engaging in. The greatest free marketer in the world was supposed to be Ronald Reagan. He was supposed to have introduced the idea.

An hon. member: Right. Right. It ain't working.

Mr. Funk: But where did export subsidies come from? Who has increased their export subsidies 40 per cent in the last year, starting to subsidize into their own market, and even into Canada? This is the model that the hon. member is suggesting for Canadian agriculture. At the same time, he is attacking the traditional pillars of Canadian agriculture, the orderly marketing system which has made it unique and has allowed more Canadian farmers to survive.

I would like to ask the hon. member on which side of the fence he is actually on. Is he advocating that the orderly marketing system give away to the free market system, or is he not?

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member brought me back to orderly marketing. Before I enter that discussion, let me assure him that I come from a farm where we sell pigs without a marketing board, but we have a dairy for which we have a marketing board, and those things are pretty much to stay intact, as they are.

He would advocate that we would even have a marketing board for hogs, but I do not think that is going to fly. But let me get back to something that is very fundamental. When I indicated to this Chamber that in fact we have brought in programs to spend money to assist with the needs of agriculture at certain times, like a safety net program, it was his party that voted against the supply bill that put all the money in the hands of farmers. Have him explain that to his farmers back home. When we brought in the supply bill to put money into western grain stabilization and to put money into the Canadian Wheat Board overrun, it was his government that voted against it. Explain that to the people of Canada. If you support the farming and the agricultural policies of your own government, why do you vote against them? It makes no sense. Talking about being on both sides of the fence. Why wouldn't he and his party have supported those very things which he demands this government to do?

• (1330)

Mr. Funk: Because the government spending plans are a bunch of garbage.

Mr. Holtmann: There you go, Mr. Speaker. There you have the answer; just a little more rhetoric.

I am not on both sides of the fence. We have supported orderly marketing. We have done that. It has been stated again and again by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Agriculture that in fact orderly marketing is one of our criteria. We have the right to have it within our own country.

We are debating the GATT. Naturally we think we are totally and unfairly treated by our trading partners. We are demanding that some orderly marketing be brought there because it assists all Canadian farmers, especially the ones that he represents.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, before I had the privilege of sitting in this House, I was, as you may recall, a member of the National Assembly, and at the time I represented a rural riding.

Back in the early 70s, I quickly became acquainted with the problems and concerns of farmers. At the time, there had been a major development in the agricultural sector, in Quebec and across Canada, and I am referring to the introduction of milk quotas, which turned out to be a very important and very profitable decision for our dairy farmers.

Recently, five representatives of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec came to see me in my office. In the past, when they met at various locations in the riding I represent, in the Petite Nation valley or in Thurso, for instance, I often attended their meetings. That is when I gradually came to understand—and when I say understand, I should say I merely scratched the surface—the real problems of farmers.

Lately, our farmers have become increasingly concerned, because of the GATT talks and especially because of free trade. The decision on imports of yogurt and dairy products including ice cream from the United States brought things to a head, when Quebec saw its milk quotas drop by 5 per cent, in other words, producers of industrial milk in Quebec will have to cut production by 5 per cent.

So obviously they are concerned. But they are also concerned for a number of other reasons. When we look at the motion, we see the words: "safety nets". As others said earlier, the safety net is there to ensure stable incomes that cover our farmers' production costs. However, I feel that this particular safety net has mainly benefited the general public, because for years our farm producers have been very efficient in their operations.

If we look at the past 20 years, and these are the facts, these are not figures out of a hat, if we look at the facts, the agri-food sector has been extremely efficient, with the cheapest products on the market, compared with the textile industry, auto manufacturers, and so forth. Farm producers have been very efficient since costs have not increased that much, compared with all other products on the market. So we can't say that they have failed to keep their operations up to date. In fact, they have been extremely efficient.

Will present benefits, such as the quota system for commercial milk producers or the stabalization program, be at stake in the negociations? Will the assistance we provide our farmers have to be cut?

I have always said, Madam Speaker, that agriculture has become as important as national defence in this world. If were to depend on outside sources for our food supplies, we would be putting ourselves in an extremely precarious situation. It is therefore essential—it is one of the most fundamental policies of our country—to ensure our self-sufficiency. There is no other choice. Otherwise, we would be in their hands.

So, we need well-established policies and the capacity to apply them, for the benefit of the Canadian farmers. As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, the present policies are effective. We would of course have to call upon people from the industry, the UPA for example, which represents our farm producers in Quebec. They have expressed their concerns during the meetings I had with them. They insisted that the government should not reduce at all the assistance it is providing them. That, of course, is their main request.

Since the commercial dairy farmers are already getting 5 per cent less for their milk, the slightest cutback will make farm relief even harder to find. As you know, the level of farm relief in Quebec—I cannot talk for the rest of the country—is extremely low. How do you expect the sons of farmers to follow in their fathers' steps if it means getting $250,000; $300,000 and up to $600,000 into dept? There is a provincial farmers assistance program I dealt with for many years. Generally speaking however, it is a heavy burden very few people are willing to support. Therefore, it is important to think about the future.

I do not want to do a historic retrospective but it is interesting to note that, 20 years ago, continuity was not a problem. Farmers' sons succeeded their fathers, which led to a very stable local economy. Farmers might have enjoyed stability but they had to work very hard to maintain their standard of living.

At the turn of the century, almost 70 per cent of our population lived in rural areas and over 25 per cent of our labour force worked the land. It is a high proportion. However, after the rapid industrialization that followed the First World War, this percentage fell to 15 per cent. Today, after World War II and the mechanization of agriculture, only 3 per cent of our labour force work the land. They have become very efficient and, with the new machinery and technology, it is obvious that our needs are enormous. But there are a lot more indirect jobs today me must take into account. For instance, in Ontario and Quebec, one out of seven jobs is directly or indirectly related to the agri-food industry.

To get to the point, Madam Speaker, if we cannot ensure the future, it is because present-day farmers did not get the help they so desperately need. We have lost some ground in the GATT negotiations and the Free Trade Agreement. It is very important that the government realizes there is a limit to what our farmers can handle.

If we loose our would-be farmers at that rate, you will see multinationals step in and take over the food-production industry, and that will spell the end of price stabilization. You can rest assured, Madam Speaker, that food prices will go up because, with those big multinationals, it is what the market can bear that counts, so to speak. But it is important for the government and the producers, UPA especially, who are watching closely the GATT negotiations and free trade. There is a potential danger for Canada to give in to American demands, especially when it comes to reducing the support given to our producers. It is extremely important that we maintain our security net for our farmers. If we do not, not only will our farmers suffer, but it may also give rise to a social problem. Even if the population is concentrated in big cities, there are still people who want to farm. We must not take for granted that we can reduce the importance of farmers in our economy.

On the whole, I am sure that the government knows that UPA is watching it, and it is extremely important that it contacts the people concerned to make sure that the well-being of our farmers and of our food-producing industry is considered on the same footing as our National Defence.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Stormont—Dundas.

[English]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today on this very important motion which concerns the integrity and future stability of the Canadian agricultural industry.

I wish to commend my colleague, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk, for bringing this motion forward. I believe it is a timely motion in view of the impending deadline of the GATT negotiations in Geneva and also for its support in maintaining an economically viable and productive Canadian agricultural industry in which both our farmers and the Canadian consumers are the beneficiaries.

The motion urges the federal government within the GATT talks and its domestic economic policies to recognize the vital role of farmers in maintaining the Canadian way of life. It specifically calls upon the government to uphold the principles of Canada's supply management system and maintain agricultural safety net programs which provide stability and an equitable return for every sector involved in food production.

The motion also urges the government to adopt policies which promote sustainable development in farming as well as recognize the essential role of agricultural communities in our economy and the well-being of Canadians from coast to coast.

Canadians are aware of the importance of agriculture to our economy. A decline in productivity and stability of our agricultural sector would certainly have a negative impact on the country. The government must realize that a failure to adequately protect Canadian agriculture at GATT and within its own agricultural policies would be detrimental to every Canadian and have serious consequences for Canada's over-all economy.

For 15 years Canadian farmers have relied upon the supply management system to promote stability within agriculture and to obtain a reasonable return for their business. One sector of Canadian agriculture with a considerable interest in the GATT negotiations and which is dependent upon supply management is the dairy industry. There are over 34,000 dairy farms in Canada with some 70,000 farm families deriving their livelihood from this industry. For these people, marketing boards have to remain strong.

In addition, there are roughly 25,000 Canadians employed in the dairy processing industry working in 400 plants across Canada. The total figure of those involved in this one agricultural industry is close to 100,000 and represents approximately 14 per cent of the total Canadian agribusiness employment. When these figures are incorporated into figures for the other agricultural sector, one can see the importance of agriculture to our economy and to employment in Canada. Jobs are scarce in rural Canada and agriculture is the backbone of our rural communities.

The dairy farmers of Canada desire to retain the marketing boards and the supply management system in order to earn a living from the price they can charge for milk. Farmers do not take advantage of the consumer by inflating the cost of milk and other dairy products. They simply obtain a fair price for their products based on their input costs. Supply management accomplishes just that. Without such a system Canadian dairy, chicken and egg producers would not be able to continue in operation. Very few businesses could if it cost more to produce a product than what it sold for in the marketplace.

Canadians witness every day the quality of agricultural products our farmers produce. Most Canadians agree that Canada has established in a relatively short period of time an agricultural system that is envied by the rest of the world.

In my riding of Stormont—Dundas I have over 2,600 constituents involved in agriculture and related services industry. Among them are, in my unbiased opinion, some of the finest dairy, egg and chicken producers in the country. I also take great pleasure in the fact that at the Ault Foods plant in Winchester some of the finest cheese in the world is manufactured and they are recognized internationally for their products.

Our agricultural sector must continue to meet the high standards of quality we have in Canada today. It must also be able to continue in meeting the needs of our farmers and all Canadians.

A recent public opinion poll found that 94 per cent of Canadians believe it is important for the dairy industry to be self-sufficient. Eight-six per cent of respondents thought our dairy farmers were doing an excellent job and 70 per cent said that all the dairy products consumed in Canada can and should be produced in our country. Only 3 per cent thought that dairy farmers were overpaid, while 45 per cent believed they were underpaid. Consumers who were aware of milk marketing boards viewed them positively and said that they were beneficial to both the consumer and the producer.

Canadians also recognize the valuable contribution farmers have made to Canada's cultural and historical heritage. Farmers have worked the rural landscape for generations and the rural way of life is an integral component in our country's traditions. Our diverse climate affords farmers a shorter growing season, but they have nonetheless succeeded in providing the food needs of our country.

Today, however, high interest rates, rising input costs and uncertainty over the future of agriculture in Canada are combining to place increasing pressures on the ability of our farmers to survive. The concerns about supply management and the various safety net programs have added to these burdens. The federal government for its part has yet to provide the kind of reassurances our agriculture community deserves.

The uncertainty over the outcome of the GATT talks in December has already caused problems for farmers in terms of their ability to obtain bank loans. Mr. Cyrille Parent, who chaired the annual conference on banking and agriculture held this month in Saint-Hyacinthe, Quebec, has stated that banks "are advising farmers not to take out loans for the next month". Banks themselves are quite concerned as well about the future of Canadian agriculture. They have a vested interest in the agricultural sector and its future viability.

In the last five years Canadian banks have written off over $560 million in bad loans and currently have $7.4 billion in outstanding loans to farmers. Obviously, our banks support the maintenance of supply management and the quota system in Canadian agriculture. They want to see this government take the appropriate action to support our farmers. They want to see Canadian farmers survive and continue their business relationship with the banking community.

Canadian farmers are not afraid of competing with the major agricultural nations of the world. What they simply want, however, is a fighting chance. They need the ability to compete and survive. Farmers realize the world is changing. They know that the agricultural trade issue is a major aspect of success of the GATT talks. No Canadian farmer wants to see a global war in agriculture, nor increased protectionist measures. Farmers recognize that if, for example, farm subsidies are to be phased out, then it must be done so in every country.

A level playing field must, however, exist in agriculture on the international scene. The United States is calling for the elimination of agricultural subsidies at the GATT. Yet the U.S. dairy producers are subsidized with U.S. government tax dollars. The U.S. farmer clearly admires the Canadian supply management system, so much so, that 11 of the major milk-producing states in the United States, which account for 80 per cent of production, implemented a system of production management on November 1 of this year. One therefore questions the actual commitment the U.S. government has to eliminating agricultural subsidies.

Canadian farmers are already at a disadvantage with their U.S. counterparts. Interest rates are lower in the U.S., and fuel costs, fertilizer costs, feed prices, and machinery parts are also lower in the U.S. than in Canada. There is little chance that our farmers would be able to compete with supply management if our safety net programs were entirely dismantled at the GATT.

Therefore, the federal government must stand steadfast in supporting our farmers. Prices for commodities have to reflect the costs Canadian farmers incur to produce their goods. Supply management has consistently provided a sufficient supply with a reasonable return for the farmer. The system works to protect the farmer and the consumer by tying prices to the average costs incurred by the most efficient producers and limiting production to estimates of domestic consumption. Thus, Canadians obtain a stable supply at fair prices. Without supply management, this relationship would end and so would Canadian agriculture.

In an editorial on October 30, 1990, The Ottawa Citizen discussed the need for international agricultural reform and the elimination of inefficiency in agriculture. However, it is also said that Canada should not give away the farm. The article pointed out that the Canadian consumer may well rejoice if, as a result of marketing boards being eliminated, the price of chicken fell. The article quickly noted, however, that the consumer would be less satisfied if market forces pushed the price of a drumstick beyond the budget of an average income family.

In conclusion, I have concentrated my remarks on the issue of supply management. I did so because I believe its future is interconnected to the future of agriculture in Canada. The federal government has both a moral duty and a responsibility to preserve the Canadian family farm and the rural landscape of Canada. It has the even greater task of protecting our economy and the welfare of Canadians. In the final analysis, whatever happens at GATT, Canadians will not forgive this government, should it relegate Canadian agriculture to a shadow of its historical past, and its present contribution to the well-being of our economy, our farmers, and our country.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member made his speech largely on the subject of supply management. However, I would like to ask him a question pertaining to some of the other aspects of the GATT negotiation process and Canadian agriculture.

It is no secret that the Liberal Party, which he represents, has had trouble winning seats in western Canada through the years, and there are lots of reasons for that. One reason given by the farm community was that the Liberal Party was seen as one of the forces which undermined the historic Crow rate for the movement of Canadian grain.

With the changes that were made under the Western Grain Transportation Act, the system was somewhat changed, but the principle of paying the railroads rather than paying the producers was maintained. However, now we see a situation, both in the GATT negotiations and in the task force report, where a process is under way to dramatically change the regime by which the Crow benefit is distributed and farmers fear it will be eliminated completely. This clearly seems to be the long-term agenda of the bureaucrats of the Departments of Transport and Agriculture and supported by two successive governments.

I appreciate that the hon. member is not a westerner, but I was wondering what the position of the Liberal Party is on this very important question, arising from the GATT and the task force. Does the Liberal Party support a continuation of paying the railways under the Crow or would the Liberal Party go along with the government's agenda to make some dramatic changes to that?

Mr. Kilger: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from the New Democratic Party for his question. I am glad that he also recognized that being a member from eastern Ontario, I will not pretend to my colleagues in this Chamber, or to Canadian farmers whom we are discussing today, that the issue of the Crow rate, which you mentioned as being a western issue, is something on which I would say I am an expert.

I certainly think it merits a close review, but I think it is another of those issues which across the country has created a tremendous amount of anxiety in the farming community.

Although I welcome the question I certainly recognize I cannot answer it to your satisfaction. Farming is a serious issue, and I know all members taking part today recognize that fact. I will not speak to it, not being well versed on it, but certainly I recognize it is an issue of great concern to people in western Canada and the farming community. It is one of those items that is causing a tremendous amount of anxiety for our farming community. I certainly would hope that the government and all members would look at it very closely.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I am in a statesmanlike mood today.

Mr. Gauthier: Are you? That's nice.

Mr. Crosbie: I am very pleased to see that the subject of the MTN negotiations of the Uruguay round is being debated in the House. The Liberal opposition, I believe, introduced this motion and they should be congratulated on at last, after four years, showing some interest in this subject.

I am happy to be able to say that I can find nothing offensive in this resolution that we are debating. This is most unusual. This is the first time I have ever looked at a Liberal resolution and found nothing offensive in it.

Mr. Dionne: Time for you to sit down then.

Mr. Crosbie: What the House urges is that in the GATT negotiations and in our economic policies, we recognize the essential role played by farmers in maintaining the Canadian way of life. There's certainly no question about that. It is a central feature of our policy.

It urges the government to uphold the principles of supply management. Madam Speaker, ever since we assumed office, we have been assuring and reassuring the Canadian farmer who is involved in the supply management farming industries that we intend to uphold the principles of supply management. This is exactly what we have done in our offer tabled in the first half of October at Geneva in complying with our obligations in the MTN negotiations. We are doing that.

Then it urges us to maintain the safety nets to provide a stable and fair return for all sectors involved in food production, another central feature of our policy. As a matter of fact the Minister of Agriculture at present has a major study under way in co-operation with all facets of the farming industry to ensure policies and principles to provide for a stable and fair return in all of those sectors.

It urges us to adopt policies encouraging sustainable development of farming practices—that is a given—and to recognize the vital role played by agricultural communities in the over-all economy and the well-being of all Canadians, which is another well-recognized principle to which we subscribe.

This is a resolution which we can support without any difficulty.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the Uruguay round of the multilateral trade negotiations is the most important single economic decision-making event that will take place in the 1990s—or at least as far as one can see ahead in the 1990s. There is no more important set of economic events being decided than the Uruguay round, which is going to conclude in the first week of December in Brussels, after a four-year period of intensive negotiation on 15 subjects.

I have not the time to go into all 15 subjects of course today, and we are mainly interested in agriculture this afternoon. But one of the most important sectors of the 15 being discussed—the most important I think it is fair to say—is the agricultural sector.

• (1400 )

It is widely agreed by those participating in the negotiations that, unless there is a satisfactory resolution of the agricultural issues, there will be no satisfactory ending to the Uruguay round in December in Brussels. In other words, some of the more important trading nations involved in these discussions, including the United States and all members of the Cairns Group and I think most of the representatives of developing world, are determined that agriculture is to be brought under the system of GATT rules so that some principles of fairness and equity apply in the world agricultural trading sector, which is not now the case.

There have been efforts in the past to deal with agricultural trade, but they have been largely unsuccessful in dealing with non-tariff import barriers and the question of subsidies, and in particular export subsidies.

Many areas of agriculture are not subject to effective GATT rules at all.

As we all know, the United States has had a waiver in many of these areas since 1954 or 1955. The offer we have made in the GATT negotiations, of course, is subject to all of this being removed. We will not sustain our offer, for example, if there was any suggestion that the waiver the United States now has is to continue in the future. Our offer is made subject to certain conditions being met.

What is our offer? It is an initial and conditional offer, conditional on other countries agreeing to negotiate a substantial agricultural trade reform package with concrete benefits for our own agriculture. It is designed to achieve, over a 10-year period, an end to the international subsidy war through total elimination and prohibition of export subsidies. That is the first objective.

It is sad to report that as of today, November 2, the European Community has found itself unable to agree on any proposal to table at Geneva with reference to agriculture, despite the agreement of all the countries involved in these negotiations that by October 15 every country should table its offer on agriculture. As at November 2, the European Community is unable to table any offer.

An offer that was proposed by Mr. MacSharry, Commissioner of Agriculture for the European Community, I think about two months ago and was found to be totally inadequate by the United States, ourselves, and other members of the Cairns Group. It amounted to perhaps a 30 per cent reduction in trade distorting support for agriculture over a base period that started in 1986. In effect, they were only proposing a 13 per cent to 17 per cent reduction in subsidies for agriculture.

Everyone involved, except the European Community, agreed that that offer was totally unsatisfactory and it has not been agreed to by even the 12 members of the European Community. Germany and France, in particular, have refused to approve even that kind of an inadequate offer by the European Community,. The result is that the result that the European Community is going to meet again on Monday to decide whether they will approve an offer at all.

It is quite obvious, if the European Community does not come up with an offer shortly, at least something that can be discussed, that the whole structure of these MTN discussions may collapse. The European Community, if not the most powerful economic block in the world, is certainly one the of the two leading economic powers of the world. If the EC does not produce some kind of an offer shortly, then this is affecting negotiations in the other 14 sectors.

I presume the morale of the people involved is starting to disappear because they all know what I and anyone who studies this subject knows that, if there is not some kind of progress in agriculture, there will be no progress in any of those areas. If there is a failure of this round, I envisage that the 1990s are going to be much more difficult for every country involved in the world trading system than may already be projected.

A failure of these negotiations will result in trade chaos, the formation of trade blocs, in hurricane-like increases, and protectionist devices. We have already seen all kinds of resort to protectionist devices in various parts of the world, including the United States, the world's most important market. There will be a hurricane-like increase if these talks fail. There will be a tremendous increase in unilateral action or unilateralism as it is known in the MTN.

There will be a tremendous increase in bully-boy tactics by the giants of the world economic and trading system who, of course, if unrestrained by rules, are going to exert their influence through raw economic power. That is why, Madam Speaker, it is so important to us that we have a successful conclusion to this round. When the battle that depends simply on raw economic power commences, then we are not among the leading nations of the world in that respect. We are a middle-ranking nation. We are an importing trading nation, far beyond our size. One-third of our GNP is dependent upon trade, so we are very dependent for our prosperity on a properly functioning world trading system with clearly recognized rules that we can appeal to when the giants attempt to bully us around. That is the importance of the new rule-making system which we are having great success with and with the new system that would apply if this round is successful with reference to the acceptance and enforcement of panels. A lot of progress has been made in those areas which is why we must settle this thorny issue of agriculture.

With respect to our own agricultural offer which I referred to, one objective is the question of export subsidies. One of the difficulties with the European Community is that the European Community appears determined not to agree to any restrictions with respect to export subsidies. If the European Community is not going to agree to any restriction on its right to give the tremendous export subsidies it is now giving its grain and other farmers, then Canada is going to continue to be savaged in the competition between the EC, the U.S., and others through the use of export subsidies. That is one objective.

The second objective is greater market orientation through a reduction of up to 50 per cent in trade distorting, internal subsidies, combined with clearer rules on what is to constitute non-countervailable or non-trade distorting support for agriculture. This is most important.

It is not all internal subsidies, Madam Speaker. It is trade distorting internal subsidies and clear rules. What kind of support can you give which will not be subject to countervail and will be non-trade distorting? That is to be decided in this round, some clear rules on those subjects.

Our third objective is improved market access through a one-third reduction of normal tariffs, resulting on bound rates no higher than 20 per cent.

The final, major objective is greater security for supply management through a strengthened and clarified Article XI of the GATT, in accordance with the proposal we made in March of this year, and which would include minimum market access levels pursuant to our international obligations.

A strengthened and clarified Article XI is needed if our dairy farmers are to be properly protected with the supply management system we now have. They know and understand that. The status quo will not adequately protect Canadian dairy farmers today. That is why it is so important that we reach success in these negotiations. That is an additional reason. Without a strengthened and clarified Article XI, a GATT panel has already indicated that dairy farmers are going to be in difficulty as a result of an interpretation of the present rules of the GATT.

• (1410)

With respect to minimum market access levels, all that has been suggested is that, over a 10-year period, the minimum market access levels with respect to supply management programs would increase to 5 per cent of the domestic market. I do not have the time to go into detail and I think all members are familiar with it. It has had a good reception.

The hon. member referred to the The Ottawa Citizen editorial of October 30. It states:

> As such, the Canadian government's bargaining position on agricultural trade in the multilateral trade talks now underway makes good sense.

That is the opinion of the editorial writers of The Ottawa Citizen.

There has been criticism from some of the representatives of the dairy industry, although they have been muted in their criticism compared to the kind of protest they can make when they are really upset about a particular issue. Naturally, in their public statements, they are going to put forward what appears to be a perfect position for the dairy farmers, just as the brewery workers would put forward what would be a perfect position for them, or the beef cattle farmers for them, or the fishermen for them. They would like perfection, but they know that perfection is not possible in the world that we live in. One must accept trade-offs and compromises so long as they are ones that leave fundamental principles still protected.

There is widespread support of the fact that we have been able to put in an offer which is good for both of the main sectors of our farming industry: the farm exporting interests in grain, beef cattle, pork, and the like, which are very badly damaged at the present time by export subsidies; and the supply management sector, such as dairy and poultry products in particular, which are the beneficiaries of our supply management system and who want it to be continued in the future, just as the government wants it to be continued in the future.

I can quote the October 23, 1990 release of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association which states that our offer is "a good start to a more balanced world in which to trade". It has stated that it is a well balanced offer.

Mr. Albert Chambers of the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, on October 16, 1990 said:

> Poultry and egg producers would have little or nothing to complain about.

Mr. Knoerr of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, on October 16, 1990, said the national farm group "strongly supports the main thrust of the proposals" in an article in The Ottawa Citizen.

On October 16, 1990, a press release from Dairy Farmers of Canada, with regard to Article XI stated:

> —the position tabled by the federal government is fully supportive of the recommendation of Dairy Farmers of Canada.

The Quebec government issued a press release quite supportive of our position. Even the UPA and the Co-op Fédérée de Québec thought that our offer was a positive evolution. They have areas of concern but generally speaking, they have been positive and the Quebec government has been supportive.

We are off to a good start insofar as our position is concerned. The United States has made a proposal which would go further than ours with reference to export subsidies. As I say, the European Community does not even want to discuss the elimination or any reduction in import subsidy levels at all. One can see that there is still a tremendous gap in the positions of those who have to reach an agreement within five weeks.

The government is providing unprecedented support to our farmers. Between 1984 and 1989, direct and indirect federal expenditures in the agricultural sector totalled about $22 billion. Some $12 billion has gone to hard-pressed grain, that is, the grain and oilseed sectors, to compensate for the low prices caused by the subsidy war. That was one of the main items, but $22 billion altogether. This is certainly more than adequate proof that the principles expressed in this resolution had been accepted and acted on by the government.

The price tag of this trade war is tremendously high world-wide. The OECD showed in 1989 the member countries of the OECD spent $245 billion U.S. in transfers to agriculture. In the European Community it was $90 billion just about; in the U.S., $66.6 billion; Japan, $59 billion and in that same year in Canada we spent $7 billion.

As a trading nation, we cannot afford to have this kind of war continuing. It is not a war that we can win. Fifty per cent of our total agriculture receipts come from export trade. That dependence is most crucial in the grains and oilseeds sector where 70 to 80 per cent of receipts come from their exports. That is why in our offer we have tried to be balanced and comprehensive, to achieve both long term benefits for our export industries and long term benefits for our farming industries that come under supply management.

If we can have this position of ours accepted in the next five weeks, there will have been a major step forward for Canada both respect to our economic health generally and the economic health of the Canadian farming community. I would certainly be glad of any support that members of the House on all sides can give to our success in trying to get the fundamentals of this offer accepted by the other countries involved.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the Minister when he referred to a letter from the Quebec farmers union supporting the Canadian government's representations on their behalf.

I would like to ask the Minister whether he quoted exactly what the President of the Quebec farmers union said in his letter. I had the opportunity, in the last few days, to meet him at the Bélanger-Campeau Commission in Quebec and he was absolutely furious and insulted at having been misquoted in this House by the Minister of State for Agriculture, the hon. member for Montmagny. In reply to harsh criticism by opposition members, the Minister defended himself by saying that Mr. Proulx, the President of the Quebec farmers union, wrote in a letter that the union approved the government's action when, in fact, he repeated their concerns about the representations made by the Canadian government at the GATT which, if they do not succeed, can threaten the future of Quebec agriculture. The union has often wondered whether the government was acting in good faith at the GATT talks.

At other times, it questioned the objectivity and even the strategy of the Canadian negotiating team at the GATT, which it believes is clearly doomed to failure. Even if the Minister tries, in his report today in this House, to make us believe his representations will succeed, the harsh reality is that they probably will not bring about the protection demanded by the farmers.

• (1420)

So it is one thing to tell the minister, yes, we hope you will succeed and that farm support programs will remain. But it is something else again to see the government really get ahead at the GATT negotiations in ensuring the protection farmers want and we wish on this side of the House of Commons.

So when the minister quotes a letter from the Quebec association, UPA, I would appreciate it if he would report exactly what was said and not leave the impression he got a blank cheque from the Union, when in fact they express strong reservations about the Canadian government's initiative at the GATT negotiations.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker I have not quoted any letter from the UPA. If the hon. gentleman had listened to me attentively as he should have, he would have heard me say that the joint press release by Mr. Prolix and Mr. Pelletier was generally positive. I said that the two presidents saw our Canadian offer as a positive evolution. I went on to say, of course they did not approve the total offer. There were some areas of criticism by them. I explained how, even if your offer was perfect, it would never be perfect enough to get the full support of the group in question because they are looking for perfection and they want 100 per cent in a world where you are never going to get 100 per cent.

I do not want to repeat all of that, but generally speaking their reaction has been moderate and positive. That is my interpretation. There are certain things they do not like as well. They do not like the 5 per cent minimal access level proposed for the dairy sector over 10 years. If all our other objectives are achieved and the rest of the world does away with the inequitable situation that now exists and the United States does away with its waiver and we are successful over 10 years, we would give a 5 per cent minimal access level for the dairy sector. They do not like that.

How are we to achieve any of these objectives if we are not prepared to give anywhere? They are not the negotiators. The do not have the responsibility, so they can be out there representing their pressure group as lobbyists and, of course, demand perfection, knowing that if they were in our shoes they would have to do exactly the same. You have to give something to get something.

We cannot say to the rest of the world: "Recognize supply management, strengthen the wording as we want it strengthened in article XI(2)(1) and do what we want in that area, but we are not going to give you any increased access at all, even over the next 10 years, no matter what you do with respect to the dairy sector". No one in the rest of the world is going to buy that. Our provision here is reasonable, but they say they do not agree with it. I cannot criticize them for taking the absolute position on behalf of their clients. What else would you expect them to take? I have nothing to apologize for. I think I have described quite correctly the situation.

There is a negotiation on, and unless Canada is not to participate, unless we are to say that we, as one of the 100 nations that belong to GATT, are not going to engage in this negotiation, then we have got to take risks. Those who are worried about what the results may be will just have to wait and see.

We already have a position in agriculture, supported right across this country despite the many conflicting interests in the agricultural and farming community across this country, and we have a couple of very brilliant negotiators in charge of this, Mr. Germain Denis, who is in charge of our MTN negotiations under the supervision of Gerry Shannon, the former deputy minister, Mr. Mike Gifford, and others from the Department of Agriculture.

We have the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture, whom I hope to have in Brussels with me during the final week, as well as the Minister of State for Agriculture who is very attentive on behalf of the Quebec farmer.

Mr. Gauthier: Oh, let me hold your hand.

Mr. Crosbie: I was going to say with cows you might hold something else.

We also have the Minister of State for Agriculture, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I am going to have lots of help. I have no doubt I will be under intense surveillance.

Mr. Gauthier: As you should.

Mr. Crosbie: As should rightly be the case.

We are aware that Mr. Proulx does not approve 100 per cent of what we are doing. I think we would be hearing a lot more from him if basically they did not think we were on the right track.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the tone of statesmanship which the minister has adopted here, and recognized that we do have a common interest in reducing the very vicious export subsidy war which has been going on.

However, the supply management sector in this country, I think, really is starting to feel like the black knight in the Monty Python movie that is losing one limb at a time and keeps trying to dance on the road as his limbs disappear.

Certainly, the effect of free trade and the opening up of the imports into the supply management sector is becoming more and more clear.

Right up front, we are offering to increase imports under the GATT. This is creating pressure from our own processors in this country as well letting loose a real howl in the media: an attack on the supply management system.

I would like to ask the minister specifically why the Canadian government agreed to adopt a producers subsidy equivalent system of evaluating subsidies, because what it has done is to include the benefits of supply management, which are actually derived from the marketplace, and instead portray them as a subsidy not only in the trade negotiations but to our own public which is examining this and following this debate.

Why has the Canadian government taken that approach which very much distorts the picture? Second, why is the government putting the accrual benefit on the table at the GATT when in fact nobody is asking us to get rid of it, or to seriously alter it?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, of course at the GATT, all measures of assistance in the agricultural field are being examined.

It was determined by the negotiating group on agriculture and its chairman that by October 1 each country would table its base line data on agriculture. The answer had to be prepared following guidelines that the chairman defined. Of course, that is what we did. That is without prejudice as to whether or not we agree with these particular guidelines. We do not, and we have made that clear. of them we agree with. Some of them we do not agree with. That was clearly stated when we submitted the data, and I quote: "It is without prejudice to the negotiating positions of the participants or to the outcome of the negotiations." There will be a whole negotiation on qualifications, conditions, what is a trade distorting subsidy, what is not, what is a green measure and what is a non-green measure.

We are not at all prejudiced in our approach by responding with the information requested by the chairman of the negotiating committee.

On the Crow benefit, that will have to be examined like every other program of assistance in the agricultural field to see if it is a green measure or a non-green measure. Some of it might be green and some of it might be non-green.

If it has to be changed in any way, the benefit will continue. We are committed to the Crow benefit as a historic benefit to the agri-food industry on the prairies. We are committed that the benefit will continue, but how the benefit is delivered is open for discussion here and in Geneva. If one way of delivering it is agreed to be trade distorting, we will find another way to deliver it. The benefit itself is going to be continued, although the method of delivering it might have to be changed, depending on the outcome of these negotiations. I think that is clear enough.

• (1430)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, in part the motion before the House reads:

> That this House urge that in the upcoming GATT negotiations and in over-all economic policies, the government recognize the essential role played by farmers in maintaining the Canadian way of life—

I think that it is an excellent motion and that the tenor of debate in support of the motion in the House today from all parties, I might add, is heartening indeed.

At the outset I want to say that my colleagues and I in the New Democratic Party opposition certainly give our full support to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Minister for International Trade in the very difficult role they have to play in these upcoming GATT negotiations.

We recognize the fact that we are playing in many respects in a global agricultural marketplace and that certain concessions have to be made. It is a difficult role. I understand that there are many pressures from all sectors of the agricultural community in terms of preserving what they perceive to be necessary structures and necessary supports in order to ensure the continued vitality of the industry.

However, we do have some concerns with regard to perhaps matters of interpretation and matters of definition and what constitutes an unfair trade subsidy or a distorting trade subsidy. We have some concerns, quite frankly, about the fact that Canada in many ways seems to be between a rock and a hard place with respect to the negotiations going on in GATT, the severe pressure put upon Canada by its U.S. neighbour, and the situation that we face with countervailable sanctions through the free trade agreement.

I would like to go into some of those arguments and try as best I can to put into perspective some of those concerns. However, before I do, I would like to give a brief perspective in terms of the nature of the industry that we are actually dealing with in Canada. Many Canadians do not really recognize the importance of the agricultural industry to our economy and to our way of life.

Today there are about 35,000 dairy farms in Canada, with each farm supporting at least two families. There are about 25,000 Canadians working in the dairy industry in about 400 plants right across the country. Speaking specifically of the dairy industry, we produce about 7.6 billion litres of milk annually. Dairy farming in Canada, as only one sector of our agricultural community, represents close to $3.8 billion in farm sales and contributes a significant portion to our Gross Domestic Product, about $7 billion.

That is only one sector of our agricultural community, a very important sector and a sector which I submit may be significantly affected by the decisions made either through GATT or by the bilateral panel on negotiations through the free trade agreement.

One thing that is very clear to all members of the House is that we do have a growing crisis in agriculture. We can talk about the grain lying in the field in Saskatchewan, because although we have record harvests we cannot sell it. This is a direct result of the devastating export subsidy warfare that has been promulgated by the United States and the European Community. Quite frankly Canadian agriculture has been left in tatters as a result of that warfare.

There is no question. I totally agree with the minister that we have to try to eliminate those unfair export subsidy concessions. Frankly we cannot play in that kind of ball game. We do not have the productive capacity or the economic capacity to be able to sustain that kind of an economic onslaught.

We have a problem in agriculture in Canada. It is a crisis that has been deepening since 1984. In one year alone, 1987–1988, we lost 24,000 jobs in our agricultural community. The farm debt in Canada now exceeds some $22 billion according to 1989 figures. Independent of what sector of the agricultural community they work in, about one-third of all farmers are facing very serious debt and the possibility of bankruptcy. Many of them are on the verge of bankruptcy or have gone bankrupt. One out of five farmers on family farms in Canada are living in virtual poverty.

Those are very sobering figures which certainly bring into question the kinds of policies followed over the last eight or ten years in terms of the commitment this institution must make to our agricultural community.

In 1961, just about 30 years ago, we had 480,000 farms in Canada. But, as of 1986, that number was reduced to less than 293,000 viable farms. That is a staggering loss in that economic sector. As a result, our rural communities are losing a very important economic base. They are losing a way of life. That is most disturbing.

We have seen an alarming trend developing as a result of the policies of this administration, a trend that favours the free market agenda, the corporate agenda, bowing to the shrine of the global free marketplace. We have seen the cancellation of farm subsidies; the abolition of interest-free loans; an increase in the federal surtax on agricultural goods; and high interest rates, which of course have been most devastating to our farmers, particularly younger farmers who have had to carry a high debt load getting into the business and trying to expand their operations.

We have seen the impact of outrageous exchange rates between Canada and the U.S. and the difficulties that has created, not only in agriculture but in virtually all export sectors. With the 7 per cent goods and services tax, all of these things are adding up to some very difficult times indeed for our agricultural communities.

We have seen a slow capitulation of this government to repeated U.S. demands to reduce market support mechanisms in agriculture. That was enshrined in the free trade agreement that is now into its second year.

I just want to read Article 701 of the free trade agreement signed by both countries, regarding agricultural subsidies:

> The Parties agree that their primary goal with respect to agricultural subsidies is to achieve, on a global basis, the elimination of all subsidies which distort agricultural trade, and the Parties agree to work together to achieve this goal,

That sounds very honourable. On the surface I do not think most people would find much to object to, except when you try to determine what this definition of a "market distorting subsidy" actually implies. We get into difficulty there because we see that Canada's marketing board structure has been fingered by the United States agribusiness sector as a trade distorting subsidy. That is a challenge they submitted previous to this. If that means that Canada is committed through this agreement to eliminating that kind of a "trade distorting subsidy", it spells real problems for our farmers and particularly for our dairy farmers.

If the United States fails to secure the reductions in terms of internal subsidies through the current Uruguay Round of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the GATT negotiations we have been talking about, it will likely continue to go after Canadian marketing boards through the bilateral dispute settlement mechanism under the free trade agreement. If it does not get us in GATT, it will likely attempt to get us through the FTA.

• (1440)

I want to read from another article in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. This section is Article 703, "Market Access for Agriculture". It reads:

> In order to facilitate trade in agricultural goods, the Parties shall work together to improve access to each other's markets through the elimination or reduction of import barriers.

We are looking at a statement which basically says to open up the process to give opportunity for improved access to each other's markets.

When we think of it in terms of the capacity of the U.S. agricultural industry and the small capacity of the Canadian industry in perspective, what that may very well lead to is a virtual swamping of our Canadian markets with cheap U.S. agricultural goods.

We have already seen a virtual exodus on a daily basis of consumers in border towns across Canada leaving Canada to go shopping down in the United States to pick up dairy products, cheap gasoline and then come back into Canada. We cannot blame people for trying to find the best value for their dollar, but I am sure that when Canadian shoppers go down to the United States to spend their millions of dollars daily in its markets picking up those cheaper products, they are not thinking about the impact it has on our own agricultural industry and dairy sector, how it affects the jobs in that sector or how it affects our tax base. I certainly do not blame them for trying to find good value, but it is having a devastating effect on our own domestic economies.

If we open up our borders in that respect and guarantee a freer access, we are going to be running into some very difficult times in terms of the restructuring of the agricultural industry in Canada because of competition with U.S. products.

We could well become, I submit, a dumping ground for the excess U.S. capacity because the system down there is a little different. They do not control production. They subsidize the cost of production and can run into very large excesses of dairy products, for example butter which has to be dumped somewhere. What a convenient dumping ground it would be to have Canadian borders open and free to accept those products.

The Macdonald Commission which was struck sometime ago, before the free trade agreement was brought into effect, recommended that agriculture as an economic sector be excluded from the free trade agreement. As a matter of fact, as we all know, history has written that this government ignored that recommendation and included agriculture as an important component in the FTA.

Through that, the United States won some major concessions. It won the reduction of the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board. It won the removal of transportation subsidies in Canada. It won the phase-out of tariffs. It won on a number of fronts.

To give a good example of the almost immediate overnight impact of the free trade agreement in terms of Canadian agriculture, it was the grape growing industry, particularly in British Columbia, involving virtually thousands of acres of prime agricultural grape growing. Virtually the grapes were torn out of the ground and the land was left to lay fallow because the industry could not compete with the changes brought about by the free trade agreement. It is true that there has been somewhat of a comeback in certain grape varieties, but certainly it is not the vibrant industry it was before the free trade agreement came into effect.

In many ways our agricultural markets may simply become niche markets that will supply specialty products but will not have the capacity that they should have to supply the Canadian consumer with Canadian products.

Having won those concessions through the free trade agreement, I submit that the U.S. is now intent on including the dairy industry in future negotiations. It essentially said that in the FTA, although dairy sort of escaped the first round of negotiations, they intend to include the dairy industry in any future rounds of negotiations. I ask, Madam Speaker, whether the inclusion of the Canadian dairy industry in future negotiations may be a possible precedent for Canada's participation in the trilateral negotiations that are now going on between the U.S., Mexico, and Canada, which has indicated that it wishes to participate. Is this going to be one of the concessions we have to make?

I want to point out, Madam Speaker, that the American farm bureau concluded that, with regard to the free trade agreement, once tariffs were removed American grains, bakery goods, poultry, eggs and milk products will gain substantial access to Canadian markets and undermine the marketing board system.

There is no question that our way of doing business in terms of Canadian agriculture is being jeopardized, not only by the free trade agreement, but also by the current negotiations that are taking place right now in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trades.

I can recall back before I was elected, listening to one of the free trade policy advisers for the current minister of trade when they were out in the Okanagan. This gentleman was a specialist in agricultural negotiations and he was being pressed by the farmers pretty strongly as to why this government was committing agriculture to the free trade discussions. He said, and I wrote it down at the time: "When it comes right down to it, some things are more important politically than they are economically".

Madam Speaker, to me that says that this government at that time was willing to sacrifice the Canadian agricultural industry for political expediency. I think that is proving itself to be the case.

We have seen the phase-out of many of the controls and protections for our agricultural industry. If it continues unabated through GATT or through the FTA it could very well spell the demise of the industry. The truth of the matter is that—and we often hear this phrase touted—there has to be a level playing field, but there is no level playing field when it comes to agriculture.

There are a number of reasons. We are a northern climate and have a shorter growing season. It is more difficult and more costly for us to produce on a per-unit basis than, for example, a farmer in Florida or California. We have higher labour rates. The geography of the country and the fact that we are such a massive country with such a small population means that transportation costs are higher.

These factors mitigate against the concept of a level playing field, and make essential the necessity for certain market structures to continue to exist in the Canadian agricultural industry if it in fact wishes to survive.

The United States has basically been calling for free trade in agriculture. As I mentioned before, we have seen the devastating trade wars that are taking place between the United States and the European community. They have to stop. There is no question about it. We support any measures that the government can implement in order to eliminate those trade wars.

At the same time I have to caution that in doing so, we cannot be entrapped into capitulating the future of our marketing boards in order to secure a negotiation.

The United States has been most vociferous in calling for the elimination of subsidization in the agriculture community. When we look at the U.S. system, we find that it is virtually awash in subsidies at the producer level. I would suggest to the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture that if the United States wants to play ball in terms of eliminating international warfare in trade subsidies, they call upon the United States to remove the kind of market subsidies that are rampant in the U.S. industry.

• (1450)

Madam Speaker, I am going to skip over some of the other points that I had wanted to make, and in summary say that the members on this side of the House sympathize with the difficult position of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for International Trade when it comes to these international negotiations. We wish to see a successful conclusion of the negotiations, but we do not wish to see those negotiations meaning a capitulation of Canada's historical perspective in terms of its commitment to agriculture and its commitment to maintaining the market structures that are now in place.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap said—and I did check his remarks—that the goods and services tax would apply to the agricultural sector when in fact it will be exempted. Everybody knows that. He also said that the structures must remain in the agricultural sector.

I must say that the Minister of Agriculture met with Mr. Proulx of the Union des producteurs agricoles in Montreal and these people are satisfied with the way Canadian government officials are handling the negotiations. They are giving priority to GATT multilateral trade negotiations because they provide greater security for the supply management system by strengthening and clarifying GATT Article XI which covers minimum access to the Canadian market.

Unless I am mistaken, my colleague also spoke in favour of these GATT negotiations, so I have a question for him. Considering that for years now the Canadian agricultural sector has been one of the major beneficiaries of the export trade, and assuming he wants to maintain the markets we have with other countries, where does he think the Canadian government ought to put its priorities in the GATT negotiations?

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, I think the member raises some valid points. I am concerned with Canada's position in the GATT negotiations, because it is basically offering to open the door essentially to a phase-out of trade distorting subsidies. The essence of the problem is how do we define those trade distorting subsidies. Who is going to make that determination? In fact, as I have said earlier on, the United States has already fingered the concept of our marketing board structures as being such a subsidy.

We say that we are going to open the door, we are going to make these concessions by phasing out these kinds of structures, and at the same time, through Article XI we are trying to beef up the security for the marketing board structures. We are in a philosophical catch 22. On the one hand we are capitulating, and on the other hand we are saying that we need greater security through Article XI for our marketing boards.

The question is, how can we open it up on the one hand and then strengthen it on the other. That is the kind of philosophical quandary that this government finds itself in. There is no question that Canadian agriculture should be seeking to expand its markets, as the member had asked.

For example, when I was in South Korea last fall as part of an interparliamentary trade delegation, I found there were many opportunities, not only in the agricultural sector but also in our softwood lumber sector. These were opportunities for development of niche markets in the Pacific-Asia market area. This applies to Korea, in particular, because its economy is changing rapidly and very dynamically. We need an aggressive marketing presence for our agricultural commodities. We still have some difficulties with South Korea having its own tariff structures and, quite naturally, wanting to protect its own industries. There are certainly opportunities there.

We must certainly look abroad. One of the difficulties I have with the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement is that it focuses on commerce between the two nations. We have no argument with the concept of freer trade, whether it be on a sectoral basis or on a general basis. The reduction of exposed tariff structures should be accommodated. At the same time, we should be looking at reducing those barriers as we are trying to do through GATT on a multilateral basis, so that we can expand our agricultural markets into those other areas rather than just focusing on the U.S. market.

When one looks at the capacity of the United States agricultural industry and looks at the capacity of the Canadian industry, it does not require a rocket scientist to figure out who is going to be the winner and who is going to be the loser.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I would like to clarify the New Democratic Party's position on this subject. I felt they would always be supportive of the GATT as a body to help us establish world trading order. Is that the position of the New Democratic Party?

Also, do they not agree that if we could reduce, over a period of time, the trade distorting subsidies that are prevailing in many other countries of this world, then we could take part in the world marketplace much easier and much more successfully.

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, there is no argument from me on that account.

What does concern us is the definition of what constitutes a trade distorting subsidy. If the concept of our marketing board structures is inclusive in that definition, then I say we have gone too far. I do not think that we can dismantle the protective mechanisms that are necessary for controlled and efficient market system that we have developed in Canada. If our marketing board structures are part of that definition as a trade distorting subsidy, then we do not support that. But we do support the elimination of other trade distorting subsidies such as the production subsidies that are given to the U.S. market. When one looks at the U.S. market, many of their subsidies are hidden but they are there. The agriculture community in the United States is awash in subsidies. Those are trade distorting subsidies.

The export subsidy warfare that has been ongoing between the U.S. and the European Common Market has left Canadian agriculture, particularly our grains and oilseeds, in absolute tatters. Those subsidies have to be eliminated.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

THE ECONOMY

SOCIAL OWNERSHIP

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of protecting and extending the important role of social ownership in the economy, in order to achieve the social goals of full employment, regional equity, technological development and equality among Canadians.

• (1500)

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a very great pleasure to move this motion to protect and extend the important role of social ownership in the economy which we certainly see in our party as something that is critical to achieving broader social goals of full employment, regional equity, technological development, and equality among Canadians.

Traditionally, when people consider the question of social ownership, they may think that we are hearkening back to the past ideological debates of the 1930s, 1940s and the 1950s; ideological debates which equated social ownership with what we usually call Crown corporations or public ownership. That is an interesting ideological debate. One can certainly make the case, and I would not try to undercut it, that historically Crown corporations have been extremely crucial to our development as a nation. We can see that with respect to everything from the railways back in the 1800s to Petro–Canada in the present day.

It is not that notion or view of social ownership that I want to talk about in the context of this motion. Instead, I want to talk about social ownership as community–based ownership. I want to talk particularly about institutions such as co–operatives and credit unions, and some of the new developments in co–operatives which are not just consumer purchasing co–operatives which have been so important for instance in the west in the past. As I discuss this motion, I want to talk particularly about producer co-operatives, and, within that context, especially worker co-operatives.

If we take the context of co-operatives as a whole, there are perhaps as many as 12 million Canadians who are members of a co-operative or a credit union, or a caisse populaire in Quebec. That is nearly 43 per cent of adult Canadians. More than 60,000 people in fact are directly involved in directing a co-operative system through their activities as volunteer board members.

For instance, I am a member of a credit union and, partly because of my work here, I am not able to be a board member, but I count on the volunteer work of people whom I elect to direct that credit union. The same thing is true of producer co-operatives. The same thing is true of producer co-operatives. The same thing is true of consumer co-operatives right across the country. It is a tremendous area of economic activity which is, in fact, largely ignored in our economic debates.

When we consider that there are 43 per cent of Canadians who are part of this co-operative movement, it seems to me unfortunate that there is not more consideration given to the potential role which co-operatives and credit unions could play.

The total assets of Canadian co-operatives, including financial co-operatives, are $68 billion, so we are not talking about something marginal. We are not talking about something which is playing a very limited role in our economy. We are talking about important institutions which can be so much more important in the future.

For instance, credit unions and caisses populaires each year lend approximately $37 billion to their members. The annual revenues of non-financial co-operatives in fact are close to $15 billion. We have co-operatives in marketing. We have co-operatives in food, housing, day care, health care, communication, even funeral services, manufacturing, processing, and so forth.

These co-operatives have a long history in our country. What is exciting are the new challenges which have now been presented to our co-operative movement, which represent the new role that exists for this form of social ownership within our country.

For instance, Laird Hunter from the Canadian Co-operative Association testified last year to a parliamentary committee on Bill C-21. He indicated—this is an especially important point—that increasingly those interested in worker co-operative development are concerning themselves with the contribution that worker co-operative buy-outs might be able to make in plant shutdown situations. He went on to say: "Given the uncertain future of many sectors, Canada's manufacturing base, the Canadian Co-operative Association strongly believes that, as amendments are considered to legislation relevant to worker co-operative development, provisions facilitating the growth of worker co-operative sectors should be considered."

That is the thrust of my argument today. In the context of a recession and wide-spread plant shutdowns throughout the country, we have to recognize that there is a potential for workers if the legislation helps them and if the financial support is provided through institutions and through government to make it possible. It is not in all cases, and probably not even in most cases, but in a significant number of cases. There is the capacity for workers to be able to provide a response to the problems that plant shutdowns bring, not just to them personally, but to their communities.

• (1510 )

Mr. Laird, in some of his comments went on to note that in looking at worker co-operatives at the present time, there are a great number of such initiatives in the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Many co-operatives in the province of Quebec exist to establish the feasibility of continuing to operate factories that are in trouble. In fact, the same principle can be applied in other sectors of our economy.

[English]

Mr. Laird suggested that one can see these initiatives in the delivery business. On the west coast, there are a number of instances in manufacturing. He said that, increasingly, the co-operative system as a whole is being asked for assistance with this kind of endeavour.

If we look at worker co-operatives as a whole, there are approximately, at this time in Canada, 15,000 workers who are members of such worker co-operatives, with about $300 million in annual sales. That means that we have approximately 400 worker co-operatives across the country.

These have been in Canada since the 1940s and they can be seen in such areas as heavy equipment repairs, textiles and furs, industry and wood-cutting, market gardening, building trades, and maintenance. There are actors, musicians, people in the consulting field, computer programmers, people in the print and electronic media, school bus contractors, people in towing, people in blueberry picking, cedar shingle production, restaurants, graphic art, food processing, bakeries, warehousing, and, of course, retail activities, to mention just a few.

Across the country we have a great many examples of social ownership developing. This motion suggests that it is important to protect and to extend this important role of social ownership. In the time I have left, I want to explain how it can be possible to extend this important role.

A special committee of federal and provincial officials has been meeting during over recent years. I give credit to the federal government for responding in a positive way to the suggestions of the Canadian co-operative movement for such activities. It has not moved as fast as I would have liked it to, but it has taken the issue seriously.

A special committee of federal and provincial officials has recommended three ways by which to improve, preserve, and extend this kind of social ownership. This special committee first has called on governments to provide equality of treatment so that worker co-operatives get the same kind of treatment from our financial institutions that small or medium-sized businesses receive. This would require the amending of some current legislation, some regulations that specifically limit the development of worker co-operatives.

Second, this committee has suggested that government should provide equality of opportunity. In other words, it should ensure that co-operatives are considered in the development and implementation of new programs which the government is putting into effect.

The co-operative movement, for instance, testified when the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act were being discussed, and I notice my colleague across the aisle, from Burlington, who was part of this discussion with respect to C-21. At that time the co-operative movement said: "Look, as originally drafted, these changes to the unemployment insurance regulations were not going to make it possible". At least it left it ambiguous whether it would be possible for members of worker co-operatives to use their UIC entitlement, as would be possible for those who were trying to start small enterprises to use that same entitlement to start worker co-operatives.

It has now proven to be the case that it will be possible in some of the regulatory changes which were made as a consequence of the presentations put forward by the Canadian co-operative movement. That is the kind of thing which has to take place to see that we do not have discrimination in regulations, that we have instead equality of opportunity.

Finally, this committee has suggested that governments have to overtly encourage the formation of worker co-ops. It seems to me that this requires what we as a party suggested five years ago in a report which came from an action group, which I co-chaired, called "Jobs Action Group", which aimed to provide some new bottom-up ways to increase employment opportunities, especially in some of the poorer regions of this country. To do that, however, will require some financial commitments on the part of government.

I want to finish my comments today by noting some of the suggestions which have come from the Worker-Ownership Foundation in Toronto which has set out a policy agenda direction in which government should move to provide this kind of financial support. It is something which we in this party certainly endorse very strongly.

I should say, of course, my colleague who is our spokesperson on co-operatives is here. I have to be especially careful that I do not make any mistakes in what I am saying as I carry this argument further.

The suggestion from the Worker-Ownership Foundation is that we need the implementation of a program that provides short term seed financing for specialized technical assistance people to come and work with newly establishing worker co-operatives. We also need the development of a tax credit that will partially offset the capital gains payable by existing shareholders who sell significant blocks of shares to qualified worker–ownership groups.

• (1520 )

We also need the development of a package of flexible debt financing instruments, loan guarantees, low interest loans, et cetera. I think if we move in this direction, the direction of encouraging this kind of social ownership, we will actually establish in this country some new innovations and some new initiatives in terms of bottom–up community development. It will give us new jobs in many parts of the country. It will preserve jobs in many parts of the country. It will give us fairer potential opportunities in many poorer regions of this country. It will, finally, and most important, give a greater sense of worker self–direction in many of the enterprises established through this form of social ownership throughout Canada.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to address the hon. member's motion. The context of my remarks have mainly to do with the broader question of social ownership. I did not realize the hon. member would address a specific aspect, that being co–operatives. But he has, and I would like to respond specifically to some of his remarks.

I believe that his goals are laudable, that is to have people control their own destinies through taking over companies which fail, and so on. He talked about equality of treatment, equality of opportunity and, third, that the government should overtly encourage worker co–operatives or production co–operatives by means of tax credits, flexible debt financing, loan guarantees and so on.

I believe the government could perhaps give them equality of treatment and equality of opportunity through some legislative measures if there is in fact discrimination. It is my belief that there probably is not discrimination. For example, if it means doing something along the lines of the way we fund housing co–ops, then it is just another market distortion means of interfering in the economy.

I would like to take an example of one housing co–op, the Sundance housing co–op in Edmonton. It was built in 1977. It receives no less than four government subsidies. This is fine if we are to provide housing for low and modest income people, but it distorts the housing market when we are providing housing accommodation for those high income people who are earning over $50,000. The four subsidies are a $280,000 outright grant, which is 10 per cent of the mortgage; a preferential 9.5 per cent mortgage, which was given for 50 years; a special, one time only, 1.5 per cent mortgage reduction subsidy for 50 years, which brought the mortgage rate down to 8 per cent; and the fourth subsidy, a $30,000 a year subsidy to the whole project. That is fine. Low income people and modest income people receive a subsidy. Of this $30,000 a year subsidy, people earning over whatever the cut–off rate is, I believe around $22,000, pay a modest surcharge of $72 a month.

A recent study done by CMHC said that 9 per cent of Canadians who live in these housing co–ops earn over $50,000. This is a terrible distortion of the housing market if they are taking advantage of up to four subsidies like are offered in the case of the Sundance housing co–op. If the hon. member is speaking of these types of subsidies when he talks about flexible debt financing, loan guarantees, tax credits and so on, I do not think we want anything.

Further on the matter of the Sundance housing co–op, it is my belief that the high income people should, after a period of time, when their incomes reach 50,000, move on to allow low income people or modest income people to have affordable housing. Thirty–four per cent of the people living in the Sundance housing co–op can afford a mortgage on a modest home. Why is the Government of Canada subsidizing them?

We cannot, with a $30 billion deficit each year on a debt approaching $350 billion, afford to keep subsidizing this and that and everything else. For your information, Mr. Speaker, there is a member of Parliament living in the Sundance housing co–op, the member for Edmonton East. He lives with four other people there, pays as his share less than $200 a month rent. I estimate the rent money that is paid on each unit is one–half of what it would cost in the private sector.

What happens is sometimes a clique develops which really distorts. There is a committee. They pick who comes into the co–op and once again, that is distorting the market. They are laudable goals that the co–operative movement can achieve, but sometimes by perpetuating some of these distortions and abuses of government programs, people are discrediting the whole co-operative movement.

I would argue that social ownership is no longer the route to go. If a group of workers wants to take over a plant that is closing, they can get together and put together a business plan. They can approach a bank. The bank can lend them money. They can put a management team in place, and that is fine. The government should in no way be involved in giving them preferential treatment to distort the market in order to favour a select group of people.

I was invited two weeks ago today to address the Co-operative Council of Edmonton, Alberta. They have an annual meeting that is made up of 15 members, two of which are housing co-operatives. There are other members, which the hon. member listed. There are credit unions, farm co-operatives, workers co-operatives, consumer co-operatives and so on. Two hours before I was to address them, I received a phone call. I was told I could not address them because I had spoken out against housing co-operatives and they felt it was not appropriate.

In this case, a few members of housing co-operatives who are earning over $50,000 a year were offended that I suggested that they should no longer take advantage of massive government subsidies. They were really offended and said: "No, we do not want you to speak here", even though they were only two out of 15. They were discrediting the whole co-operative movement by such a petty way of approaching what would have been a very rational and reasonable discussion.

I personally support housing co-operatives and other co-operatives. Housing co-operatives are a very good way of providing housing for low and moderate income Canadians, and the Government of Canada should continue to do that. But we should in no way subsidize high income Canadians, including two members of this Chamber, to be the recipient of massive housing co-operatives.

Social ownership has distorted what we want to achieve and we no longer should be involved in this manner. If we want to provide housing support, we should have housing support that is targeted at those in need. There are growing numbers of homeless people and low and moderate income people who need affordable housing.

• (1530 )

The co-operative movement should look seriously at what the hon. member is talking about, getting involved and becoming more active, but he should not be asking for government subsidies or loan guarantees or for taxpayers to support them in this manner. We support them in other manners through the unemployment insurance program and so on.

In closing, I would say that social ownership is not what we as Canadians want to achieve. We want the free enterprise system to continue. It has provided a lot of growth. Individual initiative has spurred growth and economic activity.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am thankful for the opportunity to rise and speak on this issue. As the member for Essex—Windsor is probably well aware, there are many worker co-operatives in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood. Carrot Common is one of them, and there are many others. I salute the work of these co-operatives. As the member mentioned, there is opportunity for more growth in the co-operative movement where all Canadians can be affected in a positive way.

First, I want to say that I am concerned about a couple of the tendencies that seem to creep forward from time to time where they try to put on an air of exclusivity. In other words, there are times when, if I go into the store and I do not have my co-op card with me, I do not tend to get the graciousness that one would normally get when one goes to any other store in the riding. In the area of public relations, the whole co-op movement would be much better served if those people who know it well and who practise it would be a little more approachable in the service they provide.

The member is missing a tremendous opportunity in the neighbourhood of financial services. He mentioned in his speech that the co-op movement had millions and millions of members across Canada. It would seem to me, if these members could be marshalled and organized in one or two of our principal financial institutions, that they could then use a very special kind of leverage because they were part of a co-operative financial institution. This could have dramatic effect on interest rates, on mortgage rates, and on entrepreneurial loans to small and medium sized businesses.

One of the problems we have with the co-operative movement today is that no one has taken the time to marshal the forces of the various membership. I remember a lawyer friend of mine, Joe Pomerant, spent about three years of his life working with various aspects of the co-operative movement. He showed that if he could amalgamate the various co-operative clubs which existed in Ontario and use that buying power, he could lower vacation travel costs by as much as 30 per cent or 40 per cent. Those are substantial numbers.

That same spirit could be applied to the workforce. We are dealing in a world where we have to show world-class competitiveness. It just cannot be at the negotiating table when we are redoing our union contract. It also has to be in the quality of our work and the level of productivity in our work.

If the co-operative movement were to factor this noble objective which I support into its negotiations, its wages might be a lot lower, thereby making us much more competitive and thereby making opportunity for job creation and growth a lot easier.

In the marshalling of the co-op movement the available spin-off resources are limitless. We have never really put a tight focus on how we can use this, especially during times of recession. However, as the member from Edmonton mentioned earlier, if these co-operatives are to be organized, if they are going to be like bridge points for exclusive clubs, if they are to be used to get preferential financing and once the financing is in place, people develop, grow and move beyond the basic objective of the system, to the exclusion of others, that is not a very sound or logical way to go.

The co-operative movement, time and time again throughout history, has pulled us through some very tough times. In any riding across Canada where there is difficulty, it is only when all of us get together and pitch in that we actually pull ourselves out of some of the severe crises that we get ourselves in.

The member from Essex—Windsor, the man who is the driving force behind this motion, he should perhaps start with a large financial institution to see if by marshalling the forces of all members of the credit union movement across Canada he could consolidate that resource and, having consolidated that resource, perhaps he could start a whole new trend in banking and interest rates. That would give credibility and trust to his objective more quickly than anything.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the hon. member for Essex—Windsor for presenting this motion, because it provides an ideal opportunity for showing how the government lived up to its promise of regional equity and justice for all Canadians, and especially how much has been done by Conservative members in Ottawa and especially by the tireless member for Roberval, the hon. Benoît Bouchard.

When this government came to power in 1984, it saw that despite the efforts of the previous Liberal government and the considerable sums of money it had spent on regional economic expansion, serious regional disparities still existed across the country. That is why our government embarked on an in-depth analysis of regional economic needs and decided to provide a framework for meeting those needs, something which had not been done before.

This new framework approach, which was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne in the fall of 1986, was intended to correct regional imbalances and under-development, while concentrating on the most disadvantaged regions. In line with this approach, new regional development initiatives were introduced, based on the specific needs of target regions.

• (1540)

That is how the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Department of Western Economic Diversification were created while Industry, Science and Technology Canada was given the job of looking after Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, let me explain for the information of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor how Industry, Science and Technology Canada has obviously succeeded in focusing its new economic development initiatives in the most disadvantaged areas of Quebec and Ontario by providing them too with promising opportunities.

In Quebec, on regional development, this government has developed an action program specifically aimed at achieving the goals hoped for by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, that is job creation and lowering unemployment, reduction of regional disparities between regions and technological development of businesses.

When we came into office in 1984, we agreed to pursue the industrial and regional development program, the IRDP, established in 1983 by the previous government. This program was to promote industrial and regional expansion by supporting private sector initiatives that offered the most opportunities for profitability, sustained growth and competitiveness in the international arena.

Even if the program was of national scope, the degree of assistance given to businesses varied depending on the level of social and economical development in the region where the projects were. So, the more a region was disadvantaged in terms of unemployment and income, among other things, the more assistance it might receive. So, the IRDP was taking into account the economic disparities, not only from region to region nationally, but also between different parts of the same province like Quebec.

The IRDP, by promoting the establishment of new plants and the modernization of existing ones, helped create and maintain thousand of jobs throughout Quebec. The program also had an "innovation" facet which helped promote technological innovation and development in a number of Quebec industries.

Anxious to adapt our regional development policies to the specific needs of the various regions, our government signed with the Quebec government, in 1988, a multisectorial and multiregional agreement for economic development. With a view toward harmonizing the actions of both levels of government and maximizing their impact, the agreement's main objectives were to speed the economic growth of the various regions of Quebec and increase the participation of local populations in the work force.

The five-year agreement has a budget of $820 million, $440 million of which, that is 54 per cent, coming from the federal government. I must emphasize, that the major part of the funds, $486 million, will be allocated to areas with a resource-based economy, as their industrial base is not very diversified and often fragile, and also because these areas are far from the main urban centres and have a much higher rate of unemployment. This is particularly true of my own riding of Abitibi, and the riding of Temiscamingue, in Northern Quebec.

In areas where the economy is resource-based, initiatives come under five distinct headings: Business development, Technological development, Natural resources development, Strenghthening of economic infrastructures and Human resources development.

That is why specific initiatives have been put in place in the agri-food industry, fisheries and aquaculture, as well as for the enhancement of the industrial and tourist sector. Also, we have just announced an innovations assistance program.

As for the central regions, we have established a manufacturing productivity strenghtening program, and we support seven initiatives for the development of the Montreal area. We have announced recently two programs, a depressed areas assistance program and an innovations assistance program. And the hon. member for Essex—Windsor could read in the record the statement I made in this House about the state of progress of this agreement with the province of Quebec. The hon. member will see that it is the member for Roberval, the hon. Benoît Bouchard who has done his homework and not minister Gil Rémillard.

Furthermore, the federal government promotes regional development in Quebec through subsidiary development agreements within specific sectors or areas. As early as 1985, our government and that of Quebec agreed upon a set of subsidiary development agreements in forestry and mining, the agri-food industry, fisheries, tourism, home entertainment products, transportation, communications as well as science and technology.

A total of $1.4 billion has been earmarked for those various sectoral agreements. The money was divided equally between Canada and Quebec. It includes an amount of $150 million that was covered by a draft agreement and was distributed in March 1990 into seven sectoral agreements.

By the same token, we prolonged most of the sectoral agreements until March 1991. Needless to say many measures and initiatives put into place under those agreements will contribute considerably to the development of Quebec regions.

As to the Montreal region, our government recognizes it faces particular problems. The unemployment and poverty problem in the central districts of the city of Montreal is particularly worrying. We know the east and southwest districts were the most affected by plant closings and massive lay-offs in the last few years. This is why the Canadian government has been actively promoting the economic renewal of that urban district for over two years.

The Industrial Recovery Program for East End Montreal, set up in June 1988, and PRISOM, launched in September of this year, both aim at re-inforcing and diversifying local industrial structures, attracting new investments, and furthering the creation and growth of new concerns, particularly small- and medium-sized businesses. The aggregate budget for these five-year programs is $50 million.

Mr. Speaker, a word now about the positive and constructive efforts of the government in northern Ontario through FEDNOR which was established in 1987 to make sure that this region gets all the help it needs to achieve its full economic development potential. The $55 million earmarked for this five-year project represented a major commitment, as a result of which a number of businesses were set up and jobs created in the whole region.

Under FEDNOR, over $26 million in federal funds were allocated to finance some 311 projects. I must emphasize the fact that they also created and maintained nearly 2,225 jobs. The FEDNOR advisory council which is responsible for ensuring the relevance of all the FEDNOR programs to the local needs was totally involved in these contributions.

This government, in response to the very favourable reaction of the public towards FEDNOR, and in spite of budget cuts, made sure that businessmen in Northern Ontario received the assistance they needed so very much. That is the reason why an additional amount of $14 million has just been allocated to FEDNOR.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, before blaming the government for its so-called disregard for regional equity, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor should have talked to the business people in Northern Ontario who appreciate in particular what the federal government has done so far for them through FEDNOR.

Mr. Speaker, FEDNOR has greatly helped business people in Northern areas meet the challenge and achieve their full potential. Under a special provision dealing with acquisition, FEDNOR is helping a whole series of Northern Ontario businesses sell their wares to the federal government.

Hardly a few weeks ago, representatives from over 80 businesses in 25 Northern Ontario communities came on a trade mission to the National Capital to present a sort of vista of Northern Ontario. This mission, sponsored and organized by FEDNOR, in co-operation with Supply and Services Canada, was intended to help Northern suppliers do business with the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, government activities in Northeastern Ontario, which is going through a difficult period, are worthy of note. In the Témiscamingue area, for instance, FEDNOR representatives have helped speed up processing of applications for regional assistance. Thanks to FEDNOR, investments by Pyrok and Dymond Clay will make a major contribution to the region's economy. We could name several programs, including agriculture, but above all, Mr. Speaker, this government has played a major role in recognizing the importance of the economy of Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec. My point is, Madam Speaker, that our approach has been successful. In fact, we are nearing our goal, which is equality for all Canadians. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the motion put forward by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is interesting and intriguing and I must just read it again so that we will see where we are going.

• (1550)

The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of protecting and extending the important role of social ownership in the economy, in order to achieve the social goals of full employment, regional equity, technological development and equality among Canadians.

I appreciate the hon. member's desire for full employment in Canada, and I understand and respect the hon. member's wish to invest in Canadian men and women and provide them with training and retraining opportunities that will allow them to participate fully in a thriving economy.

I know that he is sincere in putting forward his motion and his ambition to build a strong and competitive future for our country through full employment.

I would like to point out to him that laudable though his intentions may be, the motion he has placed before the House displays a lack of understanding about what is feasible in a land as diverse and complex as Canada. It shows a disturbing inability to grasp the complexities of our labour market.

I would like also to remind the hon. member that this government has always understood the importance of investing in our citizens. Indeed, we are at this moment making the very types of social investment he advocates in his motion. These investments come in the form of training and retraining Canadian workers in programs offered through the Canadian Jobs Strategy and our Labour Force Development Strategy.

We have always maintained that the failure to preserve a competitive workforce would have dire consequences not only for the individuals who lost their jobs but for Canada's economic prospects as well. That is why we have dedicated more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than any government in the history of Canada.

I noticed that the hon. member's motion did not define "full employment". This is understandable. Our organizations such as the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council which is also keen to see full employment has stated: "It would be impossible to come up with a definition of full employment with which everyone would agree."

In effect, the Advisory Council acknowledged that defining full employment would be as complicated as Rubic's cube. In its recent report on unemployment, the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council suggested that the figure of 4 per cent unemployment might be considered full employment.

It is our view that the selection of a single unemployment target such as 4 per cent is not feasible nor is it realistic, because Canada remains a country of great regional diversity. Governments cannot push a button to replenish the cod stocks in the Atlantic nor force automobile plants to the Gaspé coast where unemployment in particularly severe.

On top of that, Canada like the rest of the industrialized world, is facing rapid economic changes as international trading and manufacturing patterns evolve to adjust to a much more dynamic and unpredictable global market.

The choice of targets such as 4 per cent for full employment can also be very misleading. In fact, the unemployment rate of 4 per cent or less can even mask great disparities.

When the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was making his remarks in this debate, he made reference to financial institutions that may be able to present programs and have loans, mortgages and other financial transactions at a lesser rate than some of our banks and trust companies today.

I might say that my son is employed with Van City Savings and Loans in Vancouver, which I believe is the largest credit union in the world. It competes very well in that vibrant financial market in Vancouver with some pretty large numbers. It has done very well, but I might also note that most of the chief executive officers have come from some pretty large corporations to direct it and to give it good advice as it carries on down the road.

There are good areas for it. But it is not the workers' nirvana. Co-operatives have many forms.

At one time in business I formed a company where I had all the shareholders, who were mainly the employees, with the same amount of common stock. My investment differential was in the preferred shares. They said as long as the company made a profit and paid a dividend out of current earnings, that is the way it would run. But if the company lost money for two consecutive years, then the preferred shares would have voting power and the direction of the company could be changed. There are many forms that a co-operative can take. It is not the answer to all things in business, but it does have a place to play.

Let us compare the year 1967 in Canada, when the unemployment rate was 3.8 per cent to 1988, when the unemployment rate was 7.8 per cent. A single comparison of the two numbers would suggest that Canadians were better off in 1967 than they were in 1988.

After all, if we stick to the Advisory Council's definition of full employment in 1967, we were actually within the unemployment rate of 3.8 per cent. However, a closer look at the numbers suggests that everything is not quite so rosy, particularly when we compare the two years to the numbers of people who held full time, year-round jobs.

In 1967, the year with apparent full employment, 39 per cent of the population 15 years of age and older worked full time all year. But in 1988, a full 5 per cent more, or 44 per cent of the population held full time jobs year-round.

Let us compare what this has meant in dollars and cents for Canadians. And let's adjust the comparison to 1988 dollars so there will be no confusion.

In 1967, the year that meets the Advisory Council's definition of full employment, 14 per cent of the Canadian population enjoyed adjusted annual earnings of $25,000 or more. But in 1988, when we had an unemployment rate of 7.8 per cent, more than 25 per cent of the youth and adult population earned that much. Now, were we closer to full employment in 1967 or in 1988? Which would you choose?

What I am pointing out to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, is that full employment is much more complicated than his motion suggests.

This government believes that increased employment is possible and that the federal government has a significant role in achieving this goal. The government has recently authorized a new ceiling of $346 million for training measures in 1990. That is more money than we have ever before set aside for training in the past.

Because of these allocations, people who would otherwise have been looking for work now have the opportunity to increase their skills to find the work they want. This emphasis on active intervention such as training and re-employment, rather than passive income support, is endorsed by all member countries of the OECD. Our goal is to apportion even a greater amount of our labour market programming towards this end.

This change in emphasis, Mr. Speaker, lies at the heart of the Labour Force Development Strategy. The Labour Force Development Strategy will dedicate more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than ever before. A total of $800 million is being reallocated to expand the developmental use of unemployment insurance. The increased expenditures on active programs will raise our active mix of labour market programming from 25 per cent to 40 per cent.

The expanded developmental use of unemployment insurance funds will allow for more training, mobility, self-employment and other re-employment strategies, practical measures that will provide long-term benefit to unemployed Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbett): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being four o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at one o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 4 p.m.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Plamondon that Bill C-201, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code (scabs and essential services), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. members opposite are a little perturbed. I suppose they expected to be up first. Not always, fellows.

Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege, as always, to get up in this House on debate on any bill and, in particular, Bill C-201, as put forward by the hon. member for Richelieu. It is my privilege because, in my capacity as associate labour critic, I have points to make on the bill, which proposes amendments to the Canada Labour Code and basically deals with the treatment of scabs and essential services. On the one hand, the bill would prohibit the hiring of scabs to replace employees of Crown corporations who are on strike or locked out and, on the other hand, the bill would ensure that essential services are maintained in the event of a strike or lockout in a Crown corporation.

I share the sentiments of my colleague, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, who is the labour critic for Her Majesty's Official Opposition, that the anti-scab portion of this bill has certain merits. The treatment of workers who are locked out or on strike at a given company are, of course, severely undermined by the use of scabs. After all, when bargaining breaks down or when new contracts come up for renewal and workers exercise their right to strike, a right which has been long fought for, they are at a great disadvantage when scabs are hired to fill their jobs. In this respect, that portion of the bill which enshrines and upholds the rights of workers to strike, without interference by scabs, deserves support. Some portions of the bill are quite clear on this matter. Clause 90.2 declares:

> For the duration of a strike or lockout—a Crown corporation is prohibited from
> (b) using—the services of a person not employed by the Crown corporation to discharge the duties of an employee who is a member of the bargaining unit on strike—

—namely, a member of the union itself.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is a caveat in the bill, signed at the end of clause 90.2, paragraph (c), by the use of the word "unless". While the bill is clear about its intention not to hire scabs to replace workers, it does permit the preservation of essential services which are ambiguous and not clearly spelled in the bill.

The member sponsoring the bill made this House aware that he was concerned about essential services and Canada Post, as many Canadians are, and the fact that Canada Post is one of the Crown corporations which experiences great difficulties with respect to the use of scabs during a strike or a lockout. However, although the bill may be designed to remedy certain problems associated with Canada Post, there are other Crown corporations which would be put at a clear disadvantage through this legislation. The part dealing with maintenance of essential services is one such contentious point.

The changes to the Canada Labour Code suggested in this bill are further complicated by the changes at Canada Post itself. Many of its services and the way it does business have been altered, and the day may come when a greater number of its services are contracted out. At least this is apparently the trend. As my colleague, the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, so properly put it, and I quote from his remarks of the other day:

> When you change the mandate and the reason why you came into being, then you create difficulties for the union that is there.

Getting back to the point of essential services, the bill does not elaborate on what are considered essential services. There is a provision in the bill for the corporation and the union to agree to what are essential services but, apart from that, no definition is in place. The legislation would require that the two parties in the dispute would agree on a definition for essential services and would forward a list of those to the minister responsible for the Crown corporation. There the minister can keep tabs on essential services and can even decide, in conjunction with the cabinet, whether a strike is apprehended or in progress and can suspend the right to strike or order essential services to be maintained. Again, for the record, such essential services are not defined in the bill.

• (1310)

Shakespeare so often used the term "That's the rub". The executive powers conferred to ministers of the Crown responsible for particular Crown corporations are very broad. They would be able to order workers back to the job and put a stop to a particular labour force or union which has a legitimate grievance. The section in question, section 90.9 ordering the suspension of the right to strike, goes on to state that this may be done if the essential services provided for are insufficient and that the public health and safety are endangered.

I have two points: first, earlier in the bill the essential services are to be determined by the company and the union or by the union itself. Then we read that the minister responsible may determine the sufficiency of essential services and waive the right to strike. They are very broad powers indeed. Second, the part about public health or public safety being endangered is very unclear. Obviously this would relate to some sort of violence or confrontation, but I fail to understand how the situation of public health or safety would be remedied by ordering the suspension of the right to strike, thereby aggravating the whole process.

In short, portions of this bill are effective and we can sympathize with the member who has put forward his arguments in Bill C-201. However, still others need further clarification, and therefore it must be referred back to committee for some serious detailed analysis.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-201, presented by the member for Richelieu. First I would like to make a few comments in regard to the anti-scab part of this bill. That part we support in our party whole-heartedly, because we know what goes on, on the picket line, when a unionized group goes out on strike. We know of the tragedies that happen.

If I may I would like to make reference to one very recent occurrence that is still very vivid in my own mind, what went on in my riding in the town of South Porcupine at Dome Mines, where we saw a very ugly and bitter strike, where we saw life-long friends become enemies, where we saw families being torn apart. Why? It was because there were scabs crossing the picket line. The company saw fit to bring in workers from outside the province to keep the mine going. It said that the miners had to have a mine left over to go to after the strike, so it had to keep the mine going, but it went beyond that. The company went into production. Another atrocity was that it brought in students and used the students as scabs, and some of them were injured.

We know on this same picket line one worker in particular was dragged some 50 feet by a car that decided to drive through the picket line. We know of others who were injured. We also know that there was some bitterness from the union side. It only aggravated the situation. There is a definite need for anti-scab legislation in this country, and I think this is a step in the right direction. I say that with a certain amount of reservation because of the second part of this bill, which I will be speaking on in a few moments.

We have similar legislation in Quebec. It is in the form of anti-scab legislation with a difference. The difference is that in Quebec there is a committee set up to decide what is an essential service before the strikers go out and not decide it afterward as is suggested by this bill.

This bill in the second part gives the minister full authority to decide what is an essential service and what is not. Granted, there are certain sectors of these work places that do have essential services. There are certain areas that have to be maintained for the purposes of the workers having a job to come back to.

However, when we talk about essential service, we have to keep in mind that we are talking about services that would otherwise put the health and safety of Canadians in jeopardy. When I look at the list of corporations that I have, I wonder if we could say that the Federal Business Development Bank is an essential service when it comes to public health and safety.

We say that Lotto Canada comes under that jurisdiction. Can we say that the National Capital Commission comes under that jurisdiction? It certainly does not. Therefore I think we need further study of this bill. We must ensure that these kinds of questions are asked prior to this bill receiving Royal Assent. Further discussion is required on the whole matter.

I am suggesting that we intend to support this bill and send it to committee so that we can have further input into it and clean it up. There is no question that we need anti-scab legislation to protect workers who by law have been given the right to organize. They have been given the right to bargain and they have been given the right to go on strike, but they have not been given the right to stop someone from crossing the picket line and therefore jeopardizing the whole bargaining process.

What initiative is there for an employer to go back to the bargaining table and bargain in good faith when business can proceed as usual because scabs are being used? We must give workers the right to stop those scabs from crossing the picket line. The only way we are going to do that is with legislation like this bill, without the broad definition of the second part.

We need some form of mechanism which will ensure that employers will go to the bargaining table and bargain in good faith, knowing that if they do not they will not have business as usual.

In conclusion, I would strongly support the first part of this bill. I also strongly recommend that we have further input in the second part, which would give the minister too broad a brush to decide what is an essential service and what is not.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the proposed legislation currently before this House, namely Bill C-201, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

• (1320)

This bill is twofold in its purpose. If enacted, the legislation would prohibit the hiring of persons to replace employees of a Crown corporation who are on strike or locked out. It would also ensure that essential services are maintained in the event of a strike or lockout in a Crown corporation. While I acknowledge the concerns of the hon. member which gave rise to the introduction of the proposed legislation, my comments are directed more toward the approach which he has chosen to follow in introducing the bill before us. I would think that in considering possible amendments to existing legislation one might want to avoid disrupting the existing broad based framework for the sake of seeking to address an apparent specific and limited problem.

In this specific case, the hon. member is proposing amendments to Part I of the Canada Labour Code which would apply only to Crown corporations. Without, for the moment, debating the merits or weaknesses of the proposed amendments, let us look at the question of what one might view as a piecemeal approach to amending legislation.

Part I of the Canada Labour Code, which deals with industrial relations in the federal private sector jurisdiction and federal Crown corporations, is a balanced and comprehensive piece of legislation covering a broad spectrum of labour relations activities. These range from union certification and employer accreditation, through the collective bargaining process and the various stages of third party assistance available, to the rights and responsibilities of the parties involved and the extent of sanctions and prohibitions which may be applied in cases where it is judged that these established ground rules have been violated.

I am suggesting that it may be impractical for hon. members to consider specific changes to the Canada Labour Code dealing with the matters of replacement workers and essential services as applicable only to Crown corporations and in isolation from the remainder of the provisions of the code and the federal jurisdiction universe to which it applies.

Having addressed what I view as the inappropriate nature of the legislative initiative which is before us, I would now like to focus on the specific issues which are dealt with through the proposed bill. The question of essential services and the public interest is a topic which has come before this House on a limited number of occasions, namely when hon. members have been asked to consider back to work legislation in the case of a work stoppage of major significance.

As indicated earlier, Part I of the Canada Labour Code provides the framework for the collective bargaining process and also prescribes the various forms of third party assistance which are available to employers and labour unions to assist in resolving their differences at the bargaining table.

The vast majority of labour disputes at the federal jurisdiction level are settled without resort to strike or lockout action on the part of the parties. However, situations do arise from time to time where parties are unable to reach a satisfactory settlement and a work stoppage results, causing significant disruption to the economy or compromising the health and safety of Canadians.

It is in cases such as these that the government, as the protector of the rights and interests of the public, must accept its responsibility and bring about an end to the work stoppage.

The point to be made here is that a strike or lockout is an economic weapon utilized within the bargaining process and brings with it certain inconveniences or discomforts for those citizens whose access to specific goods and/or services is affected. Each situation involving a work stoppage must be assessed on the basis of the degree of disruption which it poses for Canadians and the seriousness of such disruption: Does it represent a threat to the economic viability of the nation or threaten the health and safety of its citizens?

In the federal private sector the government has been under severe pressure from time to time to prohibit strikes in so-called essential services. I use the term so-called essential services, and I should perhaps offer a word of explanation so as not to sound somewhat cavalier.

If one were to attempt to define and list essential services in Canada, it would in my view call for much sober thought. The public's perception of essential services can be somewhat capricious and may be dependent upon its frustration of the moment at being considerably inconvenienced when deprived of a service or a product through strike action.

To illustrate this point, I might refer to a strike which occurred some years ago in the United Kingdom and which involved the people who were responsible for changing the bulbs in the traffic lights. If one were to sit down and list essential services, I hardly think that these individuals would come under this heading. However, as the strike progressed the traffic in London was slowly grinding to a halt. If this resulted in a paralysed city, I suppose such a service could then be considered essential.

Given that there is undoubtedly an area where the public rightfully is inclined to pressure government for restrictive legislation, we have nevertheless at the federal level opted not to seek legislation which prohibits strikes in our area of jurisdiction. Instead, this government has sought mechanisms to further improve the functioning of industrial relations and to assist the parties to negotiate meaningful agreements and improve their day-to-day relationships.

Our free collective bargaining system made operative through the Canada Labour Code assumes that parties to the collective bargaining process will come to the negotiating table with a spirit of determination, a commitment to make the process work, and a sense of compromise reflecting the necessary give and take of the collective bargaining process.

While not prohibiting the use of replacement workers in the event of a work stoppage, the Canadian Labour Code does strike a balance in providing the protection for those employees who are affected by strikes or lockouts. The code provides that workers involved in legal strike action cannot be permanently replaced and have preference over any one hired to replace them in returning to their job following the conclusion of the work stoppage.

In addition, the code prohibits an employer from suspending, discharging or imposing any financial or other penalty on an employee who refuses to perform the work of another employee who participates in a legal work stoppage.

While the existing provisions may not satisfy the hon. member's concerns, they do provide Crown corporations an opportunity to continue functioning during a work stoppage, while at the same time they protect the rights of permanent employees who legally participate in such activities.

I would suggest that what the proposed legislation is doing is putting severe restrictions on the free collective bargaining process. As did its predecessor, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the provisions of the Canada Labour Code passed by Parliament provide an appropriate framework for the functioning of the industrial relations systems within the federal jurisdiction and have served us well over the years.

I believe that the best form of collective bargaining exists when the parties themselves are faced with the task of reaching an acceptable and workable agreement. The more restrictions placed in the process, the less likely the parties will be prepared to make the necessary tradeoffs and compromises provided.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Bloc Québécois are very proud to see this bill before the House today, and they are also extremely proud of the fact that one of their own members introduced this bill.

Amazingly, it takes something resembling a lottery for the House to consider one of the fundamental problems of any democratic country: the problem of civilized behaviour and discipline in relations between labour and capital.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to introduce certain democratic principles in our labour relations, principles that are known in many countries, and even in our own, in provinces like Quebec, for instance.

I heard previous speakers mention the need to maintain fairness and freedom in labour negotiations. That is what this bill tries to do. It is intended to ensure there is a balance between the various forces involved.

Mr. Speaker, I was there, front row centre, during a debate that almost shook Quebec to its foundations in the 1970s, in 1976-77, when the government at the time introduced anti-scab legislation. I can assure you that the arguments we heard against that bill were far more forceful and impressive than those we are hearing today. People said we were headed for disaster, Mr. Speaker. They said Quebec would become a war zone if this bill was adopted; that it would cause fundamental injustice; that strikes would last much longer and that there would be no more free negotiations; and that the unions would have an unfair advantage, in a confrontation that is always difficult to control.

After a difficult, long drawn-out debate, the Quebec government managed to get the National Assembly to pass Bill 45 which became our anti-scab legislation. And now, 13 years later, we still have a system that is much stricter and far more controlled than what is being proposed here. And as for the disastrous consequences that were predicted, if we look at the statistics, we see that since the anti-scab bill was passed in Quebec, the average duration of labour disputes has been reduced by 35 per cent. That is something to consider.

The bill before the House today does not ask us to go out on a limb; it is not fraught with unknown perils; and no disaster lurks around the corner once the legislation is passed. On the contrary, just look at the situation in Quebec. Admitedly, Quebec has been a pioneer in Canada in social affairs and civilized employer-employee relations. The House would be ill-advised to ignore the fact that Quebec has taken the lead as a result of the social and economic renewal which swept through the province in the 1970s, particularly by restoring proper employer-employee balance. I fail to see why anyone would seek to mainatin the status quo in this field.

This insistence on reliving the violent incidents of the 1930s reflects a peculiar attitude. As you may recall, savage freedom prevailed at that time. As one would say in Quebec, might was right. Invariably the strongest was the winner, for he could hire more scabs and attract strikers by dangling before them untold opportunities for stable employment. Do Canadians really want to go through that again?

Let no one tell me this has not happened since then, for we saw that in 1986-87 in the case of the bus company Voyageur, we saw that in the case of the grain elevators, the 1986-87 postal strike and again today in the port of Montreal where, we are told, scabs are now involved in an ongoing labour dispute. Is that the kind of labour relations the federal government is prepared to accept? Of course we did hear various arguments, such as: "Look, this is not going far enough, the minister wields too much power when it comes to defining essential services; this should be enlarged, covering government employees and all employers coming under a federal charter."

We agree of course, but we are only on second reading. Members who stand up to vote later today will be telling us whether, in principle, they agree or disagree that time has come to inject some civility into labour relations in Canada. And then if they want to move amendments, as we might ourselves, they will have an opportunity to appear before the legislative committee and propose any amendment they deem relevant or necessary. Should they feel dissatisfied about the way their proposed amendments have been dealt with on third reading they will still have the option to vote against the bill.

Claiming that one does not agree because the measure goes too far or nor far enough smacks of hypocrisy, because we all know that the parliamentary process gives us a further opportunity to do some fine tuning so the bill will more closely reflect our point of view. For now we are debating the principle and members will be asked whether they think Quebec was right 13 years ago to set up a tolerant system which restored real balance between opposing forces, which is exactly what they were, Mr. Speaker.

As management representative for many years I had to deal with strikes and I know very well that if we want to maintain proper balance between opposing parties there can be no question as to what is a strike and what is a lockout. Mr. Speaker, a labour dispute involving scabs simply cannot be called a strike, it is a subversive and hypocritical denial of the right to strike. One is either in favour of or against the right to strike—a basic right in social relations in this country. If you are in favour you do not want to lessen or indirectly undermine the worker's sacred right to strike, a right which Canadian employers have learned to live with.

Canada is not a Middle-Age country, Mr. Speaker. Employers have long since learned what a strike or a lockout is and they are quite prepared to negotiate. Quebecers have been living in this enlightened labour climate for 13 years now, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that this House would be undignified if it were to refuse to bring the federal government into the democratic context of the 20th century.

[English]

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join the debate on Bill C-201, a proposed amendment to the Canadian Labour Code which, if passed, would prohibit the hiring of replacement workers by a federal Crown corporation whose employees were on a legal strike or locked out by the employer. The bill also contains provisions which are intended to ensure that essential services are maintained in the event of a strike or a lockout in a Crown corporation.

I wish to commend the hon. member for Richelieu for the initiative which he has shown in bringing this particular subject to the attention of hon. members. There is no doubt that the employment of replacement workers during work stoppages is an issue which deserves careful consideration in this House. Whether or not the situation in federal Crown corporations dictates the need for legislation, such as is proposed in the bill, is a matter which individual members will have to weigh carefully based on the arguments put forward during the course of this debate.

[Translation]

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, Quebec is the only province that has legislative provisions banning the hiring of scabs. The law was first adopted in 1977 and amended in 1983 so as to cover outside consultants and subcontractors.

[English]

Several jurisdictions, including the federal realm under Part I of the Canada Labour Code, protects an employee's right to return to work following a work stoppage, in preference to a person hired as a replacement, and prohibit the disciplining of an employee for having taken part in a legal work stoppage.

In Quebec, two objectives of the legislation prohibiting the use of replacement workers were stated as the reduction of the incidence of violence in labour disputes and a decline in the duration of the work stoppage.

While the hon. member responsible for the introduction of this bill has suggested that there is evidence to indicate that the Quebec legislation has had the desired effects, much of the research to date has been proven inconclusive. Studies dealing with the question of violence associated with work stoppages have relied essentially on newspaper accounts and have not reached any definite conclusions with respect to the incidence of violence in situations where replacement workers were employed.

In the proposed Bill C-201, which would apply only to federal Crown corporations, essential service provisions would also be incorporated into Part I of the Canada Labour Code. The essential service issue in federal jurisdiction has been reviewed on several occasions. The code does not generally cover essential public services as defined by the International Labour Organization jurisprudence which would include fire, police and health protection. Beyond this strict definition of essential services, it would be difficult to envisage an administrative structure which could determine what is essential with respect, for example, to the operations of various Crown corporations such as the Canada Post Corporation, the Canadian National Railway or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In effect, in these particular cases, the law would be providing for partial operation which is a different concept to that of essential services.

In its review of the question of essential service disputes some time ago, the Report of the Task Force on Labour Relations chaired by H. D. Woods, outlined seven observations which it felt were fundamental to the determination of a scheme for containing such disputes. The task force suggested that: "It is extremely difficult to say with certainty or conviction in advance of actual events in what industry or service and at what time resort to economic sanctions ought to be curtailed." It went on to comment that "there can be no one policy of procedure that works with uniform success" and recommended that "flexibility of approach is essential lest the parties build the existing policy or procedure into their strategies." It concluded that circumstances may be expected to arise in the eventual course of industrial conflict in which disobedience and defiance of the law will not be forestalled by that law.

The task force conclusions remain valid, and I would suggest that the current provisions of the Canada Labour Code with regard to dispute resolution reflect the realities contained in these observations.

Again, I want to commend the member for Richelieu for bringing this to the attention of the House. It is something at which from time to time we are all obligated to look and I think this debate is most worth while.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to spend a few moments in addressing the bill before us this afternoon. I would like to compliment the member for Richelieu for bringing it forward.

For many years I think we were under the impression, and it appears to have been a false impression, that we had reached a more civilized level in industrial and labour relations than had been witnessed by some of the events of recent years.

The increasing amounts of money and time spent by many North American corporations on seminars for their staff, supervisors and personnel officers, runs into the hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars, has shocked those of us who, from time to time have been on the mailing lists of the corporations and companies that conduct these seminars on strike breaking and the hiring of replacement workers, to use a more polite phrase. We have been astounded at how little we seem to have learned over the years.

The concept of job ownership among the labour force is very deep. Working people in this country and particularly in certain parts of it, British Columbia, Quebec and northern Ontario, for instance, have always felt that it was their right to defend their their jobs with every bit as much reasonable force as this society expects people to use when their property or their home or their business is attacked.

We find the hiring of replacement workers or scabs or professional strike breakers on the increase. This is true not only in the private sector, but as we have seen, in the public sector, for example in the operation of Canada Post Corporation in the last few years. It is simply an invitation to violence which no civilized society can accept.

This bill is one small way, but a great start to put us on the path back towards more civilized relationships within industry, and more civilized relationships within society.

If I had more time, I would read some definitions of scabs and strike breakers and replacement workers that have been used from time to time simply to demonstrate to this House and to anybody who happens to be listening or reading the debates just how deeply some of those feelings are on the part of workers who see their jobs threatened by the use of scabs or replacement workers. It is important for us to understand the depths of those emotions so that we realize how important it is to adopt legislation along the lines now presented.

I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, and I think there are a few others, and perhaps even the author of the bill, believe that perhaps there is room for some refinement in the designation of what is an essential service. Is a definition which simply talks about the public health or public safety enough or is it too broad? Where are we going to restrict basic rights, which are as old as the Magna Carta? It said hundreds and hundreds of years ago that "no man shall be forced to build bridges". If they were not forced to build bridges, then I think it is entirely appropriate for us to believe today that the state, or any corporation, ought not to be taking measures to deny people the right to withhold their labour. It is a right which is as old as mankind itself. This proposal, which we welcome, is one which will introduce some civilization back into the workplace and back into industrial relations, and give us a chance to live harmoniously within this society.

We support the bill and look forward to seeing it in committee.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate today on Bill C-201, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. We have heard much about the intended purpose of the bill. We have also heard about some of the practical difficulties of implementing its provisions and about the implications for industrial relations in Crown corporations.

Hon. members who have spoken in debate have made a number of useful observations. Some of these remarks stand out as particularly relevant and, in my view, we should want to bear some of these in mind as we come to a conclusion on the desirability of the bill.

One such argument was to the effect that the bill could give a relatively small bargaining unit of a multi-bargaining unit employer, the ability to halt an entire national transportation network. The example used was CNR, the Canadian National Railway. If a railway could not use other workers to do the work of a small unit of employees on strike, the enterprise would not be able to continue operating. This would be an intolerable situation and one would have to question how legislation could be passed that would allow it to happen.

Another potential problem is the impact Bill C-201 would have on multi-union bargaining structures. Labour and management in the railway industry have come together in large scale multi-unit, multi-company bargaining structures on occasions in the past. Such wider based negotiating arrangements have the advantage of limiting the number of potential strikes facing employers and unions during the bargaining round. However, under the proposed anti-replacement worker regime, the enhanced power given to individual unions would likely have a fragmenting effect, increasing conflict in the system and preventing the occurrence of such broad-based bargaining arrangements that have been attractive to both companies and unions.

There are also special competitive factors that certain Crown corporations face. Crown corporations such as CN Rail would find themselves under a significantly different legislative system than their major competitors. Canadian National would be prevented from replacing workers on strike while CP, for example, would be in a position to do so. Crown corporations, in effect, could be placed at a disadvantage operationally and at the bargaining table. In short, Crown corporations, relative to their private sector competitors, would be made less competitive.

The designation of essential services as proposed in the bill introduces its own unique difficulties. On one hand, single facility operations such as hospitals are adaptable to such arrangements. On the other hand, transportation systems that operate on a continuous basis and have national and international connections require the maintenance of a highly evolved system of human resources and equipment co-ordination. The minimum staff concept associated with single plant operations would be extremely difficult to implement in a modern transportation system.

I mentioned that inequities would arise in the application of our labour relations laws as they apply to industries under the Canada Labour Code. I referred to CN Rail as the example. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is also a Crown corporation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.49 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired.

[Translation]

The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Richelieu. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint–Denis, on a point of order.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Since this is a private member's bill, I hope the House will agree to let us vote row by row, according to the custom we adopted recently, instead of party by party. I ask this since it is a private member's bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do I have unanimous consent for taking the division row by row?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may remind hon. members that the first to vote will be those who are in favour of the motion. I will start by requesting those members in the rows to the right of the Chair to rise, followed by members in the rows to the left of the Chair.

Subsequently, I will ask members in the rows to the right of the Chair who are opposed to the motion to rise, and I will conclude with those in the rows to the left of the Chair.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Plamondon), which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Laval-Est on a point of order.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I did not rise earlier, because I was late. I therefore preferred to remain seated. I want to put on the record that, had I been on time, I would have voted against this motion, even if the bill is commendable—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Della Noce: —because I suggest it is incomplete.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond on a point of order.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent in the House for members to revert to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to now proceed to Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

VIMY MEMORIAL SERVICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, yesterday hundreds of people congregated on a few acres of France that are forever Canada. They came to the lovely park land containing the Vimy Memorial.

Every November, crowds of French citizens join our own dignitaries and troops at a special service of remembrance to commemorate the 60,000 Canadians who were killed in the First World War.

The memorial itself stands on top of Vimy Ridge, the site of Canada's first and greatest victory. Our soldiers had been drawn from other armies to form the Canadian corps and attempted to take the heavily defended ridge. On April 9, 1917, they succeeded and won everlasting respect. My father was in that battle.

The French government graciously granted Canada some of that historic site in perpetuity. As I said, hundreds of French men, women and children went there yesterday and joined our ambassador to France, Mr. Claude Charland.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has expired.

ITALIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I rise in my place to compliment the Prime Minister, but today I would like to commend him for the official apology rendered yesterday to the some 700 Canadian citizens of Italian origin who were interned during World War II.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchi: Congratulations are also in order for the National Congress of Italian Canadians, particularly its outgoing president, Anna Maria Castrilli, for her perseverance in advancing this special cause.

The wounds borne by the former internees and their respective families were greatly soothed yesterday, soothed by words they longed to hear.

We in the Liberal Party welcome this progressive and just step. We share in the pride felt by the community. We urge the Prime Minister to bring the matter formally before the House of Commons in short order so we may successfully close this one chapter of the Canadian experience.

There will be those who say we cannot and should not take the responsibility to right the wrongs of our past. Why not? Is not our nation and people made stronger by such acts? This apology should not be interpreted as an act of weakness but rather as an initiative that reinforces people's belief in and commitment to Canada. It serves to remind all of us in this Parliament that the protection of basic human rights is something that we should be vigilant about every day.

ALBERTA WOMEN IN POLITICS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate former Senator Martha P. Bielish on the publication and distribution of the book that she commissioned entitled Alberta Women in Politics.

To quote the author, because of her lifelong involvement in politics and with women's organizations in the province, most notably the Alberta Women's Institute, the senator was acutely aware of the inaccessibility and lack of information on women who have contributed so much to Alberta's public life.

I must commend Mrs. Bielish's initiative as well as her dedication in working for equality. Education and information are crucial. As a former school teacher, she recognized and contributed to raise the awareness level of the plight of women and their goal of both gender and economic equality.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the Minister Employment and Immigration to implement a simple solution to what has become a democratic nightmare, namely, to allow new parents simply to avail themselves of the new parental benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act as of January 1, 1990. She said no. Her refusal clearly shows how out of touch is the minister.

Reports from all over the country indicate the severe confusion taking place. New parents do not know what to do and, simply put, neither do the employment centres.

We ask again that the minister clarify the situation once and for all. It is bad enough she has taken away crucial benefits from working families during a recession by gutting the UI program. They should not be made to jump through a hoop to get what little benefits are left.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Sir, speaking as one proud Canadian and as a former broadcaster, I am genuinely excited about the electronic process which is available to the 12-member Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future.

I know that our private broadcasters have always been very supportive of ways to help soothe the wounds and foster greater understanding between Canadians. Within some sort of realistic framework, they and the cable community channels could grasp this window of opportunity to provide up-link satellite feeds. It would enable the greatest possible participation by Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

It would be wonderful to watch simultaneous town hall meetings in, say, Dundas, Ontario; Whitehorse, Yukon; and Corner Brook, Newfoundland, with the commissioners located in Trois-Rivières.

It can be done. Canada is an improbable nation. Keith Spicer and this commission face an improbable task, but our forefathers did it. In the name of our children, I feel a tingling sense of optimism that this citizens' forum will help keep Canadians united.

MEMBER FOR CHAMBLY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I was astonished when I read the statement made by the member for Chambly, a member of the New Democratic Party to the effect that he won't be speaking for his party when he declares himself in favour of sovereignty-association, although he doesn't agree with the definition of the PQ, and he is against Quebec's independence. Before his election, M. Edmonston supported the Meech Lake Accord. Since his election, he has been against it. I wish to give a piece of advice to the member for Chambly, but not as member of the New Democratic Party: if a referendum is held, let his position be clear and unequivocal. I understand!

CHILD TAX CREDIT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in defence of thousands of Canadian children, children who may not see the Christmas they were promised by this government.

The finance minister's press release on Bill C-86, the advanced child tax credit, confidently stated that his government would:

> —expedite its consideration, so that prepayment of the—credit may be made in November.

November is here, but where is the bill? Questioned last week as to when it would be raised in the House, this government committed to nothing. Let me now urge the finance minister to re-read his own press release and to act and act now.

Low income families have made plans for their credit, taking the government's word that the cheque was as good as in the mail. I fear that children who can least afford it will be short-changed. Above all, I fear that in Canada the grinch who stole Christmas is not just a cartoon character; he is a minister of the Crown.

ITALIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval-Est): Mr. Speaker, I also want to echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for York West and all members of Italian descent who sit in this House. Yesterday the Prime Minister of Canada apologized to Canadians of Italian origin for the hardships caused by the government in office during World War II.

November 4 will be a historic day for people of the Italian community because justice was rendered at last.

After half a century of silence during which successive governments in turn failed to apologize for so unjustly incarcerating more than 700 Italian Canadians, most of whom lived in Montreal and Toronto, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, had the courage to re-open and correct a page of our history, an initiative which none of the previous governments ever did take.

Ever since I first entered politics, Mr. Speaker, I never thought I had made a bad choice when I ran under the Conservative Party banner.

Today I say publicly that I am proud to be a member of the Conservative government of Brian Mulroney, all the more so because this was the outcome of an electoral commitment to Canadians of Italian origin and to the whole Italian community—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for York Centre.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are entitled to look to the national political parties as instruments of national unity. In times of regional tensions like today, parties are expected to offer support for unity, each working out its concept for binding our country together.

In this connection, it has to be noted that members of the NDP seem to have developed two faces. Outside Quebec they present a face which continues to speak for a renewed and strengthened federalism. Inside Quebec, their sole MP, the member for Chambly, calls for a sovereign Quebec with an association in economic matters with the rest of Canada.

• (1430)

We know this message is attractive right now to many Quebecers, but it does not square with the party's policy outside Quebec. This is not a contribution to national unity. The NDP two-faced policy is a disgrace.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Senator Murray says that it is futile to examine native issues while the national unity debate is on. He says: "Wait until after the Spicer group reports in July of 1991". I think this is wrong-headed, and it could be disastrous for Canada and for native people. Things can be done, progress can be made parallel to Spicer.

I draw the government's attention to an eloquent speech by Roberta Jamieson, Ombudsman for Ontario and herself a native Canadian. Last September in Halifax she said: "The issues, native issues, should be resolved, not buried". All the provincial ombudsmen agreed with her proposal for a federal commissioner to mediate day-to-day issues regarding native people. This is positive.

I warn the government in my home province of British Columbia that the situation at the roadblock on the Duffy Lake Road, near Pemberton, is about to explode. We could see another Oka in British Columbia. Let us not see that. Let us move now on native issues.

COMMUNICATIONS ON THE LOWER NORTH SHORE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, communications are extremely difficult year round on the lower north shore of the St. Lawrence River and in particular in the riding of Manicouagan.

The villages of Baie-Johan-Beetz, Kégaska, La Romaine, Harrington Harbour, La Tabatière, Mutton Bay, Aylmer Sound and Tête-à-la-Baleine are served by seaplanes in summer and by skiplanes in winter.

[English]

In the fall and the spring these isolated villages are linked by helicopter with the closest airport.

The basic necessities required by the people of these communities are obtained at great cost to them. The time has come for our government, in co-operation with the provincial government and with the local municipal authorities, to put in place the means to improve the transportation facilities on the lower north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

CRIME PREVENTION WEEK

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, as you know this is Crime Prevention Week in Canada. Police forces across this country have been fighting a tough war against the illegal drug trade on their streets and in their communities. Drugs have been cited as a major cause of violence and crime in Canada.

The federal government acquires large sums of money through its proceeds of crime legislation and through seizures of cash in drug investigations. It has the ability to redirect all or a part of these funds from drug seizures to local police forces to aid them in their difficult battle. Do not forget that it is these very police forces that often finance the investigations and put up the front money in these cases. This money often comes from municipal taxpayers.

I urge this government to begin sharing the seized proceeds of crime with other Canadian police forces on an equitable basis to maximize the effective use of resources and permit these police agencies to share in the assets that their work produces.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last week in New Brunswick the Minister of Income Assistance announced that the Government of New Brunswick will exempt the goods and services tax credit from consideration as income so that those with lower incomes will benefit from the credit. In other words, in cases of need, there will be no erosion of assistance from the province of New Brunswick.

This is a positive move and the province should be congratulated for it. This virtually assures what we have been saying all along, that lower and modest income Canadians will be better off under the new system, the GST system.

SOVEREIGNTY FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend, the Prime Minister tried to convince us that federalism made economic sense for Quebec. What does he take Quebecers for?

The existing federalist monetary policy is disastrous for Quebec. Hundreds of businesses are going bankrupt because of the exchange rate. The furniture industry is in crisis. Pratt & Whitney is laying off more than a thousand employees.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the federal regime breeds economic instability in Quebec. Only if it were sovereign could Quebec demand a monetary policy promoting economic stability and growth in the province. Therefore, only in sovereignty can Quebec find the assurance of stability and growth.

CHILD HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the 1989 report of the Canadian Institute of Child Health cited preventable injuries as the leading cause of death for Canadian children between the ages of five and fourteen.

All members will agree that the health of our children is everyone's concern. All sectors of society must work to propose innovative ways to address the causes of these injuries.

The Sifton Safety Home, promoted by the London, Ontario, board of education is a good example. The concept encourages home safety and seeks to reduce or eliminate child injuries in the home.

In the safety home, children are accompanied by teachers and parents. They move from room to room and are encouraged to identify and recognize household dangers.

For the 3,000 children who will visit the safety home this year, the experience offers first-hand reinforcement of what to look for and not to do within the home.

Programs like The Sifton Safety Home, a private sector and public sector sponsored project for children's safety should be lauded. Hopefully, it will be expanded into a children and youth educational program in the future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister about the government's handling of the Rafferty-Alameda situation.

Last Thursday, the government's own lawyers went to court in Saskatchewan and asked the court to delay for six days, until this Wednesday, the government's request for an injunction to prevent the province of Saskatchewan from completing the Rafferty-Alameda project until there had first been a complete environmental assessment.

Now we learn that the federal Minister of the Environment has left the country and will not be back until the following week, November 13. This means he will not be available to be cross-examined on his affidavit. This means he will not be available to be a witness in the court proceedings that are starting, supposedly, next Wednesday.

In the light of these facts, how can the government be taken seriously when it says it wants to have the Court of Queen's Bench in Saskatchewan issue an injunction to prevent the Rafferty project from going ahead and not being completed before there is an environmental assessment, when it has allowed a key witness to be out of the country for two weeks and to be out of reach of the court proceedings for that entire period?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are several facts that the hon. member should be aware of, if indeed he is not.

Late last week the representatives of the Saskatchewan government filed very detailed and somewhat voluminous affidavits in the court prior to the hearing, which was scheduled for Thursday. As a result, the lawyers representing the Government of Canada quite appropriately asked for enough time to file counter affidavits, which were filed by the deadline on Friday.

Those affidavits have now been filed before the court. They are available to the judge in question, and to all interested parties. The judge, and certainly the federal government is agreeable to this, has indicated that the hearings will proceed on this coming Wednesday without any delay. All of the evidence is now before the court. Our commitment to securing that injunction to stop work on Rafferty–Alameda is proceeding as scheduled. We are very hopeful that a decision will be reached on Wednesday or shortly thereafter.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has failed to give any answer as to why the Minister of the Environment, a key witness in these proceedings, is going to be away, not until this coming Wednesday, but until the Tuesday of the following week, so that the province of Saskatchewan will be unable to cross-examine the minister on his affidavit, and so that he will not be there on Wednesday of this week to be a witness.

If the government is serious about this court action, why is it allowing the minister to be away? Is it not a fact that the government is just going through the motions and does not really want to have the court rule before the Rafferty project is completed?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment, the critic for the New Democratic Party, the critic for the Liberal Party and another interested observer, a former minister in the previous government, are all attending a significantly important meeting in Geneva on climate change with respect to the emission of CO2. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that if the Minister of the Environment had not kept his obligation to attend that ministerial meeting, then the opposition would be on their feet accusing us of having failed in our international obligations.

• (1440)

The appropriate information is filed before the courts in the form of affidavits. The Government of Canada will be represented. The Minister of the Environment will be represented by the appropriate lawyers and the proceedings will occur this coming Wednesday as scheduled.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the environment critic for the official opposition is not a witness in this case.

Mr. Gauthier: Right.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The environment critic for the NDP is not a witness in this case, but the Minister of the Environment is and he cannot be a witness through his lawyer.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, if it is so important for the minister to be at this conference which ends the 8th of November, why does the minister not come right back? Why is he going on to spend another five days not at this conference, but in London, England, briefing the High Commissioner on the Green Plan—something he has not done for this House—and meeting with environmental groups? Why is that more important than being physically present in Canada to testify on behalf of the federal government to get the injunction against Saskatchewan in the Rafferty–Alameda case? Why the extra five days? What is the explanation for that?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the question of the Leader of the Opposition really defies credulity, and it is an attempt to try and create an impression that is totally unjustifiable. The motion in front of the court in Saskatchewan is a motion for an equitable remedy for an injunction.

The evidence has been put before the court in the form of affidavits. It may or may not be the case, but there is no reason to believe that there will be motions to cross-examine on the affidavits. Those have not been put forward. It is not a trial. There is no viva voce evidence in this particular proceeding.

If for some reason the court should decide to grant a motion to cross-examine on the affidavits, it is quite feasible for the Minister of the Environment to return to Canada very quickly to meet that obligation. But there is absolutely no reason to believe that he would be required to do so, and it would be irresponsible of him to cancel this very significant international obligation on behalf of Canada in order to sit around wondering whether he would be called forward when it is highly unlikely that he will be.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the debate in this House over many weeks has centred around whether or not there was an informal agreement between the Minister of the Environment and the Premier of Saskatchewan. I have in my hand the affidavit of Ralph Pentland, Director of Water Planning and Management Branch saying: "When the minister and the premier joined the officials, including me, for lunch, the minister and the premier seemed to have reached some understanding for a course of action. The minister described the concept he and the premier had been discussing".

What were those understandings? What was the agreed on course of action? What was the concept, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer and there are times in my political career—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is unusual to have such unanimity of support in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I would have assumed, as a layperson, that one of the reasons we have a court system and appoint distinguished lawyers to be judges, is so we can take evidence of this nature, place it before the courts and let the courts decide.

We on this side of the House applied to the appropriate court in Saskatchewan to seek an injunction, because we believed that the agreement of January 26 had been broken. We have provided evidence of that fact to the court. The opposition to that request for an injunction has supplied its own evidence. But, surely, it is up to the courts, rather than the House of Commons, to decide how that hearing should proceed and what the results should be.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister and the government are answerable to this House, not to the courts. This House wants some answers.

The minister's affidavit itself demonstrates clearly that over a period of weeks he was trying to bully the review panel into accepting—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. That is an accusation arising out of a court process. If this was a criminal case, of course, none of these questions would be order. It is a civil case and what is in front of the court right now is a conflict between the various people who have filed affidavits.

The hon. member's question went to the government and said what has happened, and I allowed it. But I have to say that if by picking up one affidavit or another that is going to be the basis of a charge against a member, I do not think that is an appropriate question to ask.

Perhaps the hon. member can rephrase her question, but I do not want it to be repeated as it was put.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think it is entirely appropriate for the House to be informed and I would hope the government would choose to respond—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am trying to point out to the House that under the circumstances and the content of the question that was put, I feel that it is inappropriate. The House is undoubtedly going to be informed when a judge makes a decision. When there is conflicting evidence in front of the court, it seems very difficult to ask the House, or a minister, to decide which affidavit ought to be accepted. That is clearly a task for the judge.

If the hon. member has a direct question which goes to the root of government policy or government action then, of course, it is acceptable. I would ask the hon. member to consider carefully the way she puts the question.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could simply ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment what was the concept Mr. Pentland was talking about? What was the understanding and what was the course of action agreed upon?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties, as you have already indicated, is that if hon. members stand in the House to read one of several somewhat conflicting affidavits, then we are at a bit of a disadvantage unless we are to take the House's time and read all the affidavits and place them before the House.

I would like to repeat what I said before. The fact is that this case is before the courts and it is up to the judge to make that judgment.

In response to the hon. member's question, let me also refer to another affidavit, which I am sure she has before her, even though she did not mention it, and that is of Norman Spector. He talked about the fact that Premier Devine visited with him and talked about a proposal. A proposal in my mind, again as a layperson, is very much different than an agreement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In about a month, almost 16,000 more Canadian jobs have been lost. This weekend New Democratic leaders from across the country met to discuss the very serious state of the economy, and it is the same everywhere. Whether it is the family farm that is being devastated, fisheries, or the manufacturing sector, the economy is in big trouble.

The job losses mount each week with 310 jobs losses in Kamloops, 240 in Windsor, 370 in Brantford, 200 in McMasterville, 461 in Timmins, and so on. The list continues. These are people we are talking about and it is a very, very serious situation for Canadian families across the country.

There was a consensus by New Democratic leaders that a national crisis requires a national solution. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, when will the Prime Minister be prepared to announce a first ministers' meeting on the economy so that all the provinces, territories, and the federal government can discuss this?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has commented on this, but I do want to say to the hon. member that I will be having a meeting with the finance ministers from the provinces. We have not set a specific date, but it is traditional at this time of year for us to get together to review the state of the economy, to review what policies might be put in place, both federally and provincially, and to consider this in the context of the budgets that will be forthcoming from all of our governments early in the New Year. At that time we will be able to address some of the concerns that she has very appropriately put before the House.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians cannot wait. It is a national crisis. Surely, it is serious enough that Canadians every day lose jobs. They do not know how they are going to put food on the table. Economic indicators again today from Statistics Canada indicate that the economy is going down. Surely, this is an important enough situation for the Prime Minister himself to meet with the premiers and to address the situation. The Minister of Finance has repeatedly told us his plan to meet the needs of the international money markets. Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what the government's plan is to meet the real needs of Canadians, to do something about creating jobs, and to make the economy more healthy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been quite clear what the plans, proposals, and strategies should be to address the current weakness in the economy.

We have indicated that as soon as we saw the weakness developing in the spring of this year, we could see a reduction in interest rates. That reduction has continued through. We have had about one and a half percentage points since the peak of interest rates in the spring of this year.

As the weakness in the economy continues and as we see a continuation in the easing of inflationary pressures, we should be able to see a continuation of that drop in interest rates.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. He talks about addressing the inflation rate, but the government and the Minister of Finance are prepared to introduce the GST which, by the government's own admission, is going to increase inflation. From that we have to assume that the interest rates will go up again.

If the Minister of Finance is serious about the inflation rate and if he is serious about having lower interest rates and yet by introducing the GST is going to increase inflation, will the Minister of Finance withdraw the GST now and keep the interest rates down?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes reference to the goods and services tax. I am sure she knows this, but I draw to her attention that the goods and services tax is going to lower the cost of new investment, new buildings, new plants, new equipment, and new technology. As that new technology, investment, plant, and equipment come on stream, jobs will be created in construction. The competitive position of the Canadian economy will be improved.

While my hon. friend is correct in that there will be a one-shot 1.25 per cent increase in the cost of living, the ongoing impact of the GST is to reduce the inflationary pressures. It will reduce the cost of production of businesses, whether agricultural, fishery, resource, manufacturing, or service sector businesses. So, in a very real way, it will reduce inflationary pressures on an ongoing basis.

The important point that I think I should address in the hon. member's question is the simple fact of the 1.25 per cent increase in the cost of living does not mean that interest rates will go up. What the Bank of Canada has said on an ongoing basis is that it will be looking at the underlying rate of inflation in the economy. If that continues to ease, as it has, then we will be able to see some reduction in interest rates.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The continuing growth in the federal deficit has not only led the government to borrow offshore, but it has drained domestic savings to the point where the private sector, too, must look abroad for its borrowings. As a result, Canadian funds in the form of dividends or interest payments are going abroad at an accelerating rate, pushing the current account deficit to record levels.

Can the Minister of Finance tell the House what he plans to do to stem this increasing flow of Canadian wealth abroad?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the very clear direction that we have been following for the last six years is to get the federal government deficit down. We have been successful in getting the federal government deficit down against the opposition of the hon. member's party, not him, I might say, but all his colleagues in the House of Commons and in the Senate today with the opposition to the GST. In every way that we have turned to get the deficit down, we have been met by opposition from the members opposite.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hear the hon. members cheering that we are not getting the deficit down fast enough. They are doing this, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Shame.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): The minister knows very well, Mr. Speaker, that the debt has more than doubled since his government came to office. The minister also knows very well that the deficit is at a very high level, near the record levels of the past years. The minister knows that as well as I do. The Minister of Finance also knows that Canada can attract foreign funds only if the Bank of Canada maintains its high interest rate policy. Yet, it is that very same policy which is sharply eroding business profits, causing unemployment, and hindering the essential investments in our future.

How does the Minister of Finance propose to correct Canada's growing foreign imbalance when his own policies are crippling our export industries?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says we made no progress in getting the deficit down. I should remind him it was $38 billion in the last year of the government that he was a part of. In the last year, it was $28.9 billion. As a per cent of our economy, it has gone from 6.7 per cent to 3.1 per cent of our economy, so we are making very real progress.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What I would say to the hon. member is he cannot have it both ways. Every time we have brought out a budget to get the deficit down, each one of the items that we have proposed to use to get the deficit down, his party, his colleagues, have opposed.

I agree with him, we should be getting the deficit down. But if the Liberal Party would stop sucking and blowing, we might get some more progress here.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

THE CITIZENS' FORUM ON THE FUTURE OF CANADA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, in this House, the Acting Prime Minister said that no more people could be added to the membership of the Citizens' Forum on the Future of Canada, chaired by Mr. Keith Spicer. There will be no room for francophones, for people north of the 60th Parallel, and for a wide spectrum of ethnic communities. Yesterday, before the National Convention of Italian Canadians in Toronto, the Prime Minister was saying and I quote: "That there was room for additional appointments".

Mr. Speaker, the question that arises today is this: Whom are we to believe? The Prime Minister, who says anything, anytime, to woo Canadians, or the former Secretary of State, who told us Friday that there was no room for additional people on that commission?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think that all members of the House would agree that the panel that forms the membership of this very important instrument is made up of very distinguished Canadians who represent all walks of life and, I think, represent a very good cross section.

What is important to recognize is that these individuals are not intended to act as representatives for any one specific group or another. They are part of a group which will facilitate and encourage dialogue and discussion so that a consensus can emerge.

What is most important is the facility to allow all Canadians, regardless of where they come from, regardless of who they are, regardless of what walk of life they are engaged in, and regardless of what ethnic composition they come from, to have a clear opportunity to come forth before this panel, represent their views, engage in the dialogue and allow themselves to be heard so that all Canadians can take advantage of it.

• (1500)

I think that is the most important feature, and I regret that the hon. member has lost the thrust of this whole function.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has lost the question. It is a simple one.

Are there going to be additions? Yes or no.

No answer.

During a radio interview this weekend, Keith Spicer, the new chairman of the Citizen's Forum, said: "We will create a receptive climate in English Canada for the Quebec Bélanger-Campeau commission's recommendations, especially if they are radical".

My question: Who gave chairman Spicer the new mandate to create a receptive climate in English Canada for the Bélanger-Campeau commission's recommendations if they are radical, and do tell what this mandate means? Please do tell.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the mandate is pretty clear. I have it in my hand. It was tabled in the House of Commons last Thursday, and I ask the hon. member to re-read it.

Perhaps he will get an idea of what the mandate is all about. When he is suggesting that there should be additional members, how many members is he proposing? Does he want to expand it to 24, 50 or 100?

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the House that it being three o'clock, we need the consent of the House to continue Question Period.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that we started Question Period late today because of the intervening vote.

Usually, with these kinds of things we work them out in discussions with the opposition in advance.

We had certain agreements as to what was going to occur this morning, and that turned out to be a surprise to us different than what we expected, which disappoints me.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, you can well understand that my cabinet colleagues will have commitments that they made and meetings they have to attend.

I have no problem agreeing to an extension of Question Period for the benefit of the opposition, if in turn it will acknowledge that some of my cabinet colleagues will have to leave. They may not be here for their questions.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has made it clear that we cannot continue without consent. Is there consent to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Canadians are very concerned about the extent to which our policies in the Persian Gulf are being driven not by our Canadian–UN peacekeeping role, but rather by election strategies in the White House.

I ask the minister to confirm that our squadron of CF–18s in the gulf has come under the effective tactical control not of Canadians but of a U.S. air combat director aboard a U.S. cruiser. Will the minister indicate what concrete efforts Canada is taking to bring all troops in the Persian Gulf under effective UN command and not under U.S. command?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, without for a moment agreeing with any of the premise of the hon. member's statement, the Canadian squadron of CF–18s is under a tactical control.

The hon. member should understand what that means. That means there is information fed through at least three separate vehicles to a controller. The command of the aircraft is strictly under the command of a Canadian.

Our allies who we work with in the gulf understand fully Canada's rules of engagement, and therefore they have been informed prior as to what commands Canadians can accept or reject.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, quite clearly it is the U.S. that is calling the shots in terms of tactical control.

My supplementary question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Ten days ago, the minister deeply alarmed Canadians with his dangerous sabre rattling talk of Canadians dying in a gulf war.

I want to ask the minister whether he now recognizes that as U.S. Senator Sam Nunn, has said: "War would be a bloody and costly effort. We ought to give all other options, including the embargo, a chance to work." Does the minister recognize and agree with that and, most important, will the minister now finally agree that no offensive military action should take place in the gulf without a clear United Nations mandate and, most important, without a full debate and vote of the Parliament of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a curious irony that a party that is so deeply anti–American as the New Democratic Party is should find itself capable only of believing a proposition when it comes from the words of a United States senator.

Of course I support the view that was just quoted, by Senator Nunn. I have been saying that, as members of this government have, for some time. Indeed, the reason that we are there and the reason that we are making it clear that we intend to follow through on Canada's commitment with respect to sanctions and with respect to moving Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait is precisely because we know that he does not believe paper tigers. We know that he will only take seriously the threat of action by Canada and by other nations if it is clear that we intend to follow through on the actions that we have forecast. Of course, we would prefer to do that through the United Nations.

That is why Canada has been working so very diligently, and with some substantial effect, to try to achieve unanimity within the United Nations. We are still doing that. We would prefer a United Nations command, but we do not want Saddam Hussein to believe that the world will simply walk away and there will be no carrying forward on the positions that have been taken in the United Nations and elsewhere if, per chance, there is a veto by one nation, one member of the Security Council. We do not intend to have the broadly supported position of Canada on this question under-cut by a potential veto by some other country in the United Nations. Surely that is sensible.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister on the same subject. It is reported that Secretary of State Baker has been visiting a number of senior government officials in those countries which are participating in the multinational force to determine in fact if they are prepared to engage in offensive actions against the Iraqis in Kuwait.

I want to ask the Secretary of State if, in fact, he has had those consultations yet with Secretary Baker or are such consultations planned, and does the Secretary of State intend to make Canada's position clear, that we do not want to participate in any offensive action against the Iraqis and will give sanctions a proper and long-term opportunity to work their way out and force the Iraqis to withdraw without the use of force.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it may be some help if I quote the words of Mr. Baker as they appeared in the Sunday Gazette:

> "The overall purpose of the trip is to discuss, with our coalition partners, strengthening the full range of measures that we have taken to isolate Saddam Hussein—and thereby to lay the foundation for the possible—execution of all options,"—

Certainly, from Canada's point of view, the option that we prefer is an option that demonstrates enough strength to Saddam Hussein that he, peacefully, leaves Kuwait. That is the purpose of our policy; that is the policy that we have been pursuing actively.

Is there consultation with the United States? Of course there is, as there is with the other countries, the broad array of countries, 25 of which have troops of one form or another in the region, a wide range of which are associated through the Security Council and other actions of the United Nations.

Will there be debate in this House? There was debate in this House. There was the recommendation from this House that the matter should be carried on to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. It was before that committee that my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and I appeared. We are prepared to come again. The Ambassador to the United Nations will be there. We certainly are going to take every step we can to ensure that Parliament is fully involved in the discussion of this issue. We have been doing that; we intend to continue to do that. We intend to have Canada meet its international obligations.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we would still like to know whether in fact Canada has been directly engaged in this round of consultations with Secretary of State Baker because it seems that with the impending U.S. Congressional elections, that would be a very major turning point. Would the Secretary of State would answer that question?

I also wish he would respond to the plea that was contained in yesterday's Calgary Herald in a letter written by a Canadian nationalist who is being detained in Iraq who said that he feels betrayed because we have not sent a special envoy.

• (1510)

I ask the minister if the government has now decided whether to take some special actions, such as sending a delegation, or would it be asking the Secretary General of the UN whether he would undertake to go to Iraq and make the case to free the foreign nationals presently detained by the Iraqi government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am in regular touch with the foreign ministers of other countries which are involved in the large coalition of nations that want to have Saddam Hussein leave Kuwait.

Second, with respect to persons who are there against their will, we naturally want to have them freed. I have indicated privately to the hon. member, and I think publicly on other occasions, that there will not be an official mission on the part of Canada to seek the release of these persons because we think that would be used for propaganda purposes by the Saddam Hussein regime.

I am aware that there is consideration being given by some persons respecting unofficial trips. I think we would want to consider carefully whether public discussion of the possibility of unofficial envoys will speed up or slow up the return to Canada of Canadians who want to leave Iraq and cannot now.

CHILD TAX CREDIT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the government House leader.

Given that there are only 49 days left until Christmas, and about 66,000 Canadian families which are expecting their child tax credits paid in advance as promised by the Minister of Finance, will he tell the House when he proposes to bring forward the legislation to authorize the advance payment of these child tax credits, given that the opposition is willing to expedite its passage?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that there is an interest on the part of the opposition to expedite this piece of legislation, if not the rest of our legislative program. Certainly I am prepared to engage in those discussions.

I have one concern. It is something I would ask the hon. member to think about and perhaps come up with some suggestions. We can get it through this House all right with agreement on all sides, but what do we do with the other place, which is having difficulty even starting a debate on GST?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister has forgotten that his party commands a plurality in that House. He had no trouble recently getting through legislation that cut back on social programs. Perhaps he is afraid that Trevor Eyton and the boys will not pass this one.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Manley: Last week, we were trying to find out what the government proposed to do for the poor people of Canada in the face of the recession. Here is something they can do. Why will he not make a commitment to move forward on this legislation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, of course we are committed to moving forward on this legislation.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: The concern is not the senators in the plurality. It is Allan MacEachen, Royce Frith and his crowd that are holding things up over there.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Epp: The place of the living dead.

Mr. Andre: The concern of the hon. member for low income Canadians receiving their cheques before Christmas is well placed. I hope he remembers that part of the GST package is to send before Christmas—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: —the sales tax rebates. I would hope their concern for these low income Canadians would extend to both the child tax credit and the GST tax rebate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

RAFFERTY–ALAMEDA PROJECT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the very serious matter of the Rafferty–Alameda project.

The minister will know that the premier of Saskatchewan has sworn that he informed the Prime Minister's Chief of Staff and the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary about an agreement he concluded with the federal environment minister.

My question is this: Did Mr. Spector or the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary inform the Prime Minister that the premier of Saskatchewan felt that he had an agreement with the Minister of the Environment? Was the Prime Minister aware?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, again we are returning to the matter which was raised earlier in this House today with respect to a series of affidavits which have been filed before the court. It is the responsibility of that court to evaluate the material contained therein.

We assume that the court will reach its judgment on Wednesday, or shortly thereafter, in assessing the various affidavits.

The hon. member refers to the Prime Minister's Chief of Staff. Perhaps he might want to read that person's affidavit. He might want even to read it into the record of this House, because he will discover that the Prime Minister's Chief of Staff refers specifically to a proposal which Premier Grant Devine had spoken of, but it does not in any way refer to an agreement.

Surely we are in a very real sense wasting the time of this House in discussing a matter that is properly before the courts in the province of Saskatchewan, and it will be concluded there.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, first of all, it is going to be very interesting to see if the judge indeed makes a decision as to who is not telling the truth here.

My real question is: Did the Prime Minister know? As well, in his affidavit, the Minister of the Environment admitted in several instances that he attempted to influence the panel. Under section 22(b) of the EARP guidelines it specifically states that the panel should be free of interference.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is that the actions of the minister are akin to jury tampering. Can this government assure us that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member may have his own opinion as to these entire proceedings but, as I had to say to another member earlier, those opinions cannot be by way of accusations in this House. If the hon. member wishes to put a question and make it a careful question that the government is in a position to respond to and does not stray into accusations and charges, then I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. de Jong: If I may, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment, in his own affidavit, stated that he made several attempts to communicate with the panel and to get the panel to agree to certain timetables. This, we maintain, is contrary to the EARP guidelines.

My question therefore is as follows: Can this government assure us that the minister's resignation will be sought immediately, at least until this matter is cleared up?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Repairs on the CN Franquet–Chapais railway line in Abitibi have been completed since June 29, 1990. Mining companies in Chapais and Chibougamau have asked CN management in Montreal to run ore shipments on this line right away.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Does the Minister think it is economically sound to keep shipping the ore via a 700-mile detour that is no longer necessary? If not, will the minister urge CN management to take action as requested by these mining companies, as soon as possible?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN has appealed the decision. There is a procedure that must be followed in such cases. I do not and I must not get involved in the daily operations of this Crown corportion.

QUEBEC'S RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. On the weekend, the Quebec wing of the Progressive Conservative Party approved a resolution recognizing Quebec's right to self-determination. This right forms the basis of a movement towards sovereignty that is taking place now in Quebec. My question is this: Does the government endorse this resolution by the party's Quebec wing?

An hon. member: Very good question!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order! One moment please! This is not a question about government administration.

The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, on a supplementary.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. This is the fundamental issue on which the future of this country depends. Would the House of Commons not be interested in a fundamental right that will determine the future of Canada and Quebec, Mr. Speaker? This is an essential issue that will loom large in the background of all political parties in Canada and Quebec during the coming year. I think that—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is right, but my task is quite clear. The question must be acceptable under the Standing Orders of the House, and that is my decision.

[English]

I have to advise hon. members that Question Period is concluded.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of an Australian parliamentary delegation led by Senator John Olsen.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

VIMY MEMORIAL SERVICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, yesterday hundreds of people congregated on a few acres of France that are forever Canada. They came to the lovely park land containing the Vimy Memorial.

Every November, crowds of French citizens join our own dignitaries and troops at the special service of remembrance to commemorate the 60,000 Canadians who were killed in the First World War.

The memorial itself stands on top of Vimy Ridge, the site of Canada's first and greatest victory. Our soldiers had been drawn from armies to form the Canadian corps in an attempt to take the heavily defended ridge. On April 9, 1917 they succeeded and won everlasting respect. My father was in that battle.

The French government graciously granted Canada some of that historic site in perpetuity. As I said, hundreds of French men women and children went there yesterday and joined our ambassador to France, Mr. Claude Charland, in paying tribute to those Canadians who fell in the First World War.

Let Canadians do the same on Remembrance Day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

WHETHER QUESTION IN ORDER

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege regarding what happened earlier when I put a question in this House.

There is a Constitution in this country and there are public statutes. There is a government, and within that government a department responsible for federal-provincial relations. This department is responsible for managing relations with members of the federation, and therefore one of the important questions, Mr. Speaker, is how relations between members of the federation and the central government are managed.

When a member of Parliament rises in the House to ask a minister of the Crown, a senior cabinet minister, and I am referring to the Deputy Prime Minister, to tell the country how he intends to subordinate the rights of nations to federal-provincial relations, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter that directly concerns the House. If any question should concern this House above all others, it is democracy, the future of the people of Canada and the future of the people of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand why statements made at a party convention about Quebec's right to self-determination are considered in such a restrictive light that a government is under no obligation to inform this House what it intends to do.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House are very clear. I am moved to observe that if the hon. member is so interested in the proceedings of the Quebec wing of the Progressive Conservative Party, he should ask himself why he was so quick to leave it.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to rise in this debate, because I wonder why our government or a minister of the Crown cannot answer this kind of question when in 1952, the Right Hon. Louis Saint-Laurent supported Resolution 673 at the United Nations which was precisely about the right of nations to self-determination. This position was again taken by the UN in 1960, in Resolution 1514, which was at the time supported by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in the past, similar questions were put to various ministers and those questions were answered.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the question is an important one, and we on this side of the House would like to know, first of all, why a reply to the question was not allowed. The government may or may not answer a question. Although, this government doesn't make a habit of answering them, the question was put quite clearly. We fail to see why the hon. member did not receive a reply to his question. We would like to know why the Chair did not allow a reply, and we would like the government's opinion. Are they prepared to answer the question, yes or no? That's all.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am looking for the right citation in Beauchesne's. I just cannot put my finger on it at the moment.

Quite clearly the purposes of Question Period are to provide the opposition with an opportunity to obtain information about the actions, programs, or policies of the government. They have to do with the competence of the government.

Questions about what members of the government in their other capacity as members of a political party in discussion somewhere else are not relevant to the government. They simply are not, as provided in the rules, in Beauchesne's, about the purposes of Question Period.

Your Honour was exactly correct in suggesting that it is not proper to put to members of the government questions pertaining to discussions held that do not deal with the responsibilities of cabinet ministers under their Privy Council oath, do not deal with responsibilities of ministers in respect of their departments, do not deal with decisions or actions of the government, but in fact deal with the actions of a political party to which members of this government belong.

Those are actions and decisions of the political party; they are not actions and decisions of this government. Hence they are not appropriate for Question Period.

As to the generalized supposition that these issues of constitutionality and so on are important to the country and should be debated in the House, indeed they are. There are all kinds of appropriate fora or occasions for the discussion and debate of such issues in this House.

Question Period is not the appropriate time. It is not provided under the rules that members of the government should be called to account and questioned about actions they participated in as members of a political party. It is simply not appropriate for Question Period.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last week, we were all very pleased to let the Prime Minister speak on the future of Canada. Now, a minister of the Crown says that he does not have the right to answer the question put to him by another member regarding Quebec's ability to decide its own future, its self-determination, when it is clearly a legitimate question for the government. I am quite sure that the Quebec lieutenant of the Prime Minister would like, with unanimous consent, to clarify the matter. I am convinced he is willing to do so— I remember very well, Mr. Speaker, that when we were the gouvernment, we were asked questions on our policies, like the one regarding cruise missile testing. From time to time, political parties have messages for the government.

I would think that the question is in order, and that members of this House would be willing to set the rules aside in order to give the minister a chance to speak on this most important question for the people of Quebec. I would like to have unanimous consent for this. Are we ready to give it?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East, with reference to my ruling of a few minutes ago, has asked if the House would give the unanimous consent for the minister to answer the question. Let me make it very clear: the hon. minister does not need unanimous consent to answer the question.

What I was pointing out as your Speaker is that, as the question was framed, to my mind it was out of order. There are other ways to ask a question on the same subject matter. I have to interpret the rules. I was not saying that the minister could not answer it. I said that, as asked, I think it was out of order.

If the minister wants to answer it, that is up to the minister. If the House wants to revert to questions and the minister wishes to rise, then of course the Speaker is in the hands of the House.

• (1530)

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): If the House would allow me to answer the question put by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, I think that would help clarify the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unanimous consent is required to ask the question again but none is required to provide a reply.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify the resolution that was approved on the weekend, and I hope this will help—

An hon. member: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): You gave me permission to answer the question put by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. I would appreciate it if the hon. member from British Columbia—

Mr. Speaker: Excuse me. One moment, please!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am already on my feet!

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Are we still in Question Period, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could explain to hon. members what has occurred. A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean concerning a question which he put in the Chamber. At that time I felt that the way the question was put did not accord with the rules. The hon. minister had every right to answer if he had wished to. I was not precluding him from answering.

Having listened carefully to the point of order that has been raised, I want to make it very clear that I did not preclude, nor would I ever presume to preclude, a minister answering a question if he wished.

The minister has indicated that he wishes to give a response to the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. All I need is the consent of the House to revert back to questions, which is a procedural thing. I thought I had that consent and on that basis I represented the hon. minister. The hon. minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I think my explanation regarding the resolution passed Saturday at Mont-Sainte-Anne will satisfy hon. members. The resolution proposed by representatives of the riding of Louis-Hébert recognized Quebec's right to self-determination.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Quebec Conservatives approved this resolution to the extent that it is already part of the United Nations Charter of which Canada is a signatory. This does not, and I am thinking particulary of the debate that is starting on the future of Canada and Quebec, in any way anticipate the decisions that will be made.

The convention in Quebec felt that one could hardly vote down this kind of resolution, just as the United Nations, were not thinking particularly of Quebec or Canada at the time they accepted theirs, did not anticipate the decisions or solutions Canada and Quebec will make or choose. We approved the resolution in a spirit of openness, and I think the question is a valid one and the answer remains valid, insofar as we are talking about self-determination which, once again, was approved by the UN Charter and applies to all peoples.

That being said, I think the question was in order, and we accepted it, but, I repeat, we did so considering the fact that at a time when Canada and Quebec are about to get involved in fundamental discussions on each other's future, we felt it was a valid question.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, we are talking about a decision made by the Quebec wing of the Progressive Conservative Party. That being said, I think the decision made in Quebec was an excellent one, and I want to congratulate my Conservative colleagues in Quebec for making that decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The honorable member for Lac-Saint-Jean on a supplementary.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): To start with, I wish to thank the minister for explaining to us the ins and outs of the resolution adopted by the Quebec caucus. My question to him is this: Can the government—since there is a government in front of us—through its minister, tell us if it accepts the principle that Quebec has the right to self-determination? That is my question, Mr. Speaker!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again to the member for Lac-Saint-Jean that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when the member for Lac-Saint-Jean was minister, he did not appreciate such outcries. I would hope that he will behave in the same manner now that he is across the way.

What I say to him is this: It is a resolution adopted by a wing of our party, the Conservative wing of the Conservative Party. Mr. Speaker, the government deals with recommendations the same way the Liberals and other parties do.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would think that under the circumstances hon. members would give the minister the courtesy of hearing his response. He is trying to make a very extensive response to a question which the House has consented to hear, when that would not ordinarily be the case. The hon. minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I think the debate is too serious and the matter too fundamental to be treated in a partisan way in the House of Commons. I am sure there are partisan intentions behind the question. At a time when we are discussing once again those fundamental issues, the Quebec wing of the Conservative party made a recommendation to the government which will deal with it according to the normal process. Therefore, because of the seriousness of the issue, I think we should avoid any partisanship, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because I think you have ruled, and very rightly, that it was essential that the question put to the cabinet had to do with governing operations. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean rephrased his question which was then in order. He asked the minister whether the Tory government was willing as a matter of government policy, to accept the resolution passed by the Quebec Tory wing at their convention over the weekend. Now, the minister, and this explains my point of order, Mr. Speaker, in rising to answer a question which you had then ruled in order, took the oportunity to answer, not as a minister and member of the Canadian cabinet but strictly as a militant Tory politician from Quebec as if he had been dealing with this question at a political convention. Hence his answer was not in order since it did not give the government's real answer that is whether or not they accept as government this resolution passed by militants over the weekend.

Mr. Gauthier: That is the question.

Mr. Speaker: The best solution might be for him to ask another question tomorrow.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The public accounts committee's sixth report, which I have the honour to table today, deals with controls over grants administered by federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations.

The committee identified a number of procedures which, if adopted by grant-giving agencies, would improve controls and accountability for grants. For example, the committee recommended co-ordination of instalment payments with enhanced reporting and monitoring of grants where the size or the dollar value of the grant makes it cost-effective to do so.

Another major recommendation in the report dealt with the accountability of granting agencies for repeat funding of the same organization year after year and called for triennial reports to Parliament on recurring grants, justifying them in terms of competing demands for scarce resources, benefits to Canada and to the recipient.

The committee also recommended that resources be allocated to program evaluation and that unused portions of grants be recovered.

The government has been requested to table a comprehensive response to this report within 150 days.

CANADA–EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TABLING OF TWO REPORTS BY THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, two reports of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association: the report of the Canadian Delegation to the Debate on the parliamentary dimensions of the CSCE organized by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, and the report of the Canadian Delegation to the annual OECD Debate of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. Those meetings were held in Strasbourg from September 26 to October 4, 1990.

Mr. Speaker, I draw to the attention of members of the House the parliamentary debate on security and co–operation in Europe because it is centred on the new Europe. I think that members should look at the report because it has dimensions for Canada's future involvement in the Europe that is forming, not only the 12 nations in the European family for economic reasons, but rather for reasons of security.

The debate centred upon the formation of a new body, the assembly of Europe. Members of this House should read with care and decide whether this House should become involved in the debate on the future of Europe and what Canada's role should be.

As I have said, all the countries in Europe unanimously wanted to model their new assembly of Europe on the Council of Europe's rules. Canada did not feel that this was the way to proceed. In fact, an assembly of Europe with responsibilities for the security of the new Europe should be based on the rules that such an assembly of parliamentarians would like to bring into being.

I encourage members to read this report and come forward with suggestions as to whether this House should formally debate Canada's position in a new Europe because clearly it is starting to develop, and it should be done with care.

RACIAL TOLERANCE

DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to seek consent to propose a motion which will be put without debate or amendment. The motion would be seconded by the member for Vancouver East and reads as follows:

> That this House rejects any attempt to use our country as a platform from which to disseminate knowingly misleading, inaccurate and false statements about the Holocaust and Nazi prosecution of the Jews and other people before and during the Second World War and that this House deplores utterly and categorically all those who wish to spread a message of racial discrimination and hatred on the basis of colour, religion, ethnicity or culture.
