PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 3 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO AIPO

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian parliamentary delegation that attended the Eleventh General Assembly of the AIPO in Singapore, from September 7 to 17, 1990.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-337, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (oath or solemn affirmation).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to introduce this bill, seconded by my honourable colleague from Miramichi.

The purpose of my bill can be summed up in just a few words. All members of Parliament swear an oath of allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen. This is required by the Constitution. However, the oath makes no mention of Canada or its Constitution. I believe that this is seen by many Canadians as a shortcoming of the current oath.

Canadians would prefer an oath taken by parliamentarians that perhaps is best described as contemporary and up to date, one that reflects the growth in the maturity of our nation. I think my bill will do that. It would require MPs to take a second oath pledging allegiance to Canada and its Constitution.

Canada yet again is feeling an identity crisis. It is incumbent upon members of this House of Commons to express faith and confidence in Canada. I would welcome support for an oath of allegiance to Canada, our home, our beloved country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to this House containing over 200 names of citizens of this nation who are upset about the government trading away part of our dairy industry.

These petitioners call upon the government to hold our Canadian system up as an example for the rest of the world and to protect it in its entirety at all costs in the current round of GATT negotiations.

We have on this list names of peoples from Woodstock, Glencoe, Appin, Thorndale, London, Strathroy, and Mill Pond Crescent. There are a lot of names of people who are very upset about government trading away part of our dairy industry. I am sure that I will hear from them too in regard to the suggestion made yesterday that Canadian farmers are getting $8.8 billion worth of subsidies, when in fact it is much less than that in the dairy industry. Rather than $8.8 billion, the dairy industry is only getting $266 million in direct subsidies.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition to this House signed by Canadians from western Canada, including places like Steinbach, Manitoba; Saskatoon, Rosthern and Carlton, Saskatchewan; and other points in western Canada.

These people are asking the government to stop the low-level flight training program as it affects aboriginal people both in Labrador and in other parts of Canada. They are happy that the training base will not be established and that the military has agreed not to escalate flights.

However, they would like all flights to end and that money to be directed toward developing a sustainable society among aboriginal people.

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present petitions today from almost 100 members of my constituency who are calling for the government to enact legislation amending food and drug regulations.

The petitioners feel that the new legislation is necessary and that it would require both manufacturers and restaurateurs to provide a specific list of food ingredients and additives in their prepackaged and prepared foods.

Perhaps this legislation would prevent the needless deaths from food allergies, like that of 15-year old Robyn Allen who died from consuming food that had peanut oil in it; he was strongly allergic to peanut oil.

There are many other Canadians who are in that situation. That is the purpose of this petition. It is supported by a private member's bill which was introduced in April by the hon. member for Hamilton East.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition sponsored by the Writers' Union of Canada.

The petition has been signed by Canadians from coast to coast, many in my own constituency. It reads: whereas the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and, now proposes to include them in GST and whereas uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by GST application, wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation on regulations

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA PROJECT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle) moved:

That this House urge the Minister of the Environment to revoke the Rafferty-Alameda project licence and use all federal authority to prevent Saskatchewan from proceeding with project construction until an independent environmental assessment panel has completed its review.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me today to lead off the debate on this motion.

What we are concerned with is a very important issue. It is not just an issue of concern with the province of Saskatchewan, but how this issue is resolved will exhibit to the Canadian people the commitment or lack of commitment of this federal government and the new Minister of the Environment to questions relating to the environment and how serious this government takes the environmental review process, especially when it affects megaprojects like the one we are debating today.

Let me start by saying, despite what some other politicians have claimed, that the New Democratic Party either here in Ottawa or in Saskatchewan is not opposed to building a dam there per se. If a proper process is followed, if there is an independent environmental review to show that no lasting negative environmental impact will occur because of this project, this project does make economic and environmental sense. We are totally and wholeheartedly for it. To be able to devise a way to allow southern Saskatchewan to have a lake, to have access to water would be a godsend.

There are many professionals and non-professionals who have serious doubts about the environmental effect and impact of this project as well as the economics. First let me comment on the economics. The Saskatchewan government wants to build two coal-fired plants in order to produce electricity. We can buy electricity cheaper from Manitoba. There are two coal-fired plants that have been mothballed in North Dakota. The infrastructure is there. We can buy electricity from those plants much cheaper than building the Rafferty-Alameda projects. Economically, it does not make sense to us.

Second, the Government of Saskatchewan claims that these reservoirs are needed as coolants for the coal-fired power plants, and that there is enough water in the Souris River to fill up these reservoirs. Various studies have shown that if the Rafferty dam had been built in 1912 it would not have filled until 1948 and that the Rafferty reservoir would not reach full supply level 97 per cent of the time.

In fact, the reservoir may never fill. The evaporation rate in the Rafferty reservoir would be as high as 75 per cent of the natural flows in any year. Instead of getting a lake some 70 kilometres long, which the Government of Saskatchewan is proposing, in fact what we will be getting are two algae-infested, green, slimy sloughs that will not be any use for recreation purposes, water supply purposes or for irrigation.

One really wonders about the motivation of the provincial government in jamming this project ahead. The Saskatchewan government claims that it did an environmental study. Indeed, it did do an environmental study. But that environmental study has been criticized by the federal Department of the Environment, by the U.S. Corps of Army Engineers and by the American Environmental Protection Agency. These are three very legitimate public bodies who have looked at the project and have found the Saskatchewan environmental study to be lacking. In fact, the U.S. Corps of Army Engineers in their report stated:

> The credibility of the quantitative results of both of the above model studies is severely limited by the lack of a model calibration and the verification based on historic data. Furthermore, the programs are highly simplified in that the normal variable flow, water temperature, and pH are held as constants, and the assignment of initial input concentrations and reaction rate coefficients is highly subjective.

In other words, what the U.S. Corps of Army Engineers said about the Saskatchewan environmental study is that it is highly subjective and highly simplified.

When officials at the federal Department of the Environment were talking about the Saskatchewan studies it stated:

> There are a number of important information gaps related to assessing implications for federal responsibilities concerning this project. There are also ambiguities, errors and omissions with respect to technical information and impact predictions.

What we find is that very reputable organizations find tremendous fault with the Saskatchewan study.

Those parties who are very concerned about this project and the price tag of some $1.6 billion were dismayed when a former Minister of the Environment, Mr. McMillan, issued a licence on June 17, 1988. It was necessary for the government to issue a licence because we are dealing with an international water. The Souris River originates in Saskatchewan, flows through the United States and comes back up into Manitoba. There is obviously federal responsibility here.

• (1120 )

It took us awhile to convince the government of the day, the one before the last election, that there was some federal responsibility here. A licence was granted on June 17, 1988 anyway. The conditions surrounding that licence are certainly suspect. We knew at the time that Mr. McMillan was giving the licence to the Province of Saskatchewan in exchange for an agreement for the Grasslands National Park. The federal government has been wanting this park for some time. The Province of Saskatchewan had been holding back, so in exchange for the licence, Saskatchewan agreed to go along with the Grasslands park.

As well, many of us suspected another reason. Around that time the Federal Court made a decision regarding French-language rights in the Province of Saskatchewan. Remember, as well, that was around the time when a by-election was being held in the riding of Saint-Jean in the Province of Quebec.

We suspect as well that there was some agreement of compliance with the federal order regarding French-language rights in Saskatchewan in exchange for this licence.

Right from the beginning political deals were being made, political deals about the environment. Well, that was not good enough for people concerned with the environment. It was not good enough for the Canadian Wildlife Federation and with an organization called SCRAP which is Stop Construction of the Rafferty-Alameda Projects. They went to court and on April 10, 1989 the Federal Court squashed the licence because, as the court stated, the minister did not comply with the EARP guidelines.

The Saskatchewan government appealed this and on June 22, 1989 the court upheld its first decision saying that the EARP guidelines were binding on the minister and must be applied to the Rafferty-Alameda dam project.

Already we have had two court decisions insisting that the federal government has a responsibility and that it had not lived up to that responsibility before issuing the licence.

A second licence was issued on August 31, 1989 after the minister had ordered an initial environmental evaluation, an IEE. This is the way the EARP process works. First, the minister has what is called an initial environmental evaluation. There are no public hearings on this. A rough evaluation is made and a report presented to the minister. Then the minister decides whether there is reason to hold a full public inquiry. The minister at that time decided that there was not enough reason to hold a full environmental inquiry and so he issued the second licence.

Again people opposed to this project took the government to court and a historic decision was made in December of last year. The decision reiterated the two previous court findings, that there was federal responsibility and a full public inquiry should be held.

What the court said was that the government should either revoke the licence in the 30-day period or else put in a full environmental review process.

The Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada reached some agreement. It was the understanding under that agreement that no construction was to take place other than for safety reasons, an environmental review process was to be put in place, an independent panel was to be named, public hearings were to be held, and we thought things rested with that. People were generally happy with that process.

Earlier this spring, upon hearing rumours that construction was continuing on the Rafferty part of the project, I visited the site and indeed I saw the bulldozers working back and forth. I raised the matter in the House at that time. The former Minister of the Environment assured me that the federal government was aware of this ongoing construction, that he was going to send a group of engineers to the site to see what type of work they were going to be doing, and that he would report back to the House. He never did report back to the House. It appears as though construction continued and continued until the panel itself felt that its own integrity and the integrity of the process was just being blown away. It became public last week that the panel had decided not to proceed further with its hearings. Then the premier of Saskatchewan repudiated the whole agreement officially and the next day the panel resigned, so here we are in this present situation.

I maintain that the federal government is not in compliance, as things stand now, with the Federal Court order. The Federal Court order of December of last year insisted that the licence be revoked unless there was an environmental review process. To do an environmental review process, and I quote from the court's decision, "the minister is lawfully obliged to require and permit a panel to conduct a public review of all the significant adverse environmental effects".

The minister must ensure that conditions exist that would allow the panel to conduct its inquiry. It is obvious that those conditions do not exist. That is why the panel resigned, because they could not proceed under the current conditions.

Therefore we maintain that the original court order is still in effect that now demands that the minister revoke that licence. Every day that passes when the minister does not revoke that licence, this federal government and the Minister of the Environment are in contravention of the court order. That surely is unacceptable, particularly from our own federal government.

There are some lessons to be learned in all this. First of all the big lesson is you do not mix the environment and politics the way this federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan have attempted to do it. There are all sorts of suggestions of deal making right from the beginning. The first licence was really part of a deal between the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government. Some of this seems to lead right to the door of the Prime Minister. It was the premier and the Prime Minister having friendly chats together making the deal.

Even with the present minister, we have all sorts of insinuations and suggestions, especially coming out of Saskatchewan, that there was some understanding between the federal government and the provincial government. In fact, in a very disturbing speech made by the president of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, Mr. George Hill, last Friday he stated:

> In January, 1990, Dr. Good (one of the same civil servants) implored me not to insist on putting a time limit on when the Panel had to report. He no doubt wanted it to look like they had all kinds of independence. He assured me that he would have control over the Panel, through the Chairman, who would be an employee of the Federal Environmental Review Office. It must be understood that this office, known as FERO, for Federal Environmental Review Office, is not independent from the rest of the Federal Environmental Department. The head of FERO reports to Dr. Good, Dr. Good had spun his web to include all these people. He assured me that he was in control and he would see that they acted expeditiously and report in short order, because after all, this project had already been reviewed twice.

That is a statement by the president of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation saying that he had the assurance of the deputy minister of the federal Department of the Environment that he was able to control the panel and the workings of the panel.

That is a very serious charge. I hope that the Minister of the Environment will stand on his feet some time today and explain what Mr. Hill was talking about. Surely he can give us the assurance that the environmental review panel is indeed independent and not controlled by his department.

We must also really wonder about the motivations of the Saskatchewan government.

• (1130)

We understand that this project is to be mainly in the riding of the Premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Devine. Of course, there are local spin-off benefits in terms of construction and jobs. Despite clear indications that this project makes no economic sense and makes no environmental sense, we very much expect that perhaps the only area where it does make sense is in terms of political sense for the Premier of Saskatchewan. He certainly has succeeded in whipping up local people who see the economic advantages to this project, for themselves, short-term. He has been able to mobilize these people and I suggest that the only way Premier Devine can get himself re-elected in his constituency is through these tactics.

An hon. member: He's buying the polls, even there.

Mr. de Jong: He is attempting, as my colleagues says, to buy the polls. Well, let me warn the Premier of Saskatchewan that it ain't going to do him any good because he is going down the tubes as well as soon as he screws up his courage to call a provincial election.

He is using $1.6 billion of public funds from the province of Saskatchewan for a very dubious environmentally and economically sound project. The people of Saskatchewan have been burdened with tremendous deficits and debts because of the present Tory government in Regina. He is quite willing to put an extra $1.6 billion on that accumulated debt just to assure his own re-election and I say, shame, shame, shame.

Of course, the premier does not want to have a full public inquiry. He does not want the public to know. In fact, earlier this year, people concerned with the project were questioning whether the Government of Saskatchewan was indeed complying with the agreement that they had made with the federal government in January of this year and they asked for all of the available documents. The Premier of Saskatchewan, on June 19 of this year, issued an order that all the files relating to the Rafferty-

Alameda Dam project be sealed and that they not be made public. The reason he gave for that was that it was in the public's interest. In other words, he stated that it was in the public's interest for the public not to know the complete story about the Rafferty–Alameda. Again, we say shame, shame, shame on the Premier of Saskatchewan.

In summation, let me state that the Minister of the Environment has only one option. He can only do one thing. Given the sorry and sordid history, given the political games that have been played between the federal government and the province of Saskatchewan, and given the court orders which are plain and explicit, this minister surely has no other recourse but to lift the licence to prevent any further construction, to have an independent, public, environmental review, and, on the basis of that report, then to make the decision whether or not to allow this project to proceed. But the first step he must take is to revoke the licence and revoke the licence today.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by congratulating you on the responsibilities which you have assumed.

I would also like to explain to members of the House that the Minister of the Environment is unable to be present at this moment. He had planned to make the initial response on behalf of the government, as is traditional, but he will be here, hopefully, later this morning, prior to one o'clock.

I would like to take this opportunity to address what is a very complex and I am afraid, for some, a confusing issue, by providing some important, historical background on the establishment of the panel in question and its role up until very recently.

As many members understand, the process which we are discussing today began, in a very real sense, on January 29 with the appointment of the review panel by the Minister of the Environment and it has ended with the resignation of that same panel on October 12.

The panel itself, of course, was well qualified for the task. It consisted of Robert Connelly, chairman, who is an employee of FEARO; Hugh MacKay, a consulting engineer from Winnipeg specializing in water resources planning; Dr. Donald Gray, chairman of the Hydrology Division at the University of Saskatchewan; Robert Bell, aquatic biologist from La Ronge, also from Saskatchewan; and Dr. Moodie, a professor of biology at the University of Winnipeg. It was a distinguished group most of whose roots, of course, were in western Canada.

The construction at the Rafferty site was to be voluntarily stopped by the Saskatchewan government once the dam had been rendered safe and was not to resume until the Minister of the Environment had responded to the report of the panel. While the licence issued under the International River Improvements Act was to remain in place, the province did agree to accept any modifications to the licence which the minister wished to make and which fell within federal jurisdiction. Moreover, the Saskatchewan government was to give favourable consideration to recommendations from the panel which fell within provincial areas of jurisdiction.

As part of the safety measures, the low-level outlet structure of the Rafferty Dam was to be made operative through the placement of downstream erosion protection and the installation of a control valve. To do so, the 1990 spring run-off was to have been stored above the Rafferty Dam. The province agreed, at the minister's request, to store as much water as possible in reservoirs upstream of the Rafferty Dam.

As is the case of all panel reviews, the terms of reference for the review were issued by the Minister of the Environment. The Rafferty–Alameda panel was asked to undertake a review of the environmental and related social impacts of the project. In addition, the panel had the mandate to make recommendations concerning the operation of the Rafferty–Alameda Dam, including possible structural modifications, if necessary. In formulating its recommendations, the panel was to take account of Canada's international obligations, including agreements with the United States related to the project.

Construction of the project was to cease, once the Rafferty Dam had been rendered safe, and was not to resume until the panel had submitted its recommendations to the minister. The minister, as needed, and in response to the panel's report, had amended conditions of the International River Improvements Act licence governing of the project.

The project components, as specified in the panel's terms of reference, were the Rafferty Dam and reservoir on the Souris River; the Rafferty-Boundary diversion channel; intermittent channelization for approximately 16 kilometres downstream of the Rafferty Dam; and the Alameda Dam and reservoir in Moose Mountain Creek, which is situated just north of Oxbow.

The Alameda Dam would be constructed on the main stem of Moose Mountain Creek, just east of the village of Alameda. The proposed dam and ancillary works would create a reservoir of sufficient capacity to regulate flows for flood control in both Canada and the United States—that, of course, has been one of the important objectives of the project—and for improved water supply to existing users from Oxbow to the international boundary and to potential new irrigators along the reservoir and downstream of the dam.

The panel was also asked to review all information prepared in accordance with the Saskatchewan Environmental Assessment Act, the United States National Environmental Policy Act and EARP itself.

No deadline was given for the completion of the review, although it was well understood that it is typical for reviews of this nature to require from 12 to 18 months for completion.

It is fair to say that there had been considerable study of the project and its effects prior to the appointment of this panel. These included environmental impact assessment statements prepared in accordance with Saskatchewan Environmental Assessment Act and the United States National Environmental Policy Act, with an initial environmental evaluation prepared in accordance with EARP guidelines order itself.

The first task of the panel was to formulate and issue operating procedures for the review. These procedures outlying how the panel planned to conduct the review were released on March 30, 1990, along with some questions and answers on the review itself.

During the first few months of its appointment, the panel was also examining and reviewing available studies on the project to determine if the information was adequate and whether or not additional information was required before proceeding to public hearings. The panel, after a detailed examination of over 25 volumes of information, decided it did in fact require additional information. Consequently, on May 25, the panel issued its draft information request and invited written public comments on its 36 questions.

In the draft request, the panel asked for additional information on water quantity and quality, fish, wildlife, plants, petroleum resources, and recreation.

During March and April of this year, the panel secretariat made two visits to the Souris basin, the purpose of which was to contact provincial and municipal officials, local residents, farmers, the media, and representatives of environmental groups to explain the process, answer questions, and listen to concerns and suggestions.

During the week of June 18, the panel toured the Souris basin and held two open houses in Estevan, Saskatchewan and in my own constituency of Brandon—Souris in in Souris, Manitoba. On its driving tour, the panel had the opportunity to deal firsthand with the Souris basin in Manitoba, wildlife refuges in North Dakota, and the project site in Saskatchewan. The open houses allowed the panel to explain the review process to local residents and to listen to their concerns.

The panel received 24 submissions commenting on the draft information request. Each submission was carefully considered by the panel in the preparation of the revised document. The final information request listed 45 questions that required answers before the panel could proceed to the public hearing stage of the process.

Perhaps it is worth taking a moment to discuss in some brief detail the nature of this further information request. It dealt with issues associated with water quantity, water quality, fish, wildlife, and other areas. For example in the area of water quantity, the panel felt it was important to understand the cyclic nature in the annual water balance of lakes in a prairie environment. However, data presented in the Souris Basin Development Authority, the SBDA, environmental impact statement was from 1912 to 1981. Given that 1982 to mid-1990 was a very dry period in my part of western Canada and in the area in which the Souris River flows, the inclusion of this data in the analysis would balance the number of wet-dry cycles and it is expected they would increase the confidence of predictions on the time it would take to fill the reservoirs.

This is crucial information to assist in determining predicted flows in the basin downstream in both North Dakota and in Manitoba.

In the area of water quality, the panel noted that the validity of information from the models available would strongly depend on the manner in which they synthesize processes and on the existence and accuracy of available data. Although the water quality models reported in the SBDA Environmental Impact Statement appear to be state-of-the-art, there was in the mind of the panel insufficient data for proper calibrations and verification.

Consequently the panel asked for more information on water quality projections in the Rafferty Dam reservoir, in particular, and what was being done to address the uncertainties associated with the predictions on water quality in the western part of Manitoba.

In the area of fisheries, the panel noted that the operation of the reservoirs is expected to have both positive and negative effects on fish habitats in North Dakota and Manitoba, as well as in Saskatchewan. The sustainability of fish populations and the success of some of the proposed fisheries mitigation measures would depend on the conditions which prevail under the operating plan specified in the international agreement or required to meet the primary objectives of the project. Consequently, the panel wondered how the fisheries mitigation measures proposed for the Saskatchewan portion of the basin, and which might be required for the North Dakota and Manitoba parts of the basin, would be compatible with the operating plan and the primary objectives of the project.

In the wildlife area, the panel noted that the SBDA waterfowl mitigation plan outlines procedures to be implemented to address anticipated project-related waterfowl losses in Saskatchewan. But the panel also wondered what measures would be undertaken which would ensure that there would be no net loss of waterfowl production in the Souris basin as a result of the project and what national and/or international interim measures, if any, are under consideration.

The panel also noted that reservoir flooding will destroy vegetation that is important to the sustainability of wildlife populations, particularly white-tailed deer. It asked therefore that the effects of the loss of range on the regional population of white-tailed deer be quantified and to outline what measures are contemplated to provide alternate habitat for white-tailed deer.

These are only a few examples, Mr. Speaker, of some of the detailed questions that the panel raised to provide you and other members of the House with an example of the thorough analysis that the panel was undertaking in trying to do its job properly.

These are also important questions that will have to be thoroughly answered before any decision can be made on the potential environmental effects of this project.

It should also be noted that the panel received a response to these four questions from the SBDA on September 24. Thus the panel had reached step five in its seven step process and was about to make documents available for public review prior to proceeding to the final public hearing.

It should also be noted that while the panel was conducting its work, Saskatchewan was proceeding with ancillary works in the Rafferty reservoir and below the Rafferty dam. These activities included the construction of a causeway in the reservoir area, continuation of work on the new Dr. Mainprize Park and, most recently, the initiation of channelization downstream of the Rafferty dam.

After the panel had finalized its information request, initiated on August 1, it arranged for another tour of the Rafferty-Alameda area in early September. It visited the Rafferty dam and ancillary works and the proposed site of the Alameda structure. The tour was well advertised and somewhere between 50 and 100 people accompanied the panel throughout its visit, with SBDA officials and their consultants being present. The panel visited some of the mitigation lands that the SBDA is developing to reduce impacts. These include tree planting areas designed to replace wildlife habitat that would be flooded by the Rafferty reservoir. They also visited areas that have been designed to replace or to create fish habitat in the Rafferty reservoir.

The panel also visited the proposed location for the Alameda dam. The involvement of individuals from the Souris basin in the Estevan area and from Manitoba was considered to be most valuable to the panel in achieving a better understanding of the potential impact of the project in general, ways to mitigate effects and both support and concerns about the project.

During this tour, the panel observed that channelization downstream of the Rafferty dam had begun.

While it was the understanding of all members, when appointed, that none of this work would occur, the panel was of the opinion that any negative environmental effects associated with the causeway and the park were reversible or could be mitigated. Therefore, the panel in spite of these frustrations continued its review. In a letter to the minister on October 4, the panel pointed out that initiation of downstream channelization clearly violated the panel's terms of reference which specifically charged the panel with reviewing this component of the project.

The panel recognized that the Canada–Saskatchewan ministerial agreement, which was signed in January 1990, restricting construction on the project, had been interpreted differently by the federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan. The panel also recognized and appreciated the attempts by the Minister of the Environment, the hon. Robert de Cotret, to reach an understanding with Saskatchewan on the agreement. It was this difference in interpretation and the incompatibility it caused with the terms of reference, however, which gave rise to the difficult situation in which the panel had been placed.

However, while the agreement regarding some aspects of the project may be ambiguous, it clearly states that no work on the Rafferty–Boundary diversion channel or on the Alameda dam and reservoir, including the acquisition of land, will begin and that construction on the Rafferty dam, once the safety of the works was assured, would cease until the review was complete. Once the safety of the Rafferty dam was secure, it was the panel's understanding that no work on these elements of the project would occur during the course of the review.

Given these circumstances, the panel sought guidance on how best to proceed with the review and in the interest of preserving the integrity and credibility of the process and the review, the panel felt compelled to suspend its operations until this matter was clarified.

It was a surprise, however, to the panel, after its letter was made public on October 11, that the premier of Saskatchewan announced later that same day that he instructed the SBDA to begin or to resume construction on all aspects of the Rafferty–Alameda project.

Premier Devine said he "issued the instruction in response to the announcement by the federal Rafferty–Alameda environmental review panel that it had suspended its operations pending clarification of its terms of reference". It is difficult to comprehend why a request to clarify terms of reference for the review which had advanced to the final stages would provoke such a reaction.

Not surprisingly, the panel announced the next day that it regretfully tendered its resignation to the minister. It pointed out while the review of the Rafferty dam was not an ideal situation, since it was well under construction when the panel began its task, there was every expectation on the part of the panel that it would be able to conduct a thorough and credible assessment of the potential environmental impacts and ways to mitigate the effects the Alameda project and the Boundary–Rafferty diversion channel prior to construction.

The announcement by Saskatchewan made it clearly impossible for the panel to complete its task in accordance with its terms of reference.

While the panel regretted that it would be unable to fulfil its obligation to the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and North Dakota, it felt, under the present circumstances, that its first priority must be the protection of the environment as well as the integrity and credibility of the review process. The minister, in accepting the panel's resignation stated, and I quote:

> When Saskatchewan announced its intention to start work on the Alameda project, the panel was compelled to resign. Since mid-summer I—> —have met with the premier, members of the panel, residents of the province and other stakeholders. I have tried to find a reasonable solution where the interests of the review panel, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, the environment and the economy could be > accommodated. Unfortunately, we could not find that common ground. Had it completed its task, the panel would have provided valuable recommendations to the benefit of the environment and the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and North Dakota. The resignation is a loss for all concerned.

Meaning the minister.

I believe that this bit of history demonstrates that the government has tried very hard to ensure that a proper environmental assessment panel review was conducted. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has had many discussions with the government of Saskatchewan to negotiate a practical way to allow the review process to continue. However, in the final analysis, his work has been frustrated, not through lack of effort, but rather because of a lack of authority to deal with this type of situation. It has become clear that the present environmental assessment and review process guidelines order developed by a previous administration was both confusing and ambiguous. We are now seeing, and I regret, the practical example of its failure. It would be appropriate later on this day, Mr. Speaker, for other hon. members to address how this matter might be rectified as, indeed, I am sure they will.

It is clear that the matter before us is a difficult one for two reasons. It is difficult because the guidelines that were originally designed in the early 1980s were not intended to have the force of law. They were drafted consequently in a manner in which, on occasions, was both sometimes confusing and ambiguous. These guidelines were later given the force of law, despite their inadequacy, and that is the system under which we are currently operating. I think most members of the House would agree that these guidelines have proven to be inadequate to the responsibility given them and that is why Bill C-78 is before this House and will be discussed in greater detail tomorrow.

It is also clear that the agreement reached between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan in January of this year was not as precise as we would wish it to be, and that has led to different interpretations.

As to the significance of that agreement on the part of the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan, we proceeded in accordance with our responsibilities, as we understood them, in the early part of this year to appoint a panel. That panel has met and attempted to fulfil its task during the course of the summer. It has taken longer than many people in the area would have wished and the consequence has been an immense amount of frustration with that fact. As I have indicated, the task of the panel was substantive and the progress significant. We regret, therefore, that they felt compelled to resign.

The minister, when he speaks later this morning, will indicate in some detail the response of the government to the fact that the resignations have occurred. He indicated in the House yesterday that he made a commitment on behalf of the Government of Canada that it will fulfil its legal responsibilities and will address the matter of the appointment of a replacement panel because that is part of its responsibility.

I am somewhat at a loss in terms of being unable to be more precise at this time in the absence of the minister, but I can make a commitment to the House that the minister will speak to the House as soon as he is available and will at that time provide a more detailed explanation of the government's response to the resignation of the panel.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the parliamentary secretary told us. First, we understand that the hon. member feels personally concerned with this since the question of water quality in the city of Souris is a broadened question on the study itself. A large group of people who are opposed to the project come from Brandon and Souris.

I also understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Saskatchewan government's stated intention to go ahead with the Alameda part of it might really be counter to what already has been told to the Saskatchewan government.

I understand in a letter dated August 15, signed by the Minister of Transport, to Mr. J. F. Dolecki of the Department of Economics at Brandon University, the minister stated as follows:

> The proponent, SaskPower, has applied under the Navigable Waters Protection Act (NWPA) for approval of the total project, including the causeway. The application will be processed in the usual manner. However, as a result of the Federal Appeal Court decision of March 13, 1990, on the Oldman River Dam project, the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process (EARP) Guidelines Order will now apply.
> Given the fact that this project has been recommended for a public panel review under EARP, no action will be taken on the NWPA application until the panel has rendered its decision. I should add that there are currently no plans to issue a stop order on the project under the NWPA.

What the minister is stating there is that he is not going to allow work to continue, yet the Saskatchewan government has now declared it is going to continue. My question to the government is this: What are you going to do about it?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, let me respond to the first part of the hon. member's comments by noting that yes, this entire project has been of interest and concern to myself and, of course, to many members of my constituency.

The member is correct when he suggest that some of the principal opponents of the project reside within the constituency. I might also add just so that the information is before the House that there are also many supporters of the project residing within the Brandon—Souris constituency and I suspect that my constituents would want me to inform the hon. member that, indeed, the majority of the communications which I have received on this project actually favour it.

That is not to suggest that governments make decisions on the basis of the number of letters received in support or in opposition because governments have a responsibility to provide leadership and not simply to try to determine which way the political wind is blowing at any given moment. But I think the hon. member would want to have that information available.

The letter which the hon. member quoted with respect to a former colleague of mine at Brandon University, Professor Dolecki, was received from the Minister of Transport in which he referred to some information that would be received and the decisions that would be taken after the review panel had completed its work.

It is my understanding that we will be seeking the appointment of a review panel because that is what we are required to do under the law. We are anxious to receive the benefit of the work which has already been taking place.

As I indicated earlier in my remarks, the panel which has been in place for the balance of 1990 had reached step five in a seven step process. It had done an immense amount of background exploration. It met with the public on different occasions and it met with the interested parties. I believe it is very important that the information which it was putting together was for the recommendations it would be making to the Minister of the Environment and which would in due course be made.

I can understand why the panel, as I have indicated, felt compelled to resign early this month. I expect, Mr. Speaker, that a well qualified panel will be asked to continue with that responsibility with the appropriate terms of reference. I anticipate that they will be able to make use of the information which has been gathered to date and it will be on with the process and the application of EARP as we have been doing during the course of 1990. The end result will be the provision of the information to the minister and consequently the appropriate action.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his comments concerning this difficult situation and especially his efforts to explain the difficulties that have marked the Rafferty–Alameda process.

Does the hon. parliamentary secretary feel that the Government of Canada has lived up to its obligations and its commitments regarding the environmental evaluation process?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): I guess the short answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is that I believe we have to date and we will continue to do so. We are at a very difficult period now, as one can expect, with the resignation of the panel, but we intend to fulfil those obligations as given to us.

If I might be permitted to add, because I know that the hon. member will be interested in knowing this, this had been a very difficult task. One of the reasons why it has been a very difficult task is the fact that the guidelines, which have now been given the force of law, are quite frankly inadequate and must be replaced. That is what Bill C–78 is all about.

I would hope therefore, if I am permitted an editorial, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member will attend the debate tomorrow on second reading and lend his strong support to that legislation. We cannot permit the country to continue with the present guidelines being in place because they are not equal to the task which lies before them. That has added very substantially to the difficulties of the federal government.

I firmly believe that Bill C-78 will be a very major step in ensuring that these issues will be addressed and resolved in the future, rather than concerns being addressed part way through the process as has been the case with Rafferty-Alameda.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering, first of all, whether the parliamentary secretary has had the opportunity to confer with his colleagues, the Solicitor General, about how it looks to the country to have three court orders essentially being overruled by a political fiasco in Saskatchewan that includes, I might remind him, George Hill, a former president of the Progressive Conservative Party of Saskatchewan who has very much politicized the whole SaskPower operation, and the new Senator Berntson in the other place who is one of the eight new appointments there. This is how it looks to the Saskatchewan people. There have also been suggestions from a former cabinet minister in the Saskatchewan government that water could be diverted from the Saskatchewan River system or even from the Churchill River system down into this swamp.

I was just wondering whether in fact the minister was aware of how this must look to the people of Saskatchewan, including the political implications as well as the environmental implications.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member referred to a swamp and I am not too certain as to what area he is referring to. I have visited the area on two different occasions to meet with officials and with interested parties on both sides. While I did see an immense amount of very dry land, I did not see any swamp.

Mr. Funk: That is what there will be when they build the dam.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): I guess that is an issue on which there would obviously be a great deal of division of opinion, just as I believe there is a great deal of division of opinion on this issue in the province of Saskatchewan. On the question of whether or not Mr. Hill is qualified for his task is probably something which is better addressed in the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan rather than in the federal Parliament.

Certainly the Minister of the Environment has consulted with all his cabinet colleagues, as one would expect, and continues to do so. I think the federal government has tried very conscientiously. I would like to compliment the Minister of the Environment for the fact that in July he did visit the site. I know because I was present. He met with the opponents, with representatives of SCRAP in the city of Regina, and travelled to the site. I think all present had a good thorough knowledge of both the arguments in favour and opposed. I might add that that visit was very much appreciated because one of the things that is very frustrating to the people who live in that part of Saskatchewan is the fact that so many of these projects are evaluated from people who reside in very distant places. They do not always take the time to visit, to understand and to listen to both sides of the argument. I might say that the Minister of the Environment has very appropriately done that.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this motion before us. Certainly this is the most serious test and challenge of a government's commitment to environmental action that we have dealt with in this House.

The member who has just spoken talked about the inadequacy of the guidelines. I would remind the member opposite what the courts had to say about the government's action with respect to the guidelines. The courts have said that it is very clear that the government is trying to evade its responsibilities under the guidelines, which have now given substantially more force than will be the case with Bill C-78. The government, they said, should be embracing the guidelines in its responsibilities and instead it is evading them.

There are many things we do in government or as politicians on behalf of our constituents that can be undone if we have made a mistake. This is one of those things that cannot be undone. This is one of those things with damaging consequences that will go on for generations after none of us are here to live with those consequences. That is why it deserves the full attention of this House and the full attention of the government.

In fact what has happened is that we have a history of shame surrounding this project. It is the history of the government, through three consecutive ministers of the environment, that has sought to do everything it can to ensure that this project is completed before an environmental assessment is carried out.

We have complete complicity, as I read the history of this, with ensuring that the damage that will be done by this project is neither fully nor thoroughly and publicly examined nor mitigated on the basis of a full environmental assessment. The whole purpose seems to have been to conspire to delay the process, to conspire not to take legal action that the government could have taken, and to conspire to issue permits to make sure that any environmental assessment that is ultimately carried out—and let me remind the House that there has not been a full environmental assessment under the meaning of the act—has no force and effect because the project is complete.

The history I have spoken of starts with the issuance of the first permit for this project by the federal government with the approval of the then minister of the Environment, the Hon. Tom McMillan, in June 1988. Knowing what it knew about the environmental effects of this project, knowing what it knew about the public objections, and knowing what the guideline order said its responsibility as a government was, in particular the minister's responsibility, this government went ahead and issued a permit. Let us not forget that fundamental fact. Since then we have had a process of delay and bungling that has allowed this project to proceed nearly to completion in defiance of two very specific court orders that that not happen.

For over 11 days now we have had a minister who knows that work is proceeding that should not be proceeding. He has failed to do anything to stop that work. The minister's predecessor knew since April that work was proceeding that should not proceed, in contravention of the court order and in contravention of the agreement. We have a government that has continued to pay the province of Saskatchewan $1 million a month of taxpayers' money to continue doing work under an agreement which it had agreed not to do.

We have a crisis now, a crisis of which a minister was aware in April and allowed to develop to this point. The minister admitted in the House last Friday that he was out in Saskatchewan in July, negotiating ways around the agreement and negotiating ways around the terms of reference of the environmental assessment panel. He was trying to pretend that work which was going on there was perfectly in accord with an agreement when he knew perfectly well the concerns of his environmental review panel that its work was futile, was useless, and was a sham if the work were allowed to continue.

The parliamentary secretary is sitting over there, shaking his head. Let me read from the letter of the Environmental Assessment Panel to the minister, dated October 4: "As you know, on April 2, this panel wrote to your predecessor expressing concerns regarding continued construction of the Rafferty–Alameda project. On April 27, Saskatchewan announced its intention to proceed with ancillary works in the Rafferty River reservoir and below the Rafferty dam.

These activities have gone far beyond any minimum measures necessary to ensure the safety of the site. The parliamentary secretary knows that, the minister knows that, and I suspect the Prime Minister knows that.

Why did they not act in April? Why did they not use the powers that are there under the guideline orders, that the courts have reaffirmed and that are in fact strengthened by the decisions they have made not only on Rafferty–Alameda but also on the Oldman River dam project?

The panel made clear many times over those months what its concerns were. The minister failed to act. I reject totally the minister's claims that he is now concerned and that he will take tough action. The time for tough action has passed and construction of the Rafferty dam is weeks away from completion, because there has been no action since last spring.

The panel is put in the position of saying that it understands that the agreement has been interpreted differently, the agreement between Saskatchewan and Ottawa which says that safety work can continue and that the Government of Canada will pay the province of Saskatchewan $1 million a month for the inconvenience of the delay. That has gone on since April now. For eight months the people of Canada have been paying the province of Saskatchewan $1 million a month not to work on the Rafferty–Alameda dam project, when the government has known perfectly well that it is proceeding in violation of that agreement and has continued to pay. I ask the government and the minister how they can justify paying out money and allowing that project to proceed.

On Friday in the House the minister clearly said that the Alameda dam could not proceed. What he failed to address was the fact that contracts have been called on that dam and the contract for construction of that dam has proceeded. Not only do we have the Rafferty dam part of this project nearing completion without an environmental panel in place and without an assessment having been completed, but now we have the Government of Saskatchewan poised to commence work on the Alameda dam. One can almost hear the pleading in the letter from the panel where it mentions that it at least had hoped that it would be able to do a full environmental assessment of that part of the project before it had started.

Now the delays, the lack of action, as the court says the continual evasion of the government of its responsibilities under environmental assessment legislation and the guideline orders, have put us in a position where we have a second project that is under way. Even the opportunity to assess a part of that project before it starts is now denied to any environmental panel.

What is the minister going to do? He is going to take strong action. Where was he on October 4 when that permit should have been revoked immediately? Where was he on October 11 and 12 when the premier of Saskatchewan was saying he was going ahead with that work? Why do we sit here on October 16 and nothing yet has been done?

Where is he now? What is he going to do? Is he going to set up a new panel? Is he going to do what has been attempted since last April when the panel was set up to so modify the terms of reference of that panel that they are meaningless?

In a letter from FEARO to the panel in the spring, it made clear that the panel did not have the right to consider alternatives. A fundamental of any environmental assessment is that the panel has the right to consider what alternatives there were and whether this is the only means of achieving the government's or the proponent's ends.

The minister referred to tree planting as mitigating measures. It is up to an environmental assessment to determine what mitigating measures are adequate, not to the proponent to put in place what he considers mitigating measures and then expect the environmental panel to rubber stamp those mitigating measures.

We have two court orders that make it clear what the obligation is of the government. It is clear from the actions of the minister that those obligations have not been met. Tough talk instead of tough action does not delude this House or the public.

The parliamentary secretary talked about Bill C-78. The government, from the beginning of this project in June 1988 to now—well over two years—has avoided actions it could have and should have taken, has attempted in every way possible to ensure that this project continues. This inaction gives no one any confidence that Bill C-78 is going to lead to a process where all projects that proceed in this country are going to do so only with the fullest respect for the environment in a way that does not damage it, and in a way that sets us in a different direction, with the environment as our first consideration when we decide whether and how a project should continue.

Bill C-78 does not at all allay the concerns of the public and the concerns of this opposition that the government is one bit sincere. In fact, it allows for this kind of thing to continue. It allows for the government to compromise at any time it wants on environmental assessment.

We have guideline orders. We have court decisions that give those guideline orders full strength and effect, that give the government not only the right but the obligation to take whatever action it wants to protect the environment. Until we are prepared to move forward from the current situation in legislation, we should not move at all.

Bill C-78 does not move us forward in areas of interprovincial jurisdiction. What we need is a government with the courage and the confidence to say: "We are responsible for the environment in this country, and we are going to deal honestly, fairly but toughly with any problems or any authority that tries to damage that environment."

I just want to wrap up by saying what I said at the beginning. There are some things we do that are temporary in nature, that have a short term and not a terribly serious impact. This is one that does have serious impact.

This is a challenge to the government to act now, to pull that permit now, to go to court as construction continues, to do what it should have done months ago and use whatever political, fiscal and legal means at its disposal to stop this project. Any environmental panel set up, if it does not do that, will be a sham. It will be useless, worthless, because the project will be done before it has an opportunity to complete its work.

We have not yet talked about whether there was or was not a deal between the Premier of Saskatchewan and the Minister of the Environment. There is only one way for that question to be answered and that is for the minister to table all documents, all letters, all correspondence, any draft agreement, and any information so that this House can draw its own conclusions.

I find it hard to believe, and I think any reasonable person would find it hard to believe, that the Province of Saskatchewan would expose itself to legal damage by letting contracts, by even calling for tenders, if it did not know it could proceed. There is only one basis on which it could have known it could proceed and that was some indication from the Minister of the Environment that it would be able to proceed.

Against that logic the government has an obligation to table any information relative to the claims by the Premier of Saskatchewan and by the President of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation that such a deal existed. Only then will we and the Canadian public know who to believe on this issue and who to trust with the future of our most precious environmental resources.

I challenge the minister and I challenge the government to stop trying to fool Canadians about its intentions on the environment. Tough words do not stop the kind of damage this project is going to do. It should be subject to a full environmental assessment. It should be subject to a full report. It is too late now for the Rafferty dam. Let us admit that. Damage has been done that cannot be undone, but let us stop the work now and ensure it does not go any further. Let us make sure the Alameda dam does not proceed along the same bumbling path that has been followed at the Rafferty dam.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament from Manitoba I have had a long-standing interest in the dispute over the Rafferty-Alameda dam. I had an opportunity to check the records this morning and see that I raised this in June, 1988.

I raised it as a result of information that came to me from someone who at that time worked in the minister's office. That person was concerned that the effects of this project on Manitoba were not being taken into consideration in the deliberations and agreements going on at that time between the Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada with respect to the Rafferty-Alameda project.

The person I am referring to later resigned from the service of the Minister of the Environment over this issue and it was out of that resignation that came the support for the view that a deal had been made at that time between the Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada with respect to Rafferty-Alameda, the deal being that the Saskatchewan government would accommodate the federal government on the Grasslands park in return for the Saskatchewan government having its way on the Rafferty-Alameda project.

The person I am referring to of course was Elizabeth May, who has since gone on to resume her work as an environmental activist and recently has authored a book with respect to the fight over South Moresby and Lyell Island.

I recall this to remind the government and the minister that the minister did not do the right thing with respect to the current situation in Rafferty-Alameda. He has already delayed in doing the right thing. We are at a disadvantage today because we know he may make an announcement later. We do not know what that announcement will be, but we can say that he has delayed in doing what we think is the right thing, which is revoking the licence. If the minister persists in not doing the right thing, he will be the third environment minister to have his credibility dashed on the rocks, so to speak, of the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

Tom McMillan, began his Ministry of the Environment with high expectations all around, and ended up discredited because of the way he handled the Rafferty-Alameda project. The next Minister of the Environment eventually left the ministry for reasons not related to the environment, but had his credibility damaged by his reluctance to do the right thing with respect to Rafferty–Alameda.

We now have a third Minister of the Environment. If he ever wanted to do anything to shore up, build up or create some credibility for himself, having originally got the job in an extemporaneous sort of way because of the resignation of the former minister leaving the government caucus to join the Bloc Quebecois, he should do the right thing and take a very tough line with the Government of Saskatchewan. We feel that tough line should be the revoking of the licence, not taking the Government of Saskatchewan to court because that takes time.

The Government of Saskatchewan has shown that it has no respect for litigation. This has been through the courts and the construction continues. The only possible thing that might work is to revoke the licence. That is what the minister must do. If that is not the announcement he makes today then we will continue to be on his case until he does that.

We are talking about the rule of law. We listened, and all Canadians listened, with some sympathy to the Prime Minister the few times he emerged from under whatever rock he was hiding this summer to say something about what was happening at Oka. He would talk about the rule of law, about how all Canadian laws must be respected and that sort of thing. That is what we are talking about here. We are talking about a situation which has been ruled on by the courts, and the Government of Saskatchewan has flagrantly ignored the judgments reached by the courts, and what we assume was the spirit of the agreement between the federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan pursuant to those court judgments.

If this sort of thing happened anywhere else, if there was this kind of unauthorized property damage going on anywhere else, we would call the police. What is happening here is that the common property of everyone, in this case the environment and the land being subjected to the construction activities at Rafferty–Alameda, is being illegally altered and illegally damaged. If someone did this in your backyard or if someone went into the backyard of the hon. member for Brandon—Souris and said: "Well, I know there's a law against this and I know there is a court order against this, but I have decided I want to do this anyway," then proceeded to dig up his backyard. What would happen? That person would be brought to heel and might even end up in jail.

There has been a lot of talk over the last 10 years or so with respect to the environment. Some of it has come from the other side, but mostly it has come from environmental groups. They express the need to see negative or illegal actions against the environment, not in the namby-pamby way that we now regard them as civil matters which can be litigated and negotiated, but as crimes and the kind of thing we put an end to when they are happening. That is the kind of situation that we have here with respect to the Government of Saskatchewan and the Rafferty–Alameda project.

What kind of possible credibility can the government, or for that matter, the whole environmental review process, ever hope to have in the future if the Government of Saskatchewan can get away with simply saying: "We don't like that ruling and we have a different view of the agreement that we had with the federal government. We are just going to go ahead." It is no wonder this panel resigned.

Any group of people with a smidgen of self-respect would not have anything to do with this process. Perhaps these people felt, at the time at which they were appointed, that there was a serious intent on the part of both levels of government to initiate a full and meaningful review. Fair enough. But they have obviously come to the judgment that the kind of review they had in mind is not in the cards, and that the Government of Saskatchewan was proceeding apace with the project. Who would want to be part of a farce where you come up with a final review or judgment of a project just at the time it is being completed?

The only people who seem to be able to tolerate that scenario in its own mind is this government, but it is not just the credibility of the government that is at stake. If it was just that, I would not worry about it. It is like worrying about nothing, because it does not have any credibility. That is not the point. Who cares about the credibility of this government, per se, by itself?

What we care about is the way in which this government, by adding fuel to the fires of cynicism which are already consuming the land, is creating a situation in which Canadians will find it impossible to have any hope, not with respect to all the things that we already associate cynicism with in the political process, but also with respect to this whole question of the environment and the rule of law. Yet, that is precisely what the government is doing in appearing at first to have made deals about the environment, then ignoring its own statutes, and being found in contravention of those statutes by the courts. And so it goes until the situation we find ourselves in today, where it appears that the minister knew that the panel had resigned, that construction was proceeding, and it was not until it became public that, thanks to being questioned in the House of Commons, he now is in the position of feeling that he has to do something about it.

If the minister has any commitment whatsoever to the integrity of the environmental review process, to the integrity of the role of government in protecting the environment, and for the sake of future governments—never mind this one—the only thing he can do is to revoke the licence. That is what we hope to hear from the minister later on today. Perhaps he will choose to make that announcement in the House when he speaks to this particular motion put forward by the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

I am very happy that today we have the opportunity to debate Rafferty-Alameda, and I congratulate the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle on making it possible. I was also pleased to be able to second the motion. It gives us an opportunity to spend some time on this particular environmental question, but also on the larger question of the environment. I think on a day-to-day basis, or indeed on a month-to-month basis, it does not get as much attention around here as it should. It is as if, Mr. Speaker, we are all in a lifeboat somewhere and we are spending all of our time arguing about who the captain will be or how we are going to distribute the last remaining lunch that we have. In the meantime, the boat is sinking and nobody is willing to pay any attention to the fact that the boat is sinking. Well, the boat is sinking.

To use another analogy—a favourite of mine—which goes back a long time: the canaries in the mine are dying. We remember that miners used canaries in the mines so, when the canaries began to die, they knew that it was time to get the hell out of the mine because they can not breathe the air any more. Well, the canaries are dying all over the place.

The canaries are dying when there are no more fish left in the ocean to provide a livelihood for fishermen and fisherwomen. The canaries are dying when 10-year-old saplings or seven-year-old saplings have to be planted in Toronto, instead of the three-year-old saplings which used to be planted, because the three-year-old saplings will die due to the quality of the air in Toronto.

The canaries are dying all over the place and these are just a few examples. I could go on and on. And yet we, in the House, with our endless prattle about things that do not really matter when stacked up against the environment, are doing the Canadian public a great disservice by being so preoccupied with these penultimate matters, instead of the ultimate question of human survival, for that is what we are talking about. In each and every case, when we are talking about an environmental issue, we are asking if we have the collective political will to survive as a human species, to have a truly human, fully human future, or are we some kind of unintelligent species which will simply not wake up to what it is doing to itself and to its environment, and are we destined to collective self-destruction?

In that respect, individual Canadians can do a lot of things such as collecting stuff to recycle, buying green products, and all those sorts of things which are happening now. But, in the final analysis, that will not be enough unless policies are put into place and there is the political will by governments and the international and global communities to deal with this problem. I am sorry, but I do not see that kind of will displayed on the other side of the House. I do not see it in sufficient quantity internationally for that matter. There is a lot of talk about sustainable development, yes. One cannot turn on the TV or radio, or read anything now without hearing or reading about sustainable development.

We need to talk about what development means and what sustainability means, because this phrase has become cheapened. It has has become the standard language of public relations people and everyone else who wants to be part of the new thing happening vis-à-vis the environment. Well, public relations will not get us into the 21st century and 22nd century with a liveable environment. Only real political will will do that and real hard political choices that none of us will enjoy, not just the rich, the powerful, the polluters, but every one of us who has a life-style which is wrapped up in ways which negatively affect the environment, and that includes almost everyone.

This is something I hope we will all keep in mind when we are debating Rafferty-Alameda, acid rain, PCBs, water quality in the Great Lakes, or whatever. All of these things need to be seen in the larger context of human survival and in the larger context of the integrity of creation. Unless we begin to think at that level about what we are doing when we are talking about these issues, we will not be addressing the problem adequately.

The minister can make a start today, in terms of creating that political will and in terms of demonstrating that political will, by telling Premier Grant Devine of Saskatchewan that, as far as the Government of Canada is concerned, he is acting outside the law and he will be treated the way outlaws are supposed to be treated. The licence should be revoked and, if construction on the project continues after that, then Mr. Devine ought to be answerable to the full extent of the law for the environmental crimes that he would be committing if he continued with that project.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the rage and the outrage I just heard expressed, but I wonder if the hon. member could give me some information about the past involvement of his party on this issue. Perhaps if he heard a few dates and events, he could tell me how his party responded.

For instance, in February, 1986 Premier Grant Devine announced the multi-million dollar Rafferty-Alameda Dam project. If I am not mistaken, there was an NDP government in power in Manitoba at that time and perhaps he might want to tell me how it reacted.

Perhaps he might want to tell me how the NDP government in Manitoba reacted in August, 1987, when the development authority, set up by Saskatchewan and various environmental groups, approached the NDP government in Manitoba and asked them to take a very strong stand against this development. The NDP government in Manitoba at that time said: "It's not our responsibility. It is the federal government's responsibility." It let the environmental groups take the government to court and we know that those were successful.

Again, in February, 1988, when there was still an NDP government in power in Manitoba—unless I am mistaken—the Saskatchewan Environment Minister approved the Rafferty-Alameda Dam project, and still the NDP government in Manitoba, knowing the impact on Manitoba and the public objections in Manitoba, resisted the pleas of environmental groups to take some legal action to try to oppose this.

I wonder if the hon. member who has just spoken would like to explain to me the past record of his colleagues in Manitoba on this.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for doing her homework, a rare incident in the Liberal caucus but it is nice to see it happen every once in a while.

The fact of the matter is two things. First, part of the problem at that time was that the federal government and the Government of Saskatchewan were careful to do everything they could to exclude the Government of Manitoba from the process and, indeed, from a lot of the information. But the fact remains that I have no desire to defend the passivity with which this issue was dealt by the NDP government of that time. It was far too passive on a variety of environmental issues and I believe it is one of the reasons it met the fate it did in 1988.

I could spend a lot more time than the hon. member has documenting the way in which the government of the province of Manitoba at that time, in my judgment, did not pay enough attention, and did not have the political will I was just talking about that is necessary to deal with the tough environmental questions that has to be dealt with.

For example, with respect to returnable containers, the availability of returnable containers actually declined under an NDP government. I see that the Ontario NDP government has made a different kind of decision today and is reported in The Toronto Star as going to be taking a tough line with the soft drink industry in trying to get the number of returnable containers up. This is good news. This is the kind of thing the Manitoba NDP government should have done and did not do. I was one of the ones who was always on its case asking it to do it. If the hon. members talks to any of the cabinet ministers, they will verify what I have just said.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, before I ask my colleague a question I do want to make an observation. In terms of the opposition to the Rafferty–Alameda Dam, might I suggest that it was my party, including myself, that first raised it in the House consistently, before the Liberals even began to realize that there was an issue here. The record definitely shows this, if hon. members want to go back and check the record.

I must also say on this, which maybe indicates a difference as well, that the former Liberal critic for the environment, the hon. member for Davenport, and I had joint press conferences, including the Wildlife Federation and so forth, that we took this to be not a topic that we were going to score political points on, but a topic that we were working on together and we were quite anxious and willing to include any Conservative as well. The position we took, and that critic for the Liberal Party at that time, was that the environment is too important to play political games with. Unfortunately, the Liberal Party decided not to reappoint the hon. member for Davenport as its environmental critic and in fact now is playing politics with the environment, and let the record show that as well.

The question I want to ask my colleague is this. In my speech earlier, I quoted Mr. George Hill, who is still the president of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. In his comments, Mr. George Hill stated how he had been assured by Dr. Good from the environmental department that Dr. Good had complete control over the environmental panel. He could determine pretty well how the panel was going to be operating. Mr. George Hill made some very serious allegations.

We know that the government has introduced Bill C–78, dealing with environmental review. Certainly the bill goes half way in a sense that environmental review will no longer be part of the environment department but will be separated. Mr. George Hill made the allegation in his speech that because right now the environmental review is under the environment department and Mr. Good of the environment department can control pretty well what the environmental review section is doing, while Bill C–78 separates that, still our request and the request of environmentalists is to have the environmental review part report directly to Parliament rather than to the Minister of the Environment to ensure that the environmental review process remains legitimate, remains outside of politics and should become answerable to Parliament rather than to the minister. Would my colleague agree with that?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with that and expand on it in this sense, that I think that wherever possible environmental assessment needs to be taken out of political control, if you like. There is a problem with that as well because what does political mean? When we say out of political control, we mean political in the pejorative or partisan sense of that. I do not want to see it taken out of political control in the sense that larger genuine political questions about value, the nature of development, et cetera, which are political questions in the best sense of what it means to be political, and which at some point in a process need to be considered once the basic biological and physical assessments have been done of any particular project.

I want to say something in response to some of the heckling that I was getting from my colleagues. It is the first time I have ever been heckled and I am very sensitive about it. I was asked whether I had criticized the former NDP government on the public record. Indeed, I have had many occasions, some of them in this House, to criticize not only the Manitoba NDP government but the former Saskatchewan NDP government over their policies with respect to uranium mining. I know that it is strange to Liberals that anybody would get up and express criticism of a government of their own party. But we in the NDP have that kind of freedom of expression and we use it frequently in order to make our positions known.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for questions and comments has now expired. The Opposition House Leader has the floor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, during a debate of this kind, it is customary for a member to be allowed a 20-minute speech, followed by time for questions and comments. The Official Opposition's interest in this Opposition day and in the motion before the House is such that my colleagues asked me to suggest, as has become customary, that we be allowed to split the 20 minutes in two periods of ten minutes, followed by five minutes for questions and comments. Or if you prefer, Mr. Speaker, we will give notice to the Chair that Liberal members wish to have each shared by two speakers. I say this so as not to complicate the task of the Chair. We could start with the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou, who will speak for ten minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the suggestion by the Parliamentary House Leader of the Official Opposition. Does the House agree with this request?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment?

[English]

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, we have no difficulty with the Official Opposition proceeding in that manner if they choose to do so.

I might add that I suspect that we on our side will probably not do so, but it it is only because the issue is so complex and needs such substantive argument that we will retain our 20-minute speeches.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, on the same point. We have no objections. We do want some guidance from the Chair, though, in terms of what happens to the question period afterward. Is it understanding them that one can ask five-minute questions of each of the speakers?

Most probably, as the parliamentary secretary stated for the government members, most of our members as well will speak for 20 minutes. It is a complex issue. It does require some in depth understanding and some explanation.

We understand, as well, that the Liberals might lack this. They might want to speak for 10 minutes is to give us 10 minutes worth of platitudes, but again the record will show that.

An hon. member: Ten minutes of shallow breathing.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your attention please. If I understand correctly, the House agrees with the proposal made by the Parliamentary House Leader of the Official Opposition. There are, of course, provisions that allow the members of the other parties to either take the full 20 minutes with 10 minutes of questions and comments, or divide their speaking time as well, as long as they advise the Chair before they start whether they intend to take 10 minutes or 20 minutes. So that is understood. I now recognize the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou, for a ten-minute speech.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with my parliamentary House Leader. There is much I would like to say, but I prefer to give ten minutes of my speaking time to colleagues who will shed some light on the regional aspects and argue the importance of the federal government's role in environmental issues.

Mr. Speaker, when the Saskatchewan government decided to proceed with the Rafferty—Alameda project, our environment critic, the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard, said he was vigorously opposed to the Saskatchewan government's decision to go ahead with construction on the Rafferty dam, without having the requisite public hearings on the project's environmental impact.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, the history of this project goes back to February 13, 1986. Since then, there have been a number of developments. Studies were made, the licence was revoked and re-instated several times, and a number of conditions were set. Today, the latest decision by the Saskatchewan government contradicts a ruling by the Federal Court, and challenges federal environmental regulations. I hope the minister will set an example that will be clear to everyone concerned, and I hope he will do so as soon as possible—it is already late in the day—and that he will do everything necessary to stop this project. A clear stand is important because there are other projects as well.

For instance, I know that as far as Phase II of the James Bay Project was concerned, the Minister of the Environment was quite clear when he said that environmental assessments were necessary before they could proceed. So if the minister was that categorical for Quebec, the same should apply to Saskatchewan or Ontario, as in the case of any other program.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an area where one can conveniently say: now listen, it depends on the circumstances, we'll let them— there are a number of considerations and finally, there might be a provincial election. The environment, however, is so important because it involves the future of all mankind. That is why a clear stand must be taken, since this is not an area where concessions should be made, Mr. Speaker.

If we start making concessions, of course we can talk about foreign policy and the global economy, but the environment is the air we breathe and the water we drink, and that is why the future of mankind is at stake here. If a federal government cannot have clear authority over the environment, we are all wasting our time. If every province makes decisions for purely internal reasons, without considering what is at stake for our country and for the environment, I think we are not doing our job, and I therefore ask the Minister of the Environment to take action and do everything he can to put an immediate stop to this project until the requisite studies have been completed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, to make sure that everyone listening understands why we are talking here and why we are in this situation, I would like to talk about what happened from the beginning to now. On February 13, 1986, Premier Grant Devine announced a multi-million dollar project. The Rafferty dam is to be used to cool the coal-fired generator at Shand. The Alameda reservoir water will be stored and released periodically. In August 1987, the Souris Basin Development Authority, set up by the province, released the results of its environmental impact study. Meanwhile, the province appointed a three member board of inquiry to hold public hearings. In February 1988, the province's environment minister approves work to begin on the dam projects after reviewing the board's recommendations.

Two years ago there were people opposed to the project. It ended up in court. The courts rejected and put this project on hold. Canadians are asking why the province of Saskatchewan wants to go ahead with it and why the minister is slowly, with all sorts of excuses, giving the opportunity for the project to continue. That is why my colleague from LaSalle—Émard said very clearly that this has to be stopped right away, otherwise the other provinces might look at the weaknesses of the federal government in this matter and proceed unilaterally like Saskatchewan did.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling that my time has almost expired. In concluding, I would like to take the little time I have left to quote our environment critic, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, who said that the piles of studies that preceded the release of the Green Plan would be so much garbage if governments allowed a couple of developers to ignore these regulations through injunctions. Our future is at stake—our collective environmental future. That is what the Official Opposition critic or the environment had to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, a report to the United Nations on the Canadian Council of Churches study of mental health and social stress of refugee claimants in Canada was made public today. The reports states:

> Canada's treatment of these large numbers of people is in direct violation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. If not remedied it will rank among the most significant mass abuses of human rights by Canada—

On December 28, 1988, in a downtown hotel in Toronto, the minister of immigration announced the plan for handling the cases of people in the system prior to the new law taking effect on January 1, 1989.

By the end of July 1990, over one and a half years from the announcement of an up to two year program, less than 20,000 cases had been completed. Of these, 16,179 had been accepted in principle and were in process of being landed, and 608 were rejected.

Almost all the claimants have now been in Canada for two years, many for four or more, and almost none have come out of the end of the tunnel.

S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker, this system is turning out to be an expensive proposition for Quebec because the province has to assume financial responsibility for the refugees. More especially, the system is discouraging immigrants from integrating the majority in Quebec. The minister must take immediate action because these policies—

TRIBUTE TO YVON DOLBEC

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to tell members of the House about the 1990 award of the Quebec chapter of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, the year's winner of this major award is Mr. Yvon Dolbec, founding president of Dolbec Logistique international Inc. Mr. Dolbec is well known for his outstanding contribution to international trade growth throughout Quebec and, more specifically, for his role in promoting international trade. This warm-hearted, dynamic and extremely generous man is the very image of the professional who devotes himself to the betterment of the community.

Mr. Speaker, I extend to him my sincere congratulations for winning this award, and I wish him many more years of success in international affairs.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today, World Food Day, Canadians are asked to stop and consider what so many of us take for granted: our daily bread.

We must remember that hundreds of thousands of Canadians, half of whom are children, go hungry each day and that our farmers who produce our basic food needs are less and less able to survive. Short-sighted government policies which fail to support our farmers can destroy our country's food production security, and polices which do not provide adequate nourishment to all Canadians will bankrupt us in future social costs.

World-wide the situation is even more serious. The discomfort of seeing the pitiful images of starving, emaciated children and adults must overwhelm us into action.

In Canada we must start by assuring security of Canadian food supply and production. This government must guarantee that our farmers will be protected in the current trade negotiations at the GATT. Each Canadian must understand the links between food consumption and environmental degradation and develop green, environmentally friendly habits.

Last, but not least, this government and all Canadians must strive to assure by policy and action that every human being is guaranteed his or her daily bread as a basic human right.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the refugee backlog system in Canada has broken down.

Even with the increased budget and staff taken from regular immigration, it cannot process all 100,000 persons in the time the minister promised. Twenty-one months later only one quarter have received decisions. Of those accepted less than three per cent have been landed and allowed to apply to bring their spouses and children, which will likely take another two years.

A mental health study shows that 58 per cent of these claimants suffer declining mental health since they came to our land because of our government's delay. This is cruel and inhuman treatment, torture, according to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which Canada signed.

The great majority of our backlog came over three years ago from notoriously refugee producing countries such as Sri Lanka, Iran or El Salvador. Our government discriminates against them by forcing the most recent claimants from the Caribbean to jump the queue for examination first.

Shame on this government for continuing the torture of persons who came to Canada to escape from cruel and inhuman treatment at home.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, Etobicoke Council and the Ontario government recently agreed to give Robin Pereira a rebate on her taxes to compensate her for airport noise disturbance.

Now that it has been established that a level of government recognizes airport noise as a problem, others will demand and can reasonably expect to receive compensation.

Recognizing noise as a problem is not new. Provincial governments have been building highway sound barriers for years. But it has been difficult to persuade governments to give airport noise similar attention.

What does this mean for the federal government? It means our government can no longer maintain that noise is a minimal concern and that complaints only represent a handful of citizens who exaggerate the effects of jet airliners flying over their homes.

Ultimately the federal government will be accountable. Others will follow Robin Pereira's lead, and soon provincial and municipal governments will demand compensation of their own.

Isn't it time that we take a serious look at this problem and address it with the attention it deserves?

FEAST OF LIGHTS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform all hon. colleagues that the period of October 16 to October 20 marks the celebration of the Diwali Festival, the Hindu Feast of Lights.

This is an important time for Hindus in Canada and all around the world, as they commemorate the victory of light over darkness and love over hatred.

By commemorating Rama's defeat of the demon Ravana and the return of light to the world, Diwali imbues the Canadian Hindu community with a sense of joy and renewal.

With its vibrant spirituality and traditional wisdom, Hinduism and this particular festival have added much to our heritage. Celebrations like Diwali help us better understand and appreciate the common bonds of humanity and of the human experience in which we all share.

I believe I speak for all members of the House when I offer the Canadian Hindu community our sincere wishes for a Diwali full of joy and peace. In this spirit, all Canadians join with you today, Mr. Speaker.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the decision by the government to exempt the Alcan Kemano completion project from an environmental assessment is a gross violation of the Prime Minister's 1984 promise to conduct such a review.

A retired Fisheries and Oceans biologist has said that they were under great pressure to justify the Alcan agreement. Another today, has said that fisheries biologists were opposed to the government's proposal. A recent engineering study and now the B.C. ministry of the environment have expressed concerns about the Nechako River Agreement.

The biologist with Fisheries and Oceans says:

> This is a classic example of how to abandon a resource. It's a classic example of how to misuse scientists. And it's a classic example of getting public servants to put a good face on a bad decision.

The Minister of the Environment should subject this project to a full review, and the Minister of Justice should launch an investigation into the allegations that public employees were put under political pressure to justify this government's decision to kill a river.

BILL C-21

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, last week members of the United Allied Fishermen and the Allied Workers Union met with the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration to express their concern that their unemployment insurance interests were not being protected.

I want the fishermen to know that if the Senate had passed Bill C-21 into law a year ago, they would not be concerned today because fishermen would be collecting their unemployment benefits after 10 weeks of work, whether or not they fish in an area considered to be a high employment area or not. The policy of economic terrorism should indeed be put to an end, and it should be done in the Senate where it is being imposed by the Liberal senators, not because they care about the fishermen but because they care about playing crass political games.

I urge the United Allied Fishermen and the Allied Workers Union to lobby the other place as it has lobbied the standing committee, to let the senators know about the devastating effects the Liberal senators' partisan gamesmanship is having on the lives of fishermen, as well as on the lives of expectant parents, seniors and others who would benefit from the passing of Bill C-21.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, today is the United Nations World Food Day. We usually think about those elsewhere who are hungry. We all too often block out the Canadian situation. We would do well to reflect on our own who live in constant hunger.

In Winnipeg, over 4,600 people rely on food banks. Almost 2,000 of these are children. In Canada, 1.4 million people including over half a million children are in a similar situation.

On Tuesday, October 2, in this House the Minister of Finance stated proudly that Canada experienced extremely strong growth in the economy for the past seven and a half years. Then why, over the last year alone, did the number of people using food banks increase by 30 per cent?

This government has decided that it is not responsible for hunger and malnutrition. This government has not declared war on poverty; it has declared war on the poor.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, grain farmers in Canada are facing the worst cash flow crisis since the 1930s because the world price for wheat in real terms is the lowest in history due to the $50 per tonne Export Enhancement Program of the United States.

The Minister of Agriculture, after one year of fighting every farm organization in Canada to get rid of the interest-free cash advance program, has finally agreed to reinstate this program for one year. Finally he has realized that farmers are facing a disaster.

Last October the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool asked the government for a special assistance program for farmers. The government took six months to approve the program and payments were delayed for almost eleven months for many producers.

While the United States has armed its grain producers to the teeth in the international trade wars with programs like the cash advance program, deficiency payments and the export enhancement program, the Mulroney government has disarmed our farmers in this international trade war. This has weakened our bargaining position at the GATT negotiations. I call on the government to stop selling out our farmers and bring in emergency legislation to reinstate interest-free cash advances immediately.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents, Mrs. Michelle Cloutier of Val Senneville, outraged at the behaviour of Liberal senators, wrote to them on October 12, 1990, as follows: "As a Canadian citizen in a democratic system I urge you to stop playing games as you have been doing in an attempt to delay Senate proceedings. I also ask you not to accept any pay for the time that has been lost, because you are very handsomely paid by the Canadian taxpayers. Finally, instead of trying to prevent the government from dealing with the situation, I would suggest that you prove beyond any doubt that the Liberal policies implemented when you were in office did not result in the current dismal economic and social conditions. Liberal senators, either you work for Canadians or retire and let Canadians work for you".

Mr. Speaker, I should think we share the feelings of Mrs. Cloutier when she states that, come election time, all Canadians will remember how the Liberal Party is behaving these days!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I recently received a copy of a letter sent to Senator MacEachen by one of my constituents, a small businessman in Westfield, New Brunswick.

My constituent urges Senator MacEachen to support the GST. He says:

> I question whether Canadians support the disruption and uncertainty the Senate has caused by holding up the GST legislation. I also question whether the lobbyists who have called on you have really vested an unelected Senate with a mandate to overturn legislation that was part of the last campaign platform of the current elected majority government.

The time for obstructionism is over. The Senate has created a climate of uncertainty for Canada's business community that is unacceptable. It is time for Liberal senators to set aside their partisan politics and get on with the business of Canada's duly elected representatives.

I wonder if Senator MacEachen has read the name of my constituent into the record.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Like most Canadians, Mr. Speaker, my constituents have had enough of the ridiculous and outrageous performance of Liberal senators.

While men and women throughout the country are tightening their belts and working hard day in and day out to earn a living, the $65,000-a-year Liberal senators blow their kazoos and bang their desks.

While commerce people and businessmen work hard to build a better and more prosperous country, the Liberal senators ring the bells and read the phone directory, all the while getting the extra $153 a day they voted for themselves when they held the majority.

Mr. Speaker, we do not mind if they want to play children's games, but not at the expense of hard-working Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Rafferty-Alameda project represents only the tip of the iceberg when watching this government's failure to discharge its responsibilities and protect the environment. It is not the existing guidelines that are weak, it is this government that lacks spine.

The Minister of Transport ignores the court ruling on the Oldman River dam. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans exempts Point Aconi and the Alcan expansion, and ignores the concerns of the public. The Minister of Finance keeps ignoring the environment in tax reform and budgets and, on the crucial issue of James Bay 2, ambiguity reigns.

Canadians want substance, not public relations in the form of glossy brochures.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago this morning the federal government invoked the War Measures Act. I was a new member of Parliament at the time and I sat here as our leader, Tommy Douglas, rose to condemn that act in Parliament.

Now, some 20 years later, many questions remain unanswered.

[Translation]

However, we have learned two lessons, Mr. Speaker. First, violence must never be used in a democratic society. Second, the government overreacted by using the War Measures Act.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the 15 of us, including Stanley Knowles, joined Tommy Douglas in voting against that act. We were proud of Tommy Douglas when he said, and I quote:

> —we are not prepared to use the preservation of law and order as a smoke screen to destroy the liberties and the freedom of the people of Canada.

We proudly voted against that act on October 16, 1970.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Right now, the government is engaged in intense negotiations at the GATT on issues vital to the future of Canadian agriculture and, therefore, to the future of a large part of our Canadian economy. Yesterday here in this House the Minister for International Trade said, and I quote:

> The Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed at the amount of assistance he is giving Canadian farmers.

As far as I am aware, the Minister of Agriculture remained silent in the face of this statement. He did not deny it or contradict it. So I ask the minister about this statement. How can Canadian farmers have confidence in this government's ability to protect their interests? Is this not a strange way for this government to strengthen its hand by saying it is too generous to the farmers of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I used to know the Leader of the Opposition when he had a sense of humour. He has obviously lost it. Even The Globe and Mail detected that the comment made by the Minister for International Trade was being made tongue in cheek.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition, he may be interested in noting how some of the farm leaders have responded to the very balanced and well thought out position that has been put forth by the Government of Canada in the GATT negotiations as they relate to agriculture. Mr. Don Knoerr, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said that the national farm group strongly supports the main thrust of the Canadian government's proposals. I think that is a pretty solid endorsation of our position.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. I have a statement in my hand which was just released by the Canadian milk producers concerning the government's GATT position. They say:

> The Canadian offer regarding minimum access and the reduction of internal support to milk producers will be of no benefit to Canadian consumers and will severely penalize Canadian milk producers.

This is a statement just issued. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that this is a serious matter and he should not be making statements intended to be taken tongue in cheek, although the Minister for International Trade, in making one, may well have had not just his tongue but both feet in his mouth.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the government tabled a proposal that would raise market share of imported dairy products from 2.5 per cent to 5 per cent. I want to ask the minister why this government offeredc to double the market share of our competitors and how far he intends to go with this absurd and perilous policy.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): I am amazed at the hon. member's question. Last week, the Minister of Agriculture and I met the Dairy Farmers of Canada. Yesterday in Montreal, with Deputy Minister Denis, our representative in Geneva, and other parties, I met representatives of the Dairy Farmers of Canada and the Union des producteurs agricoles. Today, these people issued a press release, stating that the position tabled by Canada in Geneva was a positive development.

I want to make it quite clear that the status quo—and everybody across Canada agrees—is unacceptable, and that we had to table a proposal with GATT that would be positive and make the rest of the world realize the Canadian structure is probably the best in the world, but we had to convince our partners. Our own people could not agree more that the status quo was unacceptable. Since we are not like the Liberals, who merely complain whenever something doesn't suit them, we have tabled a position that reflects the objectives of agriculture for the twenty-first century.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister is a few weeks late with his press release, because I just quoted a statement made a few minutes ago by John Killoran, president of the Dairy Farmers of Canada, in which he said—I will quote from the English text—referring to a volume of 3.5 per cent:

[English]

> It is unrealistic for the federal government to expect the Canadian dairy industry to accept guaranteed access to its markets beyond this level.

He went on to say:

> The third aspect of the Canadian offer is the reduction in direct government support for agricultural producers of 50 per cent over the next ten years. "This proposal has never been endorsed by his organization and appears unjustifiable in the context of the GATT" said Mr. Killoran.

[Translation]

I therefore want to ask the minister why the government insists on maintaining a policy that was rejected by the Dairy Farmers of Canada. Why?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is trying hard but he is unable to overcome the general thrust of the statements. For example, Mr. Jim Caldwell of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association said that there is more to life than cows giving milk; there are cows that give meat. He said if other countries would adopt the Canadian position, we would have a pretty good deal.

The Canadian chicken marketing agency said—the hon. chickens opposite should listen to this—"poultry and egg producers would have little or nothing to complain about. It is what we expected." I mean wake up and join the real world.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Yesterday, the Minister of Agriculture claimed that the Dairy Farmers of Canada supported the Conservative Government's position at GATT, as a result of which dairy imports would double and industrial milk subsidies would be cut by 50 per cent. I would now like to read a quote by Don Killoran, president of the Dairy Farmers of Canada, who issued a press release about 20 minutes ago:

> It is unrealistic for the federal government to expect the Canadian dairy industry to accept guaranteed access to its markets beyond this level.

I would like to ask the minister why he makes this erroneous claim that the Dairy Farmers of Canada approve of his government's policy. He knows it isn't true.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to know that in the past three years, the Canadian position— When his government was in power, it did not bother to meet Canadian leaders in the agricultural sector even once in 16 years, but we, and first of all the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, meet them whenever necessary. We have set up committees to consult people across Canada. Last week, we consulted the Dairy Farmers of Canada. We are aware of the problems. I would like to read to you a document received from the Dairy Farmers of Canada in connection with the GATT talks.

As far as Canada's dairy industry is concerned, however, maintaining Article XI in its present form no longer provides protection against imports of processed dairy products, a protection that is crucial in order to preserve Canada's supply management program. It is therefore essential for Canada's dairy industry that the wording of Article XI be amended to reflect the Canadian proposal. That is what we have done, Mr. Speaker, and we did it because we believe in supply management.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister that Mr. Killoran has just told us 20 minutes ago, not last month, and I quote: "Canada's offer concerning minimum access and reduced support for producers will not benefit Canadian consumers but will severely penalize Canadian dairy producers". That is what Mr. Killoran said just 20 minutes ago.

Here is my question to the minister: Will he finally stand up and defend the agricultural producers, yes or no? If he cannot do that, let somebody else take over!

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr.

Speaker, I do not have to stand for such lecturing from the hon. member when it comes to defending Canadian farmers.

What my colleague and hon. members ought to know is that there already exists a minimum access to the Canadian market, roughly 2.5 or 2.7 per cent. The agricultural community now recognizes that we can no longer bar access to such sectors as butter, and that we must open up something like 1 to 1.5 per cent of our market. Mr. Speaker, we are in the position of a claimant. We are hoping for an article XI which would provide good protection for our marketing boards and prevent situations such as we experienced last year in the case of yogurt and ice cream. What we need, Mr. Speaker, is a supply management system which effectively protects dairy producers, not a system which might deteriorate from week to week. That is what we advocate, Mr. Speaker, a consistent position which will protect Canadian agricultural producers for years to come.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Aboriginal people in this country have received a lot of promises and many of those promises were made during the Oka crisis. However, now that the guns have been dropped, the barricades are down and the cameras gone, this government has fallen silent. I remind the Prime Minister that during the crisis he said that would develop, and I quote, "programs and policies that will bring a much greater degree of social justice and fairness to the native peoples across Canada". The Prime Minister is also committed to speed up land claims, to improve economic and social conditions.

What specifically has the Prime Minister done to see that land claims progress more quickly? What specifically has he done to ameliorate the social and economic conditions for aboriginal people across this country since that promise?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member has reminded us of the commitments that we made to the aboriginal people on September 25. We are proceeding in a co-ordinated fashion to realize some of those commitments.

It takes a lot of time to reverse a trend that has been occurring in the country over the century. The Prime Minister's commitment is the most broadly based, most sweeping, and most deeply penetrating commitment of its kind in the past century. We are progressing as well as can be expected, but we will be glad to advise the hon. member of our progress as we go along.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I regret, and the aboriginal peoples of Canada I am sure regret, that the Prime Minister will not stand in the House today and answer for his own promises.

I say to the Prime Minister, we have had a number of reviews, including the Penner report, the Coolican report, and the La Forme report on land claims. There have been many reports in the House on aboriginal conditions. The government has been in power six years. It has had six years to put into place a plan to deal with aboriginal issues.

I have made proposals, particularly around the land claims issue, one of them being an aboriginal land claims commission. Will the Prime Minister consider that proposal, and consider a system really to deal with land claims across the country? Will he consider an aboriginal land claims commission?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to consider all these options. In fact, that is exactly what is happening. If the hon. member would listen for a moment, she would hear what we have been saying all the way along, that we are looking at co-ordinated, appropriate ways of dealing with these issues. When we have the answers, we will be very pleased to present them to the hon. member in the House.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would remind the government that there are many people who have proposed the answers and most of all the aboriginal peoples of the country who should be consulted. He and the government should be listening to the answers that they have proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on September 24 I urged the Prime Minister to hold a public inquiry on the incidents at Oka and Kanesatake. He said that after the crisis, and I quote the Prime Minister, the government will be more than pleased to take the kind of action suggested by the New Democratic Party Leader.

Mr. Speaker, we need a public inquiry, we need action, not just words. We need a wide-ranging public inquiry like Mr. Justice Dubin's or the Marshall inquiry in New Brunswick. Will the Prime Minister act now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a motion to refer the whole matter to a parliamentary committee, and this would be the best way for hon. members to get acquainted with this case. In my speech of September 25 I referred to a series of initiatives we were going to take in favour of native peoples. The hon. member said, and I quote:

[English]

"Many people have proposed answers to aboriginal problems."

[Translation]

The answers and the solutions I heard from the opposition and elsewhere are rather sketchy. For some time now we have been advocating more serious analyses leading to real and worthwhile solutions which will bring lasting benefits to the native people of Canada. Never did I suggest that the answers would come to us overnight. These are major issues which require serious analysis, and that is precisely what the Canadian government will do.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade, pursuant to the GATT negotiations.

Since 1986, the government, without getting a single solitary thing in return, has given away two-price wheat, tax rebates on farm fuels, and much more. Yesterday, there were even more concessions. All of this has happened—and this is key—even before the heavy, tough negotiations have begun.

What else is the minister prepared to give away? Will the Western Grain Transportation Act be sacrificed?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I outlined yesterday what the amount of assistance is that Canada provides for its farmers. I said it was a tremendous amount, a huge amount. The Leader of the Opposition, of course, forgot to mention that it is a huge amount of assistance, $8.8 billion a year.

If the hon. member wants to help the farmers of Canada, he will speak to his senatorial colleagues in the Liberal caucus and ask them to pass the GST bill which will save the farmers of Canada $250 million. This is the most accurate estimate we have.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, this minister should stop joking and get serious.

When it comes to trade distorting subsidies, Canada is not the worst offender. Yesterday, at the GATT the government proposed a 50 per cent across-the-board reduction in internal subsidies. The minister knows well that that is not going to alter the imbalance already there. Surely, Canadian farmers deserve a level playing-field.

Will the minister promise no reductions in Canadian supports until other countries reduce their subsidies to Canada's levels?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman reveals a total lack of knowledge of how the negotiations at the MTN operate. Canada's offer is made conditional on and subject to the other countries of the world making offers at least as good as our own offer. That is before our own offer will go into effect at all. If there is no agreement at the GATT, there will be no one agreeing to do anything with respect to trade distorting subsidy.

We intend to continue to support agriculture in ways that are non-trade distorting. We will continue to give very strong support to agriculture, but we will do it in ways that do not damage our own agricultural interests and do not crucify the western grain farmers, which the hon. gentleman completely ignores in his statements which reveal that he has not studied this subject at all. He should come to a briefing and then ask another question.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade as well.

The Minister of Agriculture said a few minutes ago that the Minister for International Trade's statement yesterday was made with tongue in cheek. I would suggest that it was probably made with foot in mouth, and perhaps some of his own colleagues could treat him for that.

The minister's figure that was quoted yesterday included the cost of provincial programs. It included the cost of border protection, research and development in the agri-food industry, and food inspection, all of which are costs that benefit all Canadians.

Is the minister saying that these expenditures are bad expenditures and bad ways to spend Canadian tax dollars?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is really a shocking display of lack of study by the members of the agricultural caucus, if they have an agricultural caucus in the Official Opposition.

Canada is trying to achieve the doing away of export subsidy assistance, which is at present ruining our Canadian exporting farmers. The Canadian Wheat Board, which offered an initial price at the start of the season of, I think, $135 a tonne, is having to sell far below that because of the ruinous export subsidized competition between the European Community and the United States. For four years now we have been trying to put an end to that. The hon. gentleman opposite does not realize it.

We intend to try to do away with trade distorting subsidies. Income support and protection for farmers and other programs that are not trade distorting, yes, we will support 100 per cent and continue to support, but we want our own farmers to be saved from this atrocious subsidized competition presently hammering them into the ground when they have the second best crop in their history. Wake up, man.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Possibly he can have a briefing with the minister who just spoke.

The minister knows full well that the statement made and the figures given by the Minister for International Trade yesterday left the wrong impression and gives an incorrect impression about the amount of money spent by the government to assist agriculture and Canadian farmers. It is really doing a disservice to Canadian farmers at this stage going into the round at GATT.

Why did the minister not stand immediately yesterday and correct his colleague, or does he agree with the statement he made yesterday?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is widely recognized in the outside world—I do not know if the hon. gentleman is in the world outside or inside—that this Minister of Agriculture has been the most expensive Minister of Agriculture in Canada's history.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosbie: I was feeling sympathetic with the Minister of Finance yesterday.

Why does the hon. gentleman think that the President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, our biggest farm group, said that he can strongly support its general thrust, when speaking of our offer at the GATT? Does that not tell him anything?

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture who, eleven months ago, was quoted as saying in The Ottawa Citizen and in the Calgary Herald:

> This government is committed to the principles of supply-management and that includes border protection for the commodities.

Before the GATT yesterday, Canada proposed to open the borders for dairy and poultry products. What happened in the intervening year? Why the policy reversal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is pretty clear that the position that the federal government has taken with respect to the supply-management systems in Canada is a position that, not only secures the retention of the supply-management system in Canada, but indeed strengthens the existence of the supply-management system. It was under threat as a result of the existing Article XI, which was undermined as a result of a GATT panel ruling that was brought down with respect to ice cream and yoghurt.

The hon. member across the way wants to quote selectively from the Dairy Farmers of Canada. This is what the Dairy Farmers of Canada have to say about this government's position today, October 16, 1990.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is very important to clarify this issue. This is what the Dairy Farmers have said today: "The federal government offer within the trade negotiations in agriculture under GATT covers three important aspects for the Canadian dairy industry."

"The first aspect deals with the clarification of Article XI of the GATT which permits the maintenance of import controls in the case of supply-management. This clarification is necessary in order to recognize the validity of applying such a program on dairy products as has been the case in Canada for the past 20 years.

"Dairy Farmers of Canada submitted to the federal government a detailed proposal several months ago in order to improve the actual wording of the article of GATT, which is fundamental to the maintenance and future development of our industry. In this regard, the position tabled by the federal government is fully supportive of the recommendations of the Dairy Farmers of Canada."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Read the second paragraph.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not I should ask my first question again. We did not hear what the government's policy was.

Yesterday, Carla Hills called on Europeans to ignore their farmers because they represent only 10 per cent of the population and cannot throw out a government.

Since Canadian farmers represent less than 4 per cent of our population, and since the Europeans have had difficulty distinguishing Canada's position from the Americans', have our negotiators accepted that same analysis that farmers do not matter any more?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member has been reading what Carla Hills, the American trade negotiator has to say about the Canadian position. Our position is clearly well thought out. It is balanced, it is realistic and it reflects the reality of the Canadian agricultural industry. It will bring about order in the international marketplace, bring about some stability and security and hopefully some confidence in the total agricultural industry; and that is our bottom line.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture just read the second paragraph of a statement that I had already quoted from, issued around two o'clock by the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture why he stopped where he did and why he did not read the next paragraph which begins as follows:

> "However, the government offer of a 5 per cent minimum access, by volume, to Canadian markets is unacceptable to Dairy Farmers of Canada" stressed Mr. Killoran.

Why did he not read that and put that on the record of Hansard?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, because I ran out of time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture says that he ran out of time when it came time to defend the interests of Canadian farmers.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he will table the entire statement, which will be found to have in it all the points I raised, which were the quotations from the president of the Dairy Farmers of Canada. It says that the offer of 5 per cent and the other point I mentioned are totally unacceptable to the Dairy Farmers of Canada. If this government cares about the dairy farmers, why will it not accept that position and withdraw what it tabled at the GATT yesterday?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my colleague that in October 1989 the Dairy Farmers of Canada issued a document entitled Necessary GATT Principles for Supply Management, Article XI. The last paragraph of this document, paragraph (j), states: "—where no historical imports exist, permit the level of authorized imports of the product form to be not less than 1 per cent of the domestic production of such product form, provided that the cumulative level of imports in quantity or value of the like domestic product in any form is not less than 5 per cent of total domestic production of the like domestic product", end of quotation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Considering the fact that the GST will increase the price of housing and that the Minister of Finance has devastated the industry with his made-in-Canada recession and excessively high interest rates, why doesn't the minister drop the GST instead of gouging Canadian consumers?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter of the GST has been decided in this House.

What is at issue today is whether senators who form a minority in the Senate are going to hold the Senate to ransom and hold this Parliament to ransom by not only resisting debate on the matter of the GST, but also resisting a vote on the GST.

The GST was part of this government's platform in the last election. The Liberal Party lost the election.

Ms. Copps: False.

Mr. Gauthier: It was not.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is very unusual that the member for Ottawa—Vanier would be saying that it was not part of our platform. Then why is it that the second item of the platform of the Liberal Party of Canada was that it was going to defeat the goods and services tax?

The rules that I have always worked by in this House is that if you lose an election, you do not run the agenda of Parliament.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, anybody who goes back to the records of 1988 will also find that the same minister said at the time that any reform in the tax system would be revenue neutral. That is what the minister said then and that is not what the minister is doing right now.

My supplementary is for the Minister of State for Housing. Is the minister aware that many people in Canada today find the housing situation very difficult? We have a record number of homeless at the present time. We have many people who are going to sleep on the street in the cold. Many shelters for the homeless are already full.

What is the Minister of State for Housing planning to do in order to assist the homeless of Canada? Is he planning to do what the Minister of Finance is saying in terms of a solution to the recession that people should die first before they can go to heaven?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one point to the hon. member.

He cannot say it was not a part of our platform and then turn around and say we are not following one part of the part of our platform.

The point I would like to make to the hon. member is that there is a downturn in housing; that is very clear. But when you look at the housing record over the last four years from 1986 through 1989, we had levels of housing between 200,000 starts a year and 246,000 starts a year, which is a good deal higher than the normal sustainable level of housing starts, which is in the range of 175,000 to 185,000.

The condominium market in this province has been overbuilt in the last little while, so there is bound to be a reaction in the housing industry. That is the sort of reaction that we are going through right now. Because of the policies that we are following to get inflation down, to get interest rates down, we are going to see a recovery in the housing markets that will put us back on the track comparable to what we have seen in recent years.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Privatization.

Can the minister confirm that under Article 1602 of the free trade agreement, the cap in Bill C-84 on the percentage of Petro-Canada shares that can be sold to foreigners can never be lowered? That under the trade deal, that 25 per cent foreign ownership ceiling will in fact be a 25 per cent floor, leading irreversibly to greater foreign ownership of our national energy industry?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no.

Petro-Canada can be owned 100 per cent by Canadians if they buy the shares.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the question was not whether or not Canadians could own it. The question had to do with the cap contained in the bill which again, at 25 per cent, under the trade deal will be a floor not a ceiling. However, the last time the Tories tried to privatize Petro-Canada the minister said, on December 11, 1979, and I quote the minister:

> —only eligible Canadians—eligible Canadians—should be permitted to own shares in Petro-Canada, and only eligible Canadians—Canadians, I repeat—should be entitled to buy shares in the after-market. I have stated many times that the shares must go to and remain in Canadian hands.

When did the minister change his mind? When, like apparently the rest of the benches over there, did he become "a real live nephew of his Uncle Sam"?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if I heard the date right, but I think he said 1979. To my recollection, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will have to correct me if I am wrong, I was not in that cabinet.

THE SENATE

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Further to the letter I sent you this morning, I would like to know what you intend to do about my recommendations which are summarized as follows and are intended to put an end to the masquerade in the Senate:

1—that, as soon as possible, a Senate code of ethics be implemented that would oblige senators to disclose appointments to the boards of major corporations or banks;

2—under the authority of the House of Commons to appropriate funds, that the vote of $41 million, representing Senate salaries, be reduced to zero, so that taxpayers would no longer have to pay for all their nonsense;

3—that, under section 38 of the Canadian Constitution, you initiate a constitutional resolution that would completely abolish the Senate in its present form.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think we have three good ideas here.

In fact, I read the following in an article by Lysiane Gagnon in La Presse on October 11, and I quote:

> What do we do about the Senate? I have an idea. We don't have enough day-care centres— I think Senator Hébert and Senator Gigantès would be perfect as clowns and Senator MacEachen as a tap dancer. They already know their parts and only need some grease paint to look like they came straight from Le Cirque du Soleil.

However, the real question is how, at that critical moment last week, Senator MacEachen, who said he was a defender of low-income Canadians, happened to be in Brussels working for the Bank of Montreal, whose profits were $550 million in 1988.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister, since he is the leader of this government, would indicate what he intends to do about the problems the Senate is causing for Canadians at this very moment, problems that will probably cost the taxpayer considerable amounts of money if we do not put an end to this nonsense right away.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to consider the interesting suggestions made by the hon. member.

On October 9, Le Soleil reported, and I quote:

> "The Liberal Senators, led by Jacques Hébert, put on a vaudeville act last Thursday and Friday that made the last supporters of this institution hope it would be abolished outright".

The article referred to warriors in the Senate.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Lasagna!

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, Lasagna Hébert! Senator Hébert's brother asked him to stop his fooling around in the Senate, and on behalf of all parliamentarians, I would ask the Liberal Party to try to talk some sense into the Liberal senators!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on October 11 the premier of Saskatchewan claimed to have an agreement with the Minister of the Environment, reached on September 5, which watered down the whole environmental approach on the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

• (1500 )

I have a draft agreement in my hand that addresses these issues. It is a draft agreement between the Minister of the Environment and the Saskatchewan Water Corporation which says: "It is expressly agreed that the corporation may now proceed to acquire land and take steps necessary to proceed with construction of the Alameda dam, that the corporation may proceed to do all that is necessary"—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, I must ask the hon. member to put her question.

Mrs. Catterall: Has the minister seen such an agreement? Has he signed it? Has he discussed it in any way or agreed with it in any way?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to reiterate that this whole discussion is under debate today in the House.

I would like to say that I am under a court order at the moment to have a panel at work. I will comply with that order. I will meet my obligation to appoint a panel as soon as possible to resume the environmental assessment work that was stopped last week.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of Question Period wherein the Minister of State for Agriculture, inadvertently I am sure, led the House to believe erroneously that Dairy Farmers of Canada in November 1985 had agreed to the 5 per cent figure.

Dairy Farmers of Canada has just indicated to me over the phone that the—

FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO SENATE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for granting me leave to raise a question of privilege today. It is my contention that my privileges—and, by the same token, those of all members—were breached yesterday afternoon by certain members of the other place.

After question period yesterday afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I went over to give Senator Jacques Hébert a message from one of my constituents who happens to be his brother. Senator Eymard Corbin, who was with Senator Hébert, tried to stop me by resorting to intimidation and insulting remarks like—

Some hon. members: Warriors! Warriors!

Mr. Robitaille: Warriors indeed.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote him. He said: "You have no business—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but this is not a question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA PROJECT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. de Jong: That this House urge the Minister of the Environment to revoke the Rafferty-Alameda project licence and use all federal authority to prevent Saskatchewan from proceeding with project construction until an independent environmental assessment panel has completed its review.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the House recessed at 1 o'clock the Liberal Opposition had the floor. Since it had been agreed that the allotted time would be split in two the Official Opposition still has 10 minutes.

The hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou had the floor, but since he is not in the House now his allotted time as well as the time for questions and comments automatically expire. Therefore, as agreed by the House before recess, a second speaker on the opposition side may have the floor for 10 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am still waiting to use House time for my question of privilege about the hon. member for Kamloops. I see that the member is not present again today.

I have heard informally from some members of his party that he may be back by Thursday evening of this week. I wonder if the Speaker has confirmation as to when the member will be back in the House so that we might proceed with the point I raised last Friday.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Officially, the Chair does not know at this time when the Hon. Member for Kamloops will be back on the Hill.

The hon. member for Western Arctic has the floor.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in the debate about basically the environment but more specifically about Rafferty-Alameda, the Rafferty dam mystery as it has become known.

One of the most fundamental questions to be asked is: Why is the Rafferty dam project racing toward the finish line when the important decisions have yet to be made about whether it should be built at all?

Being environmentally friendly is everyone's buzz word—businesses, consumers, and government—but it is not saving our planet. The situation with Rafferty-Alameda is indicative of most other environmental problems today, that is that there is no leadership. Ottawa and the provinces never stop arguing over who is responsible for what, without any leadership on who will defend the planet and protect the environment.

Canadians have made it clear that they want this government to take action on our many environmental problems. Most environmental damage is irreversible and the accumulative effects are degrading the environment at an astounding rate. Canada must lead the world in practising environmentally responsible statescraft. This means defining and implementing a strict concept of sustainable development through securing global co-operation to eliminate critical problems immediately and fostering an environmentally conscious populace through public education and involvement.

The Liberal government established Environment Canada in 1971. Today that ministry alone does not go far enough toward addressing the alarming environmental issues facing the world: mass famines in Africa, the Chernobyl nuclear accident, the Exxon Valdez oil spill, the holes in the ozone layer, and the global warming which could cause droughts and floods like our country has never experienced.

Knowing all of this I have to ask: Where is the government? Where are the policies? Government has to integrate environmental input into decision making at the highest level. Environment must be a priority of every federal department. It must be the cornerstone of every department's work.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you as I suggested over a year ago that we have a commissioner, an auditor of the environment who is independent of the House. Those are suggestions that have come from the public, because the public feels the environment is one priority that cannot be compromised and muddled up in politics. It is beyond partisanship. The value of clean air and clean water and the environment is something that should not be compromised. Environmental considerations cannot be an add on or an after-thought. They must be made integral to economic policy making and planning and a required element of any economic development proposal.

One of the reasons I wanted to speak on this important issue is the effect of carelessness, as well as the lack of government commitment to the environment and the effect it may have on my riding in the Western Arctic.

I realize that the environment does not adhere to barriers or does not adhere to the walls that we think should be put up to isolate a problem in one area. That is not the way it works with pollution and with the environment.

The environmental problems facing the north, for instance, are extensive. The most serious include Arctic toxic pollution, ozone destruction, and the greenhouse effect. Acid rain is a bilateral problem that knows no borders, as I indicated. Acid rain potentially may affect all sectors of the environment including human health. The most persuasive evidence has been assembled for aquatic systems. It is well known that freshwater bodies begin to show biological damage at about a very moderate level of acidity. As well, discussion of long-range transport of air pollutants can no longer be restricted to oxides of sulphur and nitrogen. Hydrocarbons are interfacing with these new gases at low atmospheric levels, producing damaging ozone. Toxic pollutants such as pesticides, metals and PCBs are being emitted and volatilizing from aerial spraying and open bodies of water, to be deposited at great distances away. The ecological damage of acid rain is generally understood, but the associated human morbidity and potential long-term health effects are not.

Pollutants in the environment can wreak unforeseen results, among them a global warming trend that could push average temperatures higher than any in the experience of the human race. A nuclear winter caused by global war might mean the end of most life forms. These are sometimes viewed as radical ideas, but these are not viewed as radical by the scientific community that studies them everyday or by the people who have extreme concerns about the environment and feel that there should be no compromise.

Despite these problems we have the technologies, tools, and knowledge such as we have never had before to stop the self-destruction. We also need the sensitivity of politicians who really mean what they say and really believe, when they make legislation and commit legislation to the public and to this House that they mean to uphold it, that they do not make deals, and they do not have newspapers saying things that anger the public.

The Edmonton Journal quotes the minister as saying: "I always shake hands with the premiers when they come to see me. That does not mean I have agreed to everything they have put on the table but, in apparent contradiction to the general tone of his remarks, the hon. minister has also said he hopes the Rafferty-Alameda project will be completed. I still very much hope the project will go ahead but will go ahead under the conditions set forth by the court". The public is getting a very mixed message on this one.

I have another quote from The Globe and Mail of October 16 which reads: "The panel alleged that workers were already constructing channels with the Rafferty-Alameda in the river downstream from the dam, quite beyond the safety work agreed to and said it needed direction from the minister, the current environment minister. Premier Devine promptly said Saskatchewan would forge ahead with the construction and claimed he and Mr. de Cotret had made a special deal on September 5 to let the work go ahead. Mr. de Cotret denies there was such a deal. Yet nine months after the court's most recent ultimatum no full review has been completed, Saskatchewan is pressing ahead with the dam, and Mr. de Cotret is threatening to retaliate if it does so. Will Canadians need a political assessment to get to the bottom of this mess?"

There are many concerns about this. What this country needs is a government which will encompass environmental security as a cornerstone of all government policies, whether they be defence, foreign affairs, energy, fishing, or forestry. We need to push for acceleration of the ozone protocol, adoption of an international law of the air, measures to ensure rapid reduction in the $CO_2$ level, and the preservation of tropical rain forests. Taken together, these measures represent a comprehensive and coherent approach to our environment covering preventive, punitive and remedial action as well as both domestic and international aspects. They demonstrate the proactive Liberal approach to this crucial issue. They are based on the fundamental premise that pollution is everyone's problem. We must all work together to ensure a healthy and secure environment for future generations.

What is the problem? Why do we have an Opposition Day to debate the Rafferty-Alameda when we have environmental assessment legislation? Why do we have this debate? The government has to be accountable. The Prime Minister has failed to implement a strict, sustainable development regime. It has been severely compromised. That is what the brunt of this whole debate is about.

His ministers have not acted as trustees to the environment, but have instead been the providers of exceptions. The Rafferty-Alameda is an exception to regulations. James Bay is an exception. No environmental assessment is necessary until the people push it to the limit.

Oldman River dam is also an exception. No environmental management is necessary. At Barriere Lake, conservation plans can be ignored. It is obvious that this government has to change the way it approaches the environment.

There are a group of ministers who are obsessed with opinion polls, but despite numerous surveys including the poll released this week, they choose to ignore what the public wants the government to do, which is to clean up its act and to own up to the legislation that is put through this House for the good of the environment and for the good of the Canadian public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments, five minutes only.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is of a more general nature for the hon. member for Western Arctic.

I want to congratulate her on an excellent speech on environmental concerns. Like so many members on this side of the House, I know she has a genuine concern about the environment. We are very dismayed—I think that is the polite way of putting it—at the lack of action on the part of the government.

I have in my hand a federal agenda for the environment called "Green Print for Canada" prepared by the Green Print for Canada committee. I know the hon. member has seen this document. I believe it was distributed to all members of this House. I know the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, who has been a proponent of environmental improvement in Canada and who organized the World Conference on the Environment in Toronto a year ago last summer has certainly been a proponent of this document.

In her review of it and discussions with government officials, has she noticed that any of the proposals put forward in this document have been implemented by the government? Or has it ignored every single one of them?

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that I believe that this particular Green Plan is one that is refuted to belong to the Canadian public, because no one minister should take the ownership and possession of a piece of legislation that is intended for the good of all Canadians.

Having said that, this particular scheme was in the hands of the former Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean. I would like to say that there has been no implementation of the recommendations in that particular Green Plan. I think it is one that needs to be shared with the public, and it is one that is under much scrutiny by the public. Certainly it is one that the people in my area of the Western Arctic and the north are intrigued by.

We have the situation in the Northwest Territories that is very serious. In fact, we have been the recipients in a very remote area of PCB pollution. The contamination of our food chain was sure no deal. A study was done on the contamination of mother's milk, for instance, which showed that Inuit mother's breast milk was contaminated. This is a very serious issue for us.

Also, we are looking at the whole impact of what we want to be zero discharge from Alberta pulp mills into the Northwest Territories. The pollution is feeding into the Northwest Territories from Alberta. We await any kind of direct action on this particular Green Plan at this point.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, just a quick question for my hon. friend. When would my hon. friend find it acceptable for agriculture or farmers in southern Saskatchewan to have the proper kind of irrigation available so that they can grow crops necessary to feed the people of Canada. At what point in time would the hon. member accept a dam being built anywhere on any river, but particularly the one we are talking about?

• (1520)

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, there is only one answer to that. It is at a time at which a government that has committed itself to an environmental assessment review owns up to that legislation. That is the only time that a decision can be made as to whether or not a project can go ahead with regard to the proper environmental stewardship and all aspects of sustainable development.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Saskatchewan Power Corporation is proceeding full speed ahead with construction of the Rafferty-Alameda water storage project. This situation is not in compliance with the federal court order of December 28, 1989.

[Translation]

According to the guidelines governing to the federal environmental impact review process, the December 28, 1989 Court order requires one environmental review before the project can be completed. I wish therefore to list the options which the government considered in order to meet the challenge raised by the Saskatchewan government.

[English]

It may appear at first thought that the most direct and expedient means available to me as minister responsible for the International River Improvements Act is simply to revoke the licence that my predecessor granted for the Saskatchewan Power Corporation to construct the Rafferty-Alameda project under this act.

That is what the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle is suggesting as well.

Indeed, there is provision under the IRIA, section 13(1), for me to do so where a licensee has failed to comply with the terms and conditions of the licence. However, my officials have advised that the corporation is not in breach of any of the 22 conditions specified in the licence of 1989.

Moreover, since the act's regulations would give Saskatchewan months to comply with terms and conditions, any breach that occurred could not be corrected quickly. Given the pace of construction, the project would be finished before I would be able to revoke or suspend the licence. In other words, this option is not useful in the current circumstances.

The Government of Canada intends to proceed on this matter as follows. Mr. Speaker, I am under a court order to have a panel at work. I will comply with that order. I will meet my obligation to appoint a panel as soon as possible to resume the environmental assessment work that was stopped last week. At the same time, the government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the Alameda project not proceed until a full and proper environmental assessment can be completed.

Let me recall for the House the actions taken by my predecessor in response to the Federal Court order of December 1989 in this matter. As instructed by the court an environmental assessment panel for this project was appointed before January 30, 1990. At the same time an agreement was signed with the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. The terms of reference for the assessment panel and the agreement with the provincial corporation are consistent with reference to project construction.

Construction was to cease until the panel's recommendations had been received and I had the opportunity to amend the licence to take them into account. Only safety related construction on the Rafferty dam was permitted. This arrangement is demonstrated in the compensation clause whereby the Government of Canada offered financial assistance to the corporation to offset the expected cost of delaying the project. The Government of Canada has kept its end of the bargain in all respects. Saskatchewan has not. Therefore, as I stated in the House last Friday, I have instructed my officials that the October payment be suspended and that the November payments be frozen.

I visited the site in July and can assure the residents of this area of my sympathy for their efforts to come to grips with the vagaries of floods and droughts. The Rafferty and Alameda dams are needed by Canada to provide irrigation water for 4,800 hectares of farmland, for protection from flooding and for a resource of water to cool a large new terminal power plant which will be completed in 1991.

In order to equitably share the water in the Souris River between Saskatchewan, North Dakota and Manitoba, a water sharing formula was agreed on between Canada and the United States in 1959. Without these dams, Saskatchewan retains only about one-third of the water to which it is entitled. The rest of Saskatchewan's share passes into North Dakota.

We also know that, even though its water supply would be reduced if the Rafferty and Alameda project is completed, North Dakota is willing to fund over 40 per cent of the cost. The United States wants the dam so that several communities will be protected from severe flooding.

As time passes, more and more of us are becoming increasingly concerned about the environmental health of the world in which we live, and we are now taking action. We are voicing our opinion, joining environmental organizations. We are recycling our wastes. We are thinking carefully before we purchase or unwisely dispose of environmentally unfriendly products.

This is a good trend, indeed an essential trend, if we are to leave this planet in a satisfactory state for the generations yet to be born. In the process of protecting the environment, however, we do not want to bring all developments to an end, hence the need for effective, environmental assessment mechanisms at both the provincial and the federal levels.

The controversy surrounding the Rafferty-Alameda project reinforces the need for strong and explicit environmental legislation. The 1984 EARP order in council under which officials of Environment Canada have been struggling was only intended to be a guide for the preparation of assessments. As such, it contains clauses which are ambiguous, difficult to apply and for which the necessary supporting tools—by that, I mean documents, definitions and criteria—still need to be developed both by the departments and the agencies, as well as by FEARO.

Just as Canada was a leading nation in embracing an environmental assessment and review process, let us maintain that leadership role and demonstrate to the world that we are serious about the need to take action to clarify that process in order to ensure that we have a truly sustainable development in this country.

Once we pass the new environmental assessment and review process legislation, Bill C-78 now in second reading, we will have our own house in order and we will be in a stronger position to influence the adoption of similar mechanisms by other nations.

However divided public opinion may be on the Rafferty-Alameda issue, the last thing people on either side of the issue want is to see such a carefully negotiated and difficult compromise torn apart at this time. We have too large a stake in this process to see it abandoned.

Mr. Speaker, the rebuff by Saskatchewan is a serious blow to co-operation as I understand it, and as we practice it. I am deeply disappointed at the turn of events last week. Yet it also serves as a clear reminder of the fragility and unreliability of our present mechanisms for dealing with environmental assessment. On the issue at hand I have an obligation to proceed in a business-like manner to make Saskatchewan live up to our agreement of January, 1990.

Unlike the Rafferty Dam on which construction began in 1987, the Alameda Dam has never proceeded past the planning stage. It is my hope that the province of Saskatchewan will make clear its intention not to proceed with work at Alameda. Let me repeat, however, we will not hesitate to take the steps necessary and available to us to ensure that this project does not go forward until a full assessment is complete.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister once again, when the House was expecting very clear and forthright answers, we got nothing but slipping and sliding.

The minister says that he will take all necessary steps. What necessary steps will he take to stop the ongoing construction that is presently proceeding at a rapid rate. He says he is going to cancel some funding. That is not going to stop the project. He said he will not revoke the licence. Clearly, he has given up that very important tool.

Would the minister be good enough to share with the House, and all members on both sides who have a deep concern about the impact that this specific project has—especially in places like Manitoba, North Dakota and other parts of Saskatchewan—and, more importantly, what it does for the entire process of environmental review, what specific steps he intends to initiate to stop the construction of the project so that a review panel can do its work? As he is fully aware, his original review panel quit because they said there was no point in doing a review while the work was going ahead. Why appoint another panel when the work is proceeding? How is he going to stop the work?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I think I have been very straightforward and very clear on this issue. First, I will live with the court order that we got in December 1989. We will appoint a new panel because that court order was very specific. We are in discussion right now with Saskatchewan on an agreement that would lead them to stop construction. There are other steps available. What I explained a few minutes ago was very simple.

The question of simply revoking the licence is a non-starter for the very simple reason that the licence has not been breached in any way. What has been breached is the agreement that was signed between Canada and Saskatchewan in January of 1990. That was the document that was breached. There is recourse to that document if we want to pursue it. That is exactly what I am doing at the moment.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I share the sentiments of my colleagues from Manitoba in my bitter disappointment at the minister's lack of action.

The minister is going to implement or put up a new panel. We have had a panel resign because they could not do their work and maintain the integrity of the environmental review process due to the actions of the Government of Saskatchewan and the inaction of the federal government in stopping the action of the Saskatchewan government. Now the government is talking about a new agreement. It thought it had an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. That agreement grew out of a court order. The court order said lift the licence. The only reason it could maintain the licence was if it set up a proper environmental review process.

The government reached an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. The spirit was there and the spirit of a court order was there to have the environmental review, for the construction to stop, other than for safety few reasons, and to have the review panel report?

Saskatchewan totally ignored the process. There is no other alternative but to revoke the licence. The court order demands that the licence is revoked. The one condition the court allowed to maintain the licence has now been breached and is no longer is existence. Therefore, the court order says to revoke the licence. The minister is not in compliance with a court order. For days and weeks now, the minister and the government have not been in compliance with the court order. If I was the minister, I would be very worried about that.

My second point is regarding the minister talking about Bill C-78. I drew attention to this in my speech and I hope he heard it. If not, he should refer to Hansard. They are remarks by Mr. George Hill. He said: "The head of FEARO reports to Dr. Good. Dr. Good has flung his whip to include all the—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please!

Very briefly. Since several Hon. Members have asked the Chair for an opportunity to ask questions or make comments, I would appreciate it if the Hon. Member for Regina-Qu'Appelle could be very brief, please.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: I will, Mr. Speaker. Let me just conclude with this quote.

This is what Mr. George Hill stated about his relationship with Dr. Good of the environmental department. Speaking of Dr. Good, Mr. Hill claims that "he had assured me that he was in control and he would see they acted"—meaning the environmental review process—"expeditiously and reported in short order because, after all, this project had already been reviewed twice". In other words, Mr. George Hill was claiming that Dr. Good was in control of the review panel. If that is the case, surely it is time that the minister's Bill C-78 be amended so that the environmental review reports to Parliament and not to the department.

I would appreciate comments on both points I have made.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the point that in reading Bill C-78 carefully, one will see that under the new recommended process the group that would be designed to carry out environmental reviews would report directly to the minister. It would be much more of an arm's length relationship than the one we have right now.

I have said on a few occasions that I would be very happy to have any constructive suggestions on how to improve Bill C-78. We have to get Bill C-78 through the House. We have to have a piece of legislation that will replace a guidelines order that was never designed as legislation. It is very hard to interpret. It is very ambiguous and is leading us into situations that I think all members would deplore. I urge the hon. member to give me his comments on Bill C-78 and to move along with Bill C-78 as quickly as possible.

I take it we will be debating Bill C-78 tomorrow and I will obviously have more to say at that time. We certainly need that legislation in place. It is, at the moment, a good piece of legislation and it might be improved. We have to move along and get that piece of legislation before through the House, through the Senate, and given royal assent as soon as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Davenport. There is only one minute.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, because of time limitation, I have a very brief question.

Would the minister assure the House that, as far as he and his government are concerned, it is his interpretation that the guidelines resulting from the Order in Council of 1984 are mandatory? Those are the same guidelines that were used by the Canadian Wildlife Federation when it took the action in court which resulted with the stopping of the Rafferty-Alameda Dam construction. In his view, are the guidelines mandatory?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, what I can tell my hon. colleague is that I certainly believe that once we have a court order, a court order is a court order. I will certainly not recommend any position to my colleagues in government that will lead the government to be in contempt of court. The court order is very clear and what I have been saying for the last half hour is that we will live up to the court order. There is no question about that in my mind and no question among my colleagues.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, just a very brief question. The minister keeps saying the government will comply with the court order. What we want to know and what everyone wants to know is what the government intends to do about the fact that Saskatchewan is not complying with the court order. Surely, the federal government has a responsibility to make sure that, not only it complies, but the Saskatchewan government complies. What does the hon. minister intend to do about that?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I was very clear. I said that, first, the government would comply with a court order. I said that we would appoint a new panel. I said that I was freezing the payments, and I also said that the government will take the necessary steps to ensure that court order is respected.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question and comment period is now over. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East rises on a point of order.

[English]

Ms. Copps: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the minister involved told the House that he was going to come forth today with some specific action on this issue. What we have seen is a minister of the federal Crown acting merely as an apologist for Grant Devine.

• (1540)

I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to allow the minister in the federal government to tell us exactly what he intends to do to stop construction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I must regretfully interrupt the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, but Question Period is now over. You are starting up a debate and the time for questions is expired.

Ms. Copps: Pursuant to our Standing Order, I now seek the unanimous consent of the House to continue directing questions to a federal Crown minister concerning this major issue, because we would not want him to cling forever to the apron strings—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the question and comment period to be extended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but there is no unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Shame!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I call on all hon. members to please co-operate. There is no unanimous consent. Resuming debate.

[English]

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Will the hon. member need 10 minutes or 20 minutes?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Ten minutes. My colleague for Winnipeg North Centre will be following at that point.

First, let me say with deep regret that members of the Conservative side of the House did not allow us to proceed with proper questioning of the minister. This is an issue of vital importance to specific regions of the country, my own province of Manitoba, as well as Saskatchewan. We have international commitments with North Dakota. It is a matter of serious concern to all Canadians because of the implications it has for the credibility and legitimacy of the entire federal role in ensuring proper environmental treatment of major capital projects.

To be denied the opportunity in this House to engage the minister makes it clear that the minister has no answers. He has been promising since last Friday that the Government of Canada would take all measures necessary to stop the construction in Saskatchewan so a proper environmental review could go ahead.

The government is now saying that it will establish a new panel to undertake another review, but will take no action to stop the Government of Saskatchewan which, with total impunity, total arrogance and indifference, has said, "We don't care what the federal government is going to do. We are going to assert our own rights to go ahead with this project." The minister caved in. The minister backed off.

The minister and the government have failed a major test of asserting federal responsibility, federal obligation, and federal rights. The question we have to ask, Mr. Speaker, is why? Why, when there was such a clear-cut unmistakable, unequivocal test for the federal government, does it back off?

Ms. Copps: They cut a secret deal.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is clear. There is a lot behind the covers. There is a lot behind the smoke-screen that the minister has not said.

We have here, for example, an agreement that arrived on members' desks today which talks about an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen, in right of Canada, and the Saskatchewan Water Corporation. I would like to read to you, Mr. Speaker, if I might, section 3 which states:

> Notwithstanding the terms and conditions contained in paragraph 1 of the original agreement, it is expressly agreed that the corporation may now proceed to acquire land and take all steps necessary to proceed with the construction of the Alameda Dam.

Section 4 states:

> Notwithstanding the terms and conditions, it is expressly agreed that the corporation may now proceed to do all that is necessary to complete construction of the Rafferty Dam.

And so on.

What this agreement really says is that, when the minister shook hands with Grant Devine back there on September 5, they had a deal.

Ms. Copps: That's right.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): They had an agreement.

An hon. member: A secret deal.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is an agreement which he is now attempting to cover up. I say, Mr. Speaker—and I do not use these words lightly—the minister is covering up a private secret agreement with the government of Saskatchewan to go ahead with the dam. The proof of that action is the fact that he is unprepared and unwilling to take the proper and necessary actions to stop the construction. We have prima facie evidence that this agreement in fact has already been signed, sealed and delivered, and we have a minister who will not own up to it. It is not the first time. It is not that this comes by accident because what we had before was exactly the same kind of deal. We had a Minister of the Environment, who is late and not lamented in this House, who got up in the same way when questions were raised about Rafferty–Alameda and said: 'There is no deal. There is no agreement. I am proceeding as proper'' His own senior adviser on the environment, Miss Elizabeth May, had to resign her post to bring attention to the fact that there was a deal. The federal government had colluded with the premier of Saskatchewan to come up with a secret arrangement.

If lightning strikes once, it strikes the second time with this government. It is maddening and frustrating that on an issue that is so crucial to our constituents and to many other people in this country who believe that there has got to be a clear responsibility of the federal government to stand up against these big capital projects, the mega-projects that sort of ravage the environment, which have no test of sustainable development whatsoever, that the federal government, which is the last resort, when it meets the test, where do we find it? We find it signing secret deals, making secret accords to serve the political purposes.

We understand the political obligations of the Prime Minister and his cohorts and Mr. Devine. Mr. Devine has been his lap dog for the last two or three years: Meech Lake, GST and all the rest of it. But that is no reason why they should be so cavalier in their surrender of this very crucial issue.

I want to say this. There is clear action that this government could be taking. They do have instruments under the law. It is not sufficient to say: "Let's pass Bill C–78", because as I read Bill C–78, it will legitimize many of the actions that the minister is now taking to go ahead with these kinds of private agreements and not have the same requirement as the guidelines put forward. At least we now have a procedure that is out in the open and is more public, rather than the one that attempts to put it in the shadows.

This minister cannot get away with this bag of tricks. He will be exposed, as will his government, as being complete traitors to the cause of maintaining a proper environment. I want to say on behalf of thousands of farmers and townspeople in the Souris Valley of Manitoba, who have been seized of this issue for a matter of two or three years, who realize that they have had to rely upon these kinds of interjurisdictional controls, that this is a government that once again has failed them badly and miserably.

I challenge my colleagues from the province of Manitoba, especially my Conservative colleagues, the member from Brandon West and others, to get on their feet and denunciate this action by the minister today. He has had his chance. He has been able to dance, and bob, and weave, and slither and slide for the past 48 hours, but he can do it no longer. He has revealed himself today for the charlatan that he really is, that he has no intention of bringing an end to this project.

I believe that it is up to members of this House to start putting the pressure on and put some backbone back in this minister so he will start realizing that he is not simply there to be an apologist for a provincial government, but to stand up for the rights of all Canadians and particularly, to protect those who cannot protect themselves. There is more than the environment at stake. Once again we are putting the entire credibility and legitimacy of the political process at stake because people have looked toward this government to try to defend it, to try to act in its interest. What do we find? A government that is trying to chisel its way out.

Mr. Speaker, I want to turn over that debate to my colleague, the member for Davenport, to continue with this attack. We simply say that we cannot allow this action to continue. We cannot allow this minister to get away with the clear and unmistakable slipperiness that he tried to pass over on this House today. There are necessary steps. We call upon this government to take them.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre having to do with the Manitoba situation and the refusal of the Manitoba government, the current Progressive Conservative government of Manitoba, to really take any strong action with respect to Rafferty–Alameda, given all the things that have happened.

It does not seem to be willing to take the Saskatchewan government to court. It does not seem to be willing to take the federal government to court over the GST like so many of the other provinces.

We see now in the post election period that the theme which often punctuated the election campaign of not too many weeks ago, that a Tory is a Tory is a Tory, seems to be coming through in spades. The Manitoba Conservative government has gone back to sleep now that the election is over. Premier Devine is able to do what he wants with Rafferty-Alameda.

The federal government is able to do what it wants with the GST and nothing is to be done by the Manitoba government, surely, something that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would find as objectionable as I do.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I may just make a quick reply.

My wife has always reminded me never to say: "I told you so." I think in this case the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona, my colleague for Winnipeg North Centre and myself could say: "We told you so."

We said very clearly during the course of the debate in the Manitoba election that this was a campaign of false pretence and that the then leader of the Conservative Party in Manitoba was parading around Manitoba paddling his canoe on the pristine lake. Probably the Souris River was the site of the television take-out, with a borrowed canoe no less.

It is no wonder that I am sorry about the person who will not get the canoe back, because if he tries to go down the Souris in the year to come, it is probably going to be totally corroded by the kind of pollution that would be let loose.

All I can say is that the Government of Manitoba has become fellow travellers with the government here. It is trying to protect Grant Devine. I say it is a lost cause. Let him go. He is not worth this kind of complete and total abdication of responsibility.

Grant Devine, for all his friendship and association with Manitoba and federal Tories, is not worth taking the kind of action we see today, which is to betray a fundamental stewardship of this federal government.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I sat here listening to comments that were made about a subject that back home is portrayed as a matter which has good guys and bad guys in it.

For the life of me, I cannot understand how anybody in all good conscience can stand up and say that protecting run-off, preventing flooding conditions, is in anyone's harmful interests. I look at the Boundary Dam as an example that has existed for years on a tributary to the Souris River. I see absolutely no pollution coming from this tested project.

As a result of that, Mr. Speaker, when you combine all the good that is associated with this project, one is hard pressed to believe in fact that we could be actually standing and talking here about a semi-arid area of this country, Saskatchewan, and be concerned about the storage of water. I am concerned as anyone else is of all the environmental impact statements that have been done to date.

When you consider the opportunity given to us to be partially funded in a major sense by the United States to prevent flooding, to store water, to provide for a possible increase in water tables throughout the farms, how can anyone be against it?

I ask the hon. member who has given this dissertation today: Does he not really feel that there is more than just an average amount of politics in this problem presented before us today? Is there any reality to the concerns that storing water in Saskatchewan, which has been water starved for the past number of years, is in fact not the right way to go?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that there should be serious efforts made to deal with the basic problem of dryness on the Canadian prairies.

We could start by doing an awful lot more about conserving our soil problems, on which there is no action being taken. I remind him of this. He has been an active politician in the prairies for many years. I recall for him the Garrison diversion. I can recall going to Washington and having a congressman for North Dakota use exactly the same words about the Garrison diversion, that it is going to store water. It is going to give new irrigation run-offs. It is going to provide all these benefits.

The point is this: There is a trade-off between benefits and losses. We are trying to set in place in this country an honest, open system for making that assessment and trying to get governments and private industry to begin honouring that process.

When there are governments like the Government of Saskatchewan and now the federal government allowing that process to be distorted and perverted, it destroys the whole thing. What we are saying here is that the issue goes beyond Rafferty-Alameda. It goes to the fundamental heart of whether we, as a country, will be prepared to have closer, better and more careful stewardship of our environment. To do that we need proper procedures and we need to honour them. We cannot tolerate the breaking of that basic responsibility.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue in the same vein as the previous speaker, my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre, who brought to our attention just how frustrating it is to deal with the government on issues of the environment.

Like any other corrupt government it knows what to say, how to print green papers, how to position itself, and how to buy public relations firms. It does not know how to deliver on the environment. When push comes to shove, this is the best example we have had of a government that does not care about the environment.

I am sure my colleague from Winnipeg shares with me the frustration of having a minister available to talk with us, but when we ask for a little extra time to pose a few more important questions, his colleague from Saskatchewan said: "No more questions. We do not want debate". I think this House deserves to have this question not only talked about, but we deserve to have ministers of the Crown come here to speak directly. I am sure my colleagues know this.

It is interesting to note that not only is Grant Devine being protected through this scandalous behaviour, but when you look at the senators and one story about who was appointed to the Senate most recently, there was a Senator Eric Berntson. What was Eric's big contribution to Canadian politics?

Mr. Edwards: Ah, come on. Let's be fair.

Mr. Walker: Well, if there is a second one, perhaps, during your time, you can bring attention to his second accomplishment. His first accomplishment is the defence of this dam site. It shows to what extent the Conservatives of Saskatchewan will go to promote a project and to protect their colleagues.

There is more at stake than this. When we were in the middle of the Oka debate, sometimes the House isolates one debate from the other, the government hung its whole extreme argument around the rule of law. There is a second side to the rule of law. First, it has to be applied in every circumstance if it is a real application of law. Second, it is made to protect the citizen from government, not the other way around.

What do we have in this case? We have a government official, a premier of a province saying to us: "I don't care what you guys are saying, I am going ahead with it". We talk about the rule of law. Where is the application of the rule of law here? This is one of the most fundamental trespasses we can have against the environment, against federal-provincial agreements, against the law of the land, and the government is silent. No posturing, just get out of the way and let them do it. You would almost think there is a Saskatchewan election coming up within the next year, wouldn't you? I am sure many of my colleagues from the west share the frustration in dealing with the federal government.

The only thing we can be happy about in this sad story is that the protection of the western Canadian environment has finally become a national issue. After watching one Conservative government after another in the west avoid these issues, after watching this Conservative government since 1984, support these Conservative governments and ignore the environment, finally this little postage stamp of an area has become a national symbol on how we treat the environment.

As we watch this play, we can understand that every little corner of the country is important. It is not just the big cities. It is not just the big Hydro-Quebec projects we hear about. It is these little projects that make a difference in our country. You have to stand up for each one of these examples and say to people that this little corner is as important as this big piece of property over here. We have a total environment to protect, a total country at stake here. What this government fails to recognize is the importance of these small battles, or what start out as small battles, and which should not be a battle at all. It should just be accepted wisdom as how to proceed.

Lost in all of this, lost in the bickering back and forth in the House, is the plight of the people in that area. They had their expectations raised by a government that did not care about the environment, secretly supported by the federal government, which also has not shown much care to this whole thing. Between them, they set out a deal and told the people in the area of Estevan and surrounding communities that they would be helped out through this dam project.

The government did not talk about the protection of the environment. It did not talk about things we put at risk. It did not talk about the new rules in Canada. It did not approach the environment in the way that has been talked about elsewhere. It just talked about how they could swing this one through because no one would pay attention. There are jobs at stake. There are people who make technical investments. They make large investments in trucks and yet, the government will not tell the whole story. There is a lot of bitterness created in small communities across Canada when these environmental conflicts come up. It is our responsibility in the House to tell both sides of the story, to make sure people do not get hurt, and to help people understand that their environment is as important as other people's environment and that we have to work together.

It does not matter whether we are talking about a small farming community. I originally come from a small city, the city of Sudbury, and I know what it was like to have thousands of jobs put at stake by people saying: "Oh, if you don't do it this way, we are sorry about the environment but you know all your jobs are going to be lost."

We cannot hold people's careers, their individual families, and their investments hostage because they are afraid they will lose everything if a certain project does not go ahead. It is up to us to set the standard in the public sector so that we can protect the environment and protect communities at the same time. We cannot use scare techniques. We cannot try to hide our mistakes in a small corner of the country saying this is so small that no one else will notice. We have an obligation through federal regulations and federal legislation to make sure that every part of this country is protected at every point of the way.

I will end my remarks by reminding the House just how severe this travesty is. We have asked the government time and time again: "Are you sure you have a deal with the provincial Government of Saskatchewan that will hold? Are you sure that we can rest safely and that this environment will be protected?"

Each time one minister after another—and goodness knows there have been enough ministers of the environment trying to help them out over there— has said: "Don't worry, you people are just raising all sorts of fears", and we find out once again that our fears are minimal compared to the damage to be done to the environment.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege for me to speak on this subject that has had so much attention.

I represent the area in which the Rafferty–Alameda dam is located and have had the privilege of doing so for 11 years. I want to set the record straight for the people of Canada, and especially for opposition members in this House, about what we are dealing with. Unfortunately I see they are leaving, but I think we need to hear this in terms of sustainable development for our country and a set of guidelines that will lead us into the future.

The area that I serve and that the Rafferty–Alameda dam is in is a very dry area. I happened to be the chairman of the task force on drought during the most severe drought period that hit our country, with the exception of probably the 1930s. We are a semi-arid desert area in western Canada and particularly in southern Saskatchewan. If there is any place on earth that needs water, it is southern Saskatchewan. Our rainfall is approximately 12 inches a year and when we have drought years, 5 and 6 inches a year.

There is something very significant about what has happened in dams in Saskatchewan. First of all when the Gardner dam was built there were those who were against it. When the Diefenbaker dam was built there were those who were against it. Those dams turned out to be very profitable for Saskatchewan; just ask the people that live near them.

In terms of what has happened in the history of Rafferty–Alameda dam, Alvin Hamilton tells me that it has been studied since the early 1900s. This issue has been studied to death.

The hon. member from Winnipeg mentioned the Manitoba area. I want to suggest that when the Minister of the Environment came out to view the project—and I want to commend him for doing that— many towns, villages, and municipalities from Manitoba were represented. There was not a municipality, a town or a village in the area from Saskatchewan that was not represented. People on all sides of the political spectrum support the Rafferty-Alameda dam. The past MLA for the NDP supports it. The past MLA for the Liberals that represented the Estevan area support it. People from all parties support it. What is the problem here?

We need the water to cool Shand power station. We need the dam for flood protection in run-off years because the situation, when there is a heavy run-off, is that the water comes all at one time and then the river dries up completely.

There has been a lot of talk about the fish. We are certainly concerned about fish. My farm is six miles from the dam. There are very few years when one cannot walk across that river absolutely bone dry, and any fish that would happen to be in that river would die. One of the very difficult things that we have seen here in debate in committee, in this House, and across the country is that we have people talking about a subject and a situation about which they have absolutely no understanding.

I would like to emphasize for all Canadians, for the House of Commons, and for all those who will have a part in bringing about sound sustainable development to our country: don't take advantage of an area by commenting on situations of which you have no understanding just to make political points. It simply does not count. What really counts is the facts. If we are going to have good sustainable development for the future, let us put some guidelines in place such as the ones in Bill C-78 that will do just that.

What happened with the EARP guidelines? I want to make the following point: no one has said that Rafferty-Alameda is not environmentally sound. What we are arguing about here is the guidelines. The people in my area feel betrayed. We feel we have become guinea pigs for the rest of the country on the guidelines. Let us get down to earth and EARP the earth, if you will, and get on with the new guidelines as the minister is trying to do. Let us put into place a set of guidelines that is going to work for all Canadians and not penalize a few in one area, which happens at this time to be the Rafferty-Alameda project.

What is the history of the EARP guidelines? I understand that they were brought together in a hurry at the end of the administration of the Trudeau years, in the last two weeks. There are those who have admitted to writing them in a hurry to get something on the table for the then Prime Minister. These guidelines were ill conceived. They have not worked. Add to that the fact that we have grown 100 years in terms of environmentally sound thinking. The project that was in place is caught in the middle of it.

There was a time the provincial government put in place the guidelines and we moved by those guidelines and that was it; the federal government accepted it. Maybe that time is well passed and we need a new set of guidelines, but let's not penalize the Rafferty-Alameda dam just because there were a poor set of guidelines.

Again I want to emphasize that people have been talking about a project of which they know nothing. I hear the Manitoba people, people from the town of Melita who have come down to meetings in Estevan, supporting it in areas where they have had flooding. The people of Minot, where they have had their homes flooded out, have come down supporting it and saying that it is environmentally sound and that it is good for the area. What is the problem? Let's get on with it.

You might say the people of your area are against environmentally sound practices. There are very few meetings that I have not attended. Time after time I would hear our farmers say again and again: "Look it, we are environmentally conscious". They are probably more conscious than many other areas of the country.

One farmer from Oxbow said: "I knew exactly how many deer were in the valley. I know how many birds' nests there are. I see them". These, I should say, can be mitigated and will be mitigated with other areas around the dam that will allow nesting and so on. Nobody has argued with that. Again it is back to the guidelines.

Our people are environmentally conscious, and this is a project that is environmentally sound. I dare challenge the rest of the country. There might not be too many projects that are as environmentally sound as Rafferty-Alameda.

I do not want to throw stones at anybody in Ontario, eastern Canada or anywhere else, but there are some major environmental problems in Canada that are much more serious than anything that will ever happen at Rafferty-Alameda. This is in my opinion. In the opinion of those who have studied it and in the opinion of the judges we are not dealing with the environmental aspect; we are dealing with the guidelines. Let us get on with the guidelines, settle it and get it done.

What about the frustration of our people? One member of the opposition did mention the frustration. This has been a most frustrating thing for our people. It has been on again off again and there is the economic impact of that kind of situation. It is simply not fair.

What we are asking for in our area is fair treatment. We are asking the minister to proceed with Bill C–78 and put into place a new set guidelines that will do away with the past guidelines that were not working. Then it will be a new day for Rafferty–Alameda and a new day for sustainable development in Canada. We need it. Nobody will argue that. Nobody is arguing that we do not need some reasonable guidelines. We do need them.

I challenge this House and Canadian people. I want to say one more thing before I sit down which I emphasized. Don't pass judgment on a project that you do not know anything about if you want good, sound environmental guidelines. That goes for Conservatives, Liberals, New Democrats, all Canadians. We want to see a future for our children that will have sustainable development and a healthy environment to live in. We all want that. Somehow we have been painted in Rafferty–Alameda as being something else than environmentally sound in our thinking. That is not so.

I believe that we have piloted for the rest of Canada. May I say on behalf of my constituents that we have endured at times ridiculous assault on what has been said and done on this issue. I beg you in this House and I beg all parliamentarians to let some common sense prevail and let us do the right thing. With a new set of guidelines in Bill C–78 we should forge ahead for the betterment of not only Souris, Moose Mountain and Rafferty in southern Saskatchewan, an area that needs water, but for all Canadians.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the passion with which the hon. member speaks. He has spoken to me privately about this before and I know how he feels about it, but let me just take some of the things that he has said. In a way, he is reinforcing the view that we have been putting forward in the House today.

He says that no one should pass judgment on this project unless they know something about it. All we are saying is that we have a process for passing judgment on the project that is designed to bring in people who will treat the matter with some objectivity. That is the environmental review panel. It is this panel which has now resigned because the Saskatchewan government continues to build the project, in spite of the fact that the review is going on. It is one of the reasons given for the resignation of the panel. It is not the dam itself that many of us are against. You spoke about the larger picture and problems that exist elsewhere in eastern and central Canada. I agree. But what is at stake at Rafferty–Alameda is how we deal with environmental questions and what kind of precedents we set.

In terms of your own statement about who passes judgment on these projects, we are saying that you cannot have a process set up to pass judgment on a project and at the same time have the project going ahead. Your own minister has just appointed another panel or says he is going to appoint another panel. Why? To pass judgment on the project. So how can you possibly get up and defend the fact that the Saskatchewan government intends to continue building the project while that very judgment that you say you want passed is in the process of being developed. That is the question. It is a question of process not a question of whether that area needs water. We all know it needs water. It is not a question of whether you care for the environment. We know that you care for the environment. It is a question of due political process.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for that question and I would like to explain exactly what has happened in the process.

First of all this project has been studied many times, but let us just deal with the last study in which the committee was put in to review in early February I believe. It was five months before that committee got down there, at a cost of $450 per member of a five–man committee per day. I think, in terms of process and guidelines, there should be some time limits, some reason to these kinds of things, not just a direction to hold the project up.

These guidelines should be very carefully laid out. My understanding is that they are laid out in Bill C-78. That is exactly what I am speaking of.

I think you would agree with me, Sir, that we, as representatives, are to be custodians of the Treasury which the people of Canada put in our hands. They have told us: "Let us do it in a reasonable way and in a respectable direction".

In our area in five months we plant a crop, we see it grow, we harvest the crop, and in normal years we market a crop. It is pretty hard to explain to my farmers and the people in Saskatchewan that a review committee cannot get down to see the project in five months. It is very difficult.

Mr. Funk: It is your committee, Len.

Mr. Gustafson: It is very difficult, very difficult. The opposition is making accusations here. Let those accusations be made. I am not here today to make accusations. There have been enough accusations. There have been enough politics in this situation. I want to tell you that the local wildlife people support the project, and some of them quit their jobs with the wildlife organization because of this issue.

An hon. member: Not all of them.

Mr. Gustafson: Not all of them. I am not saying all of them, but those on the local scene did. This is the point that I make. Let there be a committee set up under guidelines that will review the process, but do not penalize an area because some cheap political group wants to take advantage of a project for its own benefit.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have an interest in this because my grandparents were married in Melita and travelled by cutter on December 4, 1894, to the Gainsborough area. They settled later in the Oxbow area, leaving behind I think close to a hundred descendants in that area now—most of whom I am sure vote for the hon. parliamentary secretary but, also, some of whom are New Democrats. I am sorry to say to the member for LaSalle—Émard I do not think there is a Liberal in that area at the moment, but when he comes to lead his party that may change a little bit.

What I have heard from them, including the New Democratic relatives, is that the farmers of the area, the townspeople of the area see the merit of this proposal and that there is strong local demand for the project to go ahead. I want to ask the hon. parliamentary secretary whether there is majority support for the project in his constituency and in the area affected?

Mr. Gustafson: Again, I would say that 95 per cent of the people support the project, regardless of the political implications. As I said earlier, the former MLA for the NDP supports it, the former MLA for the Liberal Party supports it. I do not know of a reeve of a municipality or a mayor of a town who does not support this project, irrespective of politics. This project is needed. It is environmentally sound and it has unanimous support in that area. There are a few who do not support it, sure, but they are very, very few.

Again, I appeal, let us do the right thing. Let us move along with Bill C-78, bring in a set of guidelines that are workable. I believe it is our minister's intention to try to do that and I compliment him for it.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we are talking here about the integrity of the process. If indeed the project is environmentally sound, as the member keeps alleging, why is the government not prepared to insist that there be a process in which the rest of the country can share the member's confidence?

What we are talking about here is whether the rest of the country will believe what the member seems to think is a matter of faith. It is quite conceivable that we could have a process that could determine that this project be stopped until such time as the panel reported, in which case the rest of the country could have the confidence that this member has. I can tell you right now, Mr. Speaker, that the rest of the country does not have that confidence.

Mr. Gustafson: One of the reasons the country does not have that confidence is because the opposition and people who do not know what they are talking about have been sending the wrong message.

Mr. Caccia: Explain why the panel resigned then.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the member's question, there is a special standing committee which I have been sitting on. The special committee has been hearing witnesses with regard to Bill C-78, which is in fact exactly what he says, the kind of guideline.

What I am saying simply is do not harness this project with the ill-fated guidelines that were brought in by his government in a hurry at the end of the last Liberal administration. They do not work. Let us be fair and move on, EARP the EARP as it were, bring in the reasonable guidelines which are in Bill C-78, which the minister is trying to do and proceed with the project.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Will the parliamentary secretary tell this House whether he fully supports his Minister of the Environment?

Mr. Gustafson: I was very pleased when at our request and the request of the premier of Saskatchewan, the Minister of the Environment, newly appointed to his position, came to Saskatchewan. We had been asking again and again for someone to come and look at the project, just come and look. He came and looked at the project and he heard from the people.

He has moved ahead on Bill C-78 to bring in those new guidelines. As far as I am concerned, the quicker the better. Let us get on with the project.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege and an honour to be involved in this debate today.

I think it is a very important debate. In many ways, it has been one of the most substantive debates that many of us have heard. I think the interchange is certainly up and sharp. It is incisive. Also, it has led to some new points of view being put on the table and argument being joined.

In responding to some of the things that the members of the government have said, I would like to say that the member from Souris—Moose Mountain is not what I would consider or describe as one of the political hoods who has been involved in this whole process.

I think he genuinely tries to represent his constituents in a straightforward kind of manner. He has certainly dealt with me and others among my colleagues in that kind of manner. We have talked about this.

Nevertheless, I think we do have a fundamental difference of opinion in this case. I realize the frustration of his constituents. That certainly is a dry part of the country, there is no question about it. This has been an on and off project, something that has been talked about. Now it is in a pretty active phase for some time.

It is hardly surprising there should be local support for an initiative that presumably would solve some long-standing problems and create some economic activity at a time when there is very little in our province. The rest of the economy is shot.

I think the hon. member should remember too that even in Saskatchewan we have had previous examples when what we assumed to be sound and long talked about projects were completed and they did not turn out to be quite the way we expected them to be.

Certainly the Diefenbaker dam, or the Gardiner dam at Diefenbaker Lake was long anticipated and carefully planned. Nevertheless, the full potential that people envisioned for that particular development has never even come close to being realized in terms of benefits to the agricultural community.

Furthermore, in my own constituency, we have the effects of what used to be popularly called the Squaw Rapids dam, now the E.B. Campbell dam close to Nipawin which it was never envisioned would have any extreme downstream effects.

Nevertheless, it has cleaned out the Cumberland delta, formerly one of the most productive fur and wildlife bearing areas in North America. In fact, it was the site of the first Hudson Bay post. There used to be about 10,000 muskrats trapped every year in that particular area. Now they are lucky if they can get 1,000.

These are the kind of effects that have flowed from previous efforts of dam building in the province. So we have to look at these things carefully. Even documents that are on the record say that if this project had been built in 1912, it would not have filled up until 1946.

There is some question about the environmental soundness, whether a dam of that volume and scale is the proper thing. As my colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle mentioned, there is some question about the wisdom of building another coal-fired plant at a time when we are supposed to be thinking about $CO_2$ emissions. We can buy power cheaper, for example, from other sources such as North Dakota and Manitoba.

There are some legitimate questions to be asked here. Certainly local benefits are legitimate, but so are some of these other questions. When challenged, the courts have found that some of these questions had not been properly addressed. That was the opinion of the court.

As a result of that, we had a process put in place whereby a review or process had to take place, or the licence should not be proceeded with. Clearly the action of the review panel in resigning makes it obvious to all of us. I do not think the hon. member is even arguing that what is happening is in contravention of what the court order said. Something has to happen.

I guess that is where I would like to turn briefly to the remarks of the minister, which had to be one of the most disappointing performances that I have heard. Certainly, he stood up and tried to address the issue. In the end, what did he really say? He said basically that, while the easiest way may be to lift the licence, he does not have the authority to do that because there is no breach of the 22 terms and conditions. That flies in the face of everything I have seen in those 22 terms and conditions. He said it would give Saskatchewan time to comply, but that it would take too long.

But then he said that since he has a court order, he is going to reappoint a panel. At one point he said that he would take the appropriate steps, and then the necessary steps to make sure that construction does not proceed. He said that very clearly. He was challenged numerous times. When we wanted to challenge him some more, some of the hon. members opposite, including three from Saskatchewan, spoke up. I believe it was the Minister of National Defence who said, no, questioning should not proceed. What are these necessary and appropriate steps? We do not know.

The minister says he is not going to lift the construction order and that he is not going to stop the project by that means, but he says that the government is going to take necessary or appropriate steps. Surely the hon. member's constituents must be wondering what is going to happen next. The minister's own government has put him in as bad a position as any opposition member could have possibly done.

Mr. Gardiner: With help like that from your friends.

Mr. Funk: Yes, with help like that from your friends, you really do not need any enemies.

I guess what really sticks in people's craw here—and I think the member knows it—is the whole political taint to this thing.

This is in the Premier of Saskatchewan's home constituency, after all. The gentleman is in deep political trouble, as everybody knows. The Alameda Dam is in the constituency of a new senator and that whole Senate appointment phenomenon is not only a legal cloud, but certainly a political cloud as well.

The president of SaskPower Corporation, who is also from that area, a former president of the Progressive Conservative Party of Saskatchewan, was quoted earlier in the House as having made a speech in which he said that the senior level bureaucrat in the Department of the Environment had assured him that everything was looked after essentially in terms of the environmental review process. It does not look very good I would like to say to the member for Souris—Moose Mountain.

It looks like we have had whole series of secret deals. First came the one that Elizabeth May unmasked. We have never really seen what is in that January, 1990 agreement. There was also the September 5 oral agreement.

I would like to read briefly from an article in The Globe and Mail which states:

> On Sept. 5, 1990, Mr. Devine and the current federal Environment Minister, Robert de Cotret, met in Ottawa. Mr. Devine said the pair orally agreed to alter the terms of the Jan. 26 deal: the project could go ahead and $10-million was to be set aside to alleviate any adverse environmental impact afterward. On Sept. 10, Saskatchewan sent the terms of the new agreement to Mr. de Cotret by facsimile machine, but it says it received no response.

I think that is a very crucial point here, because after that the environmental review panel quit and really threw light on this whole situation. It drew attention of the public, the media, and the House.

What we actually see here is that this deal still stands. It would have been much better if the minister had stood in the House and at least had the nerve to say: "Yes, I cut a deal with Grant Devine to save his political hide and we are going to keep fiddling around here till this thing is done and nobody can do anything about it." Instead, he got up and vague made threats about appropriate and necessary steps.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say it has been a pleasure to be involved in this debate. I hope the right thing is done in this case.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time alloted for questions and comments is limited to five minutes. Resuming debate.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in the opposition day debate today on a New Democrat motion moved by the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle. He has spoken in the House on numerous occasions during Question Period and in debate today. He has, as well, spoken about the impact of the lack of action by the Minister of the Environment as it relates to the Rafferty-Alameda Dam project. I also wish to refer to some of the comments from the member from Winnipeg who spoke so eloquently.

We are just asking for some simple yes or no answers, Mr. Speaker, which we have not been able to get from the government so far. Let us make no mistake as to what this debate is about. This is a debate about what kind of proper environmental assessment review process procedures we should have in the country. It is a debate about the failure of the 1984 guidelines that were developed by the then Liberal administration and the failure of the government and the members opposite to live up even to those guidelines. It is about the kind of projects like the dam project we are talking about today and others that I would like to comment on because they relate so directly to this debate on the proper assessment procedures we really should have in Canada.

I will get to that in a minute. It is important to understand that inviting some people down for coffee and doughnuts is no substitute for a proper environmental assessment review process. We have heard, during the debate today, about some of the deals and the handshakes made by the Minister of the Environment with the Premier of Saskatchewan on this particular project and the squirming that they have had to try to see that this project actually gets through, whatever kind of review process that we have.

I have two examples that I would like to cite to give some examples of the confusion that we have from the government opposite on two projects and, as well, to comment on where we should be going in regard to environmental assessment. After all, as one of the previous speakers said, any good, corporate citizen and any good level of government will be prepared to subject their projects to due process, an environmental assessment review process, with some time frame and guidelines built into it. Nobody is suggesting that something has to be dragged out forever.

What we are talking about is a fairer process, one that informs and advises all participants—proponents, local governments, Indian bands, trade union movements, and environmentalists—so that all have their opportunity to have their say. If we look at the record of people who are active now in the environmental movement and the trade union movement, when making submissions—dare I say even industry—everyone is coming to realize that nothing gets done these days unless proper assessment is followed.

Let us just talk about those two examples. The first one is one that has a little story to it and it points out the confusion there is in the ranks of the government.

On a trip back home to my riding some time ago, I was speaking at a forestry conference and someone asked a very good question of me. The question was: "Mr. Gardiner, since it is in the EARP guidelines that any federally-initiated activity should have an initial assessment done under the Environmental Assessment Review Process Guidelines, was that done with the forest agreements?" I have spoken in the House before about how, despite previous commitments from the government to sign those tree-planting agreements, we do not have them. But I thought, what an interesting question. Here is what is generally thought to be a positive move by government. When we finally get some tree-planting agreements, whether they are in the Green Plan or what have you, have they been determined by the government to be properly evaluated?

In the Committee on Forestry, when the Minister of Forestry appeared, he said, to the committee: "No, we have not done that, Mr. Chairman." So there was a bit of a gasp. Here is the federal Minister of Forestry admitting that he has not even followed his government's own guidelines. Then, one of his officials kindly interrupted and said: "Well, Mr. Minister, actually they have been evaluated. We do have some initial assessments done of the forest agreements." Of course, I used my opportunity jump in and say: "Well, that is good. Let's table them. Let us take a look at them." It should be good news. Generally speaking, tree-planting agreements are good news for all of our country.

It took a few letters from the Clerk to the minister and some officials to find out where these initial assessments are. The minister said that they did not exist, but then was told by his officials they did exist. It took a bit, but we finally got a letter. It was one of those "I regret" letters which advised me that no, this was not done after all. It was a case where the minister was right for all the wrong reasons. It shows just how much confusion there is in the government's own ranks in what could potentially be one of the most important departments in the country, the Department of Forestry.

I will move now to a question I had on a statement in the House today with regard to the Alcan Kemano Completion Project in northern British Columbia and the decision of the government on Friday to exempt that project from the environmental assessment process. It is incredible!

The Prime Minister, when he was Leader of the Opposition in 1984, made an unequivocal commitment that that project would be subject to some kind of environmental assessment through due public process, with public hearings and what have you. We have had a few coffee and doughnut sessions, but that is about it. We have at least one retired fisheries biologist and another expressing his concern and opposition at the time and he was familiar with others.

A retired official spoke at a meeting in Vanderhoof in my riding on May 26. I would like to put this on the record because it is an incredible allegation that I advised him was a serious one. I raised it in the House today and I have written to the Minister of Justice to ask for an investigation. This is with regard to a project which is massive in scope. It will reduce the flow of the Nechako River, a major tributary of the Fraser, in some cases by more than 50 per cent. It likely could impact the Fraser River by a reduction of as much as three feet in flows at certain times of the year. This is a massive project which Ministry of Environment officials from the province of British Columbia are now expressing their concerns about the settlement agreement, the federal-provincial Alcan Company agreement. Of course, the regional district is expressing its concerns.

I do not know how many of you have read The Omineca Express/Bugle of September 12 in which there is a report on the engineering study which lists a host of the other problems resulting directly from the settlement agreement, which the government insists does not have to be subject to an environmental assessment. This is it for those people who are concerned about this debate and this issue. This is what it takes, one page, one 8-1/2 by 11 sheet of paper to say that the environmental assessment and review process guideline order does not apply to the project known as the Kemano Completion Project. It goes on to mention a couple of dates, and what have you.

It is incredible because the allegations now being made by retired fisheries biologists leave me to believe that the same confusion in the Department of Forestry and the confusion we have over the Rafferty-Alameda, shows that the government is out of control when it comes to environmental assessment. I will read the quote, Mr. Speaker, and then just quickly wrap up. I am quoting from The Prince George Citizen of May 28:

> "I think this is a classic example of how to abandon a resource. It's a classic example of how to misuse scientists. And it's a classic example of getting public servants to put a good face on a bad decision,"—
> "This department may well be ready for an examination of the way it does business."

There is no better reason to have a full environmental assessment of that project than some of those quotes and comments from that former Fisheries and Oceans biologist who is expressing his concerns about how this is proceeding.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some comments about environmental assessment. I look forward to the debate on Bill C-78 and hope government members opposite are listening so that we can be assured we will get good assessment procedures in the country, not the environment circus we have now.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate.

It is an important one and one that has looked at the issue for some time. It is important to look at it from the standpoint of how we ended up in this situation.

The situation we find ourselves in today with the Rafferty-Alameda project is largely, I believe, a result of trying to apply retroactively a process that was designed as a planning process. It was attempted to be applied as a planning process but under ambiguous guidelines open, obviously, to a variety of interpretations. This is clearly an unacceptable situation for all concerned. There is no question, and we have seen this repeatedly in all of the polling and reaction of Canadians on every occasion, that Canadians want their environment protected. They need confidence that the government's policies and laws are clear, consistent and predictable. Steps have to be taken to clarify the confusion in which we find ourselves today.

We have already heard eloquent testimony in the House from my colleague and others about the significance of this project and of the commitment there is to maintain the integrity of the environment. We have to take steps to clarify the confusion in which we find ourselves. This government has already taken those steps and, at the same time, is advancing the whole field of environmental assessment world-wide. One must look at the context in which this particular issue is being dealt with. This is not a government that has avoided discussing or dealing with environmental matters. Consistently, through a series of ministers, it has taken the lead.

Environmental assessment as a planning tool has been practised by the Government of Canada since 1974. It has been used to predict the potential environmental effects of proposals requiring a federal government decision. This process was updated in 1977. Perhaps the most important thing for the purpose of this debate was the reinforcement of that in 1984 when the Environmental Assessment and Review Process guidelines were issued by Order in Council. I will not dwell at length on the timing of that.

Mr. Caccia: Good Liberal initiative.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): It was a Liberal initiative, and I am grateful to my colleague for reminding me of it.

These processes were never adequately implemented because a series of Liberal governments were not clearly aware of or perhaps, if I dare say so, fully committed to environmentally sensitive planning. There was certainly, and my colleague opposite will know, no substantive legislative framework for these guidelines. The process was never more than a cabinet directive until 1984, and not adequately funded by government and not consistently implemented by government departments.

Since 1984, it has been very difficult even for a government such as the one I support, dedicated to environmental values, to fully implement these hastily conceived, ambiguously-worded guidelines introduced as perhaps, one might say, almost as a deathbed repentance in the dying days of that particular government.

In fairness, perhaps the government of that day did believe, as did this government, that the Federal Court guidelines on the Rafferty-Alameda project, the EARP guidelines, were just that, a set of guidelines to be interpreted pragmatically and reasonably. As a consequence, variations in interpretation could be expected and tolerated.

I think it is a little bit much for anyone to believe that the Government of Saskatchewan would have entered into and commenced to the extent that it did, believing that it would ultimately be found to be in contravention of clearly-defined guidelines. That does not sound reasonable.

As a further consequence, it could be expected that given the nature of these guidelines, there will be differences in interpretation, as has happened in the Rafferty case. It was not anticipated, and I would be interested to know if my colleagues opposite would contradict this. It was not anticipated or expected that these differences would be interpreted with the force of law. Even before this became the problem it is today, this government that I support recognized the need to place its environmental assessment process on a strong, clear legislative footing.

In 1987, three years ago, the government asked the then Minister of the Environment to consult the public on the need for and manner of reforming the environmental assessment and review process. The minister issued a green paper to serve as a basis for that consultation. Six months of public meetings were held in major centres across Canada, followed by a national consultative workshop in March 1988.

Broad consultations were held with a wide spectrum of Canadians, including governments, the private sector, native peoples, environmental special interest groups, legal profession, and environmental assessment professionals. I think a very comprehensive approach was taken to ensure that there would be a clear, strong, legislative foundation. Participants in the consultations called for an accountable and administratively simple process based in law that is effective, efficient, fair, and open. I trust that all members in this House would agree with that.

The government has responded clearly and strongly to the needs of the country and of the Canadian people. The key elements of these reforms is in fact a proposed Canadian environmental assessment act, for the first time a comprehensive legislative commitment to good decision-making.

While the focus of our debate will be on the legislation, and I understand that will be continued tomorrow, I wish to point out to members that the government is going even further, not just providing that legislation to ensure this package fills the needs of Canadians today.

We are not stopping simply with the introduction of C-78. Beginning immediately the government is requiring that environmental factors be integrated into all government policy decisions. That I would say, Mr. Speaker, is an unprecedented step. I cannot overstate its importance to government decision-making.

Certainly this is a matter that my colleagues on the environment committee have considered very carefully, believing that it is a very important aspect of contemporary government responsibility and accountability. Government policies are often the determining factor regarding what economic development projects are conceived and implemented across Canada. If the policies are not environmentally sensitive, it is much more difficult to ensure the resulting projects will be, even with tough assessment legislation such as we are introducing.

Henceforth, therefore, Mr. Speaker, all decisions of cabinet will require the potential environmental effects to be assessed and considered. If the members opposite want to ask questions at the end, I would be happy to try and answer them if I could.

To help build public confidence that this is being done consistently and well, the responsible minister will be required to make a clear statement about the environmental effects of the policy initiative at the time it is announced. I want to stress again that the fundamental issue here is that we are dealing with a project after the fact and with a process that was flawed from the outset. If we do not acknowledge those two things, we are really not dealing with the essence of the issue.

Also, to help ensure consistency and to enable the public to see the rules under which government is functioning in this regard, the Minister of the Environment has been asked to develop a set of clear guidelines for use by all departments and the Privy Council Office has been asked to amend cabinet procedural manuals accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, I had the advantage briefly many years ago of sitting at that cabinet table and knowing of the kind of criteria that apply. It was certainly not the practice then and I am sure it was not the practice of the government that succeeded it, but now we are being advised that in fact these cabinet documents must require, must have, that kind of environmental assessment.

Further opportunity for public scrutiny can be reinforced by the House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment which I have the honour to chair, and which can then request any minister to appear before it to explain the environmental implications of any new policy or program. The government will certainly encourage and welcome this form of public accountability.

I think we must remember that it is not just enough to have guidelines. It is not even just enough to make sure they are clear, that they are public.

There must be a way in which the public itself can call to account policies, programs and those ministers who are responsible so that there can be an ongoing dialogue. Certainly, there is nothing static about this process of trying to have an environmentally sound approach. There is a great deal we have yet to develop and to learn in this process.

I believe the steps that are incorporated both in Bill C–78 and along with it are great steps forward, ones which are virtually unprecedented both in Canada and even outside our country. We do not hide the fact that neither we nor any other country in the world have all the techniques fully developed for environment, economy integration and policies. We are still at the early days in developing these approaches, but we are sincerely committed to doing as well as can be done and, in some cases, to taking the lead in the situation.

Leadership almost always requires breaking new ground and having the strength and resolve to do it. A second, vitally important element of this reform package is a consistent and predictable program of financial assistance to participants and public reviews that will be required under the process set out in Bill C–78 and, for that matter, any public reviews that may be undertaken under the present regime until Bill C–78 is able to be implemented. This is going to be introduced immediately the funds are approved by Treasury Board. We have learned over the years that whenever financial assistance is provided to review participants, the issues will certainly be more cogently debated and the results achieved much more satisfying to all concerned.

It is not just that we ensure that all necessary points of view are fairly represented in front of this environmental review process. It is that the best information becomes available. That point is sometimes missed. The funding is usually directed as a matter of priority to communities and individuals most directly affected by the proposed development.

This enables them to study and understand the issues thoroughly, and to prepare well considered submissions to the review panels. It minimizes antagonistic rhetoric, and encourages and promotes useful dialogue.

For each public review, the funds for this purpose will be allocated according to strict criteria and on the basis of applications submitted. Allocation decisions will be taken by special committees established for each review made up of credible individuals largely from outside government to ensure the independence of the process.

Again, this I would say is virtually unprecedented. The only government that I am aware of that has attempted this is The Netherlands. It is the only other country that we know of that has such a public review participant funding program. I think we should not lose site of the fact that once again we are attempting to break new ground in this very important area.

I hope that this will build partnerships among decision makers and those affected by these decisions. Mr. Speaker, as you can see, even though we know that Bill C–78 is a strong, comprehensive piece of environmental assessment legislation, we are not letting the matter rest there.

Just a few minutes ago, the minister indicated that he certainly welcomes any improvements to the present package of Bill C–78, which members will have a chance to address tomorrow.

The additional initiatives that I have added this afternoon clearly demonstrate to the Canadian people that this government is strongly and irrevocably committed to making all its decisions based on sound environmental criteria and to ensuring that the affected public has a fair, reasonable and open opportunity to ensure that the best decisions are taken.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with amazement to the hon. member's speech, speaking in such laudatory terms of a government that I know he supports, but he must do so with qualms and great nervousness on an issue such as this where the government has clearly failed in its obligations.

I listened in vain for words that might indicate his position and the position of the party of which he is a member, the Conservative Party, on the motion that is before the House.

I thought perhaps he was making a speech on Bill C–78. I know there is a rumour that it may be called by the government for discussion tomorrow. Whether it is or not today we are not discussing Bill C–78. We are discussing a very specific project and we are discussing in fact a very specific motion which states:

> That this House urge the Minister of the Environment to revoke the Rafferty–Alameda project licence and use all federal authority to prevent Saskatchewan from proceeding with project construction until an independent environmental assessment panel has completed its review.

• (1700)

I thought in a speech on a motion of this kind the hon. member, who after all is a Privy Councillor and very knowledgeable in these matters, might have told us what his position is in respect of the motion; but I did not hear him say that. I wonder if he would tell us whether or not he supports the motion and, if he does not support it, why he does not support it.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the member was not here earlier and did not hear the minister's speech. If that were the case, I suppose I could have taken my time simply to repeat what the minister has said. It seems to me he has upheld—

Mr. Milliken: Do you agree with the minister?

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): I do agree with the minister, yes. I would hope the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands also agrees with the minister. If he does not agree with the minister, I would like to know in what way.

It seems to me that we have two responsibilities with respect to the situation in Saskatchewan. One is to ensure that the environmental review process ordered by the courts is completed. That is exactly what the Minister of the Environment said he would do.

I do not know whether or not the member for Kingston and the Islands opposes that process, whether he wants the courts to reopen the question, or whether he does not want to proceed with the panel that the minister has proposed to appoint again. If he does not support that, then perhaps he should be responding and explaining to me what his alternative is.

I thought the minister made it very clear as to what he would do. I think that the member for Kingston and the Islands should perhaps explain why he would be opposed to the project if in fact the environmental panel completes its work and gives it a clean bill of health.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the hon. member's speech. He used, as is his right, the motion before the House today to talk more broadly about Bill C-78 and the environmental assessment review process. It is important because this Rafferty—Alameda situation is indicative of the problems and the flaws that have developed in the current process. It is that process and this motion, which is so well crafted by my colleague, that I think we are debating here today.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether or not he is going to be urging the Minister of the Environment to ask for a return of the federal funds, our tax dollars that have been allocated for this project, from Saskatchewan because it seems to have accepted that federal compensation under rather dubious circumstances. That is one question.

The second question refers to his assessment of Bill C-78 generally. The briefing notes for the legislation say one thing. It seems to be quite an attractive package, looking at the briefing notes, but on closer examination of the legislation it does seem that the government is saying one thing in the briefing notes and doing exactly the opposite in the legislation. I would ask for his comments on that.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, first of all on the member's question about the funding that has been provided to Saskatchewan, if she were to look at it for a moment, she would see that this whole process is so upside down that people trying to sort out what is the correct responsibility would have a great deal of difficulty. The fact that the project could have carried on to the point that it did before a court order suggested that because of the environmental concerns it should be put on hold. It seems to me that this in no way is going to contribute either to the elaboration or the enunciation of environmentally secure projects or build much public confidence.

I have not heard anyone on the other side of the House deal with the substance of the project itself. I have heard most people deal with it in the context of the various decisions that were taken.

I think it may be useful—and I know that one or two of my colleagues tried to do this—to look at the project from some kind of an objective basis. Whether or not funds were allocated in a way that was not responsible is not possible to tell at this point. We have to allow the environmental review process to complete itself before determining what further federal responsibility there will be in the situation.

Turning to the second question about the difference of interpretation of the material provided for Bill C-78, this is not terribly surprising because the legislation as the minister indicated this afternoon is still in the process of being more properly defined and determined. I would hope, if the debate is continued tomorrow and members have concerns about certain inadequacies or improvements that should take place in that legislation, they will be brought forth, debated, and determined here. We must not get ourselves back into the situation that resulted from hastily conceived and inadequately arrived guidelines in 1984, for which we are now paying a very large price. I cannot believe that was a happy result in the situation.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the member must know that with the court decisions, which I know he has studied as carefully as I have, the present environmental guidelines, whatever their inadequacies when they were first initiated, are stronger than the legislation now before the House.

I have a couple of things to which I would like the hon. member who is also the chairman of the Standing Committee on Environment to respond. Does he feel it is correct for the minister to make a statement that a project is necessary before an environmental assessment has been completed when the very question of necessity is the fundamental question of an environmental assessment, looking at alternatives and the necessity for the project?

Second, does he think it is proper that the minister obviously endorses mitigating measures that have gone ahead when the question of mitigating measures is a matter for a full environmental assessment review, not for predetermination?

Third, is he aware of and does he agree with the exemptions to Bill C-78? Does he really mean to pretend, in the face of court decisions that strengthen the guidelines order and their status, that Bill C-78 is an improvement with all its exemptions?

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep this very brief. There were a number of questions that my colleague opposite placed. I think the two questions which perhaps are the most important are the comment that she believes Bill C-78 is a weaker version than the guidelines. If that is the position that she has taken, it is certainly not the position I have seen from most of the people who have studied this legislation. Maybe she has another point of view and maybe it can be supported.

I watched very carefully when Bill C-78 was introduced. I had the feeling—and I think the colleague who spoke briefly before her would echo this in terms of her own interpretation—that Bill C-78 is a considerable advance and provides the kind of sound prior knowledge and process that will prevent the situation which we have witnessed here today from developing on another occasion.

This brings me to the final point I want to make in response to the member's question. I find it very strange that she would question the necessity of a project that clearly the people of Saskatchewan and the Government of Saskatchewan have spent many years designing, apart altogether from whether or not it will meet the final test of an environmental assessment. There is no doubt in my mind that the people of Saskatchewan and the Government of Saskatchewan believe that the project is extremely necessary. I hope she is not speaking for her party in saying that it is not.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, what this debate has revealed so far by the intervention of the parliamentary secretary this morning, by the minister and now by the member for Rosedale is a severe case of Tory myopia. I will explain. All three have referred to the guidelines that have been interpreted by the courts as being vague, as being confusing, and as being full of uncertainties in their significance.

The reason I am saying that this is a typical case of Tory myopia is that the courts found it possible to interpret these guidelines and to make them mandatory. If there is any uncertainty or ambiguity, it is in the Tory mind which does not seem to be able to accept the fact that the courts have made these guidelines, which they have been deprecating in the course of the debate today, mandatory.

It is this kind of political playing around that makes this debate fascinating in a way but also quite depressing. It allows the participation on the part of government members by the parliamentary secretary, the minister, and the member for Rosedale to create the impression that they are the victims of some kind of uncertainty created by guidelines which nevertheless the courts were able to interpret and make mandatory for the present government, so much so that on several occasions three ministers of the Crown chose to ignore them.

I will refer to the classical case last spring when here in the House on several occasions the Minister of Transport refused to take a position for his government on the Oldman River dam in Alberta. He was alleging some reasons of safety there. As well, some reasons of safety have been alleged in the case of the Rafferty–Alameda case. Is that not a strange coincidence?

Is it not a strange coincidence also that we have a Tory government in Ottawa hesitant to take action with regard to a Tory government in Alberta? Is it not a coincidence that you have a Tory government in Ottawa hesitant to take issue on environmental matters with a Tory government in Saskatchewan? Is that not strange? I find it very intriguing, to say the least.

I can only conclude that there was a lack of determination or spineless behaviour on the part of this government when it came to the crunch of these two major issues.

It is also interesting to note that this debate has failed so far to recognize, on the part of the government members when they participated in it, that nothing has been said about the resignation of the panel. This is what has precipitated this issue in the last 10 days and what has also precipitated the excellent motion put forward by the member from Saskatoon that we are debating today. The resignation of the panel is key to this issue at this point. It must be addressed because it reveals a profound sense of dissatisfaction on the part of the panel itself with the mandate that it had been given by the government.

Third, it is quite interesting to note last week that the premier of Saskatchewan was claiming publicly that the Minister of the Environment had given him the green light to proceed, forcing the Minister of the Environment here in Ottawa to contradict him. "Who is telling the truth" is a very intriguing question I would like to put to you, Mr. Speaker.

Fourth, there is the amazing remark last week by the Minister of the Environment who says all of a sudden, that he would like to leave it to the environmental groups to go through the courts and take the next necessary court action. Hiding behind the skirts of the NGOs, Mr. Speaker, here you have a minister who does not perceive that it would be his role. It is his role, and he leaves it to the NGOs to do it.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, other ministers of the Crown doing the same? Imagine, for instance, the minister for native and northern affairs, when something goes profoundly wrong in the mandate under his jurisdiction, saying: "I will not take action. Let the band council of northern British Columbia take the action in court on my behalf." It is pretty unusual to say the least, if not peculiar.

Then, Mr. Speaker, you have the fascinating notion that has emerged in this debate that Bill C–78 is the panacea of all troubles. I ask the parliamentary secretary who is patiently staying with us all day long whether he has read section 6 of the bill.

This bill, as we are gradually discovering in committee this week, is perforated with exceptions and is silent on the regulations. The notion was being created by the Minister of the Environment a couple of hours ago that we should support the speedy process of this bill. How would he dare say that when this bill has been sitting without any action since the latter part of June despite a commitment by the government to get it going throughout the summer, at least with interested parties away from the Hill?

We are behind schedule on this bill because of the inaction on the part of those responsible for it, and for no other reason. It seems as if this is a diverting tactic on the part of the Tories, namely, that what is happening with Rafferty–Alameda is due only to the fact that the guidelines are not clear and that once a bill is in place everything will be all right.

Mr. Speaker, that is a false notion, and I will explain to you why. It is based on the assumption that political will is going to be present once Bill C–78 is in place. The action of the government belies that assumption, and this leads me to the next point which has to do with the Point Aconi plant in Nova Scotia.

First, last spring there were the concerns expressed by the federal fishery officials there about the plant. Then the Minister of the Environment made his first public commitment in Halifax at the end of May and said that he will take action on it.

Then the matter was referred to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for public review and there was backtracking on the part of the Minister of the Environment on his original statement in Halifax. Finally, in the fall there is the announcement that Point Aconi will not have a significant impact on the environment, and the matter is shelved.

Mr. Speaker, let me take you with the time available to the Alcan smelter. We are informed by fiat from the government that there is no need for a public review of the expansion of the Alcan project. This is the word from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. No explanation is given. We were only told that the criteria are being met.

Some 10,000 and more people have threatened to go to court to block this project. How does this government intend to act in light of this particular situation? How does this government implement its own concepts that it is elaborating and that it is putting forward in this debate today when it comes to the reality of issues be they the Alcan smelter, the Point Aconi plant, the Rafferty–Alameda, the Oldman River dam and its elusive, ambiguous silence on James Bay 2. I would like an answer to those questions.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, there is little doubt that the political process in Canada has lost credibility. It has certainly lost credibility because of the actions of all of us in this House. It has lost credibility because there is a government in power which has clearly ignored the wishes of Canadians. It has lost credibility because the government in power has lost control of the public agenda.

As well, there is another reason for the state of the democratic institutions in our country, and it is that we now have in the nation a population which is so far ahead of the government in its understanding of the evolution of the world, society, and the problems that the world faces, as to make government largely irrelevant. No better example of this can be given than the debate that is being held today and the failure of the government in power to defend the integrity of the need and the integrity of the environmental protection process in the land.

This began some time ago. It began when the government engaged itself in a process of consultation, leading to the eventual publication in the next couple of months of the Green Plan, a process of consultation that was by and large a farce, a process of consultation which has largely been condemned.

Then we go on to the Point Aconi decision in which the Minister of the Environment allowed himself to be bamboozled by the Minister of Fisheries. We follow that with the failure of the Minister of the Environment to support the conclusions of the committee on the environment of this House, in calling for a reduction in $CO_2$ emissions. And then, we come to that which members opposite have quoted at much length today, and that is the new Environmental Assessment Act, Bill C–78, an act which is a clear weakening of the existing guidelines.

The hon. member opposite said that he wanted to get on with the bill. It is not the opposition that is preventing us getting on with discussion of the bill. There has been a multitude of occasions for committee hearings; we should be much further ahead than what we are. We are caught in the government's agenda. Indeed, those discussions would be further along than they are if this government had not lacked the political will and the understanding of the ecological disaster that looms before this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have Rafferty–Alameda. The government says that it cannot revoke the licence. The minister says that he has legal opinions which say that he cannot. Now it may occur rarely but there are occasions, and we all know it, when legal opinions are not so much a reflection of the law but they are a reflection of the will of the person who is asking for the opinion.

If this government is unable to come up with a clear legal opinion that says it cannot revoke the licence, I would suggest that it is because that suits the government's agenda and it is not a reflection of the state of the law.

Members opposite say that the dam is required, perhaps it is. On the other hand, if it is required, one must wonder why the initial environmental evaluation that was done in 1989 said that it was not. But the issue here is simply not whether the dam is required or not, it is the integrity of the process and that process has been called into jeopardy by this government.

There is another integrity that we must look at, and that is the integrity of this government versus small towns and municipalities across this country who cannot become hostage to the incompetence of a government which simply does not understand what happens when tremendous hopes and aspirations are placed in a project and then that project is halted because of the government's incompetence.

The Prime Minister is fond of quoting from journalists. Let me quote from one of the most respected journalists in this country, Dale Eisler of The Leader-Post of Regina:

> The federal government has bungled and abdicated its environmental responsibilities from the start. It has taken the intervention of environmental organizations like SCRAP and the Canadian Wildlife Federation to force Ottawa to fulfil its legal duties.
> For the Tories, (Rafferty) simply could not be allowed to fail.
> So by pushing it through now, Grant Devine can only hope to perhaps save some face.

Then he goes on to say:

> What he can't hope to do is prevent Rafferty from being a lasting symbol to incompetence by Ottawa—

That indeed is what we are dealing with here, incompetence which has really let the people of southern Saskatchewan down. It makes no sense for the members opposite to stand up here and say, "Let's talk about the project". If the project is in jeopardy, it is because the members opposite have allowed this process to fail. It has allowed this process not to be able to demonstrate that indeed the project ought to go ahead.

The member opposite said that no one has said that Rafferty is unsound. That is not the question. That may have been the question in the 1970s, but the question today is, is it needed and is it the only way. What surely we are going to learn as we wind our way through the debates on Bill C-78 is that what we must be looking at is not simply an existing project and asking whether that project satisfies certain criteria, but is there indeed a better way, is that the only way to proceed. Surely to heaven the environmental assessment process must begin much earlier in the process. Members opposite fail to understand that. That is one of the major failings of Bill C-78 and it is one of the major failings in this government's attitude toward the environment.

We have raised here in this House the whole issue of secret deals. I have known the Minister of the Environment a long time. I like him and I respect him. I believe that he is a man of his word. I believe that this matter of secret deals must be cleared up. Today my colleague, the member for Ottawa West presented the text of an agreement that was allegedly reached at the September 5 meeting. The minister did not deny the existence of that agreement. I think he must. Article 4 of the document states that it is expressly agreed that the corporation may now proceed to do all that is necessary to complete the construction of the Rafferty dam.

Article 5 states that the minister agrees to issue revised terms of reference for the Rafferty-Alameda dams for the Environmental Assessment Panel in order to give full force and effect to the provisions of this agreement and which terms of reference shall only provide for review of the operation after its completion.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Who signed this agreement?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member opposite asks who signed this agreement. I hope the agreement does not exist.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Is it signed?

Mr. Martin: I hope that the whole thing turns out to simply be a balloon. The point that I would raise, however, is that the alleged agreement does do one thing very clearly and that is, it confirms the essential thrust of Bill C-78 which is to say that you assess a project after it is finished and indeed, that monetary compensation may well be sufficient in order to make up environmental degradation. There is no amount of money that can make up for environmental degradation that is enshrined in Bill C-78 and it is not acceptable to this side of the House.

I bow to you, Mr. Speaker.

• (1730 )

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I hope you will not deduct it from the time of the members.

There have been discussions among the three parties and I believe you will find consent for the following action. The action concerns government Motion No. 16. First, by consent, the NDP will withdraw its subamendment to Motion No. 16. By consent, the Liberal party will withdraw its amendment to Motion No. 16, and, by consent, the government will withdraw government Motion No. 16, and substitute therefore the following new government motion:

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the sending of members, vessels and aircraft of the Canadian Forces to participate in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula, and in recognition of the seriousness of this matter, accept the undertaking of the Government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian Forces in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and
> That upon adoption of this Motion, the said Motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

I wish to indicate that that would be the business that would be called tomorrow, should we proceed with this consent.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like, as well, to speak to the point of order brought forward by the parliamentary secretary to confirm that we have had a series of discussions to find a way of having debate in Parliament on the Gulf crisis reflect a spirit of commitment and engagement by all Canadians.

We want to note that the new resolution put forward by the government does meet some of the concerns that were raised. I do want to acknowledge and make sure that Parliament understands as well that we expect the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be putting forward today or tomorrow further correspondence on this very important point, outlining different steps and commitment the government is prepared to make in dealing with the United Nations and dealing with Parliament. We think it is a very important step forward, and also indicate that this would establish a new plateau for debate, but would not necessarily negate any further potential amendments that would be offered in the same spirit in which these measures have been taken.

I would recommend to my colleagues that we accept the proposal by the parliamentary secretary. I think it would be an opportunity for us to begin a debate tomorrow with different terms of reference for this resolution. As a result, we could go forward and be able as a House to adapt our own debate to the very rapidly changing conditions in that very crucial area.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, just briefly, we too have been consulted on this question and we certainly agree to the terms of the motion proposed by the parliamentary secretary. I look forward to participating in the debate tomorrow and seeing this debate come back before the House on this very serious question.

I just wanted to underline the point made by the member for Winnipeg South Centre, as well, that it is certainly our understanding that this new motion would indeed be open to amendment as its predecessor was.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, yes, I can confirm that we do not have a problem if the Official Opposition and the NDP wish to move amendments and subamendments tomorrow through the normal procedures.

Also, I should signify that, to make sure it is procedurally correct, that the motion would be deemed moved by Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) and seconded by Mr. Andre, which is consistent with the mover and seconder of the previous Motion No. 16.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am amazed. We are being asked to agree to a series of motions in quick succession: first, withdrawal of the New Democratic Party's amendment, one which I would have supported; second, we are asked to give our unanimous consent for withdrawing the Liberal Party's, the Official Opposition's amendment, an amendment I would also have supported; third, we are being asked to withdraw the main motion, the government's motion, which I do not support.

We are being asked to do this, just like that, at the end of the day, as though it were routine, despite the fact that consultations were pretty rushed, and at a time when the House seems strangely empty—according to our custom I will not elaborate—and on a matter that is very important and in which members like myself have always had a keen interest.

I was discussing this question with my party's outstanding new critic, when all of a sudden, everything went into high gear and we were asked for unanimous consent. I realize some meaningful glances are being exchanged.

Since last week, I noticed some mysterious goings on. I did not know exactly what, but I did know something was happening. As a veteran parliamentarian, I have been around long enough to realize that this particular motion seemed to make a lot of people uncomfortable, that the government wanted a unanimous motion and that the Official Opposition obviously wanted a motion that would be acceptable to the vast majority of members in this House. And the NDP members, who are all smiles because a member of the Official Opposition rose in the House to say he was amazed—

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say once and for all that personally I am fed up—I hope this will come through in the translation—I am fed up with the lack of communication on such important matters. I say this to the members of your majority as well as to the members of my own party and other parties.

If only they would tell us: tomorrow, we intend to ask for the unanimous consent of the House. The NDP seems pleased at the thought of signs of division here and there. There is no division. This matter is far too important for that. But why can't they give us reasonable notice and say that tomorrow, they intend to present a motion? I am a reasonable man. I am a reasonable parliamentarian. Why don't they tell us: tomorrow, we would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House for withdrawing the NDP motion, the Official Opposition's motion and the government's motion—

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, —

Mr. Prud'homme: Just a minute! You started it. It's too bad, but you know very well this is not done. And you made the suggestion, not me! That is all I had to say.

I want my comments on the record to express my amazement at this procedure. It doesn't happen very often, Mr. Speaker, but it happens every time we discuss the Middle East. Now I am a reasonable man but I am nobody's fool, and if the government's motion was flawed to start with, that's just too bad! This is a very important matter, and we are being asked to give our consent because tomorrow— caucus should be very interesting tomorrow! Being a reasonable man, and since my esteemed colleague from Winnipeg is the party critic whom I respect for his intelligence and his brillant mind, I hope he will give us further explanations in caucus. Perhaps you could give us notice that tomorrow, you intend to seek the unanimous consent of the House for withdrawing the NDP, Liberal and government motions and presenting a new motion. That is asking a lot, but we will have time to think about it this evening. Come back tomorrow, and you will find me very reasonable. I don't feel very reasonable right now, however. I will listen if there are any further comments.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary rises on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, in light of the conversations I just heard, I will withdraw my request for consent until discussions have occurred with members of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I heard the hon. member say because of opposition from the opposition or a member of the Official Opposition. There are other members. I just noticed there is one here from the Bloc Quebecois. No one wants to call them the Bloc, but I do. The Bloc Quebecois is here. I just noticed he was on his feet. So, it may not be only me.

Do not always make it so personal, saying it is Prud'homme and disagreement because it is the Middle East. I am getting sick and tired of it. But if the hon. member pushes and makes me sick and tired, I assure him that there will be a lot of people who will be sick and tired. I assure him of that. We must debate that issue calmly, because it is a most important issue affecting the peace of the world.

I do not want it to come to this at this hour. Once I was asked for consent on another matter around this same hour and I thought I should have said what I am saying here today. But I want him to know—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but, the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis cannot continue. This is not a debate. I made allowances with case of the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis because he is the dean of the House. But a request for unanimous consent seemed to have been denied. The Parliamentary Secretary has withdrawn his motion. Therefore, we are returning to the order of the day, namely, the question and comment period.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: You may interrupt the debate, Mr. Speaker, but I am already on a point of order. It is quite simple. The Parliamentary Secretary has tried to develop a situation where, under a sort of conspiracy of silence, at about 5.45 p.m., he tries surreptitiously to sneak in a few "quickies". Like the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis, we are somewhat disgusted to see this kind of deals by people who claim to be speaking on behalf of others. Mr. Speaker, we hereby give you notice that we are sick and tired of him also.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am prepared to entertain other points of order, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that there is nothing to debate, the motion having been withdrawn for lack of unanimous consent. I will hear the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Transcona who rose on a point of order, but I do hope it is not the same.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, my point of order was simply that I thought the matter had been dealt with and we should return to the question and answer period, which would rightly have followed the speech by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Great! Therefore, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Environment has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member who has just spoken has a great desire to be precise and I appreciate the manner in which he has chosen his words. I would like to direct his attention to the question of a document which he cited which had been referred to earlier in the debate, and referred to as an alleged agreement.

There are times in my life when I am happy that I am not a lawyer. There are times in my life when I wish I had had an opportunity to study law. I would assume, as a layperson, that any reference to an alleged agreement would presumably be an agreement reached between two or more parties. I would want to ask very precisely whether this document, to which the hon. member and, I gather, other hon. members have referred, does in fact indicated that one or more parties had signed that agreement? Is this alleged agreement a signed agreement, or is it an unsigned alleged agreement? I think there is an important difference between the two.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to the hon. parliamentary secretary. The agreement that I saw was not signed. The issue is not whether or not it was signed. The issue is that the minister had an opportunity to deny the existence of the agreement. The second point is that the agreement does seem to enshrine a quite archaic view of environmental assessment, which view is also enshrined in Bill C-78. My point is that there is a coincidence of archaic assessment views. I would hope that the agreement is, in fact, not a real agreement. I would certainly appreciate the opportunity of hearing the minister deny its existence, but the agreement was not signed.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard to just elaborate for a few moments on this archaic principle that he refers to because of interest to me is the notion that environmental damage can somehow be compensated for in a financial way.

It seems to me that this is very much not Canadian perestroika or new thinking when it comes to the environment but is very much an old way of thinking that assumes that these kinds of things can be made up for in dollars. It is a bit like what we were doing 15 years ago and we still are, in some respects, asking aboriginal peoples to extinguish their land claims for money. We cannot not extinguish our claim to a healthy environment for money because, in the end, you cannot buy ozone. They are not making any more of them—like land, I suppose. You cannot buy a lot of these things. The very notion that this is somehow a matter of dollars and cents just shows how far back this government is when it comes to this kind of thinking.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has, very clearly, picked up on my point. What is occurring with the Rafferty dam appears to be a feeling by this government, and certainly by the Devine government, that it makes no difference what you do; build the darn thing and no matter what the damages are, you can always pay for it. In Bill C-78, clearly, when they talk about mitigation and they talk about minimal damages, they talk about compensation. In other words, they are enshrining in Bill C-78 that it does not make any difference what you do to the environment, but that it is possible to buy your way out of the damage. That is simply not acceptable in the 1990s, certainly not in a reawakened nation, the Canada of today.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to participate in this debate on the motion of the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle which reads:

> That this House urge the Minister of the Environment to revoke the Rafferty-Alameda project licence and use all federal authority to prevent Saskatchewan from proceeding with project construction until an independent environmental assessment panel has completed its review.

This incident last week, where the review panel resigned in outrage over the conduct of the provincial government, is just another case in point of the holes that are shot through the environmental assessment review process. This motion gives us an opportunity to talk about the flaws in that environmental assessment review process. As many members mentioned this afternoon, there is another bill before the House, Bill C-78, which gives us some hope that this will change. However, as I want to connect my comments later, I think that C-78 is once again another false hope for that process.

As I said at the beginning, Rafferty-Alameda and the events of last week when the panel resigned is just one more indication of an environmental assessment process that is flawed. It is stacked upon the same sort of process that has or has not taken place around Point Aconi on the Atlantic coast where a coal-fired, electric generation plant is going to go ahead without an environmental assessment process.

Another example of that is the whole Hibernia project. Once again, this is an enormous project with an enormous influx of our tax dollars and there is not an adequate environmental assessment review process. As many have pointed out this afternoon, this is just not acceptable. We, in our party, are very conscious of where tax dollars come from. They come from ordinary Canadians to a far greater degree than they should because the corporations are not paying their fair share. We want to protect those tax dollars. Those people have worked hard for their money. It should not be taken away to conduct or to fund projects that are not environmentally sustainable. All the projects that I have cited this afternoon, the Rafferty—Alameda, Point Aconi, the Hibernia, do not stand the test of sustainability. That is the test which any environmental assessment review process has to pass.

Not only is existing legislation which is supposed to be looking after that process inadequate, but Bill C-78 is also inadequate. It has lovely language in the briefing notes; wonderful things that are going to flow from this, that we are going to follow the Brundtland commission's report in looking for a sustainable future.

When you actually read the words of the proposed legislation, you see that this is not in fact the case. It just opens the door wider for the kind of abuses that have occurred in the past. This is just not acceptable. The Canadian taxpayers, the Canadian public, one and the same, are fed up with the kind of bureaucratic gobbledegook that has gone on, seeming to achieve something when in fact what they do is open the door wider for big business interests to conduct their business with impunity. This is not acceptable to the ordinary taxpayer, the one who is carrying far more of the burden than they should do in our country.

I also want to address my comments to the issue before us, the Rafferty—Alameda. We have an instance where the federal government has given over $8 million compensation for the so-called inconvenience of this project. What has happened with that money? What is going to happen with that money now that Premier Devine in his wisdom—and I say that with lots of sarcasm, Mr. Speaker—has decided to proceed?

The federal government has a responsibility to the taxpayers, not just in collecting the taxes, but making sure that that money is spent wisely. If that money has been taken on a supposed fraudulent basis, it should be taken back and made sure that it goes back into the government coffers. We hear lots of rhetoric on the other side of the House about the concern of the deficit. If the government is so concerned about the deficit, get that $8 million back. It would go some degree in being able to protect ordinary Canadian taxpayers from the abuses of government.

We have an environmental review process that is shot full of holes. We have a tax system that is biased against ordinary Canadian families. They are the ones who are having to pay for this process that is fundamentally flawed. We can do better. We can do a whole lot better. I know that in my party we intend to do better when we become government the next time around because this government is so—

Ms. Langan: Corrupt.

Ms. Hunter: I am not going to suggest the word that my colleague used—I am sure it has been picked up in Hansard—because I know it is unparliamentary. Their ideas are fatally flawed. They have no vision about the kind of direction we should be going on the environment.

When we talk about the test of sustainability, it is not out of any airy fairy idea that the economy is somehow divorced from the environment. No, Mr. Speaker. What we have to do is integrate the environment and the economy.

We know that people are hurting. We know that people in Saskatchewan want jobs. We understand that. But those jobs in Saskatchewan and those jobs in Hibernia cannot be given at any price, especially not the environmental price. It is not just this generation that pays the cost, it is future generations.

The federal government has a responsibility to provide leadership. That is what is lacking, federal government leadership on environmental assessment. We seem to be afraid of that. We seem to think that we are going to be putting more bureaucratic markers in the way of development. That is not the intention of real environmental assessment. It is to show the integration of the environment and the economy are not two, but one. We, the taxpayers of Canada, are the economy. Where and how we live is the environment.

I would like to conclude by saying that the motion before the House today on the Rafferty–Alameda project is just one example of the flawed process of environmental assessment. I know in the coming days we will have more opportunity to debate the Environmental Assessment Review Process. I caution this House that we no longer have the time or the resources to make a mess of this. We have a responsibility as federal politicians to create an Environmental Assessment Review Process that integrates the environment and the economy, that shows people that the projects that federal tax dollars provide are sustainable, both economically and environmentally.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is almost six o'clock but I have a brief comment.

The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands made a statement which I think deserves more comment but, unfortunately, we do not have enough time. She said that jobs should not come at any price. I think this is at the crux of the environmental debate.

Jobs have been used as an argument for the need for this project to continue, as well as water. Jobs are used in British Columbia to justify the logging of old forests and various other forests that environmentalists want to protect. The thing that comes to my mind on this is that in the end we have to come to a different way of regarding job creation in this country and, for that matter, in the world. Not everything that creates jobs is necessarily good.

If I could revert to my other vocation, the church, I recall that one of the complaints against St. Paul by the Romans was that he was putting the idol makers out of business. There was a great job creation industry in Rome making graven images. One of the complaints against St. Paul was that he was putting the makers of graven images out of business. The whole Christian church did not pack it up at that point and say: "Oh, well, we do not want to put these people out of work making graven images, so we will just bury the truth and we will not proceed any more with it." Instead they proceeded.

It is the same thing here. Many of the jobs which exist in our society today exist because of the worship of false gods, whether that be materialism or economic growth or whatever the case may be. We need to come to the point where we put the truth first and design jobs around the truth, rather than letting the existing jobs dictate what we preserve and what we do not.

Ms. Hunter: I think the brief intervention by my colleague from Winnipeg—Transcona this afternoon has demonstrated that there is a depth of knowledge within this caucus about the real priorities for the 1990s on environmental and economic issues.

The integration of the environment and the economy is doable. It is not only doable but it is a crisis situation. We have the vision in this caucus to be able to take it forth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), to inform the House that the proceedings on the motion have expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(7)(a), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed in today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): moved that Bill C-225, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act (staff of members of the House of Commons), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, prior to my comments on my private member's bill—and I should say at the outset that I do not plan to take up the full 20 minutes that have been allocated to me for debate—I think it would be useful for members on all sides of the House to understand a part of the history of this bill coming forward, which is in my name.

The bill was actually first introduced in 1984 by the then member of Parliament for Lachine, Rod Baker, who was also a parliamentary secretary at the time on the government side. The idea and the notion behind the bill came from a committee on which I had been asked to serve that was also made up of members from all sides of the House. It was a non-partisan committee, in the best sense of the word, and it had been lobbied extensively by members on all sides of the House to take a look at the problems that this bill is designed to address.

I rather suspect from those I have talked to that the bill will be adopted and referred to committee, as it was in 1984 when it received broad support from the House and would have gone to committee. I think some work has to be done on the bill. There are some flaws in it, and I recognize that, which can be corrected in committee. If that bill had been scrutinized by that committee and referred back to the House, the intent of this bill would now be legislation. Unfortunately an election in 1984 intervened in the passage and further consideration of the bill.

If the bill were implemented, it would simply accord the same privileges to staff of members of the House of Commons that are now granted to staff of cabinet ministers or the Leader of the Official Opposition. If a member is ever defeated, dies, or leaves office in whatever way, it would provide that an individual would worked in his or her office for a period of three years would receive consideration for priority employment in the Public Service of Canada. That is what the bill would do.

The bill would not give employees a right to enter the Public Service of Canada, but it would give them the opportunity to do so provided they met the standards and criteria the Public Service of Canada would require of any employee who applied for employment in that service. That is essentially what the bill would do.

I am told that the private members' committee that listened to the arguments in support of this bill was unanimous in its endorsation that it should receive full consideration in the House and I believe has made it a votable bill. In other words, if members of the House of Commons choose to do so, after three hours of debate I believe a vote could be conducted wherein all members of the House could participate in that vote on whether or not this private member's bill should be adopted by the whole House or referred to committee. That to me is a clear indication of the broad all-party support there is behind this notion of fairness.

Someone at that committee asked me for two or three reasons why I thought this bill should be adopted and why staff of the offices of members of Parliament is not granted the same rights as staff in minister's offices and in the office of the Leader of the Opposition.

The explanation for that is that when the amendments were made to the existing legislation a number of years ago, members of Parliament did not have their own staff. Members of Parliament at that time drew upon a common pool of employees that the House of Commons provided. Members did not have at that time the existing arrangement where we have our own staff assigned to us by the House of Commons or we have the right to hire staff in our own offices and at the constituency level. That simply did not exist at that time.

I am sure if it had existed at that time that we would not be faced with the problem that we have today. In other words, if members of Parliament had been given the right at that time to have their own staff, they would have been included in the amendments to the legislation at that time.

The number of people we are talking about here that could possibly be affected by this legislation I have determined to be in the area of between 35 and 50 people once in a four-year period. According to the information I have in each election there may be a turnover in members of Parliament of about 100. In other words, there may be 100 members who decide either not to seek re-election again or who may be defeated, and so we have a 100 or so new members of Parliament after each election.

According to information I have received from other sources, it is expected that most of those staff individuals would be employed by incoming members of Parliament, or they may choose for whatever reason not to stay on the Hill and seek employment elsewhere, and that by experience over the years there would probably be in the area of about 35 to 50 experienced people on the Hill who may not be able to find employment.

I say all this because I think we have to be realistic about what would be the impact of this private member's bill on the Public Service of Canada. Essentially what we are looking at is that the bill would probably affect between 30 to 50 people once every four years or so, following an election. The individuals could not just walk into the Public Service. They would need three years of service in the office of a member of Parliament. They would needs the skills and other requirements of the job to be considered for hiring into the Public Service. They would receive a priority consideration, however, and I think it would be of value to the Canadian Public Service to have people who have the degree of skill that is earned by working for members of Parliament. It would be of continuing value to the Public Service.

It should not by any measure be considered as another perk of one kind or another. They are skills that people have learned by working on the Hill that could continue to be utilized in the public good in Canada.

Therefore, as I said at the outset, I have no intention of speaking for 20 minutes. I think there is broad general support for this concept. I recognize that there are some weaknesses in the language in the original bill as it was drafted in 1984. I would be prepared to work with the committee to strengthen the language in the bill. I would hope that we could perhaps have some witnesses from the Public Service unions, even some members of the staff of members of the House of Commons, and any others who may be interested in having some input into making the bill say what it is we mean it to say.

I would simply say I would enjoy appearing before that committee to lend any assistance I could on what I would consider to be a truly non-partisan, non-private member's bill that you have before you today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the bill that has been introduced by the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine.

I like most members of the House will feel torn when I approach this bill because it affects all our staffs, the people we work with on a day-to-day basis. We know any time we see effective members that behind them is a group of very effective staff people who work closely with the members.

It not only affects those people who work for us, our staff, but in my opinion it would also have quite an effect on the Public Service, thee thousands of dedicated, intelligent, committed people who are looking for career paths in government in the Public Service. I would like today to argue and address what I consider to be some of their legitimate concerns.

Before I get into the full argument, the position that our staffs are put into is very similar to the position that we as politicians are in. Especially in this day and age this is not a secure job to have. We all know that the average length of time that a member of Parliament is here is less than six years. Some are here longer than that; of course many are less. This insecurity that is created for us as politicians unfortunately is shared by our staffs. They also are faced with this concern for where their futures lie.

Therefore there is a very real need. In many respects my admiration for the member in introducing the bill is that there is a legitimate concern by all of us members for those staff persons.

I would like to make a quick summary of the bill. I think the hon. member actually did summarize it. I would like to resummarize it to make sure that I have it clear in my mind and everyone else's the points we are addressing.

The bill proposes that any person who is employed in a member's office will be entitled to a Public Service appointment without competition if any one of three conditions is satisfied. The key point in my mind is without competition.

First, the person could have been a Public Service employee prior to being employed by the member. Second, he could have qualified for appointment to the Public Service while being employed in the member's office. Third, and in my opinion the most dangerous one, is a person who has been employed in a member's office for a period of three years. If that has happened, all they have to do is meet one of those qualifications and they have priority over the regular public servants for the position.

If we think of the stream of Public Service employees legitimately trying to pursue their aspirations, with this bill we are creating a back door, or perhaps a better analogy would be a revolving door where members of our staff, after completing three years' service can enter through the door and take priority over any of the public servants that apply for a job. This can be done without a competition. Granted, there are a few exceptions to that. It could be a person who has taken a leave of absence and upon returning has priority over the member's staff person or it could be somebody who has been bumped by that. Other than those minor exceptions, the staff member from the member's office who wants to get into the Public Service will take priority over all other public servants.

There is a test. They do have to qualify for the job. The hon. member has made that point and I would like to expand on it. There is a big difference between qualified for the job and the person who is the most qualified for the job.

I am sure there is some argument that will be brought out that this bill does not guarantee that the staff person will get the job, which is the point I address. They will not get the job unless they are qualified. I concede that that is a very legitimate and necessary step. I think you have to recognize that they automatically will receive priority over the existing civil service. To me, this just does not seem to meet a fairness test that I would apply as would most others.

It really bothers me that the fundamental principle of merit seems to be abandoned. It is no longer the best qualified candidate being considered for the position, not if it is one of our staff members. He has to be qualified and to have satisfied one of the three previous conditions.

I have met with many, many staff members since I have been on the Hill. I have gained quite an admiration for their ability and their competence. I seriously question whether we need to be concerned for their well-being. If they are competent, they should have no trouble competing in a legitimate competition. If they are the best person for the job then they will succeed.

In most cases, we have good people working on the staff of members on the Hill. The test has to be when they go for the job that they are the best qualified for that job.

We have the Public Service 2000 program. The Public Service is trying to create a more efficient and effective organization style. If it is to try to make more from less, if we are continually squeezing the dollars by which they operate, yet increase demands placed on them, if we ask more for less, then we have to honour some of their requirements. They need to feel they have our confidence and trust. They need to see that job development possibilities are there. They need to know that their successes will be duly rewarded. They have to know that the development steps that they require in their career paths are going to be open for them. In my opinion, this back door, this revolving door of Bill C-225 would go a long way to destroying any of the progress that we have made to date and will make on the Public Service 2000 process.

• (1820)

The hon. member in his speech mentioned the situation of after an election result where it is not inconceivable that there would be several hundred staff members in motion. God only knows we would love to be able to ensure that they all have work some place, but we have to consider the impact that these hundreds of people would have on the career civil servants. They have first priority for those jobs. They have first priority to their career paths and we have to ensure that they retain that priority.

We try to be more fair, more just, to our staff and in the process of that will become less fair and unjust to the civil service. I even question that the priority we would be giving them would even pass the test of our Charter of Rights.

There may be, as the hon. member has suggested, a number of faults with the current act. I maintain and will argue that the solution is not found in this bill. There is no question that we have an obligation to our staff, but by eliminating the fair and progressive job competitions we will have taken a step backwards. We have the key to the front door. Let us use it. We do not want our staff having to enter in through the back door.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am a little astounded to see this bill coming from the quarter it comes from. It just strikes me as somewhat elitist to be seeking special privileges for those who choose to work with members of Parliament. I am quite surprised to see that kind of bill coming from the New Democratic Party.

The bill proposes to amend section 39(4) of the Public Service Employment Act so that the staff of members of Parliament have a special priority to be appointed to the Public Service as the bill says, in priority to all other persons. If that is not elitism and preferential treatment, I do not know what is.

The argument that this privilege is currently enjoyed by the staff of ministers I do not believe justifies extending and multiplying by many times the number of people who would qualify over and above all other persons who might be eminently suitable for employment in the Public Service, to be appointed without competition, without being measured on their merit against anyone else who might be equally qualified for this job.

It says quite simply that there are three ways a person can qualify for this privilege. One, if they were an employee of the Public Service before coming to a member's office. Second, if they were qualified for appointment to the Public Service while serving in the member's office or, third, if they simply can endure and can manage to prevail in a member's office for three years. I want to stress again that they are then eligible for appointment to the Public Service on a priority basis in preference to all others and without competition.

We have a Pubic Service Commission that was established 80 years ago to ensure that the Public Service did not become the place of employment of those who had friends in office, but that it became a place of employment that impartially served all Canadians without deference to one political point of view or another, and without being beholden for the jobs that are held in the Public Service to any politician or to any position of privilege.

I am surprised for a second reason that this bill has been initiated by the NDP. It appears to enjoy the support of the NDP members who are in the House, as well as the member who is presenting it.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should listen to what I said.

This bill originated from an all-party committee, and originally from a Liberal member for whom I just substituted my name. I think if the hon. member is going to enter into this debate in a fair way, she has an obligation to tell the truth.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to apologize. If it is my duty to be at other places, and I am not here to listen to all the words of wisdom presented by my hon. colleague.

The fact is that the bill is here in the name of a NDP member, and I will address it on that basis.

I was surprised to hear my hon. colleague mention that he is introducing this bill without any consultation with the unions, that he hopes will take place subsequently.

The hon. member and his party's critic for the Public Service must be aware that in fact the major unions of the Public Service have taken a very strong position. They want to see the Public Service Employment Act amended not to further restrict free and open competition for positions but to make those very things subject to negotiation at the bargaining table.

That position was stated as recently as yesterday morning by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada at a press conference releasing its paper Dialogue with Parliament. What it wishes to do is recognize that the Public Service Employment Act is now much more restricted in the rights it accords to employees than other labour legislation, simply because they happen to be employees of the public of Canada.

It severely restricts its right to negotiate. What the unions are seeking to do now that the bargaining process in the Public Service has achieved some maturity after approximately 22 years is to make such things as hiring processes, promotion processes and firing processes subject to negotiation at the bargaining table.

I question whether the members of those unions would find this the kind of provision that they would wish to negotiate into their contracts. Also they wish to expand their right to appeal, to grieve and to set up a much more legitimate process when there are objections from employees or their unions to the way in which an appointment, a promotion, a dismissal or a transfer has been made.

The member should be aware that at the moment there is a significant problem of morale and stagnation within the Public Service. One of the reasons is that there is very little room for movement in the Public Service. There is an aging workforce. For people already within the Public Service to move on to new opportunities and new levels of responsibility is extremely difficult.

As a result, the Public Service is losing many bright and capable people to the private sector or to other career opportunities simply because they cannot be given the opportunity to have new responsibilities and new experiences within the Public Service.

Making another several hundred people on a regular basis qualified to be parachuted in over and above those people who are there now looking for opportunities does not seem to me a wise thing to do. Nor does this seem to be an opportune time to do it with those kinds of problems existing in the Public Service.

I do not think any of us can ignore concerns about patronage in the Public Service. The recently released reports of Public Service 2000 includes move by the government without discussion by Parliament. Their wish to make the appointment of people and the moving of people around in the Public Service more a matter of managerial discretion not open to appeal and not open to examination. This has already created some significant consternation in the Public Service about the possibility of people being moved, based on their personal relationship with their supervisor or manager rather than on their abilities and on their job interests.

Given the scepticism that exists now among the Public Service unions about the fact that all these changes are being imposed from on high by management without them being part of the process that comes to solutions as to how best to reform the Public Service, I think we need to be very cautious about adding to that scepticism and adding to that cynicism.

The fact that ministers' offices have this privilege right now, the fact that in recent revisions Treasury Board has doubled the number of people who can be appointed out of a minister's office and directly into the Public Service does not necessarily make an expansion of this a good idea.

There is a process for Public Service reform under way. I fully expect that the government, if it really wants it to succeed, will open up that process to consultation with the employees and their unions and that an idea like this is certainly something that could be considered in that process but should not be brought into this House without consultation with the unions and in isolation from all the other reform measures that are now under consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Matapédia—Matane.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, after listening with care to my colleagues, it is with mixed feelings that I take part in the debate on Bill C-225. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the priority access of our staff to Public Service positions. Like all members of this House, I am extremely grateful to the people who work for me and for my colleagues. It is perfectly legitimate to be concerned with issues such as our staff's job safety and opportunities for advancement. They deserve it. They are loyal collaborators who are familiar with the business of Parliament as well as with the various Departments and the machinery of government.

They devote a lot of time and energy to satisfy our needs. For the most part, they do not have a fixed schedule. They are available at any time of day, often very early in the morning and late at night, and even during the weekends. Not many peole are so fortunate, Mr. Speaker, as to have such dedicated collaborators.

I can say without exaggeration that we could not do all our work if it were not for them. They provide us with the help, information and professional services we need to fulfill our demanding tasks as parliamentarians and politicians. Without them, we must recognize it, Mr. Speaker, we would often be lost.

We all know that our staff is as loyal and dedicated as we are when it comes to serving our country.

The purpose of Bill C-225 we are dealing with today is to amend the Public Service Employment Act to provide equitable treatment to the staff of Members of the House of Commons by according them a priority consideration to be appointed without competition provided they had been Civil Service employees immediately before, or had qualified for appointment to the Public Service, or had been employed for at least three years in the office of a Member of the House of Commons.

Over the past few years, Mr. Speaker, in order to streamline its expenses, the Government laid off some 1 000 Public Service employees. Thanks to its Work Force Adjustment policy, the Government was able to re-hire a large number of employees declared redundant thanks to the co-operation of the unions and the efforts of the Public Service to minimize the impact of these cuts.

Merit has always been a cornerstone of all appointments to the Public Service. Over the years, however, the merit principle changed to take into account other criteria such as efficiency, equal employment opportunity, a sense of fairness and awareness within the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is essential to maintain a Public Service which is not only politically neutral, but which appears to be politically neutral to most Canadian men and women as well as civil servants generally, and not motivated by partisan or other types of political considerations. For nearly a century, I think we have managed to have a Public Service that is neutral and we must take all necessary steps to ensure that it remains neutral.

In my opinion, a Public Service which is politically neutral should be protected from any political interference. Such political scientists as Kenneth Kernaghan have identified the major characteristics of a classic model non partisan and neutral Public Service. In this context, this political scientist gave us the following theorical model: First of all, the policymaker and the policy should be distinct from the Civil Service. It is the responsibility of politicians and their associates to make political decisions and that of civil servants to implement them.

Second, the appointment and promotion of staff should be based on the merit principle and not on party affiliation or contribution.

Third, public service employees should not indulge in any partisan politics.

Fourth, public service employees should not reveal publically their personal opinion concerning the policies of the Government or its administration.

Fifth, public service employees should provide privately and confidentially politicians with objective advice.

Sixth, public service employees should loyally carry out the political decisions while respecting the philosophy and platform of the political party currently in power without consideration for their own personal opinions.

The practical limits of this theoretical model of a public administration have already been denounced and it appears certain that the reality of the Federal and Provincial Public Services falls short of this ideal. Proposals may therefore be formulated to better correspond to the contemporary reality. However, both in their original or amended forms, the major characteristics of this model are always present. At this time, three questions arise: What would be the impact of Bill C-225, if adopted, on the principles which I have just described? What would be its impact on the perception which Canadian men and women have of their Public Service? And finally, what would be the impact on the morale and promotion opportunities of present Public Service employees?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the need for Public Service neutrality and impartiality to be preserved in any decision we may take. It is necessary for the maintenance of a highly competent Canadian Public Service which is deservedly envied by several countries.

Mr. Speaker, within the context of Public Service 2000 and personal management review carried-out by the Public Service, I suggest that the amendment should be judged on its merits. The Public Service Employment Act is very important and embodies basic principles which should not be disregarded.

• (1840)

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe that the employee who has served faithfully and worked loyally for a Member of the House of Commons for at least three years should receive some priority consideration. I feel this would be a step in the right direction. I recognize, however, that some questions remain which deserve careful consideration.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, all members here readily appreciate the purpose of the bill and could support it. As indicated in the explanatory note, the purpose of the bill is as follows: "—to provide equitable treatment to the staff of members of the House of Commons (including the staff of the Speaker of the House of Commons) when their employment is lost—"

The bill would give members' staff the right to priority appointment to any public service job for which they are deemed to be qualified.

Mr. Speaker, it is passing strange that the New Democratic Party would sponsor this kind of legislative measure, for we all remember—and this was quite a recent occurrence—that the NDP is adamantly opposed to preferential treatment being given to members over any other citizen. So why would they now want our staff to be given preferential treatment? I find this quite contradictory, Mr. Speaker.

Anyone who is familiar with the 1990 labour market would know that nowhere can an employee expect foolproof job security. Still any fair-minded Canadian would readily agree that the staff of members should not work under conditions offering little or no chance of promotion. Mr. Speaker, we members of the House know the situation of our staff better than anybody else. We live with them all day long. We are quite aware of their long working hours because they are the same as ours, not to mention the stress they work under as well as the endless series of problems, questions and issues with which they must deal and be familiar.

More than anybody else we know just how unpredictable their workload can be from one day to the next. That does not prevent them from discharging their many responsibilities with outstanding dedication and loyalty. Indeed the public cannot possibly be aware of the support they bring to members and to the House, and their work does not get the recognition it deserves.

Given the importance of their contribution to the country, as much as other Canadians these people should be able to look forward to other employment once their term is complete. To me that seems only normal and fair.

But is that enough to claim that this legislative measure ought to be adopted as is? I for one must confess that Bill C-225 raises a number of serious questions. The first question I asked myself was this: Are the circumstances of our staff such that legislation of this kind is necessary? Second, even if that were the case, does this bill really provide a solution and is it an acceptable one? All members of this House are probably aware of the extraordinary implications of the bill before us today. The bill provides that irrespective of the merit, skills and experience of other persons, including public servants, that would qualify them for a given position, when it is established that a member of the staff of a member of the House of Commons has the minimum qualifications for the position in question, that employee, and I quote from the bill, . . .is entitled . . .to be appointed without competition . . .in priority to all other persons", subject to section 30 of the Public Service Employment Act, under which a public servant returning from leave of absence has priority.

I will get back later to this aspect of the bill, in other words, its content. The question I think we should answer first is this: do the economic circumstances of members' staff, when they leave their jobs, justify taking extraordinary measures? The explanatory note to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine does not indicate there has been any kind of study of the circumstances of our employees, that would justify the proposed measures.

I think we have a duty to all Canadians, and I to my constituents, to point out that this bill would give preferential treatment and, as a result, we would subsequently be accused of putting our own interests and those of our employees before those of our country.

My second concern is this: even if the facts about the present circumstances of our staff were to give cause for concern, is the solution proposed by Bill C–225 the appropriate one?

I think we should remember the two main objectives our Parliament had in mind in the last century when it passed the legislation that preceded the Public Service Employment Act, and I am referring to the Civil Service Act, which took away the ministers' authority to appoint public servants and gave it to an independent parliamentary commission, the Civil Service Commission.

Its initial purpose was to make sure that in the Public Service, both entry and advancement would depend on the merits of the candidates and on no other consideration. Its second purpose was to establish a clear separation between the executive power and the Civil Service on one hand, and the legislative power on the other. In fact, the separation of powers proved to be beneficial. Today, it is one of the advantages of our system of government. According to this principle, the role of the Public Service is to advise the government and carry out its decisions in a matter that is loyal, impartial and neutral.

Thus I would be afraid that the bill before us be seen by Canadians as mainly avoiding two important principles: the merit principle and the neutrality–objectivity principle.

Is it to say that there is no other means to improve our employees' career plan?

Bill C–225 would also entail serious practical problems.

As I indicated earlier, except for the civil servant on leave, that bill would give our employees the highest priority access to Public Service positions. That alone could create serious difficulties for the government as well as for the Public Service when attempting to resolve downsizing problems.

I want to emphasize the fact that, under paragraphs 4.1(a) and (b) of this bill, a person doesn't have to have been employed in the office of a member of Parliament for a minimum period of time to be entitled to a priority appointment.

Needless to say that, under this bill, the Public Service Commission would have to assess all employees of MP's applying for a job before considering public servants affected by personnel reductions or lay–offs. So, the efforts made by the government, by Treasury Board and by the Public Service Commission to implement the Work Force Adjustment policy would be a lot less effective than under the present system.

I will conclude by saying that my intention here is to underline certain serious questions relating to this bill. They are questions of principle, Mr. Speaker. They are so important that, in my view, it is imperative, in the interest of the Canadian public, of Parliament and of the Public Service, that we find answers before a legislative measure of that scope can be implemented.

[English]

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to add a few comments of my own to Bill C-225 but, before I do that, I would like to take advantage of the opportunity to congratulate you on your new position in the chair and commend you for the very competent manner in which you have started to assume your new duties.

The subject before us this afternoon, Bill C-225, is not new to most members of the House. In a very broad sense it reflects a concern for employees that every good employer should have. As employers, and each of us as members of Parliament is an employer, we employ capable staff. This may not be a concern that members of the opposition have, but as a member on the government side I often hesitate to brag about how good my staff is. There is always the danger over here that a cabinet minister will think that they are good enough and try to recruit them away from us.

Having said that, I feel I do have a very competent and a very capable staff. They are very well motivated. They often go far beyond what could normally be expected from an employee. They work long hours, often under trying conditions and under great pressure. I am assuming that several members of this House, if not all of them, could say much the same about their staff members. Most of the people employed in this House would be an asset to any employer. But, as mentioned by the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine, their employment is subject to the re-election of their employer and is often, therefore, very tenuous. Because most members of Parliament are concerned about their staff, this issue has been discussed and discussed many times in this House.

I understand an earlier bill was brought forward in 1984 and since then this has often been the centre of discussion by members informally and formally, on both sides of the House. As the hon. member for Beaches—Woodbine said, it is a non-partisan issue and for a very good reason. This bill deals with an issue with which all members are concerned, that of providing a degree of job security for the respective office staffs, knowing the uncertain climate in which these very capable individuals work. However, my concern with this bill is that in order to provide a degree of security for our staff members, we may well impose on the rights and employment of others.

Bill C-225 is an act which would amend the present Public Service Employment Act, the legislation under which most of Canada's federal public servants are hired. The Public Service Employment Act, which was promulgated in 1967, is one of several pieces of legislation designed to provide a framework for the management of human resources in the Public Service of Canada. This act has a long history, beginning in Canada in the early part of this century, with roots deeply embedded in the fine traditions of the British civil service and its long commitment to political neutrality.

The first act, governing appointments to the Public Service or, as it was then known, the Civil Service of Canada, came into being as a result of concerns for the competence of the civil service and the prevalence of political patronage in making appointments to the civil service. A succession of acts since that time have all reflected Parliament's commitment to the maintenance of a politically neutral Public Service.

One of the key elements of the current act is the establishment of the Public Service Commission of Canada, an organization which reports to Parliament and is responsible for all appointments to and from within the Public Service. It is the responsibility of this organization to ensure that people who are appointed to the Public Service are qualified.

The normal route into the Public Service is by competitive process and selection of the person or persons to be appointed is on the basis of merit. I cannot conceive how any logical person can debate the principle of hiring on the basis of merit. When we want someone to work for us, we want the best, and we will hire, on merit, the best person we can. The Public Service should do exactly the same.

Having said that, however, there are a number of exceptions allowed to the merit principle which are already embodied in the Public Service Employment Act. The Parliament of the day obviously felt that allowing exemptions to the merit principle would, in certain instances, be in the best interests of the Pubic Service and, indeed, of Canada as a whole. One example of an exemption or exception to the merit principle is what is known as the veterans' preference. Section 16(4) of the Employment Act empowers the Public Service Commission to confine its selection in certain cases to persons in receipt of a pension by reason of war service or persons who are veterans or widows of veterans. There are obviously some humanitarian considerations and bona fide occupational requirements involved.

In the case of open competitions, that is competitions open to the general public, the Employment Act also empowers the Public Service Commission to appoint Canadian citizens to the Public Service in priority over non-Canadians. I think that is an exception that most Canadians would agree with. Another common sense exception to the merit principle is contained in section 30 of the Employment Act. This section provides for the appointment of a public servant who is returning from leave of absence or whose job has been filled during his or her absence to be appointed to a position for which he or she is qualified in priority to all other persons. This is another exemption that I feel is easily defensible, one that most reasonable employers practice in any event.

I want to emphasize that I am a whole-hearted supporter of the merit principle in hiring and I am not supporting exemptions but to draw my argument to a logical conclusion, I am illustrating existing exemptions that are made and allowed to the merit principle.

Another example of a variation in the merit principle is in section 29 of the Employment Act which provides for the consideration of a person or persons who have ceased to be employed by reason of lay-off resulting from lack of work or discontinuance of a function to positions for which they are qualified. This provision has been of great value in recent years during the downsizing of the Public Service. The provision has been used as a basis for an agreement with the Public Service unions on a policy to address workforce adjustment situations. This policy now forms part of our collective agreements.

The final exception contained in the Employment Act from the requirement to appoint the best qualified persons to positions in the Public Service is contained in section 39. That is the section being proposed for amendment by Bill C-225. This amendment to the act calls for the provision of the same privileges regarding statutory priority entitlement that are currently given to the staffs of ministers to the Crown to be extended to the employees of all members of Parliament. This priority entitles the individual for a period of one year from the day his or her position terminated the right to be appointed without competition to a position in the federal Public Service for which in the opinion of the Public Service Commission the person is qualified.

As I stated earlier, the history of the neutrality is long and complex and should be a major concern to Parliament. The question of political neutrality and the appearance of political neutrality is of particular concern to ministers and they must be assured that the advice they receive is not motivated by partisan or other types of political considerations. They must also be assured that in the execution of their duties, officials are acting without political motives.

It is also extremely important that the public not feel that political alliances enter into or in any way affect their dealing with government departments. The public expects appointments to be made to and within the Public Service on no other basis other than one's ability to do the job. Any suggestion that one's political activities had any bearing on appointments to the Public Service will undermine public confidence in the Public Service.

Any good government will have concern with the concept of public interest. In order to deliver services directed toward the public good, governments need impartial employees, capable of offering objective advice. They must not fear that the advice offered by a public servant is slanted toward his or her political beliefs or designated to embarrass the government politically.

In addition to these concerns and considerations, Bill C-225 would further impede those public servants who are on a lay-off status or have been placed on a priority list from obtaining a new position at the same time. This bill would also reduce opportunities for those public servants who wish to compete for a particular position as a career move because there is an even greater likelihood that this position will be filled with a person from this expanded pool of priorities. This I believe would do little to improve morale—

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians benefit from developments in science and technology: living standards rise, industries become more competitive, agriculture becomes more efficient, and new career opportunities evolve for our youth.

This week is National Science and Technology Week. Educational institutions, laboratories and museums are opening their doors, inviting us to renew our curiosity and to increase our awareness of Canada's many proud accomplishments in science and technology.

On October 20 the chemistry department of the University of Alberta is opening its doors to the public, and everyone is invited for a tour of its facilities.

The future promises great opportunities for Canada and our youth as we open the doors to explore, develop and build on the paths that science and technology provide for us.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, Monday and yesterday in this House the Minister for International Trade stated that the Minister of Agriculture should be ashamed of the $8.8 billion given to Canadian farmers as subsidies. That $8.8 billion is a fictitious figure. It is about 40 per cent higher than the actual figure.

For example, papers filed in Geneva on October 1 show that Canadian dairy farmers received $2.2 billion in subsidies, when in fact the only cash subsidy given to dairy farmers is $261 million and that goes only to industrial milk producers.

The $2.2 billion is a concocted figure, most of it being the difference between what United States farmers get for milk versus Canadian farmers, and then calling it a subsidy. This game of smoke and mirrors ignores the fact that Canadian farm inputs are much higher than those in the United States.

I ask the minister of trade to stop this charade and stop playing games. He must be honest with Canadian farmers and support them or resign.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, automobile manufacturers have just announced that they will offer a discount equal to the difference between the 7 per cent GST and the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' tax.

The offer seems generous, at first, but it is misleading advertising.

Basically, these are just end-of-year discounts.

Even worse, the promised reduction does not cover the $800 per vehicle, on average, consumers are supposed to save with the GST.

In fact, this so-called GST discount is based on the manufacturer's suggested price. That price is often unknown, falsified or inflated.

I therefore urge the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to investigate this case of misleading advertising. I also want automobile manufacturers to appear before the House Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, and explain why they should not be charged for spreading misleading advertising.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the inflationary pressures we have experienced during the past four years made it necessary for the government to maintain a strict monetary policy with very high interest rates.

Although it was necessary to fight inflation for four years, it is nevertheless a fact that the present economic slowdown is proving very costly for people in the Eastern Townships, especially in my own riding, Richmond—Wolfe, and of course for the entire country.

According to statistics provided by Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, the number of bankruptcies has increased substantially in my region, in Saint-François.

For instance, the percentage in the business community is over 35.6 per cent and among private citizens over 14 per cent.

I hope that a carefully controlled reduction in interest rates will be feasible in the near future, which would, of course, produce immediate results. Lower interest rates would make it possible to start the recovery of businesses that are now stagnating. It would be an opportunity to consolidate existing businesses, and I am thinking of Bombardier in Valcourt, Camoplast and Fibres Donnite in Richmond and Shermag in Disraeli.

PERSONS AWARDS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, 61 years ago the much celebrated Persons case decision declared women to be persons.

In its decision the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council ruled that where section 24 of the British North America Act refers to people it should be interpreted to include women.

Although section 24 referred specifically to the make-up of the Senate, the impact of that decision reached far beyond that chamber.

The ruling was an important initial step toward the attainment of fundamental rights for women in this country.

Since that time, there has been much accomplished in the name of women's rights. These accomplishments were largely due to the vital work done by individual Canadians.

Yesterday awards were given out by the Governor General to just such individuals: people who have demonstrated a commitment to improving quality of life for women in Canada. These women deserve our recognition, admiration, and thanks for their efforts.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked to see an article in Maclean's October 15, 1990 issue make this statement about the newly appointed Senator Michael Forrestall: "As well as a Senate salary of $62,000 and perks of about $30,000"—wrong—"the new senator collects a parliamentary pension of $45,000"—wrong—"and a $65,000 salary as chairman of the Veteran's Appeal Board"—wrong.

I cannot believe that Maclean's would be so tardy. Why did it not check the facts? Why was it so eager to besmirch the reputation of Senator Forrestall and Parliament?

The facts are that an MP cannot draw a nickel of his or her pension while serving in the Senate. Second, Senator Forrestall resigned immediately from the Veterans Appeal Board upon being appointed to the Senate.

Shame on Maclean's. Where is the apology? Printing a letter from Senator Forrestall is not good enough.

THE SENATE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are becoming more and more horrified by the apparent transformation of Canadian democracy.

• (1410 )

In this seemingly new system it appears that a government of the day and its elected members have less of a role to play in determining government spending and policies.

What are the attributes of this new system? First, we have an opposition which forgets that it lost the last election. Next, there is a minority of appointed Liberal senators who want to set the agenda arbitrarily, who can pick and choose what bill should become law. Why not? They are accountable to no one.

Finally yesterday we have the Leader of the Opposition, who has not even been elected to the House of Commons, dictating when and if votes should be held in the other place.

Canadians are fed up with new system based on partisanship and opportunism. The time has come for responsible government to be restored.

Elections mean that governments have a right to govern. They do not mean a group of unelected individuals can set its own political and legislative agenda. The time has come to get on with it. Canadians deserve it.

NATIONAL STUDENT DAY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, today hundreds of thousands of Canadian students, many of whom are in the gallery, will be celebrating National Student Day. For many there is little reason to celebrate.

It is known that 30 per cent of Canada's students drop out of high school before graduation. The native communities have much higher percentages which go up to 90 per cent. Underfunding has reached crisis proportions in many post-secondary institutions.

For example, there will be 10 million fewer dollars transferred to provinces for education in less than a decade. Plant and equipment are deteriorating rapidly. There have been cuts in science and technology, and there have been reductions in the funds for research and development.

Student and tuition fees are going out of sight. In fact there has been a 3 per cent administrative fee put on the poor, those who need to borrow money to go to school.

S. O. 31

The Canadian Federation of Students today released a report entitled Strategy for Change. In its report it has identified the major problems: no vision, no plan, no strategy, no focus; the same problems as in the government's agenda for economic, social and environmental development. It is the same problem.

Education is an investment in the future of our country. Where is this government's political leadership?

THE SENATE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, never before in the history of Canada has the appointed Senate overstepped the bounds of tradition to defeat bills of such importance to the economic future of our country. Its actions should outrage everyone who believes in democracy and representative government.

Since 1984 this government has been committed to reducing the deficit and improving Canada's economic opportunities at home and abroad. In 1988 we reiterated that commitment.

Our efforts are hot having the desired effect because the Liberal dominated Senate is stalling the good work of this House by not passing our bills.

The unaccountable Trudeau Liberal senators seem to be afraid to pass the legislation of this House because they know that the effects of our legislation would prove to be so positive that they would work against the Liberals in the next federal election.

CO-OPERATIVES WEEK

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, this week is Co-Operatives Week in Canada, when we recognize the achievements of our 100 per cent Canadian owned democratic economic sector.

The history of co-ops proves that when we work together we as Canadians can achieve anything we want to. Why then has the government not put as much effort into supporting and promoting co-operatives in Canada as it has into helping big business?

Instead of providing increased support for the co-operative housing sector the government has reneged on its commitment to help build 5,000 units per year and threatens to destroy the concept by creating low income ghettos.

Instead of building on the brains and talents of local people by supporting worker co-operatives, the government shells out billions to large foreign corporations.

Instead of treating co-ops fairly, this government proposes to bring in GST legislation which will discriminate against co-ops and and will make them uncompetitive.

We need governments with the political will to support the co-operative sector actively, not act as guardians of the interests of the rich and powerful.

THE SENATE

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, for three weeks we have been treated to an incredible display in the Senate, thanks to the Liberal senators, with the blessing of Jean Chrétien. The Liberal senators' foolishness is already costing Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars in additional costs, this with the blessing of Senator MacEachen. MacEachen, Chrétien and Trudeau almost brought this country to the verge of bankruptcy in 1980-1982. And now they want to finish the job and bankrupt the country altogether.

Mr. Speaker, enough is enough! Canadians are sick and tired of this asinine behaviour. I want to ask the government and the Prime Minister to take whatever action is necessary to uphold democratic principles, stop this waste of public funds and make the Liberal senators stop their shameless behaviour.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, this week Amnesty International is celebrating its 29th year of campaigning on behalf of political prisoners with a Prisoner of Conscience Week.

Although organizations like Amnesty International are crucial in establishing world-wide values promoting basic human rights, it is the role of this government and others to challenge those countries which flagrantly and systematically violate the basic human rights of their citizens. We must be our brothers' and sisters' keepers.

The fight against human rights violations is led by many valiant individuals around the world who every day risk their lives. We should be proud today of the visit of such a distinguished individual, Nineth de Garcia, president of the Guatemalan non-government organization Group of Mutual Support, who will be meeting with an all-party delegation later today.

Mrs. de Garcia founded the GAM group after the disappearance of her own husband, to press for human rights in Guatemala and to support families searching for missing relatives. Mrs. de Garcia, like many other Guatemalans and Canadians, is asking the Canadian government to link bilateral aid to an improvement in human rights in her country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. On Monday the minister said: "It will not be good enough to do an environmental review after Rafferty-Alameda is completed. Construction must stop".

On Tuesday he reversed his position and said he would and could do nothing.

Mr. Speaker, the minister was right on Monday. He was wrong on Tuesday. The minister says he cannot act because Saskatchewan has not breached the original agreement. If violation of the review panel's terms of reference is not a breach of the original agreement then it is because the original agreement was a set-up. There is only one solution. Will this minister seek an immediate injunction to halt all further work on Rafferty until all questions about the government's ability to act have been determined?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat today what I said on Monday and Tuesday. I am under a court order to have a panel at work. I will comply with that order. I will meet my obligation to appoint a panel as soon as possible to resume the environmental assessment work that was stopped last week.

I said on both Monday and Tuesday that at the same time, the government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the Alameda project not proceed until a full and proper environmental assessment can be completed, according to the court order under which we are operating.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that it is very clear that for this minister the necessary steps are to see that project completed perhaps another minister will respond. My question is for the Minister of Transport.

The permit the minister refers to is under the International Rivers Improvement Act, but no permit has been issued under the Navigable Waters Protection Act which is required under the federal guidelines.

The Minister of the Environment refuses to act, refuses to take his responsibility. Will the Minister of Transport obtain an injunction to see that construction stops until he issues the requisite permit. Also, will he undertake today in this House not to issue that permit until the work of an environmental panel has been completed?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a number of options are being looked at very carefully. I will name a few of those options.

There is the possibility of a court action to seek an injunction as my hon. colleague is saying. There is the possibility to act under two statutes under the Fisheries Act. There is also the possibility of having an agreement to have work halted on the project. All three are options that we are pursuing very actively right now.

• (1420 )

I am sure my hon. colleague will agree with me that our purpose in this House is to make sure that we do have a full environmental assessment of this project before any work can be done and that should mitigation be required, that those measures be clearly outlined so that we can deal fairly and equitably with the environmental concerns that many citizens have expressed. That is exactly what we are doing at the moment.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this government defines mitigation as cash compensation after the damage has been done. That is not good enough.

[Translation]

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. National unity means sharing common values. We believe in protecting the environment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment flip–flops. The Minister of Transport refuses to act. There are allegations of an agreement between Tories. On Point Aconi, the minister has failed. On Alcan, the minister has failed. $CO^2$ pollution, the minister has failed. Bill C–78, the minister has failed—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will please put the question.

Mr. Martin: You have got to admit, Mr. Speaker, I am learning.

Mr. Speaker: Not everybody would agree with you.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, my question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this. Why is this government sitting idle while this nation's reputation for environmental protection is being torn to shreds? Will he ask the minister to proceed?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when we talk about our environmental reputation, I must tell my hon. colleague across the way that we have one of the very finest environmental reputations in the world.

We introduced Bill C–78. It is a bill that goes further than most bills anywhere else in the world. The Dutch have said publicly that we have a bill that could be a model for the industrialized countries of this world. We have moved on acid rain. We were the first government to be able to conclude an agreement with the U.S. on acid rain. We are finally developing the Green Plan. The Green Plan will be a model for most countries who are trying to achieve what we hope to achieve for the environment.

The hon. member should be cheering the environment, not saying that we are not doing what we should be doing as a country.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Rafferty–Alameda is the acid test.

I have in my hands a draft agreement between the Minister of the Environment and the Saskatchewan Water Corporation which says that the minister will agree that the Rafferty dam can proceed to completion and that the Alameda dam can start construction.

Is this the deal on which the minister shook hands in his office on September 5 with Grant Devine? Is this the agreement that was faxed to his office on September 10? Is this the agreement that sold the environment down the river?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The Saskatoon Star–Phoenix quotes George Hill, president of the Souris Basin Development Authority and past president of the Tory party in Saskatchewan as saying:

> I'm prepared to put it in affidavit form, I'm prepared to appear in court and swear on as many bibles as anyone wants to produce that that was the agreement and Mr. de Cotret asked the Premier to shake hands on the agreement.

My question is this. Who is telling the truth? Who is prepared to table the documents that will prove who is telling the truth?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be a little unbelievable that Mr. Hill made that comment because he was not involved in the discussion I had. He was not involved. He was not there.

We did discuss a number of issues—

Mr. Boudria: Tories never cease to amaze me.

Mr. Nunziata: Robert, you've lost it, you've lost it.

An hon. member: You would think we were in the Senate.

Mr. Crawford: You'll wish you were.

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. members that if we lose time waiting for order, they lose time.

Mr. de Cotret: I would just like to tell my hon. colleagues that I went to Saskatchewan on July 25 to meet with stakeholders, to meet with the proponent of the project, to meet with citizens, and to meet with the government. We have had ongoing meetings and ongoing conversations since that time.

There was no secret deal made. We always tried to reach agreement. Those conversations were ongoing until the panel resigned. And that, Mr. Speaker, is the truth of the matter. We have had a number of conversations on a number of occasions, either in person or over the phone. Unfortunately, the panel did resign. We are taking the measures that are required to ensure that we abide by a court order and ensure that the environmental assessment process is conducted properly.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns the Rafferty–Alameda dam. This is a test for the minister. Now is the time for the minister to show Canadians that he is really serious and that his government is really serious about the environment. We are discussing a situation about an environment review panel. I quote briefly from a letter dated October 4 to the minister from the environment review panel, which has resigned, and refers to the agreement between Canada and Saskatchewan. It says:

> While the agreement may be ambiguous regarding some aspects of the Project, it clearly states that no work on the Rafferty-Boundary Diversion Channel or on the Alameda Dam and Reservoir—will begin, and that construction on the Rafferty Dam—

—will only continue after safety is ensured and the panel has made an environmental review. How can the Minister of the Environment stand in this House and say that he will appoint another panel? Who will he get to serve on this panel, when clearly the first panel was not able to do its work based on the very guidelines of his Cabinet?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have three documents that are very important in this issue. We have a court order which, by and large, is the most important of the documents; we have an agreement which signed in January of this year between the Government of Canada and that of Saskatchewan; and we have a licence that was issued in 1989 to the proponent of the project. And I intend to respect the letter of each one of those agreements and those documents.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of the Environment cannot answer how he will get people to serve on this environment review panel when the last one had to quit because they were not meeting their own conditions.

When it comes to tough decisions about the environment, we know whose side this government is on. First of all, in the Point Aconi case, the government chose, not the people of Canada but Senator Buchanan. The government had to decide between proper environmental review of Hibernia—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party to please put her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: The government has also had to decide between Alcan and the people of—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: My question to the Minister of the Environment is this. In each instance, the Minister of the Environment has chosen the side of his corporate friends. Whose side is this government on for the environment of Canada, the people or the corporate interests?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can be very clear. This government stands for the environment; this government stands for sustainable development; this government follows what the Brundtland commission report proposed; and, this government, in the case that is being raised right now, has stated very clearly that the government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the Alameda project not proceed until a full and proper environmental assessment process can be completed. And that is exactly what we are going to do.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, everyone in this country sees the environment as an absolute priority. So what does the new Minister of the Environment do? He hands out environmental assessment exemptions! My question to the minister is this: if he is unable to meet the expectations of the public, is he at least prepared to resign and let someone else take his place?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the present government is working on Canada's environmental agenda as quickly as possible, an agenda that will be the envy of the industrialized world. I can assure all members of this House that they will be very proud to see how Canada compares internationally in the next few years.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of the Environment based upon his statement today.

He said that he does not believe that the environmental review can proceed if construction is going on on the Alameda Dam. The Government of Saskatchewan indicated last evening that it intends to start construction of the Alameda project within a matter of a day or two.

Considering that fact, I want to ask the minister very specifically: Will he undertake a court injunction to ensure that there will be no construction on the Alameda project until that environmental assessment is properly conducted? Will he give the commitment that he will take that step today to stop that construction?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that we were looking at three options, all designed to do the same thing.

One is a court injunction and we are looking at that very closely. That has to be under the terms of the agreement, rather than under the terms of the licence. The other is a statutory action that we can do under some sections in the Fisheries Act. I am getting advice at the moment on that. The other one is, hopefully, to get an out of court agreement to not start work on Alameda.

I told the House yesterday, and I repeated it today twice, very clearly, that we will not accept the Alameda project proceeding until a full and prosper assessment is done from an environmental point of view.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister understands that he does not have the time to dither because the construction will be starting in a matter of 24 hours or so.

Going back to the question of the agreement, somebody is not telling the truth. The Government of Saskatchewan and its officials claim that there was not an agreement. The Government of Canada, through the minister, says there was agreement.

Because Canadians need to know the truth about this vital issue, will the minister undertake to table all the memoranda, minutes, documents, and correspondence relating to his meetings with Premier Devine and the Government of Saskatchewan?

More importantly, will he undertake to have the committee on environment invite Premier Devine to appear before the committee so we can hear his allegations against the government and get to the bottom of what this is all about?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is an agreement made on January 26, 1990. It is an official agreement. It is signed by Saskatchewan Water Corporation and signed by the then Minister of the Environment. This is an agreement. I will table this agreement. It is a public document and this is the agreement under which we are going.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On national television last night, the minister showed no compassion for people in the refugee backlog who have been separated from their children or their spouses for three or four years. The minister still insists that her ill-conceived refugee backlog clearing process is working.

Would she reconsider her position and give speedy clearance to those refugees who are separated from their children or their spouses?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are several points I would like to make to the hon. member.

The first one is that he is making an assumption that some other form of process would be faster. I would point out that the last time we had an administrative review it took us two years to clear 26,000 cases. That is not any faster than what we are doing today.

The process that I have set in place is moving ahead. It will be done within a reasonable time-frame and it is very important that people coming to this country all come under the same rules.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mrs. McDougall: That is what we have established and that is what we will continue to uphold.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, when the minister announced these programs, she said they were temporary and would remain in place for two years, to clear up the backlog of 85,000 refugee claims. That was two years ago. Today, about 20,000 claims have been settled, and of those 20,000, only 608 were rejected. What is the minister afraid of? Why doesn't she admit her policy is unfair and inhuman and prevents family reunification of refugees who have been waiting for four or five years?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I absolutely regret—categorically—the hon. member's assumptions. First, people come here because this is a good place to come. I do not notice that people have stopped coming to our borders because of this terrible human rights crisis to which the hon. member refers.

Second, if people want to speed up the process, it would help considerably if lawyers did not have as many as 17 adjournments on a single case.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As the minister knows, the churches' report to the United Nations accuses Canada of torture in its treatment of refugee claimants in the backlog, those who came before 1989. According to the churches' study, 58 per cent of them have suffered declining mental health because of the government's years of delay in processing their claims. They have suffered in the countries they fled, and now they are continuing to suffer at the hands of the government that prevents them from getting jobs, creates anxiety about their futures, and denies them their right to be reunited with their families.

I ask the minister, what steps is she taking to end this torture?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without accepting any of the vocabulary that has been used, let me say that we have put some steps in place that I think will make the process faster. We have done that in the last few months. Fifty per cent of the cases have been opened, and the process is moving ahead more rapidly. We, too, want to ensure that people's futures are settled.

I would also point out that people can work in this country as soon as they have had their first hearing. There are many countries in which people who are refugee claimants cannot work at all, can never bring their families, and can never become citizens. I think the hon. member should maybe turn his attention to where the real problems are.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been promising fast action for 21 months. She has failed to deliver. Furthermore, she has taken so many of the regular immigration staff out of normal immigration work that Canadians now have great difficulty in getting action on their sponsorships.

Will the minister stop the torture and stop blocking immigration by declaring an amnesty, that is, land the people in the immigration backlog?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am really surprised to hear this hon. member, for whom I have a great deal of respect in the refugee field and who is really concerned about refugees, raising some hysteria about torture. That is unlike him and is unworthy of this Chamber and is unworthy of the people—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I also want to point out that the UN High Commissioner for Refugees has looked at our system. The head of our refugee determination system, Gordon Fairweather, has been in communication with him because our system is regarded as a model, aspects of which may be applied in the rest of the world. That means that we are doing this in a fair and humane way.

ENERGY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The price increases in heating oil and gasoline are a crisis for millions of Canadian homes and businesses, yet the Conservative government cancelled over a dozen programs that Canada had in place to encourage energy conservation. Now Canadians are seeing the result.

Will the minister reconsider the programs cancelled, such as the incentives for converting from oil to natural gas? Will the government also reinstate the cancelled programs, such as the ones at the National Research Council, for developing alternative energies to fossil fuels?

• (1440)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the first question, the answer is no. On the second question, the answer will be in the Green Plan.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I attended the minister's news conference this morning where he gave his blessing to a further 10-cent-a-litre increase for the price of gasoline based on present world prices. I think Canadians will be grateful to him to have that blessing.

How much of a price increase for home heating oil is he prepared to give his blessing to in light of present world prices?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we had a good federal-provincial meeting. We went through the various aspects.

I was asked whether or not the price increase on crude post the August 2 invasion by Saddam Hussein of Kuwait had worked its way through the Canadian pricing system. I said, no, that there was a mathematical formula which would relate to about 0.7 cents per litre of increase for every dollar increase on WTI.

What I find incredible is that that member was a member of a government which, at this time, wanted the price of oil to be $116.63 a barrel. He wanted the Montreal reference price to be $78.73. In other words, he wanted Canadians to pay $78.73 for a barrel of oil, plus $40 a barrel in tax, greater than the price of crude is today. What is he really for, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The government has a duty to ensure that Canadians are not being taken advantage of by price gouging as a result of companies using the Persian Gulf crisis as an avenue to boost their profits.

Is he prepared, along with the Minister of Energy, to request immediately oil companies to provide the government with a detailed report to justify the gasoline price increases that have occurred across Canada?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House before in a statement on September 27, I expect the oil companies to act responsibly.

We went through the various pricing mechanisms today with the ministers of energy. The hon. member will note that the increase in the price of energy relative to crude price increase as against increases in the price at the pumps is roughly half at the pumps as against crude prices.

He will also have to take note that there are some provinces which, through the public utility boards that they have set up, are looking at the type of monitoring for their provincial pricing.

The third point I make to him is that we are monitoring the pricing through the Petroleum Monitoring Agency on a weekly basis. If there is any evidence of gouging, I, along with my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, would under the legislation take the proper action.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Consumers Association of Canada wants an investigation of the petroleum industry in connection with unacceptable increases in the price of gas. Will the minister order an investigation today, one that is crucial for Canadian consumers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, has answered that question quite clearly. I think the hon. member—

Some hon. members: No, no!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if I were given a chance to reply—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: The hon. member is aware that we have a Bureau of Competition Policy that is able to check what is happening in the oil industry. The director told me he is following developments very closely. I believe that this morning, he attended the federal-provincial meeting to find out what is happening in the oil sector.

We are concerned, and I am as concerned as anybody else about the increasing price of gas. On behalf of consumers—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am as concerned as the next person, as all Canadian consumers are, about the increase in the price of gas. However, we must find out what the reasons are, and what we can do to intervene.

In fact, that is what we have done. The director of the Bureau of Competition Policy is doing his job, and my colleague, the Minister of Energy, is doing his. We will watch very closely what happens during the next few weeks. I believe that together with the provinces, we have a responsibility to keep a close eye on developments in the price of gas in this country, Mr. Speaker.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this is National Students' Day and I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of Canadian students. Many of these students have incurred quite huge and onerous debts as a result of the Student Loan Program, some quite a good deal more than $15,000. Because of that burden, many have defaulted. This government has imposed a 3 per cent surcharge on those loans in order to discourage default.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. McCurdy: My question to the minister is this: Will he explain how increasing the student debt load can possibly be designed to cut down on defaults?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, students are the future of this great country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Weiner: That is precisely why the Prime Minister indicated education is such a high priority.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, we are proud of our record of achievements.

An hon. member: Yes, sir.

Mr. Weiner: In particular, since 1984-85, we have doubled the Canada Student Loans Program from some $200 million to over $400 million. Unfortunately, the debt, the defaults have more than tripled within the same period. So it was more than natural to begin an analysis to see what methods can be implemented to help with the administrative costs of some of those debts. The small administrative fee which is repaid at the end, when they are already in the work force, did not seem like much of an obstacle in the shared responsibility of education between the two levels of government, the parents, the family, and the students themselves.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair in asking the supplemental question to which he is entitled will be very clear to dissociate himself from the demonstration that we have just had in this Chamber.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there is no member of this House who would reasonably assume that I was in any way responsible for any of—

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Dairy farmers in Quebec and Canada are worried. Is the Canadian offer tabled at GATT likely to reassure them?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, Canada's position tabled Monday at GATT— I personally met leaders of the Quebec agricultural industry on Monday, and this morning, in the newspapers, I found that most Quebec agricultural organizations and most Canadian organizations have come out in favour of the Canadian position at GATT. We feel that our position is balanced and represents the interests of all Canadian farmers, and I am particularly proud that Canada will be able to count on the support of all Canadian farmers in defending their interests in Geneva.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I have disavowed any responsibility for the actions in the gallery. I look at the other side for someone to disavow responsibility for the government's side behaviour.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Shields: We don't believe you, Howard.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would help the Chair and put his question.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Students has protested the 3 per cent surcharge. The government's own advisory committee on student financial aid has also disapproved of it.

My question to the minister is: Will he not withdraw this stupid surcharge and act constructively to, instead of increasing the financial barriers for students, help to cut them down?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, those young people are not typical of the bright, vigorous, vibrant young people that I have come to meet from coast to coast.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: They'll pay the deficit.

Mr. Weiner: The member will know that the current program is undergoing an internal review as well as an external examination to see how much more effectively it can meet the very pressing needs of those students who require assistance.

This government has nothing to be ashamed of in terms of its contribution to post-secondary education. In 1984-85, $4.2 billion was contributed versus $5.7 billion in 1989-90. We have increased spending, as I said, under this program. We have established 15 networks of Centres of Excellence involving over 30 universities. We have increased funding for the three granting councils from $500 million in 1984-85 to $800 million in 1989-90.

An hon. member: Speech.

Mr. Weiner: We value education. We value our contribution. We are going to continue all we can do to be helpful to make Canada the most competitive society in the world.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate the court's confirmation of Canadian women as persons, but sadly, today we also see a tremendous upsurge in the murder rate against Canadian women.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. What program does the minister have to assist Canadian women who are living in terror, and what does she plan to do to end this scourge?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to answer the hon. member's question, which was put to me very recently by one of her colleagues.

The government's family violence program is shared by a number of departments, including those of my colleagues, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Solicitor General, but I would be very pleased to review what the Department of Justice is doing to this end.

We have, first of all, engaged in a reform of the Criminal Code in the law governing sexual violence, which was amended in 1983. We are now assessing the impact of those changes.

In addition, we are analysing measures to deal specifically with violent pornography. We fund research to such projects or through television programs to inform the general public about the existing law of sexual assault and an evaluation of programs for men who batter their spouses or lovers.

In policy development, we have set up a departmental committee to develop policies relating to women, especially violence against women. We have participated in the interdepartmental committee developing a policy on family violence.

Finally, with respect to the administration of justice, we have provided support for conferences and seminars designed to sensitize justice professionals on sex equality issues, especially as they relate to violence against women.

An hon. member: Speech.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): I am sure the hon. member as a member of the legal profession may be aware of the programs sponsored by the Canadian Judicial Centre for the Canadian judiciary to sensitize them to issues with respect to violence against women as they appear in the court.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, assessment, research and development are all very well and good in their place. But, two weeks ago a 16-year old girl was murdered in the shadow of these Parliament buildings. This is a war and women are dying.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. Not long ago in Montreal, over a period of only ten days, seven women were killed by their husbands. As a woman and as the person responsible for law enforcement at the national level, what does the Minister of Justice intend to do to help women who are victims of violence?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, we have a very extensive program to deal with the matters to which the hon. member referred. It is not a simple matter. In fact it is a very complex one. However, attitudes, not just men's but also women's attitudes, are very important. They are the basis for the changes that are necessary in society. We have initiated programs that deal with the attitudes at the root of these problems. As I said before, we have a very extensive program, and, in my opinion, a very effective one to deal with these matters.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The current nursing shortage has forced many nursing homes to rely on medical service companies to provide their nursing and support staff. As a result most of the labour cost of these homes will be subject to the 7 per cent GST. Nursing homes expect to have no option but to pass this cost on to their patients.

Now that the Canadian Council on Social Development and other national social policy organizations have issued an indictment of this government's current funding policies regarding medicare, I ask the minister if his government will continue to allow the GST to be aimed at the pension cheques of the chronically ill.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stretches rather far in trying to link the various allegations that she makes.

She knows full well that sitting before the Senate right now is legislation that would allow cheques to go out to millions of low income Canadians as part of the GST tax rebate. If her colleagues who are barricading that in the

Point of Order

Senate would get moving, those Canadian families earning less than $30,000 a year would benefit.

What we need from the other side is its co-operation in order to get these cheques into the hands of these Canadians.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of the recipients of this year's Persons Award: Geraldine Bailey, Mrs. Jean Scott, Mrs. Helen Hnatyshyn, Madame Thérèse Dallaire-Laplante, Mrs. Irene Grant, and Madame Délie Gallien-Chiasson.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Richard Thornburgh, U.S. Attorney General.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I think I am obligated to say something to the House and to one of our hon. members.

When I made the remark that I would hope the hon. member in putting his supplemental would make it clear that he was dissociating himself from what took place here, that may have implied a presumption which was not proper for me to make. I say to the hon. member that I did not mean to leave that presumption, and I hope the hon. member will accept my apology.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period when the member for Windsor—St. Clair was dissociating himself from the demonstration that took place today, unfortunately I said to him: "We don't believe you, Howard". I wish to apologize to him most sincerely.

An hon. member: We don't believe you.

Mr. Shields: It was most unparliamentary and I realize that.

I also wish to apologize to all hon. friends in the House, my colleagues. I wish to withdraw that remark.

Unfortunately it cannot be taken off the record. For that I am truly sorry and I wish to extend my sincere apology.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair and indeed all members of our caucus were impugned today by the government members trying to intimate that we were associated with the demonstration in the gallery. As leader of party, I want to say that we would—

Mr. Siddon: It wouldn't happen by accident.

Ms. McLaughlin: The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development now says it would not happen by accident. I want to say to the minister and to all members on the other side that I dissociate myself, but I should not have to say that as members of Parliament we do not condone that kind of demonstration. We have never condoned that kind of demonstration, and we should not have to say we dissociate ourselves. It should be assumed that members of Parliament do not appreciate that kind of behaviour from the gallery.

I appreciate your comments, Mr. Speaker, and the comments of the previous speaker about withdrawing his comments; but I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister who has left, or someone speaking on behalf of the Deputy Prime Minister, to offer to withdraw the remarks of all of the government members on the other side.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, part of our role in this Chamber and as officers of this House, as Whips, is to try to maintain decorum in the House.

I have been rising in this Chamber since I became aware of a situation last week about statements made by the House leader of the New Democratic Party about members of the government caucus. Those comments are untrue and they are known to be untrue, and they have not been apologized for. There has not been an adequate opportunity for me to argue the question of privilege, and that is partly what has gone wrong in this House. It began on October 11 on a very serious issue with—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may be referring to an argument which he commenced by way of a question of privilege. That argument will of course be heard as soon as the hon. member for Kamloops returns.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. The cards that were thrown on the floor of the House were all signed. Perhaps the government could answer each one and tell these people this is not the right way to communicate with Canadians.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand how easy it is for members to say things that they might think is a statement in levity that can nonetheless have the effect of departing from the practices of this House.

My friend, the hon. member for York South—Weston, in response to the apology that was just uttered by my colleague from Athabasca, said that he did not believe that statement. It may be that the statement was uttered tongue in cheek, as is suggested. That may be the case.

I have been in the House, Mr. Speaker, for 16 years—

An hon. member: Eighteen years.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Eighteen years. I have been travelling a lot. I know, Sir, that the standards of this House when they decline, decline gradually. People do not intend that they decline but they decline nonetheless.

I think the hon. member for York South—Weston is a serious parliamentarian who would want the standards of this House to be respected. I would consequently ask him, one colleague to another, if he would stand in his place and withdraw those remarks.

• (1510)

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to indicate that I fully subscribe to the standards as advocated by the member who just spoke.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point as the hon. member for Yukon rose on.

I have not yet heard from the government side an indication of whether it felt it was appropriate for not just one, not just two, but many members including cabinet ministers to drown out the member for Windsor—St. Clair when he attempted to put his supplementary question.

I believe, Sir, that that was impugning the motive of the member for Windsor—St. Clair. I think it is a matter that you should reflect upon, review the tapes and review Hansard to see in fact if the privilege of the member has been infringed upon.

Second, at the time when my leader rose, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said: "That was no accident" with regard to the matter of the demonstration and its so-called relationship to this caucus.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you could review the "blues" and, if you find that those words were recorded, take the appropriate steps to ensure that the minister withdraws those remarks.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): First of all, Your Honour, I would like to express my appreciation for your gracious remarks with respect to a statement that you made that could have been misunderstood. I thank you very much for that, Sir.

To the hon. member for Athabasca, let me express my appreciation for his apology for a remark that I did not myself attach a great deal of significance to.

I do not think that there could have been any serious suspicion or inclination among the vast majority of members of this House that I would have had anything to do with behaviour in the gallery, such as was unfortunate to have taken place, as we all agree.

But I have to say this: when people have watched this House on their television sets it will not be the ill behaviour of those students that they will remember; it will be the ill behaviour of the members on the other side.

We have a considerable problem in maintaining the trust and respect of the people of Canada. There is little doubt that our status has decreased still more when we see near bedlam on the government side that is inappropriate to this House. I hope that I never have to experience it again.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, to the point of order that has been raised, the only question that ought to be before the House is whether or not the House, in the event of any incidents or demonstration here, would ever want to make the mistake of presuming the involvement on the basis of absolutely no evidence whatsoever of any member, whether he or she is an independent member, a member of the New Democratic Party, a member of the Liberal Party, or a member of the Conservative Party.

That is the only issue. Does this House make an automatic presumption of involvement of a member in a demonstration from the gallery? All members reject that kind of behaviour.

I think the Speaker today has served this House well with the remarks you have made, Mr. Speaker. I think most other matters subsequent to your comments are matters of debate and partisanship. We ought to quit while we are ahead.

Mr. Speaker: First of all I want to thank the hon. member for his comment and I want to thank other hon. members for the support on both sides of the House for that.

I will consider carefully what has been said. If it is appropriate to come back to the House and report, I shall do so.

I think it is clear to all of us, not just to members here but to the public that is watching and listening, that we have an obligation to maintain as much dignity and civility in this place as is possible, given the fact that it is not a tea party and it is a vigorous place of debate.

I think that that is the general mood of all hon. members and I think I am accurately expressing that mood.

We will move on to Routine Proceedings.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

51ST REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 51st report of the Striking Committee.

Routine Proceedings

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Environment with the title No Time to Lose: The Challenge of Global Warming.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response within 150 days.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, for those who have followed the work of the committee, we have had more than a year of meetings, heard some 60 witnesses and more than 200 submissions.

We are tabling an interim report at this time in advance of our final and full report because of the very important second world climate conference that will take place near the end of this month and early in November at which our government will be called upon to play a key role.

We believe that the matters to be addressed there are so urgent that literally, as the title of this report says, there is no time to lose. We anticipate the 17 recommendations put forward by this all-party committee will be very seriously considered and acted upon with respect to our leadership at that important conference.

ALL-NUMERIC DATES AND TIMES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-338, an act to establish a national standard for the representation of dates and times in all-numeric form.

He said: The designation of dates in a numeric form can be very confusing as it is often difficult to tell which number is the day and which number is the month. After the year 2000 we can see a situation of 02/03/04, not knowing what is day, month, or year.

International standards organizations are pressing for the universal adoption of a non-confusing process for giving dates and times. Standards have been agreed upon and recommendations have been made. The order would be year, month, and day. There is no specific federal legislation or agency responsible for or with jurisdiction over such matters now. I believe this bill would end much of the present confusion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MIDDLE EAST

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Routine Proceedings to seek the unanimous consent of the House to put the following motion. I move:

> That this House establish a special committee of members and empower them to travel to the Middle East region, consult with members of the Canadian Armed Forces, observe all aspects of their operations and report its findings and recommendations back to this House at the earliest opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the member to move the motion?

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition which has been duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

This petition is from 63 of my constituents. They are from the Port Blandford area and another distinct area of my riding; Perry's Cove, Salmon Cove, Carbonear and Harbour Grace.

These petitioners are very concerned that they now need 14 weeks instead of 10 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance in Newfoundland for the whole of the year. They note that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland, as I think everybody in this House knows, is the highest in the country. Therefore, the petitioners—and I am very pleased to note that the minister relevant to this is in the House today—humbly pray and call upon Parliament in the loudest possible voice to introduce the variable entrance requirement without delay. This will enable them to qualify for unemployment insurance in 10 weeks instead of 14.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present to the House further petitions supporting the previous petitioners who object to the Tory government imposing the 7 per cent GST on books, newspapers and magazines. Such a tax on printed material is a tax on literacy and has never been imposed by any federal government since Confederation.

On behalf of the petitioners I thank the other House for refusing to pass the GST legislation.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present three petitions signed by residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance.

The petitioners, in certain assurance that this honourable House will therefore provide a remedy, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the government to hold our Canadian marketing systems up as an example to the rest of the world, and protect them in their entirety at all costs in the current round of GATT negotiations.

These dairy and poultry farmers come from Ontario communities such as Kerwood, Watford, Alvinston, Pretolia, Croton, Forest, Camlachie, Strathroy, Inwood, Cambridge, Woodstock, and so on. They are representative of the province of Ontario.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to the House from members of the Canadian poultry industry, mainly those in Ontario.

The petitioners call upon this Parliament to reject any proposals involving tariffication of a supply managed product, any increase in minimum import provisions and any increased access to the Canadian market involving poultry products as now being discussed by this government at the GATT negotiations.

These petitioners do humbly pray and ask this House to follow their petition.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I want to introduce six petitions from citizens of my riding expressing strong opposition to the GST and supporting the Senate in their actions.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36.

It is my duty to present this petition. I will say ahead of time that I do not agree with its contents but as the member of Parliament for Brant I feel obligated to present it.

The petition says wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will effectively protect the life of the pre-born child. This petition is from the anti-abortion people in my riding in Brantford, Paris and so on.

As I say, I do not agree with the content of it but I am presenting this petition.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by many Canadians who are appalled by this government's new foray into taxing books.

The petitioners indicate that they believe that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy. In this particular day and age when so much talk and effort has been put into creating a literate society, it seems that the GST legislation is going in the opposite direction.

These petitioners humbly pray that this government sees fit to listen to some sense and to withdraw the GST legislation.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today on behalf of residents of southern Ontario, whereby they recite the importance of newspapers, books and periodicals to a functioning literate democracy.

They call upon the government to not tax these articles under the GST.

CANADIAN NATIONAL PENSION PLAN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling a petition signed by hundreds of pensioners and organized by the CN Pensioners Association. Mr. Speaker, your petitioners say that a parliamentary sub-committee representing all parties was formed by an order of this House on April 17, 1985, to examine the various aspects of the Canadian National Pension Plan.

Mr. Speaker, your petitioners call upon Parliament to table a bill ordering Canadian National Railways to implement immediately all the committee's recommendations on pensions.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition which points out that whereas the railway passenger service in Canada has been carried on by VIA Rail, it is essential for many Canadians, and has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years, it notes the savage cuts of the Conservative government in funding for VIA Rail.

It points out that this could result in a serious erosion in national passenger railway service in this country. Therefore, it calls upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present one of the hundreds of petitions that I have received from constituents in the city of Vancouver, as well as from the municipality of Burnaby, concerning the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax.

They point out that it is an unfair and regressive form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay. It points out that the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

The petitioners urge the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system in this country so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and a truly progressive system rather than this destructive and regressive goods and services tax.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present a petition signed by numerous residents of the Toronto area in the province of Ontario.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax in so far as it applies to books, newspapers, magazines and periodicals.

The thing that surprises me, if I may say so, is that no members on the other side of the House from the Toronto area rise to present such petitions. One can only assume that their constituents are appalled at their support of this tax and are delivering the petitions to us to file in this House because of the failure of their members to stand up and reject this tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty today to table a petition signed by several Canadians. It deals with the important subject of books, magazines, newspapers and this government's plan to introduce a tax on magazines, books and newspapers. This is a tax on learning.

Literacy is the cornerstone of democracy, culture, and education. The productive end of all this is that we have a better educated population. It is wrong, in view of these petitioners, to tax Canadians on their books, magazines and newspapers.

• (1530)

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, today, I have the honour of tabling a petition concerning the GST on books, periodicals and newspapers. I think it is shocking that this government does not support education, literature, libraries, reading, heritage languages and, both official languages, and discourages people from learning more by cutting the public's available income by 7 per cent, as a result, of the GST.

Mr. Speaker, this petition is signed by a number of Canadians.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition, under Standing Order 36, signed by native residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically from Moose Factory, Long Lake, and Geraldton, Ontario.

On behalf of these 200 natives, I request the federal government to deal in a just manner with the struggle of all aboriginal peoples in Canada to have their land claims and rights properly addressed. Inaction on the part of the federal authorities will only continue to antagonize race relations in Canada and provoke dangerous and ignorant acts of racism.

HAZARDOUS WASTE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): I have a second petition, Mr. Speaker. I present it on behalf of some 450 residents of Hornepayne, who are asking the federal government to cease all efforts to locate hazardous waste sites in the township of Hornepayne.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of Canadian citizens who protest against the government's attempt to apply the goods and services tax to magazines, books, and newspapers, which they say will inhibit the dissemination of the printed word as a corner-stone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society.

The petitioners ask Parliament to exempt books, newspapers, and magazines from the said goods and services tax and that the tax be defeated.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36. It deals with the goods and services tax.

The petitioners, all Canadians, ask Parliament to reject this tax on books, magazines, and newspapers as it is a tax on learning. They humbly pray that Parliament will do so.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to present a petition, probably one of the largest petitions or the one containing the largest number of signatures ever presented in the House.

There are about 16,000 names on this petition, representing every one of the seven federal ridings in Newfoundland and Labrador, the five held by members on this side of the House and two held by the gentlemen from St. John's West and St. John's East respectively.

I am grateful to the Secretary-Treasurer of the Fish, Food and Allied Workers' Union for co-ordinating this petition. It is a petition that affects literally tens of thousands of Newfoundlanders, hence the interest in it.

It addresses the issue of the variable entrance requirements and points out the need for the government to introduce such a resolution, a motion to get the requirements back down to 10 weeks. The petition goes on to point out that the change to 14 weeks has occurred at the same time as substantial reductions in fish quotas which have reduced the amount of work available to many thousands of fishermen and fish plant workers.

I believe the petition speaks eloquently for itself and for the 16,000 people who signed it, as well as many other thousands they represent. I have great pleasure in supporting the prayer of the petition and would hope that the government would see fit to act on it, and act on it soon.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to table in the House today. The first is signed by residents from the Lower Mainland area, Maple Ridge and Mission area.

They call upon the government to get moving and sign the forest agreement so that we can promote more effective and sustainable forestry practices, increase spending on reforestation, and promote genuine sustained yield management of our forests.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, from the same wonderful communities in British Columbia, is a petition related to deregulation in the airline industry. It is particularly relevant, not just for the lower mainland of British Columbia, but in light of recent announcements by Canadian Airlines reducing their service to northern B.C. I dare them to reduce the service to Prince George.

These constituents and petitioners are concerned about deregulation in the airline industry.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by 2,650 residents, principally of Calgary but, as well, other parts of Alberta and indeed across Canada.

The petitioners' prayer has to do with prevention of and punishing of acts of obscene cruelty to animals. The prayer states:

> WHEREFORE the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to recognize society's abhorrence of acts of cruelty and violence against animals and amend the Criminal Code of Canada to change Sections 401 and 402 into hybrid offences within the absolute jurisdiction of the provincial court judge, thereby allowing the Crown the option of proceeding by indictment; and raise the penalty for such offences to a maximum of four years' imprisonment.

These people are speaking to the House from the heart. I pray we hear them.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions. The first one is with respect to the goods and services tax and is signed by a number of residents from the northern area of my riding, including the communities of Viscount, Young, and Watrous.

The petitioners indicate that they are opposed to the goods and services tax. They state that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

The petitioners call upon the government to withdraw this tax and to ensure that, if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity fort the government to impose a massive tax-grab.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): I also have a petition, Mr. Speaker, signed by a number of farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

They are upset that the government has chosen to remove oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and call upon the government to reinstate oats under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat now enjoys, namely that neither of the commodities could be removed unless removed so by Parliament.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions signed by a number of people in my riding.

The petitioners point out that it is the first time since Confederation that the Government of Canada proposes to tax the printed word and argue that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a corner-stone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society.

The petitioners pray that Parliament will reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the fight goes on. I have had the pleasure of presenting petitions from coast to coast against the goods and services tax, from my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and many other areas of Canada.

This time I rise on behalf of the people of Kapuskasing to implore the government to see the error of its ways, as asked by the petitioners, and scrap the goods and services tax, bringing in a tax that is fairer to all Canadians.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all notices of motions stand?

[English]

Mr. Milliken: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how the government operates on Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers, but they are dealt with only once a week. The government gets lots of notice that these things are going on the Notice Paper and then they appear.

• (1540 )

I have two on that are quite straightforward. The material that is asked for should be readily available. It must be prepared and submitted by this time, and I have just asked for it. I do not know why the delay.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, who I know wants to co-operate with the House, would not perhaps be more forthcoming and say: "Yes, we would agree to that," and table the return. Even if he promised to table it in two weeks, we could adopt the motion. Yet, we are constantly delayed on these things.

I think it is not a reasonable way to proceed. It is certainly not the spirit and the intention of the rule that we proceed in this way. The intention is that we deal with the motions expeditiously. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary does not know that word, but it does mean quickly.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member's motions are not answered at this point. The only assumption I can make is that with each of his requests, we take them seriously, we do a great deal of research, and we want to make sure that the answer he receives is nothing but of the highest quality.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I also have a motion for production of papers, Motion P-29, which humbly calls upon the government "to cause to be laid before this House copies of all letters exchanged by His Excellency and Her Majesty the Queen concerning the application of Section 26 of the Constitution Act".

Mr. Speaker, this is not terribly complicated. If there is no correspondence, they can say so! But if there is for Heaven's sake please release the letters, because we have a crisis on our hands in this country. There is a crisis in the Senate. It might help us understand what is going on.

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House resumed from Thursday, September 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and
> That, upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre):

> That the motion be amended after the words "Canadian Forces" and read:
> enforce these United Nations resolutions;
> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis; and
> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following after the word "resolutions"

And further, that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that I did not have to wait any longer than I already have to enter into the debate on this very serious issue.

In my riding of Dartmouth since the beginning of August, there has been one over-riding issue. I know many times that things such as the government's unconscionable GST, its regressive social programs, and its destructive economic programs take the forefront.

I come from a fairly special riding. My riding borders the shores of Halifax Harbour. It is a riding, the city of Dartmouth, that has a very strong military tradition. It is a riding which looks out on the Bedford Basin where the allied convoys used to assemble before they went over to fight that great war for liberty and freedom, the Second World War.

My riding of Dartmouth has grown accustomed to standing on the shores and to waving good-bye, then to her men, and today to her men and women who have chosen to give and dedicate their lives to the service of the country through the Canadian Armed Forces.

I am pleased to rise in this debate today, because perhaps nowhere else in the country is a single riding more affected by the actions of the government when it decided to send the three naval vessels—HMCS Athabaskan, HMCS Terra Nova, and HMCS Protecteur—into the Middle East, than the riding of Dartmouth.

On those three vessels, there are about 924 men and women. My colleague from Halifax and I sometimes disagree on the split, but of those 924 men and women, probably at least 50 per cent, and perhaps about 60 per cent, live in the riding of Dartmouth. Most of the rest of them live in the riding of Halifax.

I want to say from the outset that I support in principle, the Canadian government's actions in condemning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, by joining later with the United Nations and nations from around the world to say: "This type of activity cannot be allowed to go unchallenged. Canada will do the right thing and will participate in the naval blockade of Iraq." I support that.

It is in the finest of traditions of the Canadian Armed Forces, when called upon, to go to protect sovereignty of states and to protect freedoms. But, there was a problem. The problem was when this unprecedented action was taken because of unprecedented circumstances in the Middle East.

When Iraq decided to take over the sovereign state of Kuwait, the government forgot one fundamental thing. That fundamental thing was that it should have recalled Parliament so that the Canadian members of Parliament, the people of Canada, the people who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces and their families were kept fully abreast of the reasons why this action was taken. Instead, this government chose differently. It was a summer of hiding for this government, in particular this Prime Minister. He was under fire on the economic front, on the constitutional front, on the trustworthiness front and what he wanted to do was hide. Even though this unprecedented action was taken to send our Canadian navy into a potential theatre of war, he did not do the right thing and that was recall this Parliament, do it immediately, to seek a national consensus so that when our men and women of the Canadian navy went overseas they knew that they had the nation of Canada behind them.

This is not a small error. I have spoken to many men and women who live in my constituency who have dedicated themselves to the service of the country through the Canadian Armed Forces. They said they were proud to do their bit. They were proud even though our equipment is not what we should have to show that we are the best trained military in the world. They were proud to do their part, but they were bitterly disappointed that the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada chose political expediency over the proper parliamentary and moral thing to do, and that was to recall this Parliament. The debate that we are having today, in the middle of October, should have taken place at the beginning of August, but the government chose not to do that. It was the summer of the nation's discontent. It was the summer that this government went into hiding.

Our party urged the government to recall Parliament and to do it immediately. We did not come out and take cheap, partisan, political shots. We understood the severity and the complexity of what was happening over in the Middle East. We understood the implications for all freedom-loving nations if this action was allowed to go unchallenged. But, we also understood that we do not live in a dictatorship; we do not live in a one-party state; we do not live with a president for life. We live in a parliamentary democracy where issues such as this should be properly debated on the floor of this place.

Mr. Speaker, I started to talk about my riding and I will give you a little more background on my riding. I said it had a strong naval tradition, and it has. In my riding we have the air support base, CFB Shearwater. CFB Shearwater was better known, I guess, during the Second World War as RCAF Station Dartmouth. At the present time, CFB Shearwater probably has 1,000 military personnel and 600 to 800 civilian personnel working on that base. The Canadian navy employs thousands of individuals. A lot of those people live in my riding, as I said earlier.

We tried to figure out one day how many people living in the city of Dartmouth and its surrounding area, on the Dartmouth side of the harbour, depended on the Canadian military for a living. We came up with a figure of about 16,000. Sixteen thousand individuals living in my riding are serving in the Canadian Armed Forces and serving proudly. So it is little wonder that on August 22, Alderman Gloria McCluskey from the city of Dartmouth was driven by an overwhelming desire to show support for those military families, for the men, women, and children, who were left behind. She organized, on the Dartmouth waterfront, with very little advance notice, a ribbon tying to show those people who give so much to my community and Dartmouth, the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces and their families, that we supported them and that we were going to be with them in this time of uncertainty and that we would like to show our solidarity with them over the coming weeks and months. There were literally thousands of yellow ribbons tied on both sides of Halifax Harbour.

I have been involved in a lot of functions; some fun, some not so fun, and some tragic. Up until that point in time I have never been as moved or as touched as I was at that ribbon tie. There were a lot of tears of uncertainty from spouses and children. the men and women spoke to me that day. It was not a partisan debate. It was a day for support.

They said: "Mr. MacDonald, why do we have to turn on CNN Headline News at six o'clock to find out what is going on in the Persian Gulf while my husband, my son, or my daughter is being sent over? What in the name of goodness is wrong with this country when the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, and the government in Ottawa have a gag order on? Why do I have to watch the evening news to find out what Maggie Thatcher, the Prime Minister of England, has said in her House of Commons? Why do we have to rely on foreign media to find out what in the name of goodness our troops were being sent over to fight against and what was going to face them when they were there?"

It is a national tragedy what the government did to those men and women and their families during the period of time until debate took place on the floor of this House. It is a national tragedy. It is shocking.

Until August 22, I had never been involved in an event that was so moving. Two or three days later on August 24, the vessels left Halifax Harbour. I have read a lot about the Second World War and about the role of Halifax in the Second World War, the importance of convoys assembled in Bedford Basin to be sent overseas, many never to return again. I have read about it. I felt it that day when the three naval vessels, the Athabaskan, the Terra Nova and the Protecteur left the harbour.

My colleague from Halifax was there. She can attest to it. It was an incredible afternoon. The three naval vessels did a salute past while we sat on the reviewing stand. There were tens of thousands of individuals from Halifax-Dartmouth and farther afield, from 100 miles away, who came to say to those men and women "Godspeed. We wish you well. We support you. We are concerned just like you are. God bless you all and I hope that you are back real soon". That is why they were there.

There is a member opposite who, if he wants to get into the debate, should perhaps put his name on the list on the other side.

Do you know one of the problems that day? The Prime Minister had a chance to redeem himself. He did not bother to recall Parliament because he was afraid that his political hide would be ripped off him in this place for his policies and blunders through the spring and summer of this year. He did not even bother to show up on the Halifax waterfront to see off those 924 men and women who by his orders were going into a potential theatre of war, to wish them well as the Prime Minister of this country.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Do you know what he did? He made a decision and it says a lot about the Prime Minister. He made a decision that it was more important for that Prime Minister to meet with his Quebec caucus than it was to see the men and women off who were serving on those vessels and on the Sea King helicopters.

Ms. Clancy: Many of them from the province of Quebec.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Many of them from the province of Quebec. He made a more important decision, to try to put out the fires that were raging uncontrolled in his Quebec caucus. He acted more as the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party than he did as the Prime Minister of this country. That is an insult that the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces and in the riding I represent and my colleague from Halifax represent for which he will never ever be forgiven.

The orders were given. What did the Prime Minister do? You wonder why people are cynical. Under great pressure from editorial boards, from Canadians from coast to coast, and from parliamentarians to recall Parliament, he waited. He waited until the final hour, a really courageous move. He waited until 10 days before he knew that this place had to resume sitting before he got the order-in-council from the Governor General and indicated that the troops would be put on operational alert in a potential theatre of war. That is the backdrop to the motion that we are debating today.

My colleagues and I in the Liberal Party support the Canadian Armed Forces. We have risen time and again in this House on this matter. We see this again today in the paper. At a time that the Canadian military has been told to stretch the resources to the limit because of the unprecedented crisis in the Persian Gulf, we read in the papers that one of the naval vessels that went over had to get a cannon installed on its deck that had to be taken out of a museum in Halifax.

We saw the ships go into a 10 or 12-day refit. They had to take armaments that were destined for the frigates being completed in Saint John and the frigate replacement program and put them on the decks of those vessels. They did that because this government loves to talk, especially around election time, about its commitment to the Canadian Armed Forces. Shortly after elections, we know where their commitments go. They are written in invisible ink when it comes to the Canadian Armed Forces. They cancelled Phase III of the Frigate Replacement Program. They carried out base closures from coast to coast in this country.

Just today, while we had those three vessels and the CF-18s in the Middle East, the Minister of National Defence is quoted in the paper as saying: "Hey, boys, be prepared, big cuts coming." If they cut them any more they will have to go on gas rations in the Persian Gulf to get those vessels home. That is a fact.

The people on this side of the House support the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who are doing their best with outdated equipment under the threatened knife of further government cutting and under the incredible indifference of the Prime Minister. The men and women of the Canadian forces are still doing the best job they can with the resources that have been given to them.

We saw in Halifax and Dartmouth the 2,000 or so people who worked at the dockyards doing an absolutely incredible job. They refitted those three vessels in 10 days. It was incredible the job that they did in the short period of time that they were given to do it. It is those same individuals at the dockyard that this government refused in 1988 when they were negotiating a contract to give them wage parity with their counterparts on the west coast. It seems this government is intent on perpetuating wage discrimination based on where you live and not what job you do.

The Prime Minister in debate on this motion said that the employees of the dockyards in Halifax and Dartmouth should be commended for the fine job they did. I just hope that those words translate into a fair contract because their contract has come back up for negotiation. It is a contract that should, once and for all, get rid of regional rates of pay and an abhorrent bit of wage discrimination.

For the second time, I sought unanimous consent of this House to introduce a motion. The motion would have done the following. It would have established a committee from all sides of this House to travel to the Middle East, not in six weeks time or two months time when the government needs a diversion, but right now. The government has sent over 1,000 men and women into that area. I and people on this side of the House felt that it was proper that a committee of this place be struck of members to go over and observe the conditions under which our men and women and our equipment is operating, talk with them and report back with recommendations at the earliest possible opportunity.

I have sought unanimous consent of the House twice, and twice it was refused. I give this House notice that I will continue to rise under Routine Proceedings to put that motion until the people opposite see the sense in what I am trying to do. We want some accountability and reportability. We want to support the men and women that this government has sent to the Persian Gulf. Perhaps some day that will come about.

In conclusion, the motion that is before us, the main motion, not the subamendment and the amendment, is a motion that everybody in this House, I would hope, would like to support. But there is a problem with the motion.

I do not understand why the government has to try to play politics with every single issue that comes up. It could very easily have consulted with the House leaders of the Official Opposition and of the New Democratic Party, and it could have come up with a resolution that was supportable by all sides of this House.

This is a national issue. It is not a partisan issue for these people opposite to play with. After the summer of discontent and the summer that they hid in the woods. They had to come back with a motion that they knew some members of this place were going to have great difficulty in supporting, because the motion would mean that not only do we support the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces but we support this government's censuring of public opinion and parliamentary debate on issues as serious as the one that is before this House now.

In conclusion, I would hope members opposite, the House leader opposite and the Whip opposite will continue to listen to leadership on this side of the House. We are trying very hard to come up with the solution so that by the time these resolutions come to a debate the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces will have no question in their minds but that their actions on behalf of this government and the people of Canada are supported by members of Parliament, and that the motion that is put forward is one that does not have the traditional attachments to it to try to reap some benefits on this very sad situation to members of the government.

I would hope that by the time that motion is put cooler heads and less partisan heads will prevail on the other side and that the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces will know that they are supported by parliamentarians.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I do not necessarily have a question, but I do have a comment to make to the hon. member for Dartmouth.

Just last Sunday I met with Janet van Nostrand, a woman whose son is serving on the Athabaskan. We talked for several minutes. Young Lieutenant John has been in the Armed Services for about five years. He is 29 years old and a graduate of engineering from the University of Toronto. Janet and her husband, Dr. Peter, talked to John on Sunday morning, September 30. John relayed that morale was high and spirits were good. The working order of the HMCS Athabaskan was functioning well. He made a point of saying that.

I just want to express the thought to the hon. member that I feel a little uncomfortable in how political he seems to try to make this situation.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Attewell: A thought went through my mind about these brave men and women serving over there who are obviously nervous and wondering what the future holds, it is such a powder keg over there. If we were to play back the hon. member's speech, I was wondering whether that would help their morale, their pride and so on. I do take a little exception here. I think they would rather have us thinking about things that will help them with their confidence, humbly praying for their return, and not making a political harangue of this situation.

Yes, it is a very serious situation over there. We do not know from hour to hour what might be happening. I would just like to see us concentrating on our faith, hope and prayers for these young men and women. We are all so proud of them, especially in our own particular case, this John van Nostrand, a fifth generation young man from the village of Vandorf where I live.

I want to stay on a high note of pride for these young men and women. Let us get this partisan politics out of the discussion.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to commend my hon. friend. I believe that his concern for the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces is genuine. I wish to assure him that I think all members of the House share the same concern.

But, Mr. Speaker, to get up and say let us not talk about how this government screwed up and how it handled the situation is a bit too much for me to handle. For the member to get up and tell me that what we should really be doing is forgetting the events that transpired during the summer months is a bit too much for me to handle.

There is nobody who is more concerned in this House for the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces than I am, Perhaps my hon. colleague over there is a close second. I for one am not going to forget what this Prime Minister and this government have done and the slap in the face they have given the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who are doing their jobs over there. We wanted to do our jobs in this place, but the Prime Minister did not allow us to do that.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, since my comment is to the hon. member, I will use his language.

I thank him for his remarkable exposé that he just made. He may feel that he is a new member here but he has already shown an extraordinary—and I do not want to be pompous— sensitivity and a comprehension of a very important debate. He knows this has been quite a day for me. To say that, I mean it totally and absolutely. I want to thank him for that unbelievable understanding of the meaning of what we are all about to do.

It is no secret. He knows that I disagree with the government motion. It is no secret and I will say that in my speech if I have a chance to make it. I disagree with having sent soldiers. That is another matter. At least he has shown in his own speech that he understands.

I have a question I would like to ask him about his motion. He knows that I am very concerned and my colleagues know it. At least if they didn't, they know it since this morning. He referred to a special committee, and I agree with that. I would like to ask him what he means by travel to the Middle East region to consult with members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

By the Middle East region does he mean just where Canadians are or, in order to have a better understanding of the entire picture, that the time has come for colleagues not to go where Canadians may be attacked soon but to have a feeling and a better understanding of what I have been trying to convey to this House ever since I arrived here, especially since 1970, with all due respect to all my colleagues? Can my hon. colleague who made that speech please help me out in understanding his resolution?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to. I have introduced this motion twice. I think it is incredibly important at this point in time where we could be facing a major confrontation in the Middle East that parliamentarians have a first-hand observation so that they can come back to this place and have a better and fuller debate, not just based on what is happening on CNN news in the evening.

If we are now getting into a situation where we could be potentially sending tens of thousands of Canadian men and women in the Armed Forces to fight in a war that could happen if diplomatic efforts fail, I think it is very important that members of this House make every effort to apprise themselves on a first-hand basis of all of the political happenings that are now taking place in the Middle East. Anybody that is watching this situation develop knows that it is not just a problem between two states. It is a problem involving a number of states which is extremely fluid, and it is changing on an hourly or daily basis.

My primary concern is that we go and find out exactly what conditions our men and women are operating under currently, so that we can come back to this place and do not have to listen to third-hand departmental reports given out in the House here as to how the Canadian vessels or the Sea King helicopters are standing up. We could also look at the broader political situation that is evolving so that when we make a decision, if God forbid we ever have to make a decision and if the escalation continues, we will make a decision on what we will do with the Canadian Armed Forces after first-hand knowledge of all of the very difficult and different aspects of this political and military confrontation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with care to the remarks of the hon. member. I want to commend him for the eloquence with which he spoke and certainly for the concern that he expressed for the members of the Canadian Armed Forces, many of whom as I know live in his constituency and the constituency of the member for Halifax who spoke earlier in this debate. I also want to associate myself with the remarks of the member for Saint-Denis who pointed out the importance of looking at a broader regional approach to this question, including looking at the ongoing tragedy of the plight of the Palestinians in that region.

I want to just ask a very straightforward question of the hon. member for Dartmouth with respect to the government motion which is now before this House. There is an amendment which has been proposed by his colleague and a subamendment which we have proposed. I want to ask him, should the amendment and the subamendment be defeated, whether in fact he will be voting against the government motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his comments and for his question. If the hon. member was listening, which I am sure he was, and I know he was busy signing letters, he would have heard at the end of my remarks that I had urged that we not get to a point where there is a vote yea-nay, nay-yea and indifferent and abstained in this House on this particular issue, and that I had hoped that we could come to a consensus where cooler heads would prevail and we could come up with a resolution that basically supported our Canadian Armed Forces.

If the hon. member wants to know whether or not I would condemn the government for not calling Parliament earlier, I would condemn it. If he wants to know if I would support the amendment put forward by the Liberal Party, I would support it. I would hope that by the time we get to the main resolution the government will have seen the error of its ways in bringing phoney, partisan, political overtones to this particular resolution and that we will have a resolution that everyone in this House can support.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The Minister for External Relations.

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the crisis in the Persian Gulf and to do so from a somewhat different perspective. As the Minister for External Relations, I am particularly concerned about the people affected by this crisis, so I would like to approach the issue from that perspective.

Mr. Speaker, the act of brutal aggression committed by the Iraqi government has had an overwhelming impact on the lives of the people who were directly affected. Saddam Hussein drove thousands of people from their homes, and because of him, hundreds of the thousands of workers have lost their jobs. They now have no food, no shelter and no money. He has forced these people to ask the international community to help them return to their country of origin.

His invasion of Kuwait may have even more serious consequences, increasing the poverty and dashing the hopes of many of the poorest people and nations in this world. As a member of the global community, Canada has a duty to help those who are in greatest need.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that Canada was among the first countries and one of the most generous, with its donation last August of $2.5 million to meet the needs of the initial waves of displaced persons that crossed the border from Iraq to Jordan. I am also very proud that from the very beginning, non-governmental organizations in this country provided support for aid and air transport operations. These dedicated people have maintained a Canadian presence in the most desperate situations.

I am also proud of the fact that when conditions in the evacuation camps deteriorated to the point of near-chaos and relief teams were hardpressed to help with the ever increasing flow of refugees, Canada asked the United Nations to appoint a special representative in charge of supervising relief operations.

Secretary General Perez de Cuellar appointed Prince Saddrudin Agha Khan. According to the latest news, the situation in the camps has improved considerably and air transport operations are now better organized.

Since the beginning of October, more than 300,000 people have been repatriated, thanks to the concerted efforts of the UN and bilateral action by Pakistan, Egypt and other countries.

However, Mr. Speaker, there are still thousands of foreign workers in Iraq and Kuwait, and the situation remains explosive. New waves of refugees fleeing Iraq and Kuwait are still reaching the borders.

Canada is prepared to continue its assistance. On September 14, the Prime Minister announced that an additional $75 million in humanitarian and economic aid would be set aside to help people directly affected by the crisis. This money will be used partly to charter Canadian planes that will take displaced persons back to their countries of origin, including Bangladesh, the Philippines, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, India and the Arab Republic of Egypt.

On September 28, Canada rushed an additional $4 million to the International Organization for Migration, to be used for evacuating refugees by air. This was in addition to the million dollars already donated to the organization at the beginning of the crisis. IOM executives contracted a Canadian air carrier for these shuttle flights.

Part of the $75 million will be used to provide for the basic needs of displaced people in evacuation camps, including water, food, shelter and medical care. Part of these funds will also be used to assist resettlement in the country of origin.

In the countries least equipped to cope with the mass of returning nationals, assistance will be needed to build new housing, support educational programs and reintegrate returning nationals in the labour market.

I can assure the House that the plight of these displaced persons is our most pressing concern. My representatives are now consulting with Canadian missions in the region and in the countries affected by the crisis, as well as with international organizations on the spot and the governments of the countries concerned, to finalize Canada's aid program for these people.

International relief organizations and NGOs will also play an essential role in channelling our assistance.

[English]

Canada will also provide economic assistance to the countries of the region most severely affected by the impact of the crisis and of the sanctions, especially Jordan, Egypt and Turkey.

In Jordan, it is estimated that some 30 per cent of total Gross National Product will be lost this year through trade losses, through increases in the price of oil and through lost remittances from Jordanians who once worked in Iraq and Kuwait.

Egypt and Turkey too will suffer significant losses for economies with little resilience to external shocks such as these. I have asked my officials to provide me with a detailed assessment of how Canada can best respond to the needs of these countries and those populations. Consultations are under way with other potential donors and the countries in question.

We will ensure that this additional Canadian assistance is used effectively to relieve hardship, to adjust to the economic shock and to help keep the process of development on track.

Our world has become increasingly interdependent. Other countries further from the region will also be affected by the impact of the Gulf crisis.

Many countries in eastern Europe have launched a dramatic, but still fragile, process of political and economic transformation. Their ability to manage the basic economic adjustment to market economies is hampered by the burden of oil price increases, which is further compounded by the need to now pay in expensive, hard currency.

The developing world too will be affected and I am factoring in the longer term consequences of the gulf crisis in our over-all assistance planning. The scenario for many developing countries is not good, but much will depend on the longer term price of oil.

• (1620)

Higher oil prices affect both the developed and the developing world, but the consequences in the developing world, particularly the low-income countries, are much harder to manage.

In addition to coping with higher prices for imported oil, developing countries might find weaker markets for their exports if global growth is negatively affected by the increase in the price of oil and if inflation and interest rates increase.

Developing countries are much more vulnerable than developed countries to such changes in the global economy. Many may well have difficulty paying their import bills and in continuing to finance important government programs.

Mr. Speaker, the extent of the problem and the response of the international donor community were the focus of discussions at the annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, which I attended.

It is essential to proceed with a joint analysis of the extent of the impact on developing countries and to provide for multilateral co-ordination, if we are to maximize the use of the meagre financial resources at our disposal.

A co-ordination process has been established.

The gulf crisis financial co-ordination group has already met twice, and Canada has been an active participant.

It is clear that growing economic pressures as a result of the crisis will make it very difficult for many developing countries to cope with their debt load.

Canada has been asking for some time for new measures to respond to the ongoing problems of developing countries regarding their debt.

The gulf crisis is even more reason to improve the debt strategy. At the meeting of Commonwealth Finance Ministers in Trinidad and Tobago last September, it was agreed that it would be necessary to take steps to improve the "Toronto terms" used to re-schedule the official debt to the Paris Club.

I am confident that this is a first step towards a broader, international consensus that is necessary if we are to improve assistance to developing countries that are having trouble re-scheduling their official debt to the Paris club.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I would like to say that the consequences of the actions of Saddam Hussein will not be limited to the Middle East. They will be felt by all countries throughout the world.

Peacekeeping and resisting aggression are also elements on which the future of developing countries depends. As a citizen of the world, Canada will not forget the needs of the poorest people and countries of this planet.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are all aware of the wide-reaching consequences of the crisis in the Persian Gulf, and I believe that as Canadians, we must consider the disastrous impact of this crisis on the people concerned and make sure these people receive assistance from the international community and Canada, thus giving them hope for a better life in the nearest possible future.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister made his remarks on this issue of committing the Canadian government to up to $75 million to assist some of the problem areas, assist refugees, et cetera, and we heard where some of that $75 million will go today from the Minister for External Relations.

I am wondering if the minister, representing her government here today, could tell this House what her government is doing to assist the Canadian farmers who have lost contracts with the Iraqis. The Prime Minister in this House did hint that his government would consider such compensation to Canadian farmers. I am wondering if she could give us an update as to just how this compensation will work and in what amounts.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, my colleague's question is very relevant. Indeed, as member of the international community we endorsed and even actively participated in the drafting of the United Nations Security Council resolutions. Such decisions were necessary to put pressure on Saddam Hussein and make it possible for the international community to hope that Iraq would withdraw from Kuwait. This calls for commitments on the part of the Canadian government, and it was with that in mind that the Prime Minister announced that Canadians and the government would join in this international effort to help striken communities through these extreme difficulties.

With respect to the impact on the domestic situation I would suggest that ever since we took office the government has shown it is committed to support the agricultural community in Western Canada. We have given evidence of that on several occasions in the course of our mandate, and again recently in giving support to agricultural producers in their quest for alternate survival means tailored to the needs of their community. I expect that my colleague does not entertain any doubt whatsoever about what our government has done.

As to a special measure, I think the Minister of Agriculture and some of his colleagues are examining the situation to see whether something else might be done. Unfortunately I am not in a position to provide more information on that point. The main issue I want to emphasize in the dabate today is that it is imperative that we should try to solve some of the problems of the people who have been the victims of this crisis. That was the thrust of my remarks today, and I am convinced that all members of the House and all Canadians will be supportive of any measure we can take to assist those people.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway and then the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister just said that the government wants to provide assistance to the people affected by the crisis in that area. She knows full well that among those are some Palestinians living in the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza. She knows, for instance, that Palestinians working in Kuwait have sent a lot of money simply to support their families still living in the occupied territories. That money has now run dry, and for the Palestinians living in the occupied territories, the situation is very serious indeed. As the minister knows, those Palestinians face illegal deportation, collective punishment, and settlements. And now they are facing another major problem, the lack of financial support, usually given by the members of their families in Kuwait. The minister mentioned how important it is to respond to the need of the people from Jordan and Turkey for example. What will the government do to help the Palestinians living in the occupied territories, who are also victimized by this whole situation?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): As my hon. friend has just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, we recognize indeed the tremendous needs of the community directly affected by the Iraqi crisis. Immediately following the invasion, we may have been more directly concerned by the exodus of a great many displaced people toward the so-called frontline nations and by the very serious consequences both on the individuals and the governments who had to provide food and shelter for those displaced people.

The House should therefore understand that we are currently involved in discussions, that we have met some immediate needs identified by such international organizations as, for instance, the International Immigration Office. As I explained in my remarks, we are working with the international community through the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the OECD, as well as with donor countries in an effort to identify the areas of intervention and make sure that the needs of the people will be taken into account and that we will be able to provide enough assistance to help these populations.

My hon. friend most certainly knows that the CIDA has assistance programs for the Palestinians and that, during these discussions, we will certainly check to see whether additional funds should be allocated for compensation. I do not think that any decision has been made so far, but I take due note of his comment. I am aware of the impact this loss of revenues provided by those working in Kuwait will have on Palestinians. I also take due note of this.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the fact that many countries outside the Middle East region are very severely affected by the crisis that exists, among them east European countries and also many Third World countries very distant from the Middle East.

Those countries that are very far from the Middle East have experienced hardship earlier because of our government's cutbacks twice in ODA to their programs. The gap is widening in Third World countries between the rich and the poor and it is becoming critical as a situation in itself in that, by allowing this to continue, we could be provoking a global depression to say nothing of recession here in Canada.

The oil crisis that is exacerbating an already bad situation is creating very bleak situations for many countries. The minister mentioned that she was planning to factor in adjustments for these countries that are severely affected by the oil crisis.

Can she assure us, first, that ODA funds will not be diverted to east Europe? As well, in the face of the extreme crisis being faced by so many Third World countries because of the oil crisis, is Cabinet reconsidering the ODA cutbacks and will it not just factor in adjustments but increase ODA levels to the countries most affected by the crisis?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the hon. member's interest in development, and although we may not have met, I am very much aware of her interest in the area of development assistance.

First of all, I would like to say that this government, as the hon. member knows because I have given her this answer many times before, is very committed to helping Third World countries. I think we have demonstrated this in a number of ways, and of course we spend a considerable amount on development aid. I think there are other factors as well that show our commitment to Third World countries.

Perhaps I may remind the hon. member that we were the first country to forgive the debts of Third World countries in sub-Saharan Africa—both Commonwealth countries and members of La Francophonie; we were also one of the first countries to transform our loans into donations. I think that is also a clear indication of our commitment to helping Third World countries. The hon. member warned earlier against directing aid funds to Eastern Europe, and I believe we have made that commitment. In other words, CIDA aid budgets as such are not used for countries in Eastern Europe. Those are new budgets, and our existing aid budgets are used for countries that are eligible, and the hon. member knows the countries on the list.

As for the present situation, we are aware of the tremendous difficulties caused by the crisis, in addition to the problems already being exprienced by those countries. I think that when working with Third World countries, which includes working through various multilateral mechanisms, by participating in various international committees and also bilateral talks, we always try to determine the best ways to maximize our aid in terms of responding to the specific problems of Third World contries.

That is what we are doing today. We are already aware of some of the increasing problems of certain countries, and I can assure the hon. member that we are personally committed to alleviating as much as we can the additional problems created by this crisis.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows full well—she said so herself—that we are providing assistance to Jordan and others, but principally to Turkey.

Will the Minister tell us whether the Prime Minister or the Minister for External Affairs or indeed others have reminded Turkey, which is now receiving assistance because of this crisis, that it never acted upon the United Nations' request for withdrawal of their troops from Cyprus?

There are numerous United Nations resolutions that were not acted upon by the government of Cyprus and now, because another country was invaded and pursuant to United Nations resolution, we are providing assistance to that country. This issue is of great concern in Canada, and I can assure you that hundreds of Canadians will listen carefully to your answer.

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague knows full well that this is a crisis situation. I dare hope that all Hon. Members and all Canadians were happy to see the Government respond so quickly in providing assistance to the people affected by this crisis. I think Canadians have the reputation of being generous people. We have upheld this reputation during other major crisis—including the famine in Ethopia—and I think Canadians generally have always supported the actions of their Governments. I understand my hon. friend's concern about other conflicts, but the Government had, for compassionate reasons to take quick action to help countries adapt to a new situation. Speaking of assistance, I suggest our aim must always be to help those most disadvantaged and this is the basic idea behind our policy of providing assistance to people who must face a situation for which they are not responsible.

I think my hon. friend understands now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question and comment period is now over. Debate. The Hon. Member for Victoria has the floor.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I must say I appreciate this opportunity. It is the first I have had in my new role as critic for defence, disarmament and arms control for our party and I look forward to using that position to forward a number of important policies for the country. It is an interesting time to become involved in these issues.

In beginning my job in this role, I want to pay particular tribute to the colleague who preceded me, the hon. member for Brant, who served in this role for a number of years with great distinction. I may say, there were others who preceded him and I will have an opportunity to refer to at least one of them in a minute or two.

Generally, I see the importance of the time that we are in as a time for Canada to define very clearly a new role for itself internationally and, consequently, a new role for itself in terms of defence, disarmament and arms control policies.

I would just make brief reference, at the outset of the debate, to two or three particular issues. For the first time since the end of the war, we now have an opportunity to have a genuine peace dividend as a result of the changing conditions in eastern Europe. We have an opportunity for a new role for the armed services. We have an opportunity for imaginative leadership in the Arctic and in the Pacific in the area of arms control policies.

We have an opportunity to provide leadership to bring the collective agreement that had served us in Europe, this country and others, for so many years, NATO, to an end and to have a new role for collective security in Europe, governed primarily by Europeans. There is no longer a need for Canada and the United States to maintain troops in Europe. There is no longer a need for NATO. Canada's policy must be to bring NATO to an end and, if NATO will not end, then Canada should withdraw as soon as possible from that organization.

We will have an opportunity, in the weeks ahead, to discuss a new arrangement for surveillance of the continent and an end to the NORAD agreement, which winds down in March of next year.

The Iraqi crisis was clearly brought on, in the final instance, by a breach of international law by Iraq. Our party stands with all parties in the House of Commons in condemning the Iraqi invasion of August 2, in condemning the continued occupation of Kuwait by Iraq, and in condemning the keeping of hostages by the Government of Iraq. All of those are in breach of international law and in breach of obligations under the UN charter. We stand in support of the United Nations and the international community in condemning the breach by Iraq of international law under the charter.

We support the United Nations' call on Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait and to free the hostages. We support the UN sanctions and boycott of Iraq. We support the UN authorization of military action to enforce these sanctions against Iraq.

For the Canadian role, we say that, if we had been here in Parliament when this crisis first broke out, we would have urged a different military role for Canada than that urged and adopted by the government. We would have said that Canada, as a member of the Security Council, should have not provided direct military involvement in the enforcement of the blockade, but rather reserved its position so that it could operate as a peacekeeper when the crisis was over.

However, our contingent is in the Persian Gulf and it is our position that to withdraw the contingent directly from the Persian Gulf would send the wrong signal to Iraq and Saddam Hussein. It is therefore our position that there should be a change within the particular alignment and that our contingent should serve instead in the Gulf of Oman, reserving itself again for a peacekeeping role when the crisis is over.

I would say, as well, that we stand with all Canadians and all members of the House in saying that we have the greatest of confidence in our men and women who are serving in the Canadian contingent in the Persian Gulf.

We have not the same confidence, I may add, in the equipment that has been provided by successive Liberal and Conservative governments. On that score, I had an opportunity to do a little research. I looked up some of the statements made by our party in the past.

It is intriguing, Mr. Speaker, when you go back even as far as the founding convention of the party in 1961, to see that our party has consistently urged successive government after government to reshape our military forces, not to continue to provide a kind of mini-American army in Europe and to waste an inordinate amount of money over the last 30 and 40 years in seeking to achieve that role, but rather to prepare ourselves for precisely the kind of role we are being asked and may yet be asked to perform in the Middle East; that is, a role of international peacekeeper under the aegis of the United Nations.

A little volume was produced by an earlier defence critic who was my father and who happened to represent Toronto in Parliament. I noted in doing this research that he served as a member of the defence committee of this Parliament for a number of years. In this volume that he wrote back in 1965, he built on the resolution adopted by the founding convention of the party and outlined the kind of policies, that if we had been following for the last 30 years, we would not only have saved the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars, but we would have been equipped to play a real role as peacekeeper in the world.

When we look at the role that Canada has now in the Middle East, we say that we should alter the role and that Canada should move its forces back into the Gulf of Oman. But we should also prepare for the culmination of the crisis which is clearly upon us in the next few weeks. The United States and the armies of Egypt and Saudi Arabia are clearly building to the point that they at least have the capacity to engage in a major military assault on Iraq and the Iraqi forces in Kuwait. All of the analysts indicate that such an assault would be extraordinarily costly in human lives and in the long term political consequences. Some of the estimates are that there would be 30,000 to 40,000 U.S. soldiers killed in such an action. There would be thousands and thousands more innocent civilians in Iraq who would be killed. There would be thousands upon thousands of Iraqi soldiers killed. The cost in human lives of a military assault on Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi forces would be enormous.

The cost in terms of instability in the Middle East in the long run will be incalculable. The world has seen in the last two months, since the crisis began, a very remarkable pulling together of international opinion. Virtually all of the international community has supported the actions that have been taken to date. They have done so under the aegis of the United Nations and the United Nations Security Council. This is an achievement which the world has dreamt of since 1945 when the United Nations was first founded.

Offensive military action taken outside the purview of the United Nations will shatter the work that has been done in the last two and one-half months. Further, it will shatter the very shaky but important alliance in this venture that there is to date between the Arab world, or at least the majority of the Arab world, and the rest of the international community.

The cost in terms of stability within the Arab world would be enormous if the United States leads offensive unilateral military action against Saddam.

It is hard at this stage to understand exactly what the U.S. intentions are. We have General Michael Dugan, who was the Chief of Air Staff for the United States, saying that it was clearly the U.S. intention to engage in offensive action in the Persian area and against Iraq.

There are others who suggest that this is merely an important bluff designed to persuade Saddam Hussein that rather than face the American might that is now being organized in Saudi Arabia, he would be advised to pull back from Kuwait.

There are those who argue publicly in the United States that the objective should not be the objective set down by the United Nations resolutions, namely the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the return and freedom of the hostages, but the objective should be the personal removal from power of Saddam Hussein, deserved though that may be, given his record.

For the international community to accept that additional objective brings with it a number of important consequences. The bluff itself may involve great dangers because it may induce Iraq to take pre-emptive action in the Middle East against its neighbours in Jordan, Israel and elsewhere.

What Canada must do in the weeks and days ahead is to ensure that we follow two substantial objectives based primarily on our membership on the United Nations Security Council. The first objective we should have is to ensure that whatever action takes place in the Middle East, starting tomorrow, must continue to be done under the United Nations and under United Nations authority.

Article 41 of the United Nations provides for the establishment of a Military Staff Committee. This was designed when the charter was adopted to give the United Nations the opportunity to directly supervise an international peacekeeping force. Let me read it for the record. It is Article 47.1:

> 1. There shall be established a Military Staff Committee to advise and assist the Security Council on all questions relating to the Security Council's military requirements for the maintenance of international peace and security, the employment and command of forces placed at its disposal, the regulation of armaments, and possible disarmament.
> 2. The Military Staff Committee shall consist of the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members of the Security Council or their representatives. Any Member of the United Nations not permanently represented on the Committee shall be invited by the Committee to be associated with it when the efficient discharge of the Committee's responsibilities requires the participation of that Member in its work.
> 3. The Military Staff Committee shall be responsible under the Security Council for the strategic direction of any armed forces placed at the disposal of the Security Council. Questions relating to the command of such forces shall be worked out subsequently.
> 4. The Military Staff Committee, with the authorization of the Security Council and after consultation with appropriate regional agencies, may establish regional sub-committees.

• (1650)

The time has come for the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations to be brought into being. Canada should take the leadership in the Security Council to test and press that position as far as it can. There are indications that the United States would not accept it. Those indications cannot be given in to at the beginning. Every international effort must be made to see that this crisis is used to further strengthen the United Nations and to give it an opportunity to operate.

The practical significance of this is that it permits whatever military action becomes necessary in the Middle East to be done so with the full support of the Security Council and the international community. Anything less than that will have a devastating impact on the world as we know it, and turn this crisis into one that will be preceded only in its consequence by the Second World War. That must be Canada's first objective in the days and weeks ahead.

The second objective must be to clearly limit and delimit Canada's role in this crisis militarily. That limit must be clearly stated by the government and by this Parliament. Canada's role is only to operate within the authority of the United Nations Security Council resolutions. Canadian troops will not be authorized to take any action not authorized by UN resolution. So far, Canada is proceeding in precisely that way. If I heard the Minister of National Defence correctly in the House the other day, he indicated that the current orders to the Canadian contingent is consistent with that principle.

What I think the Canadian people need, in fact what the world community needs as an act of leadership from Canada, is a statement from the government that this will continue to be the government's policy, and that Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Peninsula will not be drawn in to any action undertaken by the United States that is not authorized by UN resolution.

We must make it clear in advance to the Americans that that is our position and that if they take military offensive action against Iraq without UN authority, they will lose the support of Canada for their activities in the area. It is an important principle and one which we have to maintain.

Let me quote in support of that position. Mehran Nakhjavani is an Ottawa-based economist and consultant who has done work for The Economist and teaches at McGill University. Mr. Nakhjavani, as I understand his position from a number of articles that he has written, including one in today's Globe and Mail, is not someone who has any illusion that sanctions will work. I hope on that point he is wrong.

I insist, on behalf of our party, that sanctions be given every opportunity to work before military action is taken. Mr. Nakhjavani is not one who could be seen as someone who has any illusions about the capacity of Iraq to withstand the sanctions. He may, if I understand his position properly, in certain circumstances, support offensive military action against Iraq. What he states in as clear terms as I have seen is a position that even if the United States took action, it is imperative that Canada stay out of it. Let me quote the concluding paragraphs of an article he wrote and was published in The Globe and Mail on September 27, 1990:

> The danger is that if it comes to war, Canada's armed forces will be seen to be involved in an aggressive operation against Iraq, rather than as a responsible member of the international community. Canada has always championed the United Nations system, and must not allow its name to be besmirched by involvement in a war planned and directed by generals in the Pentagon or Damascus.
> This is not an argument for appeasement. There is indeed a fundamental principle at stake, namely the right of small nations to live free from the threat of invasion by powerful and covetous neighbours.
> Article 42 of the UN charter was written for this day, when the United Nations could finally come of age and, free from the dross of superpower rivalry, assume its responsibilities.
> Canada's voice must be the voice of reason in the midst of the war-mongering: let the UN direct the military operation. Put our troops, and those of the multinational forces in the Persian Gulf, under UN command and a UN flag.

There are lessons even now to be learned by what has been happening in the Middle East and in the Persian Gulf crisis. The first lesson we must learn is the need to end the pernicious sale of arms around the world. Our troops and those of the international community are facing Exocet missiles built in France. They are facing planes developed and built in the Soviet Union, purchased by Iraq on British, German, and American credit. I do not have any details of whether there are Canadian parts involved in these weapons, but that would not surprise me, given the way in which our industry is so integrated in the war industry around the world.

Our troops and those of other countries face weapons which we have sold to Iraq, which is now the fifth strongest army in the world. This situation in some variation or another could be duplicated wherever we are going to be asked to serve as peacekeepers.

The world has gone mad in the last 40 years in the sale of arms to the Third World, in the development of arms and an arms culture within our own societies and economies. The lesson we have to learn from this is that the world must turn back from a reliance on the addiction and the addiction of arms sales as a way of earning a living. We have to do it in Canada. We have to do it in the western world and in the Soviet Union, which is now obviously beginning to realize the enormous economic and social cost of trying to maintaining a role as a superpower. We must see that same lesson and particularly we can see it vividly now in the lesson of the Iraqi crisis. The crisis that we are facing is the crisis that we have created ourselves.

We also must understand and recognize when we put this crisis into the total global context that there are other critical issues that we have to face. We have to face the issues of a reliance on oil and a reliance on fossil fuels. We have to face the issue that the lives that are being threatened in this crisis is as nothing to the crisis which we are imposing on the lives of children and adults in the Third World who are the victims of poverty, in part brought about by the addiction and cancer of the military arms race.

We must learn from this how the world's decisions must most effectively be made, how to use the United Nations, how to turn to the regions to solve their own problems, how to involve both sides of the now torn down Iron Curtain in resolving issues of international conflict. Finally, we must see out of this an opportunity for a new role for Canada, not a role that says, as the government has said to George Bush, "ready, aye, ready," whenever you ask, but a role in which Canada can be an international peacekeeper, in which Canada can be a voice of reason, of principle, in which Canada can use its considerable power in the world to strengthen the United Nations and to give our children and grandchildren an opportunity to live in peace in the future.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it is an honour for me to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on this motion. I think it is a motion that enjoys widespread support in Canada and in this House and on a non-partisan basis as well. Surely there can be no doubt that to resist unprovoked aggression, to ensure that an aggressor does not profit from violent acts, and to give hope to the victims of aggression is the right course of action for Canada to pursue in the international community.

As we all know in the pre-dawn hours of August 2, the Government of Iraq, without provocation and paying no heed to the civilized norms of international conduct, launched a massive invasion of Kuwait. With an overwhelming force of 150,000 soldiers, 1,200 tanks and some 1,000 armoured vehicles, a force which was vastly superior to any defence that Kuwait could muster, Iraqi forces quickly captured Kuwait City and occupied the seat of government.

Six days later Iraq's original pretext of invasion, which was a claim that it was assisting revolutionaries flee Kuwait from reactionary rulers, was replaced by Baghdad's declaration of a comprehensive and eternal merger between Iraq and Kuwait, an ill disguised phrase for Iraq's outright annexation of Kuwait.

The speed and brutality of this invasion and its utter disregard for the norms of international conduct is the essence of the issue which confronts us today; namely, how we in Canada with like minded nations, members of the international community, can best prevent further acts of aggression by Iraq and compel Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait.

I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, nor hon. members of the House that the Canadian Armed Forces have been used over the years to uphold the pillars of Canadian foreign and defence policy, especially in support of United Nations measures designed to secure the peaceful resolution of disputes and confirm the sanctity of existing states and their borders. Indeed, Canada's support for the United Nations operations in this region stretches back as far as 1949.

It is in support of these long-standing Canadian objectives that our ships and our aircraft have been committed to the Persian Gulf region.

Canada's geography should not and indeed cannot isolate us from developments in international affairs, even when it is a country that is so far away such as Kuwait in the Persian Gulf to which not too many Canadians have travelled or perhaps know that much about. What we do know is that Canada is a trading nation which will be adversely affected by the economic consequences of Iraqi's blatant disregard for international law and its resulting impacts on our trading partners. We all know some of those consequences that we are feeling now.

More important than trade and those kinds of economic consequences, Canada is a concerned, a compassionate and an active partner in the international community of nations, something that has been a precedent for all governments of this country and something that all members of the House can feel very proud about. As Canadians we must recognize that in the 1990s the commitment of our military forces may be required to give concrete expression to our concern for international peace and security.

Much has been written and spoken about the so-called peace dividend. Now that the cold war is over and the superpowers are beginning to work in concert, some people believe that now is the time to reduce Canada's defence preparedness.

Mr. Brewin: Agreed.

Mrs. Collins: Well, I do not agree.

Mr. Speaker, you will know as I do that that simply is not the case. The real peace dividend is that we can now have a greater awareness of the larger world in which we live unfettered by the overriding concern of east-west relations which has been the concern for some decades.

How we respond will be a test of our maturity as a society and our willingness to pursue actively the principles which will promote the type of world community we seek for ourselves and future generations. It is a responsibility that corresponds with our aspirations and our vision of the world. The challenge is to achieve that dividend, a peaceful and stable international environment across the entire globe.

I take great comfort in knowing that the world community shares those aspirations.

The international community, as embodied in the United Nations, has sent a clear and unequivocal condemnation of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. It has refused to recognize Iraq's annexation of Kuwait and is taking such measures as are necessary to enforce economic sanctions against the aggressor. We now have over 25 countries that have committed forces to the region as part of a multinational effort to deter further aggression and persuade Iraq to give up its illicit gains.

This is truly collective security in action, and as a founding member of the United Nations, Canada too must play a role.

I cannot help but feel that there is a sad and perhaps in some ways poetic justice in the fact that it is a modern tyrant, Saddam Hussein, who unwittingly, I am sure, has brought about unprecedented revitalization of the United Nations.

The preamble to the Charter of the United Nations speaks about the determination to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, about faith in fundamental human rights, about the dignity and worth of the human person, and about the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small.

It goes on to say that "to unite our strength, to maintain international peace and security, and to ensure that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest" we "have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims".

I am convinced that the recent actions of the Security Council and the member states of the United Nations are a true embodiment of how its original architects, with the bitter experience of two world wars behind them, intended the organization to function.

Canada was one of those architects. It is entirely fitting, therefore, that our United Nations mission has taken such an active role in opposing this type of naked aggression. The countries of the international community have put aside their differences, both past and present, to voice their unwillingness to countenance Iraq's behaviour by agreeing to implement the strongest UN Security Council resolutions since the Korean war.

I would remind the House that in an historic display of unanimity the Security Council has taken the following measures. It has condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and called upon Baghdad to withdraw its forces from that country. It has imposed a trade embargo on Iraq and made it virtually impossible for Iraqi oil to reach foreign customers. It has refused to recognize the incorporation of Kuwait into Iraq. It has deplored Iraq's treatment of foreign nationals and demanded their immediate release. It has authorized the use of force to implement the economic embargo and has only permitted the import of food into Iraq for humanitarian relief.

But, like other tyrants before him, Saddam Hussein is unlikely to be deterred by resolutions that are not backed by concerted action on the part of the world community. We, in co-operation with like-minded nations, must demonstrate in concrete terms that aggressors will not profit from their callous disregard of the international norms of civilized behaviour.

The nations of the world are being given a new chance to develop an international system to save succeeding generations from the scourge of aggression, to reinforce the rule of law, to decree that henceforth the world community will tolerate only the peaceful resolutions of disputes.

To this end we must from time to time be prepared to support our noble words with concrete measures. Our actions must lend credibility to our philosophy, or the tyrants of this world will not be deterred.

That is why the founders of the United Nations made specific provisions for the enforcement actions under chapter VII of the UN Charter. Article 42 of the charter that has been quoted often in this House states:

> —should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations.

These measures were designed to deal with threats to peace or acts of aggression when all other measures had failed. This is precisely the action taken by the Security Council on August 6.

The government felt that the passage of the Security Council Resolution 660 condemning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and 661 authorizing the imposition of economic sanctions provided a sufficient rationale to commit elements of the Canadian forces to the multinational efforts in the Persian Gulf.

Only hours after our ships departed the Security Council passed Resolution 665 calling upon those states which were to deploy maritime forces in the region to take such measures as were necessary to ensure strict implementation of the embargo. The effectiveness of this implementation process was further enhanced when the Security Council passed Resolution 670 approving an air embargo against Iraq.

If we did not accept our share of the burden in support of such measures, we would not be living up to our obligations as founding members of the United Nations. I remind the House that over 25 members of the United Nations, I think it is, have now committed forces to this operation, nine of them Arab countries. Was it really possible for us to do less?

Can we abstain from participation in a multinational effort that has drawn support from Third World countries, the economies of which are already stretched to the limit? Can Canada shirk its responsibilities when Bangladesh has not?

I submit that it is imperative for Canada to assist in enforcing the ground rules of a new international order. We will have this new order, this new era of peace, but only if it is supported and strengthened by all civilized nations including Canada.

I know that hon. members will join me in asserting that only such an important fundamental cause could ever justify the use of the dedicated members of our Armed Forces.

Canada now has close to 950 officers and non-commissioned members serving aboard our ships as part of the Operation Friction Task Group, including 29 women serving on the HMCS Protecteur. As well we have some 550 personnel deployed in support of our CF-18 operations including 40 women. These men and women are living proof of our nation's determination to stand up and be counted when the deterrence of aggression and the preservation of peace are on the line.

Of course we hope and pray that war will not break out, that the economic sanctions supported by multinational military deployments will prove sufficiently effective to deter further aggression and persuade Iraq to comply with the wishes of the United Nations.

If wiser counsels do not prevail, Mr. Speaker, the House can be assured that our service men and women have the protection that technology and their own professionalism can provide. They are equal to any task that will be demanded of them, and they have the comfort and ease of conscience that comes from knowing that they are serving in a just and noble cause—the pursuit of a lasting peace and the elimination of violence between nations.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in supporting the motion before the House and ask colleagues from all sides of the House to join me in that support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. I will recognize the hon. member for Victoria, the hon. member for Saint-Denis and then the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence. I look forward up to a point to working with her over the next period of time. I hope I can make her life at least politically miserable, and I do not intend that personally in any way, shape or form. I am sure at that level we can work very well together if the past is any indication.

I would like to ask two questions of the minister. The first is whether she will give this House a clear and unequivocal commitment that Canadian troops will not participate in any military action in and around the Arabian Peninsula that is not authorized by the United Nations Security Council. That is the first question.

The second question refers to her comment about a peace dividend. I heard her say that we should not anticipate a peace dividend. Now, I am a bit puzzled on that because I woke this morning to The Globe and Mail telling us that the defence minister has warned the defence industry that financial constraints will mean further cutbacks in the size of Canadian forces.

We know that last month 1,400 troops were cut from the 8,000-member force in Europe and sources have told The Globe and Mail that there will be a further reduction of 5,000 to 15,000 troops, much of the reduction coming from troops in Europe.

I would like to ask the minister whether the time has not come for some really creative thinking on the part of the Department of National Defence and of the government in this area.

We were down in Washington on the CSIS committee and we heard more creative thinking from the CIA than we hear from the Department of National Defence when it comes to a genuine peace dividend.

We no longer need our troops in Europe and the government should be proceeding to plan open and above board for the withdrawal of all troops from Europe. They provide no military service. They provide no political significance now that the CSCE is being developed and expanded, as explained in a very good speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We can move to reserves. We can move to a new navy role because we will no longer have to maintain the sea lanes. That role is going, going, gone. It offers us an opportunity of a peace dividend.

I would like to hear the minister say that her department is engaging in some creative work to be able to assure Canadians that there will be a real peace dividend in the next 12 months to two years.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the hon. member's first question. I think that it is perhaps the first time I have had an opportunity to speak with him in the House of Commons in his official role as critic. He is from my own province. The city of Victoria plays a very important role in our navy and is a city that I frequently visit and enjoy. It is a wonderful city.

I think the hon. member is aware that the mandate of our forces operating in the Persian Gulf is for the deterrence of aggression, the enforcement of the economic sanctions in accordance with the UN role. That is certainly the role that they have. We hope that will be all that is necessary. It would be unfair for me to predict the future.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in his speech on this motion earlier in the House of Commons what actions he would take if circumstances changed that required some other more aggressive role. We certainly hope that will not happen and that a combination of the enforcement of the economic sanctions and other diplomatic efforts, can resolve this issue peacefully. I hear lots of different opinions and I am sure my hon. colleague is hearing, as I am, about the likelihood of that, but certainly every effort has to be made because the alternatives certainly, in my mind, are too horrific to think about, the loss of life, the children, and the loss of the future in that part of the world.

Coming back to the future of our own department, I am sure, as the hon. member is aware, it is a difficult time. We are dealing with several aspects. One, as I mentioned before, is that the Cold War is over and that is such welcome news. We believe the stability in Europe has come about because of the strong role that NATO has played and, in effect, it has been able to deter aggression during some of those years that were more volatile than is the case now.

Canadians have played a role in that united force. It was not a large role but a significant one nevertheless, considering the size of our armed forces. We have always said that we will be there with our colleagues and there is a joint resolution through the CFE talks and, hopefully, to be acknowledged at the CSC meetings in November. Then we can see how we can reduce our participation. I hope that will come about and that, at a future time, we will be able to have a significant reduction in the number of troops in Europe.

We are faced, as a government and as a country, with a difficult financial situation. In our department, we have had to play our role in helping to deal with the deficit. We have taken not absolute reductions in some cases, but in others certainly less than had been planned for in terms of growth in defence spending over the past two years.

As the minister indicated in his speech yesterday, at this point in time our plans are based on only 5 per cent nominal growth, which really is no growth, because that is just the cost of inflation. That means that we do indeed have to be more creative. That is why we are now going through a process of looking at everything we do, at our taskings, at the number of people at the defence establishment review, and at our headquarters operations.

Certainly we recognize that, in the area of equipment, because of the long lapse which the Canadian Armed Forces had to endure, that there is really a backlog built up and we need better equipment. Therefore we are looking at ways to economize more effectively in areas of infrastructure or personnel in order to be able to redress that kind of balance.

As the hon. member is aware, we are looking at the utilization of our reserves, our militia, in more effective ways and combining the total force concept which we have brought to bear. I just announced last week the implementation of a new benefit package for our reserves so that brings them, again, more in line in terms of service with regular force. More and more of our reserve people are on call-outs and being able to fulfil certain kinds of roles. I have great confidence in that; I think that is a very important direction in which we need to go.

We are also going to have to do things better and more effectively. We all know that when there is a lot of money around, people perhaps tend to get a little flush and that is not the case now. So those kinds of reviews are going on and I look to the support and assistance of hon. colleagues who, I know, serve on the standing committee to assist us with their suggestions and input. I am sure they will be very helpful as we try to meet these difficult challenges that lie ahead of us.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): There is nothing I would like better than to question the hon. minister but I have already participated this afternoon. Therefore I would like to be gracious to one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, who was recognized by you, Mr. Speaker, after me. So, with sadness, I will not put all my questions but I will put my comments in a speech. I regret this but I want to be gracious to my colleague.

[Translation]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis. I should like to direct to the Minister two questions, and make a brief comment.

[English]

By way of comment, as the associate critic of defence, as a Newfoundlander and as a Canadian, I want to sincerely thank the hon. minister for her comment and for her personal, as well as her colleagues' support of the Canadian forces, indeed Canada.

I did note in her presentation that she dwelt very much on the mechanics of the United Nations' resolutions and how we responded to them. Personally I found that instructive. I am sure that the listening audience, the public, also found it instructive and very helpful in trying to understand this very complex situation.

I do have a couple of questions for the minister. They are not hidden questions and I do not think they are difficult questions. I will say that I supported the action of the country, but there is one area that I feel somewhat constrained to comment on. I will put the question to the minister and hope that she can shed some light on it.

I say I support the action. I know the minister has supported it. I am sure other ministers and, I would suggest, many members of this House have supported it. However, I am not sure that every member does support it. I think the advantage of bringing this to discussion in the House of Commons, in the Canadian Parliament before we commit one troop or one gun to an action of this kind is very important.

Historically we have done it in World War I and World War II. We did it in Korea. Perhaps I do not engage in partisanship as much as I should or could, but I understand this is not a question of partisanship. It is not a question of trying to get even with the government, or to score political points.

I think that when a country is sent into a zone that could end up in war, as the minister said: "God forbid, blood may be shed and people may be killed", you have to be prepared to do that, Mr. Speaker. The last thing I want to do is try to scare the public, but I do not think there is any member of the public, the 58 per cent who support this action on the part of the government, who would not have preferred to have a full discussion in the House of Commons. The points that are being brought out now would have been obvious to them before the decision was made. However, it is too late for that now.

I would like to ask the minister if she could tell us what went on behind that decision. Was there reason for it? Was time the problem? Was there something else? Maybe the public would be interested in knowing.

The British consulted the opposition. Even George Bush who does not really have to according to his Constitution consulted the members of his opposition.

My second question is this. Does the minister have any concept of what we are looking at in time? What is her estimate and the estimates of her colleagues?

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say the member for Saint-Denis in Montreal is always gracious. I appreciate that.

Knowing of the strong record of service and involvement in the military of my hon. colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, yes, there were different points of view about when a debate would be most appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, looking back at that calendar knowing Parliament was coming back before the ships would actually become operational—there was going to be a significant period of time to get them there—there would then be the opportunity for debate. In fact, that was the first motion that was moved. We had the debate in the early days.

I think the hon. member is probably aware that there is no actual legal requirement to have a motion. There is a requirement in the National Defence Act to table an Order in Council within 10 days. This has been done in different ways.

I recall reading the debates from the time of the Suez crisis. The Liberal government at that time during the debate indicated that it is the role of the government to make the decisions in these instances. Then there should be an opportunity for debate. Ultimately it is the executive that makes the decision.

Second, how long they will be there? I wish I knew. I really do not think anyone knows at this point in time. On balance, one would hope that they could be home as quickly as possible. If it is necessary to ensure a peaceful resolution to this dispute to work for longer periods of time for the enforcement of sanctions to finally persuade what we hope is Iraqi's agreement to withdraw from Kuwait, we are prepared to stay there along with like-minded nations, as long as it takes. We will be watching on a daily basis.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Do I have unanimous consent to recognize the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville for a short question or comment.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No. Sorry. Debate.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member who wanted to put a question will have time at the end of my remarks. As he knows, I speak very briefly and to the point.

I am very pleased to participate in the debate on this motion put forward by the right hon. member for Yellowhead and seconded by the government House leader.

The Associate Minister of National Defence said that this motion enjoys widespread support among Canadians and in the House. I would like to correct the hon. minister. This motion could have received wide support had her government not bungled this process and come up with an all-party resolution. There are parts of this motion which are very good. There are parts that our party and I, as an individual, can support. Let us break it down.

The first part states:

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait—

No one would argue with that. I think all Canadians would give this full support.

The second part of the motion states:

> —and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2—

Our party supports that wholeheartedly. But the associate minister is not even interested in hearing this side. It is typical of that government. It refuses to negotiate with us. It refuses to try to come up with an all-party resolution. It puts in its two cents, and then it runs.

The last part of the motion states:

> —and for the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational, military effort in and around the Arabian peninsula;—

Our party supports a multinational military effort too. But under whose auspices? Under the auspices of one of the superpowers plus some smaller countries which would not get the support of the United Nations? We could not support that. I am saying one superpower or another plus a few countries. But if this multinational military effort would be under the auspices of the United Nations, we could fully support this motion.

The critic for our party has had talks with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I cannot speak for the NDP, but I hope the same talks are going on there. The NDP have an excellent amendment.

Our critic put an excellent amendment which would ensure that we take part in the multinational military effort in the future, providing it is under UN command. Then this country would have credibility. Imagine, if we had such an all-party resolution, what a boost this would give our military forces who are out there and whose lives are on the line right now. Imagine what support this would give Ambassador Yves Fortier who speaks on behalf of our country. I congratulate him for representing our country so well.

I was in the United Nations at the beginning of this year. I asked: Does the United Nations listen to the resolutions or motions passed in the House of Commons? The answer I got was, yes, if it is an all-party motion or resolution. They do pay attention to it.

We had that example in this House right after the Tiananmen Square crisis. We negotiated among the three parties a resolution which received unanimous support and the world took note.

I must say to this government that one does not play Russian roulette with Canadian lives who are serving in the Canadian Army.

Canadian military personnel want to know under whose command they will serve in the future if the conflict expands. The government gives us the answer that it is under Canadian command. Surely everyone knows there must be one co-ordinating command authorized by the United Nations. Then we would give full support.

If this Persian Gulf crisis can be settled without war, if the United Nations and all the participating countries supporting the UN resolutions can force Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait and restore the legitimate government of Kuwait through sanctions instead of bullets, then this will be a victory of all victories. It will be a victory for the great institution, the United Nations, a victory for all the countries which support the principles of the United Nations, but most of all a victory for the people of Kuwait.

I hope that the government has learned a few lessons from the international crisis of the Persian Gulf and from the national Oka crisis that we have had this summer. Lesson number one is: Recall Parliament. When there is a world crisis such as and our Armed Forces are going to be involved, for God's sake, the first thing to do is to recall Parliament if it is not sitting.

The second lesson I hope the government has learned is that it should take all parties into its confidence. It should take the Standing Committee on External Affairs and the Standing Committee on National Defence into its confidence. It should take the people of Canada into its confidence. The government did not do that. If the government had done that and come up with an all-party resolution, then I think the government would have looked good, Canada would have looked good in international eyes, and again we would have shown our leadership as a peacekeeping nation.

Just a little over a week ago we unveiled the statue of the former Prime Minister, Lester B. Pearson. We were all out there from all three parties and we all applauded at the unveiling. Well, we can take Lester B. Pearson's vision a step further and, instead of acting just as a peacekeeping nation, maybe we should go a step further and be a peacemaking nation. That is something we have not heard from the Prime Minister nor from the Secretary of State. What negotiations are going on in the United Nations, in the corridors, to show that Canada, yes, wants to continue its peacekeeping role, but also has a peacemaking role because our country is respected by all sides of a conflict.

As a former educator, I would like to take this debate in a somewhat different direction. We all remember that over a few weeks ago, right across the world, candlelight vigils were held in commemoration of the United Nations World Summit for Children on September 29 and 30. These vigils served as a reminder to each and every one of us of the 20,000 to 40,000 children that die every day as a result of malnutrition and disease brought on by it—be it misplaced priorities of local governments, economic hardships imposed by international interests, or very simply war, wars that are long gone, wars that have been ongoing for time out of mind, or wars that are just begun, all leaving behind in their wake such destruction and devastation as is difficult for us in the western world to conceive of, let alone comprehend. Such is the magnitude of war.

How many children, I ask, are suffering as a result of the Iraq aggression on Kuwait and the subsequent embargoes? How many more will suffer if counter-aggression is found to be the only solution in the Gulf crisis?

I ask this question, not as somebody who does not agree with the actions of the United Nations or the countries who have joined to date the peaceful demonstration against Iraq, but as a reminder for those of us who are in the position to make these decisions that will ultimately decide the fate of the thousands of children in Iraq and the surrounding countries.

This is why more decisions of this magnitude are taken and that extensive and effective consultation and debate are paramount to allow us to explore alternatives, to discuss various courses of action, and most importantly to understand fully the objectives and implications of our actions such as sending fighter jets designed for aggression right into the heart of the conflict. This cannot be done unilaterally by government. Actions such as these should be taken as a country because each and every one of us has something to lose either directly as our sons, daughters, fathers, mothers, our fellow Canadians go to potential war, or indirectly as we become party to the destructive and devastating effects of war.

Granted, the Prime Minister has committed funds to alleviate some of the suffering for the displaced in Iraq and for those surrounding countries affected by the crisis, but what about our Canadian farmers? What compensation has the minister offered them? I asked the Minister for External Relations that after her speech. She said the government does not have an answer.

Has the Prime Minister consulted with the farmers about the extent of the damage they are suffering or expect to suffer as the deadlock continues? No, he has not, although this should not be a surprise to anyone.

It has become astonishingly clear that in the last few years, be the issues domestic or international in nature, our right hon. Prime Minister does not believe in consulting Canadians. I am not sure who he consults to resolve these issues. However, since the United States invasion of Panama, one might guess that the opinion of the President of the United States takes precedence over any Canadian. In fact, in times of international crisis, one may as well look to President Bush for his comments because our Prime Minister's opinions are merely a regurgitation of the president's.

Were the Prime Minister to listen to Canadians, he would have heard the overwhelming outrage regarding his support of the Panamanian invasion. He would have heard Canadians insist on the recall of Parliament to discuss our role in the Gulf. He would have heard coast to coast the insistence that were Canada to get involved in the Gulf crisis that it be done solely under the auspices of the United Nations.

It is an insult to those men and women who are in the Gulf today and to their families that Parliament was not recalled. It is an insult to our history, our integrity, and our identity that we are not able to act independently within the context of the international community. It is a political precedent set by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, a precedent that became tradition, that Canada is a leader in institutions where diplomacy and peacekeeping activities are crucial.

Our party has always maintained collective action through the United Nations as a primary objective of Canadian foreign policy. The United Nations is today the most credible form for deliberation and subsequent co-operation through which we can hope to achieve international peace and security.

We have also maintained public consultation as an essential element to government policy, especially when it involved the deployment of Canadian forces, as was the case during the Korean crisis in 1950. Parliament was given full opportunity at the time to discuss Canadian military options and to endorse the use of Canadian forces in support of UN resolutions.

I would like to stress that when I say public consultation, I mean consultation before or at the time of, not after the fact, as has been the case on numerous occasions such as Canada joining the OAS. Even in our involvement in the United States-Mexico trade agreement, the Minister for International Trade made the decision to sit at the table with the U.S. and Mexico. Now he comes to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade and says: "Let's hear from Canadians what they think about it." The government already made the decision that we are into a trilateral agreement. Now he goes through the sham of listening to Canadians, after the fact.

Therefore, as an extension, the Liberal policy is and always has been in keeping with opinions of organizations such as the United Nations Association in Canada.

The same concerns we express today on this floor were echoed in the statement issued by the president of the association at the start of the Gulf crisis. Geoffrey Grenville-Wood expresses his concern about the lack of public debate and discussion around the role Canada is playing in the crisis. He expressed concern about the recent actions of the Government of Canada as being seen as moving away from the traditional and broadly accepted tenet of Canadian foreign policy, that is working within the guidelines of the United Nations.

Mr. Grenville-Wood also puts forward several recommendations, the principles of which I would like to share with the House. First, that Canadian Forces—that is the ships and the CF-18s—be placed and remain solely under UN command, and that Canada stick by that commitment.

Second, that Canada support any resolution that may suggest UN military observers to the Iraq-Saudi and Iraq-Kuwait borders to monitor and report any violations of said borders.

Third, that in keeping with UN conventions, Canada provide leadership in ensuring that all foods and medicines are delivered to the peoples most in need, especially children—the same children to whom we held the candlelight vigilance.

Fourth, that Canada do its utmost to address the problem of the refugees from Kuwait, if necessary, accepting under special provision those who apply for immigration to Canada.

There are situations in which individuals, leaders on behalf of their countries, should stand up and be counted, as we heard from the Associate Minister of National Defence and as we heard from the Prime Minister on the floor of this House on September 24, when he said that the situation demanded a prompt decision to stand up and be counted.

However, one can just stand up or one can stand up with pride and be counted. Unfortunately, once again our Prime Minister has made sure that Canada stood up only to be counted as part of the United States.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a good deal of interest to my friend's comments, some of which I could agree with. Certainly he is entitled to his point of view with regard to his criticism that Parliament ought to have been recalled. Prior to 1984, I sat on that side of the House for—I shudder to think of it—nine years. My friend sat over on this side for a number of those years, part of the government benches.

I cannot recall one day assigned to Parliament for foreign policy debate for all of those nine years except for one time, and I think my friend for Saint-Denis will agree with me on the facts of this. The hon. Don Jamieson—

Mr. Prud'homme: Maybe I could agree with you once.

Mr. Friesen: Okay. The hon. Don Jamieson, a fine gentleman from Newfoundland and a very honourable member of Parliament and Secretary of State for External Affairs assigned, I think, two or three days of debate on foreign policy in one sitting. It was a good debate. He did it under pressure from the opposition.

During those years we experienced the takeover in Ethiopia. We experienced the scene in Namibia where Canada was thoroughly involved with the Front Line states in trying to find a solution there. We experienced the Argentinian-British confrontation. We also had Canada involved in peacekeeping observer forces in Vietnam. All of those, to my recollection, were without parliamentary debate, unless it was an opposition day.

The Government of Canada of those days chose never, I underline never, to make ministerial statements in the House on foreign policy matters. It took a lot of foreign policy decisions, perhaps made outside the House, spoke at the United Nations, but not in the House of Commons.

Since 1984, we have repeatedly had the Secretary of State for External Affairs make foreign policy statements in the House prior to making them outside the House.

Opposition parties have been given notice of those debates and statements so they could respond. There has been time after time given and statements made on policy in the House.

I am just curious with such a contrast in practice prior to 1984 to post 1984, when prior to 1984 there was almost no debate in this House on foreign policy matters. After 1984, there has been every opportunity for it. What is it that converted the member of Parliament who just spoke so dramatically that, while he was in government, he was not taking part in this. He was not calling for a full parliamentary discussion. Now he wanted Parliament to be recalled for this important debate.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that, sitting nine years in opposition and now so long on the government side without any ministerial positions, et cetera, the hon. member's mind is getting weaker.

He is failing to remember events that have happened. I cannot speak about what happened under Don Jamieson, but I can speak to the period 1980 to 1984 when I was sitting in this House. I sat a year and nine months prior to that when the Conservatives were in power under the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, the right hon. minister.

Unfortunately, I learned in those nine months that that government did not know how to even count when it lost the vote in 1989. I travelled around the world on NATO delegations and others. I can say that between 1980 and 1984 Canada was held in the highest respect because of the clear positions the Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, took on behalf of our country. We were respected.

Members of Parliament from other countries would say: "You people are fortunate to have a leader with such foresight." That is what we have lost. Canada had an identity that the world respected. What have we got now? "Yes, Mr. President, how high?" That is what we have now.

With the short two years that I have been here, I hate to think what this country will come to if it sits in power for another two years. Somehow, I hope there will be an election tomorrow. Let Canadians speak. Let Canadians assess their foreign policy and how far it has deteriorated. If the government sold Canada, we would get some return for it. It is not selling Canada. It is giving it away for nothing. It is giving it away.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question, and I want to link it to the comments from the hon. member for Dartmouth.

There seems to be a preoccupation with second guessing how our forces were going to be mobilized, when should they go and so on. I mentioned that I happened to visit with Janet van Nostrand about her son, John, the lieutenant who is on the Athabaskan. It is just 200 miles from Kuwait.

I did not find that Janet had any bitterness toward the government, that she was frustrated that there had not been a national debate. None of this. She was just so proud of John. She went into another room and brought back newspaper clippings, clippings from magazines and so on of the Athabaskan. She had not a word in terms of being frustrated at this.

I am sure that men and women who join the services never really wish to go into a war or wish to be in any risky peacekeeping role, but at the same time when they sign up, that is exactly what they may be called upon to do.

I sure have a different perspective on the situation than hon. members are putting. Is the hon. member trying to tell us that he has had thousands of letters criticizing the government's action on this? I suggest that if we keep it a little less political, that even had we debated it in late August or something, what would the member be talking about then in a political way: that the ships are not ready, they will not make the gulf, this sort of thing. That problem has been solved. They are there and certainly, as Lieutenant John said, they are performing very well. Have you created your own tidal wave of response on this and are you misleading—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville stop giving fictitious names to his wife and listen to everything his wife says. If he had walked down Main Street in his riding, as I did in Parkdale—High Park, along Bloor Street, along Roncesvalles Street, streets that you know very well, Mr. Speaker, within an hour or two Canadians were expressing their disgust—

An hon. member: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

Mr. Attewell: I want to protest in the strongest terms. That was not a fictitious name. This woman Janet van Nostrand, her husband Dr. Peter—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean any offence. If I said anything that offended, I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

The message is that this government does not have a clear foreign policy. This government does not have a process by which it consults Canadians, does not have a process to work through the standing committees. Why do we have standing committees? So that your constituents, so that someone speaking on behalf of them, could present that to the standing committees and to this House. We would like to hear more of that.

I am sorry, but over the summer I did not hear many of those comments. The ones I heard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on a question or comment.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to just point out that when Janet van Nostrand's son, Lieutenant John, was sent to the Middle East that he and the 955 other soldiers who were sent assumed that they were being sent to the Gulf of Oman because Commodore Ken Summers, who spoke on behalf of the navy at that time, indicated that that is where they would be sent, well beyond the possible reach of Iraqi missiles. I think the record should be very clear on that point and that that is why there should have been a recall.

I just have a very straightforward question for the member who has just spoken. That is with respect to the position of the Official Opposition on the government motion, assuming that the subamendment and the amendment which have been proposed by the opposition parties are defeated, and I welcome the hon. member's support for those, is it the position of the Official Opposition then that they will be opposing the government motion?

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, in my speech I took the House through the amendment and I expressed which parts we can support and which parts we cannot. I also mentioned that our critic is in negotiations with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I hope that the NDP party will do the same so that we can up with a motion that all three parties will support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 5.59 p.m.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

PRESENTATION OF REPORT ON TWENTY-THIRD ANNUAL MEETING OF CANADA-FRANCE INTERPARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report on the twenty-third annual meeting of the Canada-France Interparliamentary Association.

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO GST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this morning it is my duty to present a petition signed by 30 Canadians who are vigorously opposed to the new tax on goods and services which the Conservative government proposes to introduce on January 1, 1991. These Canadians say that the Conservative government has inflicted 31 tax increases on taxpayers since they came to power in 1984, that introducing this tax would be unfair, since it is a hidden and regressive tax, and that it would increase inflation and make things very difficult for Canadians. Your petitioners strenuously object to this new tax which, in their opinion, constitutes an unprecedented assault on the incomes of Canadian men and women, which will not only force them to pay higher taxes but also increase inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians, most of whom live in the community of Sarsfield in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, a lovely village where I have the privilege of residing.

The residents of Sarsfield in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell strenuously object to the Tory government's plan to introduce the GST, and they humbly call upon Parliament to reject the proposed unfair tax on goods and services.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to deposit, for the House of Commons and the government, a petition signed by a significant number of Canadians respecting their disapproval of the imposition of the GST.

They petition this government to come to its senses quickly and to recognize that close to 90 per cent of Canadians across this country, young and old, north, south, east and west, are definitely against this kind of GST tax.

They humbly pray that the government listen to those concerns and to those voices right across the land.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of 100 of my constituents from the Dover area, essentially Elliston, as well as from Catalina, Port Union, Little Catalina, Melrose, and the Bonavista area.

These constituents are very concerned that the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is the highest in the country. They are devastated that they require not the usual 10 weeks that they have been used to over the past 14 or 15 years but require in fact an additional four weeks to qualify for the whole year of unemployment insurance.

Given all the other factors, the terrible success rate of the fishery of Newfoundland this year, the impending gloom and doom of the goods and services tax, and other economic downturns, these constituents are very concerned about this issue.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to introduce immediately the variable entrance requirement without delay so, that they can have their 10 weeks and get on with their unemployment insurance.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway.

They point out that the proposed goods and services tax of the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay.

They point out that the government has not yet addressed the unfair taxation system which places an unreasonable burden on lower and middle income taxpayers.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to ensure that, if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, it must not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Finally, they call upon the government to cease its proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax and to bring in real and effective tax reform.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present today from people in Canada.

The first one is an anti-GST petition signed by people from communities of Lynn Lake, Leaf Rapids and The Pas, Manitoba, from my constituency. They are especially concerned with the effect that the GST will have in being charged on educational expenses and figure skating, for example. They call on the Parliament of Canada to reject the GST and would ask the government to make sure that the GST is not implemented.

In addition, I have a petition from people in the communities of Snow Lake, Thompson, Matheson Island and Easterville who also call upon the government to make sure that the GST is not implemented. They believe that it is a regressive tax and that it will hurt people. It is a tax on consumption and it is not real tax reform. They believe it is not in the best interests of Canadians.

From other parts of Canada, Corner Brook, Pasadena, Gallants, Gillams, Meadows, Cox's Cove, Benoit's Cove and Red Bay, over 395 people have signed petitions against the goods and services tax. They believe it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

Also on the topic of the GST there are 538 names from the communities of Corner Brook, St. John's, Deer Lake, Benoit's Cove, Halifax and Summerside, saying that they reject the goods and services tax. They also believe that it would be an unfair hardship on low and middle income Canadians. They believe that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small businesses. The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition which will be of special interest to the member for Peace River and, if he were in the House, it would be of interest to the member for Athabasca yet again to hear me present a petition on the topic of northern tax benefits. This is signed by people from my riding and it joins people from other parts of Canada, especially northern Alberta, who have rejected the task force report on northern and isolated areas.

They believe that the report issued on October 27 of last year fails to address the realities of the high cost of living in northern areas across Canada. The undersigned call upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the report and develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program, which recognizes the financial needs of people in northern and isolated areas.

I am sure that members from all three parties in this House would love to present petitions on behalf of their northern residents.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the very famous riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I notice this petition was signed in part by people from the community of St. Albert, where I understand there is a very famous cheese factory.

These people like so many thousands, in fact millions, of other Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax. It is a source of amazement to me that, having presented as many petitions in this House as members of the opposition have presented, the government has not already withdrawn the tax.

In any event, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax which, as they recite, is an unfair, regressive tax measure.

The petition itself indicates how this Liberal Party of Canada, on behalf of all Canadians, is strongly opposed to this tax which represents an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians across the country, not just those in St. Albert in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): M. Speaker, I have a petition signed by residents from a number of communities in the great province of Ontario, expressing their concerns about this government's proposal to proceed with the goods and services tax.

They call upon and pray Parliament will reform the current taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and will reduce the tax burden on the average Canadian.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by many concerned Canadians.

Dairy and poultry farmers of Canada are concerned that marketing systems may be in jeopardy due to the implementation of the free trade deal and the current round of GATT negotiations.

These marketing systems have worked well in the past in Canada and these petitioners call on government to protect these marketing systems in the current round of GATT negotiations.

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by many of the residents of Malpeque. These petitioners are concerned about the Canada Post decision to discontinue rural Saturday mail delivery. They state that due to the rural nature of Prince Edward Island, its residents should not be deprived of adequate postal services, and call upon Parliament to reverse the decision and allow rural life to flourish in Prince Edward Island and not decline under measures such as the cancellation of Saturday rural postal delivery.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present yet another petition against the goods and services tax.

I spoke yesterday of presenting petitions from sea to sea to sea. The petition I present today is from people in Sackville and other points in New Brunswick, Fredericton and other places, as well as places in Ontario and in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, these people who have petitioned the House of Commons state that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture and education. A literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the application of the GST. They petition Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a large number of petitions circulated by Rural Dignity in Prince Edward Island.

These petitioners feel that the Canada Post Corporation has a mandate to improve rural mail delivery in Canada and in Prince Edward Island. Considering that the profits of Canada Post were $149 million, these petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to reinstate the six-day mail delivery service in rural Prince Edward Island.

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice of my intention to rise this morning on a matter of privilege.

As you know, Sir, privilege, roughly speaking, constitutes that which infringes on the ability of a member to perform those functions for which he or she was elected.

Privilege also can be breached when there are threats of intimidation or attempts at bribery towards a member in order to solicit a certain vote or action.

Beauchesne's fifth edition, article 67 states:

> It is generally accepted that any threat to a Member, attempting to influence his vote or his actions as a Member, is a breach of privilege.

I wish to raise the events of this morning, Mr. Speaker, and ask the Chair to consider whether or not those two elements of privilege are contained in those events.

This morning a duly called meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport, which was called seven days ago under Issue No. 50, Meeting No. 66, 111090 at 4 p.m. At this meeting this morning not one government member attended. The meeting was called pursuant to Standing Order 106(3). The notice states as follows:

> Consideration of a request made pursuant with Standing Order 106(3) to review the sale of lands to the Hamilton Harbour Commission and resuming consideration of a request made pursuant to Standing Order 106(3) to review the sale of CN Route Canada by Canadian National Railways to Transport Route Canada Inc. and the several other incorporated companies either involved in the sale or amalgamated as a result of the sale.

That was circulated by the clerk of the committee.

• (1120)

The steering committee of the Transport Committee met under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, with government members and opposition members in attendance, and agreed that a meeting would be held this Thursday.

Since that time the chair of the committee, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has tendered his resignation, both as chair and as a member of that committee. That is an important element, but not the significant one in this matter.

How can I and other members perform our tasks on the committee if the committee cannot meet? How can we represent the interests of our constituents and other Canadians in matters such as CN Route, Hamilton Harbour, et cetera? Has Standing Order 106(2) been thwarted by the action of the government members?

You, Sir, have maintained consistently that you have no authority over the internal workings of committees. I would maintain, however, that this morning's events had nothing to do with the decision of the committee, or process in committee, or the adherence to rules in a committee. The committee never had an opportunity to decide or have a process or enforce any operating rules.

It was the action of individual members. Perhaps it was a collective decision of the government members of the committee, perhaps a decision of their Whip, but it was their decision to boycott the committee. That is infringing upon my ability and the ability of others to function as members of that particular committee. I repeat, I am not asking the Chair to consider the actions of a committee, I am asking the Chair to reflect on the actions of individuals outside a committee meeting.

I cannot and will not reflect on the motivations of those members. But I will say that it has been brought to my attention that this may have been done as a method of encouraging me to agree to the 49th report of the striking committee. It has been suggested to me that, since I am the chief Whip of the New Democratic caucus, and since I am charged in that capacity with general stewardship of committees from our perspective, that I might have some influence on whether or not the 49th report is adopted.

I am not suggesting that the transport committee is being boycotted as a means of coercing me into adopting this report, I am only raising the question that if this should prove to be the case, would that be an infringement upon my privileges?

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you review the matter and give us the benefit of your consideration.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on the same point of privilege. As the transport critic for the Liberal Party and the Liberal caucus and as the member who put in, under Standing Order 106(3), that the Transport Committee come together—which it has to do within 10 days on this question of the Hamilton Harbour—I feel, quite frankly, that my rights to do a job on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer, certainly have been violated this morning by the non-show of the Conservative government members.

All members know that the quorum of the committee is eight. All members also know that when the Conservative government members intentionally stay away, en bloc, it basically paralyses the work of that committee. If this is left unchallenged, it would set a precedent that I do not think would be too helpful either for this place.

Whatever the issue at the transport committee, whether it is the Hamilton Harbour situation, or the CN Route, or the election of the new chairman, we can differ between political parties as to the outcome. The positions taken by committee members whether they be on the government side or the opposition side can be debated and we can dispose of the business of the country. That is the job we are supposed to do.

But it is quite frustrating, to say the least, when despite our best intentions and despite the fact that we asked for this meeting according to the standing provisions of this House that, not only are we unable to put forward our positions but there is no business at all.

Quite often you hear that for the backbenchers of Parliament, the greatest opportunity is in the standing committees. We tell our constituents and we tell those who visit this place that, by and large, the greatest work done by individual members of Parliament is not necessarily in that 45-minute daily broadcast known as Question Period but, in fact, behind the scenes, in the standing committees where we cross the t's and dot the i's, in terms of the legislation passed by this place.

Mr. Speaker, I would submit to you that when the standing committees come to a halt and are unable to function and do the work, not only is it a disservice to the subject, but it is infringing absolutely on the privileges of members of Parliament. It is in committee where members probably make the greatest contribution.

I know the member for Hamilton East and others wish to speak on this point. I would ask on behalf of myself and our caucus, Mr. Speaker, that you seriously look at this point of privilege because it affects the rights of members of Parliament on all sides. If ruled out of order, it would set a very dangerous precedent because not only will it paralyse the work of the transport committee, which has a number of interesting dossiers in front of it, but the work of other committees.

I hope that your deliberations on this matter bring it to an early resolution so that we in this place may have the direction of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton East. Briefly.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker. In determining whether in fact we have a prima facie case of breach of privilege which I believe you will find, Mr. Speaker, you should be aware of the fact that Hamilton City Council has already looked to all their federal members of Parliament for leadership.

I know for a fact that the member for Hamilton West was in Hamilton last night, had that assurance and gave the full assurance to the city council of Hamilton that this issue as going to be dealt with under the Standing Orders, which was our full right.

When a member of Parliament gives that commitment to a city council that has passed a unanimous resolution to see the removal of a particular chairman, obviously it infringes upon that member's capacity to do his job if the meeting is cancelled by the non-show of other members of Parliament.

I know, for example, that on Tuesday, October 16, there was a headline in the Hamilton Spectator: "I wash my hands off Harbour Commission. Scott". Certainly there has been a debate in the city of Hamilton about whether members on all sides of the House are discharging their responsibilities and making sure that the public trust is honoured in this particular case.

Obviously that has not been the case. There are some who do not want to do their job. On this side of the House, we want to do our job. The member for Hamilton West and the Liberal transport critic were infringed in that right today by the decision of the Tories not to participate, and effectively to muzzle the transport committee which is taking charge of this dossier because the Minister of Transport will not. So I think there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege.

If you do find this so, Sir, we will be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear by now, certainly it was clear to me some time ago, that what we have is a complaint. We do not have, I believe, a question of privilege.

Ms. Copps: It's a muzzling. It's a muzzling.

Mr. Hawkes: All three opposition members have brought up the issue of attendance. At the beginning of September of this year there had been 1,143 full committee meetings in this session of Parliament.

Ms. Copps: What are we getting paid for?

Mr. Hawkes: If they want to talk about attendance, Mr. Speaker, we would be glad to provide them with a record of the number of times that there were no representations from the Liberal Party or the NDP. The only reason the meetings could proceed is because government members were present.

I would remind hon. members also, Mr. Speaker, because they raised the issue of a meeting this morning, that the normal practice in this Chamber is for consultations to occur to set up an agenda. They chose to go a route where no consultations took place.

Ms. Copps: That's false. They can't proceed without opposition members present.

An hon. member: That is a lie.

Mr. Hawkes: Our members—

Mr. Speaker: There may be a difference of opinion about what is being said, but I do not think we need to be shouting about lies. The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, they used the provision of the Standing Orders to cause a meeting to occur.

My members had alternate plans for the use of their time at the same time as the meeting was called. We had an option; we could have sent substitutes, but in our opinion the subject matter was too important to not have at least a reasonable proportion of regular members in attendance.

More importantly, on what they would like you to believe is a question of privilege, they are indicating that somehow their privileges have been affected because they are blocked. The Standing Orders require on an annual basis, within ten sitting days of the commencement of a Parliament, that the membership for Standing Committees be reported to the House and one of the very few decisions, other than naming members, that lies in the hands of the Striking Committee is to name the size.

Those decisions were made and that report was presented to the House. The Whips on the opposite side named their members to sit on the committee and everything was done according to the rules. All of a sudden the opposition, not the government, blocked the coming into force of those committees which had been reported to the House by the Striking Committee.

If the opposition has complaints about the functioning of committees, I would suggest that the only people, from a party basis, who might have a question of privilege because of the difficulty in committee are the members of the House who are willing to support the Striking Committee report. Those members who are not in support of that report are, in effect, blocking the continuation of committees in a normal, functional and effective fashion. It is in fact those who rise in the House to address you, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege that have the solution in their hands. They can move at any time the adoption of the committee report, a debate can ensue and the House can divide. They do not want to face the House on the issue of the Striking Committee report. That is their choice. The government has decided at this point to leave that report on the table.

It is normal practice in the House for negotiations to take place either among Whips or House leaders when there are problems. The Liberal Party House whip came to me on Monday of this week at five o'clock to discuss the issue. We had a very good discussion that did not result in any solution, but that is the nature of the place. Not every discussion results in a solution, but it is part of a process to resolve a problem.

I agree with my hon. friends, not just in the case of transport, but in the case of a number of committees, that there are problems. That is why the House in its wisdom set down a set of rules for a Striking Committee report within ten sitting days of the commencement of the fall session. That is why the Striking Committee reported. There is no problem with the Striking Committee report in respect to the composition of the House. All we have to do is accept that report and the place can function. All the Whips have the power to substitute. They can change members. It provides recognition for the independents in the House in proportion to their numbers relative to the size of the House. It is a good report.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, if you wanted to get into the issue of motivation, which some members seem to do, those who choose to block unanimous consent for the adoption of the report are indeed the group that want the committees to be in trouble. If they are apportioning blame, do not put it on government members. Put it clearly where it belongs, on those members of the opposition who will not accept the Striking Committee report.

Mr. Speaker: I do not need to hear further argument.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan has risen on a question of privilege. The hon. member for York West has clearly joined in on that question of privilege, and there may be others. The hon. member for Hamilton East spoke and I notice the hon. member for Hamilton West is here and he might want to say something about it, but I have a procedural matter before me.

I have listened carefully, of course, to the hon. member for Calgary West. I will consider carefully what has been said here. I suggest in the meantime—and it is only a suggestion, I cannot force it—it might be wise if some discussions took place. The situation the hon. member complains about is, for whatever reason, at the moment the committee is not meeting and as a consequence not functioning.

I have some doubt as to whether it is a question of privilege. But because the committee has come to a complete stop, I am prepared to at least look at the matter carefully and report back to the House as soon as is appropriate. In the meantime, as I say, it might be resolved by further discussions. I thank all hon. members for the intervention.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I appreciate the Speaker's concern. I appreciate that the Speaker wants to get on with the business of the day in this House. But what I must request that, when considering everything put before him thus far in the argument, he should also be clear of the facts of this case and not to be clouded by the issues raised opposite by the hon. member from the other party.

Mr. Speaker: My difficulty here is that I have the point.

One of the reasons that I feel I do not need to hear a lot of further intervention is that we may get further and further away from the basic of facts.

I have the point and I assured the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan that I understand completely the point he is making, which I might remind hon. members was made in a very concise and careful way.

I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West that, if there are further complaints or arguments that need to be taken, perhaps they could be taken in another place. I think perhaps that is enough discussion on the matter. Certainly, I have enough with which to report back to the House. I know hon. members would want to appreciate that.

Mr. Keyes: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

As I understand it—you can clarify me of course if I am wrong—if I am prevented from doing my duty for my constituents in this place, whether it is in the House or in the form of a standing committee, I may rise and point out to the Chair that those privileges have been breached.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was undoubtedly detained on important business. The point the hon. member is making is the point I have to decide.

It has been presented to the Chair in this question of privilege, and that is exactly what I will be deciding.

NEED FOR PROMPT RULINGS ON QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since we are dealing with questions of privilege, I would remind the Chair that we raised two questions of privilege which were very important and very urgent, especially regarding the right of the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie to sit in this House. Mr. Speaker, I think waiting for weeks and weeks, when there is a major question mark in the minds of some members of the public as a result of this question of privilege, is tantamount to shirking our responsibility to ensure that members of this House have every right to sit in this House, and I am sure we all agree! However, we hope that very shortly you will take away the doubts that were used concerrning the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Furthermore, although at this very moment, planning operations for the Hibernia project are underway, we have yet to receive a reply to the question of privilege we raised, and although the legislation has not yet become law, considerable sums of money are being invested in this project.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I submit, with respect, that both questions are urgent and pressing and are an excellent example of the need for raising questions of privilege, and that any delay in dealing with these questions is an embarrassment to most of us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point is well taken. For the time being, my answer is: soon.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your admonition and, indeed, ruling that further discussion of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan ought to go no further for fear that it might lead into other matters.

The fact is that this point and others that have been raised in the last little while cannot be separated from what I would see as the over-all condition of the House, which I would ask Your Honour to have a hard look at. I do not know when all this started. It is easy to point fingers but the fact of the matter is that I feel we are sliding into some form of anarchy.

I am reminded of a Yeat's poem which, to paraphrase, goes: the blood-dimmed tide of anarchy is loosed, everywhere the ceremony of innocence is drowned.

You, Mr. Speaker, have a special responsibility to protect the House of Commons, where democracy either succeeds or fails in the country. I would ask you to take a hard look at this issue and at every other issue and seize the authority that all Canadians and indeed, all members of Parliament, in their heart of hearts are looking to you to exercise in restoring some dignity and order to this place. If you are not able to do that, then I fear the worst for the entire political process.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might take some advice from our esteemed colleague and simply get us all out of this particular problem so committees can function simply by giving unanimous consent at this time to the Striking Committee report to set up the standing committee.

Mr. Blaikie: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Out of regard for many years experience in this place, I will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona for a minute or more longer.

I must point out that one of the ways we do retain order is to operate under the rules. We are slipping a bit. It is not with any malice of forethought, I am sure.

The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the opportunity that the member on the government side just took to introduce a kind of partisan strategy into what I intended as a very well meaning message to the Speaker and to all members of Parliament is just the sort of thing that I was being implicitly critical of when I spoke up.

Mr. Hawkes: How is that partisan? Explain yourself.

Mr. Speaker: I think under the circumstances it would be wise if we moved on.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am going to relate very indirectly to what has been said. It is a point of order and it is not a point of privilege, and I would invite you to consider that.

Standing Order 106.(3) of this House specifically says:

> Within ten sitting days of the receipt, by the clerk of a standing committee, of a request signed by any four members of the said committee, the Chairman of the said committee shall convene such a meeting—

The point I would like to make is that by the government deliberately not producing members for that, they are are causing the standing order to be breached. The event that is supposed to occur under the standing order cannot, by virtue of the fact that the government does not constitute the requisite quorum. I believe that point has not been raised by other hon. members. I would invite the Speaker to—

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that that point has been raised. I fully understand what took place. If one wants to refer back to the argument of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, I complimented him on the fact that it was extremely concise and did cover these points.

I think this is why we should move on to Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and That, upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and on the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre):

> That the motion be amended after the words, "Canadian Forces" and read:
> enforce these United Nations resolutions;
> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis; and
> That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

and on the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following after the word "resolutions"
> And further, that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I will say at the outset, as the associate critic for national defence, as a Newfoundlander, and as a Canadian and somebody who has had some experience in the events that have culminated in the Gulf crisis, that I am delighted to stand and speak about this momentous occasion in Canadian military and, indeed, Canadian political history.

By way of an overview of what I plan to do in the next 20 minutes, I want to comment on certain specifics of the what, why, how, when, and where of this particular subject. I want to dispel maybe some of the phoney issues, the make-believe issues in this particular crisis. I want to look at the human aspect of it because this is something you cannot dehumanize even if you wanted to. It is an aspect that many members in the House had direct association with.

I see the hon. minister for health and welfare who, indeed, I am sure would share a lot of the views I will mention this morning and expound upon.

Then I would like to in a more macro sense, having gone through these micro issues, perhaps give you what I believe to be an overview of maybe the way we should be doing business in future in consideration of our defence policies in Canada. We have been doing defence policy in both parties pretty well the same way since World War II and maybe this is a chance for us to have a look at this crisis, the evolution of world order, and maybe get some ideas of going about planning our defence business, both our policy and our budget, in a different manner.

I want also to say at the outset that if I say anything that alarms or confuses people, I apologize for that. Certainly that is not my intention. While I do sit on this side of the House, it is not my intention this morning, although I can do it and have done it, to be partisan. On any views that I express, I would ask my colleagues on the other side of the Houses to bear that in mind.

Looking at the what, Mr. Speaker, by way of review, just very quickly, right now as I stand in this House of Commons and if my information is correct as of last night at nine o'clock, we have 1,488 members of the Canadian forces, men and women, in the Middle East. They are deployed in three ships, HMCS Athabaskan, Terra Nova, and Protecteur. I am delighted to say parenthetically that at one point in time in my career I managed to have these three ships under my command.

We have an element of the CF-18 fighter squadron now based in Qatar in the Middle East, essentially from 409 squadron, but I know there are elements from 421 squadron and I believe some from the air maintenance squadron, number one air maintenance squadron and indeed perhaps even elements of the other squadron in Germany, that is 439.

Why did we take this action in Canada? I think it is very important to understand at the outset why we are there. There have been all kinds of accusations made as to why we participated in this. I would like to think of this with a clear and objective mind and the best way I can put it—and I wrote it down last night—is that, in my opinion, we took action not out of national hunger for conflict, but presumably out of the moral responsibilities shared by committed nations to protect the world from a very evil force.

I believe that we cannot remain silent in these kinds of things because peace is more than just the absence of war and its preservation by our world system and world order extracts an obligation.

I am delighted, as a Canadian and as a former member of the Canadian forces, to see that we as a country exerted and extracted this obligation from the Canadian people. We met our commitment and I think we did it proudly and effectively, as you may judge from my comments that may follow.

I would say that that is my opinion, and I would be less than honest with myself and my colleagues on this side of the House if I did not say that I believe the Canadian public would have been better informed and the idea of precisely why we dispatched at that point in time the members of the ships' company and their support force would have been clearer to the Canadian people if there had been a debate in the House of Commons.

I can understand the preoccupation of the government with wanting to get on with it. In fact, the hon. associate minister of defence last night, and I believe rightfully so, in her mind at least, indicated that there really was not time for parliamentary debate. In any case, the debate, as required by the National Defence Act and the rules of how we run this country, would have taken place by the time they had reached the war zone or the defence zone, the hot zone, if you like Mr. Speaker. I accept that, but I certainly would be concerned that had we had a debate in time before the ships reached the zone and had the decision and the vote been, in the unlikely instance quite frankly I believe, then we would have looked rather silly in the international scene if we had had occasion to recall these ships.

I do not fully buy her argument, although I know where the motivation came from. I will speak briefly to that later, Mr. Speaker.

How did we do this? I think we did it for a number of reasons, but how we did it I think is interesting. I have stood in the House of Commons, I have stood in uniform, I have stood on the bridge of my destroyer, I have stood in public forums and, quite frankly, I have been embarrassed by the way that the Canadian forces have been maligned and by a confusion of the state of equipment with the state of the personnel. I do not think it was an intentional confusion. I think it was a conclusion that perhaps had been drawn or wrongly concluded, or wrongly inferred from the logic that may follow from that sort of premise. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that absolutely nothing is further from the truth.

I am referring not just to the uniformed members, of our men and women and their leaders and their subordinates, but I am also referring to the often unsung members of the Department of National Defence, those who are not in uniform and who indeed are, in their own way, and when the circumstances require, every bit as dedicated as the men and women who indeed put their lives on the line as 1,488 people are doing right now, and to their families as well who indeed make the same kind of sacrifices, although it may not be over the same period of time.

I have to make reference—although the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Halifax and members from the other side of the House have made mention of this, but I feel that I want to do it one more time and I do not think it would be too often if every single member of this House got up and did it—to what we saw in Halifax, something that we have not seen for a long time. We have seen the turn to of HMC dockyard and their talented men and women, their supervisors, their management teams. In two and a half weeks, with the supervision and co-operation of the three ships' companies, in fact the ship repair unit and everybody involved in the maintenance, repair, we saw a refit, in this case it was a retrofit of defensive weapons, and indeed the ships' companies.

I remember in one case, the Athabaskan, the dockyard put in 4,000 hours in one week and people were working 16 to 20 hours a day with four hours sleep a night. Over a period of a week, and in some cases longer than that, that extracts a tremendous toll and it requires a great dedication and talent to be able to accomplish that.

I use this not in a flippant way, but it is an order of magnitude with some experience behind it. I would estimate, and I could be wrong by an order of magnitude of 50 per cent, that the retrofit of the defensive weapons that have put our ships and our men and women in a much better position where they are right now in defence of their country, what was accomplished with the total cost in round figures of $15 million in less than three weeks, that had we done it in the normal way we do it, through the bidding procedure and through the procedures that are laid down, it probably would have taken 20 times as long and may have cost 10 times as much.

I think it is a reflection on what we can do when we put our backs to the wheel. I do not think I need to elaborate on that any more, but I would say that every single member who has spoken here has in some way made reference to that kind of dedication. I think it has made all Canadians, not just people from Halifax, not just the men and women in uniform or the civilians from National Defence, but all men and women in Canada very proud of what has happened.

Somewhat later of course, Mr. Speaker, you are aware that we dispatched a squadron of CF-18s. The purpose of that was not as clear to me as it was in dispatching our ships.

However, I do not want to put water in the wine by discussing my opinion on that. Suffice it to say the decision was made and the aircraft were sent. I am assured that their purpose there was primarily for the defence of our ships.

They could be called to defend our ships on a national basis. I am prepared to accept that, although initially I was a bit concerned why we needed to send aircraft. Aircraft and ground personnel are not as easy to move around in the Middle East once you get them there as ships are, Mr. Speaker. You can get them in and out.

The other aspect of this I would like to comment on is we are the 50th in order of magnitude armed forces in the roughly 200 countries in the world. That puts us in the top 25 per cent. In NATO, we are sixth or seventh, depending on how the size of our forces is counted. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we are not 50th in talent, in leadership and in the dedication of our men and women.

I would venture to say, and this has been borne out by NATO exercises over the last 20 to 25 years, that the men and women in our ships, aircraft, ground crews, maintenance squadrons, support forces and in the land troops deployed to look after the low flight missile defence systems, are as well trained as any of the armed forces in the world. I would say that they are among the best, if not the best.

I stand here with great confidence and with great pride that those who are there want to be there. Those who are there are proud to be there. While the business of being away for Christmas is not a very pleasant thought for anybody, it has to happen. We do not have any real indication of how long this is going to go on. If that should happen, I know that they will do it in the knowledge that they are doing it for their country and for the reasons that they joined. They have agreed to support their country.

There has been a great debate over the ships, how old they are and that sort of thing. They are not new, and they are not young. By way of comparison, and I do not mean this to be a minor comparison, I have a Lee Enfield rifle at home that was built some time in the First World War. It is as accurate now as it was the day it was manufactured. Sometimes the age is not the best indication. There is no question our ships are old and the machinery is old.

I know for a fact that there are 12 United States destroyers in the Middle East right now that are older than the Athabaskan. Also, I know that there are ships in the Middle East that are perhaps better equipped against attack by a missile system or super system that the Iraqis do not have.

I think it is important for all members of the House, and indeed the Canadian public, to realize that because of the specific refit that those ships received, because they were retrofitted with defensive system specifically against the known Iraqi threat—Exocet missiles, Mirage aircraft, chemical warfare and the other range of activities that the Iraqis are likely to put upon us—I would venture to say that our ships are probably better off than some of the other ships that are over there that are designed for general purpose threat.

I think one can draw his or her own conclusions from that. I am sanguine that we, as a country, have outfitted our ships as best we could under the circumstances. I know that Commodore Summers was very pleased that he received the kind of fighting suit that he had. While they may all be referred to as a last ditch system, they were found to be effective when they were needed. I refer to the Falklands. Although ships were sunk, these systems were very good.

The other thing regarding the Falklands is that the ships of the Falklands campaign did not have the long range and air early warning of 200, 300 or 400 kilometres that our ships presently have. That was one of the big weaknesses of the Falklands war. This was drawn out.

Our ships do have the mutual support benefit, and they have the coverage that is provided by our aircraft.

I see time is running out on me here, but there were a couple of things that I wanted to mention specifically. I do not want to go through the great list of where the people are from. Since I am from the maritimes, I would want to mention specifically that I am very proud of the effort from the maritime provinces.

In Newfoundland alone, we have 142 members who serve in this force. That is 9.5 per cent, and Newfoundland makes up only 2 per cent of the population. In the maritimes itself we have 621 out of 1,488. That represents 41 per cent of the men and women who are serving, while the maritimes in fact make up only 9 per cent of the population.

I know that in the case of my riding, again if my count is right, I am looking at 45 members from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I want to mention three of them because they have been written up in the newspapers. Their parents and their grandparents totally support what they are doing. They believe what they are doing is right. I think we should take comfort from those kinds of personal stories.

I am referring to Clifford Miller. Clifford is from Georges Brook. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Miller. Georges Brook is very close to Clarenville. Mr. and Mrs. Miller strongly support their son being there. They are very proud that he is there. In fact they note that he made a special move to make sure that he did get included on this force.

There is also young William Cumby. He is a marine engineer. He is the son of Ches and Viola Cumby from Harbour Grace. In fact, his grandfather, Chesley, Sr., served in the Second World War in the navy as well. Both his grandfather and grandmother wish him the best and believe that he is doing the best for his country. I think it is safe to say that in both cases they are very proud of the men and women involved.

You might find it of interest, Mr. Speaker, that the Protestant padre in HMCS Protecteur, although he travels in the other ships, is Captain Baxter Park from Bay of Islands. I believe that is in the riding of the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Speaker, you are cutting me off a bit early, I believe, but I do want now to mention in a more macro sense some of the things that concern me. If we look at this as an instance where the cold war is on the demise—it is not over yet—we see here a basic point in the crossroads in the evolution of international order. I would not have believed this could have happened, that we would have had 30 nations so solid in their support of the Security Council in the United Nations with no vetoes. I think this is a wonderful occasion.

We should take some measure from this, because since World War II analysts have been carefully endeavouring to evaluate the sufficiency of our force in a single, simple defence criterion, and that has been the extent to which our commitments correspond with our capabilities. Indeed the title of the last written white paper is Capability versus Commitment. I submit that perhaps a more appropriate assessment today should include the consideration of the degree to which the quality, size and utility of our forces parallel a more realistic evaluation of future threats.

Accordingly, I want to take this opportunity in the three or four or so minutes that I have to indicate some of the concerns that perhaps we need to look at when we plan our defence budget.

We no longer have the same bipolar world we had before. I do not suggest that traditions of the east-west conflict do not still maintain, but we do not have a world where we have one monolithic communism. We do not have two bipolar powers that always disagree in principle. In the past conventional thought focused on fighting a major conflict in eastern Europe. In fact the main battlefront is now one country, so the eastern front is not what it used to be.

We have new threats. We have the proliferation of missiles and high-tech weapons in the Middle East as we see today in Asia. We have the expanding drug war in Latin America, and we have the unending spectre of international terrorism that we see almost on a regular basis.

In addition to these changes we also recognize that military might, might not wield the same power of influence it did in earlier times. Instead we are looking at a relative power of countries in an increasing complex interplay of economic and military factors, as we see by the oil determinants, which together are impacted by the fragile disposition of modern domestic political systems. We have the emergent democracies in eastern Europe. In fact instead of one nuclear power in the Soviet Union, we may have 15 independent ones, which quite frankly from an arms control viewpoint scares the living daylights out of me.

There are three key developments that we should be concerned about. Very quickly, they are the international threat environment that I just mentioned. The second development refers to efforts to forge a new approach toward devising strategy, and this is the inclusion of economic factors, as well as military and political factors. Third, we have items that concern us taking place in the United Nations like we have recently seen. The degree of co-operation that countries may now be able to have because the cold war does not constrain people to one side or the other, I believe is a harbinger of international order and perhaps an international peace force that we may see in the future. We may not be looking at peacekeeping, as was suggested yesterday; we may be looking at peacemaking.

In conclusion, if I could suggest that we are looking at a more macro, different view of the world today and if events of the past are to be recognized in a positive sense, we have to look at this major occurrence and apply it to our defence planning in the following manner.

For example, what are our objectives? The objective here is to contribute to world peace, to get Iraq out of Kuwait and to make it difficult for it to go back. What this has in a follow-on commitment is open to our imagination. What are our goals? What assets do we have? How willing are we to defend or preserve the peace and at what level?

In speaking to the motion, yes, I can agree that the House condemns the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. It is unprecedented. It is against world order. I can agree that we want the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait. I affirm unequivocally our support for the action of our men and women, the United Nations Security Council, those who have participated since August 2, and the dispatch that has taken place in the past.

I would be very concerned if we were to give a blank cheque for what happens in the future, because in this kind of situation the fear of a sudden escalation is something that I am sure concerns all members of the House. I sincerely hope that before we move into that kind of thing we would have a full, open and candid debate about the future of our Canadian Forces in the Middle East.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the House would bear with me for just a couple of minutes as I have a comment arising from the hon. member's intervention.

As the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception knows, I have nothing but the highest regard for both his contribution to his country while serving in uniform and for the depth and quality of his contribution in the House of Commons when he participates in debates related to the defence of Canada.

As my colleagues in the House of Commons know, one of the practices I try to follow in leaving a portfolio is to refrain generally from making public comment, because I know that my successor has a right to run the department without having me looking over his or her shoulder and without feeling any constraints based on my previous involvement there.

I do want to take advantage of the opportunity presented by the hon. member's remarks today to add just one or two comments in response to him. In saying that I want to associate myself fully with the remarks that the hon. member made about the quality of the men and women serving in Canada's Armed Forces and the tremendous dedication shown by the members of their families. Having spoken to the families of service people who are serving often under very difficult circumstances, and realizing the strains put upon those families of service people, I am very much aware of the human cost often involved in the decision to serve one's country.

I think all members of the House of Commons on both sides of the Chamber would want to support strongly the families and the men and women serving in the Canadian Forces and also associate themselves with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman when he referred to the tremendous contribution made by civilian members within the Department of National Defence.

My hon. friend will know that those of us on this side of the House will disagree with him on his feelings about the need to have called Parliament back early for a debate on this matter. I think he acknowledges that the provisions of the National Defence Act have been fully complied with. The government has made an effort from the outset to ensure that the Canadian people and Parliament were kept fully informed of the reasons for our involvement in the Middle East and also of the nature of that involvement. The hon. member concluded his remarks by insisting that Parliament continue to be informed. I am sure that my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will attempt to do precisely that.

I want to associate myself fully with the vast majority of the content of his remarks and congratulate him on what I think were very useful and constructive comments.

• (1210)

In times like this members of Canada's Armed Forces who daily demonstrate their patriotism and their love for Canada are called upon to make special sacrifices and literally to put their lives on the line in defence of freedom and in taking a stand against aggression. I think it is incumbent upon all of us in the House of Commons to set aside the normal partisanship that exists in this place to indicate that they have our full support as they go ahead. Let us indicate as well that the principles in support of freedom, the principles in support of the rule of international law, and the principles in support of those who would resist aggression, remain alive and well in the House of Commons and remain central to the hearts of Canadians from one coast to another.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for his contribution, which I think helps to fully underscore that point.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. minister for his comments, realizing that there is a difference of opinion in that regard.

Irrespective of how the motions sit now—as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, we have a motion of the government and an amendment to that motion by this party and an amendment by the NDP—I hope that we can put something together because I think it would be really important to the men and women who are serving our country if we could get all-party, unanimous agreement from the House. Whatever is going on should really have the full support of this House. As one of the 295 members I would do almost anything to be able to encourage that and to make any compromise that is necessary to have an all-party resolution so that the men and women over there could know that they are serving with full support, without any partisan disagreement or anything of that nature.

On another item, because the hon. minister did speak about the human aspect, I get upset when I see people trying to draw conclusions from certain facts that when added up really do not portray the full story that was perhaps intended, and intended with the best of intentions if I could add that caveat. I am referring to a couple of articles which have appeared in the media, and perhaps for good reason, but I think it is important to give my impression from talking to families and from talking to people who are aware of what is happening over there that morale is good. Of course there are concerns.

I would like to read three paragraphs written by Master Seaman J. B. Eldershaw, HMCS Athabaskan, in response to an article which indicates that there are concerns among the men and women on the ships, that there is ennui, and that they are upset about the patrols and how much time they spend on patrol, and that sort of thing. As a prelude to it and as a sailor, when sailors are not complaining you are in trouble because they always complain. God bless them; they have the right to do that. As long as people listen to them they are relatively happy. In the last three paragraphs, and they are short—he says:

> Let me make it very clear: our morale is very high. In fact, I have never seen it higher and I've served aboard Athabaskan for the past four years.
> Sitting around and waiting is always boring and this gives us a lot of time to think of things to complain about. The expression that a sailor is not happy unless he is complaining was coined for a very good reason.
> There is always a minority who complain about everything. They are insatiable and are probably responsible for the article in question. These same individuals have finally realized that this is not a nine to five job and was never intended to be. My opinion of them is low and my advice to them would be, "If you can't handle it, get out of the navy. You weren't drafted, you volunteered."

It gives me great heart to hear from a fairly junior member of this force who has taken it upon himself to be concerned about these kinds of comments and concerns and to address them in a very forthright, honest, and candid manner.

I hope that will give relief to the parents, the friends, and the families who after all are going through the same kind of anguish, anxiety and concern as those who are serving are going through.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time in coming, but as one who was involved with this issue from the beginning, as the former external affairs critic for my party, I am very pleased to finally have an opportunity in the House of Commons to say something about the situation in the gulf and the Canadian response to it.

I had many occasions during the course of the summer, after the invasion of Kuwait, to call for the resumption of Parliament and to be critical of the government for finessing the requirements of the National Defence Act in such a way as to make it possible for Parliament not to have to come back until its scheduled return on September 24.

Before I say anything else, I would like to say that I appreciated listening to the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I understand that he had a distinguished naval career.

I was brought up in a house in which one was encouraged to have a great deal of respect for Her Majesty's senior service, my father having served in the Fleet Air Arm during the Second World War. I come from a family with a military tradition, if you like. My grandfather was in the First Canadian Mounted Rifles in the First World War, and then there was my own much less demanding service in the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders of Canada in Winnipeg. I would therefore like to associate myself with many of the things which were said by the member and also by the former defence minister about the men and women who served in Canada's Armed Forces.

One of the things I understood myself to be doing in the military, and I am sure my father and my grandfather before me understood themselves to be doing, was defending a way of life in which people had the freedom, particularly in Parliament, to be critical and analytical of the actions of their government, even when it came to military and foreign policy decisions. That is what I intend to do today, express my differences of opinion with the government about how it handled this particular issue.

There is no dispute about the unacceptability of the invasion and annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. Indeed, the unanimity of world opinion with respect to that is something that is to be greatly valued. I will talk about the value of unanimity and how everything ought to be judged in terms of whether or not it contributes to that unanimity shortly.

First I would like to go back to the week following the invasion of Kuwait, a week in which I was here in Ottawa, to retrace events and show how our criticism of the government evolved at that time. I begin by saying that the government was not, in my judgment, as concerned as it could have been in the past about what was happening in Iraq. This government and many other western governments contributed to the current situation in many ways, through unacceptable silence when Iraq committed acts such as the gasing of its own citizens, particularly the Kurdish population, through helping to arm Iraq during the Iraq-Iran war, and also by generally giving out a message to Iraq—as indeed we unfortunately give to so many other countries—that we really are not all that concerned about what they do as long we are able to maintain good commercial relationships with them.

It was in that vein that the NDP called for the Government of Canada to impose sanctions on Iraq before the Government of Canada actually did. There was a bit of lag time between when other countries imposed sanctions on Iraq and when the Canadian government imposed those sanctions. It was not a long time but nevertheless it was not an automatic response on the part of the Canadian government. We had occasion to call on the minister to do that in the morning, and sometime later that day he did respond and impose the sanctions.

I had an opportunity to meet with the Secretary of State for External Affairs early in that week. Without going into everything that we discussed, I had no impression at that time that Canada would by the end of the week be sending ships to the gulf. What I was trying to do in requesting and getting that meeting was to try to establish the basis for a bipartisan or tripartisan or collective approach to the problem.

It was something that did not succeed in the sense that the announcement about Canadian military participation came after a meeting that the minister had with NATO foreign ministers in Europe, not after a meeting that he had with Canadian parliamentarians about what the Canadian response should be.

In that sense I just want to situate the announcement. I thought it was unfortunate from a tactical point of view that the Canadian announcement about sending the ships came prior to us as a country knowing the outcome of the Arab summit which was taking place at that time. I think if the government had wanted to look less like it was simply responding to an American request, even if it had waited a day, it would have been able to say that it was doing something which Arab nations were doing. There was an impatience there which I think helped contribute to a context in which Saddam Hussein was more able to make the case—I do not think he succeeded in doing so— that this was a sort of western gang-up on the Arab world, which I do not think is true.

I think all decisions have to be judged as to whether or not they contribute to these false perceptions. I think the government being impatient in that way contributed to that perception and in that sense is to be criticized.

I also think that the way in which the judgment to send ships came after a NATO meeting also reinforced the sense that this was the western industrialized world, not so much concerned about aggression, but concerned about protecting its way of life which is dependent upon the consumption of oil. Again, this is not something that tells the whole story about what is going on in Iraq and Kuwait, but nevertheless reinforces a perception which did not need to be reinforced. I think there is an element of truth to that perception but it is certainly not something that should have been reinforced.

The government demonstrated what we at that time, and still do, regard an impatience, in not giving the United Nations enough time to get its act together to put together the kind of real multinational or UN force under UN command that might have been possible. I say only "might" because it may not have been possible.

Our criticism of the government is that it did not really give that enough time. Canada has a special historical role, if you like, at the UN that it could have played out in this case in trying to put together a UN force. We did not need to be there, Johnny on the spot, after the Prime Minister's meeting with the President. If the goal was to deter an invasion of Saudi Arabia, then clearly the American forces were already doing that and the Canadian ships were not required in order to deter Iraq.

If the goal was to enforce UN sanctions, at the time at which it was announced that the ships were to be sent the UN had not yet legitimized the use of minimum force to enforce the sanctions. Yet in a way the government was saved from more criticism by the fact that the UN eventually did sanction to the use of force to enforce the sanctions. When that decision was taken, that resolution had not been passed.

We feel that the government could have, in light of the comments that I have just made, put more of an effort into constructing an appropriate, forceful and certainly military, if need be, UN response to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

I would like to make a few comments about the larger picture concerning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, and some of the things that have been said about western, or particularly American or whatever hypocrisy, when it comes to the situation in Kuwait. I want to agree with some of those observations and I want to disagree with some others.

First of all, I think it is unfortunate that President Bush on occasion has been heard to say, and I heard him say it myself, that all nations who benefit "from the free flow of oil" should be sharing the burden with the United States in the gulf.

I think we have to make up our minds, and the President has to make up his mind. I heard him say last night on the news that this is not about oil, this is about naked aggression.

Well, I think it should be about naked aggression and I think it should not be about oil. But the President himself has said these kinds of things and it is in the saying of those things that he gives rise to the criticisms that he has received not just from non-Americans but from American citizens themselves. They are worried that what is really motivating the administration is not a great concern for the welfare and the sovereignty of Kuwait but an attempt to protect the American way of life, a way of life—including our own—that is excessively dependent on the consumption of fossil fuels, dependent on the consumption of a finite resource.

At this point we are consuming far more than our share of that resource, particularly when you consider that it is a finite resource. When I say "we" I mean North America, Europe and all who are concerned about oil supply. We need to be pushed on this, for it seems to me that if we can leave out the character and the ambition of Saddam Hussein for a minute, sooner or later as a civilization we are going to have to face up to the fact that we cannot continue to consume a finite resource, in this case oil, in the way we have been consuming it. We ought not to be prepared either to go to war or do any other thing damaging to the future of the planet in order to maintain that lifestyle for as long as we possibly can and to hell with the future.

It is with respect to this so-called defence of our way of life that much of the scepticism about what is happening in the gulf arises. People know that the international community did not mobilize to save East Timor from invasion and annexation by Indonesia. People know that. People know that in many other cases there has not been a similar degree of outrage.

I think some legitimate analogies have been made and some not so legitimate analogies have been made. I think the one of East Timor is actually the best as far as I'm concerned. There is an anology between Iraqi-Kuwaiti relations and Indonesia-East Timorese relations. Many other anologies are more complicated because the countries which have been invaded by another country have in some way or another, rightly or wrongly, been in a hostile relationship with the other country.

But in the case of Iraq and Kuwait, and in the case of Indonesia and East Timor this was not the case, and yet there was no comparable outrage. People are right in pointing out the inconsistency that attends this international outrage. But that does not make the outrage wrong. It just means that we should have this kind of outrage all the time when these kinds of things happen.

Those of us who point out these inconsistencies and these hypocrisies are not saying we should not be outraged, we are just saying let us be outraged all the time when this kind of thing happens. Let us have the international community focus itself like it has been focused in the last few months every time a small country is treated in this way by a large country, or by a neighbouring country, whatever the size of that country may be. This is what we hope and this is what was originally intended to be the role of the United Nations.

In this post cold war era, we are at a very critical time in international relations. Will we finally seize and realize the original dream of the people who put together the United Nations and have the UN responsible for world peace and such actions as may have to be taken in the Gulf? Or, will we go from a situation in which we had two global policemen who cut up the pie to a situation in which we have one global policeman left, that is to say, the United States of America?

In this instance, the United States has been successful in working with the UN and having the UN approve many of its actions. To that extent, those of us who are UN supporters support the decisions taken by the United Nations. But it is incumbent on all of us to ask of every decision taken by the Canadian government, the American government, or any other government, does this decision contribute positively or negatively, first, to the maintenance of unanimity in the condemnation of what Saddam Hussein has done? Second, does it contribute positively or negatively to the strengthening of the United Nations?

It is in this sense that we feel any further action by the Canadian government in the Gulf ought to be only in the context of a UN resolution. If things were to proceed to a military confrontation in which Canada is involved without the sanction of the United Nations, and, in that sense, an entirely new context having developed for that military involvement, we would as a country be involved in an effort that would undermine seriously the possibilities for the UN finally to realize its role. We would be participating in an action that would establish, not the UN as the primary enforcer of peace in the world in this post cold war era, but rather the United States.

That is our concern. We hope the government will consider the amendment. We also hope it would be in this way that the House might come to agree on something. The government, in my judgment, has not done this as well as it could have done. There are ways in which we could have agreed. There are ways in which Parliament could have been involved. The government has chosen not to do that, and I very much regret that because I remember the former Minister of National Defence, who is in the House today, made a point of coming to Parliament when he sent peacekeeping observers to Iran–Iraq. He very quickly made a statement in the House and provided an opportunity for the House to comment on that.

Mr. Beatty: Your party said I was wasting time when I did it.

Mr. Blaikie: No, I do not think that is the case at all. We did not think you were wasting time. In fact, on every occasion when ministers on the other side have chosen to make statements in the House, we always indicated that that was the procedure we were glad was being followed.

This is a procedure that could have been followed this time if Parliament had been called into session. Instead, the government chose not to do that, perhaps for other political reasons. Perhaps it did not want to face questioning in the House on Oka, or whatever the case may be, but I think we lost an opportunity which I genuinely believe was there to come together over this particular incident. Instead, it appears that the House will probably divide on this.

I think our people in the Gulf, and Canadians generally, should see this, not as a lack of resolve to do the right thing when it comes to Saddam Hussein and the situation in the Gulf, but as one of the continuing flaws in our political process, particularly in the way the government approaches these kinds of issues. It is not a lack of support in any way for the men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces. It is not a lack of condemnation of Saddam Hussein and what he has done in and to Kuwait. It is not a lack of confidence in the UN. It is exactly the opposite. It is a wish that Canada would do everything in its power to see that the United Nations becomes the principal instrument by which these kinds of crises are solved in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie on a question or comment.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague on his usual grasp of a very complex topic. I also suggest that he has brought a slightly different tone and probably a different plane to the debate that I have followed for the past couple of days.

Some of the things he has said, I suppose, are not music to anyone's ears, when questioning some of the motives of some of the actions. It is at times even embarrassing to hear some of the statements with reference to hypocrisy, but I think most of us appreciate and understand that this is true.

My concern is that the darker side of the issue, if you will, is very seldom heard in this House. I am sure that most Canadians are totally unaware of this darker side of the issue. I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, this is a rhetorical question, but I would ask my colleague why is this aspect not brought out on a more regular basis in the House?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie says is true, although I would think that there are actually quite a few Canadians who are aware of the dark side of foreign policy, if you like, that is to say that decisions are always made for a variety of reasons, but only some of the reasons ever get into the official press releases.

Many people who have been involved over the years in the Canadian Armed Forces would probably be one group of people who would know that better than most. The official story is always somewhat different than the reality. Certainly those of us in politics know that this also applies, unfortunately.

The dark side, of course, is the involvement of the West in creating a situation in which we are so vulnerable to threats to our oil supply, by deciding to have our way with the world. It is unfortunate that it has to be a Saddam Hussein who wakes us up to this dependence. Far better that we should have recognized ourselves this dependence and did something about it. Instead, we waited for people like Saddam Hussein to come along and wake us up to this reality. Unfortunately, part of the reason for that is due to American, British, and other European actions in that area in the past, anyone who wanted to suggest in a democratic way years ago that perhaps oil should be distributed in the world in a different way was not allowed to survive politically. The only people who are allowed to survive politically are either regimes which are friendly to the interests of the multinational corporations or people who are violent and, therefore, because of their own sinful ways, are not to be intimidated by the sins of others.

Of course, the other dark side is the way in which we arm these people. Then we get upset if they do not do what we tell them. It reminds me of the invasion of Panama by the United States. It had to get rid of this bad guy, Noriega, after spending years using him, arming him and funding him. Then, all of a sudden, one day he did not do what he was told and then he became a demon.

There are some similarities with the situation in Iraq. It is not identical, but there are some similarities, as with others ways in which we in the West have operated in other areas of the world, and failed to understand how these things come to be perceived by people in those areas of the world.

I, for one, do not pretend to be able to enter into the Arab mind in its perception of this particular crisis, but I certainly am not willing to uncritically assume that everything that we have done in that area over the years is right and that everything that others have done is wrong. That is to enter into a form of jingoistic politics which the NDP, to its credit, and many times to its political damage, has never been willing to be a part of. That is one of the important roles the NDP has played in Canadian politics over the years, to be that prophetic voice which does not point only to what others are doing wrong, but which also points to what we are doing wrong.

People do not like to listen to that sometimes. They think we are not being loyal or we are not being patriotic. Yet, in the final analysis it is the people who are willing to speak the truth, even when it is about their own country, about their own civilization, about their own neighbours, about their own friends, who are doing the greatest political service.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important debate to be engaged in and one at which the House has taken a considerable amount of time. I think it is because those on this side of the House, particularly in the Liberal Party, and also our colleagues in the NDP, appreciate just how delicate a matter it is to show support for an international effort and at the same time maintain our objective of creating peace throughout the world.

As often is the case, the big questions come in small steps. One is caught not knowing quite where to draw the line, when to say no, and when to jump on the band wagon and support the government and our allies throughout the world.

When the government began its activities, it chose not to recall Parliament. It chose to do this unilaterally. It chose not to make reference to the House, to the committees of the House, or to have a full debate. Canadians, when many are put at risk on ships and in planes in support of an international effort, have a right to a full explanation and a full debate. All international conflicts involve more than one perspective and this one is no different.

The very first step of not recalling the House put this debate in an awkward position for Canadians trying to understand why the government moved arbitrarily and why the government did not invite other Canadians to come forward with their opinions. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the government knew at the time that we had two or three months to get organized while the situation unfolded. We are right now, perhaps, on the edge of a war. It is a very serious situation and this could have been considered by Canadians many months ago.

When the member for Winnipeg South Centre, on behalf of this party, saw this motion, he suggested the following amendment:

> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis; —and that this be sent to the external affairs committee.

If we had followed that strategy, then the government would have found itself working within a consensus and not working within a divided House.

As the member for Winnipeg—Transcona noted, it is very important for Canadians to understand that when the government enters into an international conflict it is done with the support of the House. It is rather unfortunate that as the original motion stands the government would not be able to get a consensus in the House because it ignored some of those basic steps that have to be taken.

Second, the resolution suggests that we be working through the United Nations more directly.

This is a very fine point, one in which there is a great division in the international community. I think we should address that issue very directly.

The issue is that the United States has taken leadership on behalf of the allies. This is the same way they moved in to the Korean war, in which they were able to use the UN flight that is essentially a U.S.-based operation. When we saw this particular activity, people thought that this was very much like other international activities in that the UN is just blessing the Americans. We think that Canada has had a long tradition of making sure that the United Nations grows in strength. The United Nations of 1990 is different than the United Nations of the early fifties when the Americans made their move and used it as a front in the Korean battlefield.

We should be doing everything within our power through our ambassador at the United Nations to continue our strategy of moving multilaterally in all areas, whether we are talking about trade agreements or talking about humanitarian organizations or war organizations. Our support and our future rest in the use of power, not in absolute ways but in very moderate and measured tones. That can only come through strong international organizations. We run the risk, particularly now at a critical moment, of allowing the circumstances to overtake our position unless we state quite clearly that it is only through the United Nations that we will continue to participate. That is in no way undermining the tremendous effort being made on our behalf, that is on behalf of the House of Commons, Parliament and Canadians by our military people.

I join my colleagues who have spoken before me to issue a thanks to them for being prepared so quickly, for finding the resources quickly in an organization very short of resources, and heading out in support of the United Nations effort. We wish every one of them good health. We wish that a conflict can be avoided. We wish that they are able to return to Canada unscathed by the settlement of this difficult problem.

In this context, as we show support for these people in the field, we also have to make sure that the basic support for the United Nations is not in any way eroded. We are at a critical point in the development of world politics. This was alluded to earlier in the debate by other speakers. We have come from a point where we had this tremendous confrontation on the European front that riveted the world. That confrontation was between the Soviet-based countries and the American-based alliance in Europe. We in this House all hope that we see the end of this conflict.

As the conflict is shifted from one difficult front, the European front, to the most volatile front of all, the Middle East, we see for the first time these two former enemies joining forces to attack publicly, and I do not mean in a military sense, Iraq. There is, in this short time frame, a new working alliance. We can only hope that it is the beginning of a new front that will expand, not only for war-based activities but will expand into humanitarian efforts, food efforts, foreign aid efforts and human rights efforts, into other fields in which we need to see more co-operation.

Right now, in people's pleasure in seeing this new marriage on the international front, they are willing to put aside some very basic questions. That is that people are motivated to work together out of a basic self-interest. It is in the self interest of the Soviet Union to have a stable front in that part of the world, and to have a stable oil supply in that area, just like it is for the western nations to have a more stable oil supply. While we have this in common, we cannot let it override the reality that we need to strengthen the United Nations.

We, on this side of the House, have been petitioning the government, working in committees and writing letters to the government to remind them not to let this organization become dominated by American interest and/or Soviet interest because it must be the interests of the United Nations that allows us to continue.

The United Nations is by no means a perfect organization. As pointed out before, the United Nations has turned its back on many very important regional conflicts. Whether one is talking about East Timor or other parts of the Middle East, the United Nations does not move with one voice. Nevertheless, it is functioning in a way that this new alliance gives it newly discovered credibility, and we want to make sure that that continues. Interests change. If you allow one party, particularly the American party, to gain ascendancy without question, then you set in motion problems down the line. For example, the American government right now has a changing domestic scene. The popularity of the president, according to The New York Times last weekend, is dropping dramatically, in part because of the recession which is excellent news for the government in this country, but also dropping because people are unsure of what will happen in the gulf crisis.

There was some television coverage a couple of nights ago about the president speaking to university students who were shouting "no war for oil". If that begins to shift, what does that do to the American president? Does he become more anxious about solving the crisis? Does he become more aggressive in his foreign policy? Does he decide that the battle is no longer worth the principle, or the principle is no longer worth the battle, and therefore it leaves.

For all these reasons, as the American political scene changes, its interests change. You cannot be driven by those interests. You have to be driven by an international organization on top of those interests. You have to keep reminding the government that the reason we were to be there is to support the UN, not to support the United States, although the United States is our longest and dearest ally and one for whom we would show any support necessary to make sure that its interests are protected, but we wish to protect those interests through the United Nations.

The United States is heading into congressional elections and battle fronts become part of political battle fronts. You cannot have the changing interest of a congress facing an election in early November affect the way it approaches the Middle East. Again, we secure the different political fronts by securing the United Nations and the Security Council.

What we on this side of the House ask is that this government does not get ahead of itself. The original motion proposed by the government was a blank cheque. It wanted to say that it had to go in and give support and only give it under certain conditions. Conditions change and we want the government to come back to the House to discuss this with us regularly. I think that is a fair and reasonable position and one with which most Canadians would agree. I am sure Canadians in the gulf who are ready to fight for us would be very anxious to see the next steps discussed in the House of Commons and by committees.

As a result of the concerns raised in and outside the House, we think the government's position should change and be put on paper. It should place all possible actions in front of us and come back here to discuss them before going any further down the line. There is an expression that you can get too far ahead of yourself. I think the government, in asking for that blank cheque, wishes that we just accept its judgment before we have an opportunity to see what the problems may be. This side of the House absolutely refuses this. It is also important to put it in the context of the United Nations itself.

There is an excellent article written by Bernard Wood of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. He raised the question that the most important substantial concern related to the dominant United States role in the gulf effort is linked to the basic question of what the aims and procedures of the whole operation really are and who will set them. Once again, it must be stressed that there is no easy answer. We are in unexplored territory in trying to co-ordinate an effective and legitimate response to aggression by the whole international community. He pointed out that the territory is not totally unchartered because the United Nations does have a procedure. On the one hand, we have an international crisis which was only anticipated in the most remote corners of policy and research institutes. We had a situation where everything that could possibly happen blew up very quickly and the only place that has any experience in dealing with international crises is the United Nations. Again, I join those people who say, if you turn to the United Nations and strengthen that organization, you are likely to be able to build up a stronger history of working together.

There is another point related to the situation that I think should be mentioned. It is that when we were fighting the Soviet Union, and all western nations were fighting the Soviet Union in one way or another, we had a reason, we had an ideology. We knew that these were the communists and we opposed comunism. We knew that we were Conservatives, Liberals or socialists but we knew that we were against the communists. We fought them. But when you have the breakdown of ideology, as they have right now, when you have Europeans forming new alliances, when you have the Third World thinking a different way, when you have the debate in North America changing, people do not have those small, one-line expressions to hang on to tell them what is going on. So when the so-called bad commies join us, what do you make out of a battlefront where the commies are fighting with the Americans? Well, it means that one has to stop and think: what is this world all about?

Therefore, there is the battle for public relations. One of the most interesting developments in this battle is watching the different leaders, who speak different languages, putting forward their positions on an American-based network, CNN, which is watched throughout European and Middle East hotels as well as in Asia and throughout North America. There is the leader of Iraq giving his position, the King of Jordan putting forth his case as to what should be done, and the American congressional leaders coming forward. There is a fight for public relations. The Americans know how to play this game and so, in many respects, the momentum again rests with them.

Without ideology and without thinking through the situation, we can get caught up in that rhetoric, particularly in Canada where there is such a spill-over and we think: well, these are our close friends, that must be the best direction to go. But close friends must work closely together and often close friends, to work together, need a body which provides a forum for arbitration and for discussion that makes any discussion a little more flexible and a little easier.

I recognize, like other members, that this situation is not getting any better and whatever we say today might be overtaken by events tomorrow and that we may, in fact, be into a crisis overnight. We just do not know. We hope not, but we do not really know. As the alliance through the United Nations puts into place its forces, the supply ships catch up with the troops who are flown in, the fuel depots are organized and everybody sits and waits in the desert for the next move, one has to stop to think about people who are sitting there day after day.

The date on the calendar changes, the American election passes, the date approaches Christmas and, all of a sudden, you get people saying: "Well, how long are we going to be here? Are we going to be here for months? Are we going to be here for a few hours? Do we pull back?" Who is going to make that decision? Who is going to sit there and say this has been long enough? When are we really going to know that grain supplies are depleted in Iraq? When are we going to know when the will of the leader of Iraq is broken and what is going to do it? Who is going to take responsibility for these?

I say, in conclusion, that these questions are difficult. There are moral questions and there are military questions. These should not rest solely with one of our closest friends. They should rest in the United Nations. As our government participates, it should be bringing back to this House of Commons, on a regular basis, a report—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I very much regret to interrupt the hon. member. I know he was just concluding. But I believe that if the Speaker seeks the consent of the House, he would find that there would be agreement to sit during the lunch hour—we are coming to one o'clock now—in order that other members might fully participate in this very important debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, there would be unanimous consent on our side. I just want to add one element and that is if the House agrees, we have some sort of understanding that we not call quorum calls or other dilatory motions during that period between one o'clock and two o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member may continue. He has one minute left.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I accept the interruption. It gives us on this side a chance to continue this very, very important debate.

• (1300)

In conclusion, one of the most famous current writers on international politics, Paul Kennedy, has observed that the history of international affairs over the past five centuries has all too frequently been a history of warfare or at least the preparation of warfare. Here we are, in an historical context, in the preparation of warfare.

I call upon the government to remember its obligations to the House of Commons in reporting back to us regularly. I call upon the Canadian government to remember its commitment to the United Nations.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my hon. colleague for such a learned dissertation and for looking at aspects of this problem that we are facing with perhaps different parameters than we have heard in the House so far. I am very pleased to be able to report on this. I am sure his background has given him a different slant on the kind of operation we are involved in.

I would like to pose a question to my hon. friend, partly by way of a comment and partly to seek his views on this particular aspect of it. He did dwell on the United Nations aspect of this particular crisis. As I understand it, if there is any such thing as a model operation in the United Nations and it being followed by one of the superpowers, the superpower on our side in this particular case, I think we are looking at one now.

The sequence of events as I understand it was a model progression. We had resolutions identifying that there was aggression and there was fast agreement on that. We had calls for compliance, for non-military sanctions, and then we moved on to a stronger, more offensive term called blockades. Only if these measures are not successful do we contemplate any kind of military enforcement action.

As I suggested, these steps have never been more faithfully followed and I have been following this matter for a while. The clear objective, as I stated in my presentation an hour or so ago, is to get Iraq out of Kuwait and keep it out.

I maintain that we are looking at a slightly different operation from anything we have ever seen before, because of the cold war and because although Hussein is fairly clever about the way he went about his business, I think he forgot there would be relatively fast agreement on the resolutions in the United Nations by close to 30 countries that they would participate in this peacemaking operation. I perceive with small evidence—but I am buttressed and given confidence—that we may be looking at the beginning of a new world order.

Indeed I think I suggested we may be looking at something that could be the basic crossroads in the evolution of an international world order. Although it is ad hoc, impromptu and kind of rag-tag right now, this operation could be the beginning of a world police force, a world order. Although it is not as well put together, command and control-wise, i.e. under the United Nations auspices with a good command and control structure, I accept that we are evolving toward this.

I would like the hon. member to give the House the benefit of his experience and perhaps to make specific comment on whether he sees this as something that may pertain in a more orderly and more procedural manner in the future?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, it brings to mind that none of us are quite sure right now what is going to happen in the world. We have the end of a traditional conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States base groups. We have the conventional armies being pulled back on the European fronts. We have had long discussions and some new agreements on the nuclear arsenal. It really is a shift between those two powers.

I personally am very optimistic. I wish the Soviet leadership all the goodwill in the world to overcome the difficulties in its economy and all policy areas where it is lagging behind. It just needs a lot of support from the world right now.

As we resolve this conflict— and perhaps this is where some of the academics can help us understand—we will find that the regional conflicts can have the same degree of troublesome hostility that we once associated only with the great powers.

We are dealing with Iraq which has not only the capabilities of a large and well trained army that has survived a seven-year fight with Iran, but it also has chemical warfare. It may have long-range missiles. We do not think it has access to a nuclear arsenal and we certainly hope that it does not have access to it. However, the potency of that force compared to what we would have seen in the fifties and sixties has changed dramatically.

As we resolve a large conflict on one front, we turn around and face the Middle East. The Middle East is not only going to involve the Iraq-Kuwait border, but it is also going to involve other border fronts. Of course that is why a peace plan and a Middle East committee was suggested. I think that that should be supported by all members of the House.

The fact that these 30 nations are working together and the fact that each step has been going along very carefully and in a very controlled manner is testimony to just how determined the leadership of all these countries is to make sure that this is a successful venture.

Then we go down the line and we have to come to some very critical decisions. How are we going to come to the conclusion that the blockade is not working? Who makes that decision? Once that decision is made and if the answer is that it has not worked, who makes the next decision? Once that decision is made, who implements it?

Those are very important questions. I think the member is right in asking me to address those matters and to give them some thought.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I listened with care to the hon. member's statement. I know he has given a great deal of thought to this issue, having worked with him on the Standing Committee on Human Rights in the past and in particular on the subcommittee on international human rights.

I would just like to seek clarification from the hon. member with respect to his position on the resolution which is before the House. There is a resolution before the House now. There is an amendment and a subamendment. Is it his intention to support that resolution or not if the amendment fails?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. I too enjoyed the collegiality we shared on the human rights committee in addressing many issues.

This is one of the most important debates that we can have because we are looking at questions that not only deal with the immediacy of the Iraq-Kuwait-United Nations conflict but also deal with some very basic questions about the UN.

When I was listening to his question, I was thinking of the point that it is not only dealing with what the Middle East looks like today but what we are going to do when this conflict is over. For example, if we are successful in the blockade and Kuwait is restored, are we going to leave Kuwait as a battleground for Iraq to come into again? Are we going to leave it as one of the most undemocratic regimes in the area? Or, are we going to try to show some leadership and say: now that we have the UN involved with this war preparation task what are we going to do post-war? What are we going to do if we have a peaceful settlement? What are we going to do if we do not have a peaceful settlement?

Again the UN plays an important role because as we move into resolution of a conflict we have to be prepared for the other side. This particular resolution is just the beginning of a debate. I am interested to see what contributions the government continues to make and how it receives the amendments put forward by this party. Of course the hon. member's party has put forward some interesting amendments, and the total package represents a very interesting way of approaching this particular problem and shows consensus.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first time I have spoken in the House—and I have been here for nearly 20 years—in which I see in front of me one other member. Anyway, because it is the lunch hour—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There was agreement that other members would be out for lunch. I hope the hon. member would not bring attention to it.

Other members are either in the lobby or watching the member on television, so it is not a question of them not being here because of the lunch hour. The hon. member is a long-time member and knows that he should not reflect on who is here and who is not here.

• (1310)

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comment. It was not meant to be a criticism. It was more of a humourous remark, but I withdraw that statement. I know the quality in the audience is absolutely superb.

The issue under debate has been with us for only a couple of months, but in retrospect one has almost to state at the outset it was inevitable that a major military confrontation would erupt in the Middle East at some-time, whether it was last summer, this fall or this winter, because there are so many serious problems that have gone unsolved in that part of the world for so long.

What we see in Iraq with Saddam Hussein is not the only issue in the Middle East. I want to refer to at least one other issue that has been crying out for a solution for a long time.

On August 2, certainly the world was shocked, angered and saddened at this very sudden military seizure by direct action and direct force of the independent state of Kuwait. All those—and certainly this House—who believe in and support democratic institutions and the peaceful evolution of our societies condemn this military move out of hand.

By way of introduction I cannot help but reflect on the bitter ironies that are so apparent in what is going on in the Middle East and in the gulf. Indeed reference has already been made to the seven or eight long years during which Iraq was engaged in a war with its neighbour Iran, yet during all those years and for years prior to that war virtually every permanent member of the Security Council lined up to sell weapons to both sides in that war: Iran and more particularly Iraq. Today we are reaping the whirlwind of that tragic misjudgement on the part of both the arms industries and the international community.

It is more than just mildly ironic that all of a sudden the United States, the United Kingdom, China,and the Soviet Union, to mention only a few, are wringing their hands and saying "good God, what has happened in the Middle East", when for years and years they sold arms and highly sophisticated weaponry to the state of Iraq. They have built up Saddam Hussein's military to the point where he has become a threat, not only in the gulf but in the entire Middle East. That is just not good enough.

We also have a situation where all of a sudden we have discovered that the Security Council should take direct action because one state has been militarily seized by another. I agree with that action and those resolutions, but I would like to know why even to this day Canada and the United States, the United Kingdom, France and so on, have not come to the rescue of the Palestinians.

After all, the UN passed resolution 242 calling on the state of Israel as an occupying military force to withdraw from the west bank. At the time of the military takeover in 1967, at the end of that war, even with the UN resolution that was not one gun, not one tank, not one plane from the United States, France, the United Kingdom, or Canada. I did not hear any parliamentarians on the government side in those days stand up and say that we were calling for a Security Council resolution that would send an international police force to the west bank to make certain that peace was maintained and that the sovereignty of the west bank would revert to the Palestinians. There is more irony as well in that lack of initiative on the part of the western powers and in the Security Council. Could it be, Mr. Speaker, that the major difference is because there is oil at stake in this gulf crisis and there is no oil to be found on the West Bank or in the State of Israel for that matter. Well, one wonders.

We also have to look at another irony. Even though the State of Kuwait was forcefully and militarily taken over and is being pillaged and raped today, it seems somewhat ironic that we are rushing to its aid. Indeed, some are even suggesting that we use direct military force now to re-establish the emirate in a country that is not democratic, has no intention of democratizing itself, and which has refused consistently over the years to spend appreciable amounts of money from their great oil profits to help the poorer Arab nations in the Middle East. And the same could be said for Saudi Arabia.

Yet all during the Iraq-Iran war, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait egged on Iraq and Iran, hoping that they would both knock each other out as major nations and threats to their very rich oil fields in the gulf. That is another irony that I find very difficult to come to grips with.

Notwithstanding the bitterness of those ironies, we have to face them head on, and be as honest as we possibly can. I am convinced, as are a majority—I think everyone in this House—that the Security Council made the right moves at first. They have attempted by peaceful means to put in place a series of resolutions with a blockade, an embargo, economic sanctions and so on, and have given the right to use minimum force to those multinational forces now present in Saudi Arabia and in the gulf states in order to enforce those resolutions. This is as it should be. This is a peaceful approach being taken, to try to disengage Saddam Hussein and his Iraqi forces from their occupation in Kuwait.

Much more is at stake here than simply getting Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. What is at stake here, I offer by way of argument, is really the future peacekeeping capability of the United Nations: we must be prepared to give sanctions the length of time they need in order to work. I know that means great suffering on the part of the military forces that are out there in that heat and with winter coming on, the extreme cold in the desert, the discomfort, and the cost.

Nonetheless if we jump the gun, if we decide, or the United States decides—and this is one of the problems with the command at this time—it can no longer politically hack it, if it finds out that too much pressure is being built up at home with the mid-term elections coming on, with the rising costs of oil and fuel, with the problems that it seems to have when it is engaged in a protracted war, that opposition develops and the country becomes fractured. There is a lot of internal political and social upheaval and strife as we saw in the Vietnam years.

This might all lead the U.S. command to jump the gun and move militarily into Kuwait before sanctions and the embargo and the blockade have had enough time to take effect. Time is of the essence because it will take a long time. No one has ever said that blockades can be accomplished within a matter of weeks or indeed months. We may be talking in terms of years in order to bring Saddam Hussein peacefully, without military intervention, to his knees, keeping in mind that all this time he remains extremely popular because of the sort of siege mentality that always grips a populace whose country has sort of taken on the world.

One of the worst things we could do is to go in with a so-called surgical strike and, for example, bomb Baghdad. Bombing cities has never proven to be a method of defeating the enemy. I can assure you it did not happen in World War II. We bombed Berlin and Frankfurt and Stuttgart night after night, virtually year after year in the last three years of the war. Yet Germany's determination not only to prosecute the war but to produce in order to prosecute the war, their patriotism and determination to go on was stronger in the latter days of the war than it was at the beginning of the war. The same thing can be said about North Vietnam, the more the Americans bombed the north, the more resolute the North Vietnamese were to carry out and prosecute the war.

I hope the United States has not determined that by a fast surgical strike it can some how bring the Iraqis to their knees because I do not think historical fact is on their side, quite the opposite. We are not dealing with a Panama here. We are not dealing with a Granada. I suppose if you like war, that is the kind of war you like to fight, you go in in the morning and you are back home at night. Maybe that is a slight exaggeration, but nonetheless that is what happened more or less in those two American military operations.

We have to give sanctions a chance. That means a war of nerves. It means a tremendous financial cost to the United States. I think that its allies should be prepared to pay a much greater share of that cost as the period of sanctions and embargo continues to develop. It is very important.

If we precipitately decide that the time has come, that we cannot control the situation without going to war, and we strike and go to war, then we have defeated the United Nations, we have defeated the Security Council. We have said to the world that peacemaking and peacekeeping and pressures through the Security Council, through the United Nations do not work and therefore it is back to gunboat diplomacy, whether it is with CF-18s or with frigates. That is what is at stake here. We have to make it abundantly clear to all other would-be aggressors that the peaceful world, those who believe in the rule of law and peaceful evolution, are prepared to pay the cost of waiting out this long period of blockade.

We know that in the United States President Bush is under tremendous pressure to go in militarily and sort of clean the whole thing up. I understand that he was confronted by experts in the Pentagon, not long ago, who in response to a question by him informed him that in their best judgment direct military action would cost the United States a minimum of 20,000 lives, that is military personnel, with an upper figure as high as 35,000. When one considers that in all of the Vietnam war, horrible as that war was, I believe the Americans lost 54,000 dead, the United States at this point could lose between 20,000 and 35,000 of its young pilots, soldiers and sailors within a matter of weeks.

Let there be no mistake, aircraft are important, aircraft can do a lot of damage. The navy is there to maintain the blockade but when you go to war, Mr. Speaker, you go to war primarily with one component and that is a ground force. You have got to acquire and hold land. That is what war is about. It has never changed. In hundreds of years it has never changed. You have to put foot soldiers, tanks, armoured personnel carriers and artillery in place and you have to move them. Anybody who has been in that part of the world, and I was there a few years ago, has seen the terrain on which these soldiers would be asked to fight. It becomes a horrendous challenge, particularly if the troops are unfamiliar with the kind of ground warfare and topography in that part of the world, whether it be the in the heat of summer or the cold of winter.

Having heard those grim statistics, the question apparently was then asked, "What about non-military casualties?" The figure there goes to a quarter of a million within a few days. We are not talking about a Granada here, we are not talking about a Panama. We are talking about a full scale war. That is all the more reason I suggest this government has moved rather precipitately so far in dispatching the two frigates, the supply ship and now the 18 CF-18s to the Middle East before a UN command was put in place.

That is what we would like, that is what we are holding out for, and that is why we are not going to support the main motion. We do not want Canadian forces actively engaged in military operations unless the entire operation is under UN command. That is where it should be.

No one country and no one political problem within a country or set of political pressures should dominate the major decisions being made, or that will be made, in the gulf. That is why I said a moment ago that I would hope that we would hold back.

The blockade is in place and Saddam Hussein knows that he cannot make a move and go beyond where he is. Incidentally he is beginning to feel the effects of that blockade. Just this morning on the radio news it was announced that yesterday in Baghdad the government called upon not only the civilians but the military to get involved not in military activity this time but in crop production and crop harvesting.

It said that Saddam Hussein has called upon the people to put up with less, to get by with less during this period of sanctions and embargoes. The Iraqi people are beginning to feel the ill-effects not in their extremity, certainly not yet. That will take weeks and months, but we can see some light at the end of the tunnel.

Even though Saddam Hussein may be a fanatic and his populous may be 100 per cent behind him or 100 per cent fearful of opposing him, let us not underestimate human nature. If the situation domestically reaches a point where the suffering outweighs the possible benefits of patriotism to the leadership of Iraq, there will be internal problems in that country that he will have to deal with.

I urge our government to put pressure on the Security Council, on Washington and on the other capitals of Europe, particularly the United Kingdom and encourage the Soviet Union to first of all put in place a UN command so that it is an international force in all its aspects. It will be a UN decision if and when direct action is necessary. I think that is extremely important.

There is one other point that I do not think we should totally overlook. I know that, since Neville Chamberlain and the age of appeasement, those who tend to be hawkish as well as others are harking back to those years and saying that Neville Chamberlain should have put Hitler in his place in the 1930s. Even before Chamberlain, when Stanley Baldwin was Prime Minister, the Germans retook the Rhineland and later the Anschluss with Austria, the takeover of Czechoslovakia and finally with the invasion of Poland, there would not have been a World War II. Those are one of the great ifs in history.

There is one school of thought that says that Neville Chamberlain actually understood Hitler better than Churchill did and that Neville Chamberlain knew that absolutely nothing would stop Hitler, and therefore had to beg for time in the final analysis.

We may be confronted with the same kind of situation here. We do not know. At least up until this point it might be worthwhile, not as a major thrust politically or diplomatically, but to start looking for some kind of reasonable compromise.

The reason I introduce this at the end of my remarks is this. Let us look very briefly at the history of the situation. Iraq at one time did have access to the gulf. Kuwait at one time was part of Iraq. Iraq is a major oil producing nation that should have a port on the gulf but does not have one and lost Kuwait back in 1923.

The point I am getting at is this. If all Saddam Hussein wants in the final analysis is that port, I leave it then to the political experts, the heads of state and the military to draw a reasonable conclusion from that possible compromise, keeping in mind that up to 35,000 American young men and women could lose their lives in a matter of days, certainly weeks, and that 250,000 civilians at a minimum could die as well.

Mr. Speaker, I will not be supporting the motion. Hopefully, the United Nations will eventually set up a command. Hopefully, it will be an entirely UN peacemaking-peacekeeping force. Hopefully, we will give sanctions the length of time that is needed in order to be effectively applied, so that we can avoid the war that is possibly quite imminent.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attentiveness to my hon. colleague and, while I certainly respect and appreciate the comments he has made, it worries me to talk about bombing airports and a quarter of a million civilians. The very thought of war at this particular point in time is there. It is part of the baggage, if you like, of the kind of business we are involved in. I think everybody involved is aware of that.

But I would like to spend a little bit more time in measuring the effect of the embargo's bite. I have done some work on this and I would like to share it with the House.

I would start by saying that it was about a month ago that Saddam Hussein was saying that the children of Iraq are dying because they are being deprived of their food, milk, and medicine. With the embargo then only five weeks old, his charge certainly seemed extremely dubious. The reports from the intelligence community and the diplomats in the area reported, despite the line-ups at the bakeries and the preparations for rationing, no staples had disappeared from the shelves.

To address the hon. member's point, precisely when the economic pressure will begin to hurt, and whether or not it will force Saddam to pull out of Kuwait as the United Nations demand becomes bigger and the Gulf confrontation becomes more spectacular in his eyes, are very good questions.

We are aware that Iraq has one main business, one main export, and it earns all its foreign exchange by selling oil abroad. It imports three-quarters of its food and much of its manufactured goods. Therefore, the economic sanctions are likely to hit them fairly hard, but over what period of time and how self-sufficient can they be? I think this is worthwhile spending a few moments on.

Analysts, like economists, have different assumptions and look at different things, but they have different estimates of how long the food supplies might last. Most of them agree that no Iraqi should be malnourished—that is, to feel the effects of starvation—for at least one year.

There are certain aspects that I think are worthwhile mentioning here. First, this year Iraq had a bumper crop of wheat. Generally it is sufficient in fruits, vegetables, and the staples of the diet that keep people healthy. It is expected that they can go on for a year.

There was a bit of a loophole in the Security Council resolution imposing the embargo and there was some reference made to the humanitarian aspects. I believe that human rights aspect is still being discussed. What is humanitarian is sometimes different for one than it is to the other. I am going to skip over that and look at another aspect here.

Iraq's economy, I think it is safe to say, is only semi-developed and it is likely to grind on in other aspects rather than food for about nine months, according to the general analysis. The need for imported clothing and household appliances is not pressing at this point in time. As the shortage of spare parts becomes acute, water and power supplies will only gradually begin to decline. When a generator breaks down, if there is not a spare part then there will be problems with water and electricity.

There is scope for some flexibility in their self-contained economy, but not very much. There is not a manpower problem. One of the greatest assets that Saddam has, of course, is his one million man military machine and it is not likely to fade away in the immediate future. In addition, from a military aspect, they have stockpiled conventional weapons and spare parts and they continue to assemble the exotic ones. I am referring to here the missiles and the chemical weapons which are a formidable threat. I pray to God that they do not even consider some of the implications of that. They are reasonably well stocked with parts and ammunition, but if a shooting war breaks out the consumption will be at a fantastic rate.

The key question, at least the analyses agree, is how long the foreign exchange will last. The higher estimates put Saddam's reserves at between $10 billion and $12 billion and last year the country spent more than $17 billion on imports. Although they will have to buy what they can this year, the cost of the embargo breaking will increase and the money will eventually run out.

One way or another the sanctions calculations seem to come back to the same timeframe, from six months to about a year. If the international coalition holds together that long, and there is every indication that at least at this point in time after about 10 weeks that it is holding up, Saddam should be hurting pretty badly.

The key question then is, will he withdraw from Kuwait or would he push on to a violent attack. He has got a lot of credibility to guard. He has got a lot of credibility to protect. When he gets in the corner, is he going to give up or is he going to pull the plug? That is a good question. Really whether or not the embargo is successful, or whether or not it is an alternative to war it is still possible, but let us hope that we can continue in the six-month to one-year timeframe and, at every possible opportunity, every second if necessary and through the United Nations or any other body, try to seek a peaceful means to this difficult situation in the world that we have ourselves in.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend and colleague for his very relevant information and his remarks.

I can only add, and I think he would agree, that it is pretty difficult to gauge ahead of time the actions of a madman. I am not suggesting that Saddam Hussein at this time is clinically insane, but if pushed to the wall, as it were, what would he do as a fanatic on his way down? How many he would take with him? What drastic extreme actions would he take? It is true, he does have some chemical weapons. He may have nerve gas. His missiles apparently are not very accurate and by extending their range they are even less accurate than they were. For example, he could aim the Scud B at Israel and probably miss within 100 kilometres. It is difficult.

There may be a loss of life and that would be tragic. There is no question about it. As I say, I do not think there is any guarantee, now that he has built himself up to this level of armament, now that he is in Kuwait, and now that he is in total control of his situation, even though the economy will begin to suffer, that we can in any way anticipate what he will do. As long as we are there, as long as the blockade is in effect, as long as hopefully by then a United Nations command has a tremendously effective military at its disposal if necessary, and as long as Saddam Hussein knows that he is at the end of the road, that he cannot go any further and that he has got to build down, I think that is all we can hope for.

Hopefully, as my friend has pointed out, when the sanctions really begin to bite, some sense may come into his position and he may indeed then attempt to bargain for some kind of, I will not say compromise, but certainly some end to the stalemate.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, through the years in history we have seen all kinds of dictatorships and we have seen all kinds of efforts to overcome them.

The League of Nations was a great attempt to try to overcome the problems between the two world wars. That organization failed because the stronger nations of the world failed to support it. We saw the consequences of that through six years of horrible war in World War II.

It brings to light another point about Saddam Hussein and Iraq. When he moved to take over Kuwait on August 2, it was an act of international aggression probably more serious than we have seen in 15 years. The question is, are we going to allow this to happen or are we going to take action?

The hon. member for Brant talked about what might have happened in Europe, when Hitler moved into Czechoslovakia and the other countries, if nations at that time should have opposed him. What would the result have been? We all know that at that time the western free countries were not prepared to hold a great war because they did not have the equipment. When World War II broke out, Britain almost collapsed. It had very few weapons and Canada was the first country to send a major contingent to help.

What I want to point out is this. We will have more Saddam Hussein in world history. It will not stop here. It is the old adage that people who think that we do not need a good solid military force in the free world are just dreaming. We have to be prepared to defend freedom at any time. There is no way in a free and democratic country that force will be used for dictatorial purposes. In Canada, for example, we have had Canadian Forces playing a part in peacekeeping between Iran and Iraq. We are already very educated about the situation there. We have had peacekeeping in Korea and in parts of Africa. Canadians are professional peacekeepers.

In the Persian Gulf we have Saddam Hussein who came forward with a strong army, a fairly strong air force, and chemical weapons which we have not seen used in major warfare since World War 1. All these inhumanities are coming to the fore once again. He is not just a dictator. He is worse than that. We see blatant dictatorship, blatant nationalism and greed on the part of the Iraqi leader and greed is what prompts dictators to move.

On August 2, when Saddam Hussein moved into the oil-rich emirate of Kuwait, the world was suddenly faced with a dilemma. If there is one thing that has been brought to the fore, it is whether or not we should look seriously at reforming the speed at which the United Nations may act under such circumstances. It has always been Canada's position to be peacekeepers under the command of the UN, to unite with other nations to maintain peace, and to maintain international boundaries where there is aggression, but to do it under the flag of the United Nations.

In this case, Canada can back up the resolutions already passed by the United Nations, but we want to see this become a UN force. It is very important, not just for Canada's national policy, what our national policy should be, and that it should be practised, but it is also very important for the years to come. When another fracas break out, nations will say that they will go to war and set up blockades. That is fine, but they will be doing it on their own.

Every time we do that in international affairs in today's world context, we are not doing it under the guise of a United Nations effort and the United Nations mandate. We are weakening the United Nations when we make these acts against other countries without UN mandate. In some cases, you have to move with speed. I think that the nations of the world, having been signatories to the United Nations when it was founded, have to review the speed and the operations with which the UN can operate in times of crisis. In today's world, where you have the speed to handle such things as new technology and communications, things are going to happen overnight and we are going to have the political and the diplomatic machinery to tackle it.

The next thing we are going to have to tackle is that never again in Canadian history should a Prime Minister send our troops and ships to a virtual war zone and assign them to a command outside the United Nations, even though they are under Canadian command. We understand that. They are still in there as a multiforce and they were assigned there not as a United Nations partner but indeed, as a national group.

The Prime Minister refused to call this Parliament together. That is a dictatorial attitude that cannot be accepted in a free country such as Canada. He did not recall Parliament until the date that it was supposed to return anyway. During the summer we had the Iraq crisis on August 2, and the Oka problem was going on in Quebec. These are serious issues and Parliament was not recalled. That is unforgivable. Never again should anything be supported in this House unless the Prime Minister and this government give a firm commitment that they will recall Parliament before making these decisions in the future.

The chemical weapons on the part of Iraq cannot be condemned strongly enough. That is why it is necessary to push forward in the international community in the years ahead to clear the world of chemical weapons so that average individuals throughout the countries of this world are not going to be the victims of dictators.

It is all very well to suggest, and all of us should, that negotiation and armed conflict must be the only option to resolve a crisis in the world. We realize that there comes a time when one cannot deal with a dictator. One cannot negotiate with him and the world must unite. What better than to unite under the United Nations umbrella?

Today, the cold war has subsided and both Russia and the U.S. are against what Iraq is doing. There is no divided world with the cold war going on today. We have a harmony building in the world. I would say that Saddam Hussein may very well be the author of a new evolving world. What he has perpetrated on the Persian Gulf he has brought to world attention. Yes, a new order must evolve in the world. East–west relations must continue to evolve in a peaceful and helpful manner. We must help those nations that need help internationally to readjust to the new and free world. At the same time, neither the United Nations nor any nation with a conscience can stand by and see a dictator, like we have in Iraq today, take over other small countries, because where does it go from there? We have seen the whole formula before.

We are a member of the United Nations Security Council. If there was ever a time when Canada could play a major part in world affairs it is today—to negotiate unity within the Security Council to have a firm UN decision to have a UN force in the Persian Gulf. Canada has been known, over the years, as a good negotiator in the international community. Today the challenge is there, and it should be done.

The Korean war broke out in June 1950. Perhaps a little background history here is necessary. After World War II, Korea was taken from Japan because there was always the old geographical problem there that whoever controlled Korea, that is, if China controlled Korea she could attack Japan easier, if Japan had Korea she could attack China easier. So Korea was taken out of the picture for both of them and the southern half, south of the 38th parallel was taken over as a mandate or a protectorate by the United States and north of the 38th parallel was looked after by Russia.

When the UN sent a commission there to try to promote free elections it was refused entry, north of the 38th parallel, but free elections were held in South Korea. In 1949 the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. moved out of North and South Korea at the same time. By June 1950 there was aggression from North Korea into South Korea and the UN moved in within a matter of days to take over that force. At that time China was not a member of the United Nations Security Council and Russia was staying away from the United Nations Security Council because it was protesting the fact that China was not a member. In the absence of both China and Russia, the UN passed the decision in a hurry to send a UN force into South Korea.

I want to make a special note here of that event, because I think it is relative in today's events with Iraq. Desmond Crowley who wrote a book entitled The Background to Current Affairs, published in 1963, had this to say about the UN force in Korea. He said:

> Thus the step Truman had taken was approved, and the counter-measures against the Communist forces, though conducted primarily by the United States with the assistance of small contingents from the Commonwealth, Turkey and a few other countries, were recognised as a UN action.

That statement, coming from an historian, is an insult to this country because Canada, considering the population of the country at the time, had more soldiers in South Korea on a per capita basis than any other nation of the world, including the United States. That is a fact that we have to remember. There are times when we do these things and people do not realize we are doing them because they are always considering numbers instead of the basic effort that is being made in proportion to the resources and the population of a country. Canada does not have to back up from anybody in that regard.

In an attempt to make Iraq the most powerful country in the Persian Gulf region, Saddam Hussein has over the last decade transformed his country's army into the region's most powerful military machine, waged a long and damaging war with Iran and used banned chemical weapons on his own people.

That tells us why he is in Kuwait today. There are no principles involved in this at all. This man has got to be brought to task and treated under the international law of this world. August 2 saw him finally elicit an outraged response by the whole world when he attacked and took over the tiny oil rich emirate of Kuwait. Nobody agreed with him.

By August 6, the United States reached an agreement with Saudi Arabia to deploy U.S. forces on Saudi territory. That was a relatively easy thing to do because the nations in that part of the Persian Gulf very realistically feared what Iraq was going to do next.

At that time on August 6, the Prime Minister of Canada was summoned to Washington by George Bush where he declared support for a naval blockade to enforce the mandatory economic and trade sanctions imposed against Iraq, although the UN has given no support for such action.

Here is where we failed the United Nations, because the Prime Minister should have been leading the diplomatic effort in the United Nations to make this a total UN force.

Under international law, of course, the imposition of a naval blockade constitutes an act of war. On August 10, NATO foreign ministers agreed to respond on an individual country basis to a request by the U.S. for military contributions to the gulf.

Later that day, the Prime Minister announced the deployment of two destroyers and one supply ship, along with over 900 military personnel. At that time he made it clear that the deployment was in direct response to the United States' request for aid in deterring Iraqi aggression and not a contribution to any United Nations effort to enforce sanctions.

On August 25, the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution authorizing the use of minimal military forces belonging to individual states to ensure the implementation of sanctions.

On September 10, NATO members were again asked by the United States to provide additional military forces to the gulf. On September 14, the Prime Minister of Canada announced that the ships in the Mediterranean would be put on active service as of September 15. Of course, it took them that other day to make it through the Suez.

He also announced new deployments which included a squadron of CF-18 fighter aircraft and 450 associated personnel, 500 land based support for the warships and several transport aircraft to move troops and evacuate refugees.

Finally, on September 15 the Government of Canada passed an Order in Council placing the three war ships and all other Canadian military elements that will operate in the gulf on active service. In doing so, the government successfully avoided recalling Parliament before it was scheduled to resume.

This is why I say we have a dictatorial attitudinal problem over here with the Prime Minister of Canada. The involvement of a country in what could turn out to be armed conflict is not something that should have been done behind the backs of the people of Canada, and indeed behind the backs of those Canadians sitting right here in this Parliament.

Great Britain's Parliament was recalled. The mother of democracies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House, I feel we have a special responsibility to help maintain Parliament Hill as the dominant feature of this city. The Parliament Buildings and the site as such are not only an important symbol to Canadians, they are also a symbol of Canada throughout the world.

[English]

Height controls have been maintained by agreement between the city of Ottawa and the federal government for at least 20 years. All capital cities of consequence maintain such height controls.

Increased building heights in the core of the capital city would adversely affect and compromise the Parliament Buildings as the country's most important symbol.

[Translation]

We earnestly hope that when the City of Ottawa reviews its official plan, it will take the necessary steps to protect the status of these buildings and other national symbols, for the benefit of present and future generations.

DOMINION TEXTILE INC.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Dominion Textile announced that it will be closing its plant in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia and moving its operation to Magog, Quebec.

This closure will cost the town some 330 jobs, in addition to the 70 jobs it lost this fall to its U.S. company. This is about one-third of the total textile jobs in all of Nova Scotia.

Textiles has been the largest employer in Yarmouth for over a century. It survived the great depression, but it will not survive this government's monetary and trade policies.

In its letter to me yesterday Dominion Textile stated in its attached press release:

> —the competitive position of both the Magog and Yarmouth plants is negatively affected by low manufacturing volumes. The inevitable decision to consolidate the two operations favoured Magog because a significantly lower capital investment is required to meet the needs of our industrial products business.

I call upon this government to set up an immediate commission to study why the costs are significantly lower for capital investment in Quebec over the Atlantic provinces. Perhaps this would be a job for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to study why in Atlantic Canada investment costs are are higher and make us non-competitive.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Science and Technology Week, from October 12 to October 21.

More than 600 events, embracing the depths of the ocean as well as outer space, will take place in various communities across Canada. I would like to draw the attention of the House more particularly to the Rosemere amateur aerospace centre in Quebec, where children can visit "outer space" while learning about science and engineering.

During this week, Mr. Speaker, the government will organize official signing ceremonies with announcements about the latest contributions to the centres of excellence. Certificates will be awarded as well, under the Scholarship Program for 1990-1991.

I urge everyone to participate in these events with great enthusiasm, because our future lies in developing science and technology.

NATIONAL CO-OPERATIVES WEEK

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows this is Co-Operatives Week. What better opportunity for the government in this special week to correct a serious wrong that has been done to the co-operative movement.

The GST leaves retail co-operatives at a decided disadvantage to their competition. All contributions to the share equity of co-operatives will be taxed. This is not so for their competition.

Services provided to local co-operatives by parent co-operatives will be taxed; not so with other similar retail businesses. To give an example, Co-Op Atlantic estimates the effects of the GST will give it a $1.3 million dollar a year competitive deficit. The total impact on this tilted playing field on co-operatives will be astronomical. This is unfair.

The best solution for the government is to withdraw the goods and services tax. At the very least, the government should remove the negative effects of the GST on co-operatives. It is National Co-Operatives Week. The thousands of people who are employed by or depend on Canadian co-operatives are waiting on this government's response.

PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the last few years, I on behalf of many residents of Brandon—Souris have expressed in Parliament my concerns respecting the widespread sale of pornography which often features the sadistic exploitation of women and children.

I would like, therefore, to take note of a recent court decision in Ontario in which District Court Judge Hugh Locke sentenced what The Globe and Mail in Toronto described as a "Porn Seller" to an unprecedented six months in jail as well as levying a $25,000 fine. According to the August 21, 1990 edition of The Globe and Mail, the publications in question contained "racial slurs and encouraged 'twisted deviates' to have sex with children and commit incest, rape and violence".

At a time when many contend that the judiciary is often too lenient, many of my constituents will enthusiastically applaud Judge Locke's decision.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, another Canadian, Richard Taylor, has won a Nobel Prize for physics, and we should be proud. Yet how can that pride not be tempered with regret and humiliation about the fact that he had to win that prize by working in the United States. Why? Because this country's pitiful support for science made it impossible for him to work here.

While Conservative government platitudes proliferate about the importance of research and development, its words speak far louder than its actions. Science in this country is suffering and thousands of Canadian workers are suffering because industrial jobs that can be saved only by new technologies are taking permanent flight to Mexico and the United States.

Dr. Taylor's prize, then, deserved and laudable though it may be, is just one more reminder of what The Ottawa Citizen headline said this morning: "We're behind and falling further behind in the area of science and technology—and nobody seems to care".

Canada, happy National Science and Technology Week.

PERSONS DAY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the achievements of women from Alberta, and particularly two women who lived in communities within my riding of Macleod.

Today is the 61st anniversary of the Privy Council decision which recognized women as "persons" in the eyes of the law or the Persons case.

Louise McKinney of Claresholm in 1917 became the first woman elected to a legislature in the Commonwealth.

Henrietta Edwards was a resident of Fort Macleod and was also a central figure in organizing the Victorian Order of Nurses.

Together with three other women from Alberta, these leaders established the right of women to serve in the Senate of Canada.

The first woman appointed from Alberta to the other place was Senator Martha Bielish, recently retired, who was appointed by the forward looking Progressive Conservative government in 1979.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the need to train physicians from the aboriginal community resulted in the establishment in 1979 of the special premedical studies program at the University of Manitoba.

Fiscal contribution to this program was 60 per cent from the federal government until it cancelled the agreement last March 31. Federal support has since been nil, contradicting the assurance conveyed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare last August 9 to the people in charge of the program.

The Manitoba government has now given notice it would not renew the contract beyond the end of this academic year and therefore recruitment of new students would be put on hold. This is a pity since the success rate of this program has been high. It is ironic since presently other medical schools are trying to set up similar models.

I therefore urge this government to take action now, keep its word and not proceed to dismantle this program but instead re-establish a long-term federal-provincial agreement in the interest not only of our aboriginal peoples but of all Canadians.

THE SENATE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in today's press, we read that yesterday the Liberal senators lost the first round in their fight against the GST, when their court challenge to the appointment of the latest senator from New Brunswick by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney was rejected.

According to Mr. Justice Nicholson McRae of the Ontario Court, the Constitution gave the Prime Minister the authority to designate more senators from New Brunswick than the number of members that province has in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal senators and the Liberal Party of Canada should tell Canadians today, quite frankly, who is going to pay the court costs. Canadian tax payers, Mr. Speaker?

TRANSPORTATION

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, this month marks the sixth anniversary of a tragic plane crash in the community of Fort Franklin in the western arctic which claimed seven lives. My constituents held a memorial feast on October 9.

• (1410)

The end of this month also marks the last day that the federal government will provide weather and communications services for air travel through Fort Franklin. For six years the residents of the community have been pleading with three ministers of transportation, including the Deputy Prime Minister, to upgrade aviation services for the sake of safety. And what does this government do? It deletes the service altogether.

In many remote communities in my riding air carriers have refused flights including emergencies and medivacs because of the dangerous conditions resulting from insufficient radio, weather, and runway condition reports provided by Transport Canada.

I am not exaggerating. People's lives are at stake. The review of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board of the 1984 fatal accident determined the plane crash was avoidable, had there been qualified weather reporting and communication services.

Will the minister accept my invitation of October 1—

Mr. Speaker: I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

ENERGY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us that the price of gas would go up by 10 cents a litre. It was also said during this press conference that the Maritime provinces and Quebec did not have a guaranteed supply of oil.

However, under the Canada—Newfoundland Agreement, the Maritimes will have a guaranteed supply as a result of Hibernia, and only Quebec will be left without any guarantees at all.

English Canada refuses to recognize the distinct society, but it always treats Quebec in a way that is very distinct indeed.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): There are Francophones outside Quebec as well!

THE SENATE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, reformed arrogance is the worst arrogance of all.

Yesterday we heard the unelected leader of the Liberal Party ordering the unelected Liberals in the unelected Senate to subvert the will of the legitimate elected government.

In the crowd of unelected Liberal senators is one virtually indistinguishable elected senator. This Reform senator also dances to the tune of his unelected leader, Preston Manning. This Reform senator collects four government pensions, collects his senator's salary, plus $153 per day for showing up in the upper house.

This Reform senator has not cut his salary by 15 per cent as he was told to do by Mr. Manning. Instead, he collects it all and donates 10 per cent of his salary only to charity, thus avoiding taxes to the Government of Canada.

"Reformed charlatan", I call it. The worst arrogance of all is reformed arrogance. Elected senators have proven to be the most arrogant senators of all.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, many will recall that during the election of 1988 I released a confidential internal CN document which predicted that CN was planning to get rid of 17,000 of its employees. Just last week we had an announcement of a lay-off of 1,500, an announcement which follows upon many other similar announcements, and CN is well on its way to doing what unfortunately I had the opportunity to reveal it was planning to do as far back as 1988.

I think what we need to recognize here is that these are lay-offs driven by policies of this government. Deregulation in transportation, which is the equivalent of free trade in transportation, has led to a wrong emphasis on trucking, on highways, and on further consumption of fossil fuels instead of having a structure, a tax system and other things which favour the use of railways, the most environmentally sound way of moving goods and people, but precisely the opposite of this is what the government is doing while it claims to be a friend of the environment.

PERSONS DAY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate Persons Day and remember the courageous women who made it possible.

Sixty-nine years ago Agnes MacPhail became the first woman to sit in the Canadian Parliament. Eight years later, on October 18, 1929, women were finally recognized legally as persons.

Even Canada Post has recognized the contribution made by Agnes MacPhail and recently released a stamp in her honour.

Unfortunately on this Persons Day we are reminded that the federal government does not recognize the full equality of women, having cut back on women's programs and brought in the proposed abortion bill, a challenge to the very personhood and right to choices which we won 61 years ago.

I ask the government on Persons Day to make the commitment to real equality for women in this country.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, the head of the Reform Party in B.C. says that he would like to run candidates in the next provincial election. The leader of the Reform Party of Canada says he cannot do that. The head of the Reform Party in B.C. asks why should a man across the mountains in Alberta tell the B.C. people how they should run things?

As a matter of fact, why should an executive tell the people in B.C., or 500 delegates in a convention tell the people of B.C. what to do?

There is a solution. All they have to do is hold a referendum within the rank and file of the party. After all, this is the solution that they want to have for all the people of Canada. If it is good enough for the people of Canada, why not good enough for the party? There is a problem. It might cause Preston Manning to lose his iron grip on the party or it might force the party to practise what it preaches, and that would be a little tough on it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in a speech in Ottawa, the minister finally came very close to using the dreaded R-word. He said: "We may well have had a second negative quarter". Everybody else calls that a recession.

Just a few minutes ago, the Bank of Canada announced that it was raising its bank rate. Today in committee, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said that he—and this means the government—would persist with its interest rate policies, but gave no recognition to the damage these policies are doing by way of loss of jobs and plant closings.

Why will the Minister of Finance not admit that it is these policies, his policies, that caused our present recession, the first made-in-Canada recession? Why will he not admit what everybody else is saying, that we are in a recession and reverse these policies before they cause even more damage to Canadian workers and Canadian communities?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians might take the Leader of the Opposition more seriously if he would acknowledge that the delay by the Senate of major pieces of financial legislation is damaging for this country.

Mr. Milliken: That's false.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says it is false. He should read what the Economic Council has said, what other organizations have said, that if we cannot get our fiscal deficit down or, let me be more precise, it says that it is important to get our fiscal deficit down so that we can have lower interest rates.

The hon. member wants to see lower interest rates. Why is it that he and his caucus colleagues, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard and others are saying to the senators "keep up the good work. Stop this finance legislation. Don't allow the government to have the bills passed that will help it get its deficit down". These are the precise bills the organizations said last week must be passed so the government can get on with lowering its deficit and that will take the pressure off interest rates. If the Leader of the Opposition would be true to his conscience, he would agree with me.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is desperately but not successfully trying to blame everyone but himself and his government for the mess we are in right now.

In his speech yesterday he was trying to blame the current economic mess first on the Persian Gulf crisis, and even on Canadian workers who are the victims of his policies.

I say to the minister that months before the Persian Gulf crisis in August, starting in January of this year, we began losing industrial manufacturing jobs. We lost over 160,000 according to Statistics Canada since the beginning of this year. Instead of blaming everyone but himself, the minister should look at himself in the mirror and recognize the culprit. He ought to be ashamed of himself.

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not blaming anyone. I am looking for solutions. One of those solutions to help get the deficit down, and which many organizations say will help us get interest rates down, is for the Leader of the Opposition and Jean Chrétien, his boss, to pick up the phone and call Allan MacEachen because Allan MacEachen clearly is not calling him.

Mr. Milliken: Rubbish.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Rubbish, the hon. member says.

I understand that the Leader of the Opposition in the other place is saying that he is going to go ahead and do these things and he is not going to care about what the member for LaSalle–Émard says, or for what the member for Ottawa—Vanier says or what the member for York—South Weston says.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking for solutions. One of the solutions to dealing with the problem is to get this legislation through because if we cannot get it through, it is going to make it far more difficult to get interest rates down than under the current situation.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in blaming the minister and his government for our economic situation, the Economic Council of Canada did not mention the Senate. In saying that we have the first made–in–Canada recession, in other words, made by the policies of this government, the Conference Board of Canada did not blame the Senate. Scotia–Mac–Leod, the investment bankers, did not blame the Senate when they said, "if we continue on our present high interest rate, high–dollar trend, Canada will lose a great deal of output in labour intensive areas to countries like Mexico or even the United States."

I therefore want to ask the minister why he will not admit that he and his government created our present economic wasteland and that he and his government are responsible.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it very clear on many occasions why we are in the position that we are with the high interest rates that we have today.

The precise reason is that through 1988 and 1989, as a result of the very strong growth we had in this country, we reached the edge of our capacity to produce. That led to inflationary pressures. We could have ignored those inflationary pressures, as was done earlier in the 1970s and 1980s, but we chose not to do so because we knew if we had ignored those problems, we would have far more serious problems on our hands six months or a year or two down the road.

We faced up to those problems. We brought in a higher interest rate policy precisely to fight the inflationary pressures. We are getting those inflationary pressures under control and as they get further under control, we will be able to see a further reduction in interest rates over and above the 150 basis points that we have seen so far in the last three months.

This is the policy we have been following. It is a policy that is supported by the Economic council. It is a policy that is supported by other people in the business community. What they would like to see is further action taken on the deficit to take the pressure off interest rates. As I have said time and time again, the members opposite have never provided any support whatsoever to allow—

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Nonsense he says. There has never been any support whatsoever to help us get the deficit down and help us deal with the problems of the high interest rate policy.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment on the Rafferty–Alameda project.

The one deal the minister will admit to making with Premier Devine says specifically that Saskatchewan will not acquire land for the Alameda dam. On Friday, the minister told the House and I quote: "The Saskatchewan cannot proceed with Alameda because they do not have the land, they have not even started the expropriation process". In fact, negotiations to acquire the land have been under way and were in progress as late as 7 p.m. yesterday.

Why did the minister tell the House they have not even started the expropriation process?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat something I mentioned on a number of occasions before this House.

I am under a court order to have a panel at work. I will comply with that order. I will meet my obligation to appoint a panel as soon as possible to resume the environmental assessment work that was stopped last week.

At the same time, I said that the government would take the necessary steps to ensure that the Alameda project not proceed until a full and proper environmental assessment can be completed.

I would like to tell the House this afternoon that I am instructing officials to seek an injunction on continued construction and land acquisition related to the Rafferty–Alameda project.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in response to questions yesterday, the minister consistently referred to a full environmental review process only for the Alameda dam part of the Rafferty–Alameda project.

The predecessor to the minister knew in April from the panel reviewing the project that construction was proceeding on the project. He was told that it was the understanding of the panel members when appointed that none of this work would occur. He was there in July when he knew the work was proceeding.

Yesterday why was the minister only referring to the Alameda project. Has the minister given up on the Rafferty dam? Has he given up on the channelization? Will he tell us specifically what he is doing about the entire project and the construction of that project?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think my answer to the first question was very clear, indeed.

I will read it again. I am instructing officials to seek an injunction on continued construction and land acquisition related to the Rafferty–Alameda project.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

There has been considerable confusion over the Rafferty–Alameda project. The minister says today that he is seeking an injunction.

I would be interested to know what the deal was, because we have heard several different versions. Premier Devine said that a deal was cut. I hope that this Minister of the Environment is not going to be the kind of Minister of the Environment who cuts deals behind closed doors.

I want to ask the Minister of the Environment this. On what grounds is the injunction pursued? Did he cut a deal with Premier Devine? What are the grounds for the injunction?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I said very clearly yesterday that we were looking at a number of options to deal with this issue.

We were looking at going to the courts to have a clarification for an injunction. We were looking at the possibility of applying some sections of the Fisheries Act, a statutory form of action in this case. We were looking towards an agreement that, unfortunately, does not seem to be possible at this time to stop construction on Rafferty–Alameda.

What I am saying today is that following those discussions, we have opted to seek an injunction from the courts to stop construction on Rafferty–Alameda.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker.

The minister has known for some time that there were many problems with the Rafferty–Alameda dam. I have a letter here from the hon. Minister of Transport saying that a licence had not been granted under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for this project.

This means that back in August the licences had not been received. At that time, the Minister of Transport said: "Given the fact that this project has been recommended for a public panel review under EARP, no action will be taken on the Navigable Waters Protection Act application until the panel has rendered its decision."

There is no panel. There is no decision. I say to the Minister of the Environment that he knew in August that all of the proper licences had not been received. Why did he not take action then?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I met with the various groups that are concerned on this issue.

I met with the governments. I met with the proponents of the project. I met with the opponents of the project, and we went through all that back in late July and early August.

We have four documents before us. We have a licence. We have a court order. We have an agreement, and we have the terms of reference for the panel.

I can tell my hon. colleague that the conditions under the licence were fulfilled. I believe that up until last Friday the conditions under the court order were fulfilled, and we are now going to seek legal redress under the terms of the agreement pursuant to what has been said or done over the last five days.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

[Translation]

Yesterday, the Quebec Minister of the Environment stated that the lack of public hearings on the Rafferty–Alameda dam might create a dangerous precedent. He urged the federal government to take a firm stand. Today, we get the same message from the report Greenprint for Canada. The government is accused of dangerous negligence with respect to the environment. My question for the minister is this: How will he respond to the Quebec minister and to all those who tell him the environment comes first?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, my answer is quite simple. There will be public hearings, as planned, on the Rafferty–Alameda project, and there will be public hearings, as planned, on other projects we shall be dealing with in the months and years to come. Let there be no mistake! And that is exactly what I said in my answer to the first question I was asked today.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): That is not the point, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec Minister of the Environment said, and I quote: "That the federal government's record with respect to the Rafferty–Alameda project creates a dangerous precedent that threatens public hearings on the James Bay project." My question is this: Does the minister, as far as James Bay is concerned, intend to impose a full set of environmental impact studies for both the dam and the infrastructures?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have had two conversations with my Quebec counterpart within the last few days. In fact, it was this week. We are now in the last stages of setting up a commission to review the environmental impact of the James Bay project. We are having a detailed discussion of the terms of reference, which will cover the infrastructures as well as the project itself. There will be public hearings there as there are elsewhere. In fact, the process has been discussed for several months by both levels of government. That was the gist of the understanding I reached with Mr. Paradis this week.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about discussions. Will there be public hearings before the work starts? The minister should stop beating around the bush. What is at stake here, Mr. Speaker, is not just Rafferty or James Bay, it is the whole integrity of Bill C–78.

The Quebec Environment Minister has already shown a lot of backbone. The point is this: does the federal minister intend to act likewise? Will he amend Bill C–78 to guarantee compulsory studies before any work whatsoever is started?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about public hearings for James Bay, the answer is, obviously, yes. When we are talking about legislation and regulations, I would appreciate it if the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard would help smooth the way for discussions on Bill C–78 so that we can finally get the bill to committee where we can have a thorough discussion. Of course we want reviews and public hearings before the project starts, and so I would appreciate the hon. member's co–operation in getting Bill C–78 to committee.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of the Environment. As he knows, the Rafferty–Alameda Dam projects are governed in part by an international agreement. In that international agreement, the Americans agreed to pay for part of those dams.

Has the minister asked the Americans to stop payments, given his own inability to stop the project?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I replied to an earlier question today by saying that I am instructing my officials to seek an injunction on continued construction and land acquisition related to the Rafferty–Alameda project.

I think that is quite a direct and definite statement. We are not in a position right now to go any further than this, quite obviously. We are appointing a panel to look at all the environmental consequences and we are stopping construction and land acquisition.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we watched this minister stumble for the last week looking for some ways of stopping this project. He gives us this weak injunction. We give him a second option in the international agreement. Obviously he does not even know about the international agreement.

Again, he can ask the Americans to stop payments. Under the same agreement, we agreed to give progress reports on water quality. How can the minister guarantee water quality when he does not have an environmental review process?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have committed to two things, and very clearly, in the House today. I have committed to have a full review process, a full environmental assessment process, and I have committed to have an injunction sought on further land acquisition or construction on the Rafferty–Alameda project.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the government has made a mockery of the environmental assessment review process from Rafferty–Alameda to James Bay, and now to Alcan.

In British Columbia the government abandoned the process all together by exempting the Alcan project from a review. In 1984 the Prime Minister, when he was the Leader of the Opposition campaigning for votes, promised a full environmental review of the project.

Will the Minister of the Environment follow through on the Prime Minister's promise and order a full and complete environmental assessment of that project?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is strange that the hon. member would raise a question about the Kemano project. We had an independent panel of 10 very distinguished Canadians, chaired by the President of UBC. That panel went through an exhaustive review of the project and, in conjunction with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, held public consultations. The panel recommended a long list of measures that were incorporated into a signed agreement between the Government of British Columbia, the Government of Canada, and the company. We went through a process that I doubt could be attacked on any grounds for lack of efficiency and objectivity.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, officials in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans—three or four biologists now—reject the minister's point of view. They are suggesting in fact that the government put political pressure on scientists to justify the decision of the government—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: That's quite an accusation.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Gardiner: That accusation is being made by biologists in the department.

Will the Minister of the Environment conduct an immediate investigation into these allegations by these Fisheries and Oceans officials that the government has completely sabotaged the environment assessment review process? Why doesn't he put an injunction on this project, too?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can only invite my hon. colleague, if he has got any evidence of any political influence in the environmental process, to send it to my office.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, there has never been, to my knowledge, any political pressure put on the environmental assessment process.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the reply given by the Minister of Finance who mentioned the importance of the GST in reducing the federal deficit. I would like to direct the following question to the Minister of Finance, namely, whether today, the Minister is prepared to acknowledge that the GST is going to be an endless source of revenue for the government, which is why he wants the passage of this bill.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will say that the GST will make us more competitive as a nation. It improve the capacity of our economy to create jobs. That will generate revenues. That will help us deal with the deficit more effectively.

But the import of my response earlier to his colleague was that it is not just the GST that is being held up in the House. It is the unemployment insurance reform, it is the large corporations tax, and it is the expenditure reduction bill, Bill C-69—all of which are designed to get the deficit down.

I say to my hon. friend, he would have more credibility if he would pick up the phone, call the people in the Senate and say: "Look, we in the Liberal Party are concerned about the deficit because, if we can get the deficit under control better, then we can have lower interest rates and we want to get interest rates under control."

I can see by the way my colleague opposite in the Liberal Party is nodding his head is that he agrees with that approach. I would encourage him to get up, go down the hall, speak to Mr. MacEachen, and provide some leadership from the other side to get this legislation moving, allow us to get on with the job of getting the deficit down, and allow us to get on with the job of getting interest rates down.

• (1440)

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, if the minister keeps this up, there is certainly no guarantee he is going to get to heaven.

If the Minister of Finance is interested in what is happening and who is picking up phones, he might be interested in speaking with the Prime Minister when he returns from New Brunswick. The Prime Minister will tell him what he is hearing on the phones in New Brunswick today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, today the Governor of the Bank of Canada said he was going to continue with his monetary policy and today interest rates are up, even though it is marginally. Did the Minister of Finance, in his meeting with the Governor of the Bank of Canada today, approve the increase in interest rates?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is kind of a silly question. The hon. members knows that I cannot disclose what has been discussed by myself with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Those are confidential meetings and he understands that.

We have to realize today that there has been a significant drop in the value of the Canadian dollar over the past three or four days and one of the automatic, normal market reactions is to see some increase in interest rates. That is what we saw in the Treasury Bill tendered today.

I say to my friend, he is expressing a good deal of concern for the economic policy and the economic direction of the country. If he is sincerely concerned about this, where are the alternative policies? Where are the alternatives to how best we should handle these economic issues? We are dealing with these issues as a responsible government. I am not hearing anything from the opposition parties as to what their alternatives are and how they are going to deal with this. If you do not have alternatives, stay in the bleachers. You don't have any role down here on the playing-field.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the workers at Dominion Textile joined the long line of Canadian workers who are being bled to death by the policies of the Minister of Finance and the government.

Is the Minister aware of the fact that in the first nine months of this year, the number of unemployed workers in the manufacturing sector has increased by 17.65 per cent? Is he prepared to justify to those workers that they have to die to go to heaven?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not enjoy seeing people lose their jobs. I do not enjoy seeing the Dominion Textile plant in Yarmouth being closed. But we have to understand that the reason why that plant is being closed is that it is over 100 years old and it is moving to more modern facilities. That is, unfortunately, the process that an economy goes through as we see technology take hold in different places. But we do not take any pleasure in that at all.

What my hon. friend ignores, when she talks about what has happened in the last few months, is the fact that we have had 1,600,000 jobs created in the last six years. These jobs are created because of the policies that we have been following as a government. But, as I have said on many occasions, we have been pushing at the extent of the capacity of our country to produce those jobs and that has resulted in the high interest rates that we have today. As we get through this period, we will be able to get back onto a path of non-inflationary growth again and that will allow us to create good solid jobs in the future.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Acting Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Considering the 44 per cent increase in unemployment in the manufacturing industry since the beginning of this year, I would like to ask him why his department has no programs in place to help workers who are now being zapped by this government's economic policies?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology has, indeed, been looking very carefully at this situation and we are aware that a rationalization process is going on in almost every sector of the Canadian economy. What we would ask the hon. member, in turn, to do would be to tell her colleagues in the other place to move Bill C-21 through so we can have more training money and make it easier on the people.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the litany continues. Today it is Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, that has lost 300 textile jobs. In southwestern Ontario, plant closures are a daily occurrence. Throughout Canada thousands of transportation jobs are being lost, all because of the deliberate policies of this government; the free trade agreement, high interest, the high dollar, a recession, and, in the wings, the GST.

The Minister of Transport says that he is not, and this government is not, in the business of creating jobs but opportunities. Where? Where? In the United States and Mexico?

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: When is this government going to stop creating misery in this country, stop this economic haemorrhage that is so cruelly punishing to so many Canadians?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very familiar with the automotive situation. While there have indeed been some plant closures because of rationalization, what the hon. member does not tell you is that Ford of Canada, for example, is putting in a $64 million aluminum casting plant in Windsor.

Chrysler is investing $250 million to upgrade its minivan plant, NKK-Dofasco is investing $250 million in a new plant galvanizing operation which will be in Windsor. I can go on. Joh Rubber has recently opened a new plant in Leamington.

Mr. Speaker, all they want to talk about are those that close. They do not want to talk about the things that open.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister yesterday for the first time talked about the probability of a recession in this country. Today we have seen the Bank of Canada raise its interest rate instead of continuing to decrease it. I want to ask this minister why he has been prepared to permit this final guarantee of recession to be taken on the part of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been talking about a potential weakness in the economy going back to my budget of February of this year. I do not know where my hon. friend has been. He refers to the question of interest rates today. There is a seven basis point, seven one-hundredths of one per cent, increase in the bank rate today, but there has been a 150 basis point drop since the end of May of this year.

I would also remind my friend that this is against the backdrop of over a one-cent drop in the Canadian dollar and it is a natural response of the marketplace to see some upward movement in interest rates as we have seen that significant drop in the level of the Canadian dollar.

As I have said on many occasions, as we see further continuation of the easing of inflationary pressures, if there is further weakness in the economy, we will be able to get interest rates down further.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. For several months now mining exploration has been practically moribond in Quebec, particularly in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue region. Can the minister tell us today whether he has new measures to help the mining sector in Quebec and in the rest of Canada?

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Abitibi realizes, the mines ministers' conference in August discussed exploration across this country.

• (1450)

This year in Canada, between $750 million and $850 million worth of exploration is going on across this country.

There are regions in the country where there is not the amount of exploration going on that has gone on in other years. Our department will continue to work with the industry to see what can be looked at.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, more than incentive programs are required with the price of metal today. The stock market and investment for Canadians in Canada Savings Bonds seems to be areas in which investment is being looked at.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. I want to ask him what is the constitutional policy of his government with respect to the Quebec-Canada axis, considering that last June the Prime Minister told Canadians that the government would never take unilateral action in the constitutional field. A few days later the Premier of Quebec said that never again would there be multilateral constitutional negotiations, and finally in August the Prime Minister also rejected any bilateral action. For all practical purposes, the Quebec-Canada axis is in a state of limbo and all bridges have been cut. My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Is the status quo the constitutional policy of his government or, better still, is the Prime Minister increasingly prepared to acknowledge Quebec's de facto sovereignty?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there have been ongoing federal-provincial meetings in various sectors, be it agriculture or energy. It is entirely up to the government of the Province of Quebec as to whether it wishes to participate.

Speaking from an agricultural point of view, we continue to have ongoing discussions. At our recent meeting of federal-provincial ministers held in Moncton, the minister of agriculture for the Province of Quebec did attend and did participate.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Regarding the government's future proposals on constitutional matters, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, considering that this week the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology decided to put aside his usual restraint and suggest ways in which there could be a rapprochement with English Canada, that the Minister of State (Federal-provincial Relations) says that nothing will happen it's business as usual—and that the Prime Minister has promised constitutional change, my question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this: will it be real constitutional change or just a rabbit out of hat, in other words, a Charest Report Phase II, concocted with Jean Chrétien?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I can advise the hon. member that this is something that is under active consideration and there will indeed be a constitutional national unity initiative outlined by the federal government in due course.

ENERGY

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture). Yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated that the price of gas in Canada might go up another 10 cents a litre. Will the minister immediately take steps to establish a task force that will investigate whether Canadian consumers are being gouged by excessively high prices?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be aware of what happened yesterday and of what my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, at a meeting with the provincial ministers, and it is quite clear— if the hon. member would care to listen, it is quite clear that..

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): We're listening.

Mr. Blais: I apologize.

Some hon. members: Go for it!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, my colleague met the provincial ministers and explained the situation. All the governments know their respective responsibilities. The provinces have the power to intervene. It is up to the federal government to keep a close watch on the situation and ensure there are no shortages in this country and that Canadian consumers will be able to buy gas when they need it.

Second, I have a duty to ensure there is no collusion between the parties involved to cause excessively high price increases beyond the free market price. That is what we are watching, Mr. Speaker. As the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I also have a duty to keep track of this, and I am not very happy about these high prices. However, I am aware of the situation. The minister met his counterparts, and we will continue to watch the situation very closely.

[English]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources also stated that a gas rationing plan is being looked at. The Consumers Association of Canada view this as a red herring. What we are really witnessing is a classic case of price gouging. Canadians want protection now. They do not want to be told two years down the road that they were taken at the pumps. What is the minister going to do to protect consumers from price gouging today?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to hear this. If the hon. member has any indication that the legislation has been broken, he has a responsibility to go to the Competition Bureau and advise the director. I am a little surprised at the member. If we had followed his party's position some years ago when it was in office, the cost would be over $100 a barrel in Canada. He should be ashamed about what his party did in those days.

Oral Questions

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. At the Changing Atmosphere conference in Toronto a couple of years ago, 300 leading scientists urged that global carbon dioxide pollution be reduced by at least 20 per cent by the year 2005.

Yesterday, the environment committee recommended the same. The Second World Climate Conference in Geneva is only weeks away, but according to the minister, the government does not have a position on carbon dioxide reductions; no targets, no schedules and no percentages.

Will the minister today tell Canadians and the nations participating in Geneva what the government's position is on carbon dioxide pollution?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee on the environment was tabled after Question Period yesterday. I received a copy of it. I can tell the hon. member that I am looking at that report very closely, as is my colleague, the minister of energy. Our position is the same as we have maintained since Bergen. We will look at that report, hopefully we will have ideas and hopefully there will be some solutions indicated.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the public is very anxious to know the position of the Government of Canada and to be assured that the government is not only giving good speeches, but also acting on the environment.

In view of the fact that three governments, two of which are industrial nations, Germany and Denmark, have already announced a commitment to reduce pollution of $CO_2$ by 20 per cent by the year 2005, will the Government of Canada follow that leadership?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have made the commitments in international fora before on $CO_2$. This government is very concerned about $CO_2$ emissions. But before making commitments that just may be a wish or a motherhood statement, we want to tell Canadians exactly what the implications are all about.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. There has been a lot of loose talk lately about gasoline rationing. However, much more likely is a program to encourage significant but voluntary conservation measures. For the sake of the environment, we in the NDP applaud and support such conservation measures and encourage further efforts in this regard.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if the government will invoke Article 904 of the free trade agreement to cause exports of Canadian oil and gas going to the U.S. to be reduced by the same percentage as the drop in Canadian consumption achieved by these voluntary conservation measures?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find that quite interesting from a colleague from western Canada who should be a supporter of the industry and the manner in which it performs.

It is nothing new for the NDP to be fighting the free trade battle. You've lost. What we are going to move forward with is monitoring and working with our provincial counterparts to ensure that a stable energy source for Canada will continue. This is the commitment given by the minister and by his provincial counterparts.

• (1500)

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I hope the government understands what it is dealing with here.

If we do not reduce the percentage of Canadian production going to the United States to a degree equivalent to that by which we reduce our own consumption, the free trade ratchet works to ensure that it must be allowed that greater supply in future.

Is the government really intending to induce a cutback in Canadian consumption of Canadian oil and gas while allowing American consumption of Canadian oil and gas to continue unabated?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday I would like to ask the government House leader what is the legislative program for the coming week and possibly for the next week also.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, today we will be continuing with a motion respecting the Iraq invasion of Kuwait.

Tomorrow, which is Friday, we will be proceeding hopefully to completion of second reading on Bill C-74, the act respecting the Fisheries Act, and hopefully to completion of third reading on Bill C-37, the Canadian Heritage Language Institute bill.

If we get lucky and co-operative, we may even deal with Bill C-73, the bill respecting the dissolution of certain Crown corporations.

On Monday it is my intention to call for continuation of second reading of Bill C-78, the environmental assessment legislation.

On Tuesday I would hope to call—there are the usual caveats in terms of changes of plans—Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada bill.

Mr. Speaker: There are several members who wish to rise on points of order. Of course I will eventually deal with them. However, I have a question of privilege which must take priority.

DISTURBANCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, today I rise on a question of privilege specifically to argue that certain members of the New Democratic Party participated in an action which demonstrated a clear contempt against yourself personally and this House generally.

In my argument I will make a serious charge against a member of this House and will support this charge with a motion as required by the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. I wish to remind members of the process that will follow my charges.

First, Mr. Speaker, you must determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence to warrant a committee of the House hearing the case and deciding whether there is guilt or not. Members should know, Mr. Speaker, you do not decide if there is a contempt but rather if it is possible that there could be a contempt. If you decide there is sufficient evidence, you rule that a prima facie case exists.

Following that ruling the House must decide on the question. It does this by dividing on the motion I will put before the House. If the House votes in favour of my motion, the matter is then referred to the appropriate committee which hears the evidence and decides whether or not a contempt was committed and what action should be taken by this House.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I will make the charge. I will ask you to rule that my evidence is prima facie and then to put my motion before this House.

My charge is this: that yesterday's demonstration in this House by a number of students was accomplished with the prior knowledge of the member for Windsor—St. Clair. I further charge that he did nothing to stop that demonstration and that he was in fact an accessory to this contempt against our Parliament.

My evidence is as follows. Prior to Question Period yesterday, the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House advised the government Whip of evidence a demonstration would take place. I assume the other Whips of the other parties in this House had similar prior knowledge. The question is: Why, then, did not the New Democratic Party attempt to stop the demonstration?

Second, Mr. Mark Molgat, Vice-President, External Affairs of the University of Ottawa Students Federation and one of the demonstrators ejected from this House yesterday, in the presence of witnesses said that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair did know of the planned demonstration while it was still in its planning stages.

This I believe is prima facie evidence that the hon. member did know of the demonstration, did nothing to stop it and, by not stopping it, encouraged it; a contempt against this House.

Third, several of the passes used by the students to enter the gallery were signed by the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Yesterday after Question Period two NDP members, while outside the House of Commons, laughed about the demonstration and said within earshot of a member of our staff that the Canadian Federation of Students had asked the NDP to raise the question in this House. I believe that is further prima facie evidence of their participation in this contempt.

My final piece of evidence is a poster that was hung at the University of Ottawa for several days prior to the demonstration taking place in this House. The poster reads as follows:

> October 17
> 1. Petition on 3 per cent tax on loans at SFUO.

That stands for the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa. It continues:

> 2. NDP critic asked questions on 3 per cent tax issue. Leave for Question Period from SFUO at 2.15.

Of course at the bottom of the poster, which I will give to the Table, is a big print saying: "Revolution".

The evidence, I believe, is more than sufficient for you to rule that a prima facie case does exist and that you, Mr. Speaker, should allow the House to divide on the following motion:

> That the entire matter of the demonstration held in the public gallery on Wednesday, October 17, 1990, during Question Period, and the prima facie evidence that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair had prior knowledge of this demonstration be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to yesterday's Hansard at page 14280 where the Leader of the New Democratic Party said the following:

> —I should not have to say that as members of Parliament we do not condone that kind of demonstration. We have never condoned that kind of demonstration, and we should not have to say we dissociate ourselves. It should be assumed that members of Parliament do not appreciate that kind of behaviour from the gallery.

I agree with the words of the hon. member. It is most unfortunate that her words were not acted upon by members of her own party.

The evidence before you today is I suggest, Mr. Speaker, too compelling to suggest that yesterday's demonstration and the involvement of the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair in it to be anything like a pure coincidence. I believe we do have a prima facie case of contempt against this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the events that occurred here yesterday, both in the gallery and across the aisle, constituted a sufficient embarrassment to this House without having to hear what I just heard.

I do not think there is anybody in this House who would accuse Howard McCurdy of having been extremely, meanly partisan—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCurdy: —and behaving in a way that is inconsistent with the obligation of members of this House to represent it both in action and in demeanour in an appropriate way.

• (1510)

Let me say that the ridiculousness of this charge is to be demonstrated, at least in part, in terms of my particular status. Anybody looking at me knows that if I had half a brain I am not expected to adhere just to those standards that are observed by the rest of the members, but my behaviour better be bloody well superior.

I tried to pay attention to what was said. First, the member indicated that the Sergeant-at-Arms informed the government House leader that there was going to be some kind of demonstration yesterday. I am aware of one single fact. Our House leader was not informed. Nor was any other member of this caucus informed. No member, including this member, was informed or was aware of it. It is alleged that there was an announcement at the University of Ottawa that this member was going to pose a question on student matters yesterday.

As it happens, I was not in Ottawa until roughly 10.30 yesterday. At this stage there was no question asked for in our caucus and no question approved, to be posed in respect to student issues. It was not until approximately 12.45 that the issue of a question posed in respect to students was even entertained. That would be long after, I presume, the announcements were posted at the University of Ottawa.

It is true that when I was previously a critic for youth and post-secondary education the students could depend upon me to pose questions at times when it was pertinent to do so. It was certainly pertinent to do so on National Student Day. That the caucus agreed that I should pose a question was in recognition of that fact. It was not because I had deliberately solicited that question beforehand.

It is indeed my understanding that the students were given to understand that Howard McCurdy, who could be depended upon to ask a question, would do so and they could have broadcast this totally without my knowledge. That I assert clearly.

There are any number of rumours that have been circulating around this place. I think in regard to these charges it should be noted, in keeping with what I said about the Sergeant-at-Arms informing or not informing the various caucuses, that it was only on that side of the House that there was a ready inclination to jump up and take note of the events up there and to accuse me of having been involved, when I did not even know what was going on. Clearly, in my being accused, Mr. Speaker, if ever there was an example of guilt by association this is a clear example of it. If we are going to talk about guilt by association and guilt by rumour, we have the fact, evidently admitted by the hon. member, that the Sergeant-at-Arms knew that there was going to be a demonstration and did not inform us.

I am told that there are a good many others around this place who knew about it besides the students and the government benches. I am given to understand, by rumour, that the Table understood it. There is another rumour that the Speaker's office knew about it. It appears by rumour that the only person who did not know about it was Howard McCurdy and the New Democratic caucus.

Some hon. members: And the Bloc Québécois.

[Translation]

Mr. McCurdy: The Bloc Québécois didn't know either.

[English]

The hon. member says that several of those who are involved in the demonstration had passes to the gallery. I do not know whether any of those involved in the demonstration had passes or not. I tell you quite frankly, as has been my habit, there were passes distributed among students who asked for them. After all, there were a great many of them here for a CFS press conference that I was supposed to have attended and did not. But because they have faith in me I guess in terms of my interest in them, they came to my office and asked for passes.

Mr. Speaker, to have the hon. member seriously suggest that because certain individuals had passes signed by me in their possession that I was therefore implicated in the demonstration is an outrageous accusation that demeans the intelligence of the member who made that accusation.

Further we have it that the students had a poster that said they were going to protest the 3 per cent tax. By God, if you are going to have contempt hearings against members of Parliament for what their constituents say on posters, you are going to have to indict every member in this House for contempt. That is an absolutely outrageous extrapolation.

I have no apology to make and I am prepared any old time to defend myself against any charges of contempt and to demonstrate that the member who should be held in contempt is the member with the contemptible accusations—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in this debate very briefly since I would guess most of the students that were here yesterday were from my riding. The University of Ottawa is in the riding of Ottawa—Vanier and I would like to make some comments.

Certainly I have to agree that there is a dispute as to whether all the facts are before the House. Whether or not there is a prima facie case, Mr. Speaker, is up to you to decide. When that motion is put, we will decide following your advice. I do believe that we have a serious dispute here as to fact. The member for Peace River made a serious accusation which I do not think we can slough off easily. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we will await your decision on that.

I would just like to tell the House that I have a letter, signed by Jane Arnold, chairperson of the Canadian Federation of Students. I will not read the whole letter, but I will read one paragraph which I think is pertinent to our debate: "As chairperson of the Canadian Federation of Students, I can neither condone or support the actions which took place in the House of Commons on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 17, 1990. I would like to inform members of Parliament the federation played no role whatsoever in this escapade." This letter is dated October 18.

Suffice to say that some of us were greatly embarrassed yesterday by that demonstration. I understand that students can be frustrated and I understand also, having dealt with them all my life that sometimes things get out of hand. I do think that we have a serious dispute at this time, that it deserves consideration of this House. Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to you to decide whether or not there is a case here.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to make a brief intervention on this very serious charge that has been laid in the House today.

As Whip of the New Democratic Party I want to say a couple of things. I want to indicate that I was not contacted as Whip. I want to indicate that the deputy Whip of my caucus was not contacted, that the deputy House leader in his capacity as acting House leader was not contacted by the Sergeant-at-Arms, by the Clerk at the table, by the Speaker's office, by any member of this House or any employee of this House in advance of the activity that occurred in the gallery behind you, Mr. Speaker.

We had no formal notice by any official.

It is important that I separate the official notice and the unofficial notice, in terms of the information that came to us. I also want to clearly state, from the basis of my own discussions with my caucus colleagues and staff of the New Democratic Party caucus, that we had no informal knowledge, we had no advance notice, there was no conspiracy, and no working relationship to ensure that a demonstration occurred in this House.

It is not acceptable to us that demonstrations occur in the gallery. I think all members should realize and remember that demonstrations have occurred in every gallery in this House, in the public galleries at either end, the NDP gallery, the Liberal gallery, and the government gallery. And for every one of those events, at least in the two side galleries, members of Parliament would have to provide the appropriate passes, for people to sit in those chairs.

We, as members, have a responsibility, whether it be constituents from our ridings, a citizen of this country, or a visitor to this country, to provide them with access to the House of Commons. On many days, there are lineups outside the opposition gallery door because the demand for seats is so high. But we do not, as a matter of course, demand that these people sign a form saying that they are going to be good little boys and girls. That is not our job. For us to even suggest that to them would make them wonder about our role here.

The second point I want to make is that I want to confirm the comments made by my colleague, as they relate to the Question Period process. He is absolutely correct that at the end of our morning executive meeting, where every day we meet and receive the applications for statements and questions, the matter of the students was not raised. The matter of a question concerning students was not raised. It was only later in the day, as the member described, that the matter was raised directly with us and a decision was made to put that member on the list. In fact, I can remember, full well, at 1.35 or 1.40 p.m., when it was discovered that our list, that piece of paper that we give to you indicating our lineup had not been changed to reflect the decision and the member who rose to respond to the government's charge was not even on the "list".

Mr. Speaker, I believe, while obviously it is your responsibility to make the decision, that there is no prima facie evidence and that there is no need to refer this matter to committee for further review.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, every year, during the many years I have had the privilege of sitting in this House, we have had students' day, for members of the Canadian Federation of Students. Every year, members of the various parties are advised of their forthcoming visit. Every year we are asked to put questions that draw the government's attention to their requests, and so the question of the hon. member who is being accused today was very appropriate.

Every year, Mr. Speaker, since I have been here, in any case, we have had more or less the same scenario. The debate the parliamentary secretary asks us to take part in today is worthy of the best debates by student politicians.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not go so far as to make a ruling on such a futile and childish issue. If every time students organize some kind of happening or demonstration, this House stops everything and spends hours trying to censure one of its members, I think what we need is a motion, and I will be glad to move one, in keeping with this new approach. I am prepared to move a motion of censure against all the accomplices of the senators, who did things far worse than any student could have done.

Mr. Speaker, I would never blame the student. The example was set by the other place. However, we heard no bells, no bicycle horns and no kazoos. I congratulate the students. They were far quieter than their elders who look like a bunch of damned idiots.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that there is much ado about macaroni. We are supposed to be in the House debating an issue which could lead us into a third world war and instead we are wasting our time talking about macaroni. Let us get on with the business of the House.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, if I could just make clear the process that did happen yesterday. I was involved in all of the meetings during the day in terms of setting the questions for Question Period. It is certainly the case that there was no question proposed dealing with student fees. There was no suggestion that we raise a question with regard to national students day until much later in the day, I think somewhere around noon. In terms of any link between a request by the Canadian Federation of Students to raise a question and the demonstration, it was certainly nothing that came through us or to us.

To pick up on a couple of points that the parliamentary assistant to the House leader raised, I do not think that we can rely too heavily on what one person might have said about the source of the demonstration or how the demonstration was organized. I have been here when there have been other demonstrations. We have heard all sorts of allegations about who presented passes, who had passes for what, and which MP provided passes to those demonstrators. Never once have I heard it raised that because a pass from a particular MP was in the hands of a person who demonstrated that there was some implication this MP was involved in the demonstration.

I wonder why the New Democratic Party was not advised by that fairly large number of people who, in fact, suspected that a demonstration was to take place. No one was advised in the New Democratic Party, neither myself, the Whip, nor the deputy Whip. I think it is worth considering why that was not the case.

In that context, I would like to ask that we not forget the reaction from the government side yesterday when this took place. It was not just the case of the hon. member for Athabasca making disparaging comments about the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair—and at least the member from Athabasca had the courtesy to withdraw his comments—there were statements all across the front bench on the other side and all across the remaining benches on the government side.

None of this appeared in Hansard, and perhaps for the better. I think we all know the sorts of comments made yesterday. They came very quickly as soon as the activity arose and they came thick and fast. I think we need to look a little more carefully at that, Mr. Speaker. I ask that you investigate, and I know you will, why the New Democratic Party was not notified, and I hope we will hear some indication of further retraction of statements from the other side as asked by my party leader yesterday. That is all I have to say on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, this is not because I was student president at Ottawa U, where I had the privilege of being a member of the executive council for five years, apparently a record at the time. Neverthless, I have a confession to make. I remember that as a student, I launched an Avro Arrow from the gallery unto the floor of the House. No one ever knew. Today, the truth is out.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: This object glided to the floor of the House landing at the feet of Mr. Hees, a former and well remembered member of this House.

I am very sympathetic to this kind of thing. I was a very active student. I was finally kicked out of university, but I would like to say Mr. Speaker, that—

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. member.

[English]

Perhaps we need a motion right now.

Mr. Prud'homme: Well, Mr. Speaker, you may be surprised some day. We may be happy.

As a matter of fact, to make some of my colleagues very happy, the other gentlemen have talked about rumours on the Hill and I heard one at noon that something is going to change my life here by six o'clock. I am the only one who heard that, but rumours are rumours. I am still here, Mr. Speaker.

One thing that I do not want to be taken lightly is that over the years, it is known that my respect for the parliamentary institution has only grown and grown.

I would not like this to be considered as a light event. It is severe. Yesterday, it was a piece of paper, but tomorrow, it may be something else.

In good spirit, I wonder if Your Honour would not rather remind members of the seriousness of such an event taking place and to remind all members that at no time should we give any kind of encouragement for that kind of action. I assure you that I cannot accept that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Prud'homme: I know I may not be very popular by saying the following comment, but I am not at all happy with two of the events that took place in the other Chamber. I said so. I say it publicly. Reading a petition, and all that is fine, but two of the events that took place in the Senate will never meet with my approval.

The Speaker must remind us of what this House is all about. Because you have the golden occasion to talk to the country, from your chair, Your Honour, maybe the time has come for you to remind us what this Chamber is all about. If you judge that there is a prima facie case, I will abide by your rule. But I would prefer to listen to you, Mr. Speaker, take a few minutes to remind us what this institution is all about and the respect we should have for it.

—and then perhaps take a charitable view and forget what the students did yesterday.

[English]

As far as I am concerned though, instead of bragging about what took place yesterday, the hon. member should consult his own conscience. If he feels he is not at all responsible, fine. He will have a good conscience sleeping tonight. If he feels that maybe inadvertently he did encourage, then perhaps he should take the appropriate action.

As far as I am concerned, I do not think there is a good case. Your Honour, I think, should remind us of the seriousness of what happened yesterday, because I cannot accept that.

As to making a question referred to the appropriate committee, I think that Your Honour would like to reflect on it and not take that appropriate action. I just would not like it to be passed over without you reminding us of the seriousness of what took place yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Perhaps we should beef up the security on the Hill. We have an extraordinarily good person to see to it. He, himself, will see to it.

We can feel sometimes when something is going to happen. We live in modern times. Some people may think that is the way to put their message across. It is not the way to put our message across.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the member who rose is not just an ordinary member of the House, although all members are equal in this House. He is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader. I think that must be weighed in the nature of the charge and the responsibility that the government must take to the charges that were made.

A very serious accusation has been made against an opposition member in the House. The accusations were based on hearsay, on rumour, and on the basis of posters that are out there and, before those charges were made in the House, the parliamentary secretary failed to do the adequate research to make sure that he was not making a false charge.

I have checked with the Sergeant-at-Arms. He indicates that our party was not told that there was about to be a demonstration. Further to that, he has indicated to our whip that the government did not ask the Sergeant-at-Arms whether or not we were informed. They did not check before they made that very serious accusation in the House.

The parliamentary secretary made a very serious charge, as I have indicated. He made a very serious mistake, as my colleague, the member for Winnipeg—Transcona said. I would expect that we have a full withdrawal of that charge, or that member, if he finds that those charges are false and those charges are not correct because he did not check before he got up in the House of Commons and made those charges, that will resign as a member of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, he made a very serious charge against a member of the House and he must be willing to accept the consequences.

In further evidence against the charges made on the basis of hearsay and rumour, I had the whip's office check. Yesterday, as we always do, we submitted our list of questions which we had planned on asking to the Canadian Press and the CBC. It is a courtesy that parties extend, as all senior members of the House should be aware.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that on that list submitted to those two senior news bureaus we did not have a question by the member for Windsor-St. Clair, thus vindicating everything he has said.

We have no control of what might be on a poster. We have no control what somebody might say outside in the lobby. But we do know the questions that we intended to ask in the House.

We have got up and we have defended our actions. I would say that the government took a very despicable route today. It charged a member. It did not do its research. It did not do its homework, and it will have to pay in the House for those charges.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I realize, as do all members, that this is a very important subject for the House to consider. Like all members, we are trying to understand the frustration and how strong people feel about certain issues, but none of us appreciate those feelings being demonstrated or communicated by way of throwing things down into the Chamber. It is harmless one day; another day it may be quite serious. None of us can subscribe to that kind of activity.

I listened, not in the Chamber but to my television, to the case put forward by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader. I listened to the facts, as the parliamentary secretary described them, to substantiate his case. I have to say that I did not hear, personally, as a member, facts. I heard a pretty good circumstantial case, if one were trying to make a case circumstantially.

Members being objective could hardly describe what we heard. If one wanted to assign guilt, if one wanted to presume guilt, and if one were trying to make the case, then the presentation of the member, circumstantially, would support the theory. I submit we did not hear facts.

I know on many occasions in the House—and it is primary and essential to the functioning of this place to accept the word of an hon. member— members frequently are called upon to do that. Sometimes there is great emotion running through the House when we are called upon to do that, but we have to do it. When a member is directly asked a question, that member directly answers the question. Unless there are hard facts—not a circumstantial case, not a suggestion of facts, but unless there are hard facts—we in this place always accept the word of an hon. member. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, if we depart from that we will be in very great difficulty in this place.

I suggest, as well, to you, Mr. Speaker, because you have a decision to make, that in the absence of hard facts to even refer the matter to the House for a vote, assuming one can anticipate how that vote may go, there is a presumption of guilt, whatever the outcome of the exercise. I think Parliament would be better served, and our time would be better served if we got back to the matter at hand as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I am reluctant to extend the debate very much further. There has been some suggestion that, serious as this matter is, I will have of course to consider it. There is another very serious matter which the House has been asked to debate today.

I am prepared to hear the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair. After I have heard him, his colleagues may or may not feel that they have to make any further observations. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I just have a fact to bring to the discussion and an observation.

I have never been in a situation of this sort in all my life. It is a wonderful demonstration of how evil can be the perpetuation of rumour, guilt by association, and the invention of facts and the exaggeration of facts in a way that brings this kind of an accusation to the fore. However subtly people, who are otherwise rationale sensible people, begin to behave as if those facts that are not facts were true. That is what has happened here to a very large degree.

Beyond that, I just wanted to point this out because it might be inferred that the Canadian Federation of Students was involved in the demonstration. I would just like to say that I called them this morning to ascertain whether they even knew about the demonstration and, as far as I was able to ascertain, no one at the offices of the Canadian Federation of Students, neither their elected officers nor their full-time staff, knew anything about it.

We have made every effort possible, I should tell you, Sir, to find out who was responsible and we have not really ascertained whom that might be. I just want to make it clear that the Canadian Federation of Students, insofar as we know, had nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that we all make mistakes around here. I think the member for Peace River has made a mistake. I think that everything that has happened here since he made the charge demonstrates adequately that he made that mistake.

I do not think that he or the member for Windsor—St. Clair, or the House, should be dragged any further through this process. What is needed is for the member for Peace River to get up, in light of the counterfacts which have been presented and in light of the denial which has been made by the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair, and withdraw the charge.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not here for the entire discussion, having another important engagement, but I did want to say that I regret the parts of the discussion I have heard to imply that the hon. member for Peace River is showing some sort of prejudices or biases, or in some way is being unfair.

We have all seen, read, and heard, particularly in recent months, the contempt with which politicians in our institutions are being held around the country. A lot of it comes to us because of what happens in this institution. I guess what hurts more than anything else about yesterday's incident is that somehow that kind of behaviour, to those students at least, was legitimized as a legitimate expression of a political dissent in this country. It shows that they at least held this institution in such disrespect that that kind of behaviour was felt to be legitimate.

Against that background, the information that the member for Peace River adduced to the House today about the poster hanging up for a long time and indicating the NDP critic would be raising the question. The other evidence, circumstantial—

An hon. member: Yes. Unchecked.

Mr. Andre: Just a minute—suggesting that in fact they had, at the very least, used their intimate knowledge of what the New Democratic Party was planning and the offices and facilities—

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: —to plan and bring about the event that occurred. The poster indicated they knew the NDP critic would be raising the issue, the fact that the students had obtained the passes. All I am saying is that at the very least, those students used their knowledge of the NDP's intent and their tickets to organize this event. Mr. Speaker, I cannot see how that can be denied.

I hear hon. members talking about the concern that their reputation has been besmirched as a result of these facts being adduced to the House. If that is the concern, if they wanted this matter looked into so any besmirchment could be cleared up by examination in committee, I would certainly facilitate and participate in any such motion. But, as it is, I would ask fair-minded members opposite to consider the facts that were in the hands of the member for Peace River and what happened yesterday and, rather than getting into a rage, look at the facts and realize that the hon. member for Peace River did nothing more than to legitimately raise what happened in the hope that we could all agree that whatever the circumstance, it should never happen again and we can work together to try to restore the reputation of—

Mr. Speaker: The time has come to close off the debate. I have heard, and I have taken very great care in listening to the points that have been made. I am going to consider the matter very carefully and I will report back to the Chamber as soon as possible.

I have listened with, I think, some comfort to representations from some members regarding the respect which we need to have for this place and which other people ought to have for it. Those comments, quite frankly, this afternoon and also on other occasions have been helpful. The hon. member for Saint-Denis has invited the Chair, at an appropriate time, to make some comments along those lines, and I shall certainly reflect upon that.

However, I have a situation before me. I am now going to have to consider it very carefully. I think hon. members can take from this, though this is no indication of how I will ultimately decide, how sometimes extremely careful we have to be or we ought to be in this Chamber in what we say, what may be implied to us or implied by us. I will take this into account and I hope that I will be able to help hon. members.

There is, as far as I am concerned, no need to pursue the debate any further. It is probably appropriate to all go away and reflect a little bit on what has been said in the House and especially reflect upon some of the very helpful things that have been said by several of our colleagues.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, just a very brief point. I have listened carefully to what you have said and I would implore you, Sir, to put this consideration at the top of your priority list because I think it is totally unfair for my colleague to have this charge hanging over his head between now and the time that you are able to be seized of this matter and, of course, the whole caucus.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and I assure the House that I will not delay unduly.

If there are other matters to be raised I, of course, will hear them. But, there has to be a point where these matters are concluded so far as argument and representation is concerned and I think that it is that time. The hon. member for Calgary West may have another point.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I raised a point of order last Friday and you indicated at that time that you would be seeking information from the Leader of the New Democratic Party as to when he might return to the Chamber. The subject matter of my complaint is charges levelled against me and my colleagues by their House leader. I have been living under that cloud now for a week with no apology, with no opportunity to air it fully and to have a response. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you have knowledge as to when he is returning because there is some difficulty for me in terms of arranging my schedule. It would be nice to be away tomorrow. I have some plans for tomorrow. If he does return tomorrow, can my question be held over until Monday? Is that acceptable to the Chair?

Mr. Speaker: On the question of privilege—

Mr. Robinson: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: May I deal with this first? On the question that the hon. member for Calgary West raises, which was raised as a question of privilege, there were certain representations made by the hon. member for Calgary West in which I think his complaint was certainly aired in preliminaries at least. At that time the hon. member who is being complained of, the hon. member for Kamloops, was not in the House. The information I have is that he will not be returning until the end of this week. He is not here yet. The question of privilege was adjourned on the principle of fairness that we try to apply, that it not be proceeded with further without the hon. member being in the Chamber. The question of privilege is completely secure and I assure the hon. member for Calgary West that as soon as it can be arranged, we shall proceed with the matter.

Mr. Hawkes: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There comes a point when the Speaker really has to ask hon. members to co-operate. We can go on with points of order all day long unless someone finally says: "Look, enough is enough". I see other hon. members wanting to rise. We have a very important debate in front of this House. A lot of hon. members, as they have indicated, would like to get on with it.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to cause trouble for the Chair. I take that to mean that I can be absent tomorrow even if that member is back. The question will be argued on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. member for Calgary West that as I was not prepared to proceed too long without the hon. member for Kamloops being here, I will not proceed without the hon. member for Calgary West being here. I am sure that the genius of this place can work out an appropriate time to continue the discussion.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. Your Honour is aware of the fact that I was seeking the floor prior to the intervention by the government House leader and on the point to which Your Honour indicated he wishes to reserve.

I want to raise two very brief points, Mr. Speaker. This is an important point. The first is to draw to Your Honour's attention a point which was not made during the course of the debate. That is that there was a very clear and unequivocal denial yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: I really am going to ask hon. members to support the Chair. I have heard the debate. I know the issues inside out. I understand exactly what I have to consider and I will look very carefully at what was said today. It may very well be that I will consider what was said yesterday, if that is what the hon. member is leading to.

Mr. Robinson: A point of order on a different matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to hear a point of order on something completely different. Unless the House is not going to support the Chair, the debate is over.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief point of order, not related to the earlier discussions.

In the exchange in the House today with the Minister of the Environment, he asked at that point about providing him with names of people who made charges of cover-up and other such words regarding the environmental process.

I would like you to know, Sir, that the day before yesterday I advised the Minister of Justice of two names of individuals who had these concerns and that two additional names have come forward today of which I will be advising the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's intervention. He knew things I did not know when he phrased his preamble and I appreciate very much that point of order. I am sure it will be of help to everybody.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will not, following your injunction, return to the substance of the point of order which was raised earlier.

I did want to raise a procedural concern. That is, in view of the seriousness of the charge that has been laid and the consequences which flow from that charge, both with respect to the member that laid it and with respect to the member against whom the charge was made, I would seriously request that Your Honour reconsider the decision to reserve on this question and bring back a decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, who has had many years of experience in this place, knows full well that we all try to press our point. I have indicated that I am going to reserve. I think it would be inappropriate for the Speaker to respond in haste to a matter of this importance. I will assure the hon. member for all of the hon. members in the New Democratic Party, and especially the hon. member who is the subject of this, that I will not delay unduly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call Orders of the Day, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Malpeque—The environment; the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—Sexual Discrimination; the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon—Route Canada.

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 13232); and on the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p. 13240) and on the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 13244).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the debate ended, there was 10 minutes left in questions and comments for the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

On questions and comments, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, a very short question to my colleague.

I appreciated the presentation he made and I certainly agreed with all his statements, particularly the part of the need for consultation.

Inherent in what the hon. member said was basically, when you have defence forces, you need a critical mass. There is a minimum level below which you cannot go for each country and for the free world as a whole. It is very difficult to describe what the free world is today, but it is very important to realize that there is a critical mass below which you should not and cannot go if you want to contribute to maintaining world order.

These forces up front are in the shop window. They are there. What do you have in reserve after you have deployed them? How much more have you in reserve? What militia forces do you have? How many spare parts do you have? This is a factor in looking at when the embargo will bite Hussein.

As we are involved in this critical point and time now, and I do not want to make a political issue of this, but I did notice and the hon. member did notice, that on the very day before we were talking about this in the House of Commons, there were indications from a speech made by the Minister of National Defence last Tuesday at a defence association network seminar led to speculation that Canadian forces may be cut tremendously. I do not know where the figures came from, but the article said 5,000 to 15,000 forces would be cut.

I would like the hon. member to comment on how those kinds of comments and speculation are going to help us buttress our position in the Middle East now and in the future with those kinds of activities.

• (1600)

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question because it is a very crucial one.

I mentioned in my speech that right now we are in a position to do some very fine work in the Persian Gulf and that we can do it at the diplomatic table as well. I pointed out that we drifted into World War II because no nation was prepared to defend the free world, not even Britain. It almost collapsed at the start of the Second World War, and we know what happened throughout 1940 in Britain. That is just one example.

We have heard from government members over the years that we must have a strong Canadian military community in this country and we must have equipment and everything. They have gone through six years where they have done very little and now they are talking about reducing the forces.

Government members have been saying that Canada did not have enough forces to do the job, and yet we are still in the middle of being expected to keep the peace in various parts of the world. We are expected to be helpful to UN forces when boundaries must be respected, even to the point of military action through the UN auspices. Why are we cutting our forces at a time when they are admitting in their own words that we do not have enough armed forces to carry out the duties that we are faced with in the world and in the country?

Even this summer, the army was a better diplomatic agent in Canada in the Oka situation than the government or any of its officials could ever hope to be. When we talk about the military force, we are not talking about guns, rifles, tanks, and ships all the time. We are talking about the diplomatic efforts of our Canadian forces. They are professionals in that field too. We are talking about their military efforts when it comes to a situation of freeing a country overrun by a dictator. That too is their expertise. They are also good politicians.

The hon. member might not like me to say that because he is a former admiral in the navy, but they are good politicians. That is why he is in the House today. They are good politicians because they can work with other nations in the world.

Mr. Speaker, do you think that the people on the Golan Heights today do not have to exercise a little political savvy once in awhile in dealing with their situation? Whenever they are in peacekeeping situations in the world, they have to relate to the political realities of the situation they are in. They have to be diplomats enough to talk to those people and build bridges. They have to be military enough to hold their ground and do what is right for international justice and boundaries in this world.

I hope that answers the hon. member's question. I do not know why this government has not only not kept its commitment since taking office but now is talking about reducing the forces still further, just after complaining that we do not have enough forces to do the job as it is.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated a number of the comments made by my colleague, particularly the one where people such as Saddam Hussein must not be permitted to violate human rights and must in fact respect international laws. I just wanted him to explain to me very briefly what he believes the government's position is with regard to his point, that is that Canadian Armed Forces and other forces ought to be under UN command. Second, he did mention that the Prime Minister of course had not convened the House to make those decisions. He referred to the Oka crisis and to the gulf crisis, but is this not an approach that the Prime Minister uses on whatever he undertakes? It is either that or closure or some other form of limiting discussion by Canadians.

I have a final point. He spoke about a new order of peace and co-operation in helping each other out.

I do not know if the member has the time to respond to those three questions: the Canadian Armed Forces under UN command, the government's approach of not consulting, and the new order. If so, I would appreciate those comments.

Mr. Hopkins: I thank the hon. member for his question. First, the Prime Minister has an attitudinal problem. He is the Prime Minister of a democratic county, but he does not call Parliament into session to discuss decisions that his government is making in committing our Armed Forces abroad, and that is wrong.

Never again in this House—and I said that in ending my speech—should any government in this country ever commit troops to a military problem area where there might be a war without calling Parliament into session. This is still a democratic country, and the Prime Minister is practising dictatorship within the democratic situation we have in Canada and going along no his own.

On the Oka affair, I think the army did the best possible job it could. I had very good communication with some people in it. When they heard they were going to go in there, they said: "Nobody what happens, we are going to get blamed for what happened". I saw on television one night where a young soldier got punched in the nose, blood was streaming down his face. He never reacted. He stood there.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that at last, with other members of Parliament, I have an opportunity to speak on Canada's action in relation to the events around the Persian Gulf this summer.

The government's resolution on which we are debating begins well enough. It says that the House condemns the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and demands the complete withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and affirms, quoting from the resolution:

> —unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2.

So far, so good, but unfortunately the government's resolution goes on to tie this to:

> —the despatch of members of the Canadian Forces to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula;—

Even though the government had first spoken about the United Nations, it slides over the fact that the United Nations did not authorize that military action and the military action is not led, let alone commanded by the United Nations.

The New Democratic Party and I fully agree with the first part of the resolution, condemning Iraq's invasion of Kuwait and supporting the United Nations Security Council's decisions. It is likely that if there are further decisions by the Security Council in this matter we will support them as well.

However, we do not support the decision of the United States and certain other countries to take large military action in and around the Arabian Peninsula. We believe they should have waited for the United Nations to carry out the mandate that it has in this matter to give leadership to the nations of the world.

Therefore, of course, with my party, I support the amendment by the Liberal Party, that instead of the words "to take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula", we put in the words "to enforce these United Nations resolutions and that this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis". We support that.

I do not intend to discuss that point particularly today since I think it has been well treated so far.

However, I do want to focus on the subamendment moved by the member for Yukon, the Leader of the NDP, to add the following words:

> And further, that Canada work at the Security Council to seek assurances that no country will take undertake offensive military operations against Iraq unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council.

There are provisions in the United Nations Charter in articles 42 and 43 for dealing with this sort of situation. They have been very little used during a great deal of the history of the United Nations for reasons that have often been commented upon, having to do with the cold war.

I believe this is the occasion when those articles should be used. I think the United Nations is the only instrument created by the nations of the world by which we can choose a course of peace at this time, not instant peace but direction toward peace and avoid a course toward war.

We could be at a turning point. This is not just one little incident. This is an incident with many others behind it, beside it, and possibly following it. We could be making a major choice—not just Canada but some countries of the world—either to have more generations of war, and perhaps the ultimately disastrous war that all of us have learned to fear, or a choice toward building peace, slowly, with difficulty, with disappointment but nevertheless moving more and more by agreement toward peace.

I fear the danger is that we could tumble into a resumption of the conflict between what some people have called the northern hemisphere and the southern hemisphere, give or take a few miles here and there.

Beginning 1,000 years ago, there was a conflict between Europe and Islam as it spread across the Arabian Peninsula, northern Africa, and even into south western and south eastern Europe. Then there were five centuries of European expansion. There was conquest in the other continents, massacres of the population as in many parts of the western hemisphere, enslavement of non-European peoples mainly, and pillaging of their resources as though their people had no right of ownership to them.

Those memories have not disappeared among those people who are the majority of the world as it happens now. I believe there is no authority in the world except the United Nations that can guide us to find the way to peace. It is not some outside authority. The United Nations is us, but we have to work together to do it.

We must now stick with the United Nations in order to avoid a possible network of wars, not just one war alone around Kuwait and Iraq but the possible repercussions of it as happened, as everybody knows, in 1914 when one assassination in what was thought of as an unimportant part of Europe plunged Europe and other parts of the world into four years of war.

There are the possibilities of serious wars related to this not only in the Middle East but in other parts of Africa, in other parts of Asia and in Central or South America. As I said, I agree that Iraq by modern standards is an aggressor. It is a military aggressor. What it did is wrong. We must condemn it and oppose it by the best means we can choose.

However, as it was put once by Jesus: "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone." This is not the first act of military aggression in recent history. It is not the first act of military aggression in 1990. It is the first time the United Nations Security Council has taken it up, or the first time it has been able to arrive at an unanimous decision with none of the five permanent members vetoing action.

I want to plead with members to go easy on the luxury of talking about fighting Iraq, deposing Saddam. Calling him a madman suggests that he might be less than human, and therefore we can treat him as less than human. I believe that is not the kind of thinking we should be following. That is no solution.

We have been told that we had to act quickly to protect Saudi Arabia. We really have been presented, so far as I have heard, with no evidence that Saudi Arabia was in danger. United States reported that it had information through its satellites that Iraqi tanks were amassing on the Saudi border.

United States reports have before at times turned out not to be true. There was the infamous Gulf of Tonkin incident which was concocted in order to escalate the war in Vietnam. Perhaps it was a mistake. Perhaps it was not deliberately concocted, but it certainly should not have been used as the jumping off point for that miserable war.

The invasion of Kuwait arises from a 60-year old dispute, in part that was generated by Britain's handling of its sphere of influence in the Middle East after World War I. There is no such dispute to my knowledge between Iraq and Saudi Arabia. There is no such dispute over any shared oil fields and this dispute between Iraq and Kuwait is partly a legacy of World War I colonialism when Britain and France as the principal victors in World War I, partitioned the old Ottoman Empire and took some as colonies and took some as, in effect, semi-independent states but under their tutelage.

In that area where Britain and France have been active ever since, though less than before, we had the United Nations' action of creating the State of Israel, a decision which unfortunately blew up in a dispute between the Israelis and those who had lived there before.

This arose from Britain's policy of having promised during the war, to get allies, promised the same land both to the Palestinians who had always lived there and to the Jews who yearned to return there.

When the United Nations tried to stabilize that situation with Resolution 242 demanding that Israel withdraw from territories it had occupied in war later on, that was scorned by Israel, ignored by the United States, not enforced by the Security Council, just as there was no Security Council action to stop or even condemn the United States for its naked, aggressive invasion of Panama and the killing of 3,000 people, mostly civilians. In other words we have a double standard here, Mr. Speaker, and let us not go to war just to make a debating point in a double standard.

The fact is also that the five permanent members of the Security Council have been among those who armed Saddam during the past 10 years. Why? Apparently they wanted Saddam to attack Iran, which Saddam did. Now Saddam has made peace with Iran and has attacked Kuwait, but his conduct as a military aggressor was blessed for years by the United States, by Britain, by France, implicitly, and suddenly they have turned their blessing into a curse.

Mr. Speaker, we have something on our own consciences as allies in NATO of the United States and Britain. In fact it was the NATO alliance to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs appealed as an authority when he said that he had sent the ships to the Middle East after consulting with NATO officials in Brussels. The Middle East is not in the legal sphere of responsibility of NATO by the NATO charter. It is thousands, or hundreds of miles outside it. NATO had no business authorizing ships or encouraging Canada to send ships to the Gulf of Oman. It was not NATO's responsibility, although I understand some NATO generals, now that they do not think they have to use their weapons against the Soviet Union, would like to try them somewhere else, such as in Arabia to defend United States oil.

United States oil has been a very serious problem in the Middle East for a good many decades, for example in the overthrow of the former Prime Minister of Iran. I am reading here from a document called The Recent Iranian History by the parliamentary Library dated September 19. In part he is talking about the dispute over oil price:

> —the British owned Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (AIOC) was still in place, and its royalties to Iran totalled less than the British Government's tax revenues from the Company. Many Iranians grew increasingly discontent with this arrangement, regarding it as blatant exploitation—

Further down, the article states:

> Agitation to nationalize all Iranian oil production has been growing since the end of the War—Mohammad Mossadeq emerged as the Majlas member who rallied the nationalist cause, and the shah felt compelled to support the legislature's nationalization of the oil industry (after the fact, and to appoint Mossadeq as Prime Minister.

• (1620)

Then, enter the United States.

> The shah saw his position gradually being eroded, whereupon he conspired with the Eisenhower administration to oust Mossadeq. Operation Ajax was set in motion in August 1953, whereby Mossadeq was deposed, the shah regained control, and a number of ultra-nationalists were tried and executed.

That is what the United States was willing to do, by way of aggression, to ensure a low price for the oil it wished to buy. So I say that the United States and some other countries come to this dispute without clean hands.

There is wide antipathy in the Arab world, so one reads. I have not had the opportunity to travel there, yet. There is wide antipathy toward Europeans, including the Europeans who govern the United States of America. It is not only with Iraq that we might find ourselves fighting. We know that some of the other countries there are not on our side or not fully on our side. Iran and Jordan have an uncertain position from our point of view, that is, from our military point of view. The danger is that the war that started by the NATO powers, with a few small allies including Egypt, making military moves to the Persian Gulf, might turn out to be unwinnable. I quote here from another article which I happened to find by chance, as I was browsing through The Financial Post on Tuesday, October 16. The article is by John Shiry and I quote:

> U.S. and Western policy toward the Middle East is in a shambles. In the past and at present, the West's best friends have been monarchs who control most of the oil, and the state of Israel. History and population numbers are on the other side.

He goes on to point out, in another quotation:

> The region has problems of poverty, illiteracy, public health, population growth, water supplies, development and food production.
> At this time, about 200 million Arabs live in the area that stretches from Algeria to Iran. At current rates of growth that will double in less than 25 years and reach 500 million by the year 2025.

Now the point that he is making is that the oil tends to be in the countries with small populations and the countries with large populations are relatively poor and what he has described there is the poverty of the large populations. He goes on:

> Most of these people live in countries that are not rich, and most of their cultures place a high value on having large families. At the same time, most of the economies are unable to provide adequate jobs, health care, education and housing for their existing populations. A central problem is that much of the region's oil wealth is in the countries with small populations.

The point that we of the countries who are members of NATO would do well to remember is the point that he makes in the last paragraph that I quote:

> To many leaders and citizens of the region,—

—that is Arabia.

> —the only things the West cares about are cheap oil and the security of Israel. That is not the case. But it is easy to see how the image can exist.

That is the warning. It is not just Saddam Hussein who sees us as the enemy, it a great many millions of people besides him. In fact, we have to understand that the era of gunboat diplomacy has come to an end. The NATO powers had better understand that we are not about to continue ruling the world for another five centuries. We have been selling arms. Some people grew quite rich in our country by selling arms to the former colonies. Other people grew rich by lending them money to buy the arms and collected the interest on the debts and overthrew governments if they did not pay the interest.

These people have all kinds of conventional weapons. We have had so many stories about weaponry that Saddam has and nearly all of it he bought from our countries except what he made with machinery he bought from our countries, such as chemical weapons and perhaps nuclear weapons. We ought not to be surprised if Saddam uses the weapons we provided him and uses them in the way we have been using them during this century, including the nuclear weapons.

The question is what alternative is there to both appeasement and to international war? The answer is common security. Former U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance was one of the pioneers of this concept. He said some years ago:

> There is one overriding truth in this nuclear age—no nation can achieve true security by itself—Both we and the Soviet Union are, and will remain, vulnerable to nuclear attack—To guarantee our own security in this nuclear age, we must therefore face these realities and work together with other nations to achieve common security. For security in the nuclear age means common security.

The question is, how can we put into practice the principle of common security put forward by the former Secretary of State of the United States? That is the principle, that if our enemy is afraid of us, we are not safe. Or if we are afraid of our enemy, he is not safe, not with nuclear weapons around. The principle is that we must co-operate in order to live and in order bequeath a world in which our children or our grandchildren can live.

We have the basic means to do that in the United Nations. We have the United Nations General Assembly when for the first time in the history of the world almost all countries, including the Arab countries, are present. We have the Security Council empowered to act. We have the World Court, even though the United States ignores it. We have almost four decades of experience of UN peacekeeping.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are indicating that my time is close to finished and I simply want to make two more points. We must make up our minds to use the least violent methods we can find to end international violence. Some of these are sanctions, continued negotiations, a peace conference on the Middle East to include Israel and the Palestine Liberal Organization and we must stop the deadly trade of money for weapons.

Finally, we should learn to get off dependency on oil. We can do that and it would help everybody including ourselves if we would.

These are alternatives to appeasement. They are alternatives to international war. It is in lines like this we must work to try to restore peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I found the comments, particularly the final comments of my friend from Trinity—Spadina most interesting given the article that I was just reading Defense & Diplomacy, October 1990 issue, an article by Dr. Christine M. Helms. In this article Dr. Helms discusses some of the background of the present dispute in the Persian Gulf, as set out by my friend, and makes a comment that the seeds of discontent between Iraq and the United States had been sown at least five years earlier when American officials became increasingly concerned over Iraq's military capabilities, particularly an acquisition of advanced technology. She goes on in the article to talk about one of the matters the member for Trinity—Spadina has talked about, common security. I think it would be relevant to quote a couple of paragraphs from the article where she says:

> Rhetoric is platitude, and morality will remain elusive. The ultimate losers are the region's common folk, people whose mundane daily problems will continue to multiply. The region's population, for example, will double in the next two decades in the face of dwindling resources, especially water.
> But crises can be turned for the better. If Arab leaders can address more effectively the causes of the region's economic and social discontent and the Western world can learn about the deep-rooted causes of conflict in the region and assist in a wise positive response, some good may yet come of all this.

• (1630)

Given the hon. member's comments on our common security and a move toward common security, does he feel that any of the recipe for that commonalty is present? Can there be some way that some good can come out of this total conflict?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I think it can. I do not think it will or will not. I am not trying to predict. We have the possibility. We are in the very business now, along with people in other countries, of making that choice.

We can choose to revert to old patterns, World War I and World War II patterns, and fire all our ammunition or, we can choose to hold off, to pull back, and to use diplomatic pressure, economic pressure, offers of aid, not only to the Iraqi population who are by far definitely not the most affluent in the world, offers of aid to others in that region, that is non-military aid instead of sending more guns, either in the hands of our troops or to put into their hands. That money is needed so that children, women, and even men can live. I believe if we move in that direction, then there is the chance to do something much better than what we have had up until now in the Middle East.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate my desk-mate on an excellent speech.

I would like to comment briefly that I think there has been a tremendous loss which Canada as a country has faced because of our decision to follow the United States to the Persian Gulf. Since the Korean War, we, as a country, have always seen for ourselves our fundamental and basic role in the world to be that of peacekeeping. With the decision to take an active part in the military role that has been established in the Persian Gulf, we have seriously hurt our credibility in the future as a country that will be acceptable in peacekeeping situations, such as Cyprus and the Middle East, itself.

It is very easy with some kind of gung-ho patriotism to say to the United States, as the Conservatives used to say to Britain: "Ready, aye, ready." It is dangerous, not so much because in this case we will be caught up in battle, although that may happen, but dangerous because the number of countries in the world that are committed to peace and to using peacekeeping as a mechanism to solve problems is reduced if we withdraw from that task which we have seen for ourselves in the past.

I hope very much, Mr. Speaker, that across the country there will be a rethinking of the commitment to take military action in the Persian Gulf. I hope that we will see ourselves as the world's peacekeepers and recognize that means that we do not get involved in these kinds of potentially very active conflicts of an armed sort.

Would my colleague agree with that position?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina has a couple of minutes to wind up.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank my seat-mate for the question. I hope he will not feel I am ungrateful if I do not entirely agree with him. We may have to sort this out outside.

I do not think we have lost our status and our standing in people's eyes as peacemakers. I think we made a mistake sending the ships. They were sent there. Now it is done. I think it was a mistake, but I do not think the world will refuse to forgive us for one relatively small mistake, and so far, not a harmful one.

I have said that we do not need to act as though we were pure, like the man who was invited by Jesus to cast the first stone, and there was not anybody found to do that. We do not need to be self-righteous. We could admit we made a mistake and back off. I think our record over the years would stand us very well.

I am particularly proud of what I saw when I was in Nicaragua in February, at the time of the election there, and the work that the United Nations had done to ensure, for the first time in most of those countries, a peaceful transition from a military dictatorship to a civilian rule of a different party. That is what the United Nations did for Nicaragua and the Nicaraguan people of both points of view are grateful for it. I believe that Canadian being participants in that still have a good record, but we should not damage it any further than we have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear at the beginning of my speech that I fully support that part of the government's resolution which condemns the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

We must be opposed to any unilateral military action which serves the sole interest of one country, in this case, the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. But we must be consistent with that principle, and whereas it was wrong for Iraq to invade Kuwait, it was also wrong in previous years for the United States to invade Grenada, and for the Soviet Union to invade Afghanistan. It was also wrong for the United States to fund the Contras so it could then invade Nicaragua, and for the Americans at the same time to set up a unilateral, economic blockade against the very small and struggling country of Nicaragua.

All those actions were wrong. They are all unilateral, military actions by a bigger power against the smaller country and done in the self interests of those countries. So, Mr. Speaker, while it is right to condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, I must say that it does not help the United States' case that it has carried out similar military actions in the past, nor the Soviet Union's, as I said, who made similar invasions in the past.

• (1640)

We should all hope this incident in the Middle East would lead to a new attitude by the superpowers—the United States and the Soviet Union—and other powerful countries, that we must never use unilateral, military action against another country to serve the self-interests of our own country.

While I say I fully support the condemnation of Iraq in this particular case, at the same time, I have been and I was in the beginning extremely concerned by the fact that Canada's response in sending three ships to the area was done at the request of the United States in the first place, and not by the United Nations. The immediate action by the government to send three ships, no matter how grave the attack on Kuwait was, was done at the request of the United States. That concerned me very much. It was troublesome.

I was also concerned for many weeks—this has been pointed out by many members on this side of the House—that when the government made the decision to send those ships to an area where war might very well break out, it did not immediately recall Parliament. Again, I do not think that the government should ever do that again. Whenever our military forces are sent to any area of the world, it should involve the Parliament of Canada in the decision. It may have been able to convince us in August that it was the right thing to do, but we should have done it with the approval of Parliament and not by the government alone. The government was at fault for not doing that.

One reason that it was incorrect for the Government of Canada to send those three ships in the first place at the request of the United States alone is that it undermines our credibility as a peacekeeping nation. Canada has had a long reputation as one of the outstanding peacekeeping nations in the world. We participated in almost every peacekeeping operation. Our former Prime Minister, Lester B. Pearson, was awarded the Nobel prize for initiating UN peacekeeping forces. When we respond to a situation like this without doing it through the United Nations, I think we undermine that credibility.

Despite those early misgivings, things turned out better than I originally had hoped for, because soon afterwards the United Nations Security Council did pass a resolution authorizing mandatory economic sanctions against Iraq. It also authorized the use of military forces to enforce the economic sanctions.

That was a great step forward for the United Nations, because it was the first time I believe that it was able to use Article VII of the UN Charter to enforce a decision of the Security Council. Now we have a situation where I think 150 countries support the economic embargo, 150 countries support the resolution of September 24 in the United Nations, and there are 25 nations which have military forces in the gulf area.

All that is to the good, but I must say there are still some very serious questions that have to be answered. Of course, one of them is that, while the forces that are there are operating under the mandate of the United Nations resolutions, it is still very unclear as to what is the command with respect to those forces.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the UN Charter provides for a Security Council military committee which is to supervise the use of forces under Article VII of the Charter, but that is not being done at the present time. The United States has been reluctant to place its forces under such a command. We have a situation right now where, legally the lines of command are unclear, but in fact, we know that the United States is calling the shots, and I do not think that is acceptable. While there has been a stand-off in the Gulf area between the multilateral forces stationed in the Gulf and in Saudi Arabia and the Iraqi forces in Kuwait, with no further military action, it is always possible with that large build-up of forces that military action could take place.

I was present at the evidence before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence just a few days ago. There was testimony by some witnesses that war is inevitable. That, I found, was a very depressing analysis of the situation and I hope it does not take place, but many experts believe that sooner or later this situation will develop into outright fighting.

There are four possible goals for those forces in the Gulf area. The first one, of course, is to enforce the sanctions against Iraq as has been authorized by the United Nations and is acceptable and legitimate. Others, however, are talking about the use of the forces to protect Saudi Arabia if there is an attack on Saudi Arabia by the Iraqi forces.

Again, one could legitimize the use of the forces in that instance because they would be protecting a sovereign country against an invasion. That would be legitimate in the short period under Article 51 of the UN Charter, but if the UN is being consistent, I am sure it would agree to the protection of a sovereign state against any invasion.

I do not think that is a possibility at the present time because I doubt if the Iraqi forces could overwhelm the multinational forces that are in Saudi Arabia and that area, especially with the very powerful American forces supported by other countries which are there. So, there are those two options that could be acceptable under UN auspices; that is to enforce the sanctions and to protect Saudi Arabia against any attack.

However, there are two other options which are being discussed in the councils of the world and by governments of the world that involve more risk. The third such option is that those multinational forces take the first move to drive the Iraqi forces out of Kuwait. Again that would be an extremely risky move at this time. If a decision was to be made in that respect, I think it should not be made unilaterally by any of the parties there, but be considered at the United Nations after many alternatives had been tried and, perhaps, failed.

The fourth option, and this is being discussed, is that the forces would be used not only to drive Iraq out of Kuwait, but to depose Saddam Hussein from office in Iraq and put that government out of power to assure that no further such actions took place. Again, Mr. Speaker, that is a very dangerous contemplated action.

Of those four options which are open to the multinational forces in the Middle East, I think it is obvious that the first one is totally acceptable. The second one is also acceptable. But the third or fourth must be looked upon with serious reservation and should not be contemplated at the present time whatsoever.

As many other hon. members have said, I think every attempt has to be made to resolve this situation peacefully. The resolution before us also asks for the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. Well, I think we have to try and attain that goal through negotiated actions and through sanctions.

I noticed today that the Iraqi government has offered to sell its oil for $21 per barrel, about half the world price, in an attempt to win friends. I hope that no nations of the world will be led astray in accepting that offer. If I have the information correct, Iraq earns 85 per cent of its revenue through the sale of oil, and it is by the refusal to buy that oil that we are going to bring Iraq to its knees and make it listen to sense in this particular instance. When I say listen to sense, I really mean common sense.

If you try to justify what Iraq is doing today and has done in recent weeks against Kuwait, one day similar action may be used against Iraq itself by a bigger power. You cannot use this type of military action simply when it pleases you and hope that people will forget about it or that it will go away in the minds of the nations of the world. That is why I said there is some hypocrisy here. While the United States is now supporting multilateral action under the UN, it has taken unilateral action to serve its own purposes in the past. That was equally unacceptable.

Unfortunately, the ability of the United Nations to respond to such an attack as was made by Iraq on Kuwait through the use of peacekeeping forces is not adequate at the present time. Years ago the United Nations made a request to several countries of the world to designate standby forces for the United Nations so that when an incident like this took place, forces would be trained and in place so they could immediately respond to the situation.

Canada as a country, under both Liberal and Conservative governments, has designated that it will have forces ready and has always been ready to respond in that way. There have not been enough nations of the world to do that. As a result, when you do have such invasions, it lends itself to countries like the United States involving itself unilaterally at the request of Saudi Arabia to protect that nation. Nevertheless, it is not the most desirable way to proceed if we want to avoid unilateral action by nations and not common security through the United Nations.

There has been a great improvement in the United Nations in recent years. We can look at the action it took in helping resolve the situation in Afghanistan. We can look at other situations which the United Nations has been able to resolve in recent years. Much has had to do with the new attitude in the Soviet Union. I take this opportunity to congratulate Secretary General Gorbachev of the Soviet Union for winning the Nobel Peace Prize. A new breath of air has come into the United Nations as a result of the co-operation between the Soviet Union and the United States. Hopefully, both countries will be willing to act through that international body rather than unilaterally on their own or even together as superpowers.

Once this incident passes, we have to use this opportunity and experience to effectively strengthen the capacity of UN peacekeeping and peacemaking forces so that the United Nations will be able to handle these situations quickly and effectively, without nations being tempted to resort to unilateral action.

I have examined all of the plans that have been put forward to bring peace to that region. It appears to me that the one put forward by President Mitterrand of France is probably the best. President Mitterrand has suggested that if Iraq withdraws unconditionally from Kuwait and releases the hostages, there should be an international peacekeeping conference to consider all the conflicts and problems in the Middle East, including the Palestinian question. Whether we like it or not, it is linked to this particular conflict. I say whether we like it not because, while in the first case it may appear that it is not linked, it is linked in the minds of the nations in the Middle East. If we are going to have peace in the area, we have to deal with the Palestinian question and their right to have a state of their own. As has been stated in this House on several occasions, Canada has long supported UN resolutions, which go a long way back to secure the boundaries of Israel originally agreed upon but at the same time provide for a Palestinian state in the West Bank and in the Gaza. Mr. Speaker, there will never be peace in that area unless that is done.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are motioning to me that my time is coming to an end. In conclusion, I simply want to say that our bottom line in this particular case is that we can never accept unilateral military action. The best response has to be common security action through the United Nations. I hope that we in the House will be able to agree upon a resolution as a result of this incident. I understand that such a resolution is in the process, a resolution which will make those principles absolutely clear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before we have questions and comments, there is a point of order by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, in relation to the government motion respecting the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, Motion No. 16:
> Debate on such motion and on any amendment or subamendment thereto be the only government order to be called today following the adoption of this motion; and, that such debate continue following Private Member's Hour and adjournment proceedings today until no member rises in debate, but in any case no later than 1 a.m., at which time a deferred recorded division on such motion and on any amendment and subamendment thereto shall be deemed to have been requested and ordered to take place at 6 p.m. on Tuesday, October 23, 1990, following which ordering on Thursday, October 18, 1990 the House shall adjourn; and, that following the adoption of this motion and until the House adjourns today, dilatory motions and quorum calls shall not be receivable.

Mr. Dingwall: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion among representatives of the parties of the House and our party would consent to that motion as read by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on our behalf, too, there have been discussions and this meets with our approval.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a little problem with that. I do not think you can have the adjournment debate from 6 p.m. to 6.30 p.m. I think we will have to delete that portion of the motion, if it is agreeable to the House. A point of order, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: I understand that normally the adjournment proceedings would take place following the extension, but this was discussed among the parties and I believe that there is agreement that by consent of the House we would in fact proceed with the adjournment proceeding as scheduled at 6 p.m. and then resume the debate. My understanding is that by unanimous consent that can be agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can signify that was discussed and agreed. The motion as read was the one that we agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know we can do anything here by unanimous consent, but I just wanted to bring to the attention of the House that when there are extended hours, during that time we usually drop the adjournment debate. We have Private Member's, but we do drop the adjournment debate. The Chair is your obedient servant.

Mr. Dingwall: In the spirit of trying to co-operate with members to the extreme left, we thought that we could accommodate them in that particular request. It was agreed to by the parliamentary secretary, myself and the hon. member for Burnaby that we would proceed with the Private Member's Hour, followed thereafter by the adjournment debate, and then we would resume with the major debate on the Iraq motion that we are now debating. That was the understanding of all three political parties, unless I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, my friend on the extreme right is correct, that was the understanding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am glad you got your act together. Thank you very much. Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on todays Order Paper.

INDEPENDENT REVIEW AND ARBITRATION

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing an independent review and arbitration process whereby disputes between athletes and sports organizations can be resolved, with power to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on August 25, 1978, two members of the Canadian swim team competing in the World Championships in Berlin decided to go out for a quiet dinner. In the course of their celebration of what had been for them a very good season, each of them had one beer and were five minutes late for their curfew. As a result, they were sent home without explanation and lost their position on the team and lost the careers they had developed.

Sports in Canada is rife with stories of this kind. What was once upon a time a simple matter of signing on for participation in an event has in the post-war period become quite a different exercise and activity.

Sports in Canada, as around the world, has become professional. Sports in terms of the Olympics, Commonwealth Games, and Pan American Games has become professional. This is not in itself a bad thing in the arts and cultural field. Because of the resources we have built and the kinds of economies we have, we have been able to employ significant numbers of our people in the pursuit of excellence. This is so in arts and so in sports.

We have provided an opportunity for Canadians of all ages. Mr. Speaker, you in fact may be eligible even now for the lawn bowling team to compete in the Commonwealth Games in Victoria in 1994.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: I will take that up with the Victoria Commonwealth Games Society, Mr. Speaker. I am sure your application would be well received. The fact is, though, that if you were to do that you would be subject first of all to a body that would decide who is to be on the team. Once on the team, you would be subject to the rules of that team. Included in those rules would be the absolute discretion as to whether you would compete or not.

As we all know—and not only in the area of selection and eligibility, but also when it comes to working conditions—financial assistance to athletes is determined now by a very complex bureaucratic process. Young athletes—and they are primarily younger than you and I, Mr. Speaker—who are elite athletes still in competition live in a world completely dominated by the bureaucracies that govern them. Most of the people who work in these bureaucracies do so out of a conviction that sport has a very important place in our society. However, they do so also often without any significant training on employer-employee relations and without any significant constraints on the powers they exercise over young people and over the athletes and coaches who work for them.

Clearly one of the most dramatic examples we have seen in recent years is the Ben Johnson affair. When we look a bit closely at that, we see some of the problems that this motion is intended to address.

Ben Johnson clearly made a major breach of the rules under which he was expected to work. The penalty imposed upon him was not a penalty that had been promulgated for the offence he committed, for having been found guilty for the first time of use of banned substances. The government and, through the government, the sports organizations purported to ban him for life. Yet, the fact of the matter is that at the time the appropriate sentence that had been set down for a first offence was a two-year suspension. It is only now, two years later, that in this area justice has been restored to Ben Johnson.

This motion which is before us calls on the government to:

> —consider the advisability of an independent review and arbitration process whereby disputes between athletes and sports organizations can be resolved, with power to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate.

The genesis of this motion which I placed on the Order Paper in April 1989 was a book entitled Athletes' Rights in Canada by Bruce Kidd and Mary Eberts. This book represents a comprehensive analysis of the situation facing athletes and coaches in our sports system across Canada. It was ironic perhaps that following the filing of this motion the Dubin inquiry, for totally different reasons, began to get into its deliberations.

I had an opportunity to present views to the Dubin inquiry and was appreciative of the acknowledgement of that by Mr. Justice Dubin. However, I was even more appreciative of his recommendation and conclusion. Mr. Justice Dubin concluded at page 556 of his report as follows:

> As I have stated earlier in this report, the rights of athletes must be respected. It is apparent that athletes have a number of areas for potential disagreement with their sport-governing bodies, including not only doping infractions and eligibility to compete, but also the broad range of rules that govern the conduct of amateur athletes. At present there is no uniform method of resolving these disputes.

Mr. Justice Dubin, as he then was, went on to recommend in recommendation 38 as follows:

> THAT all national sport-governing bodies establish within their own rules a grievance process through which athletes may receive a fair hearing from the sport-governing body itself, including a mechanism for arbitration by an independent arbitrator mutually acceptable to the parties.

I urge on the government and I ask this House to urge on the government an acceptance of that recommendation by Mr. Dubin. The recommendation is a very important one for natural justice to the thousands of athletes and coaches who compete and work in our system.

The model that is suggested by the very language is the model that comes from the world of labour relations. As Bruce Kidd has pointed out on a number of occasions, including in his evidence before the Dubin inquiry, the relationship of athletes and coaches to the sports organizations is in reality the relationship of employer and employee. However, the only rules that govern are those rules imposed by the sports organizations, often through contracts which the athletes are required to sign and the coaches are required to sign. Often those contracts are signed without any real bargaining power on the side of the athletes and coaches who have to sign them. They either sign them or they do not participate.

The labour relations model permits a process of conciliation as well as arbitration. In the world of courts and trials there is relatively little emphasis on that. The world of labour relations does permit an understanding that what really has happened in most of these cases is a breakdown of the relationship and that, therefore, there should be some real effort to mediate and resolve the underlying dispute. However, behind that there must be some independent capacity to make a decision which will be binding on the sports organizations so if someone is disciplined without just cause, or the length of the discipline is unfair, or if someone is not selected to a team outside the basic rules that should fairly apply or is de-selected, thrown off the team, or is ruled not eligible for funding, unfairly or improperly, not in accordance with the rules, the athlete or coach who is so treated will have some access to justice and to some independent ruling.

Some will be concerned that this is going to tie up things and is going to get lawyers and everybody else involved. It has been shown again in the world of labour relations, that does not have to happen. There are hundreds of thousands of grievances that take place in the work world. Virtually all of them are decided quickly. Often the representative of the employer has barely realized that a mistake has been made. But that has, nonetheless, been felt to be a grievance by the subject employee.

In this case, the very existence of the system will act to encourage those in positions of authority in the sports world to be fair in dealing with the athletes and coaches involved.

We can easily foresee a system which will permit a quick and immediate resolution of issues which need a quick and immediate resolution, all short, I may say, of telephone judges in the middle of a day.

We can have systems which will mean that there can be a quick interim decision followed eventually by a more careful and thorough examination of the facts, and where possible, a remedy that can be applied.

It should also be necessary, as part of this regime, that the government through Sports Canada should be educating sports organizations and those involved in the system of the kind of rights athletes and coaches should have.

I hope the government members will not see fit to talk this bill out. It is an important matter to thousands of Canadians. It is nothing that is finally binding on the government, it merely asks the government to consider this proposal. We are are already looking at this in the subcommittee on Fitness and Amateur Sport and will be making recommendations on this issue to the government. We would be assisted by the general views of this House as to the advisability of an independent review. We are really simply asking the House to endorse the recommendations of the Dubin Inquiry and to pass judgment that this is a sound and fitting idea.

The relevance of the idea can be seen in a case that has already come before our committee, and that is the case of Andrezej Kulesza, the weightlifting coach who felt thoroughly abused by the findings and report of the Dubin Inquiry with respect to his case. He may be right or he may be wrong, as he appeared before the committee, he had a deep sense of grievance at the treatment he felt he had received. Our committee was unanimous in asking the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, as perhaps a first and test case, to accept the Dubin approach in his case, which was to establish his right to appeal this to an independent arbitrator. Therefore, we have already a specific and active case, and if the House could endorse the motion I have put before it, would assist in a fair and just resolution of this.

In the Dubin report there are many eloquent statements of great as to the role of sport in our society. I would like to refer the House to the following, on page 499 of the report. At the beginning of the chapter, "Ethics and Morality in Sport", Commissioner Dubin says this:

> We look to sport to build character, to teach the virtues of dedication, perseverance, endurance and self-discipline. Sport helps us to learn from defeat as much as from victory, and team sports foster a spirit of co-operation and interdependence. We look to sport to impart something of moral and social values and, in integrating us as individuals, to bring about a healthy, integrated society.

Mr. Speaker, one of the fundamental rights in our society afforded to employees in every aspect of our national life is the right of association, the right to the protection of collective bargaining. That right is not afforded to athletes.

I submit this House has an obligation, as does the government, to see that one of the most fundamental elements of justice in the workplace, and in this case, justice in the field of sport, be afforded to our young Canadians, that is the right to have their grievances fairly and impartially determined.

I would call on the House to unanimously endorse the motion before you.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as has been so abundantly demonstrated on occasions, you are far more fit than I.

I am pleased, Sir, to participate today in the debate on the motion put forward by my friend for Victoria. The hon. member plays an active role in the parliamentary subcommittee and his views are of great interest and concern to the government.

[Translation]

As hon. members know, Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada was pleased to receive the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the use of drugs and banned practices intended to increase athletic performance—better know as the Dubin Report—which the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport tabled in the House last June 27.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give my colleagues a few additional details concerning the report because I think they are particularly relevant to the motion now before the House.

The report was the culmination of a process initiated by the federal government a little over two years ago after Canadian athletes got positive drug test readings at the Seoul Summer Olympic Games in Korea.

This was a wide-ranging inquiry. Public hearings ran from January to October 1989, 119 witnesses were heard, 295 exhibits were produced and 26 written briefs were presented. In the end Mr. Justice Dubin's report contained 70 recommendations, most of them addressed to the federal government and to other interested parties belonging to the Canadian sports system, national sports organizations, the Canadian Academy of Sport Medicine, the Canadian Olympic Association, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario.

On August 9 of this year the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport made a series of early announcements concerning about 26 of the 70 recommendations. More specifically the announcements related to the situation of people mentioned in the report—athletes, coaches and other support staff—and to a proposed structure concerning future drug-related sanctions. At the same time the minister indicated he would attempt to respond to the remaining report recommendations before year's end.

[English]

The issue of an arbitration process for sport was clearly addressed in the Dubin report. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the report contains no less than 10 recommendations which speak to the need for improved appeal, arbitration and investigative procedures in respect of doping. As noted previously, these recommendations are directed at many authorities in the current sports system. For example, Recommendation 11(a) sees an expanded role for the Sport Medical Council of Canada as "the central independent agency responsible for doping control of Canadian athletes and co-ordination of Canada's anti-doping activities." This expanded role would include among other things responsibility for "investigating and reporting to Sport Canada incidents of doping infractions".

• (1720)

Recommendations 37 and 38 call upon national sport governing bodies to establish under their own rules mechanisms through which the conduct of coaches can be investigated and adjudicated, and grievance processes, including independent arbitration, though which "athletes may receive a fair hearing from the sport-government body itself."

A key recommendation addressed to the federal government in this regard was recommendation 42 which calls upon Sport Canada to establish "a right of appeal to an independent arbitrator rather than to the Minister", as currently practised, in the case of those who have "violated the Sport Canada anti-doping policy" and committed other infractions.

In general, the Dubin inquiry was critical of the scope of existing procedures in this area, arguing that they are inadequate from the following standpoints: generally speaking, limited and/or inconsistent means exist in sporting governance to investigate allegations, suspicions or evidence of involvement with banned substances.

Appeal, arbitration and investigation procedures are limited. At present, the conduct of athletes alone is considered. Offences by support and other directly related sport personnel, coaches in particular, are not defined, and hence subject neither to investigation nor sanction.

At present, there is no uniform, objective method by which athletes or others may receive a fair hearing on doping or other sport related issues. In most cases, current arbitration, to the extent it exists, is deal with "in-house" by the national sport-governing bodies.

While the Dubin Inquiry on the appeal, arbitration and investigation processes dealt essentially with doping infractions, the report section devoted to the athletes' rights clearly reflects a concern for sport related disputes generally. Beyond doping infractions, the wide variety of rules which govern the behaviour of amateur athletes are not currently subjected to a standard dispute resolving mechanism.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the need to adopt a new dispute resolving approach in sport is clearly spelled out in the Dubin Report. The spirit of the motion we are dealing with today is certainly consistent with the principle arising out of the report's recommendations and general recognition that improvements are needed in a great many areas of our sport system.

But, as I said, Mr. Speaker, this system involves many parties which all have a part to play in bringing about these improvements and whose lack of participation to the process would minimize the chances of significant changes. Fully aware of this fact, the Minister of State will live up to the commitment he made in August to carry out large scale consultations.

[English]

At the same time, the Government of Canada must ensure that, in reviewing options in this regard, it looks to those which are consistent with the complex provisions of the Charter, human rights and administrative law. It is generally recognized that input from the sport community must be balanced by considerations to be provided at an appropriate point in time by legal experts. The sport community is aware of this and I am sure hon. members will welcome this assurance.

In closing, I want to congratulate the hon. member for having made his motion and having given this House the opportunity to debate its merits. There is no doubt that the issue is a timely one.

Still, I am convinced that the honour member's well known sense of fair play and growing appreciation for the development of a unique sport system here in Canada have persuaded him that it would be irresponsible to pre-empt the consultation process in which the Minister of State is currently engaged. Today's debate makes an important contribution to the many viewpoints which are currently being expressed on a wide range of issues, arbitration being a critical one.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this motion presented by my colleague, the member for Victoria. I would like to commend him for bringing this motion forward, as I believe it is a very important issue to amateur sport in Canada and is deserving of the government's attention.

This motion requests that the government should consider the advisability of establishing an independent review process whereby disputes between athletes and sport organizations can be resolved, with powers to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate.

For the Canadian amateur sport system to proceed in an equitable manner, our athletes require mechanisms that will afford them rights similar to those enjoyed by the remainder of Canadian society.

The matter of an independent review and arbitration process for athletes is a relevant issue today, especially in light of the findings and recommendations of the commission of inquiry into the use of drugs and banned practices intended to increase athletic performance, which was headed by Chief Justice Charles Dubin.

However, we are not debating today particular athletes' guilt or innocence, or the Dubin report itself. We are considering the rights of athletes. They require certain definable rights which would, for example, provide them with the right to challenge through an independent arbitrator, suspensions or other disciplinary actions imposed on them by sport organizations, the right of an independent appeal procedure or their rights in relation to national team selection.

In his report, Chief Justice Dubin pays considerable attention to athletes' rights. To him, the rights of an athlete should be respected. He goes on to state:

> It is apparent, that athletes have a number of areas for potential disagreement with their sport-governing bodies, including not only doping infractions and eligibility to compete, but also a broad range of rules that govern the conduct of amateur athletes. At present, there is no uniform method of resolving these disputes.

To address this problem, Chief Justice Dubin in recommendation No. 38 of his report suggests that:

> All national sport-governing bodies establish within their own rules a grievance process through which athletes may receive a fair hearing from the sport governing body itself, including a mechanism for arbitration by an independent arbitrator mutually acceptable to the parties.

In this recommendation, one can see the importance Justice Dubin attaches to providing for athletes' rights within the Canadian amateur sports system.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our society has high regards for individual rights, and rightfully so. It follows that similar rights should be extended to athletes and that amateur sports should provide them at least with access to protection and remedy.

I suggest that sport-governing bodies understand that they must provide their athletes and trainers with an adequate appeal procedure mechanism based on natural justice. That is only fair, because the interest and welfare of the athletes and trainers must be first and foremost in the minds of sports organization.

[English]

Obviously, there are many questions as to what format athletes' rights should take. Arriving at the right formula will require viewing a number of proposals. One that has been considered is a bill of rights for athletes. This proposal has gained a following with some in the amateur sport community and is worthy of further consideration.

As I have said, Chief Justice Dubin has indicated his support for a grievance procedure and independent arbitration for athletes. I think that they could mirror similar systems that are operating within organizations in the private and public sectors.

Whatever independent review and arbitration process is eventually devised, it has to come from discussions between athletes, coaches, national and provincial sport bodies and also the federal and provincial governments. I include governments because I believe there is a role for them to play in the formulation of such a system.

I believe that given the issue of athletes' rights, it would be beneficial to have government involved in the discussion stage on shaping an acceptable system. I think that a joint, consultative process is necessary in order to examine the frameworks which currently exist outside of sport before settling on any particular model. With governmental assistance, the question concerning how to enforce athletes' rights could also be resolved.

• (1730)

The formulation of an acceptable system to deliver what is required will depend in large part on the work of athletes, coaches, and the sport-governing bodies combining to develop what best meets the needs of the athlete. Settling this issue will of course require a significant amount of co-operation if the final product is to work and show athletes that their rights are being protected and not just simply appearing to be.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the abuse of banned performance enhancing substances has had a serious impact on our athletes and on amateur sports in Canada. Nothing should be done to block the efforts to stop this drug abuse. The elimination of this threat against the health of the athlete and amateur sport in general is a major objective for all those who sincerely care for amateur sport.

[English]

It is, however, important that there be procedures in place that will offer assistance to amateur athletes in defending themselves. Athletes should have access to due process and independent arbitration. Whether the issue involves drugs or team selection, the fact is that athletes deserve to have their rights protected and to have these rights defined.

Certainly, without a system to assist athletes, they are lacking the support they require to become the best that they can be in their chosen sport. A failure to arrive at a system of athletes' rights would be detrimental to both the athlete and to amateur sport in Canada.

In its report entitled Towards 2000: Building Canada's Sport System, the task force on national sport policy recommended to the government in August, 1988, that it should:

> Ensure that actions and decisions affecting athletes (selection, discipline, carding, negotiation of athlete contracts, anti-doping measures, etc.) are conducted in accordance with accepted standards of due process and natural justice.

I believe that this recommendation is right on the mark. I hope that the government will act and come forward to assist in developing such a system within amateur sport.

In responding to Chief Justice Dubin's report on August 9, 1990, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport said:

> The development of an appropriate independent appeal mechanism will be addressed in the fall.

While this statement dealt with particular athletes named in Chief Justice Dubin's report, a uniform appeal process for all athletes would be a logical extension. I believe there may be a willingness on the part of the minister to assist in the development of an independent appeal process for the entire amateur sports community in the near future.

A number of national sport organizations have some form of appeal process and grievance procedure available for their athletes and coaches. However, it would be desirable to have a uniform system throughout the amateur sport community.

On October 4, 1990, the sub-committee on fitness and amateur sport unanimously adopted a motion requesting the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport to permit one of the coaches mentioned in Justice Dubin's report to appeal the action recommended to be taken against him by Justice Dubin in his report. The motion stated:

> That the Sub-Committee ask the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), to establish an independent arbitration into the case of Mr. Kulesza, if he applies for arbitration.

I hope that our adoption of this motion signals to the minister that there is a need to obtain a uniform system within the amateur sport community that will aid athletes and coaches to deal with problems that arise in their respective sport bodies. The federal government should now come forward and help in developing such a system.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our amateur athletes and coaches should obtain a uniform and independent review and arbitration process to settle disputes between them and the respective sport organization. I call upon the government to offer whatever assistance necessary in bringing this about. By helping to create such mechanisms, the government would be acting in a positive manner and also assisting in accomplishing the goal of providing fairness and equity in the Canadian amateur sport system.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to take part in this important debate on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Victoria.

We on this side of the House are well aware of the hon. member's interest in amateur sports in the country and we thank him for his work on the parliamentary sub-committee on fitness and amateur sport.

The hon. member's motion calls on the government to consider the advisability of establishing an independent review and arbitration process whereby disputes between athletes and sports organizations can be resolved, with power to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate.

Before commenting directly on the motion, I thought it might be useful to bring hon. members up to speed on the international situation with respect to sport arbitration and appeals.

There are basically two types of mechanisms in place for the review of disputes about the actions of international sport bodies.

First, there is an appeal arbitration process within international sport federations to resolve disputes among members, national federations, or between a member national federation and the international body.

For example, a national federation might dispute the action taken by the international federation in the awarding of the rights to an international championship event. In this case, the national federation could ask for the dispute to be submitted to the arbitration process established by the rules of the international federation.

In addition to disputes involving national federations, some international federations insist, through their rules, that each national federation set up an arbitration mechanism to deal with disputes between national federations and athletes.

In the case of disputes between an athlete and the international federation, the dispute may be brought forward to the arbitration panel of the international federation.

Usually, there are limits as to what can be brought before the arbitration panel of an international federation. In general, doping-related issues and eligibility matters are what the international federations are prepared to deal with, that is, subjects where penalties are automatically invoked by the international federation if guilt has been established.

It should be noted that not all international federations have clear rules concerning arbitration, although increasingly it is the case that they do. For example, the International Amateur Athletics Federation, the world governing body for track and field, has extensive rules on its arbitration panel.

The second type of mechanism for settling disputes in the international domain is the International Olympic Committee's Court of Arbitration for Sport. This mechanism, in theory, will deal with a wide variety of disputes involving virtually any agency or individual who has a sport grievance.

However, in reality, the number of cases brought before the Court of Arbitration for Sport is quite small, probably fewer than 30 cases since the mechanism was created in 1984. This is mainly because the Court of Arbitration for Sport generally insists that other avenues of appeal and arbitration be exhausted before the resolution through the CAS is invoked, providing, in a sense, a court of independent final appeal.

It can be expected that the Court of Arbitration for Sport will be used more frequently in international sports in the years ahead, as athletes and others become more aware of avenues of appeal and dispute resolution that have been established and more litigious in their outlook generally, based to some degree on the expanding commercial elements associated with amateur sport.

Over-all, Mr. Speaker, one can conclude that many international federations have dispute resolution mechanisms. Such mechanisms to consider appeals of rule application decisions are very well established, in the form of juries of appeal, which operate at virtually every sport event and have been in place for many, many years. Other non-competition grievances, that is, issues which do not have to do with the conduct or outcome of competition, are being established, with most international federations having a mechanism of some sort.

As hon. members know, the issue of arbitration process for sport was clearly addressed in the report of the Commission of Inquiry Into the Use of Drugs and Banned Practices Intended to Increase Athletic Performances, otherwise known as the Dubin report. The Dubin report makes 10 recommendations on the need for improved appeal, arbitration and investigative procedures in relation to doping in sport.

While the Dubin recommendations on appeal, arbitration and investigation deal primarily with doping infractions, the section of the report focusing on athletes' rights does express concern for sport-related disputes generally. And the need for a new approach in sport to arbitration is clearly spelled out.

• (1740)

This brings me to the motion before us today.

Certainly, the spirit of this motion is consistent with the principles enunciated in the Dubin recommendations and the general recognition that improvements are needed in many areas of our sport system.

But, as the Minister of State for Youth, Fitness and Amateur Sport indicated in his August 9 statement, there are many players in the sport system, all of whom share a role in bringing about improvements and without the input of whom there will be little opportunity for real change.

As the minister said at the time, the government is spending this fall, consulting widely on the Dubin report. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the issue of appeal, arbitration, and investigation processes is an important part of the consultations.

Recently, the minister circulated a discussion paper on doping-related matters that includes a whole section on this area. It will form the basis for dialogue with the national sport organizations and other interested parties. The minister expects to respond before the end of the year.

In the meantime, it would perhaps be inappropriate to support the hon. member's motion and possibly, pre-empt this consultation process.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this issue forward and giving the House an opportunity to debate it. Today's debate makes an important contribution to the many viewpoints which are currently being expressed in the consultation process.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to the motion put forward by my hon. colleague.

The theme of fairness and due process for athletes is embodied in this motion which calls for an independent review and arbitration process, with power to investigate and direct such remedies as may be appropriate. Certainly this is a theme which the government is supporting and encouraging in its consultations with national sport organizations and others.

I am sure hon. members can appreciate that there are many generic questions which need to be seriously addressed in trying to reach a consensus on the future shape of any system encompassing appeal, arbitration and investigative procedures.

A fundamental question centres on the scope and mandate of the processes, mechanisms and procedures envisaged. In this regard, I note that the hon. member's motion focuses on disputes between athletes and sport organizations. There is no doubt that athletes are the first affected group to come to mind, but that is not the only group.

Coaches, for example, are intimately involved in the day-to-day operations of sport. We have had more than ample evidence this year that the rights and responsibilities of coaches can be areas of real dispute.

One need only recall Mr. Daniel St. Hilaire, a track and field coach, and his complaints about the national team selection process for the 1990 Commonwealth Games in Auckland. This well publicized and controversial case demonstrated the significance of dispute resolution in the area of coaches' rights.

Coaches' responsibilities were also the subject of well publicized and controversial testimony during the Dubin inquiry. In the end, Mr. Justice Dubin concluded that there is a need for national sport-governing bodies to establish mechanisms in this area. In short, I believe a legitimate case can be made here for expanding the categories of persons affected by arbitration processes beyond those immediately prescribed in today's motion.

Apart from the question of defining whose disputes are to be dealt with under any new arbitration process, there needs to be careful consideration of the nature of complaints allowed. The open-ended wording of today's motion implies a process for dealing with disputes generally, regardless of their nature. Indeed, this appears to coincide with the sort of resolution mechanism envisaged by Mr. Justice Dubin where he refers to disputes involving "the broad range of rules that govern the conduct of amateur sport".

Whether, in the final analysis, the mandate of an arbitration process were to be very broad in nature is something that needs careful consideration. Clearly, mandate issues must be defined before informed decisions can be made about their viability from an operational, financial and human resource standpoint. Once questions concerning the scope of arbitration processes are defined, presumably the next major question to resolve is whose responsibility it is to provide them.

The motion of the hon. member for Victoria makes what many may consider a giant presumption in that regard. It states that "the government should consider the advisability of establishing" a review arbitration process with investigative powers. What about the responsibility of the other players in the sport system? What about the recommendations in the Dubin report which, while clearly pointing out a need for changes in the current federal appeals procedure on funding sanctions relating to doping infractions, also points to the sport-governing bodies.

I think it is fair to say that the likelihood of success in implementing an effective arbitration process will depend on the degree of "ownership", as the minister's discussion paper terms it, which national sport organizations accept in the regulation of their respective jurisdictions. For example, today's motion calls for an "independent" process but independent in relation to what and to whom?

At this stage we need to think further about this concept, not in the sense of questioning the need for absolute fairness and due process but rather in the structural and organizational sense.

Again, the minister's discussion paper puts the question succinctly: In what circumstances should the provider of the appeal arbitration and investigative service be individual national sport organizations, or a central agency or a co-ordinated effort by both? Insofar as doping infractions themselves are concerned, the Dubin report appears to see the investigatory side of the process at least as a co-operative venture requiring the participation of both an expanded central independent agency capacity and concerned national sport organization.

Earlier I alluded briefly to appeal procedures for federal funding sanctions imposed on athletes who have committed doping infractions. Obviously this is one element of the current system which falls within the government's jurisdiction and one which the federal government is asked to address in the context of recommendation 42 of the Dubin report. That recommendation calls for the right of appeal to an independent arbitrator as opposed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport on the question of entitlement for direct federal funding.

• (1750)

As is the case with respect to review processes which may take place currently within national sport organizations, or the Sport Medicine Council of Canada, there are many questions to resolve in relation to federal sanctions arbitration. These include, among others: the parties eligible for sanction; the number and qualification of arbitrators; the means by which arbitrators are appointed and their role and jurisdiction; whether or not there would be power of subpoena available to the parties from the arbitrator; and, the public interest in having the proceedings strictly private or open to public viewing, and so on.

Clearly these are complex issues which require a great deal of consideration by the Government of Canada in developing proposals for any new federal sanctions arbitration procedure.

But that is but one discrete aspect of a broader arbitration system and it would be premature and indeed irresponsible for the government to act upon today's motion unilaterally, as if it were the sole authority in this area. It is not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the three government members who have already spoken to date have all persistently said that this resolution should not be considered because it would be premature. Yet all three speakers have said that the government is now considering the very matter which is embodied in this resolution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. The hon. member for Lévis has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on April 10, 1989, the hon. member for Victoria put the following motion on the Order Paper:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing an independant review and arbitration process whereby disputes between athletes and sports organizations can be resolved, with the power to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Victoria. When the hon. member suggests in his motion that the government should consider the advisability of establishing an independant review and arbitration process whereby disputes between athletes and sports organizations can be resolved, with power to investigate and direct such remedies as deemed appropriate. I imagine he is referring to the current situation with respect to appeal, arbitration and investigations in the Canadian sports field.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the appropriateness of the motion of the hon. member for Victoria, I should like to say something to my colleagues about the situation concerning recourses to appeals, arbitration and investigations just so they will have a better understanding of the whole issue.

That is what I should like to explain during the few minutes at my disposal.

For openers I notice that the motion under consideration does not say anything about appeal proceedings, yet I would suggest they are just as important as arbitration proceedings and the power to investigate.

In any case allow me to describe the context of current appeal and arbitration proceedings related to drug offences. In simple terms, the system includes three main components.

First we have the Canadian Academy of Sport Medicine. This body considers appeals filed when samples are taken, when sample B is opened and following a positive reading on sample B

If an athlete accused of an infraction to the antidoping rules so request after Sample B tested positive, the Council has full authority to activate the arbitration mechanism.

Surely you will have understood, Mr. Speaker, that these mentions of Sample B imply that a Sample A had first tested positive, the results of Sample B confirming simply those of Sample A.

Then, there are the national sport-governing bodies which hear appeals based on internal rules and procedures.

Finally, there is the Federal Government which, through its Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), which hears the appeals concerning the re-establishment of government financing eligibility.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the Sport Medicine Council. This organization, together with Sport Canada, published in July of this year a document dealing with the operation of standardized doping control methods. In the section devoted to appeal procedures, there is a list of various steps to take.

This section describes the procedures which an athlete must follow to submit a grievance after having tested positive, the steps to be taken concerning an appeal and arbitration procedure which includes the holding of meetings with the arbitrator, as well as provisions dealing with the communication between the arbitrators and the parties and those concerning the hearing. Which means that the parties involved in the development of these methods will have to review them in the light of Justice Dubin's recommendations.

I should like to elaborate now on the situation which exists within the national sport-governing bodies I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Speaker, most national and provincial sport-governing organizations in Canada already have dispute settlement procedures which make it possible for the athletes and the public in general to appeal their decisions.

Generally speaking, these arbitration procedures put together by the various organizations could be criticized for their lack of independence, because they were set up by the very organizations whose decisions are being appealed. These procedures, however, are generally considered as quiet objective and fair.

The problems as to their impartiality arise when the grievance by an athlete or somebody else is directed at the very organization which has ruled on the original decision. It should be said that most national and provincial sport-governing organizations recognize this weaknesses, and often submit the dispute to another panel within the same sport organization.

However, organizations that are more sensitive to the basic question—probably a minority right now—submit the case to a group made up of people partly or entirely chosen by both sides, as is the case in arbitration.

Delving deeper into the subject, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal now with the various types of grievance, appeal and arbitration procedures currently in use in the Canadian sport system.

Such procedures include appeal panels whose responsibility consists in reviewing the decisions made by officials and other persons concerning the management of a sporting event. There are also arbitration and appeal procedures which the interested parties may follow to contest decisions made by a sport organization, for example concerning the eligibility of an athlete to compete when he has been the subject of allegations that he might have breached the amateur rules governing the sporting activities involved.

There are also appeal procedures—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period on June 7, I asked the energy minister a question regarding his commitment to reducing $CO_2$ emissions. Specifically I asked him whether he endorsed the commitment by his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to stabilize Canada's carbon dioxide emissions for the year 2000.

The energy minister brushed off my question, referring to The Green Plan consultations, so in my supplementary question I asked him again whether he agreed to the environment minister's plans and whether he as energy minister had a plan to make these reductions possible. Again he brushed off my question.

It is because I did not receive a satisfactory answer on June 7 that I am back again this evening trying to get a straight answer either from the minister or the parliamentary secretary.

I think this question is very important because, as we all know, greenhouse gasses contribute to global warming, the gradual heating up of the earth. Canadians want to know and have as right to know what this government's policy is on this issue.

The all-party environment committee released an interim report yesterday on global warming. I want to quote one paragraph:

> Given that human-sourced carbon dioxide emissions are the principal contributor to (global warming), and given that society's use of energy is the largest factor in this $CO_2$ generation,—energy policy making must have as its immediate focus the more efficient and conserving use of energy.

This certainly is in line with the 1987 Brundtland commission report which says that energy strategies must be aimed at achieving sustainable development.

When the present environment minister of this government endorsed the commitment made by the previous environment minister to stabilize $CO_2$ emissions by the year 2000, it seemed the most logical question at the time was to find out whether the energy minister agreed with him. After all, it would be up to the energy minister to come up with a plan to use less energy and to use it more efficiently.

I put the question to the energy minister on June 7, and I got the brush-off. I had also put this question to the Acting Prime Minister on May 25. While the government at that time confirmed the commitment of the environment minister, the question of how the energy minister stood on this issue was left unanswered.

Recently details of the energy minister's new energy efficiency and conservation plan have been released. That is a plan that had been promised as a replacement for all the cuts that this government had made to alternative energy and conservation since 1984.

Canada had been a world leader in energy research, especially in conservation and alternative energy, until this government came to power.

In 1983 the previous federal government spent almost $500 million. Under this government spending has dropped to approximately $40 million—

Mr. Crawford: Disgraceful.

Ms. Callbeck: —a 90 per cent cut in alternative energy and conservation. This government also closed 12 regional conservation and renewable offices, including one in my province located in Charlottetown. It also has greatly reduced its contributions to cost shared alternative energy programs with the Government of Prince Edward Island.

A lot was expected from this plan that we found out about recently. However, when the plan's contents were revealed, it became clear that carbon dioxide emissions would actually increase, not decrease, between 8 per cent and 17 per cent by the year 2000. That is certainly a far cry from the commitment made by the Minister of the Environment to stabilize $CO_2$ emissions by the year 2000.

The question is: Who speaks for the government? Is it the Minister of the Environment who says one thing or the energy minister whose new action plan says something very different? I would also like to know what the energy minister meant when he said in August that Canada should lead by example in reducing $CO_2$ emissions.

The new plan the minister has released is a far cry from the commitment of the environment minister. It is even further from the recommendations of the environment committee, and still further from commitments made by countries like West Germany, Denmark and New Zealand.

What does the minister mean when he says we should lead by example and he draws up a plan that fails to do so? Why can't these two ministers agree on government policy? The Canadian public—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to address the concerns of the hon. member for Malpeque today.

The government has agreed with the need to address the issue of global warming, which is caused by an excessive production of greenhouse gases including carbon dioxide. It was for this reason that the Government of Canada joined with other countries on May 16 at Bergen to establish a national strategy, targets and schedules to limit, stabilize or reduce carbon dioxide emissions and other greenhouse gas emissions as much as possible.

Canada joined with the majority of the ECE, United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, in expressing the view that such stabilization at the latest by the year 2000 and at present levels must be the first step.

Obviously all ministers of the Government of Canada accept the undertakings formally made at the international forum without underestimating the significance of targets that may be agreed upon internationally. The more relevant question concerns what specific actions we are prepared to take to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

The government recognizes the importance of this issue, and it has a process in place to deal with it. During the spring and summer it held consultations with stakeholders in all parts of Canada to obtain advice on this and other environmental issues. It is now in the final stages of preparing its green plan which will be published later this year. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his officials have been working very closely with the Minister of the Environment in the development of the plan. The plan will set out a number of significant measures to reduce carbon dioxide emissions. These will include measures to improve energy efficiency and to develop alternate sources of energy.

These measures will be concrete steps which the federal government will take to address the issue of global warming and carbon dioxide emissions; but the federal government is only one of the several actors involved. If Canada is to achieve a national emissions target it will require a national effort. Our provincial colleagues also have important areas of jurisdiction in terms of energy matters. Their contributions will be vital to achieving emission targets. Municipalities can play an important role and the industry's full participation will also be necessary. Last but not least will be the actions that every Canadian can take in addressing the issue of global warming.

It has been an honour for me to address this question.

SEXUAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue a question which I asked in this House on March 8, 1990 of the Minister of Justice.

At that time I asked the Minister of Justice when the Conservative government would finally keep the promise that was made over four years ago to take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination in relation to all areas of federal jurisdiction.

That was a commitment or a promise that was made to all Canadians; not just to lesbians, gay men and bisexuals in Canada but to all Canadians. I would point out that there is serious discrimination in Canada on the basis of sexual orientation.

Indeed the Canadian Human Rights Commission has noted, in its annual report of earlier this spring, that the government's indifference in this regard has contributed to a very serious increase in the level of homophobia and marginalization in our society.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission went on to state that further delay in the amendments that were proposed to the Canadian Human Rights Act would surely bring into serious question the federal government's commitment to human rights principles.

In hearings before the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Disabled later in the spring the Minister of Justice indicated that in fact she would be tabling a package of amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act this fall, some four and a half years after the original promise was made.

As well, the government promised sometime ago—and I am speaking now of the former Minister of Justice, the hon. member for St. John's West who is now the Minister for International Trade—that the Canadian Human Rights Act would be amended to incorporate the principle of reasonable accommodation, which has been described by the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped as one of the most important, if not the most important the most pressing, human rights issue facing the disabled. That is to be part of this package of Human Rights Act amendments.

Now the fall is here and once again it appears that this government is afraid to move on a question of fundamental justice and equality.

This is not merely a question of words in an act. We are talking about human lives. We are talking about people being treated with dignity, respect, and full justice. We are talking about the reality of the lives of too many lesbians and gay men who are victims of violence, of gay bashing, and who are afraid to report that to the police, because if they do and it becomes public they risk losing their jobs. They risk rejection from their friends and family. It is only by effective human rights amendments that people will not have that fear of losing their jobs.

We know as well that the Canadian Armed Forces continues to discriminate against qualified and indeed outstanding men and women in the forces who happen to be gay or lesbian. These policies which are cruel and inhumane have caused tremendous pain and suffering for far too many members of the Canadian forces. For those who have been forced out, it shatters their lives. Others continue to live within the Armed Forces but live in fear that this essential part of their humanity is somehow going to be disclosed and their lives destroyed after many years of service.

Fortunately these policies of the forces are being challenged in the courts. Former Second Lieutenant Michelle Douglas, an outstanding officer described as one of the finest officers her commanding officer had ever seen, has had the courage to challenge the forces in the courts. Derek Dwyer, another young officer is similarly challenging this policy.

They should not be forced to the courts. Justice surely compels this government to end these policies which are so discriminatory.

The ad hoc committee on AIDS of this Parliament unanimously and strongly urged this government to keep the promise to amend human rights legislation to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation as a top priority.

The committee pointed out that failure to amend the legislation in this way would clearly impair the effectiveness of strategies to combat this terrible epidemic.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to briefly deal with the question that was raised earlier this week by the comments that were reported by the chairperson of the standing committee on the disabled, the member for Oxford. He indicated that the government and some Conservative backbenchers are afraid to proceed on amendments to the Human Rights Act because they do not want to open up this question of sexual orientation. They are prepared to deal with the disabled, but God forbid that they should have to deal with equality and justice for lesbians and gay men in this country.

We are not talking about strangers. We are talking about our brothers, our sisters, our sons, our daughters, the people with whom we work, our neighbours. For God's sake, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to members of this House and to the government, and through the members of the government that are here in the House today, to finally keep the promise that was made, a promise that was made in response to the unanimous recommendation of an all-party committee to ensure justice and full equality under the Charter of Rights to all Canadians in this country. The time is long overdue for action.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway has asked when the amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act will be moved to give effect to the government's commitment to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation.

As noted by the hon. member, the government stated in Toward Equality, in response to the report of the parliamentary subcommittee on equality rights that it will "take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination in relation to all areas of federal jurisdiction".

The hon. member noted the length of time that has passed since Toward Equality was tabled.

[Translation]

I would like to explain that the government has undertaken an in-depth review of the legislation. Sexual orientation is one of the many important issues now under consideration. Others include, for instance, the question as to whether human rights legislation should have precedence over other federal laws. We are also considering the possibility of introducing in the legislation the concept of reasonable accommodation, the abolition of mandatory retirement. It goes without saying that the government's decision on these issues is bound to have a strong impact on the lives of Canadians and, more generally, on our society as a whole.

[English]

However, there are many groups involved in the process, each putting forward a great diversity of concerns. Some of these concerns will be difficult to reconcile but the government is, and will be, working expeditiously to do this. The review of the act continues at this time.

Officials of the department are working hard to put together proposals that will resolve the outstanding issues, meet the concerns that have been expressed so far and at the same time uphold the integrity of the commitments already made by the government.

In closing, I think it is important to emphasize that as the government had predicted in Toward Equality, the courts have found so far that sexual orientation is encompassed by the guarantees of section 15 of the Charter. While the Charter does not apply to the private sector, these judicial decisions offer a significant degree of protection against legislation that would discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on June 18, I asked the Minister of Finance this follow-up question to a question I had asked a few days previous when he invited me to visit the trustee in bankruptcy with respect to the sale of Route Canada to Transport Route Canada Incorporated. After visiting the trustee in bankruptcy I said:

> I am more convinced after spending at least three hours with the trustee that the 1,900 employees of CN Route never had a chance. They were doomed from the day the deal took place.

The minister answered that the company had been losing between $40 and $50 million a year. CN had to make a decision. They either had to shut down and terminate the jobs of the employees or sell the company as a going concern to the Fingold brothers.

• (1820)

That reply brings us here today because it was unsatisfactory because of the words, "it was sold as a going concern." We on this side of the House have been attempting to get a complete and total review of this particular transaction, that is, the sale by CNR of its transportation arm, CN Route Canada, to the group of investors in Toronto, the Fingold brothers and a person by the name of Manfred Ruhland.

We are constantly debating whether or not it was sold as a going concern. Let me advise those on the other side of the House that we will not give up on this debate until we have some satisfaction for those 1,900 workers who are affected by this terrible sale by CNR to these investors from Toronto.

As a result of that meeting and our follow-up on this side of the House, we have been trying to get before the Standing Committee on Transport a resolution and a motion passed that would allow all members of the House to review in complete detail the offer of purchase and sale and all particular matters as they pertain to this particular transaction. The one and only emphasis will be to protect the rights of those 1,900 people who were terminated who were former employees of the CNR and CN Transport. They were transferred to this new corporation and their rights were not protected in that transfer.

Let me bring those who are listening throughout Canada up to date. As of this morning, Thursday, October 18, there was a meeting called of the Standing Committee on Transport. The purpose of the meeting was to elect a chairman, since the chairman had resigned in the past week. The other matter to be discussed today at that standing committee was resuming consideration of my motion, pursuant to Standing Order 106. We wish to review the sale of CN Route Canada by Canadian National Railways to Transport Route Canada Inc., and the several other incorporated companies either involved in the sale or amalgamated as a result of that sale.

What happened at 9.30 this morning is something that I had never seen before at a committee meeting. The members of the Conservative Party that were on that committee failed to show up. In essence, the committee lacked a quorum and those items that were under consideration, particularly the item on the agenda that I just read, could not be addressed, could not be followed through, could not be voted on. As a result of further delay, those ill-affected employees are not being helped. This is another way to try to get this government to do something in the best interests of those employees and something that it is legally bound to do. It is morally bound to look after those employees of CNR.

By way of background, in 1986 CN Route sold its trucking arm to a company called Transport Route Canada Inc. Three people bought it for a sale price of $29 million. We have, through our investigative process, been able to ascertain that the 36 valuable property locations in this country had been appraised at about $80 million and the rolling stock that they acquired in that transaction was appraised at approximately $23 million. That adds up to $103 million, which was the value of this company. The transport arm of CNR was worth $103 million and it was sold for $29 million.

These investors operated this company only 20 months declaring bankruptcy, and the unsecured creditors amounted to $65 million. Now if we have our arithmetic correct what it amounts to is $80 million plus $23 million, minus $29 million, which leaves $139 million that is missing in 20 months—almost $7 million a month. What we are trying to do on this side of the House is find out where that money went so that we can benefit the employees that were directly affected.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my first response to my friend opposite would be with respect to the transport committee meeting. I gather that the whole question relates to the Whip's report setting out the new membership of the committee, and the three parties cannot agree on that. I guess until they can agree on it it is very difficult when chairman has resigned.

With respect to the CN Route case I really appreciate the opportunity to be able to put some facts on the record that might help my friend a bit. I would remind him that the employees' transition package was negotiated by their respective union representatives.

Employees affected by the downsizing of the new company were given termination benefits three to four times their entitlements under the Labour Code and their own collective agreement.

CN Route was costing the taxpayer, his constituents and mine, $30 million to $40 million every year. CN had two options—surely it should not have to carry on and keep the taxpayers on the hook for $30 million to $40 million in perpetuity. It had an option to sell it as a going concern or simply shut it down.

The fact is that the vast majority of the employees were much better off with two additional years of employment than they would have been had CN Route been shut down.

This government has lived up to its responsibilities in this matter, as indeed it would in any other private sector bankruptcy.

My friend opposite knows that if the NDP had anything to do with it, everything would be subsidized forever as if money fell out of the trees, but those of us who have both feet on the ground know that that cannot carry on.

Labour Canada did a payroll audit to determine employee entitlements by way of pay and benefits under the Canada Labour Code. Labour Canada then took action which resulted in vacation pay to the level specified in the Canada Labour Code, and wages owing being paid to employees shortly after Route Canada shut down.

Labour Canada also apprised the company of severance pay and pay in lieu of notice owing to employees and, upon Route Canada being declared bankrupt, sent the information to the bankruptcy trustee.

The Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions took action in the summer of 1988 to bring its pension plan payments up to date and on September 16, 1988, terminated the Route Canada pension plan to protect employee entitlements.

At the time of the bankruptcy Route Canada owed, but had not yet been billed for, about $600,000 in pension plan payments. As a result of actions of OSFI and the plan's administrator, Crown Life, Route Canada's principal secured creditor, the Royal Bank, has agreed to make the payment. The shortfall in payments did not have any effect on payments to pensioners.

Employment and immigration established and funded employment adjustment committees where requested to do so by employees.

Transport Canada assisted independent truckers under contract to Route Canada in getting re-established with other companies. It also facilitated the establishment of an inter-city company by those owner-operators who wished to start up such a service.

The powers of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, under the Bankruptcy Act, came into play once Route Canada was declared bankrupt. The Superintendent of Bankruptcy immediately issued an investigation order to the RCMP in view of the allegations surrounding the bankruptcy.

That investigation is ongoing and I believe that it is not appropriate to make any further comment in that light.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to order made earlier this day the adjournment motion is deemed withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IRAQ

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 13232), the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) (p. 13240), and the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin (p. 13244).

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate. First of all I want to make very clear that I really do not support the motion before us, except in so far as that this House condemns the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. As an individual member representing my constituents I do not need to be encouraged by "unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait". I would take that as a matter of course and I would think most hon. members of the House would think likewise. One cannot tolerate aggression, no matter where it occurs and no matter by whom.

As many hon. members have pointed out in the debate so far, we have very selective memories and very selective applications of a moral high ground that we apply with respect to Iraq and Kuwait. This, by no means, should be taken or misconstrued as any kind of support, indirect or direct, for the actions of Iraq and its leader.

There are two points at issue. The first is what this government did without consulting the House when the action erupted in the Middle East, without consulting citizens of Canada through their representatives in the House of Commons, without so much as giving this Parliament an indication that it had a right to be involved in actions that could precipitate the world into a conflagration matched only 50 years ago.

I have seen members of the House speak with conviction, almost with rage, on this motion. Why? Because it seems so much like residents of a house of ill-repute discussing the virtues of chastity and abstinence and, perhaps, prevention, all after the fact.

There is an enormous lack of legitimacy behind the government's initial decision to commit the Armed Forces of the country without immediately bringing Parliament back together to discuss what the government's intention should have been.

I point to the fact that this is not a question of the letter of the law being applied, but the intent of the law and a perception among the Canadian public and the global public that Parliament and Canadians had not been consulted before making a commitment that cannot be withdrawn at a later date. We seem to be missing the point that what we are doing is engaging in an academic exercise about whether it was right or wrong to get involved in the first place. Only one member, the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina, made a suggestion that perhaps we ought to consider something along the lines of withdrawal.

I was in Europe at the time of the explosion of this crisis. I anticipated being called back to the House to debate a matter of great urgency. I happened at the time to be a guest of the Commons of one of the main countries in Europe. All members who had gone on holiday were called back to debate what that country should do with respect to the crisis. The same thing happened throughout Europe. Members of Parliament were recalled because in their view a decision that was motivated by American interests in the area would involve all of Europe, maybe all the world, in an issue with which they had to have (a) prior thought and consideration, (b) an assessment of their interests, (c) an assessment of the development of the world interests as a result of their involvement or their abstinence and, finally, (d) the extent to which they wanted to commit the resources available to them in the alteration of the diplomatic, political, economic, and religious realities, not only of that part of the world, but throughout the rest of the developed and developing world.

We did not have that opportunity here and it is to the great shame of the government for not having consulted with Canadians to do that beforehand and to put both opposition parties in a position where they have to produce amendments to suggest that perhaps there should have been other consultations and that perhaps the government's motion to this point not take the country in the direction in which it should have gone in the first place.

I might share for a moment or two some of the concerns of fellow parliamentarians throughout Europe, having listened and participated in some of that debate as an observer, a very intent observer at the time, as I say, because of the anticipation of being called back to Ottawa.

They were concerned that, in the event that there was not participation by European states and other states in activities that were developing in the Middle East that perhaps one very mundane consideration—the supply of oil resources to maintain the industrial power of the machinery both in Europe and elsewhere—might not be as secure. In fact, energy prices would increase immeasurably. Second, they were very concerned about the heightened Arab–Israeli tensions that might emanate. Third, they were concerned that Europe's participation in any deal with respect to the distribution of those resources could not be influenced by their absence. What would happen if they were involved? All we have to do is take a look at what has happened over the course of the last two months. Oil prices have increased. We have been given assurances, not excuses, but assurances by our energy minister that we could look forward to an additional 10-cent per litre increase in the price of gasoline at the pumps. We have had a redistribution of the economies already begun throughout the world.

They were concerned that there would be increased Arab nationalism. It is there. It is evident everywhere despite the alliance that the Americans appear to have built up. That there would be an exacerbation of east-west tensions is now a matter of fact. It is no longer a matter of speculation. That tensions between the Arab world and Israel would have risen, again, is a question of evident fact and no longer a question of speculation.

Did we consider those things before we made a decision to send our forces into the area? Did we consider what would happen to our economy if the supply of oil was going to be managed by either Arab residents of the area or American multinational oil interests? Did we consider that perhaps in neither case would our interest be served?

All we have to do is take a look at government action with respect to energy policy here today with the kinds of presentations that our energy minister is giving with respect to a very valuable resource for our industries. He is talking already about rationing gasoline and oil supplies. I cannot believe we live in a serious democracy any more. All he is doing is jacking up the price already at the pump and at the refineries.

That would be bad enough, if we had not taken into consideration as well that the government has become extremely insensitive to the evolution of its foreign policy.

This decision by the government runs counter to its normal practice. It reflects, as I said a moment ago, a policy inconsistent with regard both to timely consultation with Parliament and to defence and foreign policy.

In the past the government has felt it incumbent upon itself to recall Parliament immediately. We have seen it, as some of my colleagues on this side of the House have pointed out, a mere five years ago when there was a national crisis because 174 Sikhs landed on the shores of Nova Scotia. If it were not so tragic, it would be laughable.

Yet the government has started to remind us, and it will continue to do so—and I hope to call it to hon. members' attention—that the government will remind us that what led up to this situation with Iraq is in the past. We cannot change what is there, but I am sure colleagues will say: "Of course, but we can at least influence how we will act down the road."

The government is asking for full and unanimous support from the Canadian public for the placement of our forces in an area that is now in a state of war footing.

• (1840)

Cynics will say it is going to happen within a couple of weeks. The greatest of optimists are talking about containing, maybe restraining and retaining the level of conflict. We are putting our young men and women at risk in an area where our interests have yet to be defined, whether they be moral, political, or economic.

The government does not want to address questions about why Canadian forces are positioned in the Persian Gulf within a war zone if war breaks out. It does not want to deal with who calls the shots—pardon the pun—for Canadian forces if war does break out, whether it will be the Americans, the United Nations, or Canadian personnel.

It does not want to address what Canadian forces are expected to do, if war does become a reality. Right now, the reality is that we are participating in a blockade that is intended to force Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait, or to force Iraq into a war with the United States. We are being asked to support blindly Canadian government initiatives in this regard.

The build up of American forces, analysts said three weeks ago, is costing the American government more than $1 billion per week. This is an indication that those soldiers were not put there because they requested a holiday.

Perhaps the main motives of why the situation in the Middle East developed to the state it has come is probably to be seen in analyzing American interests with respect to its own economic interest, its declining world political influence, and the emergence of a Europe in 1992 which might find itself much more independent of American influence globally, as well as in that particular area.

If the big question is the redistribution of economic power, if the big question is the impact on the industries of the industrialized world as a result of the politics of the Middle East, why were we not given the opportunity to examine those interests? I see that my colleagues from the NDP would probably agree.

This has nothing to do with isolationism. This has nothing to do with the policy of deciding if we are to the left or to the right. If, as a country, we have in the past supported the democratrization of societies everywhere, if, as a country, we have tolerated military presence only in a peacekeeping capacity, why would we depart from those two very valuable principles now when they are needed most?

I am not naive, neither am I completely oblivious to the conflagrations that exist world-wide. There are areas that quite unfortunately are steeped in military conflict where we are not playing a role. There are other areas where our allies are involved in conflict and we are not playing a role. There are other areas where our friends and our allies are involved in the kind of circumstances that could at best be described as compromising of some principle and we are not involved.

It would appear that when the American eagle sneezes, we rush forward with our handkerchiefs. What have we seen in the course of this debate? Not only have we been attempting, at least on the government side, to seek reactive type of unanimous support, a whitewash of government initiative or lack thereof, but we are seeing seeping into the debate, very slowly and insidiously, the discussion that we can actually influence the outcome by now talking about a possible resolution called linkage.

For those who are becoming much more aware of what this term linkage means in international politics, I have heard hon. members from both parties talk about the secret to peace in the Middle East being seen in the resolution of the Palestinian question.

As one who has already avowed adherence to the principle of international peace, to the principle of international demilitarization, to the principle of harmony among people, I could hardly exclude the question of resolving the problem of Palestinians in any debate.

I am not here to discuss that particular issue. I was being asked—and I would have hoped that I had been asked two months ago—to debate whether in fact we ought to be involved in the activity of a legitimate president, no matter how much we dislike him, and I dislike him intensely, no matter how much we dislike the form of government, and I disapprove of it totally, to debate the action of one Arab leader against the actions of another Arab leader.

For those who do not understand it, Mr. Speaker, Saddam Hussein did not enter Kuwait because he was interested in resolving the problems of the Palestinians in the Middle East. He absolutely did not do that. For us now to start beginning to talk, as my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway and my colleague from Trinity—Spadina said, saying we have to link the two in order to reach a solution, I think avoids the very serious question that all of us should address, and that is: What is Canada's role in that area? What are we doing there in the first place?

Second, for those who have a genuine concern and say that this problem ought to extend to the Arab-Israeli question, I say fine. Good intentions are fine. In every other instance what have we asked for is that the partners in conflict, the partners who have a problem and are in an adversarial position, ought to have between them an opportunity to decide what the solution to their problem is. In other words, bilateral negotiations. I do not know whether this House has ever suggested that there be a solution imposed on anyone.

The massive military build-ups suggest that perhaps because of our participation, we are now coming to the point where, yes, it is now legitimate to think about imposing a solution, so we are going to democratize the entire Arab world. We are going to proselythize our religious background, our cultural values, the new values of the industrial world in the area.

I do not know whether we were all born yesterday or whether we constantly dream in Technicolor, but there are people out there who do not believe in the democratic principles to which we adhere, people who do not believe that our culture and our industrial economy is the be all and end all of their personal aspirations.

Once we begin to realize that Israel is an element that represents the western world by virtue of its presence and its values, why do we not allow Israel to work out its problems with Palestine and the Palestinians on their own?

If, out of such negotiations, comes the suggestion that there be an international conference, I think most members around this House would support an international conference. But, unlike my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway, I think it should not be one that predetermines what the agenda will be, and not one that already predetermines what the outcome will be. I think that this House might even support an international conference that was asked for by both partners in that negotiation.

If the international community were willing to stick its neck out and guarantee any of the decisions reached by those partners and by that international conference, it would be observed by one and all.

I have not heard that in any of the presentations given today. Unfortunately, I have not heard that as an initiative by the government.

And so, Mr. Speaker, on the motion, I can only say that I will support my party's amendment because it at least gives me an opportunity to affirm the principles of involvement in the United Nations and United Nations activity, but I cannot support the government's motion because I want peace first, foremost and always.

• (1850)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, let me first congratulate my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence who as usual gave an in depth review, showing his wealth of knowledge of this particular matter. I certainly support the position my colleague has taken.

The essence of what we are talking about in this debate and the question I want to pose to my colleague is this. Is there any indication how long this confrontation we face in the Middle East will last? How long will be faced with hurting people in Canada because of the mid-east crisis which we seem to face time after time after time? What I refer to is the fact that this conflict, although almost on the other side of the world, has a direct effect in Canada and a direct effect in the area from which I come.

Iraq, up to this point in time, had been a substantial customer of Canada in the purchase of grain, oats and barley. It has now been embargoed and we can no longer ship to that country. The conflict in the mid-east has caused some concern in the seaway inasmuch as for the last two years we have been told that the reason for grain shipments through west coast ports has been because most of our customers for export grain are in the Pacific Rim countries.

On the day the embargo was placed on goods and services sold to Iraq, boats laden with grain were destined for Iraq. Where are these boats? They are not in the port of Thunder Bay, which is the traditional route for all products being shipped to Iran and Iraq. They are not in the downriver ports of Montreal and Baie Comeau where the grain is loaded on huge tankers, but the grain and the boats are embargoed in the port of Vancouver. Those boats, laden with grain destined for Iraq and Iran, go through the Panama Canal. We have been told that any grain bound for the traditional markets flowed through the St. Lawrence Seaway and was not being shipped out of the west coast ports. My question to my friend is how long, in his best judgment, does he think this embargo on food products will exist and does he agree with it?

Mr. Volpe: I thank my hon. colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon for his question. He raised an issue that has been debated among many of our colleagues and one that I raised in my presentation. That is the question of Canadian interests. The interests are twofold; those of principle that should be applied generally and should transcend borders and individual interests, and the other one of pure monetary interest. We take the second one.

Until recently, like most Canadians, I was not aware of the level of trade in agricultural products between our country and Iraq. It appears that Iraq is one of our biggest importers of grain. It is one of our biggest customers. In fact, I heard one member claim that it is our biggest consumer of agricultural goods. If that is the case, and I take into account the fact that the member was trying to make a point when he said it is the biggest, the fact of the matter is that the blockade is influencing our export of agricultural goods. It is influencing as well the level of involvement we have in transportation. It is going to have an impact on the people who are dependent on both for jobs and livelihood.

Mr. Speaker, I would never suggest for a moment that we should examine our principles on the basis of economic advantage to a region of Canada or to Canadians at large. So, I want to address the second question, of the principle that we have already put aside by being involved in this crisis. I do not think there is anyone here or in this country can give my hon. colleague a satisfactory response with respect to a termination date. One would hope that the solution is a peaceful and speedy so that we can recall our young men and women to serve Canadians in Canada, or to serve under the auspices of international bodies that makes decision before a superpower imposes it on them.

Secondly,we hope there is a peaceful solution so that we normalize relations not only with that country, but with others so that our economies can get back on the footing they were on a couple of months ago so that we can produce for others, and return to the normalization of prices in the energy area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to be able to participate in this debate.

I would like to begin my remarks by saying that I, along with other members in this Chamber, condemn Iraq for its invasion of Kuwait. In fact, not only Iraq, but its president should be condemned for many other actions it has taken in recent years. Saddam Hussein should not be the leader of that country. In fact, should be locked away.

I would like to pay tribute to the troops who are now in that area of the world, to the embassy staff in that region under a very difficult situation and also to the Canadian citizens in that region. Of course, my thoughts go out to those people and members of their families in Canada who are very concerned about their welfare, and particularly to one individual in the City of Moose Jaw, Paul Francoeur, a member of the armed forces presently in the Middle East. My best wishes and thoughts go out to him and his family.

I would like to take a slightly different approach than some members have been taking with respect to this debate and focus on a couple of areas; the role and purpose of the United Nations, and with respect to democracy here in this country.

The existence of the United Nations fundamentally, is to provide peace and harmony in this world. Since it was created at the end of World War II, it has suffered many setbacks and has struggled during its history. I believe that the recent actions and resolutions passed by the United Nations have had the most unified support that the UN has perhaps ever experienced.

One of the reasons for that support has been the turn-around by the Americans. These days the United States is praising the United Nations.

This has not always been the case. It was not very long ago that the United States was calling for the United Nations to leave New York. The United States still owes some $750 million to the United Nations and, perhaps, should be considering paying its contribution.

I would suggest that the United States is not so much concerned with the United Nations as it is concerned with a steady and secure oil supply. I am also concerned about its military intentions in that area of the world. Certainly an Iraq that controls a Kuwait controls a significant amount of the world's oil production and could have a significant impact on the United States.

• (1900)

The desire for extended military bases in that area certainly is part of the Americans' decision to take the action that they have. I am very glad that the United States has taken the position that it has in respect of Iraq in condemning it. However, I would question some of its motives.

If the UN is now so important, why does not the United States support resolution 242 which calls for Israel to withdraw from occupied territories that it has occupied since 1967? It is interesting that since the United States has been moving into that area of the world it has now found new criticism recently for Israel because it is looking for support for the Arab nations.

President Bush said that we could not have a dictatorship running a country in this world and imposing its will on people throughout its territory. We have noticed in the past that the United States condoned Panama, for example. Panama had a dictator for years, and it was involved in the drug trade. In fact there were implications connecting General Noriega to the CIA itself. Only when General Noriega's plans did not fit with the United States did it invade Panama.

This is a similar line to that which the United States took in places like Grenada and in its attacks on Libya. Why did not the United States condemn Dictator Hussein when he invaded Iran back in 1980? There was no action when Iraq chemically gassed the Kurds, resulting in some 4,000 terrible deaths in 1988 that inflicted a lot of pain and suffering on a lot of individuals and causing thousands of injuries which people will suffer from for the rest of their lives. Also there was no condemnation of Syrian and Israeli occupation of Lebanon. What about the occupation of East Timor by Indonesia?

I am very glad that the United States has taken a turn for the best with respect to the United Nations and has condemned the actions of Iraq, but it is certainly with questionable intention that the United States has taken this action. When the United States announced that it would be sending troops into that area of the world, it did so long before UN resolution 665 and without prior consultation. It was only when UN policy happened to coincide with U.S. policy that the U.S. began to sing the United Nations praises.

In respect of all of that we have our Government in Canada supporting a U.S. position long before the UN resolution. I would suggest that the Prime Minister acted in a fashion that has affected and harmed the reputation of this country in the world.

Why would the Prime Minister and why would this country take the actions it did in light of the background I just highlighted in respect of the United States? This decision seems to have been made on the spur of the moment. On August 3, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs had indicated that he no intention of any military action in the Middle East. On August 6, the Prime Minister met with President Bush. On August 10, after a NATO meeting, the Prime Minister announced that Canada would be sending two naval destroyers and a supply ship into the Middle East. This was a very quick turnaround. In fact the announcement by Canada was made two weeks before the UN passed Resolution 665. That resolution, of course, is the one which authorized UN member states to take necessary measures against shipping to ensure strict implementation of the UN sanctions.

With respect to the government, I think that has hurt Canada's reputation in the world. It has hurt our reputation as a peacekeeping nation. It is the first time since the Second World War, I believe, that we have sent Canadian ships under a Canadian flag into a potential war zone. I think that action by the Prime Minister was one that certainly should have led him to call Parliament back immediately. He did not. In fact, Parliament was not called back until its scheduled date of September 24. At that time this debate began, Mr. Speaker.

This action is not justifiable. The government considered it to be important, but when you consider it in light of other actions, one wonders about the respect that this government has for democracy in this country. In August 1987, when 174 refugees landed on the coast of Nova Scotia, the government considered that an emergency situation and immediately called back the House of Commons to sit. Yet, when the Prime Minister announced that for the first time since the Second World War we are going to be sending Canadian ships into a potential war zone under a Canadian flag, he did not call back the House.

Other governments called back their parliaments. They certainly did in Britain. The absence of such action shows this government's lack of respect for democracy.

This has to be taken in the context of the attitude that Canadians have today toward parliamentarians right across this country. People are questioning parliamentarians and their actions, certainly the actions in the Senate with the banging of chairs and the blowing of kazoos.

This government's use of time allocation and closure, time after time after time, have made people become disillusioned with this institution of Parliament. We have a motion that the government wants to limit committee size because it feels that committees in this House on occasion are disagreeing with the government. It is an infringement of an MPs right to properly perform his duty. This is simply one more example of that. It is one more example of this government failing to respect the democratic institutions of this country and causing this institution to be held in less regard by the people in this nation.

What is required in this situation? We must make the role of the United Nations in the world a priority. As such, Canada should be taking a leading role as a member of the Security Council to ensure, first of all, that the UN takes charge of military operations over in the Middle East. As well, we should declare that our ships will only go as far as originally planned, and that is to the Gulf of Oman, and strictly for the purpose of helping to enforce the UN sanctions against Iraq under Resolution 665. That and no more, Mr. Speaker.

As well, Canada should be focusing more attention on the problem of the refugee situation. Thousands of refugees from numerous nations have been fleeing Kuwait and that region of the world. As is often the case with refugees, they become almost invisible. People tend to forget about them. They get quick exposure on the media and then they are forgotten. Although the government has committed some funds, which is very laudable, there should be a stronger commitment than that. Canada should be committing itself to spending more attention and energy with respect to the refugee problem.

• (1910)

In conclusion, I would simply like to say that I was very disappointed in the actions which the government had taken. It certainly had a bad reflection on the United Nations. It has also had a very bad reflection on the way Canadians view this Parliament. It has shown a disregard for democracy in this country.

With those remarks, I would close by saying that I will certainly be supporting my party's amendment and opposing the government's resolution.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

I congratulate the hon. member on an excellent speech. I just want to take this opportunity to ask the hon. member, who is well known not only in Saskatchewan but throughout this country as a tireless defender of farmers, if he could elaborate on the implications of this serious crisis for grain farmers in particular.

What impact will this have on western farmers? I know that Canadians will await with interest the comments and the assistance of the hon. member on this important question.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, we have in this country today an rural infrastructure that is in real danger. It has been shrinking for a number of years and now it is simply beginning to collapse.

One of the reasons it is collapsing is the economic base, whether it be fishing in Nova Scotia, growing apples in the Annapolis Valley, or growing grain in western Canada. This government has failed to address the agricultural issue properly in the last number of years. Certainly since it has taken power it has been promising to bring in an agricultural program since 1985.

With respect to this situation, Iraq was our fourth largest customer with respect to grain. It is certainly an important customer. The loss of Iraq is simply adding to the difficulties that exist today. We have in Canada a problem with grain sales. One of the main reasons is that we have the United States which, through its Export Enhancement Program, is infringing on our traditional territory certainly in the U.S.S.R. and in Africa. We are having difficulties making sales into those areas and then we lose Iraq. It has a devastating effect. That is why we now have literally thousands of bushels sitting in fields.

It is important for this government when it brings in its agricultural program that there be compensation made with respect to the loss of those sales. It is not the farmers' fault in western Canada that Iraq invaded Kuwait. It is not the farmers' fault that this government is not taking action against the United States for infringing on our traditional sales areas and markets. It is not the farmers' fault and the farmers should not be suffering.

This government should be taking some action, which it has not so far, to rectify that situation and assist farmers and, in doing so, will assist all of rural Canada.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise and say a few words on this motion before the House with respect to the Iraqi situation. It is particularly appropriate as we come up to November 11 and Remembrance Day.

I have been approached by a vast majority of my constituents who are in agreement with the actions of our government and the United Nations acting together. I met with many people from particularly eastern Europe. They have told me in no uncertain terms that we all know the history during the thirties when there were four or five times that Mr. Hitler could have been stopped. At that time other countries were faced with a choice. They could have stopped him or they could not. They lacked the courage or the moral fortitude to stand up and block him the four or five times when they could have. As a result, we got into a world war where 40 million people, at a minimum estimate, lost their lives. How many more tens of millions were injured, wounded, or physically or mentally affected is unknown.

Europe was destroyed as an infrastructure, whether it was roads or buildings or schools, and only recently are they beginning to recover and thrive. More than 40,000 Canadians died. That has had an impact on families and family trees. I know my own family tree in Britain was totally finished. The last Thacker in Britain in our family tree was lost in Sicily. That has had quite an impact on everybody. You do not forget those things.

It is ironic that just at the time when eastern Europe was coming on side and adopting more approaches that were conciliatory, the United Nations was expanding, the GATT treaty was expanding and human rights were expanding, time when it seemed that we could move on to a new world order with peace and a much more co-operative relationship, we would be faced with Saddam Hussein. He is an individual like Hitler was when he took over a country, who has absolutely no conception of human rights or the feelings of other people. He simply invaded Kuwait, which everyone agrees was a total illegal act by any and all standards.

The bottom line is that our generation is faced with the same choice as our ancestors of two generations ago. We can either stop it now or we can appease or somehow rationalize it in our own minds as none of our affair.

The United Nations has decided that it is our affair and acting together is a good precedent. I hope we will continue to act together and give the Security Council the backing and the support that it needs. That is our hope. We do not have any other models, we have to use the United Nations. It is a wonderful model and the clauses are there. We have to be prepared to act together and I think we will. The fact is that we simply do not have any choice.

Even with conventional weapons we have no choice. We simply cannot afford a world war with conventional weapons. We all know we certainly cannot afford one with nuclear weapons.

I am proud to say, and I am sure I speak for the vast majority of my constituents, that Canada is part of this. Thanks should go to our navy, the men and women on those ships, in the air force and their support staff. We are thinking of them. They have our full support. We worry about them and we want them to come home without any shots being fired and certainly no one being injured or killed. They have our support.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I have a short comment, Mr. Speaker. I will be participating in the debate tonight.

I want my colleague to understand that in no way, shape or form do I intend to defend the actions of Saddam Hussein. I see the hon. member repeating the line well used by the President of the United States, Mr. Bush, comparing Saddam Hussein with Hitler. I do not know why.

Could the hon. member enlighten us as to when the western world suddenly discovered that Saddam Hussein, who for eight years has become quite well known for his tactics, and well armed by the west I might add, fit the description of Hitler. Is it now or was it recently or was it when he was doing what we could not do against Iran?

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that my colleague opposite and friend for many years raises a good point. The point is when do nations act? Leaders and dictators all over the world get away with all sorts of atrocities within their own country and the world does not act. There have been all sorts of instances of Saddam Hussein killing his own people. We are a world that is divided into nation states and we accept that concept of nation states. They have all sorts of rights within their own nations to do things that we do not agree with, against human rights and otherwise, and we do not act against them. But when Saddam Hussein moved into Kuwait, that jelled everyone's thinking that this man was a madman. This man is a madman. This man knows no constraints, none of the ordinary constraints that leaders in practically every other country in the world now are beginning to accept and to operate within. Therefore, it did become a threat.

I know the arguments that it is because of oil and all of that, and there is no doubt that is a major fact because without oil imports, even in this country, we would be in very deep trouble. The United States is in even deeper trouble as well as other countries of the world. I do not take away one moment if he says we acted only for oil.

I think there was an imperative that went beyond just oil. So many other nations, including the Arab nations themselves, have joined together to say, "Okay, he has got to be stopped now". I think there was a time, if my friend wanted us to do it 10 years ago, well I would not take that away from him. He may well be right, but certainly now we have enough people standing together that I think that in and of itself that is good enough to stop Saddam Hussein. Hopefully it will be an example to other dictators who will act without any sense of consideration for other countries.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. I declare at the outset I support unequivocally the part of the motion which states:

> That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq—

I cannot however support the concluding part of the motion which states:

> —take part in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula—

Why, you may ask, Mr. Speaker. I begin my answers by asking two questions. Is Canada prepared to support military action against Iraq outside of the United Nations auspices? Is Canada prepared to support military action against Iraq without full debate in Parliament and full consultation with the opposition? The latter part of the government's motion, as it now stands, could be a blank cheque and for that reason I oppose the government's motion.

Let me proceed, Mr. Speaker, by remembering a past Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, a man who strongly endorsed the use of international diplomacy as means to settle international conflict. However, we saw a change in 1984 when the Conservatives under Brian Mulroney came to power. We witnessed a changed in attitude from a Canadian policy based solely now using Mr. Mulroney's own words, "super relations with the United States".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member would address him as the Prime Minister when referring to the right hon. gentlemen. You are addressing him as the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, it should be the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your reminder.

This subservient attitude towards President George Bush's foreign policy was evident in many of Canada's past actions that relate to the United States interests. It was there when the United States invaded Panama against Noriega; it was there again when President Bush led the American military into the Persian gulf. It was there once more when Canada's response came more than two weeks before the United Nations agreed to endorse the use of military force to ensure compliance to sanctions. While Mr. Mulroney argued that it was part of a multinational effort, it was clearly initially a United States effort.

Let us not forget that the resolution passed by the United Nations endorses the use of military force to back up the economic embargo of Iraq. There is no mandate to use force to invade that country. There is no mandate to use force to invade that country.

I do not question the Prime Minister's statement of September 24, in this House, and I quote:

> Our contribution to the defence of freedom and our resistance of aggression constitute chapters of sacrifice and glory in the history of this nation.

But I question Canada's initial involvement in this crisis as sanctioned by this government, in the absence of clear, United Nations is stewardship with Parliamentary debate in this House. I cannot trust this government with a blank cheque on this issue.

I will support the government's resolution provided we receive certain assurances from this government regarding the future or deployment of Canadian forces and the involvement of Canada in a Gulf war; specifically, a commitment that no changes in Canada's position will take place until Parliament or the opposition has been consulted and secondly, that Canada does not participate in offensive military action outside United Nations auspices without the approval of Parliament.

It should be made clear that our party took the the initiative for an all-party agreement on the resolution, not this government and definitely not the New Democratic Party.

I should point out that the approach to Canadian foreign policy by this government during the last six years has sharply turned from a strong Canadian voice to either sitting on the sidelines, or to cheering the policy initiatives of the United States with little or no consultation with our Parliament.

At this juncture I ask this government: Where was the Prime Minister during the crisis? In Washington. Who advised the Prime Minister at this time? President Bush. What were the United Nations members doing when the Prime Minister was in Washington? They were recalling their parliaments to debate the crisis with their citizens. Did we do it in Canada? Sadly, Mr. Speaker, we did not.

Sending troops to the Gulf is a national emergency, and sending troops into a possible war zone is not a decision that the Prime Minister should make on his own. The issue should be brought before Parliament for all to debate. Debate is essential in a democracy or democracy withers and dies.

I now ask if this government is prepared to make a commitment that there will not be a further deployment of troops, or the use of force without a clear mandate from our Parliament and under the stewardship of the United Nations.

What initiatives is this government making with the United Nations to find a peaceful resolution to this crisis?

In closing, I would like to say that Canadians are encouraged by the role that the United Nations has played in this crisis and we must seize this opportunity to assert the supremacy of that great institution and not of the United States. Let this be the objective that guides Canadian foreign policy.

Canada must continue to search for peace, just as Canada shall continue to abhor war. Is Canada prepared to support military action against Iraq, outside of United Nations auspices? Is Canada prepared to support military action against Iraq without full Parliamentary debate and consultation? Canada shall insist on acting militarily only under the United Nations umbrella, guided by the wisdom of this House. Hence, I support the amendment proposed by my party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): I know that the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception is consulting with the hon. member in terms of a response to this question, but the member from Manitoba is his own member and hopefully will give his own answer.

• (1930)

The member knows that there have been discussions and dialogues in the House about some other form of a motion. The New Democratic Party has proposed a subamendment which I believe the hon. member has indicated he supports. His party has also proposed an amendment. Of course, the thrust of those amendments is to ensure that any action in the gulf must only be under United Nations auspices. In the event that those amendments are defeated, does the hon. member intend to vote for or against the government motion?

Or, Mr. Speaker, is he going to stand up and say: "Well, you know, we are trying hard to get an agreement. We are working really hard. We are hoping that there can be an all-party resolution." Is he going to be direct? Is he going to be straightforward? Is he going to tell the House whether he supports the resolution or not?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I have always been direct in the House and I thank the hon. member for recognizing that fact.

The hon. member was trying to insinuate that I was consulting with my hon. colleague. Of course, I would like to consult with my colleague. In this particular instance, there was no consultation.

To answer the question, the hon. member was not listening very clearly to all the provisions that I indicated. I said, unless we can get the assurance from the government that it would be under United Nations stewardship, followed by debate in the House, we could not support the government's motion. The hon. member will see when the vote is called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Davenport.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, two days ago in the House an alternative motion was put forward at page 14250 of Hansard which contains three principles. One principle is that Canada is against invasions of all kinds. The second is that Canada supports the United Nations and its resolutions since the Kuwait invasion. And the third is that there will be a debate in Parliament should there be an outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian forces.

That resolution, it seems to me, is highly commendable. It contains a lot of wisdom. It is the result of negotiations that my party has initiated with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has all the elements that would generate, I believe, a unanimous vote on the part of Parliament, which is extremely important if it is to have any impact at home and abroad.

We are against any form of invasion. In recent years, we have seen what happened in Afghanistan. You, Mr. Speaker, and many present here tonight will remember the outrage in public opinion throughout the world against that invasion.

We also recall, perhaps a little further in the past, the invasion of Tibet which, unfortunately, did not provoke much of an outrage in the world community. Not only that that, but it did not even provoke any movement of troops on the part of any of the superpowers to defend, protect, and restore the integrity of Tibet. I suspect that was due to the fact that Tibet does not have any oil wells. A comparison between the reaction of the world community to the invasion of Tibet and to the invasion of Kuwait is a very solitary and interesting lesson.

We have, in case of an outbreak of war in the Middle East, some horrendous consequences to contemplate, both in terms of human life and environmental damage. The debate here tonight does not lend itself to that kind of examination. I just want to make a very brief reference to that aspect which would horrify every thinking human being on this planet.

What disturbs us very much is that, in case of an outbreak, the line of command in that part of the world is not clearly defined. We do not know under whose command our troops and ships would be when the going gets rough. This is why we feel it is extremely desirable to find a way on Tuesday, when we vote on the motion, to adopt the proposed alternative put on the table only a couple of days ago. In that motion we have the establishment of a clear and important principle that it is under the flag of the UN and under the leadership of the world community as represented by the Security Council that our troops will operate.

We are in full agreement with the resolutions of the United Nations. We are in full agreement with the modus operandi of the United Nations. We believe there is a family of nations that function in this world, that it is a civilized one and basically very enlightened, and any territorial ambition or dispute, even the most legitimate perhaps within the boundaries of certain nations and public opinion of any given nation cannot be resolved by means of violence and invasion. This is the lesson of history which we have gradually, slowly, and painfully learned throughout time. Now, perhaps for the first time in a long time, the world community has coalesced behind this very important and critical point.

While we fully understand the importance of the presence of troops moved into the Middle East, we know that that has taken place in order to buy time. We know the solution can only be a political solution. It cannot be a military solution if it is to be a lasting one. That point was extremely well made, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you will remember a few weeks ago, at the meeting that took place between Mr. Bush and Mr. Gorbachev. There were evidently the elements in that meeting for the search of a political solution. The means probably were different. The way of thinking in Washington is suddenly quite different than the way of thinking in Moscow as to how to get there is quite different, but I am convinced as I stand in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you are too, that in both capitols the desire is to arrive at a political solution. The same applies in our House of Parliament. We want to arrive at a political solution, one that will bring us together rather than divide us when we vote on the motion on Tuesday.

For this reason, I appreciate very much the opportunity to participate in the debate, to reaffirm the confidence of my colleagues and myself in the final role of the United Nations, and to recall that it was under the leadership of a former Prime Minister of Canada before he became Prime Minister, namely Mr. Pearson, that Canada became an active initiator of peacekeeping missions in many parts of the world, some less publicized than others. I am glad to see that a Pearsonian sense of world responsibility by way of peacekeeping has also been continued and adopted by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. Along that path, the government will have the full support of Canadians because deep down in the heart of every Canadian there is this confidence, this tremendous belief, that only through the United Nations can the diffusion of world disputes, differences, and potential dangers be achieved.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my speech, I would like to remark that our colleague from Davenport gave an excellent analysis of the situation and the role of Canada in peacekeeping.

For those who were riveted to the radio and television in the past months after Iraq invaded Kuwait, many people were upset and with good reason. We were hoping for, and we got, quick response from the United Nations. The United States took immediate action, and Canada, contrary to its tradition of following the banner of the United Nations, decided to deploy men and material to the Middle East crisis. But I guess it would be impossible to expect the average Canadian to really understand the whole complex situation that has been that of the Middle East ever since 1948, or hundreds of years, for that matter. It has always been a very complex problem and there are probably too many factors that come into play. Do not forget the Middle East, for all practical purposes, was the cradle of civilization as we know it. Yet the problems over the years have compounded themselves to the point that it is hard to distinguish what is fact and what is fiction, and where is the truth and where are the lies. God knows there is a lot of truth and there have been a lot of lies that have come out of the Middle East.

I guess many people have taken a position on this whole issue without knowing the facts, and I can understand. Members of Parliament, our fellow Canadians, and many people throughout the world maybe just do not have time or the inclination, or they do not want to take the time, to realize there are reasons why this kind of conflict that has developed in the Middle East. A tremendous amount of resentment has been built up throughout the years, and it is understandable. I would like to point out one particular paragraph that I thought summed it up quite well.

The Arab masses resent the role that the United States is now playing in the Gulf and the financial support that some Arab states are providing, all of which they perceive as designed to protect undemocratic and feudalistic governments. They can be expected to ask with frustration and anger how many houses, schools, hospitals and highways could these funds have built in poor Arab parts of the world? How many farms and factories could have been established for hungry Arabs?

Why should this enormous amount of Arab money be diverted for the perpetuation of unjust and outdated governments? It is the anger and the frustration which breeds the Saddam Hussein and the Ayatollah Khomeinis of the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker, it does not take a genius to understand that in the past years in the Middle East the Arab nations have constantly been frustrated, especially by the United States, in finding a solution in the Middle East, especially for the Palestinians who were driven out of their own homes. Has there been any effort in the last 40 years by the great powers to recognize that people who were on this land for thousands of years were literally pushed aside? Today a lot of people and nations have the nerve to point to Palestinians and call them terrorists, in their own land. When is the truth going to be known that the Palestinians have been the victims, and what other homeland, the homeland of my father from Lebanon. He is a Semitic.

Where was the United States, where were the powerful nations of this country, when they let Lebanon be sacrificed? They sacrificed Lebanon to make it a battleground between the Syrians and the Israelis and anybody else who were peddling arms.

How much hypocrisy will there be and how many lies are they going to tell us before the truth will be known? It will be too late.

How many Palestinians have died? How many have lived in the desert? How many Lebanese? There is not a week that I do not have people of Lebanese background who write and call to me, trying to bring a sister, a sister-in-law, a brother, or an uncle. It has been frustrating for all those who understand that there has been a lack of justice.

We see the United States send over unbelievable amounts of military arms and men—to protect what, Mr. Speaker? God knows that I have often said that the Lebanese problem would have been solved if they had oil underneath their soil. But, no, they are there to protect a vested interest. The cost, in human lives, never bothered them. Traditionally, under the former Prime Minister of this country, we always followed the lead of the United Nations in world conflicts. We had developed a reputation. And even as fellow travellers to different parts of the world, we were looked up to with a great amount of respect and esteem. They had faith in us. I am afraid that this faith could be eroded when we have this kind of activity.

As I mentioned at the beginning, had there just been an attempt in years past to solve the problems of Lebanon which has been bleeding for the last 15 years. How much bleeding can it take? Those who speak up in the name of the suffering Lebanese, they overtook the hometown of my father. The Israelis have it under occupation.

What about the Palestinians who have been the victims? They throw stones and they get bullets in return. Yet they are called terrorists in their own land. When is the truth going to be known? Does it make me anti-Zionist because I want the Lebanese people to live in peace and the Palestinians to have a piece of land that they can call their own?

It makes me think of a former journalist, James M. Mynafee, who is now deceased. Mr. Speaker, you probably remember that name from the past. He wrote a book. I always liked the title. He asked at the time what Canada's role was. Was Canada a peacemaker or a powder-monkey? In the late middle ages, powder-monkey was the name given to one who brought powder to those who were using a new kind of weapon. That is the whole question. We want to be the peacemakers and not the powder-monkeys in this world. We have had enough of arms dealers.

It would be ridiculous to think that we could find a solution to the whole problem, but the beginning of a solution would occur if we would put into practice the resolutions that were in the United Nations and we have said that we agree to. But no effort has been made by the superpowers to find a homeland for these Palestinians who were pushed out of their land.

There are frustrations among the Arab states. Mind you, there have been a lot of Arab states which use the Palestinians as a political football. I am here as a member of Parliament, not to create enemies.

Where were the Saudis when the Palestinians really needed help? Where was Kuwait? Kuwait is a pure fabrication of a country, with a totally undemocratic system where hundreds of billions of dollars are in the hands of a relatively few people. I am sure the average American must realize that there has to be something drastically wrong when a few families control hundreds of billions of dollars, deposited in American treasury bonds and in American and Swiss banks.

How long is this frustration going to be left to fester in the Middle East, until we have an outbreak of hostilities that will have terrible ramifications? Is it going to be this time, if we can get out of this peaceably, that we will realize that we have to sit down and find the final solution to clear Lebanon of the foreign armies on its soil and find a place for the Palestinians, a right they have under the United Nations Charter, so they will have a place they can call home? Still today there are universities and schools in the occupied territories which have been closed for two years.

• (1950)

That goes against all humanitarian things that we have stood for in the past. Yet, it is permitted to continue. We are expected to jump in line immediately because the Americans wanted to protect oil.

Once again I say: Where were they when Lebanon was overrun? Where were they when the Palestinians were calling out just to have a piece of land that they could call home?

In conclusion, for all those who believe that there is a just solution for the Middle East and in the humanitarian treatment, the place to look to is the United Nations to enforce those resolutions. It is the people in this country who can call upon the government and say that it has been 15 years that the civil war in Lebanon has been permitted to go on.

Since 1948 the Palestinians have not had a place to rest their weary heads. I call upon Canadians to ask simple questions of the Minister of External Affairs or of the government and say: Can we not use our role in the Security Council to say that time has come that these resolutions be respected? That is all we want.

To the government of this country, for the tradition and the respect that we have built up through the many years, we want it to continue, needless to say. We want to be the peacemaker and not the powder-monkey. That should be very clear. To all Canadians maybe it seems frustrating because we feel completely powerless, but we are not.

Our church organizations could be writing to our Prime Minister and to the Minister of External Affairs. If they knew that there were thousands and thousands of Canadians who are aware of the situation, we would see more action.

I was very happy to participate in this debate. It is very hard to stay calm after years of tragedy upon tragedy upon a people who do not deserve to be victims. It is amazing when one looks at the history of that part of the world to see that when the Arabs had their civilization, there was so little discrimination. It seems ironic that today they would be the victims of such discrimination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my esteemed colleague just said: "How can I stay calm?"

My comment is: Why should you stay calm when you see so much hypocrisy in North America, especially in Washington and I dare say in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker? How can you remain calm when these young people I see here could be the ones who may be asked to go if things over there turn as I expect most likely and I wish would never take place? How can you remain calm? Why should you remain calm?

My comment to my colleague is when you talk about the Middle East, Mr. Speaker, you have talked about the Middle East in the past. Would you explain to me to help me for my introductory remarks later on maybe. I may decide to give up, because every time you talk about the Middle East either in the Liberal Party of Canada, in the House of Commons of Canada or in any political party, everybody gets dizzy. Mr. Speaker, you can talk about anything in the world, but do not touch the Middle East.

My colleague explained to me his understanding of this nervousness when we start talking about the Middle East. He is a distinguished member of Parliament who sat in the National Assembly in Quebec. He was not defeated. He did not run in 1976. He came back to the Liberal Party of Canada, my party, at a very difficult time, when we were very low in the polls in 1984. He resigned his seat in Quebec City and got elected. He should not apologize for being passionate.

Could he help me out? What is his understanding of the reason why so many people are so nervous in political circles, especially when we want to find in all honesty a solution and justice for all. All means all parties. Would he enlighten me, please?

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I am flattered because the hon. member for Saint-Denis is very knowledgeable an international affairs, especially the Middle East. I should be asking him for advice. I am looking forward to hearing his speech later on, and I know it will be very interesting. I would like to say to the hon. member—

Mr. Prud'homme: There is lots to be upset about.

Mr. Assad: Agreed. The hon. member is right to be upset. But he made an interesting point. One wonders about the reluctance of members of this House to talk about the Middle East in public. It seems to me that if we have the privilege of being elected and sitting in the House, we should feel no hesitation about saying what we want to say if we are deeply committed. If we don't speak out, people will not respect our opinions. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you understand that if you don't speak up for what you believe in, people won't respect you. I agree. The reason for this reluctance to talk about the Middle East is that they are afraid of a backlash. When we want to talk about the plight of the Palestinians, they are afraid of being accused of anti-semitism. My father was a Semite. Why should I be afraid to speak out when I saw his country being destroyed? This is the place to speak out. Everyone in this House should honestly say what they think about this issue, because if they don't, they don't deserve to be here.

To the hon. member I would like to say that when we stand here in the House, we have the right and the moral obligation to say what we truly think and to defend those who cannot defend themselves. That is what makes them reluctant because they are afraid of being accused of being one thing or another. They might as well go home and let people who do have the courage say what they think.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in what has been a debate that has not only taken place in this auspicious Chamber in the country of Canada, but right across the international community.

It is a debate that has been waged and it is a debate that continues. It is my belief that most Canadians, in my humble estimation, would react in favour with the general response from the international community in response to the blind and naked aggression of Saddam Hussein on behalf of Iraq.

I say that because I believe most people share the general tenor of what has crystalized, if you will, the United Nations on the one hand, a United Nations that is able to mobilize not only one or two or three major countries or the two superpowers, but in fact a litany of proud sovereign nations which have rallied to that call. They have beckoned their men and women to try to stand up for what they believe is in the best interests of that great word we call democracy, which that has many definitions to many different people.

I believe also that in a certain sense many people would probably value the general actions embarked upon by President Bush. It is not often that many Canadians, indeed many parliamentarians and indeed this member of Parliament, would go out of their way to try to pay some degree of homage to international leadership by the United States of America. Usually it is on the receiving end. Usually the United States for one reason or another is always subject to criticism, perhaps because sometimes it is the biggest, it is the most powerful, it is the richest, and it is the most influential. Quite often it receives criticism, whether it is from this country or others, in terms of being the popular whipping boy for everyone's concerns.

I do not pretend to be a military expert, nor an expert on the Middle East. One of the most popular words in describing the affairs of the Middle East is the word complicated. It is in everyone's vocabulary. My colleague who just spoke before me eloquently, compassionately, and passionately referred to the word "complicated". I do not pretend to stand in this Chamber as an expert on that part of the world nor on military exercises. In terms of what I hear from my constituents and what I hear in terms of my discussions with Canadians and others, the situation is that if we have not acted—and when I say "we", I mean the international community—where would things be today? If no one would have stood up to Mr. Saddam Hussein, would he be comfortable now in perhaps also having invaded Saudi Arabia?

Would it in fact have destabilized more than it has already the coming together of an international resolve of enormous repercussions and of enormous consequences in the positive light of the speed with which the Soviet Union has had its own economic and political revolution and the speech with which we see the changes in eastern Europe?

If we had not stepped in as an international community, the question of what would have been can never be answered. The answer potentially in some people's minds is a very scary scenario. In general I think the actions of the international community meet with very much favour in this Parliament and in fact across this country.

When we talk about things moving very quickly in eastern Europe or in the Soviet Union, we also have to say that the number of movements in the Middle East has been incredible.

Who would have thought several months ago that an Arab country would have actually publicly invited the United States of America to send troops on its soil? Who would have thought that Saudi Arabia would have permitted 100,000, 150,000 or 200,000 troops on its soil to defend not only sovereignty but to do so against another Arab country? Who would have thought of it back in May or June? Who would have thought that Syria would have been fighting side by side with Americans boys and women, when in fact several years ago the Syrians were targeted by the Americans and other in the sense of being one of the culprits for international destabilization and acts of terrorism? Today they are fighting side by side. Who would have thought that Egypt as well would have been participating and giving the green light to the Americans to do what they are doing today?

When we speak of changes in eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union, we also have to recognize that there have been great changes in the Middle East as well. Changes come and changes go. Friendships are made and friendships are broken. Allies are convened and alliances are disposed of as well. While I generally welcome the unity of Arabs together with the Americans and the international community, I also caution Canada and the United States not to forget and dispose of the long trusted alliances that we have seen between Canada and the United States in that part of the region.

Israel is a perfect case in hand. Israel is by no means perfect, like Canada, like the United States, and like every other country. My good friend who spoke before me talked about truth. He talked about deception. He talked about lies. Who knows where that truth lies.

I do not think we should fall into the trap that Mr. Hussein tried to set for the international community in suggesting somehow it was evil Israel that was behind the Americans doing what they are doing, that somehow it was flying by disguise in American planes. We should not fall into the trap of a leader who was desperate to regain his foothold in the Arab communities he had lost. Nothing more unites a number of the Arab countries than that word called Israel.

We also have to recognize that we have alliances with that country and have had them for a long time. We also have to recognize when my hon. friend speaks of freedoms and democracies that it also happens to be the only democracy in that part of the world, the only democracy that has a forum like this one, where deputies can get up and debate the issues of the day, the only place where people have a vote.

I do not see this aggression as an aggression by the Iraqi people necessarily. I see it as an aggression by one individual who I think sees a lot of potential glory for himself. There probably is a great deal of trouble underground with this man called Hussein in his own country.

How long did it take the Soviet Union to change? How long and how many leaders have we had to go through for the Soviets now to enjoy a bit of the democracy that we enjoy every day and take so much for granted? It was not until Gorbachev came along and gave some power back to the people. Now he has his problems as a consequence of democracy, but they are better problems than the problems of totalitarian regimes.

That is also the situation in the Middle East—military regimes and dictatorships. When I see the new alliances I see that things are changing, but I also say that we should be very careful not to dispose of old alliances. Israel has been an alliance and Israel has been a friend, and we should continue to be.

Despite the fact that the Palestinian question should be uppermost in any agenda facing the international community, no one doubts for one moment the urgency of any peoples in that country to have a homeland, to have a place they could call home. However, it would be too simple to cast blame only on one side and not look at the realities of the other. The refugee camps in the West Bank are still in existence. We should also be mindful of the fact that those same refugee camps existed when it was under Jordanian rule. When Jordan had the West Bank they were still Palestinian refugee camps. When the Jordanians governed that part of the country which is now under occupied territories, there was not one university. There are now six. There were not the opportunities of work that there are now.

We talk about the truth. We talk about historical forces. We talk about manipulation. Also we should recognize that the Palestinian question also unfortunately serves the political agenda of certain Palestinian and Arabic leaders, but the people who lose are the young, the old, and the Palestinians who go without a home. The situation is not so simple that we can cast blame on one side and ignore the realities of history and the reality of present circumstances. While there are changes we should also keep in mind the alliances that have stood firm through the test of time and through the test of challenges.

• (2010)

In terms of the Canadian participation let me first salute the men and women who are presently in the gulf. These Canadians are acting on behalf of this country and symbolically acting with the world. I salute them this evening because they merit saluting. There is no greater service to one's country than through our Armed Forces and those who defend the country.

I like every other member of Parliament have people within my riding who are serving in the forces. I have 83 such Canadians in my federal riding of York West. When we go down the list of their names it really speaks boldly and proudly about this place Canada. They are people like Staliano, Ross, Sala, Rosenberger, Samute, and Sigh. They are all Canadians, regardless of their cultural backgrounds, all Canadian Armed Forces personnel from the riding of York West who are now in the Middle East.

I believe that there are two things that need to be said about the process by which this Prime Minister has led the forces in the Middle East and in the gulf. The first one is the uneasy feeling that people have about the fact that the voyage departed before UN concurrence was obtained. There was a very uneasy feeling among many Canadians. Despite their feelings as to what Mr. Hussein was trying to do, they were uneasy because they did not like the idea of losing any independence that we had on the international stage or the idea of trying to be subservient to the President of the United States when he beckoned our Prime Minister to the United States.

I believe there was some discomfort because it did not show the patience and the strength of trying to provide on day one a mission that was sanctioned, that was given the political green light under the auspices of the United Nations, which I am proud to say has always been the mark of past Liberal Prime Ministers when asked to serve.

The second aspect of the process, as opposed to the substance, was that this country and this Parliament was kept completely in the dark, as many members have said before me. The American President met with his Congressional leaders. He went on national TV to talk to Americans in their living rooms. He held daily briefings for the media of that country and was able from his golf cart to suggest the latest, even though I disagreed with that kind of image politics that everyone read through.

Where was our Prime Minister, in comparison? Did he speak to the opposition parties? Did he consult opposition leaders? Did he contact CBC and CTV to try to broadcast into the living rooms of Canadians from coast to coast? Did he offer daily media briefings so that we could at least communicate with each other? No, he did not.

I know he had a barbecue in Washington. I know he came back to his residence and everything was secret. The Minister of National Defence was called in. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was leaving, but Canadians were left wondering where was Parliament, the forum of national debate.

Why was Parliament not recalled? There was no debate. There was no discussion. There was no attempt at one resolution so that we could speak as one voice, offer a political resolution to the House of Commons and speak internationally for a change, rather than try to divide and conquer domestically. Several years ago, the Prime Minister realized that 174 people who arrived on the east coast one fine summer constituted a national crisis. When we allow 200,000 immigrants a year, when we allowed 100,000 Vietnamese boat people in 1980, all of a sudden 174 people constitute a crisis. What was his response after he falsely said it was for a crisis he called an emergency sitting of this Parliament? Can you imagine anything more despicable, more manipulative and anything more misleading in your lifetime? I cannot. The Prime Minister was low in the polls then and tried to step up those polls by stepping on the so-called refugees. He is low in the polls again today. Rather than having manipulated a false crisis, his responsibility ought to have been to react to a real crisis this summer, which he failed to do.

The Prime Minister had to stop the ships off the coast of Sicily because they were getting to the gulf too early. If they arrived there too early it would have triggered an earlier debate in the House of Commons. What an embarrassment it was to stop our ships midstream because the Prime Minister did not have the courage to face Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, you rightfully indicate my time is up. There is much which this Prime Minister and this government have to face. He is fortunate that he has been embraced in the sense that the international community has acted, but he should have done it like the other countries where Britain, France, Italy and countless others had the courage to take their people into their confidence and in a time of crisis unite them and stand united. That was not the case in this country and we are proud today in spite of this Prime Minister and in spite of this government.

Mr. Shields: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if all members of the House would consent to allow the Pages to leave now. I do not think we really need them. It would be good for them to go home. They have things to study. They have exams tomorrow. I think it would be all right if we could let them all go home.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Pages can leave.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a very straightforward question for the member who just spoke, the chair of the Liberal caucus. There were discussions earlier in the debate about the possibility of another motion being put forward.

A Liberal member for one of the Toronto ridings indicated that he would be prepared to support the terms of that motion which the government sought to introduce. I wonder if the member who just spoke could indicate what position he will take with respect to the resolution now on the Order Paper to be voted on. Does the hon. member intend to vote for or against that motion in the event that the amendments on the Order Paper are not adopted?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, my message, to paraphrase another great Canadian, is just watch us. I think he should just have patience. I believe that in the finest traditions of the House we, in the Liberal Party, have no apologies to make whatsoever in trying to galvanize a unified solitary voice emanating from this Parliament.

Because the Prime Minister was incapable of putting a motion before us that would speak to that, because he did not recall Parliament, we saw and felt the need among Canadians in terms of their aspirations of wanting some leadership. We have discussed with various parties in this Chamber the possibility of having a motion that truly speaks to the greatness of this country, its ambitions and aspirations. We will continue those discussions.

We take no lessons from a New Democratic Party that has very little credibility when it comes to defence matters and very little credibility when it comes to NATO. We used to have the former leaders talking about pulling out of NATO. That was when the NDP was unpopular. Do you remember those days?

All of sudden, for a short span of time back in 1987, Ed Broadbent jumped to the top of the polls. Then they asked him what the NDP policy was on NATO. This is when he was very popular. He said he might not contemplate pulling out of NATO in the first year of their term of office. I realize where my hon. friend is coming from and I realize where he is trying to go. Before he tries to talk to the Liberal Party he should realize that neither he nor his party has a monopoly on virtue, let alone defence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have another question from the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence and then I have another question for the hon. member for Saint-Denis. If there is time, I will come back to the hon. member.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I shall try and be brief.

Since my hon. colleague from York West has put so succinctly the Liberal position on a hypothetical situation and has indicated that he is also very familiar with the way the NDP would vote on a possible amendment, I wonder if he would share with members of this House his perceptions on what the NDP will do in the event that their amendment does not pass. What will they do in the event that the amendment for which they negotiated, which was supposed to take the place of these other amendments is not introduced? Also, what will the NDP do on the main motion and on the Liberal motion?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, my friend from Eglinton—Lawrence asks a very interesting question. Perhaps indirectly, he answers the question of my hon. friend from Burnaby. I must be honest with my friend from Eglinton—Lawrence. I do not know from one day to the next what the New Democratic Party is going to do or what it stands for. If you recall last week when their House leader, on a Thursday evening, made his maiden speech in the Senate. He called it tyranny.

The next day, Friday morning in Question Period, the House leader suggested that the Senate does not work and it should be abolished. One cannot have it both ways. That is the fallacy that underlies many of the pronouncements and many of the policies of the New Democratic Party.

My friend from Eglinton—Lawrence will now have a chance to see what the New Democratic Party is all about in the province of Ontario. I noticed the remarks made by the member for Eglinton—Lawrence on post interviews of what happened. He quite rightly pointed to a long list of commitments and promises made by the New Democratic Party. The sixty-four thousand dollar question is, will they keep those and at what cost? I must be honest. The New Democratic Party confuses me from day to day. I am not sure where they are going to be Monday because today is still Thursday.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a comment while my colleague from Toronto is speaking. I am sure it is an inadvertent comment because these are very important facts. I know that some people in the world would like us to say what he said. I am sure he did not mean it. I consulted with my friend, the admiral of the fleet of the Liberal Party from Newfoundland. First, I did not know it was a debate on Israel or I would have adjusted my speech but it is too late. Second, he called the state of Israel our ally and friend.

It has to be corrected. It is important to correct it, because the meaning of ally means more than a friend. Israel is a friend of Canada, but we are not an ally. It is not our ally. I stand to be corrected, but the military implication that suddenly Canada is an ally of that friendly country called Israel would be immense. I am sure he does not want us to drag Canada's youth into the problems of the Middle East.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, speakers before me more eloquently talked about the Palestinians and the Palestinian question.

There have been a lot of comments about the Middle East. How the member who is a noted internationalist would speak of the Middle East by only speaking of the Palestinians without the state of Israel is a debate that will never start.

I also referred in this context to the fact that Syria right now happens to be an ally. Egypt happens to be an ally in the situation of the gulf. I make no apologies for what I said. I consider Israel a friend and an ally. I repeat that for the record.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my comment will be very short.

In response to the question from the member from the NDP, I thought that when we were in the negotiating process outside this House that those negotiations were held in confidence and had a certain degree of privilege attached to them, or else the negotiating process would be of no avail.

I would like my friend from York West to comment on that, please.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, once again we see that my hon. friend from Thunder Bay, while being elected in 1988, is an astute observer of the workings of this Chamber and Parliament.

I think the frustration that underlies this question is once again the reality which we face. There is one face which the New Democratic Party tries to put on with the Canadian people. We know a very different face, and I believe that this debate ought to try to have one solution wherein all the aspirations if possible can be met.

I heard previous speakers talk about the possibilities of why the Middle East problems have prevailed for so long. What I think my hon. friend from Thunder Bay is trying to suggest is that we have expectations that a problem like the Middle East will be solved. Yet, if we cannot resolve differences on one motion that would communicate a message to the world and to the country, then we do not really have the right to be speaking of very complicated international problems that should have solutions.

We, in the Liberal Party and caucus will continue to do that because we feel it is an honourable undertaking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow one supplementary.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, but I just wanted to clarify one point for the hon. member.

Certainly, I did not expect that the Liberal caucus on this question would speak with any sense of unity or one voice. We know that there was blood on the walls of the caucus room when this issue was discussed.

The question that I was raising is not in the context of secret backroom deals which the people of Ontario rejected in electing a New Democratic government. It is not in that context. It is in a very open context. If the hon. member does not want to answer the question, certainly the people who are viewing the debate can come to their own conclusion.

He says: Just watch us. Canadians remember the last time that a former Liberal leader said that. I want to ask the member once again, give him an opportunity to recognize that Canadians do want openness. Does the Liberal Party and the hon. member support the government motion? Should amendments be accepted or not, yes or no?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the former Prime Minister that the member alluded to will go down in the annals of history as one of the greatest prime ministers who ever governed this country. I do not say that easily, because there have been a great many tremendous men who have come before him and no doubt will follow.

Certainly, in terms of the comment that alluded to a previous time, that too enjoyed tremendous public opinion and favour.

• (2030)

This was a former Prime Minister who enjoyed not only the respect of Liberally-minded individuals, but in talking to average Canadians, whether they disagreed with Liberal policies or not, there was a certain respect for that individual that transcended the abilities and the attempts by the current regime to be loved by all people, including this gentleman's party. We will continue, as I said, to strive for oneness and to speak with one voice, aided by one great speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, in 1964, I happily made a big decision. I wanted to get into federal politics by running for a federal seat. I was involved in politics ever since I could remember. I was supposed to run for the Quebec Liberal Party in 1960, but I agreed to yield my seat to the hon. René Lévesque. I had a passion for politics and a passion for my country. A passion for my country, meaning Canada. And I say it in French: "La passion de mon pays, le Canada". I also felt that a federal member had to be concerned about provincial matters, about families, the elderly, the needy, the handicapped and those unable to defend themselves. We must understand that in Canada, people are different. Mr. Speaker, I like you and I respect you, but your cultural background is different from mine. So I tried to understand inter-parliamentary and inter-provincial relations.

My second reason for getting into federal politics was my great interest in international politics. I demonstrated this at the University of Ottawa by organizing a demonstration against the racist policies of Governor Faubus of Arkansas. I don't have any notes, it's not in my notes. We burned him in effigy at the University of Ottawa. That resulted in hundreds and thousands of protests and congratulations from all across United States. Why? Because a reporter who knew me was there, covering the news for the international media. This caused a lot of problems with the authorities at Ottawa U which at the time was run by the Oblate Fathers. Attracting attention was a no-no. We always had to conform.

[English]

You were not allowed to dare—

[Translation]

I always like to—

[English]

I always loved to dare to be different in international politics. I know many of my colleagues seem to be friendly to me and I appreciate this very much. Our young colleague in the NDP, for whom I have great esteem for his brightness, his energy, and his courage, has tried to divide us. He knows I do not play that kind of politics. That is the only place where I will disagree with him—trying to say that there was blood in caucus yesterday morning. There was no blood. If there were blood, I would be the one who would be bloody.

[Translation]

Yesterday, emotions ran high, but this evening I will try to be at least outwardly calm.

I am going to tell you, without actually doing so, what happened in caucus. Yesterday, I explained more or less what had motivated me throughout my life: my country, Canada—it seems it isn't very popular right now to say this in Quebec but I am going to say it anyway and my abiding interest in international problems.

Even when you are misunderstood and harassed and blackmailed, you have to stand up to defend your views, while respecting those of colleagues who do not share them.

I watched the debate this evening. It was about everything except the debate. There is a motion. It's not very complicated. To Canadians who are going to listen to this, let me explain that we have a government motion that was amended by my party—I repeat, my party—the Liberal Party of Canada, and again amended by the New Democratic Party.

Well, I have read and I support the NDP amendment. I didn't think twice about it. And I will tell you why. Of course, as a member of this party, I have not really had a chance to disagree, but my time will come. However, I support the amendment presented by our competent new External Affairs critic. He is brilliant, intelligent, but always uneasy when the subject is the Middle East, like anyone else, like me and like the others. But he is brilliant and intelligent, and he has his heart in the right place. I hope to win him over on the Middle East.

So I intend to vote for that motion. But I cannot vote in favour of the government's motion. In any case, my colleagues— At least, not for the motion before the House, and as for a future motion, I haven't heard about it, because this is all going on behind the scenes. Some members are consulted, others aren't. Imagine! I say this for the benefit of those listening because I intend to ask my friends to review my speech—I told them about it—because for me, this is a very demanding debate. So I will try to be very calm as I prefer to be on these serious occasions.

What really upsets me, and that is why I intend to defend the amendment of the Liberal Party of Canada, and so I should, because it condemns the government for not having recalled Parliament. And I think that is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker.

In 1986, Parliament was recalled for a minor incident, compared to what might happen in the Middle East—it was about the Parole Board. In 1987, Mr. Benoit Bouchard said: "Parliament has been recalled——to deal with an issue of great national importance.

[English]

[Translation]

At issue were a few miserable Tamil refugees in Nova Scotia. The nation in an uproar! Canadian racism! People were horrified because these refugees probably did not have the same colour of skin as my friend from Toronto or my own— people often tell me that if they had been Poles or Germans or people like that, there wouldn't have been this uproar in Canada. However, the government was up in arms and Parliament was recalled. I found that positively horrifying.

An international crisis is in the making, and the Government refuses to call back Parliament. That is what the Liberal amendment is about. We won't recall Parliament because it's nothing serious. Nothing serious at all. We are going to send young Canadians—first three ships, three ships which my eminent colleague, Admiral Fred Mifflin, had under his command—we start with three. The great Canadian contribution, in answer to the call of warriors Bush and Thatcher! We are doing our bit for the war effort.

But this is not enough, because if you send three ships you need someone to defend those ships. So we are sending 18 CFs to protect our ships. But there is more. I hope everybody is listening very carefully. We also had to send several hundred people to take care of these planes. And there isn't a war on yet. There is no conflict.

I said earlier that in my student days I organized a demonstration against Orval Faubus. In 1957, I set up the National Welcome Committee and I was a student coordinator when we received the Hungarians who came to Canada, who had left their country and who went as far as Vancouver. There was a reception in every city. Later, in 1968, I was a member of Parliament, and I was involved and went to take a look personally in Czechoslovakia. I defended and protected U.S. draft dodgers. There is an American book on the subject, and I was surprised to see it was written in 1970, and the title is The New Exile.

[English]

I wish you would read it. There are just two or three pages that tell what I did, because others could not do it. It states that the man the hon. member mentioned, one of my ex-leaders, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, could not do so. I was used willingly, because the caucus was divided. It seems we are always divided on great questions. It is all right. That means vitality. Maybe it is a speech of return that I am making, but I want to show consistency. That is why I am trying to enumerate, not to be pompous. I hope people who know me know that I do not give a damn. But I want to show that I have always had that commitment of daring and of consistency.

I was a delegate, appointed by Pierre Elliott Trudeau, at the United Nations in 1974 when Arafat said: "Please listen to me. Don't let me down." The western world, instead of listening, boycotted Arafat. I am the only one who stood up. I was blamed by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, but Trudeau did not recall me from the United Nations.

But I paid a hell of price, my dear friends. I do not mind. We should have listened to that voice in 1974 that was saying: "Please don't let me down." Remember what happened in Lebanon in 1976, and on, and on. Again, it is this refusal of being there at the right time, instead of waiting for contamination and then finding a solution.

Of course, this invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein is unacceptable. I have met Saddam Hussein. I spoke in the Parliament of Kuwait. That was before the Emir disbanded the parliament because he did not like it too much. Perhaps it was going too fast. Of course, I condemn that, but let us go back to the source. The young people today would like to benefit from the dividends of peace. Have we forgotten who gave him the best of arms and arms—

[Translation]

Well, I know and Quebecers know that despite its competences our army certainly does not have all the sophisticated weaponry that the super and intermediate powers were fighting to sell to Iran or Irak for eight years, to Israel and Syria— I name them all because they are all countries to me. And today, it seems to come as a shock, as an insult or just as a surprise to some people suddenly to discover that Saddam Hussein is a great military man. The military strength of Hussein is incredible. But who armed him to the teeth in the first place? We did! That is a fact.

So there is a question we must answer. I was saying that as a proud French Canadian, for which I insist there is no translation—

[English]

I am a Canadian français. There is no translation for that.

[Translation]

But with an abiding concern for international affairs, I said to myself: What would Canada's role be in this kind of crisis? And that, hon. members is why I am disappointed in this government which failed to take advantage of Canada's extraordinary reputation throughout the world, which did not know what Canadians want—

[English]

What Canadians want is not to say yes, Mrs. Thatcher, yes, Mr. Mitterrand, yes, Mr. Bush. It is to be that kind of country where you have the Marchi, the Comuzzi, the Volpe, the Prud'homme and the Paproski. This is the kind of country that could be so exciting. What kind of international role can that country play? What role can it play at the United Nations? Have you seen any nervousness of this cabinet?

Mario Andreotti is my master of international politics. He writes to me, could you believe that? Ask Mr. Bevilacqua. He used to read the message to me because it is in Italian and he writes so small. But he is my master in international politics. He is working hard. Mitterrand, he is working hard.

Let me ask a small permission. As long as I am not too attacking, I am sure I will get it. What I would like to know of my colleagues, Canadians, do we really reflect the kind of action Canada can better play than to send, with all due respect, three ships and 18 planes? Is that not what Canadians really would prefer even though people see how Gallup last night says 58 per cent approve of the government's action, so we all get excited. We say we cannot vote against the motion, 58 per cent. It may be 38 tomorrow, and maybe 12 if war starts and we lose young Canadians who could have been used otherwise diplomatically. And I will tell you why. Canada is one of the few countries that already has Canadians over there.

The Associate Minister of National Defence, a gracious woman, nice lady, nice member of Parliament, said she felt great last night for these 900 and 500, but I feel equally great, my friend from Toronto who is listening so intently. He thinks I am going to explode. I will surprise him.

We have hundreds of young Canadians on the Golan Heights. We do not talk about that. The pride of Canada, Mr. Speaker, a hundred young Canadians, young Canadian girls and boys are in Cyprus. They are the pride of Canada for our reputation.

My colleagues, I could speak for hours. I prepare myself accordingly. Do you know how many resolutions there are on the Cyprus question, asking ask Turkey to get out of Cyprus that it has occupied 40 per cent since 1974? Have you ever mentioned that? Have you ever heard about that? No, as someone would say, there is no oil there.

[Translation]

200,000 refugees out of a population of 600,000, and we do nothing, we say nothing. We have young Canadians on the border between Iran and Irak, we have young Canadians in the Sinai. What kind of role do you think Canada will be able to play tomorrow, hon. members? of course, there is the economic blockade. We are helping to enforce. It was a UN decision. I support that decision. We support it. This military aspect, is that Canada's calling? I say no. How many countries now contributing to this major military effort are also considered to be supportive of UN contingents? Few. Examine, look around! All of a sudden we have a crisis on our hands. I am very glad that the United Nations should experience such renewed vigour, despised as they are by the Americans who still owe them in excess of $500 million. The United Nations may have to close the shop. Then overnight there is a world out there because the Soviet Union is falling apart, they are no longer a dangerous military power, so now there is no problem. Good. But we will have to respect all United Nations resolutions, not just some of them. Those of Cyprus. Go and ask—

• (2050)

[English]

Go and ask your friends of Greek and Cypriot origin, numbering some 200,000 in Toronto, if Marcel Prud'homme is a kook in defending the importance of respecting the United Nations resolution on Cyprus. Ask them in Toronto and Montreal. I know the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has more than expired. Does he have unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. Prud'homme: One minute.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Prud'homme: I will not be provocative. I thank the House.

There have been a multiplicity of resolutions on the Middle East by the hundreds. The United States used its veto 20 times. I could go on and on, but because the House has been indulgent, I will not abuse the privilege.

Tonight I could have been negative. But as most of my colleagues know there is a little something in me that says even if I am outraged about something, I still prefer to try not to go the anger route, but try to convince people that this country, so beautiful to work and live in, has such a great role to play in the world. I am not going to beg to do that on my two knees because I come from——the Province of Quebec and I am a French Canadian. Never will I go down on my knees before the rest of Canada to defend my views because to me that is only part and parcel of what Canada is.

[Translation]

I could have talked to you about this newspaper—

[English]

The Suburban, Montreal. So, I will be positive, I will only attract attention. If people want to know what they write about me, every Quebecer, Canadien français, knows about that paper. The Suburban, Wednesday, October 17, page A5. I am told that is one good way I am told to attract attention. Please read that. The Suburban is a sick paper from west Island Montreal.

[Translation]

But like Gorbachev once said here in Parliament, while dogs bark the caravan goes by. So I would rather not comment on that. But all I am asking, dear colleagues—I wish there were more of you, I realize that international affairs wear people down, so before I tire you out and abuse I want to assure you that I deeply regret the fact that the government did not see fit to recall Parliament for an emergency debate. That is the resolution of the Liberal Party, of the Official Opposition, to censure the government for failing to recall the House. I will vote in favour. We should not wrap ourselves in the flag of the United Nations— Not the United States. I have nothing, I am pro-American. I do not like their foreign policy in the Middle East. That is all I am a very civilized man. As neighbours go, they are terrific, but I do not want to take orders from the United States. If this is a United Nations mission we will take our responsibilities.

I know—and I will end on this note, Mr. Speaker—that a catch-all resolution is being drafted so that all members might vote with a clear conscience.

Because, in conclusion, I must say that some people have been very nervous over the past week. Because they do not want to discuss the real issues in the Middle-East, they do not want to get to the bottom of things. My colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre did so in such a brilliant manner. We must get to the roots of the larger problem.

But remember that on October 29, 1947, my country—

[English]

—your country, my colleagues, November 29, 1947, voted at the United Nations to create two states on Palestinian land, by a vote of 13-10. I think I know my facts very well.

Why do we not finish that job too? Do not be afraid of those who talk about linkage. I heard colleagues say: "We must not have any linkage", as if these things are not links. We must have that first. Fine. Let us solve that one.

But we must also be prepared, and announce ahead of time, that immediately upon having finished solving the Iraq-Kuwait issue, it should be well known internationally that there will be as much devotion and passion in the world community.

We should first solve what is going on in the Middle East. Then Marcel Prud'homme will be the happiest person because he will have the same devotion to his country and, hopefully, to international affairs. But do not ask me to be someone else in my country. I will always be myself. I have as much pride as anybody else.

I have much interest in world affairs, and I think that this government will find it unusual to hear me speaking so vigorously against the government. I think that the government has failed me—of course when I say me, I mean Canada— on this particular issue by not using this opportunity to see what all of us, together, the Marchis, the Comuzzis, the Mifflins, the Robinsons, the Prud'-hommes, the Paproskis can do to see if there is not something different, if there is not a role that could be different for Canada at the United Nations and in this crisis.

That is why I will vote for the motion. I am a responsible person. That is why I will vote for the amendment. That is why I will vote against the motion of that government because I am against it.

I am told now that there is a surprise coming. Well, my commitment at the moment is to vote yes, yes and no, and wait for the surprise, but I hope some people will take me in their confidence. As the oldest parliamentarian, I can only smell that there is something going on, but everything is escaping me. I almost live in this Parliament, so it is very difficult to escape me because I am devoted to see what kind of country we want and what kind of role we can play in world affairs.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow questions and comments. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway and the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, and then I will ask the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence.

[Translation]

M. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Hon. Member for his excellent speech and especially for the courage he has demonstrated on this issue. I know full well that he has had to pay a very high price within his party for the courage he has shown from the very beginning on this major issue, demanding justice for the Palestinians. I know he has paid and continue to pay a very high price within his party, and I wish once again to congragulate him for his courage and the fact that he has always stated his mind on this issue of justice for the Palestinians. Mr. Speaker, he was attacked recently in a degusting manner in The Suburban.

• (2100)

[English]

I have two very straightforward questions for the hon. member. My first question is with respect to the position of the Liberal Party on this issue. I know my hon. friend does not necessarily speak for the party on this question, but perhaps he could clarify for the House the position of the Liberal Party—a party of which he has been a member for many years—with respect to the question of an international conference on the Middle East, a conference including all parties affected, as well as representatives of the Palestinians, which dealing with the issue of self-determination may very well lead to the creation of an independent state for the Palestinians side by side with a secure Israel.

Second, my question concerns the motion discussed by some members in the House and referred to by the hon. member for York West, the motion which the government attempted to put to this House a couple of days ago to which the hon. member for St. Denis objected at that point because quite properly from his perspective he had not been given notice. What is his position with respect to the substance of that motion? Does he support that motion as his colleague from Davenport and others have indicated, or does he oppose that motion?

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate, and I talk to you as I have always talked to you privately, as a young friend. I find you bright, articulate, devoted and sincere. But, please, on this important issue, I hope that you are not trying to show that there is division in the Liberal Party. There is strong opinion in the Liberal Party on this question, but to me the subject matter is so important that I am not interested in showing there is division.

I am glad to report to you that ten years ago, or five, six, four, or three, we talked about international conferences and it was unacceptable. I am glad. I do not want to take any credit for anything any more in this House. I have not sat in this party yet, but I think we are moving there. So, I have little reason to rejoice.

Yes, I think it has to be accepted. I hope there will be a debate and I will then throw you the book. Give me two hours, and I will get out. I am even ready in two hours to get out of the House on this issue. I mean it, every second of it. I have paid too much in my emotion, my blood and my thinking to stand up for the damn thing because I am convinced it is in the interests of world humanity that we address the question of the Middle East as a whole.

Second, I will give you my position. I do not think it is the role of Canada to send troops. I will see what they say on Monday. They may know more than I on this resolution. I was not consulted. What I have to defend is what I read and what I read is that we will most likely vote on that. If it is like that, yes to your amendment, yes to our amendment, and no to the government motion. If others want to vote differently we will see what they come up with, but I will be surprised if they will get my support.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis has always shown great courage; he has always stated his mind and always been consistent. It is also true that he has paid a high price for his convictions, but he was not afraid.

As he said—I am coming to my question—how does he manage—? He has always been recognized, and he often tells me: "I am a French-Speaking Canadian and proud of it!" God knows that he is recognized as such. Moreover, he has always spoken out against the fact that the United Nations and the major powers have never helped Cyprus against the Turks who raped the island.

Being a proud Canadian and pro French-Canadian has he ever been accused of being against English Canada? Never! I have never heard that.

Has he ever been accused of being against the Turks? Never! How is it, then, that when he tries to defend the interests of Palestinians or those who suffer in the Middle East, he is accused of being antisemitist? Could the hon. member explain that? How is it possible? You have been categorized in the Suburban, but I have never seen a Toronto newspaper accuse you of being against

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: I will be very cool on that—

[Translation]

For me, as a French Canadian, it is natural. Any human being belong to a corner of the earth.

[English]

I will do it in English. Yes, I am Canadien français but I hope its for life. You understand that, but you have to feel at home. I have never known anybody since I have belonged to this country, in my country I am not recognized. I am not equal, so—

[Translation]

I am a French Canadian, but I am a Quebecer first, that is clear. Personally I have no problem. I know that tomorrow some people will say: He has defended Canada. It is not true! I said that I will never kneel in front of anybody, because I have my pride. But I recognize also that my friend Comuzzi has his pride, just as my friend Mifflin.

The second? My God, it is so provocating that I would rather pass.

[English]

In the spirit that we have developed tonight, I would not answer the second one. I will not, I regret. But I will make another statement for The Suburban, that doggy newspaper—I do not even know bad words in English, and preserve the House that I use the one in French. Just to conclude, I will not answer that except, and I am not afraid to say this, I have always said and it is on record in the House of Commons that anti-Semitism is a cancer. Do you understand what this means?

[Translation]

Antisemitism is a cancer which eats up the inside.

[English]

But how many times do I have to repeat that? I never receive any flattering article by the Canadian Jewish Congress or the Zionists of Canada and yet Marcel Prud'homme, Canadien français montréalais time and time and time again, for 25 years, has always said that. There is nothing worse than anti-Semitism because it eats you from the inside. Once you allow your heart, your passion, your head to become anti-Semitic you have opened the door to yourself to be anti-black, anti-Catholic, anti-everything you do not like. So how do I still feel so healthy? But I understand the passion of the people they want to defend. It is their problem. They should understand that the greatest friends of Israel are not necessarily their blind friends because their blind friends may not help that state to survive.

People like me, and I say it seriously, can do a hell of a lot more to say to people: "Hey, buster, that country exists. Canada voted for it. That country has the right to exist but like every other country, but the other one has the right to exist". I know it is a perpetual debate. If you want to know more, I conclude by a quote. Why do you not read a fantastic book. Parliamentarians, I will send all of you who are here tonight a copy free. I will pay for it. It is entitled They Dare to Speak Out written by an American parliamentarian. He explains what the outcome is all about in that book.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on my respected colleague's speech. I had originally planned to ask the question my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway asked, which brought to mind the following quote from La Fontaine, a French poet from the Renaissance:

> Flatterers laugh at the expense of those who listen to them.

I am very proud of my colleague from Saint-Denis for not listening.

• (2110)

The point I want to make in this debate tonight is that the hon. member for Saint-Denis touched on two themes which unfortunately come back often in our debates. One is passion for this country, an emotion all the hon. members must respect because, in our statements, speeches and questions, we always talk about the interest of Canada, and not that of other countries.

The French language, Mr. Speaker, is a wonderful tool to express passions. I note that my friend said, and this is the second time I hear him say it: "I am a Canadian, yes, but French Canadian." The English language is not as precise. Blame it on the structure of the language. In French, Canadian always comes first. The second word acts as a modifier introducing an idea without cancelling out the others. Speaking with heat, my colleague also touched on a second theme: in this House, given the parliamentary system set up by the Canadians, it is always allowed to express dissenting views, because all the hon. members always put up with differences of opinions. Within certain limits, with your permission, Mr. Speaker! There are opinions we can respect without sharing them. I respect my colleague's position and I am glad that he made his position clear to our colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway on the motion debated tonight. It is a positive stance for the Liberal Party.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not know if there is a question, but the dean can answer that last question

Mr. Prud'homme: I will answer the second part.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Italian.]

[Translation]

Latin is certainly one of the languages I enjoy most as a listener because I understand it. But I simply want to answer on the first and not on the second. Do not be mistaken. When I say French Canadian, that to us is inseparable. It is not Canadian and— it is French Canadian. It is inseparable. It is inseparable in our proudness. And if people do not accept that, I am afraid a good many will drop one of the two parts and take only one. It is not because I want to please my colleagues, but I prefer saying that I said so because I believe it. This is not to please my colleagues. I say that because I am convinced, not because I want to be nice.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the words of my hon. colleague from Saint-Denis, I wanted to rise in this debate because of the eloquence and passion with which he spoke.

Mr. Prud'homme: I hope you are not on standby in case I go too far.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. members says he hopes I am not on standby. Certainly not.

Mr. Prud'homme: In case I go too far, I said.

Mr. Milliken: In either case, whether he goes too far or whether he did not go far enough.

I was here, and I had this opportunity to participate. I decided I would do so after listening to his very eloquent contribution to this debate.

As someone who has watched this Chamber for a long time and hearing the hon. member speak with the passion which he did and delivering the address he did to the House tonight, I could not help but think back to days when I sat in the gallery of this House as a student in the sixties. The hon. member was a member of this House then.

He has been a member of this House continuously since that time. For well over 25 years he has served in this place. It is an enviable record, and one of very distinguished service to Canada in his efforts to ameliorate the condition of hundreds of Canadians as the member of Parliament for Saint—Denis.

[Translation]

I am very pleased to convey to him my congragulations because his impassioned speech was very good. As he said, when one has conviction, one must have passion. That is fine.

[English]

Of course, I also listened with some amusement to the questions put by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. I must say I share the words of the hon. member for Saint—Denis in describing him as erudite and clever. I am sorry that he has taken it upon himself to try to sow seeds of division in the members of this Liberal Party.

He is shaking his head and suggesting that it is not so. Words speak for themselves, and I am sorry that he is trying to be mischievous this evening. I would have expected better of him. Someone as eloquent and as capable as he is, I would have thought might have felt happier in the Liberal Party than in the New Democratic Party.

We have tremendous tolerance for varying viewpoints. One of the strongest points of the Liberal Party—I have watched it for a very long time—is its ability to open itself and embrace people of a great variety of opinions and views. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, instead of trying to accept that that is the fact, is busy trying to suggest that somehow because these views can all be accommodated in this great party, somehow a wedge needs to be driven in to drive some members out.

I suggest that it is unworthy of the hon. member. I would suggest that in future he try to contain his enthusiasm for wedge driving, and stick with fair questions that seek to elicit genuine information rather than these efforts to make people feel uncomfortable in the convictions that they hold.

Certainly, the members of this party are encouraged by the example of our string of distinguished leaders, and by the leadership of the party generally to hold their convictions.

The Liberal Party is in fact the party of individual rights. It believes in the worth of the individual, and it accepts differences of opinion. I ask the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway to bear that in mind when he presses his mischievous questions.

What I wanted to speak about tonight was something of some considerably grave concern, because I think the situation that we are faced with in dealing with this motion is one that arose out of a lengthy summer adjournment that this government foisted upon the House, and really upon the country.

I think it is fair to say that Canadians all across Canada were appalled when this crisis in the Middle East erupted. Indeed, there was another crisis as Your Honour will recall at Oka when the government, despite repeated calls from the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier who is House leader for this party, for the recall of Parliament at an early date to deal with these matters, stonewalled and refused.

This motion is the result of the government's reluctant recall of Parliament. It had to do it, because we had adjourned until September 24. To show that it was really serious about this, it introduced this motion on the first day back. It was debated for a day, and the government expressed some surprise that it did not immediately pass.

Apparently one day was supposedly enough to discuss this important issue. So, they called it another day, and at the end of the day, they said: "How long do you want? Why is this going on so long?" They gave notice of closure. They have never in fact imposed it, but they did come and say we are going to use it unless we get some kind of deal. Now we are sitting late to deal with this issue and we have co-operated in that. We have agreed to sit late in order to allow members who wanted to speak on this issue to do so. I am sorry that the government regards this as so unimportant that four days of debate, strung out over a period of weeks, is enough for the members of Parliament to express the views of their constituents on this very important issue.

I can think back to 1956 when the government of the day was faced with a crisis in the Suez. There was an immediate recall of Parliament to deal with the crisis. Parliament was called into special session. There was a Speech from the Throne and everything. A special session was held so that the members of Parliament could be present and discuss what the Canadian government was doing in an emergency world situation.

We were confronted with a situation that was just as grave, just as serious for world peace this summer. This government did nothing. It twiddled its thumbs and did nothing. It said we will send troops abroad, we will make our decisions but we do not need to call Parliament together. We do not need to discuss this with representatives of the people. We do not need to call the Leader of the Opposition. We do not need to speak to anybody. We will simply talk to the President of the United States, as my hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Nipigon has suggested.

We can talk to the President of the United States. If he says we should send troops, then we will send them. It was a deplorable approach to diplomacy and to the Canadian people. It was contemptuous of Parliament and an insult to the peoples' representatives here.

What the government is doing is exhibiting a pattern of contempt. As someone who appreciates this place and believes that the House of Commons is where matters should be discussed and disposed of, I am appalled at the record of contempt that is shown by the government throughout the two years I have been here. I know the hon. member for Saint-Denis with his 26 years of experience could list far more than I could of the way this government has acted in its contemptuous fashion. I can think of a few items that indicate a similar approach to the House of Commons. The failure to call Parliament back this summer is only one. There has been closure used constantly in this House, more than all the other Parliaments in Canadian history put together. That is how often closure has been used in this Parliament. We have had time allocation used in this Parliament time after time. We had the government House leader on his feet the other day saying that in the six years it has been in office, it has used it as many times as the Liberal government had before. I do not think that is much of a record. When you add in the closure use, it is a much more impressive and debilitating record. It shows a tremendous contempt for Parliament.

There are regular lengthy adjournments. You would think that if it was using closure it is because it is jammed with work. But it is not. It uses closure, closure, closure. Then it says, okay, it is time to go home now early and have a long holiday. Do not come back too soon. It asks for extended periods off. We left early in June, we came back late in September. Last year we were off until an extra couple of weeks in January. The year before, we had an extended break. It would not call us back at all until after April 3, I think, in 1989, after a two week session in December. All through the December session in 1988 it used closure at every stage to get it all through in two weeks time.

There is a pattern of contempt and disrespect for Parliament of a constant unwillingness to meet the opposition to deal with us in this Chamber. Why? It is fear. The government members are afraid to face the music that is put to them by us in the opposition. They are afraid to listen to the voices of the people. The evidence of that is in the string of unpopular policies that it pursues when we are not here and when we are here. It says we do not really care whether you want to change this bill. We really do not care if you like our policies. We are going ahead with them anyway. Shut up. If you do not shut up we will put closure on you and shut you up. If that is not enough we will send you away for a long holiday so you really have not got a platform in Parliament to speak on. That is what is going on here and that is what went on in this case. Here we have the government choose to send troops abroad. There was a two-week delay while the ships were outfitted. Parliament could easily have been recalled in the two-week period and could have discussed this resolution or some other such resolution. And, instead of doing that, the government said that it did not need to discuss this with Parliament, it would simply leave it until September 24 when Parliament is back.

This was one other piece in the whole string of contemptuous actions to Parliament, contempt bred out of disrespect for the House on the one hand but fear on the other, fear that it does not know how to control the House, fear that it cannot control what the opposition says in this House, fear that it is going to have its sins exposed by the Opposition in this House.

I do not mean necessarily bad things but I mean the unsatisfactory parts of its policies are exposed and brought to light in this Chamber. That is what this place is all about, so that the deficiencies in the government's performance can be brought to light so that it can correct them, but the government resents having them exposed. I do not know why. It should say it is sorry it made a mistake and will fix it at once. But you never hear that, Mr. Speaker.

Who has been here in Question Period and has heard a minister of the Crown rise in his place and say, "The hon. member has a good point. There is a problem there. We will have to do something about that and I will see that it is corrected", and report to the hon. member the next day. It does not happen, the government never admits there was something wrong. If a minister of the Crown does not want to answer the question he always says how bad things were under the previous Liberal regime and how much better they are today. What nonsense that is. What Canadian alive today thinks things were worse under the previous Liberal regime, other than the members of the Cabinet who sit opposite. Virtually every Canadian you speak to says we have never, ever, ever, had such a bad government as this one.

No wonder it is afraid to face the people's representatives in Parliament. No wonder it sent the troops abroad and when there was a hue and cry it said, "Well, we are not calling Parliament. The last thing we need is a place for those people to utter their hues and cries and object to this".

Well, we do not object to it as long as these troops are under the purview, under the control of the United Nations. We support this; and we have said that all along. And we have said it because this effort on the part of the United Nations represents, as my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has said, the first time the international community has acted in concert to deal with a world crisis. We have participating in this United Nations force, representatives of Third World countries, of middle powers and of the great powers and it is supported by all the great powers. Never before in the history of the United Nations has there been this kind of support for this kind of initiative. I think Canada, as a staunch supporter of the United Nations and its work, is delighted and should be delighted to be involved in it.

But surely we should have been consulted about our involvement. Surely that is reasonable and fair. Surely the people who have elected their representatives to sit here ought to have consultation, they ought to have some input into it and some discussion about it before it happens. And that is what I am objecting to, that that was denied.

We also feel that the attempt of the amendment that we have moved to this resolution, tries to assert in stronger terms the importance of the United Nations role in the entire crisis and the fact that we believe the Canadian troops should be under the direct control of the United Nations. We supported and continue to support the resolution that the government sought to introduce on October 16 in this House. And we would have preferred that that resolution be before us for debate now, because we believe that that resolution more accurately states what is intended by the resolution and the two amendments which are before us. We support that motion and still support that motion. And if we could have a vote on that one, we would support it.

I know that the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway is going to tell us that his party supports it too. At least, I think it does; it did the other day, but it may change. New Democratic Party policy, as I heard earlier, changes from day to day. Earlier this year the hon. member for Kamloops was up, speaking about the Senate. The NDP have been around the place, up the tree, and down the hole on the Senate so often that I do not know whether the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway could tell us the party position on the Senate. He must be even more confused than the hon. member for Kamloops who is completely baffled. I remember asking him a question last summer about their views on the Senate. He gave me an answer which was at variance with what he said a week before. Then he told me that that was a re-interpretation of a resolution passed at some convention they had had a few weeks before that. And that was different from the policy of the previous convention, because they no longer wanted to abolish it and they were in the process of forming some new policy on the Senate which I thought he did announce the night before, but apparently he had not. It was something different.

Really the confusion and obfuscation on the part of that party and its policies is sometimes a little disconcerting. I wish the hon. member for Kamloops were here, because I would be delighted to hear his views on this particular set of motions. I believe he was supporting the one that was to be introduced on Tuesday. I think he was aware of the terms, but I would not want to put words in his mouth.

I would be delighted to have the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway support the resolutions that we are supporting. We are delighted to be able to support his amendment. I think it is a reasonable and sensible one. I am sure he supports the very sensible amendment we have moved to the motion as well, and I expect he is going to vote for it when the time comes.

Mr. Prud'homme: How?

Mr. Milliken: I do not know how he is voting on the main motion. I assume the hon. member is voting—

Mr. Robinson: How are you voting?

Mr. Milliken: Having said that, the hon. member could save his question until the end. I know he will want to ask questions.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, because I sense from your attitude that my time is about to expire, I want to say how pleased I am to be able to participate in this debate tonight, to share the floor with the hon. member for Saint-Denis who spoke very well, and the other hon. members whom I heard speak earlier; the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon whose speech was a good one, and of course, I heard the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception when he opened the debate on this motion.

All of the members in this party, it seems to me, have indicated with clarity our views of the position of the government on this matter, our abhorrence at its continuing contempt for Parliament, and our desire to get on with this now and allow the question to be put, and the matter to be dealt with so that the expressions of the wishes of the people of Canada can be made manifest in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member who just spoke about the clarity of the Liberal position will want to demonstrate that in responding to the question that I want to put to him about the intentions of his party, particularly his own intentions, on the vote on this important issue.

We heard from the member for Saint-Denis. He was very clear. He intends to support the subamendment. He intends to support the amendment, and he will vote against the main motion, if, indeed, those are defeated.

We have not yet heard from the very distinguished member for Kingston and the Islands on this question. He told us that he supports a motion which is not even before the House, but he still has not told us whether he supports the government motion which in fact is before the House. Now, I know his colleagues have dodged, bobbed, weaved and tried to avoid this question with one noble exception, Mr. Speaker, but I want to give the member for Kingston and the Islands—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. We are getting awfully close to the end. Would the hon. member please come to the question?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is somewhat rattled these days by the fact that he has a New Democrat right in the heart of his federal constituency, elected from the provincial constituency of Kingston. I know that rattles him.

I know that he is as confused as I am by the goings on of his Liberal colleagues in the Senate. But I want to ask the member this very straightforward question: Does the member in fact support the motion of the government which is on the Order Paper and which will be voted upon at six o'clock on Tuesday evening, or is he going to wait and refuse to tell the people of Canada and his constituents? Perhaps he has not made up his mind yet, that is entirely possible. How is he going to vote, yes or no, on the government motion?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, it is the same mischief that the hon. member has been trying to put out all evening, but I am delighted to answer his question.

First, I must say I expect that the amendment that we moved will carry, so I think his question is entirely hypothetical. I fully expect that the members on the other side of the House will see the wisdom of our amendment, the folly of their ways, and vote for the amendment and I expect it will carry.

I can tell the hon. member without any shadow of a doubt, without any possible doubt, that I would vote for the amended resolution. That should make things crystal clear in his mind. I hope he understands that.

My expectation is the amendment to the amendment will carry, the amendment will then carry, and then we will vote for the amended motion which will then carry. I hope that that clarifies things for the hon. member.

He has raised a hypothetical question. He raises the question of what am I going to do if the amendment to the amendment is defeated, the amendment is defeated, and we are left to vote on the main motion. I will tell the hon. member my expectation is that I will vote against the main motion. But something could happen between now and Tuesday at six o'clock that would persuade me to change my mind. If that happens, then I might rise on Tuesday at six o'clock and vote the other way.

I invite the hon. member to attend in the House on Tuesday night at six o'clock and watch. He will see me vote. God willing, I will be here and I intend to vote the way I have indicated unless something changes.

Having said that, I know that the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway is planning a foray into Kingston and the Islands this weekend. I can only say how delighted I am to welcome him to my riding and I hope that he will be the very model of decorum and good behaviour and say all the right things to my constituents when he is visiting in the delightful riding of Kingston and the Islands.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising for debate, pursuant to Order made earlier today, the questions are deemed put on the subamendment of Ms. McLaughlin, on the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) and on the main motion, and recorded divisions are deemed demanded and deemed deferred until six o'clock p.m., Tuesday, October 23, 1990.

It being 9.38 p.m., pursuant to Order made earlier this day, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 9.38 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

ATTENDANCE IN CHAMBER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, for the last few days I have been busy working in my constituency. It has been brought to my attention that on every day in my absence the government Whip, the hon. member for Calgary West, has mentioned my absence from the House of Commons. He knows, as we all know, that this is a practice that we do not follow. I notice that the Chair has permitted that at every occasion and has not reminded the government Whip of that fact.

I understand that today is not the day to pursue the question and the allegations that the hon. member has made against me. I look forward to Monday when presumably we will get into an Albertan version of a parliamentary shootout. I do not plan to bow to any pressure from the government or from the hon. member for Calgary West in terms of supporting a special justice system for members of Parliament or a two-tier justice system. I do not plan to support that in any way or ever, regardless of the pressure brought against myself or my colleagues in the New Democratic Party.

I understand that today we will not be proceeding with the matter that has been raised every day in my absence. However, I want to say I am looking forward with a great deal of anticipation to Monday where I can reveal, presumably with my other colleagues, all of the story behind this initiative by the government to create a two-tier justice system, giving special privileges to members of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can respond to the hon. member for Kamloops and assure him that I made it very clear that we would not proceed with the question of privilege which was raised some days ago.

It is true there has been some mention of the absence of the hon. member from this Chamber. I think the hon. member would bear with the Speaker in understanding that at the insistence of the Chair, when an hon. member is unavoidably detained on business elsewhere, it is not appropriate to continue with the question of privilege. The hon. member will know that I made it very clear I did not think it appropriate to continue in the absence of an hon. member.

We do have a rule that we do not refer to the absence of hon. members. Sometimes, though, in the interests of fairness and in the interests of the proceeding it was necessary to make that point.

I would anticipate, as I indicated the hon. member for Calgary West yesterday, that at the very first opportunity we would continue with the question of privilege and, if it is convenient to both members and to the House, I would be prepared of course to hear that on Monday.

The hon. member might be able to contact my office and give me some indication. I will make similar inquiries with respect to the hon. member for Calgary West.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, October 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Government Orders

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to talk on this bill this morning. I am very sincere when I say I do want to speak on it because it is a bill that affects most of my constituents. I know that it affects a lot of Newfoundlanders and all other Canadians involved in the fisheries.

What I plan to do this morning is give a bit of the background as to precisely what is happening with Bill C-74. I want to give the details of precisely what is happening with respect to the guts of the legislation. Then I want to provide a few editorial comments bearing in mind that this is the second reading and from here it goes on to committee. If we are anticipating hearings at the commitee stage, I would certainly believe and hope that my points would be taken account of in the commitee work.

At the outset I would like to say that his bill is essentially made or devised to increase the penalties for the incursions of fish habitat, essentially to make it more difficult with stiffer fines and longer jail sentences for those people who do not obey the Fisheries Act.

The Fisheries Act has been around for a long time. It was passed by Parliament in 1868 and, in short, it is a legal authority for the government to conserve and protect fish habitat where the fish live, swim, spawn, grow and are caught, and to control and manage Canada's fisheries.

To keep pace with the changing conditions the act has been amended more than 40 times in the past 122 years.

I think every member in this House is aware that the fisheries has undergone a tremendous amount of change in the past 10 years. It seems to me that it is always going through change, but I think more dramatically since the early eighties. We have had the Kirby report, the Harris report, the Haché report, and adjustment programs. The Senate has studied it and put out two reports. There has been a tremendous amount of change in the fisheries programs, in the licensing and in the regulations. This is just another attempt to improve. How perfect and how much of an improvement it will achieve, that will be the subject of my remarks.

The proposed changes, as I suggested earlier, will make the scale of fines and penalties for fisheries violations consistent with those that are contained in other legislation. This is the Fisheries Act. There is also the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, which essentially looks after foreign fishing, and there is the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. There are certain fines and measures in these acts that were inconsistent with the Fisheries Act, which as I understand contains the domestic fisheries.

One of the reasons this bill has been put forward is to put the domestic fisheries on a par with and to make it equivalent or equal to the environmental business and the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act that pertain to foreigners. I will speak more about that later.

It is not a cure-all, but it will provide a part of the solution. There is serious need in the fishing community, as a whole, to be protected from any activities, especially illegal activities that increase the stress on Canada's fishery and may even endanger the livelihood of entire communities, the examples of which we have unfortunately have seen more and more in the past three or four years.

Of equal priority, those responsible for altering or damaging the fish habitat will face much stiffer deterrents under the proposed legislation for violations. Some activities that have the potential for harming fish habitat areas include logging, pulp and paper processing, industrial emissions that enter fish habitat areas, and bridge and rural construction.

The bill also responds to real concerns about the unreliability of the data that can be obtained under the current act, since both the sources of the information and the ability to verify it are very limited.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that one of the difficulties as exposed in the Harris report and one of the difficulties that has emerged between the optimistic projections of the Kirby report of a 400,000 tonne total allowable catch and the present less than 100,000 or in the 90,000 tonne range which is essentially one-quarter of what we had been looking at less than a decade ago, has been the scientific data. While it is not my intention here nor will I castigate scientists, fish science like predicting the weather is a very inexact science. It relies on a tremendous amount of data for which we have not had the resources, either in manpower, in collection vehicles or the records, to be able to support it. This bill does address the data collection aspect, and hopefully will improve the fairness and predictability for all concerned.

I was given to understand that these amendments reflect the concerns and the comments, both oral and written, of individual fishermen and their association. I must confess at the outset to having some reservations about that myself. I got off the phone as recently as 25 minutes ago to fishermen in my riding. None of them are too familiar with Bill C-74.

While I believe the Atlantic Fisheries Council and other organizations were briefed on the progress of what was going on, I consider a briefing somewhat different than a consultation. A briefing is: "This is what is happening", and consultation is: "This is what we are proposing. What would you like to see put into this?"

I regret to announce that once more I do not believe the considerable knowledge of the fishermen experts, who really after all are the best scientists when it comes to who are most involved and who are most affected by this, once again has not really been accounted for as much as I would be given to believe, had I read the propaganda that was put out by the government. However, I will say, on the other side of the coin, that those to whom I spoke believe that there is a need for stiffer fines for those people who are out to break the laws and, because of the need to conserve fish stocks, that is of tremendous concern to everyone.

I think this year I have attended a total of five conferences with a great number of fishermen and, if there is any such thing as the pendulum turning, my understanding as a politician from probably the largest fishing riding in Canada, the 295, is that fishermen are now saying: "Let us do what we need to do to conserve the stocks so that our total allowable catch will improve and that the fish stocks will improve over time". Mr. Speaker, that is the background. I am not going to go through all the details but I will give you some examples of what we are looking at.

Right now, we have a maximum fine of $5,000 or 12 months imprisonment on summary conviction for a general fisheries offence. That is going up to $100,000 on summary conviction and to $500,000 on indictment, with the court option of up to one year imprisonment on summary conviction, that is a summary trial, and two years on indictment. What we are looking at is a tremendous, quantum jump in fines and in jail terms.

For the obstruction of a fishery officer, the fine is now $100 or six months. It is going up to $100,000 on summary conviction and, again, $500,000 on indictment. For the alteration of fish habitat, and I spoke to this in my introductory comments, there is a fine of up to $5,000 now and it is going up to $300,000 on summary conviction and on indictment it could go up to $1 million. One million dollars seems awfully high but when we look at what is involved, the loss of people's livelihoods as well as whole communities, then I do not think it is that unreasonable. However, I will speak to those points in a few moments.

Mr. Speaker, I made reference to the Haché report and the Harris report. In the Haché report, which came out about four or five months ago, it was noted that the maximum fine of $5,000 for illegal groundfishing is looked on by the industry as the cost of doing business. In other words, one gets fined, pays the fine and gets on with it. I do not think that is right, quite frankly, and I think I am supported by most of the fishermen who will be watching this and who will read the presentation which I am making.

The report also noted that enforcement can be made more effective and less costly by focusing on the consequence of breaking the rules. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans did a statistical analysis and they show that the levels of fines, on conviction, average about 5 per cent of the maximum. Thus, while the maximum was $5,000 the fines often averaged $250.

The Haché report also observed that the motivation to misreport the areas and species fished was high. I do not have first-hand knowledge of that, I have to take into consideration what the report says.

The task force was told repeatedly by industry participants that they believed the data was flawed and, in the case of commercial data, the accuracy of the information received by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans was considered questionable, due to the large-scale misreporting and enforcement problems. Recommendations were made that would, essentially, amend the fisheries regulations in such a way that this would be redressed and, in effect, this is what we are seeing right now.

Mr. Speaker, the Haché report essentially referred to the Gulf and Fundy areas, as I understand it. I am much more familiar with the Harris report. It noted the misreporting of catches, bycatches, discard rates, and other significant inaccuracies in the commercial catch data. Dr. Harris emphasized that a vital aspect of management strategy must be the improvement of the quality of data used in the assessment.

Dr. Harris made two recommendations that pertain directly to this bill. The first one was that the Government of Canada should urge the appropriate authorities to treat violations of fisheries regulations, aimed at conservation, as a serious offence and to ensure that penalties imposed upon convicted violators be sufficiently onerous to fully offset any potential gains from violation. The second point was that the department should expand its data collection to improve the knowledge of effort levels and factors influencing the data of inshore fisheries and landing records.

I am going to give the House a record of the fisheries violation summary. 1988 is the last year for which complete statistics are available. The total number of convictions for fisheries violations in Canada were 3,325 which was an increase of 28 per cent over the previous years. The fines totalled $810,242, which was an increase of 91 per cent during that period.

In the Atlantic region that I am particularly concerned about, Mr. Speaker, the convictions totalled 1,366 with fines amounting to $489,759, an average of $358 per violation, as compared to the average, which I mentioned earlier, of $250.

For the record, in the Pacific region, the convictions were 1,959, amounting to $320,483 in fines, making an average fine of $266 and for sports fishing it turns out to be $90. Habitat convictions total 11, with an average fine of $3,135. That is all very well and it gives the background, some facts and figures.

I again note that we are at second reading. I have a number of reservations about this bill. The first one is that the present surveillance area and the increase in the surveillance area are both centred in the inshore sector.

I had a look at the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program last night. As noted by the hon. member for St. John's East some time ago when speaking on this bill, surveillance has been allocated $57.5 million. I certainly laud that greatly because I have spoken in this House many times concerning the lack of surveillance. I laud this, but I still have some concerns for reasons that I will point in a few moments.

The government is chartering one offshore vessel in Newfoundland and five inshore vessels, so once again, Mr. Speaker, the focus of the activities is going to be on the inshore. I would be less than totally honest if I did not point out that I am aware of the observer program in the offshore which kind of makes up for the lack of patrol vessels. It is not all of one or nothing of the other, but it is my judgment that we should still strive to have a better balance for the offshore control in surveillance against the inshore.

The second point I have is that while the industry and fishermen have generally supported tougher legislation, I have a reservation that at least in my riding and for areas that I have spoken about, fishermen associations, have not really been consulted in the final form of the legislation. I do hope that during the committee stage that fishermen associations and the unions will be heard of to give their experience and their considerable knowledge so that we can tighten up the regulations even in a more just manner.

The question we really have to ask ourselves is that while tougher penalties are necessary, will the proposed legislation accomplish what it is intended to do, which essentially is to help the stocks be preserved, and, in our case, to grow.

The third reservation I have is that I think the government still lacks a comprehensive strategy to apprehend foreign violators, particularly American fishermen on the Canadian side of Georges Bank.

I do not want to relive the incident again, but I am sure that members of the House and anybody involved in fishing and enforcement recalls the very sad incident on December 11 last year when the U.S. scallop dragger, The Concordia, having been chased by the warship Saguenay, turned around and rammed the Saguenay. It is not the way it is supposed to be. It is supposed to be the warship that is supposed to ram the fishing vessel but it did not quite work out that way.

This is one example where we really need to have a look at the foreign fishing—

IRAQ

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the member, but there have been discussions among the parties and there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

That Government Business No. 16 and all amendments thereto, be withdrawn and the order for deferred division of October 18, 1990, thereon be applied to the following proposed motion which would be moved by Mr. Clark and seconded by Mr. Andre.

That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2, and for the sending of members, vessels and aircraft to the Canadian Forces to participate in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula, and in recognition of the seriousness of this matter, accept the undertaking of the Government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian Forces in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and

That upon adoption of this Motion, the said Motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we concur with that motion.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, yes, we too concur with the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-74, an act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I don't know what to do for a follow-on act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Perhaps the hon. member would like to move to questions and comments.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of other punch lines I would like to invoke at this time. If I could be permitted an editorial comment, it is the finest Friday I have spent in this House in the two short years I have been in politics.

Mr. Manley: The first Friday.

Mr. Mifflin: Not the first one, John, no. I have spent the odd one.

I return to my concerns. When the hon. House leader interrupted, I was talking about an area with which I am very familiar, the ramming of vessels at sea in the pursuit of their duties.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to use warships to chase draggers, we have to be sure we do not lose the business. We have to make sure we are fully equipped, we need a good set-up and good communications. No one is laying blame in this case. I think if we had to relive the thing over, perhaps we would have done it differently. I have been in these conditions and circumstances myself.

I think the whole business of foreign overfishing and legitimate foreign fishing—and I will speak to this for one minute—inside the 200-mile limit, the other side of the House, and for a reason that I can understand, say: "Well, look, you Liberals are the ones that actually allowed the foreign fishing. You are the ones that gave the licences". I cannot deny that. I was not here at the time but that is fair enough. I accept that sort of criticism. When those foreign licences were given the total allowable catch was in the vicinity of 400,000 tonnes. Today, it is one-quarter that. I could not logically agree that we should continue to maintain the same foreign legitimate fishing inside our 200-mile limit while people cannot catch fish in their own home territories.

We are the only country in the world that gives away our main source of industry to other countries and watches them actually catch it. All I am asking is for a reduction commensurate with the total allowable catch, and it should follow some kind of a parallel graph. I do not think that is too much to ask.

My point is that when we talk about enforcing regulations on our own fishermen in our own domestic waters and fines up to $100,000, then we have to look at the whole picture.

There is another aspect here about which I am concerned. The bookkeeping requirements are extremely stringent. I put this to any reasonable member of the House: In Section 61, which I looked at last night, it states that fishermen and purchasers will be required to keep records of the number, the size, the weight, the sex, the species, the product form, or other particulars of any fish caught. Mr. Speaker, if you can imagine an open boat on a stormy day, and a fisherman in his oilskins with three or four crew members catching 30,000 pounds—they are quite capable of catching 30,000 pounds of fish, that is from 8,000 to 10,000 codfish—and they have to go through the sex, the size, the colour, the description, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera. Mr. Speaker, I believe that is too stringent. I really do.

Are you calling time, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give the hon. member another 30 seconds.

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The other point I want to make before I come to a conclusion is that I would not want to see a salmon, not being tagged or being tagged improperly, have the maximum fine invoked. We have got to ensure that some kind of judgment is applied by these well intentioned fisheries officers. How do we legislate for judgment? In the committee hearings, I think we will have to look at that.

• (1030)

Again, on the business of surveillance, I would have to point out that, if we are looking at the over-all picture of surveillance in Canada., we use 23 maritime aircraft for 60,000 linear miles of coast. The Japanese use 250 aircraft for 228 miles of coastline and the Dutch use 17 aircraft for 5,000 miles. What that amounts to is that the Dutch use the fewer aircraft to look at 5,000 linear miles compared to our 60,000 linear miles, and the Japanese use ten times as many aircraft to look after somewhere in the vicinity of less than 1 per cent of the mileage that we have.

It is an indication of what we need to do to tighten up our surveillance. I am hoping that this will be looked at in the committee stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments from the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception on this legislation which we debated about two weeks ago.

I have two quick questions for him, because we want to be a little tighter than his speeches have been as of late in the House.

First, would he support our party's recommendation that, when this bill is referred to committee, we should have an opportunity to travel a bit? Perhaps we should have just a few quick visits on either coast to get a chance to hear people's concerns on this legislation. He did mention in his speech the concern that some people have about not hearing a great detail on this bill.

My second question relates to some concerns in the House in the last few days regarding the government's approach to environmental assessment. We now have four Fisheries and Oceans biologists expressing concerns, some alleging cover-up, about environmental assessment procedures as it relates to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I would appreciate his comments on that as well.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I spoke in the House yesterday on another subject, the gulf crisis. I sat in the House all day yesterday until ten o'clock with you, Mr. Speaker, last night. I recall vividly that a member of the hon. member's asked straight forward questions. I was very naive about this. It was not until later in the evening that I found out that these were all trick questions.

This might seem to be a straightforward question from my hon. friend and had it have been three years ago I would have given straight answers to it. But I am learning that when I hear straightforward questions from the NDP, I am not sure that I should give straightforward answers.

I said during my presentation that these are points and reservations that I have. I know that they are shared by many other members of the fishing community, by people in my riding, by the fishermen associations and by the fishermen's union. In fact, I spoke with the vice-chairman of the fishermen's union last night and again this morning. Generally, they think it is not a bad idea, but they are upset that they were not consulted as much as they should have been. I suggest that maybe during the committee stage there would be a chance for consultation.

With respect to the committee travelling, I am not the chairman of the committee. I would suggest that this is something that the committee would have to look at and decide for itself.

On the second point, I am not going to comment on that because there are aspects of it that could cause me to go overtime and that would incur your wrath. Rather than get on the wrong side of you, Mr. Speaker, I will just leave that for another time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, prior to the hon. member completing his full presentation, I am wondering if he might entertain a question or so with regard to some of the sanctions which are contained in Bill C-74.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognized the hon. member on debate, but he has already spoken. I will allow him few remarks, but he cannot speak again. He might as well get his little question in right now.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak a second time. However, since you have been gracious enough to give me an opportunity to pose a question to my colleague, I will certainly afford myself of that opportunity.

Does the hon. member believe, as I do, that there is a need for consultations with regard to the implementation of this particular bill? Does he believe that we have to have before the committee representations from all fisheries organizations on both coasts, particularly those in Atlantic Canada, namely the Maritime Fishermen's Union, in order to alleviate their fears, that this bill is not, in any way, intended to be discriminatory against the inshore fishery? I think we would need those kinds of individuals at the committee to get evidence which would suggest otherwise, and if indeed it is the opposite, that corrective measures be taken. Would the hon. member concur with that observation?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence. I am very serious about this because the hon. member has raised a very important point. I alluded to it in my introductory remarks.

I have a concern that in the well-intentioned discharge of the legislation as the proposed bill now stands, it is my belief that the inshore fishermen would suffer unduly because, essentially, the enforcement action would be focused on them. I am not suggesting that inshore fishermen break the laws any more or less than offshore fishermen. What I am suggesting is that most inshore fishermen, and I am talking about the close inshore fishermen, are closer to the surveillance of fisheries officers who meet them when they come back to the wharf. Fisheries officers have a better means of getting to them when they are hauling their traps. They are small and independent businessmen. They do not work for corporations. A fisherman could be hit with a fine which before was less than $5,000 and averaged about $300, and all of a sudden one is looking at $10,000 or $20,000, which is well within the limits. This could put a small fisherman out of business very fast.

The fisherman's union that I am associated with, and I correspond and communicate with them frequently, has an inshore fisheries council. In response to the hon. member, I would strongly suggest that the Inshore Fisherman's Council and the associations that represent inshore fishermen make sure that they have an input into this in the committee stage and that the judgment that is applied and the amelioration of the bill in committee stage before third reading will be taken into account. Then the inshore fishermen will not be unnecessarily pinned down by this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, October 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weiner that Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin third reading debate on Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Since the earliest days of history, the language of a community has always been its most vibrant cultural legacy. In this country, with its many language communities, the legacy is as rich as it is diverse.

• (1040 )

Canada's linguistic resources are an inalienable part of our national identity and they are the voice and expression of our multicultural character. In a modern world, they are a vital and indispensable resource for the future.

The decision to create the institute was the result of thoughtful consultations with key leaders and groups in the heritage language field, along with Canadians from every region of the country. It was their support, people across the country, and their active involvement that brought us where we are today in the establishment of this institute.

I am proud that the government has taken the leadership in responding directly and in such a concrete way to the cause of more effective ways to support heritage language learning in the country.

The consultations that helped to give shape to the institute were an invaluable source of information and inspiration. These discussions also indicated that many language communities are still isolated from each other and that instructional standards continue to vary greatly from one community to the next. It was clear from the discussions that the existing structures and approaches simply are not adequate for the challenges and the opportunities ahead of us and, if we were to achieve a more effective use of heritage languages in Canada, that we would have to address fundamental deficiencies.

Leading experts in organizations working in the field, along with government officials, concluded that the only way to improve the situation was to introduce more innovative ways to link our communities. We have to find new ways to capitalize on what does work, replace what does not, and bring forward new ideas and methods that can be shared across the country.

Canada's linguistic communities called for a national resource, founded on co-operation and partnership. They wanted an institution that would understand the practical workings of these local language schools and one would appreciate just how important it is for students, whether they are Ethiopian or Ukrainian Canadians, to have modern text books that foster the learning process, not ones that hindered it.

That new vision is the very essence of this legislation, Bill C-37. It is not an ethereal vision, not one of ivory towers where lofty academics muse about the state of languages in abstract terms. That is not our vision, not at all.

I know that many Canadians who volunteer their time to support their heritage languages do so in the most natural and modest way. The instructors in our communities week by week achieve the most remarkable results. In the process, these volunteers do this country a very great service indeed in providing our young people with language skills promoting their cultural identity and later to achieve opportunities in the international and global world in which we all share.

In establishing the institute, we understand that Canadians want and demand that all government initiatives be fiscally responsible. That is why we have modelled the Heritage Languages Institute with this viewpoint in mind. In particular, we realize that people working in the heritage language field do not want the government to squander scarce resources by over-staffing the institute or by establishing a large alienating building in which to house it.

The mandate of this institute and the mandate of the people who work in the heritage language field is to sustain and to strengthen Canada's heritage languages. In practical terms the institute will be responsible for developing Canadian-orientated materials in-house and for disseminating these materials throughout our many language communities. The institute will act as a clearing house, seeking to correct the uneven access to teaching resources and replacing it with greater uniformity and higher standards.

The actual institute itself, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you personally will be pleased to hear, will be located in Edmonton. From the beginning we have committed ourselves to creating an institute without walls, a place where language communities and associations from every region will feel right at home. Wherever the community is, they belong.

Quality research and materials are only as effective as the teachers who use them. For this reason the institute will do its part to help to improve the standard of heritage language instruction by developing more effective training methods and courses.

In terms of financial support, the institute will receive $6.5 million over five years and as a charitable foundation, financial support for the institute may also come from the private sector and community sources, as well as from provincial and territorial governments.

Part of the federal government's financial support will be directed to an endowment fund. In this way we will make the institute a permanent, lasting testimony to the promise of Canada's linguistic resources.

The doors of this institute will always be open to all who wish to support its work. I like to think that above these doors will be the names of every one of Canada's language communities, if not in reality then at least in the minds of the people who work there. As the staff of the institute go out into the communities, they will be helpful in sharing their ideas and working together.

In conclusion, I would like to thank all those who have participated in bringing this Bill C-37 to third reading, all those witnesses who came to the committee and, indeed, the members of this House who were members of the legislative committee of Bill C-37 who worked together to strengthen and improve the legislation that is before us. I know that they share with me a sense of how important this institute will be and what it can achieve.

Recently I had an opportunity to speak to one of the leaders of the heritage language instruction. He called the establishment of this heritage language institute a crown jewel. We look forward to this institute being operational very soon. It is a challenging mandate for any institute to serve as a trustee of this nation's linguistic resources, not only for today but for generations to come.

With the support and talent of Canadians, we share the same larger vision. It will achieve its objectives and become a source of promise and lasting achievement for all people.

I urge all members of the House of Commons to pass this bill on third reading quickly in order for us to establish this institute as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, establishing a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute is in itself a step in the right direction. Cultural groups and language teachers feel it is important to have a centre where documentation on language learning is collected, catalogued and, above all, distributed across the country.

On the other hand, we must avoid duplication and ensure that the Institute is sensitive to the needs of the community and regularly updates its information and existing teaching materials.

If the Institute is to be truly effective, it must communicate on a continuing basis with all cultural groups in order to establish a relationship based on co-operation and trust.

Mr. Speaker, the Institute's mandate is a broad one, especially since it is to be an institution without walls that will serve the entire country. I have some questions about this aspect.

• (1050)

How does the present government, with a budget initially designed to respond to the needs of Western Canada, according to the reports of Professors Kreisel and Batts, plan to respond to the expectations of an entire country? We cannot afford to let a lack of funds hamper the Institute in its work. No region in Canada should be penalized because the Conservative government has decided all research will be directed from Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker, according to what has been said by both authors of reports and the groups that were consulted, the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute was supposed to be one of two new Canadian institutes that would complement the one already in place in Toronto. In fact, at the time, the plan was that one institute would be based in Edmonton, to respond more specifically to the needs of the West in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, while another institute would be established in Quebec to meet the needs of the East.

These two entities were to focus mainly on applied research and developing teaching tools, thus complementing the work done by the Toronto institute. All three were to be complementary and work together, to save time and avoid duplication.

Thanks to their strategic locations, the three institutes would have been in a position to respond to specific regional needs, since heritage languages are not necessarily the same in Halifax and Vancouver, and thus develop teaching techniques adapted to the target population.

According to Bill C-37, however, there will be a single headquarters in Edmonton that will serve all provinces. An institution without walls, with a budget originally intended to meet the needs of four provinces, will now have to respond to the needs of the entire country. It will be interesting to see how it will manage this "tour de force".

[English]

The Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship will have to stay alert and follow closely the setting up of the institute to ensure the representation of all parts of Canada on the board of directors. It will be crucial in the orientation the institute will take, thus the need of having people from different groups, different areas of work and different regions of the country.

If the institute is to serve the people, it must be representative of the people. It makes no logic sense to have an institute that is supposed to serve the needs of the Canadian population if that body is not responsible to the community that is to use it as a resource centre.

The mandate of the institute is broad. Because of this, it could easily become another elite paper-producing organization. This must not happen. The institute must never lose sight of grassroots people; those who are working in the field and have been creating material throughout the years, those who know and live the problems, those who need back-up. That is why the institute is there.

Here again, I have very serious doubts about this government's intentions. Let us not forget that this is the same government that gave $14 million to teach Canada's business elite how to speak various languages of Pacific Rim countries. Where are the priorities of this government? They love to talk about less government intervention and budget cuts. Unfortunately for the youth of this country, the government only remembers this fact when it is dealing with women, youth and native issues.

When it comes to its friends in the business community, it opens its purse strings. Mr. Speaker, I must say that I find this completely unacceptable.

[Translation]

If, as the Minister of State has repeated so often, the $4.1 million cut is actually only $30 per student, if the Conservative government feels that the amount is so insignificant, why are schools closing down because they did not get that grant? Is this the way the government shows it cares about the needs of the people? And if so, what guarantee do we have that the institute will do better than the government? How do we make sure all groups can benefit from institute resources, not only a select few in major urban centres or others with access to technological facilities? The institute simply cannot afford to discriminate against any group no matter how important or where it is located. This will be a major challenge which the institute will have to live up to.

Canada is again going through times of crises and tensions. The coming months and years will give us the opportunity to promote multiculturalism throughout Canada. Wherever people may come from they must be made to feel they are part of Canada. The ideal is to be Canadian without having to negate one's own cultural heritage. This is a major challenge, and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute is one of the tools we have at hand for the job.

The Minister of State may well be sincere, Mr. Speaker, but we do entertain doubts about the motives of the Conservative government: even before the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship saw the light of day, they reduced the budget of the future department. How can we believe the government when it claims to be promoting harmony and then turns around and tells people who need grants to maintain their cultural heritage that no funds are available? How is it possible for an institute slated for Western Canada and expected to serve the whole country to meet the urgent and basic needs of heritage languages schools with an annual budget of a little over $1.2 million?

[English]

Mr. Speaker, we understand that there must be budget restraints, but should we cut on a department that has yet to become a reality, a department that has, as a mandate, to help create harmony among the people of Canada? In this summer of discontent, some of the most disturbing facts have been an increase in intolerance against various communities in our great country. The only response that this government gave was its silence.

The Prime Minister and his cabinet refused to call Parliament back to deal with various issues, as Canada seemed to be swept over with feelings of resentment. The vast majority of this hatred is directed at this government. Unfortunately, some of this discontent was redirected to various minority groups. Instead of coming out with concrete actions to assist in the creation of harmonious race relations across Canada, this government has done nothing, except cut funding to heritage language schools that help in the preservation and promotion of harmonious, cross-cultural understanding.

In B.C., without federal funding, some of these heritage schools will close. Some already have. The schools are the reason why this government is trying to establish the heritage language institute. It seems illogical to establish an institute that is supposed to act as a resource centre for the schools that this government is forcing to close. That is why I seriously doubt this government's commitment to either this issue or others relating to racial and cultural harmony in this country.

[Translation]

On October 27, Mr. Speaker, children, teachers, parents and directors of Ottawa region heritage language schools will hold a demonstration on Parliament Hill. They will present note books from every school containing handwritten letters and children's drawings protesting against their reduced budgets. Before and after the demonstration we hope to present a number of petitions in the House to bring pressure on the government.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that remarks I made in the House on October 16 are being inappropriately used, or even distorted, by Liberals and Conservatives in Manitoba.

Unfortunately, unhappiness with elements of the environmental record of the former NDP government, by which I still stand, caused me to generalize unfairly about its record on Rafferty-Alameda.

I have taken the time to examine the record, and I find that the NDP government was expressing the appropriate concern at the appropriate time. The fact is that this issue did not become the issue that it is today until June 1988, two months after the NDP left office.

Any suggestion, therefore, aided by my comments that the NDP government inadequately responded to the deal between McMillan and Devine is completely out of line and dishonest. Indeed, if Gary Filmon is into quoting me, I ask him to quote from Hansard page 14231 of the same day, October 16, in which I referred to the refusal of his Tory government to take strong action, given all the things that have taken place since he came to power.

Furthermore, I have had the opportunity since 1988 to work on Rafferty and other environmental issues with Gary Doer, and it is precisely because of the new and deeper commitment that he brings to environmental issues that we did so well in the last election.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Between October 12 and 21, Mr. Speaker, we celebrate our first week of science and technology.

Because science and technology offer many advantages we should be more conscious of the role they play in our daily lives and in our domestic economy with a view to promoting scientific culture in Canada.

It will stand as a challenge to improve our standard of living, boost the competitiveness of our industries, and open up interesting career opportunities. We will be much better prepared to face up to and overcome the many obstacles which threaten our environment.

Mr. Speaker, let us make a common effort during this week of science and technology to raise the interest of all Canadians in the key role of science in our society and to make Canada more competitive on the international market.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, by the government's own count, 1,500 fishermen and plant workers on the Labrador coast are without income this winter, and this government evidently does not give a damn. Because of the worst failure in the fishery in years, Labrador fishermen and plant workers, many of whom are aboriginal, do not even have 10 qualifying weeks let alone the 14 now required for unemployment insurance.

Once again Labrador fishermen find themselves in an emergency while the federal government stands idly by. If special funds are not put in place this month, it will be too late. Even the minister's own Industrial Adjustment Committee has documented the seriousness of the situation and called for an emergency response program.

This has nothing to do with Bill C-21, because even if Bill C-21 passes, hundreds of Labrador people will still not qualify for unemployment insurance. The people of Labrador are full Canadians and are entitled to the support of their government.

I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to announce an emergency response program for Labrador and to do it now.

PERSONS DAY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was Persons Day, and I think it appropriate to recognize a recent contribution to women's equality.

The Federal Solicitor General has announced that the maximum security prison for women in Kingston is closing. In its place, the government is going to build five regional facilities for federally sentenced women, including a healing lodge for aboriginal inmates. This action came about because of the task force recommendation on federally sentenced women.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate all those within government and in non-government organizations who worked so hard to produce what I believe to be a very progressive, forward looking initiative that will help to improve the quality of life for incarcerated women.

Many years ago, Agnes Macphail, the first woman MP started the fight to close this prison. This government has finally taken this important step to building a better future for women and society as a whole.

THALIDOMIDE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has disappointed the disabled community yet again.

Earlier in the week he rebuffed a request by the Thalidomide Victims Association of Canada for a compensation package of about $48.9 million, spread over 30 years, for thalidomide victims.

Canada is the only country that has neither acknowledged its responsibility to the victims nor settled legal liabilities with them. Canadians will remember that their government not only did not prevent the sale of thalidomide, but it failed to withdraw it from the market quickly enough when its harmful effects had already been scientifically verified.

Victims have to live with their physical deformities and handicaps, but their families will not always be available to provide them support. The $18.9 million package would provide for current and long-term accommodations to permit the integration of victims in society, but the minister holds firm and obdurate when compassion and justice cry for action.

Yet just next to him his colleague, the minister of energy, was able to squeeze a mere $602 million in grants and cash payments to suffering oil companies last year alone. We ask: Where are this minister's priorities?

INTERNATIONAL GATHERING OF THE IRISH

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, everyone claims a little Irish in their blood, and New Brunswickers are no exception.

Next year our province will play host to the International Gathering of the Irish in North America, and we will be having shamrock citizens with us from around the world.

This is another unique opportunity, both for New Brunswick and for Canada, to demonstrate that we really are a nation for all the world, for all cultures, for all races, for all people.

Just consider the human blend and interchange to take place when Canada's officially bilingual province, New Brunswick, meets and mixes with the world's favourite adopted strain, the Irish: "Sure—'twill be like a morn in spring".

This is an early invitation for every member of this House to come to New Brunswick between July 19 and August 3, 1991. There you will share the best of Irish humour; there you will see the best of Irish art; there you will sing the best of Irish songs; all in a setting of true Canadian hospitality at its best.

Just this week we had an advance visit by an Irishman from Baie Comeau. Already Irish eyes are smiling and Irish hearts are happy.

Please come and join us next summer.

THE SENATE

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents have asked me: "What are these Liberal senators doing? Can they do this?"

I can find no authority to support the actions of the Liberal senators. The Library of Parliament provides the book The Modern Senate of Canada 1925–1963 by F. A. Kunz. On page 339 it reads:

> But these arguments and counter-arguments respecting the Senate's financial powers, although theoretically interesting, are now-a-days little more than examples of academic pedantry and to discuss the Senate's right to revise the government's financial program in terms of conflict is really to present a very misleading picture of its functions in the modern state. On the contrary, the Senate has acted in full understanding of the meaning and the implications of responsible government and accepted as binding upon itself the proposition that it should not unduly disturb what has come to be called the "balance of ways and means"—

Or, as Hopkins said in "Financial Legislation in the Senate" in the Canadian Tax Journal:

> —that it would be inadmissible to tamper with the over-all financial program submitted by the government in its budgetary proposals—

For a more current opinion I consulted last night with Canada's leading tax consultant, Dr. Vern Krishna, author of the text book on tax law, The Fundamentals of Canadian Income Tax. Dr. Krishna, Professor of Tax Law at the University of Ottawa, notes: "The precedent dates back to 1215—

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the great leveller, the great equalizer among children worldwide is when a child acquires the ability to read and then has reading materials made readily accessible to him or to her.

There is no other single skill which will open up the world of knowledge and dispel the darkness of ignorance and thus relieve human hardship through enlightenment more than the ability to read effectively.

In view of this direct and positive correlation between literacy skills and children's well-being, does it not seem frivolous to express publicly concern for the welfare of children, as the Prime Minister has done recently, and at the same time attempt to impose a tax on children's reading materials which will lessen the likelihood of poorer children learning to master reading skills?

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canada's forest industry is in a crisis. Thousands of jobs are being lost, mills are closing, and yet this government is idle in trying to help the forest industry.

• (1110 )

The minister responsible for forestry said some time ago that he would have forest agreements signed before the planting season. Which planting season? What year will he have these signed? Also the sellout of the forest industry by this government and the Government of British Columbia, in signing the softwood lumber tariff, has resulted in direct orders being issued from the U.S. government to our governments telling us how to run our forest policy.

The 64 directives issued by Washington should be released by this government so that we can get to the bottom of the domination of our forest policy by the U.S. government.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Cash Flow Enhancement Program will enable farmers to secure interest-free cash advances during the current 1990-91 crop year. Each producer will be able to secure up to $50,000 interest free on the security of his undelivered grain.

I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds for their prompt response to the serious cash flow problems resulting from lack of opportunity to market the current crop. The cash flow enhancement program enables farmers to get some immediate cash on grain they have produced but cannot sell.

This program will provide some interim help for producers pending establishment of a new safety net system consisting of two long-term programs: the Guaranteed Revenue Insurance Plan and the National Income Stabilization Account, programs which should provide significant and predictable support levels for the future.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the dairy farmers of Canada have informed the government on numerous occasions of their grave concern as to the future of the supply management system in Canada.

Given recent statements by the government regarding its position on supply management at the GATT talks, dairy farmers across Canada have good reason to suspect that the government is preparing to bend to external pressure tactics and cave in on its support.

If this government is sincere about fighting to maintain supply management, will it indicate once and for all that it will not throw in the towel at the GATT?

It is truly sad that dairy farmers of Canada have to run television ads reminding the government of something it should already know, that is when a dairy farm dies in Canada a part of Canada dies as well.

It will be nothing short of deception and bad faith for the government to sell out Canadian dairy farmers at the GATT. I call upon the government to provide steadfast support for supply management when the crunch comes in Geneva.

THE SENATE

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that the Liberal senators have finally come back to their senses and agreed to do what they are paid to do, and that is to work. Their degrading performance over the past month has severely tarnished their image as wise men and women, and undermined the reputation of intellectual integrity and emotional stability of most Liberal senators.

It would seem that a lengthy fasting session may have had more serious consequences than we first thought for some of them because it has irremediably impaired their judgment. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, common sense has prevailed and the Liberal majority has managed to score for democracy. The saying vox populi vox dei is still relevant. The Liberals have no right to presume that Canadians erred when they twice voted for the Conservative Party.

When Trudeau—their guru—said that not everybody is cut out for democracy he should have pointed out that he was talking to them.

Canadians no longer want to be held hostages by sore losers—

VARITY CORPORATION

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House a very insulting series of events that have taken place involving the workers of Varity Corporation.

As the House will recall, this company owes its existence to a $200 million Liberal government bailout in 1981 which works out to half a billion in today's dollars. Well, Mr. Speaker, guess what? Varity is moving to the United States and taking a half billion of taxpayers' money with it.

Can you guess, Mr. Speaker, what the NDP Government of Ontario and the Conservative government in Ottawa are doing? Absolutely nothing. Yes, there is a $12 million severance and benefits package under the agreement and a deal for the maintenance of 1,200 Ontario manufacturing and processing jobs.

But, really, does anyone in this place believe Varity will honour this deal any more than it honoured the agreement it made in 1986 when the $200 million in loans to Varity was written off by this present Tory government?

I expected the Conservative government to sell the workers down the road, but never did I think so soon after being elected would Bob Rae and the NDP climb into bed with the Tories and refuse to defend the workers of Ontario.

Bob Rae, if you are listening, workers want jobs, not severance packages; workers want jobs, not promises.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

THE SENATE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Liberal senators have decided to put away their childish behaviour and concentrate on their obligation to provide second sober thought to legislation enacted by the elected representatives of this House.

I know I speak for all Canadians who have witnessed this disgusting spectacle over the last two weeks when I say that I hope we will never have the occasion to see it again.

While some headway has been made with respect to a timetable in regard to the UI and Hibernia bills, and other major pieces of legislation which the Senate has unreasonably held in limbo until now, an agreement has not been reached with respect to a vote on the GST. We need the GST. The Liberal senators' stand has been unproductive. They should set aside the partisanship and look to the well-being of the country.

WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it was 20 years ago this morning that the House of Commons voted on the invocation of the War Measures Act.

I wanted to note for the House that there were 16 of us in the New Democratic Party who felt so strongly that the government was wrong that we said, "no" to the War Measures Act because of our concern about civil liberties in this country.

I do not have time, Mr. Speaker, to read all the names of the people who took that stand, but among them is the late Andrew Brewin, the late David Lewis and the late Tommy Douglas. In addition, there was Stanley Knowles, who is now an honorary officer of the House, and of course, Ed Broadbent, the former leader of this party.

In conclusion, I think the important thing was that some of these people had the courage of their convictions, and showed that leadership sometimes is swimming against the stream, and doing what is right and not necessarily what is popular. I wanted to pay tribute to those people this morning.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Finance said in the House, "We brought in a higher interest rate precisely to fight inflationary pressures". Yet the goods and services tax, the GST, according to the figures of the Department of Finance, will increase inflation by more than 20 per cent above current levels.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. Why is the government working at cross purposes? Why is it pursuing two contradictory policies, on the one hand keeping up interest rates allegedly to fight inflation and on the other hand, forcing the GST on Canadians when it knows that GST will greatly increase inflation?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being very cute with figures this morning.

The Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance have been very clear right from the beginning of introducing the goods and services tax, that inflation will take a one-time increase of 1.25 per cent in the inflation rate. That has been known right from the beginning. That is not news and that is not something that is shocking or the Leader of the Opposition is not revealing something that is new. That has been said all along and of course would be taken into consideration in setting any kind of interest rates that are set from week to week by the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State admits that the government is pursuing a contradictory policy, raising interest to fight inflation and at the same time trying to impose the GST on Canadians when it will increase inflation the year it comes in by 1.25 per cent, which is more than 20 per cent above current levels.

Will the minister undertake that the Governor of the Bank of Canada will not be allowed to increase interest rates even further to counter the inflation caused by the GST?

[Translation]

In other words, Mr. Speaker, could the minister give the House the assurance that the Governor of the Bank of Canada will not further increase interest rates in response to inflationary pressures caused by his GST?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada is following a policy to wring inflation out of the economy. It is very important that the inflationary pressures are wrung out.

• (1120 )

For example, in July and August, average wage increases in this country were 6.1 per cent. That causes, of course, inflationary pressures. The inflation rate has held fairly steady at 4.2 per cent as was announced this morning. We are encouraged by that, but there is still too much inflationary pressure in the economy.

The Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance, unlike the opposition, do not have knee-jerk reactions to what is going on in the economy. It is a policy that is followed to wring inflation out of this economy and to assure that interest rates come down and stay down, not like in the days when the Liberals were in power and we saw inflation at 13 per cent and interest rates at between 20 per cent and 25 per cent. We are not going to let that happen to this country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when Canadians look at the economic policies of this government, they know where the jerks are, they are on the other side of the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the government's approach to economic policy is clearly perverse. At a time when the government's own trade figures show that our exports are falling, the government made a deal which allows the Varity Corporation to close the Kelsey plant in Windsor with a loss of more than 500 export related jobs.

Why did the government not insist on that Kelsey plant being saved? Why did the Deputy Prime Minister not insist on that Kelsey plant being kept open and those 500 jobs saved? Is the minister saying to those workers that this is the way the government expects them to die, before they can get to heaven?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that in the automotive industry in particular, there is a major restructuring going on all over the world, not only in Ontario.

The important thing about the Kelsey-Hayes closing is that bad as it is, the workers have at least been offered a deal which is better than they might have been offered under other circumstances.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives in Ottawa and the NDP in Toronto have just joined hands to underwrite the largest swindle of Canadian workers and taxpayers in the history of this country.

The Varity agreement will cut 500 workers loose immediately. It is nothing more than a two-year stay of execution for the 1,200 jobs that are supposed to be guaranteed under the agreement.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is: Why did Premier Bob and his friend, Brian, cave in?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might have been the "Bob and Bob Show", but there is no doubt that the new agreement we have with Varity offers at least greater certainty to all the parties involved.

It was not this government that loaned Massey-Ferguson part of the $200 million. Let us go back. It was in 1981 that the then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, now the Leader of the Opposition, said that "this $200 million in guarantees facilitates a private sector solution to Massey's woes". What it did was postpone Massey's woes.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister refers to the 1981 dollars that were spent with a guarantee that the jobs would stay in Canada. I can tell him that if there was a Liberal government here, we would not allow them to pack up and leave, just like the Tories—

Some hon. members: Right on, Sheila.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: The workers have been thrown peanuts and crumbs, while in actual 1990 dollars, the amount of money spent by the Canadian Ontario taxpayers to this company is over half a billion dollars, $592 million to be exact.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will move immediately to get a repayment of this half a billion dollar bail-out which is going to result in a loss of Canadian jobs to the tune of 1,500 workers by the time this Varity mess is cleaned up by the next Liberal government.

An hon. member: Peterson almost made the same deal.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to recognize what this new agreement is. It is an improvement over the original foundation agreement. It is supported by the Government of Ontario and by the CAW, with 1,200 jobs guaranteed.

It was not long ago when we heard members on the other side of this House say, "What about the 4,500 workers from the combine plant in Brantford"? Under this agreement, the 4,500 workers at least have better lay-off provisions than they had before, when they had nothing.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for this government which now wants to be seen as tough, as "willing to take the hard decisions on the economy", to quote the Prime Minister yesterday. The Prime Minister as gunslinger is not a new act in this House of Commons. This week the signs of recession grew and we see today that the inflation rate in this country has stayed the same.

Will the government start making the tough decisions and admit that it has been wrong? Will it admit that there is a recession? Will it admit that high interest rates are, in fact, hurting this economy? Will it admit that the Canadian dollar has to decline to get—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has completed his question.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I think if we did not have the policy that we have today, inflation would be running at a much higher rate in this country. It would be much higher, there is no question about that. Every economist says that that is the fact. There is no question about that.

The hon. member talked about a number of "will it admit", will the government admit there is a recession? That is for Statistics Canada to give us the facts. Those numbers will be coming out in the next few weeks and that is when it will be decided. There is definitely a slowdown in the economy. We do not take comfort in people being hurt in this slowdown in our economy. We cannot take comfort in that and we do not. But, at the same time, we cannot make band-aid solutions to major problems that we are facing. We have a policy in this country—

Mr. Barrett: That you created.

Mr. McDermid: Well, the hon. member says, "that we created". That is right, we created 1,600,000 new jobs over the last six years. We have had unparalleled economic growth in this country over the last six years. The record of the economy under this government has been superb and I am proud to stand behind it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I say to this government, you cannot take credit for the good times and then wash your hands of the bad times. So I tell this government take the tough decision and admit that it has made a mistake, it has driven this economy into a recession and as a result, right across this country there are thousands and thousands of people hurting.

Is this government prepared to stand up and admit that it has made a mistake and change its policies to start helping people?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): No, we have not made a mistake in our economic policy. We know people are hurting. In his budget in February, the Minister of Finance said there would be a slowdown in the economy and a slight increase in unemployment. That prediction was made by the government in the Minister of Finance's budget, so that is not a surprise, that was expected. At the same time, the policies of this government are for the long term, to get interest rates down permanently, to get inflation down so that the economy can grow in a balanced manner. That is what this is all about.

• (1130 )

God help us if the NDP were in power, it would be slapping band-aids here, there, and everywhere, and inflation would be running out of control today.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, surely the government is prepared to admit that the economic situation that we find ourselves in today is different than existed at the time when the government first contemplated the GST. Surely it is willing to admit that.

Is the government completely closed-minded about changing its mind on the GST? Is it completely closed-minded about listening to the small business community, to labour, and to almost everyone in the whole country, except itself, who think that it may be time to reconsider the wisdom of imposing the GST in the new economic circumstances that we find? Is it going to be at least reconsidered?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, again, my answer is no.

Let me tell the hon. member that there has been wide consultation on the goods and services tax right across the country. It has been going on for years.

I might point out that a report from the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the Senate of Canada, on which Senator Buckwold, Senator Kirby and Senator MacEachen sit, recommended this: "We recommend that as soon as practicable, the government introduce legislation to introduce a broad-based multi-state sales tax to replace the existing sales tax system which does not work."

That is the recommendation of those people who are now opposing the multi-state sales tax that we have in the country. I cannot understand why those senators are opposing something that they recommended a short two years ago.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The minister has claimed he is taking the toughest possible action to have a full environmental assessment of the Rafferty–Alameda project before it goes ahead.

If the minister means what he said, why was he not in court yesterday seeking an interim injunction? Why is he not in court today, and does the injunction he is seeking include all construction on both Rafferty and Alameda, all land acquisition, all contracts, and all operations? Or, is this just another stall so that Grant Devine can complete the dam?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I said very clearly yesterday that I was at that point instructing my officials to seek an injunction on continued construction and land acquisition related to the Rafferty–Alameda project. That is what has happened. Officials are proceeding under those instructions as I announced to the House yesterday.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, every hour irreparable damage is being done on the site of that dam. Surveyors were out on the site of the Alameda Dam yesterday and today. The minister took no action until the Tetzlaff brothers, who do not want their farm expropriated, notified him on Wednesday that they were going back to court.

Again, why was the Minister not in court yesterday seeking an interim injunction? Is he in court today seeking an interim injunction? If not, is he prepared to let construction just continue throughout the weekend on a 24–hour basis? When will we have an injunction?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are acting. I indicated the action that we were going to be taking.

The important thing here is that we want to respect a process that has been established by the courts and been established by the House. We want to have a full environmental review of the project and we shall have that. We are seeking an injunction to stop land acquisition and construction on the project until that process can be completed.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Not content with producing newspaper advertisements which previously offended the House and, later, radio ads which offended the Advertising Standards Council of the Canadian Advertising Foundation, the government is now embarking on a series of similarly misleading television ads trying to convince the people of Canada that the GST and the government–induced inflation is good for them.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of all Canadians taxpayers this: Will he now admit that this ad has nothing to do with informing people, and has everything to do with trying to restore the failed credibility of the Minister of Finance?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, once again my friend opposite is totally misdirected in his criticisms.

The ads are not doing what he says. They are bringing the attention of Canadians to a very important policy initiative that is important for the country, and particularly for the future of our children and our grandchildren.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, inadvertently the member was right. They are not restoring the minister's credibility. It is beyond repair.

[Translation]

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister opposite whether he will admit, once and for all, that the ads were not intended to inform the public but are an attempt to restore the credibility of the Conservative Government.

And considering these facts, will he ask the Conservative Party to compensate taxpayers for this misleading advertising?

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the departmental statute does not apply to any ads that governments would put out.

These are ads for information so Canadians can better understand a very important policy initiative which has been totally misrepresented by members of the opposition.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

The National Defence Act expressly requires the Government of Quebec to send a report to the Secretary of State of Canada on the circumstances that led to the requisition of Canadian forces this summer in Oka and Chateauguay.

It is now two and a half months after the troops were requisitioned. Has the report been received? If not, why not? Will the government insist on the report, and will the government give an undertaking to make the report public?

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the report has not been received yet.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the other three questions which were part of my question were not answered.

My supplementary question is directed to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

This summer we saw, for the first time since the War Measures Act was invoked 20 years ago, Canadian forces deployed against Canadians. This is a very serious event in our history. There are many questions arising out of events of this summer, including the stone-throwing incident at the Mercier Bridge, the role of the army, the question of civil rights, and a whole set of questions.

Will the minister give an undertaking to the House that there will be a full-scale, federal, public inquiry into the events of this summer?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, first, I would certainly dispute my hon. colleague's description of the events of this summer. Members of our Armed Forces were there at the requisition of the province of Quebec to provide assistance and aid to civil order, and performed those duties admirably.

As my colleague knows, there has been a motion on the floor of the House for discussion. That motion, once it is passed, will be referred to a standing committee of the House which will have the authority to consider all matters related to the situation this summer.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, but perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister will be able to reply.

Yesterday, a Quebec coalition of publishers, book sellers, authors and printers launched an offensive against the GST on books. They said that taxing books is tantamount to promoting ignorance. I therefore want to ask the minister why he is so anxious to undermine education.

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, there is no impeding education. As the hon. member knows, libraries, schools, and universities will not be paying taxes on those books. I might say that there are many groups that would like to be exempted from the GST. All have their own reasons, but the more groups exempted, the narrower the base and the higher the rate.

• (1140 )

One of the reasons that we are bringing in a goods and services tax spread over a broad cross-section of the economy is to make it fairer, to keep the rate lower, and to give individuals choices. That is what it is all about, to make it fairer than the manufacturers' sales tax.

The hon. member might be interested to know that there is manufacturers' sales tax in publications as well now. It is hidden way down in. The people do not know they are paying it, but in fact they are.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. Books are a way to defend our language and our identity. My question is directed to the same minister. Why does this government want to destroy our Canadian cultural identity?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, we do not want to destroy the Canadian cultural identity. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Communications who is responsible for culture in the country has made some very significant announcements over the last while supporting cultural endeavours in the country.

To make a statement like that is completely erroneous, Mr. Speaker.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. In 1984 the Prime Minister promised jobs, jobs, jobs. Since then we have had lay-offs, lay-offs, lay-offs.

Plant closures and cut-backs have been the order of the day across eastern Ontario. In my own riding, in the town of Renfrew, over 1,600 jobs have been lost. This is a devastating blow to a town of 8,500. When plants close the entire community suffers.

When is the government going to produce an economic program for eastern Ontario to give some hope to business and some hope to those workers who are having difficulty supporting their families? Have a heart.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, no one likes to see a plant close or anyone laid off. What is happening in the country, as we have said before, is a significant restructuring of almost every industrial sector.

In terms of the member's own riding, the industrial commissioners from his part of the country are out in fact trying to generate new business. They are not moaning about what is happening. They are taking a positive approach and are out looking for new opportunities.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this is the first question I have asked in the House on this matter because I have been out working with industry. I have been working with communities., I will not permit the minister to stand in the House to give a different impression.

The 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber, high interest rates, and an artificially high Canadian dollar have been absolutely destructive to the forest industry across Ontario. Hundreds of jobs have been lost again in eastern Ontario. Sawmill owners, logging contractors, hard working people have had their livelihood taken away from them.

When is the government going to get serious and negotiate its way out of the export tax, lower interest rates, lower the value of the Canadian dollar, and sign a forestry agreement in order to get business and jobs moving again? Think of the people out there who are hurting because of the policies of the government.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada of course is concerned about the MOU that the hon. member refers to and its impact on the Canadian softwood lumber industry. There are extensive consultations going on between the various parties, the provinces involved and the lumber interests. That is carrying on to try to come to a satisfactory conclusion. It is a very complicated and sensitive issue, but I can assure the hon. member that is being looked after.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Associate Minister of National Defence. In April, 1989 Michelle Douglas, a talented young officer who was the top graduate in her class of 85 was fired from the forces after a degrading SIU investigation, solely because she happens to be lesbian.

The recent decision of the Security Intelligence Review Committee struck down this forces' policy as unconstitutional, and the report of the Marin Commission urged an end to the SIU witch-hunts against lesbians and gays in the Armed Forces. When will the government finally change this inhumane policy, as the equality rights committee, of which she was a member, unanimously recommended five years ago?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know of the hon. member's continuing interest and concern on this issue.

I think that he is aware that as as result of the Marin report, we have indeed agreed that homosexuality will not in itself be grounds for review of security clearances.

However, on the broader issues, these are still under discussion, both within our department and with the Minister of Justice, in terms of our over-all review for the Canadian Human Rights Commission Act, and I am sure those decisions will be forthcoming over the coming months.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that there is a very serious and immediate problem in this area and that the contracts of members of the forces whose careers are currently in limbo, and who are affected by this Armed Forces policy, are coming up for renewal in the coming months.

I ask the minister for her assurance that members of the Armed Forces whose contracts are coming up for renewal, who are currently in limbo as a result of the government's delay in ensuring equality for all members of the forces, will have those contracts renewed and that the members who are affected by this will not, in fact, lose their lives, have their livelihood shattered and destroyed as so many others have done before them.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has brought this matter to my attention in recent days. I have asked my officials to look at this issue very closely. I will certainly be responding to the hon. member just as soon as possible.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and concerns the tabling of the Green Plan. Considering the government's emphasis on protecting the environment, could the minister inform the House whether he expects to meet the deadline he had set for tabling the Green Plan?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the House that, after consultations with some 10,000 or 11,000 Canadians in April, May and June of this year, work on the plan continued throughout the summer. The Green Plan was discussed repeatedly by the Environment Committee, and I can assure the hon. member that so far, we are still right on schedule, in other words, the Green Plan will be tabled around the end of November or early December.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. There is a crisis in health care in our aboriginal community. The number of neonatal deaths is worse than in most Third World countries, due in large part to a lack of well trained health professionals from within their own community.

How can the minister justify his government's cancellation of its support for the University of Manitoba Special Pre-medical Studies Program, which was established in 1979 in response to the need to train medical doctors from aboriginal communities, while a significant number of babies on Indian reserves continue to die at alarming proportions?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raised the questions of vital concern not just to the government but to all members of the House, and that is that there are certainly inequalities between the health outcomes for native children and for other children in Canada. It is something that we are determined to address.

As the hon. member knows, the federal government has put money into trying to give assistance to natives to train for the medical professions.

The ongoing responsibility, however, for provision of training and of post-secondary education is the responsibility of the provinces. The federal government has tried to assist them in doing that, but the primary responsibility is that of the provinces.

We will be making a review of all factors which affect the health of native children. It is not acceptable to me that we see the mortality rate among native children and the mortality rate in general of native communities as being higher than in the rest of society. It is something that we are determined to address and to do everything that we can within areas of federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the words that the House heard today from the minister were equally reflected on August 9 of this year when the health minister wrote and assured the petitioners of the program. I quote in part: "Let me assure you, every effort is being made in working with the Manitoba provincial government to ensure continuity. . . of this Special Pre-medical Studies Program". That was last August. Today, it is already October.

Is the minister prepared to commit in this House today that he will restore funding for this program so that babies born on Indian reserves are given a fair chance to live?

• (1150 )

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member asks me, on behalf of the federal government, to assume responsibility for something which constitutionally is the responsibility of the provincial government.

I understand the hon. member's concern and I share that concern as well. Though it is important that we ensure that all of the partners, acting within their areas of responsibility, do what they can to protect the health of Canadian natives, the federal government will do everything that it can within its areas of jurisdiction. The fact that the federal government has provided assistance in this area is evidence of the fact.

Education, as the hon. member knows, is primarily the responsibility of provincial governments. The hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition should well know that. Instead of playing partisan games as the Leader of the Opposition is attempting to do with something this important, it is important that the hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition do what they can, together with the government, in order to ensure that every effort is made by all levels of government within their areas of jurisdiction to promote the health of all Canadians.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the minister is found of telling us that he has the facts. He reminds me of the minister of truth that George Orwell feared would come to power in 1984.

Among the thousands victimized by this government's recessionary policies, there are 300 Purolator Products Ltd. workers who are being laid off and their jobs shifted to the United States.

A steel case company that The Financial Post boasts of being among the hundred best companies to work for, plans to lay off 72 workers by January.

The transport minister says that he is not in the business of saving jobs but creating opportunities.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister what opportunities are in store for these Canadians who have lost their jobs

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Purolator air and oil filters is a relatively low-technology operation and it is very difficult to do low-technology operations in a high-cost area like Mississauga. Purolator recognized that and it decided to consolidate all of its operations elsewhere. We do not like it, but that is a fact of what is going to happen.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister is hoping that these laid off workers will follow their jobs to the United States. Varity paid $52 million to escape this government's recessionary policies.

My supplementary question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Employment and Immigration instructed to draft the UI bill, currently before the Senate, to protect the treasury from the sweeping layoffs that this government is causing?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer to that is no. What we are trying to do with that bill is to say that when these things happen, such as Purolator in the general area of Mississauga, that we have the money to retrain people for higher technology jobs. Get the thing out of the Senate and let us get on with the job.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. A few minutes ago, the premier of Saskatchewan announced he was taking the federal government and the Minister of the Environment to court over the Rafferty–Alameda project. I want to ask the Minister of the Environment a question along the lines of making a suggestion to him.

In order to avoid the loss of time in going through the courts, and he has talked about not having many alternatives, I wonder if he would consider introducing into the House immediately or within the next couple of days a bill that would make it illegal for construction on that dam to proceed until we have full and complete environmental hearings? In other words, why abrogate our responsibility from Parliament to the courts to this country, why not take some action in this House of Commons?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday and I will repeat today that we are doing two things. First of all, I am in the process of appointing a new panel to have a full and complete environmental hearing. At this hour, I do not see any reason why we cannot have a panel that will be starting to work very quickly on the issue and get us the kind of full environmental process that we are seeking.

Second, we are seeking an injunction before the courts to stop any kind of land acquisition or construction related to the project. So, I do not think that we in any way as a government abrogated our responsibilities.

Quite the opposite. We have fulfilled our responsibilities, and we will have the full due process conducted.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I understand very well what the minister is saying, but in terms of the question I make a suggestion.

Rather than going through the courts and abrogating our responsibility to the courts of this country, which could be time consuming, would the minister consider a bill to be introduced Monday of next week to make it illegal for the Saskatchewan government to proceed with construction so that we in Parliament make that decision, that it would be illegal to proceed with construction of the dam until we have a full and complete environmental hearing. I just make that as a way of a suggestion in Question Period in order to have some action on this and raise this issue immediately.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the suggestion.

I just would like to repeat to my hon. colleague and every other member of this House that over the last three days, I have gone over all the options that we had.

I believe that proceeding with the injunction is the most effective option to ensure that we do in fact get a full environmental hearing of this case. That is the way I am proceeding for the moment.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister will know that young people make up 19 per cent of the labour force in Canada, but they represent 38 per cent of the 175,000 workers who have been laid off in Canada in the last six months.

While the national unemployment rate is 8.2 per cent, the unemployment rate among young people has now reached 13.6 per cent. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Given the devastating loss of jobs and the disproportionate increase in the lay-off of workers among young people in Canada, what specific policy is this government putting in place to deal with youth unemployment and the hopelessness that comes with it?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member by first reminding him that when his government was in office, the unemployment rate for young people in Canada was over 20 per cent. That was in 1981-82.

On the question with regard to the specific initiatives that we are taking concerning youth, I would like to remind him of our most recent initiative, which is the Stay-in-School initiative to make sure that people at least complete high school.

My hon. friend will know that if we ccan get our young people to complete high school in this country, they will double their chance for employment. That is why this government is investing over $300 million in the course of the next three years to make sure our kids stay in school and get better jobs.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister's attempt to compare the numbers from a world-wide recession in the early eighties to a made in Canada recession in the nineties is not going to wash with Canada's young people.

Since 1984, given that this government has cut 35 per cent of the training budget in Canada and is attempting now to generate new training dollars by taking those dollars out of the pockets of the unemployed and Bill C-21, I again ask, what is the Government of Canada doing to assist those thousands of young people who are now on the streets, desperately in need of a job, wanting to do a job, wanting the dignity of a pay cheque but who have had no hope from this government? What specific policies does this government offer?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons)): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member, as knowledgeable as he should be, when he talks about Bill C-21.

One of the problems that young people of this country are experiencing at this time is that they lack job training skills. If the hon. member's colleagues in the Senate would allow us to get on with Bill C-21, we would have more than $100 million ready for youth for training in this country. That is his fault, not ours.

CORPORATE SPONSORS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

I am sure Canadians saw the final straw this last week, when they saw the government entering into a special deal with McDonald's hamburgers through Canada Post: If we make ogo-pogo burgers or Sasquatch burgers, we will get the subtle endorsement of the Government of Canada.

• (1200 )

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: Where are we going? Is it Wendy's in support of health and welfare next, or Burger King in support of veterans affairs? Is Ronald McDonald really leading this government? Where is this government going with this policy?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons)): Mr. Speaker, can I ask my hon. friend what he has against corporate sponsors who help youth, who help sports, and who help other members of society?

What is it with the socialist party in this country?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-339, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (appointment of proxy voters, non-listed electors and advance polls).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this particular bill, if it were to be passed would actually guarantee that every single Canadian, no matter where he or she happened to be on an election day at the federal level, would be permitted to vote on that particular day provided that he or she were entitled to vote under normal circumstances or under the conditions that exist.

It was unfortunate that during the last election many people who could have voted, who were out of the country, who were not enumerated or for any number of other reasons were not in fact permitted to vote, did not do so. Democracy is so precious that everyone who wants to participate should be able to do so. This particular bill would counteract that. It would guarantee every single Canadian that opportunity.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek the indulgence of the House to revert to tabling of documents. I would like to table orders in council.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is is agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Danis: I appreciate the kindness of my colleagues.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING AND REFERENCE OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), I am pleased to table in the House, in both official languages, the orders in council announcing appointments made recently by the government.

These orders in council are deemed to have been referred to the standing committees listed in the appendix.

INDOOR AIR QUALITY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–340, an act relating to indoor air quality.

He said: Mr. Speaker, given that Canadians as a people spend more than 80 per cent of their time indoors this bill respecting the Indoor Air Quality Act would empower the minister of health to establish a national research centre, which would be able to conduct research and study all aspects of indoor air contamination. It would develop methods and technologies for the processes of detection, correction or prevention of indoor air contamination. It would also enable the minister of health to formulate comprehensive plans and designs for the control and abatement of indoor air contamination. It would promote public education with respect to the hazards of indoor air contamination and would enable him to develop and disseminate informational materials relating to indoor air contamination.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

VARITY CORPORATION

CLOSURE OF WINDSOR PLANT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek unanimous consent to put a motion to the House dealing with a most important development in the last few days in the Windsor area.

It deals with the Varity plant and the Bobbsey Twins act of Bob White and Bob Rae getting together with the Prime Minister and spending Canadians out of style, making this depression very difficult for us.

That motion would address the specific problems of the investments of Canadians in the Varity plant in Windsor and its closure, which is wasting our money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 210 petitioners from Bonavista Bay, Charleston, Musgrave, Cannings Cove, Bloomfield, Bunyan's Cove, Georges Brook, and the Clarenville area. I have spoken to most of them; I recognize their names.

These petitioners are very concerned that the rate of unemployment in Newfoundland is the highest in the country. They want to have their unemployment qualification time reduced from 14 weeks to 10 weeks. To do that there is a need to introduce the variable entrance requirement, which has been done every year in this House since 1976.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to introduce the variable entrance requirement immediately.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House to present a number of petitions from Canadians from several provinces, including the province of Manitoba.

These people condemn the goods and services tax, particularly as it applies to books, magazines, and newspapers. They believe, as do a number of other members and I, that reading and everything that is associated with it is the cornerstone of a democratic society such as ours.

We in fact benefit as a country if we have a more educated citizenry. They also see it as a cornerstone of our economic and social development. Therefore they ask this government to remove this tax, particularly as it applies to books.

[Translation]

HERITAGE LANGUAGE TEACHING ACT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglington—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this petition is certified correct as to form and content.

Many Canadians urge Parliament to ensure that the preservation and enhancement of heritage languages be part and parcel of government policy, for they point out that thousands of students and teachers rely on government support to survive. They ask Parliament to maintain the programs which will provide quality heritage language teaching in Canada so as to preserve and promote our multicultural heritage.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I would like to present another petition from members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which is in my riding, numbering over 200.

They vehemently oppose the imposition of the GST and call upon this Parliament to implore the government to withdraw this most unjust of taxes.

[Translation]

OLDER WORKERS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition bearing 437 signatures. Your petitioners request that programs for older worker adjustment be open to all permanently laid-off workers regardless of the number of employees in the company and the location of the plant, for this would do away with discrimination resulting from the requirement that eligibility for this program is restricted to companies with more than 100 employees.

ILLITERACY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from British Columbia who state that 25 per cent of the Canadian adult population is illiterate and that in some regions illiteracy exceeds 40 per cent.

They also state that literacy skills are increasingly important in the work place and illiteracy costs Canadian society $10 billion a year. Therefore these petitioners call upon Parliament to undertake a major national campaign against illiteracy and create a community base for remedial and preventive illiteracy programs which respond to the needs of individuals and groups involved.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present to the House today signed by residents of British Columbia.

The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to introduce and systematically enforce legislation guaranteeing Canadian women equal pay for work of equal value and equal opportunity for employment.

FAMILY BENEFITS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 with a petition from residents of my riding of Mission—Coquitlam who I am sure are very sad today, because what they are calling for in their petition is the provision of tax relief and fairness to Canadian families by increasing benefits paid through family allowances and through refundable child tax credit.

As a result of the decision made in the Senate last night by collusion between the Liberals and the Tories, they feel very gravely that that will not happen.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here signed by a number of citizens of Glengarry in the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. In particular, these are mostly residents of the Alexandria area, the town of Alexandria which we affectionately refer to as "Alexandria the Great".

The people of "Alexandria the Great" are against this government's proposed GST, the grief and suffering tax. They ask that the government abandon forthwith the planned GST which causes more inflation and more recession.

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today on behalf of petitioners from Scarborough, Brampton, and Etobicoke.

This petition concerns essential assistance and protection for those persons inflicted with serious allergy reactions. This was brought to my attention because of the premature death of Robyn Allen in Scarborough and supported by the Allergy Information Association.

It calls upon Parliament to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods. As well, it calls upon restaurateurs and food retailers to provide a list of food ingredients presented on prepared foods.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the famous riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, so ably represented in this House by their hon. member who sits on this side.

These petitioners would be astounded to know that the government is persisting in its intention to pass the goods and services tax into law after so many millions of Canadians have signed petitions against this tax, including these petitioners, residents of St. Isidore, Apple Hill, and Maxville in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I am pleased to present this petition on their behalf.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops who point out that the government is going to tax reading material for the first time in history. Consequently they are asking the government to curtail direct taxation on literature, particularly children's story books.

I have another petition I wish to present on behalf of a large number of people from Chase, Pritchard, Monte Creek, Westwold, Dallas, Valleyview, Barnhart Vale, and Rose Hill.

The petitioners are pointing out their opposition to the government's goods and services tax. They suggest that it will add to the cost of living and thereby increase the rate of inflation, which will likely then result in increased interest rates and more difficult economic times. They are suggesting that the government should be implementing an effective minimum tax on profitable corporations instead.

The petitioners are asking the Government of Canada to back off on the goods and services tax and replace it with a system of fair taxation.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition on behalf of 30 of my constituents of Stormont—Dundas which has been duly certified by the clerk of petitions. These individuals are calling upon the government to invoke the notwithstanding clause of the Canadian Constitution so that Parliament can legislate total protection for all human life including the unborn.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, from people in the greater Toronto metropolitan area calling upon the government to remove the GST, particularly as it applies to the written word.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weiner that Bill C–37, an Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before Question Period, on October 27, children, teachers, parents and administrators of heritage language schools in the Ottawa area will hold a demonstration on Parliament Hill.

On this occasion, there will be a presentation of handwritten letters and children's drawings from each school, protesting cutbacks in funding to the schools.

Mr. Speaker, both before and after this event, we shall regularly table petitions in the House, in order to put pressure on the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to see this institute become window dressing for a government that has left the cupboards of heritage language education bare. I must really question the effectiveness of this move and ask how much it can really do.

I am also concerned about funding for aboriginal languages. I am concerned that this government has cut funding for various native newspapers and publications. I am concerned that this government's policy does not satisfy the language needs of Canada's aboriginal people.

I would hope that all members of this House would support the private member's bill of my colleague from Western Arctic calling for the creation of a native language's institute.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, quality education is and remains the key to the future. The Institute must serve those people who wish to promote their cultural heritage and who are dedicated to sharing their knowledge with their peers. We in the Liberal Party support the establishment of this Institute, but we intend to watch the situation very closely to ensure that no region is neglected.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand at the third reading stage of Bill C–37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Every year we welcome thousands of immigrants to Canada from many different lands. Of course, if they do not speak English or French when they first arrive, it is essential that language training be a first priority in order for them to adjust quickly in Canada.

• (1220)

This requires adequate federal and provincial resources for English as a second language classes or French language classes so that children will have the extra help they need and schools will not be overburdened. In the city of Vancouver this is a very crucial concern at this time.

Adults of all ages, and I include women as well as men, who often have the priority for language training related to employment, must have language fluency to become Canadians. Elderly persons who come to Canada to become a part of our society need opportunities for training in Canadian languages as well. This, I think, is the first language priority in multicultural Canada.

I must say before I speak to this bill that I regret very much that the federal government does not fulfil its responsibility to adequately finance language training in French or English for either adults or children.

The opportunity to maintain and learn heritage language also has been a very important component of Canadian multicultural policy. The government itself has repeated this objective often.

Language reflects culture, and young people need an opportunity to speak the language of their parents and of their grandparents, in order to appreciate their roots and to develop their identity, as part of becoming Canadians. It enriches all of us to have Canadian citizens who are fluent in second languages or, in some cases, in third languages. We can be very proud of the cosmopolitan, international character of our Canadian mosaic and our Canadian communities.

In my riding of Vancouver East, Mr. Speaker, I often visit heritage language schools, where children spent their Saturday mornings learning the language of their parents and their grandparents. Along with that, of course, they absorb the culture and reinforce their parental culture.

I want to pay tribute at this time to the hardworking teachers in these schools and in schools for heritage language classes right across the country. These teachers often work with very few resources and on low salaries.

Also I have known of children in my riding, and I am sure other members have similar experiences, who did not learn the language of their parents or grandparents. When they become teenagers, very often there are serious communication problems that create barriers between generations, and even lead to family breakdown.

Heritage language classes cost very little and they bring values to our society as well as to individuals. Therefore, we support the concept of a heritage language institute. Even more, we support the government subsidies. They are pretty small subsidies when you look at individual classes that have in the past been given to heritage language schools.

We regret very much that the government eliminated $4.1 million for heritage language classes from its last budget. This not only denies their stated policy, but it has forced the closure of many schools. It is of major concern to ethnocultural groups across this country.

Bill C–37 which we are debating in its final stage today is to establish a Canadian heritage language institute, an institute to be based in Edmonton. It is very sad, and I think somewhat ironic, that on the one hand, while the government takes away $4.1 million from last year's budget for heritage language classes, on the other hand, it has decided to give a little token back in the form of $1.2 million, just a fraction of the budget for previous years and only over a five-year period, let us not forget, to provide research and to assist the very heritage language classes it is killing off in communities because of inadequate funding.

We are not opposed to establishing a heritage language institute but we do seriously question the government's priorities and the political motivation in this instance. It certainly appears that the institute is a token political gesture so that the government can save face for having cut funding to the first priority, which must be the very community classes that will provide heritage language and for which an institute would be established.

What is the purpose of the institute and what are some of the concerns that were expressed by most witnesses that appeared before the legislative committee? I would like to quickly summarize some of these.

The purpose of the institute, as stated in the bill, is to provide a resource centre for the production, acquisition, retention and dissemination of information related to heritage language classes, a research centre for conducting studies on all aspects of heritage languages and for setting standards on how they should be taught. I think most witnesses that we talked to and people who we have been in touch with across the country feel that this is a valuable service that is needed, provided you have the classes and the communities to use it. It also would provide a public relations centre for promoting heritage languages and maintaining liaison with governments and institutions.

The funding would be $6.5 million over five years and then, I assume, it would be terminated. Surely that must be a major concern for those who will on the board of this institute. Their headquarters will be in Edmonton. We do not object to this but I think it should be pointed out that according to an eminent researcher who consulted various groups and made proposals to the government, that one of the priorities that made Edmonton and western Canada a priority was the fact that heritage languages of western Canadians could be stressed. This should give particular priority to immigrants from Asian countries who have quite a different basic language base from European groups that came earlier to our country.

We agree that a resource centre of this kind will be valuable, provided that we are able to maintain frontline community services. I would like to mention a number of concerns that were expressed in committee, that have been expressed in letters and conversations that we had with a number of witnesses. These people have direct experience in heritage language classes. I would like to mention again that we debated this at great length with a number of very eloquent speakers at the last stage of amendments.

The point I would like to make is the very strong request that came from aboriginal organizations that the languages of founding peoples, the aboriginal peoples of Canada, be excluded from this bill. They must have support to establish a separate aboriginal language institute. This was debated in committee. We were glad to see that the reference to aboriginal languages as part of this particular institute was deleted. There was not an amendment added which we had strongly proposed, and which was requested from aboriginal organizations, that would specifically mention exclusion of aboriginal languages.

There were a number of very eloquent speeches made on the question of the need for recognition of aboriginal languages, with both the preservation and teaching of these very important languages that are unique to Canada and North America.

One of the major concerns and a continuing concern is the funding cuts to heritage language classes.

• (1230)

This was a concern of every witness who came to committee and many whom government members refused to hear. I think they were a little afraid to have the constant criticism from groups across the country.

In fact, I want to say that the Heritage Language Association of British Columbia has refused to support the Heritage Languages Institute until funding of classes is restored. Other witnesses supported Bill C-37, but called very strongly for reinstatement of funding to classes as a priority.

The Secretary of State, as I said earlier, despite receiving only a 5 per cent cut in its total 1990 budget, eliminated the $4.1 million annual subsidy to heritage language classes across the country. I want to repeat, as I have said many times and other speakers have said before in the House, that this means a 100 per cent funding cut for the 1,500 schools and 129,000 students who are learning 60 different languages. Many schools have had to close down as a result, and others have had to raise tuition fees which makes them inaccessible to children from low income families.

I want to mention, particularly, some of the more recent immigrant groups. I am thinking of immigrant groups from Asia and the Middle East, although there are not quite as many groups in my own community from that region. These are groups that have not had heritage language classes established and they do not have a curriculum. There should be priority special funding to establish classes for these newer language groups that have come to Canada.

There have been leaders of ethnocultural groups and heritage language associations and students and parents representing different languages from every region of Canada who have lobbied hard for the reinstatement of funding. I note that there is going to be a cross-Canada rally on Saturday, October 27, including a rally here on Parliament Hill, to express again the great concern that there is still on this matter. It will not go away.

The government must realize that groups are not going to forget about this and that they are going to keep insisting, as we are, that there must be federal responsibility for funding for heritage language classes. It is absolutely ridiculous that we can consider putting millions of dollars into an institute when the very classes that are to be served by this institute are being quite undercut by this withdrawal of funding.

We are very concerned that the government really has very misguided priorities. The minister's rationale of course was that language classes should be a provincial responsibility. We hope the provincial governments will contribute, but let us not forget it is the federal government that has a responsibility for immigration and for multiculturalism. This falls directly within the responsibility of those two federal jurisdictional responsibilities.

Witnesses have also told us that there simply is not provincial funding and there never will be in many regions. I am sure in the Atlantic region this is true. In British Columbia, schools have closed because we do not have adequate provincial funding. I do not think the federal government can just slough this off and think that it is going to get away with it.

Another concern we have to look at is, while it sounds as if the $6.5 million over five years is a lot of money, actually, Mr. Speaker, when you break it down per year and think of it being ended at the end of five years, this is a pretty insufficient amount of money. One of the concerns that we have, and that witnesses had, is that it does not allow for any decentralizing of services of the institute to serve other regions. I know people in the province of Quebec, for example, will have concerns about this, as will people in other regions. Originally this institute was to focus on western needs, as I said, but as time progressed and as the bill came into being, the minister's interpretation has certainly been that this is established to serve all of Canada. I am not sure that it is possible to do that.

Dr. Kreisel, one of the researchers who conducted the feasibility study, said very strongly in committee that this institute should be an institute without walls. We do not need a lot of centralized, bureaucratic, academic institutions. We need the resources to go out and help people in the communities where they live and that will be able to use the funding and so on to be just as close to teachers and students in communities as is possible.

It should be a very practical institute and it should work very closely with people in the field and we would urge that this be a major focus of the institute.

I want to mention another question which came up a number of times. It was a very legitimate question. On the one hand, the government has taken all the federal funding away from community heritage language classes and, on the other hand, it has decided to give $65 million for the elite kind of training of business people, under Project 2000, related to the Minister for International Trade. The government has decided to give $65 million while $4.1 million has been taken away from community language classes where children can learn, as they are growing up and be fluent in these languages, particularly in Pacific Rim languages.

We feel very strongly that the learning of Pacific Rim languages, particularly those which are going to be useful in trade, are very, very important. But let us not kid ourselves. We have enough experience in teaching French as a second language to know that it is best to start learning the language at a younger age.

From an administrative point of view, it makes great sense to include the training needs for languages which will be needed for Pacific Rim trade, as part of this institute referred to in this bill that we are debating today. Why should it not be specializing in the languages that are necessary for trade, developing the kind of curriculum, teaching aids and supports for the establishment of practical classes for business people and others? We do not see the kind of priority for this elitist approach of putting $65 million toward training for business people, while taking away money from classes for children and not including these classes under this institute because they certainly will need the kind of resources that supposedly this institute will provide.

I want to make one final point that was part of the criticism of the whole process in the legislative committee on Bill C-37. It is important not to forget that, once again, opposition members worked very hard to try to bring amendments that would improve the bill. The government, as it has consistently done in other committees in which I have been involved in the multiculturalism area, refused to go along with amendments.

In particular, we had hoped that the government would accept amendments that would empower the institute to fund heritage language classes, as a desperate last attempt since the funds were being taken away from the other direct funding. Some of the witnesses we questioned suggested this could be used especially for new languages which are not as well developed.

We also felt that there should have been an amendment, as I said, to assist in the teaching of the languages which would be beneficial to Canada's international trade and international relations. This amount of money then could have been integrated.

I would like to point out also that the government members on the committee also tried desperately hard to limit public input by refusing to hear regional witnesses. It was only after opposition members threatened to boycott meetings that they reconsidered. It is pretty disgraceful when these kinds of things happen.

• (1240 )

I would like to quote quickly an excerpt from a letter that was received from the B.C. Heritage Language Association which reflected the concerns of many witnesses. They state: "The harsh reality for B.C. heritage language learners is that closures of heritage language schools is inevitable. We are affronted by the hypocrisy of removing grassroots support while giving to a potential mausoleum."

We will not vote against this bill because it has been our policy to support the establishment of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. However, once again, we ask the government to reinstate essential funding for heritage languages classes in communities as its first priority.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question. I would like to ask the member if the New Democratic Party is for this bill or against this bill? I could not make heads nor tails of what she was saying.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, as I stated in my remarks and in previous speeches that we made in the House, we will be supporting this bill reluctantly. We support the concept of an institute, but we do so with the expectation that the government will reinstate funding for heritage language classes.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be able to speak to this act to establish a heritage languages institute.

[Translation]

My premise is that learning languages, whether the language happens to be English, French or any other languages in Canada or on this planet, is a means of personal enrichment. I firmly believe that we should not neglect languages. Certainly not.

[English]

We all realize that in this country, English, as it should, has received a lot of attention and it must continue to do so. We recognize as well that the French language has increased in importance and significance and it has had more opportunities to develop, as it should.

We also have to admit and acknowledge that the treatment we have given to native languages and heritage languages has not at all been appropriate. It has been sadly lacking.

Why are languages so important to people and indeed to Canada. Rather than try to give you the reasons myself I want to quote from testimony given to house committees here. The first is from Eli Taylor, an elder of the Sioux Valley Reserve in Manitoba. He made the following points:

> "Our native language embodies a value system about how we ought to live and relate to each other—It gives a name to relations among kin, to roles and responsibilities among family members, to ties with the broader clan group—There are no English words for these relationships because your social and family life is different from ours. Now if you destroy our language, you not only break down these relationships, but also you destroy other aspects of our Indian way of life and culture, especially those that describe man's connections with nature, the Great Spirit and the order of things. Without our language, we will cease to exist as a separate people.

In terms of heritage languages, I would like to quote some of the testimony given by Ms. Sarah Del Rosario, who is a heritage languages teacher with the United Council of Filipino Associations in Canada, who represented the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. She stated as follows:

> These languages are a symbol of the fundamental respect to Canadian communities of origins other than French or English—they are central to the cultures and the cultural preservation and promotion of minority ethnocultural communities.
> —they are a central aspect of Canadian multiculturalism as lived by families in towns across Canada—They assist in developing positive attitudes towards the national official languages policy. They assist young people in their ability to learn a third language, often the official language—As well, they greatly advance the international trading ability of Canada as more Canadians develop a detailed and enthusiastic knowledge of the languages, cultures, and norms of countries all over the world.

Let us go back to the institute. Why are we founding this institute? Why is it that we think this is a good idea? I have tried to argue that the preservation and learning of heritage languages is important from a number of perspectives. The cultural perspective because, as the world changes, we recognize that we need to learn to get along with each other, no matter what kind of linguistic, religious or other backgrounds we come from. This is of paramount importance to each and every one of us, whether we be Canadians or people from other countries.

We recognize as well from a social perspective that people with other languages often see problems rather differently than we do, but some of their approaches are in fact superior to our own. If we can protect and enhance their language, it will enrich us as well.

We know that from an economic perspective there are tremendous gains to be made in the preservation of language and culture. Let me give some examples of some of the languages that we have in Canada, and obviously I cannot cover them all, and some of the trade that we carry on with some of the home countries of those particular languages.

First, over 300,000 Canadians claim Chinese as their mother tongue. Canada's total trade with Hong Kong, the People's Republic of China and Taiwan exceeded $8.9 billion, the latest figures available. We have over 125,000 Canadians who claim Dutch as their mother tongue and we do roughly $2.2 billion worth of trade with Holland. Over 85,000 Canadians claim Spanish as their mother tongue and if we look at the trade that we undertake with Spain, Mexico, Argentina, Peru and Venezuela, it amounts to almost $4 billion. Over 20,000 Canadians claim Korean as their mother tongue and if we look at the trade with North and South Korea, we have trade in the area of $3.5 billion. Over 160,000 Canadians claim Portuguese as their mother tongue and if you look at Portugal and Brazil, we have close to $2 billion in trade. Our total trade with Japan is almost $19 billion and there are, according to my statistics, roughly 20,000 Canadians who claim Japanese as their mother tongue.

Almost 500,000 Canadian citizens claim German as their mother tongue and if we look at our trade with West Germany it totals $5.6 billion. If we add Austria and East Germany, it exceeds $6 billion. Our trade with the U.S.S.R. is roughly $1.3 billion and if we look at Canadians who claim Ukrainian, Russian, Estonian, Latvian and a number of languages from that particular group of countries, we have an important number indeed. Over one million Canadians claim Italian as their mother tongue and with Italy we do almost $3 billion worth of business.

Quite apart from the cultural benefits and the social benefits, there are serious and important economic benefits and I have given but a few examples. It would seem rather silly, ineffective, inefficient to try to teach those languages to people who already know them when we know full well that we will need them in the international markets of the world as the world changes quickly into a global community.

[Translation]

I would now like to discuss some very serious problems with this bill. First of all, people who were directly affected will never forgive this government for cutting more than $4 million in funding for courses taught in heritage languages. They were deeply hurt.

Also, is this a symbolic gesture or has a deep commitment been made? With there will be sufficient funds to ensure the Institute's mandate is carried out? Will the Board of Directors, when it represents from 50 to 60 members, include enough people with an interest in heritage languages?

• (1250)

Will the Institute realize that it will have to work together with various urban and rural communities, universities, people who teach these courses, families, young people and the not-so-young? Will it realize there are a number of groups that must be brought together so that their expertise can be used and we can truly benefit from their knowledge? This should not become an elitist institute that responds only to a single group.

It will also be necessary to make frequent assessments of the Institute's performance, in a manner that is fair and equitable. We want to ensure that the Institute is able to achieve the objectives it has been set, but I see no mechanism for doing so.

[English]

There are also very important explanations that must be given to the Canadian people with respect to this particular initiative. Let me give some examples. The English language community wonders why, as it should with some justification. What is this going to accomplish?

Is this the way we ought to be going? This explanation is needed just because of what is happening. The need is even compounded when one looks, for example, at The Free Press of October 7, 1990, where the hon. member for Winnipeg South is referred to in a headline that reads: "Multiculturalism Policy Divisive, Dobbie says". It goes on to say that the policy is a waste of money. When you get comments like that from the government side, clearly that leads to confusion, frustration and anger.

What was the response on October 11 from the same newspaper headline: "Anti-Multiculturalism Remarks Rile Ethnic Leaders"? Surely these kinds of comments are really quite insensitive and suggest that the government is not really serious. It suggests to a number of Canadians that perhaps this is nothing but symbolic window dressing. Perhaps there are things that are changing. We really do need some explanations from the government. We need to make sure that this is a sincere gesture.

[Translation]

And I would not wish to overlook the Francophones in this country. My good friend Mr. Forest, who died a few months ago, called me about this. He was all for setting up the Institute, but he wanted to make sure this would not in any way diminish the French language. We will therefore have to make Francophones in Canada understand that establishing this Institute will merely add to what is already being done for their language and culture. If we do not give them these assurances, there may be some very negative feelings.

[English]

With respect to our aboriginal peoples, they have indicated that they do not want to be considered under this particular bill. We can best show that if we support them, we must support the private members' bill proposed by my colleague from Western Arctic who suggests that a parallel institute be created for aboriginal languages.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, after these comments, I would like to say that, together with my colleagues, I am prepared to support this bill, with the reservations I just mentioned. On the whole, I believe it is a very important initiative. On the other hand, certain precautions must be taken, and I hope that for once the government will listen.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Chair. I believe that members on this side of the House, at least in the Liberal Party, have agreed that we would like to start sharing our time in two 10-minute periods, followed by the usual five-minute questions and comments. That is because we have a large number of members who are interested in this bill and who would like to expedite the legislation as fast as possible.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I know that my venerable House leader did that in order to prevent you from having to listen to another of my tirades for more than a minimum amount of time. That really is not so because he is interested in making the affairs of the House go much smoother. I thank him anyway for standing up and at least giving me an introduction in such a tentative fashion.

We have debated this bill in the past and we have highlighted the pitfalls associated with it. My colleague from the NDP, who is normally very thorough in her analysis of all of the things that go wrong with the bill, or with any bill, has been quite correct to outline many of the drawbacks to this one.

I am at a little bit of a disadvantage, having followed a colleague from my caucus who is very erudite and who is also very knowledgeable in this area. He has given us some very good reasons for supporting the heritage language foundation and heritage languages in general.

One of the things that bothers me as a member of the House, after having gone through committee and debated this bill at second reading, is that what we have seen, both through government action and through some of the debates that have taken place in the House, a picture of a country that is so great and diverse as Canada—I use great in a qualitative fashion, rather than in a geographic sense, because this is a country that has become the host or hostess of the largest number of different peoples throughout the entire world.

My colleague from Winnipeg just pointed out the major language groups. He indicated for the purposes of this House those numbers of Canadians who identified themselves as functioning in a mother tongue other than English or French.

That does not mean that those people identified themselves as being Chinese, Korean, Italian, Portuguese or Spanish. They identified themselves as Canadians whose mother tongue, whose language of function, happens to be the ones that he enumerated.

I draw to the attention of all members the statistics that my colleague presented for consideration. When we are talking about people who identify themselves as functioning in a language other than the ones that are official in this country, the number—again I remind all listeners that it was only a sample—was well past three million Canadians who function in a language other than the two official languages.

It calls to mind what I started to say a moment ago, that a country that is capable of hosting people who still function in other languages, other than the official ones, finds itself with a government which through legislation has demonstrated a most parochial and narrow view of the way its own citizens relate one to the other and the way its own citizens developed the economy of this country and the way in which they establish an opportunity, a bridgehead if you will, with other areas of the world.

My colleague from Winnipeg has pointed out to all of us here who were not aware that we have tens of billions of dollars of trade with countries as a result of the contacts established by those people who function in a mother tongue other than English or French.

Those people would not include individuals like myself whom StatsCanada would not identify as operating in a mother tongue other than English or French, but who comes from one of those other racial or linguistic groups.

If we are serious about some of the statements that the government is making, what we should be doing is examining these kinds of initiatives in the context of the broader government initiative.

The parliamentary secretary for citizenship and multiculturalism was very proud to point out that this is another step in the establishment of broad multicultural principles which are supposed to govern this country. We have had opportunity to criticize employment equity as a function of those initiatives. We have had opportunity to criticize and analyse the function of heritage language cuts in that context.

• (1300)

I know hon. colleagues will already have been impressed with the intrinsic value of language. They will also be impressed with the analysis of what happens to policy and what happens to the dictates of commitment to the development of a country and to government policy when, on the one hand, it withdraws funds that allow for the further generation and development of language groups and, on the other hand, it establishes a foundation which has a series of nine purposes that are supposed to do something positive.

Perhaps we are stealing from Peter in order to pay Paul. I am going to be kind, because I saw throughout the parliamentary committees and the standing committee at debate on second reading an opportunity that no one has identified just as yet, that is an opportunity to establish the infrastructure for a truly multicultural policy which should permeate all departments.

We have had the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship and his parliamentary secretary, with great pride outline the fact that now we finally have a separate department for multiculturalism. Presumably that department will flourish, develop, grow, and eventually reflect the demographic reality and diversity that is Canada.

As well we heard her say: "Look, we now have this foundation, the Heritage Language Institute." The legislative committee on a race relations foundation will present its report next week. We have at least three pillars for the establishment of an infrastructure. The parliamentary secretary and her minister have given us an indication that there may be a parallel or sister foundation for native heritage language programs. There will be four pillars of the development or identification of a much more varied society in Canada.

If we are taking all of these initiatives, why would we start cutting funds that are absolutely crucial to the maintenance of language programs which will allow young boys and girls the opportunity to study a language, thought development, culture, philosophy of life, historical and cultural traditions that emanate from their parents and their family life and to give them an opportunity to discover themselves and do it with pride before or while they integrate into the mainstream of Canadian life?

Why would we withdraw funds that would make it opportune for Canada to generate new Canadians as solid, self-confident, aggressive individuals who see themselves for what they are and who see themselves as part of the whole Canadian mosaic?

I do not know whether hon. members would agree if on one hand they acknowledge that they welcome and in fact encourage such a development and on the other hand they remove the means whereby that development can come to realization.

If I were to spend more time describing why it is that language development is important, I do not know whether the minister opposite who is already very fluent in two languages would not recognize the importance of being fluent in more than two. When I said that we were becoming rather parochial, perhaps I should have been thinking of the minister opposite in terms of what we should be doing when most other countries in the world are encouraging all of their citizens to go to not only the second but a third and fourth language in a global society, in a global economy.

They are taking away funds, $4 million, from something that should be a solid and integral part of where we should be going. While they are removing $4 million from something that could be socially and economically beneficial, they are throwing away, as I said in a statement earlier today, $602 million to poor multinational oil companies for exploration purposes out west.

I think most Canadians and members on this side of the House see an inconsistency that they would like to see corrected, even though they recognize the worthwhile nature inherent in the establishment of such a foundation.

I would hope all members would see this bill for what it is, a first minor step in the direction that we all hope would emanate from the rhetoric coming from the department, a rhetoric that we hope becomes material rather than just empty phrases.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, when the minister introduced this legislation I was very encouraged for several reasons, not the least of which was that I am a unilingual Canadian with all kinds of hopes and aspirations that I would perhaps become bilingual and fears that reality dictates that I may not.

An hon. member: There is always hope.

Mr. Fisher: There is always hope, that is true. I stand here with envy of at least the two people who have spoken before me, knowing that in one instance the speaker is more than bilingual. The fact of the matter is that the way in which the minister first introduced the bill gave me hope that the Canadian tradition of being multicultural, in addition to the other things that have gone on in Parliament and in this country in the creation of the multicultural department, is very encouraging.

My problem is that when it comes down to the reality of it, like so many other things we have seen happen in this country over the last couple of years and what I have seen in the last couple of years in the House, what we really have in the final analysis are some very hollow words. The problem is that the words, hopes and aspirations being generated by a lot of activity on the government side are not and will not come to fruition in anywhere near the grand possibility that is presented within them.

I have received more mail, not only from my own constituency or my own city of Saskatoon but from elsewhere across the country, on the issue of a heritage language foundation and on the issue of heritage languages than I have on any other issue other than the GST. I suppose there is not much use debating the GST at the moment. I certainly want to debate and draw to the attention of other members of the House and yourself, Mr. Speaker, some of the comments that have come to me from people who are concerned about what is happening with the heritage languages foundation.

Their concern is primarily that it seems there has been a tradeoff. That may or may not be the case, but certainly it seems there has been a tradeoff in taking money away from what has been described to me as one of the most valuable educational institutions within Saskatoon and within Saskatchewan, an institute that has over 20 years of experience. The government is taking money away from it and putting it into an institute which will receive funding over a five-year period. It is rather questionable about what will occur after that.

The problem is that these things are not necessarily mutually exclusive and, while it is true that we as New Democrats support the implementation of the institute, it is also true that we decry in the strongest terms the cutbacks in funding to the heritages languages which we have found within our community and which is expressed in far better language by the people themselves who are involved than I possibly could. I have a letter here from the President of the Saskatchewan Organization for Heritage Languages, Shakeel Akhtar, who wrote:

> I am writing to you to convey our anger and dismay over the recent federal budget, which completely eliminated funding for all supplementary heritage language schools in Canada.
> In Saskatchewan, heritage languages are taught primarily in the out-of-school situation, relying heavily on the goodwill and determination of volunteer language teachers from the particular ethnocultural communities.

• (1310)

These communities make up the mosaic of our city and province.

I also have a letter from a very dear friend of multiculturalism, immigration and the multicultural mosaic of our country, Mr. Mike Kindrachuk, President of the Saskatoon Multicultural Council. He wrote:

> On behalf of the 12,000 members of the Saskatoon Multicultural Council and our Multicultural School, I must inform you of our shock and outrage at your decision to completely eliminate operating funding for supplementary heritage language schools.
> Such radical decisions should not be made without appropriate consultation—

This is another very important issue involved in this whole discussion: without consultation. This is something which has been repeated over and over to me in so much of the correspondence I have received.

Another important point which was made was that it is questionable whether or not there was a cut in funding to the department. I have seen figures which show it actually got a 15 per cent increase, but there has been some indication that it was cut by 5 per cent. I am not in any position at the moment to determine which of those two figures are important, but I am in a position to point out a letter from Linda Flory who wrote:

> We have been informed that the total budget of the Secretary of State has been cut by only 5 per cent. Within this budget the minister cut off the heritage language schools by 100 per cent—

Whether it is a 5 per cent decrease or a 15 per cent decrease, it is a 100 per cent cut to the heritage language schooling which goes on within our heritage communities.

I have another letter from Mr. Thomas Heine of the German community in Saskatoon. Among other things, he wrote:

> It was with great disappointment and dismay that I heard about your recent decision to completely cut funding for all heritage language schools—

With regard to the German community, he wrote:

> We also note that you are planning to establish a centralized Heritage Language Institute—at a cost of $6.7 million. What would be the purpose of such an institute? We note that very few of the heritage language groups are in favour of such an institute: we prefer to teach languages rather than just study them.

I think that is a very important matter when it comes to this whole discussion. He continued:

> Curricula have already been established through the efforts of the various modern language schools across Canada. In the case of the German language schools, graduates are able to obtain international recognition for successful completion of the programs that we have already established.

In personal discussions with Mr. Heine he pointed out that the lingua franca of the German language, the Goethe Institute accepts the levels reached within that heritage language school in Saskatoon. It is very painful to those people as well as others that such drastic cuts have been made.

I have a letter from Mr. Charles Pei of the Edmonton Centre of Chinese Heritage and Second Language Studies.

He says:

> I had just returned from the Saskatchewan second heritage language teachers' spring conference in March—held in Saskatoon. I was so surprised by the level of emotion expressed by all participants on the sudden elimination of the Federal government's per student grant to our heritage language schools.
> You may not have direct experience with any of these heritage language schools operated after normal school hours by the parents. It is the real community foundation of our multicultural Canada and that is what hurts the feeling of these people so much and they expressed their frustration in the most simple and sincere way a citizen can show. MAD.

Mr. Speaker, the Jewish community in Saskatoon also wrote me concerning the cuts. The Hindi School of Saskatoon wrote and told me that they were terribly concerned about those cuts. I also received a letter from the Jewish Community Centre in Saskatoon. And, I have here a particularly poignant letter from the Cambodian Association. Listen to this, I will quote from the letter:

> We began the the Khmer Language School in the fall of 1989, recognizing the value of retaining the Khmer language and passing it on to our children. But now, after only one year of operation, the School is faced with the threat of having to close because of the Secretary of State's funding cuts. It is impossible to collect fees from the students as they and their parents are——all very poor and restricted financial ability.

Mr. Rozdilsky wrote to me, on behalf of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee, to express concern over the cuts for heritage language training.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of not building the institute in Edmonton, it is a matter of building the institute in Edmonton, with the academic and research capability that it will obviously have, and it is also a matter of retaining the funding for those heritage languages.

The heritage languages, as has been pointed out by many other speakers, are so important to the future of this country because, if we have the ability to be able to communicate in this new trading situation which is developing in the world in the languages of other countries, which we must retain within our own country through our own citizens, in comparison to the amount of money we have given to the oil companies, the small amount of money invested for this training would be returned many times.

I would like to remind hon. members that there are going to be rallies and demonstrations across the country and there is certainly going to be one here on Parliament Hill on October 27. I would like to remind those, in Saskatoon, who are listening there will also be one in Saskatoon on October 27 on the corner of Third Avenue and 22nd Street.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this bill because it gives me an opportunity to talk about a part of our Canadianism that is vitally important to me and perhaps even more treasured by me as the daughter of an immigrant to Canada.

We are, indeed, a fortunate nation. We have been wise enough throughout our history to ask of people who come to this country from another culture and with another language that they retain their language and culture and use them to add to the richness, diversity and vibrancy of our Canadian culture. One of the most important ways we have done this is by encouraging the teaching of heritage languages and, in conjunction with the teaching of heritage languages, the teaching of the cultures and an appreciation of the cultures of the countries from which many of our immigrants have come.

For many cultural groups this has meant, through many generations, retaining a sense of attachment to their roots, their background, to the place from which their families originally came and bringing that as a vital and valuable contribution to their Canadianism and, indeed, to the Canadianism of each and every one of us.

I cannot over-emphasize my emotion when I and other members from the Ottawa-Carleton region met with representatives of the 70 heritage language schools in the national capital area. There are 70 schools just on this side of the river. I was touched by their awareness of how important these schools are, not to them and not to their children, but to the total Canadian society. They talked to me about the importance of their children going into the schools and playgrounds of Canada with an understanding of their culture of origin. They told me that sharing that culture with their fellow students or with their playmates wherever they were meant that not only they but the children from the two founding cultures were also finding their lives enriched and made more interesting by the fact that those of immigrant backgrounds were retaining those cultural links.

It has impressed me as well that Canada has a very important international role to play on a number of fronts. One of those that is certainly most important to me is the environment. I do believe we have a leading role to play in developing technology and leading world opinion so that the countries of the world are co-operating together to avoid the destruction of our planet and to ensure the preservation of life on this earth on a more equitable basis than has happened in the past. What more valuable resource to have as we play that role than to have close to one-third of our population now with links and family, cultural and linguistic ties to literally every corner of the earth.

The members from the Ottawa-Carleton schools talked to us about how important the schools are in the integration, not the assimilation, of immigrants into Canadian society. In particular the women are often not out in the workforce and therefore have much greater difficulty learning the language. For many of them their involvement with the school is their best way of becoming integrated into Canadian society, coming in contact with other families and learning one or the other of the Canadian official languages, English or French, and through their children and their children's involvement in the school becoming part of Canadian society more fully than they might otherwise do.

That to me is the importance of heritage languages in our society, not an institute. An institute only serves us well if it is there in support of that grassroots process that involves 150,000 children in this country and many thousands more who are teachers and parents involved in the program. If the institute can provide resources, can assist in the development and preservation of heritage language schools right across the country, I wish it the best, but it is thwarted and doomed to failure if the very grassroots for which it exists are cut off as they have been by this government in cancelling funding for heritage languages.

I want to address one other issue because I think it is of vital importance and that is the failure of the government to recognize that aboriginal languages are not, repeat not, part of the whole package of heritage languages. Aboriginal languages are one of our founding languages and part of one of our founding cultures. Lumping them in in the way they have done in this institute has added another dramatic failure to our lack of recognition of the importance of the aboriginal culture and the aboriginal peoples in Canadian society. We have been through a long and bitter summer. The fact that this bill is passing today without the amendment that would have removed aboriginal languages from heritage languages I think is a shame. We have got to remember that we are the birthplace, we are the place where aboriginal languages exist and whether they continue to exist in this world or not depends on whether we encourage and support their existence in Canada.

If we had one small little plant, or one small little insect, that existed nowhere else but in Canada, we would fight to preserve that with every breath we have. Yet we are failing miserably to protect a living culture that thrives and survives through its languages.

We are failing not only our aboriginal peoples, we are failing our own Canadian society and we are failing world culture by not making a commitment to aboriginal languages we should be making.

I hope the institute is successful but I hope it does not become a tree planted in the middle of an urban environment without enough earth around it for its roots to grow. I hope we do not continue to cut off the roots that make this institute relevant to Canadian society. If we do, we will just have another empty shell that serves no useful purpose, that is there as a nice little token that we can trot out to visitors from abroad.

I want to conclude by saying that the schools in this region have decided this is a serious issue. They want to challenge the government to reinstate what it cut from them this year. They will be holding a rally on October 27 on Parliament Hill and I invite any member in the House to encourage their heritage language schools to join them in spirit, if not in person.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise in the House today to speak in support of Bill C-37, an act to establish a Canadian heritage languages institute.

The formation of this institute is an important step toward making Canada a truly multicultural nation. Within this year, some 175,000 immigrants will have become permanent residents of Canada. They will have come from every corner of the globe, bringing with them all the richness and colour of their respective cultures, making Canada a better and more exciting place in which to live.

They form communities within which they celebrate their own religions, festivals, foods, and languages. Some of them open shops, restaurants, and other businesses, giving Canadians a taste of their homeland and a chance to begin to understand what would have otherwise remained foreign.

However, religious affiliation, residence in an ethnic neighbourhood, or even marriage within an ethnic group, do not necessarily keep a minority group culture intact. Language is the single most important element in a culture. Language is the single most effective medium through which to preserve a culture.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, studies have shown that if an ethnic group fails to preserve its language, integration quickly and inevitably means assimilation. This is a country that is proud of its multiculturalism and its racial and religious tolerance. However, tolerance is not enough. We must play an active role in creating ways in which our ethnic minorities can preserve their language or their heritage. This would be the role of the Heritage Languages Canadian Institute: to promote heritage languages.

There are, however, a number of questions that remain to be answered. Will this Institute meet the real and concrete needs of our ethnic communities?

[English]

The institute would have a mandate to promote the learning of heritage languages, to provide information to the public about heritage language resources, to develop programs to improve the quality of heritage instruction, to assist in the production and dissemination of related materials, to assist in the development of learning standards, to conduct research into heritage languages, to establish scholarly and professional links to further their mandate, and to encourage consultation in matters relating to heritage languages.

• (1330)

Research, consultation, and the establishment of scholarly and professional links are obviously very important aspects of an institute of this kind, but who will ultimately benefit?

There is concern that the institute could lose sight of its responsibility toward the actual ethnic minorities while concentrating too heavily on its dealings with academia. It is possible that, without close scrutiny, the institute could find itself providing assistance, not to the students of heritage languages, but rather to language scholars.

There is danger of the institute promoting programs and disseminating information that never materialize in our ethnic communities. I believe the the government must expect to keep a vigilant eye on the proposed institute once it becomes reality in order to ensure that its mandate is indeed carried out towards the survival and, hopefully, the enhancement of our ethnic communities.

The second question which we must address is the lack of adequate programs to educate our new Canadians in English or French as a second language. The need for heritage language training is real and, as I have stated, the preservation of ethnic cultures through language serves only to enrich Canada and its inhabitants. However, the need for our new Canadians to understand and to be able to function productively in at least one of our two official languages is a basic one.

It is imperative that those who are granted Canadian citizenship and who do not come from a country where either French or English is widely spoken be provided with the means to successfully integrate themselves into the realities of their new home. It would be appropriate, given the proposals contained in Bill C–37, that the government take steps to ensure the availability of proper second language training for ethnic minorities in tandem with its efforts to ensure the survival of heritage languages.

Another concern with respect to the proposed Canadian Heritage Languages Institute is the issue of the preservation of aboriginal languages. Deleted from Bill C–37's original text when the bill was in committee was a section which included "any aboriginal language" as a heritage language. This was done at the request of the Assembly of First Nations. Obviously, as pointed out by native leaders, aboriginal languages are founding languages of this nation and not heritage languages.

Heritage languages are those that may be retrieved from one's original homeland, but we can never retrieve an aboriginal language. Once an aboriginal language is lost here in Canada, it is lost forever. To help prevent such losses in the future, it would be necessary for the government to establish a foundation or an institute similar to the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute for the purposes of retaining and encouraging aboriginal languages.

My colleague, the member for Western Arctic, has developed a private member's bill, Bill C–269, dealing with this very issue. As with the issue of English or French as a second language for new Canadians, I believe that if the government has the intention of being taken seriously with respect to language issues as a whole, it should consider Bill C-269 very carefully.

In closing, I would like to restate my support of Bill C-37. An institute of the kind proposed by this bill is badly needed in Canada. Every year, Canada attracts more immigrants from countries where the language and culture differ radically from our own. The Government of Canada must continue in its efforts to assist Canadians in the preservation of their cultural and linguistic heritage.

We are all very proud to be citizens of this great country, each one with a desire to be a productive part of society and to help make Canada a better place for all. Equally so, the many diverse customs, religions and languages that have come to Canada are worthy of support, for in our diversity we can find the strength to go forward to break new ground in a land blessed with the freedoms and opportunities which we are so fortunate to enjoy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. Debate. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to this important piece of legislation which we call the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Act. I would like to make a couple of general comments.

I view this legislation, as I hope we all do, as a mechanism or a way and means of consolidating our country's approach to the development of the teaching and learning of heritage languages.

The profile of the use of heritage languages in this country other than English, French and aboriginal languages, to which I will make reference later, is usually an urban profile, but it is not exclusively so. I am sure that in Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, Beauce, Quebec, and Pictou, Nova Scotia, there are heritage languages represented there. We really do have a challenge to address this very valuable asset that we, as Canadians, have. I am very confident, subject again to a comment that I will make in a moment or two, that any investment we put into this as a country will be rewarded many times over.

In my own riding of Scarborough—Rouge River, a rough count shows me that there are approximately 20 first languages other than English and French spoken in the riding. I have heard most of them. That does not include Jamaican, which many of my constituents will regard as another language and I say that respectfully.

In my own riding executive, just the table officers represent six first languages other than English. That manifests, at least in the part of the country that I come from, the existence of a reservoir, a bank of linguistic ability that can serve our country, not just domestically, but around the world. I am very confident that we will put that to use.

Language, as well, is perhaps the principal vehicle of delivery of culture, something that we regard as very important in Canada. Language is a vital component of that and, to the extent that we wish to foster further the many cultures found in Canada in all their manifestations, we have an obligation to ensure that language, the vital component of that, is buttressed.

This is a note of caution because I do not think we should confuse heritage language with two other elements. Very briefly, I will speak from a point of reference in my own riding of two challenges which developed beyond the realm of heritage language, but which are not unrelated to it.

The first area is the challenge to develop English as second language education, not just for youth, but for adults. There are great challenges in many of our urban centres. Funding appears to be insufficient. We have large numbers of new Canadians. They desperately require first language training. I use English as a second language because in my riding that would be the dominant first language, but French as a second language has equal validity in the province of Quebec and other parts of Canada where French is the principle language spoken on the street.

The second area is the challenge to all of us of integrating new Canadians whose first language is other than English or French. I think primarily of immigrant women. These individuals need access to English and French training so that they may access the many opportunities that the country has for them and for all of us.

I have to take note then of a modest problem we have here in the definition of heritage language. It has been referred to by many other speakers, including the member for Stormont—Dundas who preceded me. That is the inclusion of aboriginal languages.

I rhetorically ask the question of how much consultation really did take place prior to proceeding with this legislation with a view to providing our aboriginal peoples with a sense of security that their languages would receive the attention they deserve and badly need to ensure their survival. It may be construed as an insult that they perhaps were not consulted to the degree that they might have wished. One thing is certain, I would not want our success in pursuing the goals of this particular legislation in any way to detract from other initiatives that must be there to foster the strength and education in the aboriginal terms.

Another challenge that I see from the structure of the bill that must be addressed—at least I believe we are going to have to address it—is that we have many heritage languages, in excess of 25 or 30. I think there is a challenge to the first directors of this heritage languages institute to ensure that all these languages are addressed equitably and fairly, with some proportionality and a political sensitivity to the presence of all of them.

We do not want to have a Tower of Babel constructed here in the first board of directors. I note that there are only 21 directors. There are a heck of a lot more than 21 heritage languages. I do not envy those who must make the decision as to which languages will be represented on that first board. However, that challenge remains.

The last item I want to take note of is that I hope the government does not hope to choke off this institution by under-funding it. It may look good on paper, but I note that the first year's funding is $800,000 in capital and $500,000 in current expenses. I look at 21 directors and I know how much it costs to move people from one part of Canada to Edmonton. I just have this fear that it will eat up half of that first year's funding just to have its first board meeting.

There are no other mechanisms inserted in the statute to provide funding for all the many good things that this institution will want to accomplish. I caution the government on that. I just have a feeling that the operation is under-funded and there will be many complaints in the months to come about the under-funding. I do not want to by too cynical. I hope the government realizes that it cannot offer what it is now offering and under-fund it. It will have failed in its objective if that is the course it wishes to take.

Having said that, I am happy to include my vote with those supporting this important piece of legislation.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy and honoured to rise and speak on this issue of heritage language.

Before I do so I would like to say a word of thanks and appreciation to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism on this wonderful and excellent initiative. Certainly the bill to a large extent addresses the issue of heritage languages fairly well in the sense that he is setting up an institute that will be used and will act as a clearing house and agency that will pass on information and deal with the issue of heritage languages from close by or from far away. It is there. I could not help but mention one statement made by a colleague, Shaun Murray. He told me the other day that if he one day became the Prime Minister, one of the things he would do would be to allow every Canadian a one-time deal tax deduction, one trip to a Third World country and back to Canada and look at what we have here in order to appreciate the type of country we have and the type of society in which we live. We can appreciate and see how fortunate we are to live in a caring, compassionate country such as Canada. I am very proud of my Canadian citizenship. I value it tremendously.

There is an area that concerns me tremendously as well as it concerns a lot of Canadians, and that is the issue of citizenship. When it comes to good citizenship, we have to make sure that the opportunities are available and provided to citizens from all walks of life, regardless of their background and regardless of the country from which they come, the colour of face, origin and also that they are provided with the tools to become good Canadian citizens.

When it comes to heritage languages, it is very important to let people learn the language of their own country. Also, I believe it is as important for all new Canadians who come to Canada, including myself, to be able to speak the language of the country that has adopted them, whether it is English, French, or perhaps both languages. That opportunity, as it is right now, unfortunately is not available to all Canadians. In particular, it is not available to newly arrived landed immigrants from different parts of the world, whether from eastern Europe, western Europe or Third World countries, or countries where their people speak languages other than French and English.

English or French as a second language is quite a situation across the country right now. School boards are struggling in order to deal with the high demand for teachers, resources and funds in order to support the school boards to deal with English or French as a second language. They just do not have the resources to deal with that problem.

Here is an opportunity that the Secretary of State has missed. That is to take a leadership role in education. When it comes to English as a second language, it really fits right into what the Minister of Citizenship and Multiculturalism is trying to do, and that is to build a stronger Canada or help to build a stronger Canada. There is a deficiency.

We have done a cross-country check-up. We have called every major school board in every major centre across Canada. Every single school board we contacted told us that they have waiting lists of hundreds and hundreds of people from different parts of the world who want to enrol in a program to learn French or English. They cannot get to these programs. The result is that there will be many people unemployed. As a result of that, they may go on the welfare rolls because they cannot speak the language that will help them to integrate into society. It is a major problem.

On Tuesday next week, we will meet with representatives of school boards from across the country. These representatives will call on the federal government to take some sort of leadership role on the issue and step in to assist the provinces to deal with the issue head on, because the issue needs to be addressed quickly.

We support the bill as opposition members because we believe it is a good bill. It fits in nicely with what we are looking for. We are very disappointed because of the $4 million cut to the heritage language schools, which can affect them quite extensively.

In the Ottawa-Carleton region we have approximately 70 schools that teach heritage languages and the cut would involve 40 per cent of their funding. On average, each school receives approximately $10,000. Four thousand dollars from every school is quite a bit of money when dealing with schools that are operated on a non-profit basis. We are disappointed with that.

• (1350)

The number of children across Canada who benefit from heritage schools is approximately 150,000 to 170,000 students. There are approximately 6,000 teachers involved in providing those kinds of services. That is quite a large number of people who are receiving the benefit of such a program.

The minister ought to be proud of the kind of initiative he has taken on this issue and I would like to thank him.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear my colleagues, the member for Ottawa Centre and the member for Ottawa West, speak on this because the three of us were involved, along with a lot of other members of Parliament, in meeting with different people from the various heritage language schools in the Ottawa-Carleton area.

These people met with us and their voice was as one. They did not understand why the cuts were made to their heritage language schools. They did not understand or realize the problems they were going to be faced with in trying to raise the money to continue on with these programs.

Most of these programs are taught on a Saturday and they are taught mainly through the large efforts of volunteers within their own particular cultural community. With the many cuts last June in the budget, Mr. Speaker, fund raising, not just for heritage language schools, but for many organizations and non-profit organizations about the country, is putting stress on the availability of the dollar.

The heritage language school is terribly important for these groups within our country. Before I ask my question, I would point out there are three particular areas that really affects them. It detracts from the ability of ethnic minorities to feel a vibrant part of the mosaic because their full participation as individuals belonging to an ethnic group is denied. Heritage language training provides a competitive edge in the international marketplace and heritage language training promotes the understanding of the importance of culture retention. An understanding of the French fact in Canada would be promoted along with immigrant groups.

My question to my colleague for Ottawa Centre is that some months have passed since that meeting. I believe it was something like 16 organizations, if I remember correctly. I have had contact with some of the organizations within my municipality and my riding of Nepean and I would like to know if the member has had any contact with the heritage language groups in his riding, how they are coping with it, and do they see their problems as being eliminated at this point in time?

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, I can see the clock is getting closer to two o'clock and I want to make sure that in one and a half minutes, at the very most, that I address the concerns of my colleague.

Yes, we have been working with the organizations here. My colleague for Ottawa West, as well as my colleagues for Ottawa South and Nepean, as well from Ottawa Carleton and Ottawa—Vanier, have all been in touch with the school boards and with the heritage schools, and it is a major concern.

It is my hope, on a very positive note, that the minister of multiculturalism will take note of this as he goes through Hansard. They have an excellent opportunity here to make some good announcements and reinstate the $4.1 million cut from the budget in order to allow those schools to deliver the goods and services they are providing to children in the national capital region as well as children across our country.

Once again I thank the hon. member for the good question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being awfully close to two o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North) moved that Bill C-316, an act to amend the Copyright Act (fair use), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to debate my Private Members' Bill C-316 to amend the Copyright Act. I would like to thank those people who have collaborated with me on it; in particular, Pierre Yves Boucher, the executive director and legal counsel of the Association of Colleges and Universities, and Lorraine Flaherty of the Canadian School Trustees Association.

I would also like to express my gratitude to the staff of the Library of Parliament, Monique Hebert and Diane MacMurray for their invaluable advice and assistance in the drafting of this bill.

To date, the bill is supported by the Association of Colleges and Universities of Canada, the Canadian School Trustees Association, The Association for Media Literacy, the Canadian Music Publishers Association, CREPUC, representing university libraries in Quebec, many members of Parliament, numerous school and library boards and various private sector businesses which see this as a reasonable solution to the problems created by the existing legislation.

I would like to note that many of these problems were there before the amendments that occurred to the act were undertaken by this government. However, the increasing militancy of creators and the attention that has been focused on this issue have created a realization, particularly in the education and library fields, that much of what we in our society do with works created by others is illegal.

Teachers across Canada are very much aware of this and their potential liability. In my part of the country, metropolitan Toronto, a teacher in Scarborough had to pay an out of court settlement of $2,000 after a CBC employee took the teacher to court for playing a tape of material taken off the television in the classroom.

I am informed that recently a school in Etobicoke had tapes seized and a heavy fine was required to be paid.

School boards and libraries have considered this issue and have sent out directives to their staff. Some boards have even removed the record buttons on VCRs. This means that teachers must limit themselves legally and, if they are very careful, to strict textbook teaching and use of materials that their board has purchased. Otherwise, they could be liable for action such as the two I have referred to.

This is almost impossible for people teaching today. It makes for a very boring and irrelevant classroom. One of the things teachers are taught to do is to try to relate the principles learned in the classroom to the materials in the real world that students are familiar with.

The legislation passed by this House in Phase 1 of the copyright revision modified the law to give creators secure and unequivocal control over their works and thus ensure them compensation. I think that was an important and a very necessary step that has assisted creators, in particular some of our more recent creators in the computer and programming industry and the music industry in ensuring the protection of their property.

Educators, librarians and others—I would say the vast majority of Canadians—recognize the rights of creators. Indeed, they are strong supporters of Canadian creators. No one that I have met wants to deny creators compensation or the right to earn a living from their work, or indeed control over the public presentation of their works. Many educators are also creators. However, there is a serious lack of balance in this legislation and some very serious access problems which the bill we have before us today attempts to address.

The minister and the previous minister of communications promised to bring in certain exemptions for education and libraries, and consultation has taken place with certain representatives from those groups. A number of exemptions from the legislation have been drafted.

• (1400)

My bill does not address these exemptions and simply assumes the minister will bring these in, in due course, although we have been advised that these are imminent for several years now. Some of the recommendations that are in these proposed exemptions are as follows. For example, it will permit the manual copying of work. Writing a poem on a blackboard is technically illegal. The exemptions the minister will bring in will also permit teachers and students to copy copyright works in examination questions and answers. Obviously much of this is going on now. It will permit the playing of a radio or television set in the course of teaching and research. It will permit live performances by teachers or students in the course of teaching and research.

I am sure almost everyone here who attended school took part in a classroom play at one point or another. Did you realize that this was illegal?

It will also permit the playing of a record or an audio tape in a classroom and the off air taping of news and public affairs programs.

I think those are essential, and I think we all recognize that certainly they are going on right now in the classrooms of this nation.

The bill before us addresses all those works that are not in the repertoire of a collective or the lists in a society or association as referred to in the act that has the power to license and permit the use of works. It addresses everything that a collective does not have power over.

Seventy-eight per cent of the works used in Canada are not from Canadian sources. There is a vast amount of audio, visual and print material available which is not controlled by collectives and unlikely to be.

For example, many professionals such as lawyers do not mind people copying their work. We as politicians very seldom mind people copying our letters and distributing them, so we will certainly not be joining collectives. Fair use would apply in all those situations, as well as for foreign materials, where creators would not feel that the market was not large enough or were not desirous of obtaining remuneration. If they did, they would join the collective.

What this bill will do is clarify the rules for teachers, librarians and other users including ourselves, businesses and people in our society who are users of works created by others.

Works will be available for use through a collective which can license institutional users and grant permission for use on an equitable and fair basis, or it will be subject to the fair use provisions outlined in this bill.

These fair use provisions are taken directly from American legislation. Essentially what they do is allow reproduction and use of material, provided there is no personal profit and it is used for teaching, review, legislative or judicial proceedings, research, criticism, comment or newspaper summary.

It also provides for a defence of fair use in an action for infringement of copyright and requires destruction of broadcast materials that are reproduced within 120 days from the day the copy is made.

As I stated before, 78 per cent of works used in Canada are not Canadian. Most of these materials come from the United States. Implementation of this bill would mean that the same rules as apply in the United States would cover most works, unless the creators have established or joined a collective or licensing body registered in Canada and made their works available and the terms and conditions of use known.

I think this is very reasonable, since Canadian teachers have been successful in obtaining permission to use American material simply by writing and asking American television networks, magazines and so on whether they could have permission to use their materials in accordance with the fair use provisions.

The impact of this bill on education and librarians will be very positive in clarifying the issue. It is also most important that provincial ministries negotiate agreements with the collectives that have been established as soon as possible, so that works that are listed in the repertoire of collectives are available to educators and librarians on a fair basis. This will allow those creators who wish to receive remuneration for their works to receive it and will allow people to use these works.

The Minister of Communications should also bring forward the exemptions to the copyright legislation that have been agreed to by the consultative committees on educational and library uses. These are important components of a total package on copyright that our educational and library system can live with.

This bill will provide a great deal of assistance to individuals, governments and private companies that must communicate. Under the existing legislation users are infringing copyright, with the exception of fair dealing, unless they have received the permission of the copyright owner of any work except for the purposes of private study, research, criticism, review or newspaper summary. That has been interpreted very narrowly by the courts as being individual private study. It does not permit the making of multiple copies for classroom use, or for sharing with others, or public performance, or display of work.

We in Parliament are constantly violating copyright legislation. Those of us who stand in this House and read from newspapers or magazines are publicly performing works and violating the law technically. Those of us who copy news items in our householders and circulate them without obtaining prior permission are violating the legislation. Of course Quorum is technically illegal, as are other news clipping services unless they have obtained permission. If we copy articles from Hansard for public circulation, even of our own speeches, this is technically illegal.

Some members have never run into this issue and may think that there is no real problem because nobody in their right mind would require permission or would object. On the contrary, The Toronto Star has a policy that refuses permission to politicians to use pictures and news items they own. I ran into this last year. I could not use a picture of myself, my daughter, and the Yamagami family from my riding who had a disabled child and I helped with an immigration issue. The Toronto Star owns that picture.

This of course would still occur, but they would be registered with a collective and we would at least know what the rules are. As far as those newspapers that do not mind are concerned such as The Ottawa Citizen or have their own rules that allow members to use their material, at least we would know what the name of the game was and we would be able to use the material, so there would be clarity.

If you, Mr. Speaker, have a public meeting or publicly display a picture or a diagram or any work created by someone else, you may be violating the law unless you have the permission of the creator. Under my bill, if the work is not in the repertoire of a collective where you can find out what the rules are, the concept of fair use will apply unless you want to use it for commercial purposes. For commercial purposes you would have to obtain copyright permission from the owner.

As I have mentioned, educators are in a particularly difficult position. Multiple copying for classroom use is currently illegal, unless there is an agreement with a collective. However, few provinces have these agreements. Quebec is the only province in which the use of collectives has been developed enough for boards of education to be able to go and obtain an agreement with a collective. The rest of the provinces are in a state of negotiation. It is a very difficult situation now to obtain permission.

I worked on a teaching project with a number of other teachers as part of a course. We decided to try to find out if one could get permission. Our project was a project in which we were studying police drama. We wanted to look in particular at this one unit on the program Night Heat, so I tried to get permission to tape Night Heat and use it in the classroom.

I was passed around to eight different people and each one of them said: "Go ahead and do it. We don't care". I said: "I wanted to do it legally. Our board says that we have to obtain copyright permission. This is the same throughout Ontario. We are working on this teaching unit. I need to obtain it legally". I went through the vice-presidents of CTV. I went through everybody. Finally I found the company that represented doctors and lawyers across Canada which owned the rights to Night Heat. I was able to send a letter to it stating when I was going to tape it, when it would be destroyed and so on. The company agreed, and there was no charge. When the day came when I wanted to tape it and I had made the arrangements, it was bumped for a hockey game. After all that effort, I could not use it.

Our bill will set out clearly for teachers and others what fair use is, and put those conditions that they want, namely, no commercial use and destruction after 120 days, in the legislation. It would be far easier for everybody.

The universities encounter many similar problems. In order to get around this law, students are having to line up at copy machines in libraries. I am familiar with a number of graduate students. Teachers will say the periodical article is in the library students will have to make their own copies. Students are spending as much as $20 a week getting these copies. They are lining up. They can only have the periodical article signed out for 20 minutes, so they are at machines in line-ups copying the article. It is completely counterproductive.

Librarians usually pay $8,000, and some even $25,000, to get periodicals. The idea is that they are used by people in the field. The people who submit to them very seldom get any kind of large remuneration. It is an honour to be published in these magazines and the whole idea is that they should be used. Because of the problems with the copyright legislation, university librarians feel they cannot do it. If the periodical is registered with the collective with the terms of use there, it will be clear. If not, it will be fair use.

Similarly, businesses run into this. One thinks of things that are put out by the Royal Bank, for example, such as a newsletter. It does not mind it being copied and circulated. It is a great honour that its material is circulated and respected. This is another example of someone who does not mind. There are many examples.

What is in this bill for creators? It continues to give creators clear and unequivocal rights to their works, subject only to the exemptions that the minister brings forward. It provides a strong incentive for creators to join collectives if they want remuneration for any of those non-commercial uses permissible under the fair use provisions. It will make the collectives stronger and more viable.

In conclusion, I think this bill will provide for the establishment of a reasonable and balanced approach to the issue of copyright legislation in Canada. I greatly appreciate the support of the House in referring it to the communications committee for further consideration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for St. Boniface, then the hon. member for Bourassa, the hon. member for Prince George—

Bulkley Valley, and then the hon. member for Lethbridge in that order.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to address this particular bill in the House today. I want to commend my colleague for the work that she has done.

She has also rendered another valuable service in the sense that she is attempting to plug a loophole which is causing a great deal of anger, frustration, and anxiety among a number of people. These include educators from all levels and others as well.

Some will recall that I made a statement pursuant to S. O. 31 this week in recognition of National Students Day and the Canadian Federation of Students Strategy Paper, entitled, Strategy For Change. I indicated that the government had no vision, no plan, no focus, and no strategy. It was in total disarray in terms of education. The points that are being made today, in fact, corroborate my statement.

I want to suggest that it is not only in disarray and confusion with respect to education. It is clear that this is also the case in the area of economic development. The Minister of Finance cannot admit that there is a recession. Some people are talking about depression. We know that youth unemployment, as mentioned in the House today, is sky-rocketing. If I remember correctly, it is in excess of 13 per cent. We know that the number of bankruptcies in the country is sky-rocketing and going out of sight. Again, it is total disarray. There is no plan and no focus. There is simply no leadership.

I could make the same points with respect to the social development area. One will recall the attempt to de-index pensions and the government came back with a clawback. This is a good example of no plan and no vision. Another example is the unemployment insurance bill. Again, we are going to try to train people on the backs of the unemployed.

Let us take the cultural area. We spoke today about the establishment of the heritage language institute. I think many people recognize that native languages are in fact dying. The majority will not survive unless we can respond to this need. The government has been unable to state unequivocally whether or not native languages fall within the institute.

We spoke as well about the importance of preserving heritage languages and we gave economic, social and cultural reasons for doing so. Again, this is a good example of disarray. What people do not understand is when those groups are not considered as they ought to be, when their languages and cultures are not readily accepted, we find people feel marginalized as if they do not contribute fully to the Canadian way of life.

I believe the government has not understood that education is a cornerstone of economic, social and cultural development policies, that it does not understand as well as it should that in order to be competitive we must have a well-educated citizenry, in order to be leaders and not followers, we must have a comprehensive plan with respect to education.

Some of you will recall that I mentioned the lack of support that universities and colleges have received.

[Translation]

I have often commented on cuts in transfer payments. If we look at the period from 1986 to 1995, we find that the government will transfer $10 billion less to the provinces. For instance, there is less funding today for training and re-training, although we were promised these programs would be improved. If we look at student assistance, we see there has been no change since 1984 and that students are facing tremendous problems. Their debts are increasing at an alarming rate, and tuition fees as well, and there is also the 3 per cent administration fee.

Illiteracy: between five and seven million Canadian men and women need help, and what do we see? An investment of $4.50 per student per year. In research and development, we see the same situation. The government promised to double it's investment. It was 1.40 in 1984, and now it is less than that.

Mrs. Gibeau: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member for Bourassa wish to raise a point of order?

Mrs. Gibeau: I think the hon. member's speech is very interesting, except that I don't see any connection with the debate on the bill before the House today.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. With reference to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bourassa, on the question of relevance, I would like to draw the Chair's attention to the fact that not only does the hon. member's speech seem to be lacking relevance to this very important subject, but furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there also seems to be a lack of factual information. To give you an example of relevance, government spending on postsecondary education in Canada has increased at an average rate of 5.1 per cent per annum under this government, which is higher than the rate of inflation, and the rate of growth—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. I am sure the hon. member will become relevant.

Mr. Duhamel: It is relevant and I am sorry that my colleagues have not picked up the point. I thought it was very clear. I said there was total disarray and confusion. There are big gaps in the initiatives not being undertaken by government. That is the point.

When we look at this copyright bill, Bill C-316, we recognize that the member has tried to fill another loophole. I pointed out that there are loopholes all over, and I can mention them again in case my colleagues are not sure that it is relevant or pertinent. I object strenuously to the comments that have been made. If they had listened more attentively, they would have heard the relevance.

We know Bill C-316 has, in fact, a number of flaws. This attempts to fill those loopholes, the big gap that exists out there. We recognize that the creator must be rewarded. But we also recognize that the teacher must be able to teach. We recognize that there are others with legitimate and valuable needs out there and this bill will go a long way toward correcting them.

I wondered, as I looked at the bill, whether or not the purpose, nature and the value of work contained within the bill is sufficiently and precisely defined. That is a question I think we can discuss at some other time. I think it should be more specific. It is not specific enough at this particular point in time.

The whole notion of what its teaching may have to be looked at as well. What is a teacher? Are we talking about teachers in public institutions or are we talking about teachers who might in fact be teaching in a non-public institution, who might be teaching, for instance, a heritage language group without the specific qualifications that are normally accepted within a province? That occurs on occasion. That is another issue I think we should look at but perhaps it has been covered. I am willing to listen to what the hon. member has to say.

I want to point out that my hon. colleague from Mount Royal had proposed a solution when Bill C-60 came up. It is unfortunate that it was not taken up at that time because we might not be having this discussion today if it had been.

As I indicated initially, I am dismayed, as are a number of other colleagues, by the government confusion in education, and as I pointed out, the whole of education. This is a good example. I am concerned as well by the delays in filling this particular loophole.

[Translation]

However, I can assure you we are prepared to support this bill, and I hope we will now be able to go ahead with it.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the speech by the hon. member for St. Boniface.

The present copyright legislation in this country consists of an act drafted in 1921, proclaimed in 1924, and subject to interpretation by the courts. Until quite recently, the legislation had never undergone substantial review. When I hear remarks about confusion, lack of vision and delays, I fully agree with the hon. member since the Liberal Party was in power at the time and, as usual, lacked vision, caused all kinds of delays, and created this confusion. This was typical of the Liberal government throughout its mandate, I may add!

During all those years of Liberal government, we saw, I might say, the birth of radio, television, photocopy machines, tape recorders, videocassette recorders, computers, satellites and various devices for information storage and retrieval. All these technologies have contributed to increasing the use of works protected by copyright.

These new technologies have to a very large extent been instrumental in creating works protected by copyright. They not only helped produce these works but also provided new ways of using them, and as a result, opened new markets, thus increasing opportunities for pecuniary remuneration in exchange for such use.

However, these technologies also made it possible to make repeated use of protected works without obtaining permission from the copyright owner. For instance, we can easily reproduce a TV program at home by using a videocassette recorder, and it is practically impossible for copyright owners to control how the program is used. Consequently, new technologies have created a host of legal problems, some of which require solution through legislation. That is why the 1924 Copyright Act was partially amended in 1988 by Bill C-60 and by the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act.

In 1988, nine specific amendments were made to the Copyright Act. The maximum fine for criminal offences was raised from two hundred dollars to one million dollars; specific protection was extended to computer programs and moral rights were reinforced to protect the reputation of the author of a work; a public exhibition right for artistic work was created; the link between copyright and drafting was clarified; choreographic work was protected, whether or not it had a story line; and finally, the obligation to obtain a licence for the production of sound recordings was abolished and the application of royalties negotiated on the market was allowed.

Furthermore, Bill C-60 encouraged the creation of corporations for the collective administration of copyright or associations of copyright owners, and provided for regulations in this respect. These licensing bodies, based on a concept that has worked satisfactorily in the music industry for over 50 years, will now be able to operate in all copyright sectors and negotiate the granting of licences with users of works protected by copyright. In exchange for payment of reasonable royalties, they will give users quick and easy access to works protected by copyright. If the licensing body and the user cannot agree on what constitutes a fair royalty, either party may apply to the Copyright Board to fix the amount. Amendments to the Copyright Act have also expanded the jurisdiction of the Copyright Board.

As a result of the amendments to the Copyright Act under terms of the Canada-United States Free Trade Implementation Act, cable operators are required to compensate the holders of copyrights for the re-broadcasting of distant radio and television signals, both Canadian and American.

The amendments which I have just mentioned represent the first step in an effort to update a 66 year old legislation. The Government is determined to continue reviewing the copyright legislation and to implement some of the most urgent amendments which have been favourably and even enthusiastically received by both creators and users.

As it progresses, however, this review brings to light new aspects which, over time, become increasingly relevant and significant, and call for our immediate attention. They are sometimes basic issues or matters of an administrative or technical nature.

A number of these amendments are necessary to meet international requirements concerning copyright or to place Canada on the same footing as its main trading partners. The purposes of other amendments are to update the Copyright Act and to rid it of such terms as "mechanical reproduction" and "perforated rolls". Bill C-316 which the Hon. Member for Don Valley-North introduced and which we are dealing with offers a good example of copyright related issues.

I share the concern of the Hon. Member for Don Valley-North and appreciate her efforts to find a solution to the sensitive problem of the use by teaching establishments of works protected by copyright legislation.

Bill C-316 suggests one way of dealing with exceptions when implementing the Copyright Act, particularly when the permission of the copyright's owner and the payment of royalties are no longer required because a given use is deemed to be fair, pursuant to the standards set in the legislation.

Generally speaking, Bill C-316 is aimed at giving various users access to copyrighted works when such access is not possible under a general licence, that is when the licence giving access to a wide array of copyrighted works cannot be secured. This is why the bill advocates setting up group management companies which authors should join. Still a number of problems related to the bill and external factors make it necessary to take a closer look at the bill before passing judgment on it.

Bill C-316 now provides exceptions in the case of certain users, particularly teachers and researchers. It advocates a radical change concerning both form and substance with respect to the fair use concept embodied in the Copyright Act. To some extent the bill goes beyond the discussions which creators and users such as librarians and teachers have had in recent years. The bill may not reflect these discussions because they are part and parcel of the review process and must be taken into consideration in any Copyright Act amendment.

Reviewing copyright provisions has always been a complex and controversial undertaking, if only because of the balance which the Copyright Act must restore between creators and users of copyrighted works. These exceptions are particularly delicate because they can seriously upset the balance if they go too far or not far enough. One of the best ways to be mindful of the delicate nature of the amendments is to see to it that both creator and user are involved in the policy drafting process. That is precisely what the government has done.

In 1987 and 1988 the Department of Communications set up two legislative committees to go over the exceptions which might be included in the copyright legislation. One dealt with exceptions concerning libraries, the other covered exceptions related to the teaching profession. When the two committees began their hearings, creators and users were sitting around the same table but they had strongly diverging views. Users wanted wide-ranging exceptions, first to gain free access to works required for teaching and research, second to be in direct contact with library patrons. Sure enough, creators would have none of this because they felt that these exceptions would encroach upon the rights they had been enjoying all along. I believe that after lengthy and sometines very vociferous debates the parties finally reached common grounds of sorts.

• (1430)

The advisory committees agreed that, instead of widening the scope of the fair use principle, the new legislative provisions would include special exemptions for libraries and schools. Therefore schools and libraries would no longer face the complex problem of having to decide whether a given activity would be deemed to be fair use by a court.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but her time has expired. The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in this debate today on Bill C-316, put forward by the member for Don Valley North, and to be presenting some of the views from my colleague, the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, who could not be with us today. He is attending to affairs in his riding, as you know, Mr. Speaker.

We do have some concerns and comments obviously about this legislation. I appreciated some of the earlier comments that a speaker made regarding how our contemporary world with its new and modern technology has placed great demands on government regulators to try and catch up in many ways with technology and laws relating to many very important issues. For instance, there is the use of VCR's. I know some constituents who have recorded a number of your memorable rulings, Mr. Speaker, and it is something that you would be concerned about in terms of copyright legislation.

There are the simple things which take so much for granted now, such as the photocopier or the fax machine. All of them may make us technically commit illegal activities in our offices. Many people, of course, would not be familiar with these machines.

In any case, Bill C-316 certainly addresses some serious matters that fall between the rights of creators, artists, and what have you, and the rights of users. That is chiefly, and most importantly, the need to balance these rights for the public good.

At this point we are opposing this legislation as it stands and I will make three quick points in review of our position and then make recommendation for your guidance.

The bill is flawed in its intent in the issues it seeks to address and by lack of a precise definition of certain terms. Clarity of thought and purpose is very important here. Of course, we have to say how important that is in all government legislation.

We say further that the problem faced by educators would be best served by a clause covering the spontaneous use of material, namely, that as part of negotiated agreements, educators would be able to use articles from newspapers and magazines, combining fair use with just remuneration, something my party has been committed to for some time.

My third point is a matter of time. Overhauling copyright legislation is tough business to be sure, requiring complex and detailed legislation, but the government has made a tough situation tougher for all concerned by not proceeding in a timely way with Phase II of the copyright legislation.

The minister has committed himself to bringing in Phase II twice in 1989. In May, 1988, his predecessor promised Phase II within a few months. It has now been five years since an all-party unanimous committee of the House requested a comprehensive overhaul of copyright laws. It is certainly not the only legislation that probably needs some overhauling.

The minister certainly enjoys his portfolio, but the job confers responsibilities. Full and comprehensive copyright reform is one of them. We know the time we had to wait for a museums policy from the minister. It is an indication that whoever is in charge of the minister's schedule should try to put copyright legislation on Monday's page so that we can give some attention to it.

Our recommendation is this: Because the bill concerns matters of importance, the bill needs more debate. The issues it touches on are important and are certainly worthy of further examination. Because we want the government to get on with the full and comprehensive copyright reform that the House and many others have recommended, we are certainly in full support of referring the matter of the legislation to a legislative committee in the interest of expediting full and comprehensive copyright reform in Canada. Let us hope that this legislation is a step in that direction.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to rise and say a few words with respect to this Private Member's Bill, Bill C-316. For me, it points out once again the critical importance of the Private Members' Hour because it is the hour where private members, after often long hours and diligent work, are able to being an issue to the attention of the whole Parliament.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, for all the years that you have sat here and the somewhat lesser years I have sat here, that was never ever done. Private Members' Bills were talked out by the hundreds. At the end of the hour, they were simply lost. When we became the government in 1984, we pushed hard and changed those Standing Orders. Now, a certain number of bills have to come to a vote.

This bill did not get on that list where they have to come to a vote, but the excellent work done by the member for Don Valley North has got us to the point where, by consensus, we agree in the House that this matter is so important that it should go on to the standing committee for further study and review.

I want to commend the member for Don Valley North because Parliament can be a very frustrating place, even more frustrating for members on the back-bench on the government side. So much of what we do in the caucus and in the committees never gets reflected in public. Whereas opposition members—and we were the same when we were in opposition—can stand up and take positions and promote them forcefully in public. On the government side we have to do it quietly behind the scenes in the committees. It is always frustrating for government back-benchers and I am sure the member for Don Valley North is very proud, and deservedly proud, of the work she has done on this bill.

There are many people that back this bill in its entirety and it reflects a broad view in our society. It is certainly worthy of detailed study. As previous members have spoken, it is a question of balancing the interests of creators with the interests of people who want to us it, especially for educational purposes. There is no doubt that none of us would ever recommend that we go out and take food from farmers without adequate compensation, or a car from a car manufacturing plant. It is the same with creators of works, especially software and other valuable educational works.

This bill will be an occasion for the standing committee to take a look at it in great detail, bring witnesses in, and further concentrate our minds, as legislators, on this topic. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, speaking for the government, I am pleased to be able to ask this House for unanimous consent that I might put the following motion.

I move:

That Bill C-316 be withdrawn and that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So agreed and ordered. Accordingly the subject matter of the bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall I call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being three o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 1 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 2.39 p.m.

CONSTITUTION

MOTION TO AMEND CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast) moved:

That, whereas the Constitution Act, 1867 provides in section 17 that there shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate and the House of Commons;

And whereas it is expedient that the electors of Canada be more directly involved in the legislative process;

And whereas an initiative and referendum process is an appropriate mechanism for the determination of questions of national interest;

And whereas the Parliament of Canada should be bound to enact any measures necessary to implement decisions of the electors of Canada on questions put to them by referendum;

Now, therefore, the House of Commons resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1990

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by inserting, immediately after section 19 thereof, the following section:

"20. (1) A referendum on any matter coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91 may be initiated by proclamation of the Government of Canada or by petition of not less than ten per cent of the electors of Canada addressed to the House of Commons.

(2) A decision of the electors of Canada in a referendum held pursuant to this section is binding on the Government and the Paliament of Canada and shall, within a reasonable time after the holding of the referendum, be implemented by them in a manner consistent with their powers and authority.

(3) The Government of Canada shall implement any legislation enacted by the Parliament of Canada pursuant to subsection (2) within a reasonable time after such enactment.

(4) No referendum shall be held on a question that is substantially the same as a question on which a referendum has been held within the previous four years.

(5) The Parliament of Canada shall, before the expiration of the first parliament following the coming into force of this section, enact a measure consistent with it to provide a reasonable procedure for the orderly administration of referendums to be held pursuant to this section."

2. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Act, 1990 (referendum).

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for having graciously seconded my motion, despite the fact he finds it controversial. He may not agree with everything it contains, but I am grateful to him for seconding it.

[English]

My motion before the House is to consider amendments to the Constitution that would put in place a process of referendums. This process would create a direct democracy. I believe that what we have today in Canada is a parliamentary system that is in need of reform. In order for that reform to take place all leaders and members of this House must show a will for reform.

However, I am not convinced that the leadership or the will is there. Leadership is courage. Leadership is the ability to take risks and leadership is trust.

I use as an example the Quebec referendum of May 20, 1980. I believe that Mr. René Levesque showed courage, took the risk, let the people decide and lived by the outcome. Equally, leadership needs the support of the people to function effectively. That means the electorate must not abdicate its responsibility, look for short-term solutions, or hope for messiahs, and they have not.

• (1310)

I believe that, as evidenced in the GST battle and the Meech Lake Accord debate, Canadians did have a vision, accepted their responsibility, but had no effective means to express it. One of the problems is our electoral process.

We have a system which, in effect, places our leaders for a period of five years in a position that is quasi dictatorial. During that time, great irreparable damage can be done to the country. Examples of this is uncontrolled deficit spending and for the west, the national energy policy. So from time to time, between elections, referendums are essential on major issues. By the referendum process I mean that either the government, Parliament or the people, may initiate that process. My motion today puts in place criteria that would allow such a process to take place.

I do not put forward the concept that referendums are the only reform necessary for a more democratic country. In a Parliament that abides by 18th century tradition like caucus secrecy, bizarre rules of the House and men with whips, there is lack of input by individual members and derailment of all intelligent and logical ideas.

To make my point, I would like to quote from the McGrath report of 1985 at page 1.

> As a new Member of Parliament, I do not know the mechanics of this institution as well as some of my colleagues. I am absolutely amazed at how little input private members have into the formulation of legislation, policies and/or regulations. It appears to me that most of the time we are told what the minister will be announcing in 48 hours and we do not have access, any means to study or contribute or change the finished product. But members must go back to their constituents to explain and support the decision of the government. Sometimes this is very difficult.

This was said by Barbara Sparrow, member of Parliament for Calgary South at that time.

I wonder how she can defend the GST. This phenomenon occurs because a bill is drafted by the department responsible, is put before Cabinet and considered in confidence by cabinet. For that reason, members cannot see a bill or a budget before it reaches first reading in the House. At that time, major amendments are ruled out of order because they could contradict the principle of the bill. The result of this is that amendments are virtually all cosmetic.

Another point to be made is that most legislation passed by the House is enabling legislation, which allows the department to draft regulations by the thousands. It has become a second level of law which has not been debated by duly elected members of the House.

When I was sitting on the committee which reviews those regulations, we found regulations which have been in place for 10 years and there was no enabling legislation permitting them and still the ministry refused to withdraw them. Not only do we have bills that have not been initiated by members of Parliament, but by officials of different ministries. We also have budgets which are not being formulated by members of Parliament of the ruling party.

I would like to quote the right hon. Prime Minister, in his leadership book, Where I Stand, at page 49: The Prime Minister stated:

> At a time when governments are supposedly committed to greater openness and accountability, the budget-making system remains cloaked in secrecy. At a time when virtually all other policy decisions are subject to an elaborate system of checks and balances within government and Parliament, the budget remains the exclusive prerogative of a handful of officials within the Department of Finance and the Privy Council Office."

The Prime Minister further states:

> But the present budget-making process itself contributes to bad decision-making and therefore to bad government. Clearly, it is time for a serious debate in Canada on how we can make the budget process more responsive and more effective to the benefit of all Canadians.

I do believe that the Prime Minister's honourable intentions which resulted in the McGrath report of June 1985, has been derailed. Why? The simple answer is that we function in a parliamentary system of the 18th century which is in need of reform. That system includes not only the House of Commons, but our Senate as well. I remind members of the House of the necessity to have regional input in Parliament with a Triple E Senate, but none of those reforms, if taken singularly, would be a total answer to our dilemma. This, then, brings me back to my argument in support of a referendum process.

Do we need a process of referendum in Canada? I ask that question, and I would argue, yes, because there is no referendum mechanism at the present time to poll people on very important issues, such as changes to the federal Constitution and taxation.

I would just like to mention a few recent examples where polls were not taken: free trade and the goods and services tax. Those who argue the opposite point will say that we already have a democratically elected government in Canada, and, therefore, the consultation is taking place each time that a federal election is called.

Recently, the Right Hon. Prime Minister, in speaking about the goods and services tax, said: "If people don't like what we are doing, they can always turf us out at the next federal election."

I would like to remind the Prime Minister and all those who oppose the polling of people that in the last election the main issue before the electorate was nothing else but the question of free trade. There was no debate about constitutional changes or taxation such as, for example, the goods and services tax.

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. Kindy: An hon. member says that it is nonsense. I was going door to door and I had to defend free trade, and I did it, because I believed in it. But there was no question about the goods and services tax. I was asked whether our social programs would remain intact. I had to respond, yes, our government is faithful, it is going to keep our social programs. Then there was the change in that Unemployment Insurance Act. I am really ashamed of that.

The last election was a one-issue campaign. It was free trade and nothing else.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Kindy: And what were the democratic results of that election? The Conservative Party that campaigned so hard for the free trade agreement got approximately 43 per cent of the popular vote. Those who opposed the free trade agreement got approximately 52 per cent of the vote.

It could be argued that a majority of the people are opposed to the free trade agreement and therefore it should not be implemented, but because of the way our electoral system is structured, the Conservative Party elected a majority of members to the House of Commons. Even so, it got only 43 per cent of the vote.

• (1320)

We should ask if the Conservative Party got a mandate from the people to implement the free trade agreement. According to our Canada Elections Act, the answer is yes. If we believe in polling the people, the answer would be simply, no, it did not get it. But because the Conservative Party elected the highest number of members of the House of Commons, it was able to pass the free trade agreement. Therefore, I would argue that our electoral system is flawed.

In Canada we need a system of checks and balances. This can be provided by the direct poll of people, a referendum process.

I would like to ask hon. members, if a question was put to the people today on the goods and services, tax whether or not the people would favour it. The result would be no. The answer would be a resounding no.

Where is the mandate of the government elected by only 43 per cent of the people and one that campaigned on free trade and not on the goods and services tax? It is now trying to implement the goods and services tax. As I said before, there is no mandate.

Why do some members oppose a referendum process, the polling of people? They would say it is expensive to consult the people, that people are not well informed, that they are not smart enough to make intelligent decisions, and that the issue would be a divisive one. I believe all those arguments are self-serving and do not reflect the real issue, the polling of people.

I personally believe in the intelligence of people. They have only one vested interest, and that is the good of the country. The people have that vested interest. Politicians are different. They have all sorts of vested interests.

To give a few examples, I will quote from a book entitled The Referendum, by John St. Loe Strachey. On page 53, he states:

> In speaking of the referendum in America the writer in the British Weekly said:
> Members of the Legislatures, they say, may be"lobbied, wheedled and bull-dozed," but the citizens are too numerous to be threatened or be fooled.

So, the argument that people should not be consulted does not hold water. If we look historically, democracies such as Switzerland and the United States of America have referendums. In the United States there can be no constitutional change at the state or federal level with out the people being consulted. The same applies in Switzerland where there is a binding referendum at all levels of government and people are consulted regularly.

Switzerland, like Canada, has many languages and cultures and the referendum process has united that country. I would like to point out that Switzerland is a united country and has four languages. Therefore, the argument that we could not have a referendum process because of our two official languages and many cultures is inappropriate as well.

In conclusion, to make our country a better place in which to live we need a referendum process which can be initiated by the people, by Parliament, by the executive branch of the Crown, and which would be binding on the government of the day.

I hope at the end of the debate, but before the hour expires, members will show trust in the Canadian people and allow a vote on this motion to take place.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate.

This motion proposes a constitutional amendment that would allow for referenda to be initiated on any matter coming within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. Once a yes or no decision has been made in a referendum, the Government of Canada would then be forced to implement it. I have a number of problems with that and with the whole notion of referenda in general.

First, the reason I oppose this motion is that it implies that there is something fundamentally wrong with our system of government, that the parliamentary system we have does not work, and that this Chamber does not reflect the hopes and aspirations of Canadians. I have opposed suggestions like this thoughout my life.

As the Chamber knows, in the early seventies, a previous Prime Minister indicated his belief that the present system was not good enough for Canada. It spawned a whole cottage industry of suggested changes to the British North America Act.

One of the questions I raised in an academic setting, and which I would like to raise it here as well, is that surely the onus rests on those who indicate that there is something fundamentally wrong with our parliamentary system. The onus is on them to demonstrate why there is something wrong and what it is that they are proposing that is so much better.

The hon. member who just spoke talked about the systems in the United States and in Switzerland. I have heard it all before. People point to the European republics and to the experience south of the border. I always ask them the same thing: What is there about the Government of Italy, France, Switzerland or the United States that you believe works so well that our system has to be the one that is radically altered?

I have maintained that, yes, there are mistakes. This Chamber has made mistakes. But over the existence of the House of Commons these past almost 125 years, our record compares favourably with every other democratic government, or any government in the world for that matter. I suggest to them that the onus should be with them to show why this parliamentary system of ours does not work.

As well, I oppose this motion for what it says about the role of a member of Parliament. The hon. member just said that everybody talked about just the free trade agreement. I am not going to get into the strategy of the Liberal Party.

I said many times during the election: "I am prepared to talk about all issues. I am willing to say where I stand on all of them." If the Liberal Party said that the only thing it wanted to talk about was free trade, that is a decision that it made and that it will have to live with for the next two to three years. I believe there is a greater obligation for members of Parliament to say exactly where he or she stands on some very difficult issues.

In the 1984 election, the subject of abortion was not an issue, but I believed—and I think I share this with other members of Parliament—that on the most difficult moral question of the 20th century a member of Parliament or anyone who stands for public office has an obligation to say exactly where he or she stands.

When it comes to things like that, I do not think it is a question of the changes of public opinion. I had many people say to me: "I am sure you have taken polls in your riding. I am sure you have seen a Gallup poll. The majority of Canadians do not agree with you." I do not want to be in this position. I do not think members of Parliament should be in a position where they say: "I have certain principles, but if they are out of fashion, I am certainly willing to change them."

I happen to believe that the free enterprise system is good. There are people in the Chamber who will say to me: "For heaven's sakes, your home province has embraced socialism. Maybe you should be a socialist." I say that time will tell whether I am correct on that or not, but I believe in the free enterprise system and I have an obligation to make that known to the constituents of my riding and let them make the decision. Once the decision has been made after I have fully informed people where I stand, then I have an obligation to act on it.

With respect to tax changes, let me say that the hon. member who proposed this motion was a part of the government. He knew as well as I and anyone who is interested in the subject of tax reform that it was a proposal of the Progressive Conservative Party in the election of 1988 to overhaul the tax system. On every public platform, we were all asked questions on this, and I did not shrink from answering with what I believed was the position of the Progressive Conservative Party, which is what we have implemented. To those people who say to me "You know, the GST is not popular. " I say, "Look, I will tell you why I support the present legislation. Because the manufacturers' sales tax is a bad tax. I am opposed to a tax system that encourages job creation in Rochester, encourages job creation in Chicago and not in Canada. That is why it has to be changed." Assuming that the MST is a bad tax, this is not a popular tax. I have to agree with people who say that. I do not like taxes. When I pay my municipal taxes, I am not too happy. When I pay any tax, I am not too happy. But it is one of the facts of life.

I heard a radio announcer ask people what they thought heaven was going to be like. When I get to heaven, I expect to see many similarities between Canada and heaven. One of the exceptions will be taxes. Taxes will not be there. They are a part of life here in Canada.

This government was elected not just to take popular decisions. We are here to take tough decisions. Mr. Speaker, you will remember in 1984 when this government was elected. In the newspapers the next day, they said: "If this was a mandate for anything, it was a mandate for the Mulroney Conservatives to make tough decisions." We saw where easy decisions led us. With the previous government we saw where easy decisions were leading this country inevitably, into bankruptcy. Those were the easy decisions. Our job was to make the tough decisions. I say to members of this House that we have a responsibility to be sensitive, we have a sense of responsibility to inform ourselves as to what our constituents think we should be doing and we have a responsibility to be honest. Ultimately, our responsibility, as Edmund Burke said, is to use our judgment in the implementation of public policy. This is what this government has done these past six years. I have been very proud to be a part of this government and to be a part of this great parliamentary system.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Calgary–Northeast.

[English]

I can sympathize with the statements that the hon. member made concerning the advisability of proceeding with a referendum. I must say at the outset that I believe referenda are foreign to our system of parliamentary government. I choose not to support the motion in spite of the sympathy that I feel for his position.

It is important that we in the House realize the position that he has been placed in by reason of the disgraceful conduct of the government opposite which has the House to a position where it has to consider a motion such as this.

It is my view that we are debating such a motion because the level of competence of the government is so dreadful that people are looking for salvation outside of this House rather than looking for it here. They know the hard-hearted attitude of the government majority in this House. It is prepared to bulldoze the wishes of the Canadian people anywhere at anytime. It is prepared to bulldoze the opposition anywhere and anytime to have its way. Canadians are fed up to the teeth with it. They want this government out. They are willing to consider referenda.

That is why the hon. member for Calgary Northeast has been driven to propose this kind of motion to this House. He, at least, has seen the light. He has realized what dreadful government the Progressive Conservative Party has brought to Canada. He jumped ship and got out of that party before his own career was destroyed. Many hon. members opposite are going to find their careers come to a very short end come the next federal election.

What is it that the hon. member for Calgary Northeast is really saying in this motion? He is saying that Canadians are entitled to express their own views very directly on a number of key issues that this government has brought to the fore, and to which be believes most Canadians are opposed. I do share his views in that respect. Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax. They are opposed to the cuts in unemployment insurance. They are opposed to the cuts in VIA Rail. They are opposed to the selling off of Crown corporations. They are opposed to the budget cutbacks. They are opposed to the clawback provisions that the government has introduced. A whole string of bad legislation has been introduced in this Parliament by this government.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls rants and raves about how on every platform he was on during the campaign he spoke about the goods and services tax. Well, did he speak about cuts to VIA Rail? No, he did not. Did he talk about unemployment insurance cutbacks? No, he did not. In fact, the Minister for International Trade said there would not be any changes in the program. Lo and behold, the changes came in within months of the government winning the election.

This government set out to mislead Canadians in the last campaign. It succeeded in misleading Canadians. They were duped into voting for this government in spite of a shocking string of policies that were hidden from view and which we exposed and said: "This kind of thing is going to happen. This government is going to do these things that they are denying today." We asked the questions. We got the answers, and then the answers all changed after the election.

Canadians were misled in 1988. They are now demanding referenda on various issues that this government has brought before this House because they did not know what this government was going to do when the election was held.

In other words, the referendum is an alternative. They are saying: "Look, we are so angry". Canadians are so annoyed at having not been able to choose their representatives on the basis of the facts that they are saying: "We now should have a second crack at this through a referendum." We should be able to have a particular bill brought to us for consideration so we can look at the bill and pass judgment on it and say is this really what we want in this country. There are too many bills that this government has brought in that Canadians do not want, that they are fed up with, and they do not want them passed into law.

I am a staunch supporter of this institution and of our parliamentary government. I firmly believe that, as the hon. member for Niagara Falls has said, over the years this House generally has been representative of the wishes of the Canadian people. Over the years, in a general way, this House has served the Canadian public well and the method of decision-making that we have where the government proposes and the House disposes generally has worked well.

There are problems. I do not say it is perfect. I would be the last person to maintain that but, to use the old quotation, I believe attributable to Sir Winston Churchill, democracy may not be the best form of government, and may be the worst, but it is better than all the others.

I say that bearing in mind the way this Chamber operates. Sure we could improve it, we can make it more representative in various ways and we all look at different ways. But I do not believe the referendum is one of those ways.

Having said what I have said, over the years we have been a Chamber which generally reflects the will of the people of Canada. At the present time that is no longer the case. I say it because this government has done so many things that it did not promise and, indeed, that run completely contrary to its stated promises and intentions.

Frankly, it is an absolute disgrace, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry to make it sound as though I am being partisan on that issue, but I can understand the frustration of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast in bringing this in. After all, he was driven out of the Conservative caucus by reason of his opposition to a tax that he believes is fundamentally wrong.

It was not just the tax. He has opposed several other policies that have to him seemed absolutely and fundamentally wrong. They were wrong because they were contrary to the promises made in the election in large measure, and they were wrong because they are bad for Canada in the second measure. We have been saying that for ages. Yet all we get for our efforts is closure. Every time the government says: "We have heard enough from the opposition on this bill after a day or two of debate. We will apply closure. We do not want to hear any more of your reasons for objecting to this bad legislation that we are proposing. That is our policy. We are going ahead with it. We do not care what Canadians think. We do not care what the opposition thinks. All we want to do is get the legislation passed into law. We will take our chances, thanks, in 1992 or 1993."

That is a new approach to government in Canada. I think it is detrimental to the way we operate in this House. Generally in the past debate has been slightly longer. There has been opportunity for more input into the decisions that the government has made through debate in this House. This government has chosen to limit debate at virtually every opportunity and to ignore Parliament as much as possible. I submit that that is a bad practice.

The hon. member for Abitibi suggests that maybe I am incorrect in that. If he is suggesting that the government is in fact acting in a way that supports Parliament and supports our democratic institution and supports the rights of members to participate in debate, I suggest he look at the record. I could cite the list. I do not have it with me today, but I could give the list of times that closure and time allocation have been applied in this House in this Parliament. I could give the hon. member the dates when Parliament was not sitting when in accordance with the rules it might well have been sitting. I can tell the hon. member that the reason for all the closure, the reason for all the time allocation, and the reason for the non-sitting of this House is attributable directly to the government.

I have spoken on this subject before in this House. He can look back at previous speeches and get the figures. I invite him to do so.

If the hon. member for Calgary Northeast is correct in his statement that in fact his move to this side of the House and his support of referenda generally is attributable to the fact that the government lacks the confidence of Canadians, which I submit is the case, then what I can say to him as a solution to the problem is why will he not urge more of his colleagues on the other side to join him on this side of the House. Certainly, we would welcome more members here to help vote against the government. We would be delighted to have them voting against the government. Whether they are in the Liberal Party or whether they are independents on this side of the House, as long as they are prepared to cast their votes against the government, I am happy to answer the question put by the hon. member for Niagara Falls.

We need a larger opposition that can force this government out so we can have an election and see whether in fact it has the confidence of the people, because that is the normal route. If the Prime Minister chooses, he can always dissolve the House and put us into an election. We in the Liberal Party are ready for an election at any time, not a referendum, but we are certainly ready for an election at any time. Indeed, we would welcome an election at this stage. Perhaps the hon. member for Niagara Falls would urge the Prime Minister to call an election so we can find out if the Canadian people support the policies that the hon. member says are so widely supported and so popular across Canada.

I can tell him, returning as I have from a weekend in my riding of Kingston and the Islands, that this government is notoriously unpopular in Kingston and the Islands. They are not in a position where people feel they can support the policies that the government is advocating and indeed, they would not support them if they were in a referendum or if they were put to them in a general election.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has expired and thank the House for its indulgence.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Calgary Northeast for bringing this motion to our attention today in terms of a Private Member's Bill on direct democracy or referenda. As has been said already, this is something that is really different or foreign to our Canadian system in terms of a citizen initiated referenda. I also remind the House that the time has come, in my opinion, that we should look very seriously at making the Government of Canada more accountable to the people of this country.

I say, unlike the member from the Conservative Party, that this institution is not working, that Parliament is not working, that there is a failure of this institution to respond to the needs of the people of this country. Our party, because of that, has established an action group to go across this country to try to get ideas from the Canadian people as to how to reform the Parliament of Canada to make it more responsible to the people of this country.

I find, for example, that a majority government in this country does not seem to work. It does not respond to the wishes of the people. In an election that is held today in terms of the issue of the day might be fiction in about two years time. We have a system in this country of responsible government which in theory is very good, but I ask the question of responsible for whom. Is it good enough to have an election every four or five years? I suggest it is not good enough to have an election every four or five years. A responsible government today is responsible not just to the people of this country but responsible in the main to the government side of the House and the majority Parliament in the House of Commons and that is not good enough.

The motion today by the member from Calgary is one on referenda. I am not sure whether or not he goes too far when he says there has to be a citizen initiated referendum that will be binding on the government as well as referenda initiated by the government itself. I think we should take a serious look at that proposition. We should debate the pros and cons to see whether or not this is one of the reforms to our parliamentary system. It is perhaps an idea that is much more popular in western Canada than it is in eastern Canada.

The Liberal and Conservative parties both put forward a spokesman from Ontario. If you look historically in this country, there have been since Confederation some 42 referenda conducted by provincial governments. Some 31 of them had been conducted in the four western provinces, three in the province of Ontario, two in the province of Quebec, and six in Atlantic Canada. Historically they have been used much more frequently in western Canada, perhaps because of the alienation or the grievance that many western Canadians feel about the central government and Parliament.

On the national level a referendum has been used on only two occasions. One of them was back in 1898 in terms of the prohibition of liquor. The other one was on conscription in 1942.

There are many recent examples as to why we must examine the effectiveness of our parliamentary system. We have, for example, a goods and services tax that most Canadians oppose strenuously but feel very helpless to do anything about because the government says it has mandate and, come hell or high water, that goes through regardless of the consequences.

We had a Meech Lake process. I supported very strongly the substantive part of Meech Lake which the members of this House know. The process of negotiation, which is not entirely the fault of this government but was inherited in many ways from the previous Liberal government, is a process that is too secretive. It is a process that is restricted to too few people. It is a process that must be opened up.

We also have in this parliamentary system of ours a Senate which is not democratically elected, a Senate where the Prime Minister can use an archaic constitutional provision, section 36 of our Constitution, and swamp the Senate with eight additional senators, something that is highly undemocratic.

On the other hand, there can be a majority in the Senate or a minority, as is now the case, that can override the wishes of the elected House. On either count, I do not think that is a proper way to go. We have had a situation this summer where we have also sent Canadian troops to the Persian Gulf, into a potential war zone without the recalling of Parliament. The Persian Gulf, the GST, the Meech Lake process, and the Senate are examples of why we need some reform to make this Parliament more sensitive to the wishes of the Canadian people.

We have to look at issues of whether or not we need a second House. Do we need an elected Senate? What power should that Senate have? Should we, for example, have in this country fixed election days so that government cannot manipulate an agenda to its purposes and forget about the purposes of the nation as a whole? Do we in this country need to have a look at proportional representation so that different points of view can be represented constantly at the centre of this country, which is the Parliament of Canada?

Perhaps our country is too diverse for a majority government to work. A majority government might just respond to the huge population centres and forget about the smaller populated areas of this country.

Should we take a look at our confidence votes in the house? Should we give members of Parliament more freedom, regardless of party, to vote the way that they see fit?

What this motion is about is a question of direct democracy. It is a direct democracy versus representative democracy. Should we have the power to recall members of Parliament when they do not listen to the wishes of their people in their own ridings? Should we give the people of this country the power to initiate referenda that are binding on the Government of Canada and on this Parliament? Should the Government of Canada itself have the power to initiate referenda.

The first part of that question was answered several times by a previous Liberal government. I remember back in 1975 or 1976 when it proposed that the government have the power to initiate referenda on the Constitution. I remember the constitutional patriation act back in 1980 when Mr. Trudeau suggested that the Government of Canada should have the power to have referenda on constitutional amendments. I remember Pepin–Robarts back in that same period of time, back in the 1970s, suggesting a referenda procedure. It has been looked at very thoroughly.

The other part of this resolution that is new and different coming from my friend from Calgary is: Should the Canadian people have the right to initiate referenda? He is saying that with 10 per cent of the voters signing a petition they should have that right.

I did not take a serious look at that. It is a major deviation from what we know today, but I also want to suggest to the House that we look at a warning as well because we may indeed go too far down that road.

An example of that today is the state of California. In California there are about 13.5 million voters, and I believe it takes only about 3 per cent of the electorate to initiate a binding referendum. It takes 372,000 people, and I think that is far too few. It allows special interest groups to manipulate the system. If we take a look at the proposition seriously, we should make sure we do not go too far down that road. There is an election coming up on November 6 of this year in that state. There will be 20 referenda questions on the ballot, 20 different initiatives. The ballot booklet explaining the vote is 144 pages long. They are estimating that the campaign, surrounding these referenda in California, will cost around $200 million.

• (1350)

This is an example of referendums gone wild; they have gone too far in the direction of referendums initiated by the electorate. Also in the state of California, for example, we have found that referendums now have become a cottage industry. They are in the hands of a small group of people who represent special interests.

We must guard against that in this country and indeed we should look very seriously at this kind of a proposal. As well we must look at the idea of whether or not referendums unite people or divide people.

A referendum can be very, very divisive. That is something we must consider very seriously. It can be divisive. It can be, as it is in California, a process which is hijacked by special interest groups.

There was a referendum in California, for example, in 1984 about state lotteries. The campaign for that referendum cost $2.6 million, but $2.2 million of that came from one company that manufactured lottery tickets. That shows you, Mr. Speaker, that they can become captives of special interest groups. They can be hijacked by special interest groups. In California now it apparently costs up to $2 a name to campaign to get names on a petition to initiate a referendum. I leave us with that warning.

I see my time has run out. Let me refer to an article in The Globe and Mail of October 15 which refers to a referendum law in California that was explained to a B.C. Social Credit Convention. They warn that this cannot used by ordinary people but can be used by special interest groups such as big business to promote what they want. I think we have to be very careful if we go down this road that we do not go as far as they have in the state of California.

With that, I think we should take a serious look at this idea. My friend from Calgary is saying that it should not go as far as California. Indeed one needs 10 per cent of the voters of this country to initiate a referendum, rather than 3 per cent or 4 per cent as it is in California. Let us at least take a look at it in terms of referendums on constitutional matters. Let us debate this. Let us open up this process. Let us open up these doors and let the people have a say as to what they want us to do.

I think we should refer this subject to a standing committee, maybe have some hearings on this issue, and allow the people to participate before we make a quick decision either yes or no.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary-Northeast.

Our colleague is urging the House to endorse a constitutional amendment in a measure he calls the Constitution Act, 1990 (referendum). In accordance with this amendment a referendum on any matter coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 might be initiated either by Government of Canada proclamation or by petition of not less than 10 per cent of the electors of Canada.

The purpose of the motion in interesting. Although Canada is among the freest and most democratic countries on earth, it is important always to seek to strengthen public participation in the affairs of the state. Such is the very essence of our democratic tradition, which is indeed the envy of many other countries.

If there is one conclusion to be drawn from the recent Meech Lake Accord constitutional debate it is that Canadians want to have their say on important issues in this country.

Still I would suggest that the hon. member's proposition deserves closer scrutiny.

First, is that the only way to let Canadians take part in the business of the nation? No. Referenda are not the only way we have to reach our objectives. Among other options which spring to mind, for instance, we could hold public hearings where Canadians would be asked to speak out about the issue at hand.

Mr. Speaker, this kind of public consultation would enable us to hear the main arguments, and it is a process that can readily be initiated.

Since the beginning of Confederation, this form of public consultation has been used almost exclusively at the provincial level. There were the two referendums held in Newfoundland, in June and July 1948, which gave the population of Newfoundland a chance to decide whether or not the province would enter Confederation. There was also the referendum held in May 1980, in Quebec, on the future of that province within the Canadian Constitution.

There were other instances at the provincial level, especially in the Western provinces. Interestingly, most of these consultations were about prohibition.

Nationally, however, and that is the focus of the debate today, Canada has resorted only twice to this form of consultation since Confederation: in 1898, prohibition and in 1942 on conscription.

Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell on the debate that took place on this issue in Quebec and the other provinces. Suffice it to recall that on the day of the plebiscite, April 27, 1942, French Canadians in this country voted 80 per cent against the government's proposal, while English Canadians voted massively in favour.

The episode caused profound divisions between French Canadians and English Canadians on this issue. Mr. Speaker, this does not mean we should reject out of hand the possibility of having referendums at the national level. I merely wish to stress that this method of public consultation, attractive though its objectives may be, bears with it a real risk, as we have seen, of polarizing public opinion and dividing Canadians. In fact, it forces a decision without necessarily allowing for further discussion or encouraging consultation. It seems to exacerbate differences, to divide voters into two camps—for or against—leaving no room for compromise.

That is why I find it difficult to support the hon. member's motion right now. Considering the many ramifications and major consequences of such a decision, I think the proposal requires careful study. It would be most unwise to proceed before having been able to analyze all the aspects, all the consequences and before determining how we should proceed, something the hon. member proposes to do after rather than before the amendment is passed.

Mr. Speaker, if we decide that a referendum is the best way to involve the public, we must consider, for instance, on what matters a referendum may be called, who may initiate such a procedure, what the rules would be, how best to ensure that the public is satisfactorily informed of what is at stake—

Mr. Kindy: Oh, stop talking!

Mr. Saint-Julien: The hon. member for Calgary Northeast tells me to stop talking! No member from Western Canada is going to tell a Quebecer to stop talking in this House, because it is my privilege, Mr. Speaker!

As I was saying— I see the hon. member for Calgary Northeast who tells me to shut up, but I remember he ran twice in Quebec and was beaten twice. He ran in Western Canada where he won, but he always lost in Quebec. And he will not prevent us from talking in this House!

We must also consider how best to ensure that the public is satisfactorily informed regarding the issues at stake, and whether a majority is required in each of Canada's regions as well as a national majority, and any number of other issues as well.

Mr. Speaker, I also think it is important to consider this question within the broader context of the constitutional amending process. The Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, said on June 23 and repeated on August 25 in Gaspé, and I quote: "Before initiating further constitutional reform, we will have to identify a new constitutional amending process". This new process will be what Canadians want it to be, and that is more open, more transparent and broader in scope.

The Prime Minister also indicated that we should always look for better ways to amend the Constitution, ways that reconcile the need for public involvement and democratic action with the legal constraints that exist in our Constitution.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I am in favour of finding ways that will provide for greater involvement of Canadians in the business of Parliament. However, to vote for the motion tabled in the House today would be to proceed piecemeal, without having analyzed all the aspects of these issues and without consulting the public.

THE LATE RENÉ HIGHWAY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Manitobans, native Canadians and patrons of the performing arts across Canada, I would like to mark the passing and pay tribute to one of Canada's great young artistic talents. René Highway died last Thursday of meningitis at the age of 36.

Born in northern Manitoba, René Highway will be remembered for the imagination and innovation he brought to his choreography and dance. He will also be remembered as a talented film and television actor.

Together with his older brother Tomson, René Highway explored the clash of cultures between white man and native through theatre and dance. His work celebrated his pride in his heritage and people.

To his family in Manitoba, may I offer my deepest condolences. Canada has lost a young and vibrant inspiration.

In memory of René Highway donations will be gratefully accepted by the Native Earth Performing Arts Inc., Lower Level, 37 Spadina Avenue, Toronto, Ontario.

I hope members will join me in mourning a serious loss to this community and to this country.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, on October 15, we tabled our negotiating position in Geneva on GATT.

Canada seeks a reduction in trade distorting subsidies, more access to international markets and clarifications of GATT Article XI, which permits import quotas in support of our supply management sectors, such as the dairy industry.

Also last Monday, the producer group known as Dairy Farmers of Canada launched a publicity campaign to increase consumer awareness of the GATT proceedings. Unfortunately, their television commercial has also had the effect of creating fears among producers that the government has changed its stance on supply management.

I emphasize that this is not the case. In their Toronto news release of Monday, October 15, 1990, Mr. Peter Oosterhoof, vice-president of Dairy Farmers of Canada and vice-chairman of the Ontario Milk Marketing Board stated, and I quote:

> The objective of the campaign is to increase Canadians understanding of the challenges facing Canada's dairy industry, and to enlist active public support for the positions taken in international trade negotiations by the Dairy Farmers of Canada and the Canadian government.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Competition Policy announced last Friday that it intends to file an application with the competition tribunal in the matter of the acquisition by Southam Incorporated of publishing operations in British Columbia.

This decision provides firm reason to renew the call made for hearings before the Standing Committee on Culture and Communications into concentration of ownership within this and other media. The press, free, responsible and accountable, is an instrument of prime importance to all Canadians.

Because of concentration of ownership, many Canadians fear that the press will not be employed in such a way as to supply them with the full range of views required to make informed judgments. Thus, we cannot be complacent about continued concentration of ownership of the press. Concentration of media ownership is much more than a merger, an acquisition or a bottom line statement.

News and information, vital elements in making decisions, are becoming packaged, homogenized and sanitized. We are heading away from reading all the news that is fit to print toward being fed all the news that is print to fit.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Nova Scotians I would like to express my profound disappointment in the economic policies of the Government of Canada.

The high interest rate policies of this government are hurting consumers from coast to coast, but in particular it is hurting those individuals involved in the resource based industries.

In addition, high interest rates have a profound negative effect on small business across this country. It is they who create the thousands of new jobs which are needed so desperately in this country. However, with high interest rates, the policies being pursued by the government opposite will only serve to shut down small business in this country.

The policy with regard to a high Canadian dollar certainly does not provide any advantages whatsoever to our Canadian manufacturing associations across this country. As a result, thousands of Canadians will be without jobs.

Finally, the GST. Why is the Canadian government putting into place the goods and services tax when we are in the midst of a first ever Canadian-made recession? Why is the government so concerned with seeing its way on the goods and services tax, which it knows will fuel inflation and cost jobs. In other words, it will be extremely negative for the Canadian economy.

LITERACY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the eradication of illiteracy in Canada must be an unabridged priority of our government.

Everyone in Canada pays the price of illiteracy, including lost opportunities, diminished effectiveness, alienation and low self-esteem. The nation as a whole pays because we are denied the fullest participation and productivity of our citizens.

Today there is a growing appreciation that a nation's most important resource is its people. For it is Canadians, their collective ingenuity, knowledge, skills and ambition which will determine Canada's future economic growth.

Our government must continue to confront the issues which challenge the growth of our citizenry, such as illiteracy. The societal and individual costs of inaction are too immense.

I call upon our government to continue the fight against illiteracy. Our objective should be each and every Canadian having basic literacy and numeracy skills at a minimum. For Canadians and the country's sake, we should expect and receive nothing less.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on this Small Business Week, thousands of entrepreneurs will have an opportunity to exchange information and discuss business matters relating to the theme "Quality and Productivity: The Competitive Edge".

Today's business people are dealing with world-wide competition and increasingly demanding customers. Canadian businesses must not only match the prices and services of their competitors on a local and regional scale, but strive to be competitive on a global scale. That means providing products and services that their customers want and can count on.

Small businesses and large companies alike must design and implement specific strategies dealing with quality and productivity.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government showed its support by launching the Canada Business Merit Award Program.

BILL C-21

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, tonight one of the most harmful pieces of legislation, Bill C-21, the UI bill, will be passed because Liberal senators have capitulated.

In May, Liberal Senator Jacques Hébert stated:

> —not only must we resist until the government agrees to negotiate fairly with the Senate to reach an honourable compromise, but if we do not, we would betray millions of Canadians who have supported us so far, we would betray the most vulnerable among them, the poor and the disadvantaged, the unemployed in this country.

The Liberal deal has betrayed these Canadians. It includes the passage of the clawback on family allowances and old age pensions.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration must recognize that Bill C-21 will be devastating to Canadians as we enter a recession. The new variable entrance requirements contained in Bill C-21 make it even more difficult for displaced workers to collect benefits, even though they have been paying higher premiums since the first of the year.

If the Tories are bent on proclaiming this legislation, then I urge them to do so with compassion. Delay the implementation of new and tougher VERs and implement the old requirements. Workers have been betrayed by the Liberal Senate and now must look to the minister for hope. I appeal to her, take a second look and help unemployed Canadians.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, October 21 to 27 is Small Business Week in Canada.

Small Business Week recognizes the important contribution of small businesses to the Canadian economy and provides a forum through which the exchange of new information can be shared between small and medium-sized businesses throughout the country.

Small business account for nearly three-quarters of the jobs created in the country over the past few years and one-quarter of the profits and wages from businesses which have fewer than 50 employees. It is no secret that small business is the engine which drives our economy in Canada.

The government recognizes the importance of fostering a strong business community throughout the country, and the creation of ACOA and WDO have brought unprecedented economic development and prosperity to the regions.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, dairy farmers on Prince Edward Island are very concerned about the future of their farm businesses and the security of their families and rural communities. By offering to slash price support to dairy farmers by 50 per cent and to open 5 per cent of the Canadian market at the GATT, this government is making a very serious error.

The Dairy Farmers of Canada have never agreed to the position of offering 5 per cent access by volume to the Americans. The dairy farmers were prepared to offer 5 per cent by value and no more than 3 per cent by volume. Let there be no confusion. This government is acting against the advice of the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

This government's free trade agreement and its flop at GATT show its failure to protect Canadian dairy farmers and supply management.

I ask the Minister for International Trade to pay a lot more attention to the agricultural talks at GATT and to show a bit of concern for dairy farmers, and indeed for rural Canada.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of our annual Small Business Week. My colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism is announcing this year's theme, Quality and Productivity: The Competitive Edge.

As we all realize, small businessmen today are confronted with many changes in trading patterns, marketing techniques and the demands of the consumer. It is the disturbing pace of change that has brought these issues of quality and productivity to the forefront.

As the minister has pointed out many times, "to be competitive, Canadian companies must do more than simply match the price, service and design of competitors on a local and regional scale. They must compete on a global scale, and that means providing products and services their customers want and can count on".

In the minister's comments, there can be found the thrust behind this year's Small Business Week. With the federal government's support, we can be certain that our small businessmen across this country will rise to their new challenges of the ever-changing global marketplace.

BILL C-21

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is shutting the door on worker adjustment programs and on the variable entrance requirement, hoping those affected will take their frustrations out on the opposition in the Senate.

Since July her department has refused resources to those eligible for funding under section 26 for retraining. Officials claim increased demand and a shortage of funds because of Senate inaction on Bill C-21. Nothing could be further from the truth.

At the same time, the minister was able to get a 200 per cent increase in dollars earmarked for ensuring part-time employment for those threatened by lay-offs. This type of employment hides the true unemployment rate. Economic indicators point to some 140,000 full-time job losses in manufacturing this year alone.

The minister can today do something about both. She can make a commitment that, upon Senate passage of Bill C-21, moneys will be made available automatically to those who have been denied job retraining since July. She can also make the variable entrance requirement retroactive for those who have already suffered in the hard hit areas.

It is time that the minister put action behind her words.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, is this a government that can run a modern railroad? Once again, the evidence says no.

VIA Rail just rolled out its brand spanking new rolling stock, with the latest in fixtures and appointments; everything you could imagine, even electric heat instead of steam. The one thing it did not install was a tank for holding human waste.

VIA's brand new equipment still dumps human sewage as it moves, leaving it to be found by the people who work on or near the tracks.

We have been pressing this government and the Liberals before it to give VIA the resources it needs to get genuine, modern equipment for the next decade and beyond, but our calls have fallen on deaf ears.

And yet perhaps this is not too surprising. From a government that has dumped on passenger rail, this is entirely consistent.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, nearly two months before the implementation of the GST, Canadian businesses and customers still do not know what is happening with the goods and services tax.

The liberal Senate and Jean Chrétien continue holding the government hostage and ridiculing democracy, with the consequence that our business people and the public in general are thrown into insecurity. Seven million Canadians are waiting for a cheque before Christmas to compensate some effects of the GST. Unfortunately, we still do not know if these 600 millions dollars or so will be payed in time for Christmas.

Mr. Speaker, in view of such abuse of power, let us wish at least that the people of Beauséjour realize the rotten deal Jean Chrétien has in store for them if he gets to represent them here in Ottawa.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. This fall, with the Canadian economy in recession, with thousands of workers losing their jobs in the plant closings announced almost weekly, in fact with thousands of Canadians suffering because of the government's high interest rate and high dollar policies, the Prime Minister has said he will not convene a meeting of First Ministers on the economy.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Will the government show leadership on this matter for a change? Will the government announce an immediate First Ministers' conference on the economy? Or, is it unwilling to do so because it is afraid to face the music? Is it afraid to face up to the reality of its own mismanagement of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, at this very moment, is out in western Canada speaking to people, talking about policies and issues and defending the government's record. He certainly is not acting like a person that is afraid of facing the very hard issues.

I can tell the hon. member, as he is well aware, that under the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord there would have been a process set up on a permanent basis where such meetings would have taken place. Unfortunately, with the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, that has not been implemented.

I can advise my hon. friend that there is a very thorough consultative process that is taking place under the auspices of the Minister of Finance. He is in the course of meeting with finance ministers of the provinces, as he will be meeting with labour and other important representatives of the Canadian economy as he prepares and lays the ground work for a new budget. It would certainly be premature now, having regard for the fact that that process is in fact in place at the present time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the country needs leadership, the Deputy Prime Minister is confirming that once again the Prime Minister has decided to abdicate his responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister knows full well that conferences of this kind were convened very often in the past and that the Meech Lake Accord was not the only justification for them. Again I ask the Deputy Prime Minister why, in these recessionary times, is the government not prepared right now to call an economic conference of provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada? We do need such a conference.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that we have not seen anything constructive in terms of how to deal with some of the important issues emanating from the premiers. One of the reasons that the Minister of Finance is in fact engaged in the consultations is to simply sit down and talk about the issues of the economy and see whether or not they have anything constructive to offer. So far, we have not seen very much.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I have said, thousands of skilled workers are losing their jobs right now in plant closings. One example is the 500 workers at Kelsey in Windsor who are linked with a transaction in which Varity Corporation is paying the government $15 million.

Will the government agree to use this money to set up a new economic development fund to help the private sector begin to create jobs to make up for the jobs that are being lost in communities such as Windsor due to plant closings and in similar communities right across the country? Will the government agree to take at least this one small initial step to begin repairing the damage it is causing every day to the Canadian economy, to Canadian workers, and to Canadian families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): One way, Mr. Speaker, in which the hon. Leader of the Opposition can help is by prevailing upon the Senate to ensure that the government's financial legislative program gets passed into law. That would be doing himself, his party, and the country a lot of good.

• (1420 )

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was in the House when the Minister of State for Industry, Science and Technology went through a litany of new investments and new job creating activities right in Windsor and the surrounding area. What has to be remembered—and I am sure the hon. member is aware of this because he has had similar experiences; I think he was involved in some adjustments and restructuring of the manufacturing sector—is that adjustment and restructuring is currently under way, but it is also coupled with huge investments by Ford, by General Motors, by other automotive companies. They are upgrading their operations so that they can compete in the 1990s and into the 21st century.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Considering that the Acting Prime Minister is telling us that the First Ministers have not contributed anything to the debate on the Canadian economy and that bankruptcies are on the rise, does the Minister of Finance still agree, does he still support the policy of Bank of Canada Governor Crow who keeps saddling Canadians with unduly high interest rates? Is he still supportive of a policy which is driving us straight into a recession?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me again take my hon. friend back to the reasons for the policy of maintaining high interest rates.

We had a period where the growth in the economy was outrunning the capacity of the economy to meet that growth. That led to inflationary pressures through 1987, 1988, and 1989 and there are still some elements of those inflationary pressures right now. Unit labour costs are growing in excess of 6.5 per cent. That compares to something less than 5 per cent in the United States, and close to 4 per cent in countries such as Japan and Germany. It is important that we get these inflationary pressures under control. We are working to do that.

We have seen the Consumer Price Index performing reasonably well in recent months. We are concerned as to where this might go in the next few months because of the pressures on the price of oil as a result of the Gulf crisis, but our hope is that we would be able to see a continuation of the drop in interest rates that we have seen during the course of the summer. That remains to be seen, though, because of the problems that we are seeing with the price of oil.

That is the direction in which we are heading, and we are confident that the policies we have been following have been working.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue because the minister has decreed now that Canadians will have to pay the GST after the first of January, whether it is the law of the land or not.

Knowing that Canadians are aware they may not be legally required to pay that tax, does the minister understand the chaos and confusion that is going to be caused when angry, frustrated consumers walk in to purchase goods or services in the country knowing that they do not have to pay the goods and services tax if Parliament has not passed it? Is the minister going to go along with this knowing that even the Auditor General does not think he can implement this tax effectively?

Mr. Beatty: You should speak to Allan MacEachen about that.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would get his facts straight he would know that what I said in the scrum to some 12 or 15 reporters last Friday was consistent with what the Minister of Finance and I and others have been saying all along and that the headline that came out from one of the 12 or 15 reporters was taken out of context. In the next sentence, in a transcript from the scrum, a reporter said: "Are you saying it is going into effect even if legislation doesn't pass?" My answer was: "No, no. I didn't say that. I am saying that I hope it passes sooner rather than later."

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the business community is saying, whether it is the president or chairman of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce or others, that every day that the Senate delays the passage of this bill it is costing the business community money as a result of uncertainty. I would hope that the hon. member would have enough guts to stand up, speak to his friends on the Liberal side and make sure this is passed on behalf of the business community of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of National Revenue, because this morning we talked with the newspaper journalist who wrote that story and who explained it. In fact, it was a one-on-one interview which took place.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: I want to put this question to the minister: Is he saying that the various quotes, extensively put out at length in The Financial Post and which have been taped by the journalist in question, are, in fact, false? Is he denying what is in The Financial Post?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thought I just explained quite clearly the result of the statement taken out of context.

If he reads the transcript, the hon. member will know that we were discussing as to when, in November, this may or may not pass in the Senate. We were talking about November 1, November 9, and November 15. That is where the quote came from in respect of when in November it will pass. I just said: "The GST is going to go ahead on January 1, 1990, regardless of when it is passed in the Senate", meaning in November. Later on, and I repeat what I just said to the hon. member, I was asked: "Are you saying it is going into effect even if legislation does not pass?" And I said: "No, no, I did not say that. I am saying that I hope it passes sooner rather than later." That is consistent with what I have been saying all along.

The concern with this whole matter is that the business community, as a result of the delay in the passage of the legislation in the Senate, is now confused and is uncertain as to what is happening. We are saying that we are certain that it is going to pass through the Senate, it will become law, and businesses should prepare early for their own benefit.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, frankly the minister is wriggling; he is attempting to squirm; he is trying somehow to escape—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his preamble and put his question.

Mr. Langdon: I put it to the minister that it is time for him to stand up in the House and say very clearly what it was he said on Friday. Is the minister prepared to stand up and, quite clearly, say to the people of Canada that Parliament still makes the laws of the country, not the chief tax collector?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have been accused, on many occasions, of skating around the issue. This hon. member appears to be skating on the offensive and he is going backward and getting nowhere.

The question that he has asked, I have answered previously on two different occasions. If he is talking about the fact that the House of Commons sets the agenda, draws up the laws, and creates the policies of the country, he is absolutely right. That is why the senators should abide by what the traditions of this Parliament are and pass the parliamentary agenda, as they are due to do, on behalf of the business community of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, a minister cannot possibly avoid responding directly to such an important question.

I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to tell us that it is not up to him to make a decision on that tax? It is up to the Parliament of Canada, namely the House of Commons and the Senate.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my answer is the same in French.

• (1430)

[English]

The hon. member is obviously skating on thin ice, to use the term which he has used in the past. I have answered the question very clearly. My comments on Friday were consistent with what we have been saying all along.

Since the member is so interested in this issue, I hope that he will support what the chairman of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce said. I quote Mr. Jack St. Clair: "We believe that business, because the GST is passed by the House of Commons, it has to be implemented now because business is not waiting. Any delay or any cancellation would have a cost effect on us now".

What we are saying to the business community is prepare now, because we believe the GST is going to be launched on January 1. The sooner you prepare, the sooner you register, the sooner you can take advantage of the benefits accrued as a result of early registration.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The fiscal and monetary policy of this government and this Minister of Finance is killing small business. The high interest rates, the high dollar, and the complicated GST is forcing large pools of capital from Germany and Japan to withdraw and go home.

At what point in time does the Minister of Finance start listening to small business, realize that they cannot operate in this environment and withdraw the GST?

Mr. Andre: Contempt for the House of Commons.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is saying that he is looking for leadership. I would suggest that he look within his own party for leadership.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Here we have Jean Chrétien back in January 1980: "I don't think this tax should be implemented". On March 5, 1990: "It would be irresponsible for Liberals to promise to scrap Ottawa's proposed GST without offering alternatives". September 27: "I want the tax dead".

Last weekend: "We'll repeal all taxes. There might be a GST. I don't know the result". I will give you some examples. He said service should never be taxed. Then he said: "Already, I am in the process of forming a committee to look at the alternatives." They are just starting now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It seems to me that on June 23, he said: "We have work to do". He waited four months to form a committee, to talk about what the alternatives might be. Here he is thinking of getting the Liberal senators in the other place to stop the GST. Where is the alternative? "We have work to do. I am thinking of forming a committee within the party to start to look at the alternatives".

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are looking for leadership. That is not leadership.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Finance. Once again, he puts a bunch of clips and quotes together. He knows that our leader has stated categorically that this tax will be undone when he is the prime minister of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mills: The Minister of Finance will not answer the question. He skirts the question. He diverges. Let us try a very simple question for the Minister of Finance.

The Small Businesses Loans Act, which could help small business in this country, needs reform. It is a policy initiative which everyone in this House agrees is a good policy initiative. When is he going to do something simple like trying to reform the Small Businesses Loans Act which can help that vital sector of our economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that John Chrétien is being absolutely categorical. I think that was the word he used, categorical. He said: "The GST will be on the table. There might be a GST, I don't know the result." Is that very categorical, Mr. Speaker? Or is it the same sort of cynical Liberal politics that in 1974 said: "We will not have wage and price controls". In 1975, what did we have? We had wage and price controls.

In January 1980: "We will not allow that 18-cent a gallon tax to go through". What did we have a few months later? Fifty, sixty, seventy cent-increase in the price of gas. Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of cynical—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. On September 20, I wrote to the Prime Minister requesting a full inquiry into the entire Kanesatake situation and related events at Kahnawake. On October 16 the Prime Minister said in this House, and I quote: "There is a motion to refer the whole matter to a parliamentary committee". Is the federal government content with doing nothing, or will the Deputy Prime Minister commit the government today to establishing a full federal inquiry into this summer's tragic events?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, there was a motion before this House which the government wished to have brought to a vote, but which the opposition did not wish to have brought to a vote, and would have referred the whole matter to a committee of the House.

The hon. member knows, and other members of this House know, since this government implemented the reform of the committee system, committees are the masters of their own fate in the House of Commons. They may establish at any time any mandate that they wish which they feel is in the interest of the Canadian public.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer is totally unacceptable. It is cowardly, it is not directed—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member does not want to use that kind of language. Would she please put her question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Withdraw.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell this House that a parliamentary inquiry is indeed justified and will be established? Will he quit beating around the bush?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the response that my colleague put forward to my question deserves an answer at this time, but I would wait until the end of Question Period to review what was said.

My colleague knows, as every member of this House knows, that it is within the power of every standing committee of the House of Commons to undertake work which they believe is important to the people of Canada.

I can inform the hon. member that if she would wish to bring that motion to a vote today, then I am sure there can be an arrangement between the House leaders respecting the motion that was put forward, which the government wished to bring to a vote but which the opposition parties did not wish to have brought to a vote. Maybe they would like to reconsider their opinion at this time.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As of 2.15 this afternoon the federal government still had not filed with the courts an injunction concerning the Rafferty–Alameda and the ongoing construction. As I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister knows, the Saskatchewan government is proceeding with construction around the clock. So far they have not started work on the downstream channelization on the Souris Basin site and they have not started work either on the Souris Basis reservoir, which would be the most damaging to the wildlife habitat. Why has it taken the government four days to attempt to seek an injunction? When will it file the proper papers with the courts in order to seek the injunction and will it ask the court to render an immediate decision?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, who is in Washington meeting with Mr. Reilly and other American officials on the goods news relating to the passage of amendments relating to the U.S. Clean Air Act, I am happy to have this opportunity to inform the House that lawyers representing the Government of Canada are in fact in court this afternoon in the process of serving and filing the documents in the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench with respect to the injunction which we announced last week we would be seeking.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am still concerned about the length of time it has taken. On May 2 of this year, I drew to the attention of the then minister of the environment the construction going on. At that particular time there were members of the panel who were threatening to resign from the panel. In fact, the minister of the day stated to me: "We are in the process of checking out what those activities are. If we find out that they are not justified for safety reasons, et cetera, we will step in and take the proper decisions". Why has it taken the government almost half a year to come to the conclusion that the Saskatchewan government has been breaking the agreement and why has it not attempted to stop the Saskatchewan government from doing the construction much earlier?

• (1440)

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, during the course of last week, members of both official parties were on their feet day after day, demanding that the government go to court to seek an injunction to stop the work in Saskatchewan. When we announced last week we would do that, the opposition parties somehow or other immediately decided that that was not what they were seeking. Today, when I announced in the House of Commons that we are in court this afternoon, again there is no support for that proposal. Instead, they go back into history to try to ignore the issue which they proposed last week.

Mr. Speaker, the true facts of the matter are that we are in court this afternoon. We are doing exactly what both opposition parties wanted last week. For once I think it would be helpful if they stood on their feet and supported us.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Will the minister tell the House and the Canadian people how the Persian Gulf task force operation is being financed? Is it out of the current operations and maintenance budget or is it from a separate funding arrangement?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. members knows, the Persian Gulf crisis was not something for which the government or any other government would have been able to plan.

The member asks whether it is from operations and maintenance or from a special fund. I can inform the hon. member that the resources needed to support the men and women in the Persian Gulf and to fulfil the commitment made by the Government of Canada to deter aggression and to enforce UN sanctions are being put forward. Resources will be available throughout the crisis, but at this time they come from the total budget of the Department of National Defence.

I can inform the hon. member that we are having discussions with colleagues at this time as to the impact of the Persian gulf crises upon our resources. Once again, I would like to assure the hon. member and other colleagues that the resources necessary, to ensure that the men and women who are serving Canada are able to serve it in a way which would make the risk acceptable, are in place at this time.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I ask the question because I fear we may be getting to have a negative impact on the operation, and this concerns me very much.

I had several telephone calls over the weekend. From the calls I understand that certain defence contracts have been terminated for lack of funding. As a result, weapons maintenance for the Persian Gulf force may be or will be impaired. Can the minister give the House the assurance that the Canadian task force in the Persian Gulf consistently gets the best support that money can buy?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the first part of the hon. member's question, if I could, because it is important.

There have been statements made in the press by a certain individual, Mr. Gerry Lanigan, which are totally inaccurate. The hon. member does not have to take my word for it, he can take the word of the president of Mr. Lanigan's company who has apologized for those statements and himself said that they are inaccurate.

I can assure the hon. member that we are providing the resources to do the job. We are trying our utmost to assure the people of Canada that the men and women who are serving and performing on behalf of the people of Canada are being provided the equipment that we can provide at this time regardless of the cost in dollars.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have information that the multinational force in the gulf region has approximately 27 ships and submarines which are equipped to launch between 375 to 500 nuclear missiles. Considering the serious risk of war and the state of tension in the gulf, would the minister take action through the United Nations to have the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the Soviet Union remove all nuclear weapons from the region immediately?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member as he normally does chose his words with care. He used the words "equipped to launch". He then made a logical leap to suggest that there was some intention to launch. He knows that is not the case.

He also knows that it is the policy of the Government of Canada, and indeed of the various governments that have come together in this remarkable show of opposition to the aggression of Iraq in Kuwait under the auspices of the United Nations, to act under those auspices as much as that is possible.

He will know that there are discussions going forward now to see if there is some way in which the United Nations mandate may be extended. He will also know that it is the hope of Canada and of the other countries involved that this matter will be resolved without the use of force and that Iraq will withdraw from its unacceptable invasion of a neighbour. We can then get on to the serious question relating to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons in the region, that is to try to have some means in which the stores of Iraq and those of other countries can be gradually controlled and eliminated.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows the awesome destructive power of nuclear weapons.

In those circumstances, would he not urge our allies in the gulf to pledge publicly a no use policy of all nuclear weapons in this conflict and remove whatever weapons are there immediately? Would he not do that?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has followed these issues for some time and is one of the genuine students in the House of procedures at the United Nations.

He knows that discussions in the Security Council now, which have so far yielded extraordinary consensus, are continuing with an eye to see if that consensus can be extended. I think that on reflection he would understand that a call by Canada or anyone else for some kind of unilateral action on nuclear weapons, on some nuclear weapons, because that is what he is talking about, could well have a counterproductive effect.

VARITY CORPORATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

As he knows, Ontario has used every cent of the $9.4 million in compensation that it received from Varity Corporation for the benefit of workers who are affected by plant closures in Ontario. Evidently the federal government has simply pocketed its $25 million share and put it into the general fund.

Why does this government not show the same sensitivity to the plight of workers as has the New Democratic Government of Ontario and allocate its share to the benefit of workers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to correct my friend. It was not $25 million but it was $15.6 million.

Second, my friend knows very well that the agreement we had regarding Varity with the Government of Ontario and Canadian Autoworkers was a global agreement within which there were four or five different parts that the Government of Ontario agreed with.

The $15 million, as all money used by the government, will be used in the best interests of the country. I will not give any guarantee that it will be automatically for or put into any kind of program which is determined in a specific way.

I would like to say again that it is a good deal. We believe that the Varity answers were good for the workers, for the country and for the Province of Ontario. I believe it is all everybody wanted, and it is what we reached.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite right. The federal government's share is $15 million out of $25 million.

This is a government that desperately needs to demonstrate that it is concerned about workers. I repeat my question: Why can't this government show the same sensitivity as the New Democratic Government of Ontario and earmark those funds specifically, which have been generated by the actions of Varity and which have affected workers, or delegate those funds specifically for the benefit of workers and not his corporate friends?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Ontario decided to use the money in the way it wanted to use the money. The Government of Canada could make another decision. It does not mean, as my hon. friend hinted, that it will not be done for the workers.

There are different means for the government to delegate money for workers and those companies. He is yelling at my friends from the business community. I think it is very helpful sometimes when those companies that my friend is yelling at for a little while could create jobs. I believe it is very good as an answer for the Government of Ontario. It is good for us too to use the money in the way we believe we can help Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Seven million Canadians are supposed to receive a cheque before the GST becomes effective. These cheques are supposed to reach them in December, before Christmas. Considering the fact that the Liberal senators and Jean Chrétien are continuing their obstructionist tactics to delay the coming into effect of the GST, will the minister nevertheless be able to send these cheques to Cana dians, or will there be an embargo on the cheques as long as the GST has not been adopted by the Senate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about the GST credit cheques. After royal assent, it should take about two or three weeks before the cheques can be sent to low-income Canadians so they will have them before Christmas. The Senate must adopt the bill as soon as possible.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. For several months, CN and VIA management in Montreal have been working together to phase out railway passenger transportation in the ridings of Abitibi, Roberval and Témiscamingue. Is the minister going to go so far as to accept the recommendations of these people who have no consideration for isolated areas?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor announced a special study to examine cost-benefit options for transportation for genuinely isolated communities. I am waiting for the results.

MANITOULIN AIR SERVICE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Manitoulin Air Service has announced that it will stop its regularly scheduled air service between Elliot Lake, Manitoulin Island, and Pearson International Airport, Toronto, November 1 because the government is imposing massive new landing fees amounting to $56,000 per year.

Why is the government destroying this vital air service between northern Ontario and Pearson International Airport in Toronto?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will realize that under deregulation there has been a great expansion in the number of routes over the past five years and in the number of flights taken; some 20 per cent in the north, I believe.

In the course of trying to operate our facilities as efficiently as possible, we have undertaken some cost recovery. The cost recovery which he speaks of is part of that program. It is happening all across Canada, in an effort to run the operation as efficiently as we can. For that reason there is cost recovery.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that good air service is vital to the economic survival and development of northern Ontario. In Elliot Lake we have already lost 2,400 jobs this year in the uranium mines. We want to diversify that economy.

In view of this need in northern Ontario, will he roll back these new landing fees and maintain this vital air service?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the people of Ontario and Quebec are interested in service. I can tell my hon. friend that service in Ontario and Quebec increased by 16 per cent over 1988. There is an increase of 24 per cent for non-jet weekly flights.

It is the function of cost recovery and user pay to operate the system as efficiently as possible. That is exactly what we are doing.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister and is with regard to the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson Airport.

Given that this government's airline policies of deregulation and privatization have been a dismal failure, why did the minister try to privatize the two terminals at our largest airport in the country only after three unsolicited private bids were deposited with this government rather than conduct a full public hearing process that would have truly determined if privatizing the terminals was in the benefit of the travelling public and the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know—and I am sure he did not mean intentionally to mislead the House or the public—that we are privatizing or turning over to private enterprise on a long-term lease basis the non-aviation services at Pearson Airport.

My hon. friend may think that it is the duty of the government to decide whether it should be five coffee shops or four. We happen to think private enterprise can do that job better.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

At his announcement last week in response to a question whether the private firms would protect the existing jobs, this minister said among other things, and I quote: "I am not in the business of saving jobs".

I ask the minister who is yelling and is agitated how he can allow himself to make such an irresponsible statement when there exists 14,000 Canadian jobs at those two terminals and following thousands of Canadians who have lost their jobs in the airline industry in the last two weeks alone.

Will the minister ensure the safety and security of these jobs rather than be glib? It is the same thing that they said to Air Canada employees: "Don't worry, be happy". Now there are 3,000 people who are not very happy.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said unquote. I am going to give him the whole quote. I said: "I am not in the business of saving jobs. I am in the business of creating opportunities". That is what I said.

You should have been there like the NDP critic. You should have been there. The NDP critic was there. Why weren't you?

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us talk jobs at Pearson. Why do you not ask me for the figures? There are 450 Transport Canada jobs at Pearson; 275 of them will stay with Transport Canada. My hon. friend is talking about 175 jobs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister promised the people of British Columbia that there would be a full public hearing into Alcan's Kemano completion project.

On October 12 cabinet passed an Order in Council exempting the Kemano project from public hearings and from environmental impact assessment. Why?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think, as the hon. member knows, there were indeed hearings set up by an independent panel of very distinguished citizens in Canada, including the president of UBC, Dr. Strangway, who is a significant scientist in his own right.

This panel held public hearings. It accumulated some 22 volumes of scientific evidence and came to the conclusion that the conservation and protection of the chinook fisheries resources of the Nechako River could be achieved by a program of mitigated measures. It came to the conclusion—and it is the conclusion of this government—that in fact the study which it had done was the equivalent of the EARP process.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The three lead federal scientists who looked into this project have now suggested publicly that there was political intervention by this government in relation to the decision on Alcan's Kemano project. Four ministers of fisheries in a row—James McGrath, Mr. Speaker, Romeo LeBlanc, and Pierre de Bane—all promised that there would be a full public inquiry and environmental impact evaluation of the project.

Why has there not been a full public inquiry and an environmental impact assessment of a project that will lower the Fraser River by three feet?

• (1500 )

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): First, if I recall correctly, and I stand to be corrected if the hon. member wishes to correct me, it is my understanding that he is on record as supporting the agreement when it was reached earlier on, about three years ago.

To address the question he has just raised, I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all members of this House that there is no basis whatsoever, according to information available to us, in respect of allegations respecting a cover-up. If the hon. member has such evidence or any other individual has such evidence, surely they have a responsibility to lay it before this House so it can be properly evaluated. But I would think it is passing strange to suggest that a panel of this nature, headed by such a distinguished British Columbian as the president of UBC could, in fact, be accused of such a cover-up.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for reconstruction and development.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the answer that the Deputy Prime Minister gave to my question regarding the federal inquiry into Oka, I want to request unanimous consent for a motion. My motion is seconded by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood and reads:

That the subject matter of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake during the summer of 1990 be referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, that of course, was part of the original motion which we were not able to bring to a vote when that was discussed. I wish the hon. member had raised this with me before moving the motion. As I indicated, the government, by having brought forward that motion, indicates that we are quite willing to have the subject matter go to committee. But as her House leader is often prone to tell me, "no surprises, no surprises; I don't like surprises".

But to show that I am able to react to surprises a little quicker than the hon. House leader of the opposition, we agree.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just to clarify the matter, the government House leader indicated that the original motion had that clause attached to it. I may be wrong, but my recollection is that it was to be referred to the justice committee, not the committee on aboriginal affairs. Perhaps I am wrong, but my understanding was that it was to be sent to the justice committee. I wonder if he could clarify that point.

Mr. Andre: You are right, that was the issue at stake. But as my colleague, the Minister of National Defence indicated today, the committees of this House are quite capable now, under parliamentary reform brought in by this government, of selecting their own subjects of study. So we have no particular problem in allowing to be done that which could be done anyway.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, is the government House leader indicating that as opposed to the policy of the Conservatives in the transport committee, he will actually let his members of the aboriginal affairs committee come to a committee meeting so that they can ask for that particular subject to be studied.

Mr. Andre: Just a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Again we have the New Democratic Party trying to impugn the motives of members of this side of the House, and I object.

Mr. Speaker: The motion before the House is that the subject matter of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake during the summer of 1990 be referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs. I take it that there is consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 95 of my constituents. They are from the Elliston, Duntara, Bonavista, Spillars Cove, Catalina, Little Catalina, Melrose, and the Port Union area.

These constituents are very concerned about the high unemployment rate in Newfoundland which is the highest in the country, and that they need 14 weeks, as it now stands, to qualify for unemployment insurance. They are not very happy with that. They want it reduced to 10 weeks by the variable entrance requirement, as has been done very year since 1976.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to introduce the variable entrance requirement without delay, but immediately—now.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of constituents from Clearwater, British Columbia, Logan Lake, British Columbia and Kamloops, British Columbia, who simply cannot believe that the government plans to impose a special tax on reading material, as a result of the goods and services tax decision.

They point out that in a democratic society, the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy and to tax it would make us the only country in the world that does so. They say forget that.

On another topic, Mr. Speaker, some of my constituents from Kamloops point out their opposition to the goods and services tax. After pointing out a whole set of reasons why they oppose the tax, they ask the government to reconsider proceeding with it, but to implement instead real fair tax reform.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): I have the honour to present four petitions from quite a number of people from the great riding of Vancouver East.

These people continue to say that they are opposed to the goods and services tax. They reject the current proposal of the government. They want reform of the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

The petitioners want to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on the sales tax measure, this reform will not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab. They want the government to cease with this proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty on behalf of citizens of Saskatoon—Humboldt and the area surrounding Saskatoon—Humboldt to present a couple of petitions which state categorically their opposition to the goods and services tax. They call upon the government to reject the tax now.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I am honoured to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of the constituents of my riding of Kent. The petitioners request that the government withdraw this despicable GST bill and axe the tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 36, I have two sets of petitions I would like to bring to your attention. The first is a petition which notes that the Government of Canada has introduced charges that will reduce homekeeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care.

These veterans also note that they have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by these measures. The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

• (1510)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): The second set of petitions, Mr. Speaker, relates to the GST on books. We are in receipt of hundreds of petitions which bring to our attention the fact that books have never been taxed in this country and that for the first time this government wants to apply the GST to magazines, books and newspapers. This is a very nefarious tax. It hits the printed word which is the cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society.

We will be celebrating Literacy Day next week. I call upon this government to reconsider this tax on reading, this tax on intellectual understanding of the society in which we live.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT ORDER NO. 16 AND ALL RELEVANT AMENDMENTS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): All summer long, Mr. Speaker, we wanted Parliament to be recalled to debate an important issue, namely the gulf crisis. On Monday, September 24, the Secretary of State introduced a motion. On September 27, my colleagues of the Official Opposition moved an amendment, and the New Democratic Party moved a sub-amendment. At 5.30 p.m. on Tuesday, October 16, the Parliamentary Secretary to the minister who is the Government House Leader rose to seek the unanimous consent of the House, saying 'I got it, I ask that the NDP sub-amendment and the Official Opposition amendment be withdrawn. The minister's absence notwithstanding, I move, with unanimous consent, that a new motion be introduced'. So much for that. Here is one small detail which is recorded on page 14251: I refused to give unanimous consent. On Wednesday, the 17th, debate got under way in good faith on the resolution of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and on the amendment of the Official Opposition as well as on the sub-amendment of the New Democratic Party. The debate went on in good faith on Thursday.

I had drafted two speeches. I appreciate my colleagues calling to commend me for the approach I took while defending my role as a French Canadian, and I said so in French. I did not get any negative response in Quebec. I spoke about international issues. That is the speech I wanted to make instead of the other one I intended to deliver and which is written. I have it here. That one would have hurt. The House gave its unanimous consent, that tonight at 1 a.m. or earlier whenever members have spoken the question will be put, it will be accepted and the division on the sub-amendment, the amendment and the resolution will take place tomorrow at 6 p.m. As a matter of fact, on October 9 the Minister of State for Youth had served notice that if the debate did not end he would eventually—and that is his right. He did not. But that is noted in the documents on which I worked throughout the weekend.

The debate ended Thursday night, in good faith. I went home at 4.30 Friday morning. The security staff will confirm that I went over the whole debate. They would not know whether I did, but they saw me leave my office after 4 a.m. I was satisfied that at last every member had been allowed to speak freely on a good resolution.

But on Friday the 19— You know, Mr. Speaker, I learned one thing from the hon. Claude Ryan and that is to tell the truth straight out. I can make mistakes, but I do not beat about the bush. So, between 10 and 10.30 a.m., in the absence of the people who could say otherwise, the same motion was put. This is, in essence, what was said: "Notwithstanding what has been agreed last night, unanimous consent is requested to withdraw the NDP's sub-amendment, the Official Opposition's amendment and the government's motion and to vote, next Tuesday, not on what the House has just discussed but on this new motion which was not debated."

The hon. members should read the excellent article Andrew Cohen wrote for the Financial Post on September 24, in which he said:

[English]

"Is combat role in the gulf best for Canada?"

[Translation]

That is what I wanted to talk about. But yet another sudden surprise prevented me from doing so.

[English]

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is an abuse of the parliamentary process. I would even say further that it is an abuse by consent.

I regret the hon. minister responsible for the House is not here. On May 24, during the abortion debate, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby tried a quick one, saying: "Let's withdraw the abortion debate." My good and esteemed friend, my good colleague and an honest man, the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, was taken by surprise. The government almost lost its abortion debate because of that kind of trickery.

What happened on May 25? I wish my colleague, once and for all, would read how outraged the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House was, as I am. He blasted the NDP for what they tried the night before. They cannot have it both ways.

Do hon. members want me to read it? I will quote, Mr. Speaker. I have been very succinct. I have worked night and day since Thursday night because I feel it is an insult to intelligence. It is not the way to conduct our affairs. We may disagree, esteemed colleagues, but let us do it in open. This is not the way to run parliamentary affairs.

The government is almost making me upset over having decided, with the greatest joy of my life, to run for this office on February 10, 1964. I still say my respect for this institution is growing every day. We do not want to bring what is going on in the Senate into this House. I know some senators will disagree, some friends and colleagues of mine. I do not wish to break all my friendships with everyone today, but this is not the way to conduct our affairs in this House.

Now, my young friend, the assistant leader, is having a lot of fun because he succeeded while someone was washing their hands on Friday and someone else was absent. Those who were interested were not here. He passed the motion that I disagreed with on Tuesday night.

I know some will say that the Liberals are fighting with each other during this debate. I am waiting for those would try to pick a quarrel with Liberals because that would not enhance the debate and that would not enhance the respect we should have for this House. How many times do I have to repeat that respect for this House, respect for the parliamentary process, and respect for our country?

[Translation]

That is right for our country, Canada, as I stated on Thursday evening. I said I was proud to be a French Canadian, which we are, and to be here for two main reasons. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that nobody was abusive toward me over the week end. Everyone who phoned me said: "It was a very interesting debate."

[English]

It was a very interesting debate. I have made my point. I do not want to go on, but I could, Mr. Speaker. I depend on you to give me guidance. I know that we can do anything by unanimous consent, but it is an abuse of the parliamentary process to proceed that way. It is an abuse by consent.

• (1520)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to rise to address this point because I also share the sense of deep concern expressed very eloquently by the member for Saint-Denis. I think it is important that we recognize the history of this matter.

On Tuesday, October 16, there was a suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, that a substitute motion to the motion that was then before the House dealing with the question of the crisis in the gulf should be put. At that time, the hon. member for Winnipeg—South Centre, speaking on behalf of the Official Opposition, and myself, speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party, agreed in good faith to that substitution. That agreement was predicated on one very important element.

As I stated in the House, as recorded at page 14250 of Hansard:

> I just wanted to underline the point made by the member for Winnipeg South Centre, as well, that it is certainly our understanding that this new motion would indeed be open to amendment as its predecessor was.

It was on the basis of that understanding and that understanding alone, that on Tuesday, October 16, we did agree to allow for a substitute motion to be put.

Without going into the reasons for this, that substitute motion was not put at that time. We continued debate on Thursday well into the evening, until nearly 10 p.m., debating the motion in its original form together with the amendment of the Official Opposition and the subamendment proposed by the New Democratic Party. That was the focus of the debate. I was present for the entire course of that debate.

That was also the basis for the decision to allow the vote to be deferred by agreement to Tuesday at 6 p.m. What was being deferred very clearly was the original motion, the amendment, and the subamendment. All members left the House on Thursday evening assuming that that was the end of the matter and that there would be a vote, in fact three votes, on Tuesday at 6 p.m.

At approximately 10.20 on Friday morning, things changed. With respect to my colleague from Saint-Denis, it is important to be very clear as to the basis for that change.

My colleague, the Whip for the New Democratic Party, was approached, not by the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader, but by a rather breathless deputy House leader of the Official Opposition, the member for Kingston and the Islands. That member urged my colleague, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, our Whip, that the House agree to the speedy withdrawal of the original motion which was before the House and, in turn, indicated that this was the subject of the earlier agreement. My colleague, the Whip, was not present during the earlier discussions and assumed, in good faith, that in fact there would be an opportunity, as had been agreed previously, to put the amendment. On that basis he agreed, as did the Whip of the Liberal Party. That was the basis for this substitution to which the hon. member for Saint-Denis refers.

When I learned of this, and I did not learn of it until some time after the decision was made, I immediately approached my colleagues, both the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader and my colleague and friend, the member for Kingston and the Islands. I pointed out to him that the earlier understanding had clearly been that there would be an opportunity to vote on the subamendment, which we had put before the House.

He indicated, and I appreciate his undertaking, certainly that was his understanding.

Mr. Milliken: No, I said I did no know.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the member for Kingston and the Islands indicated—and if I am misstating what he said, he can certainly rise in his place—but, during my conversation with him, it was my understanding that he indicated he was not aware of the fact that it had been agreed that the subamendment would be put as part of an earlier package. I think that is a fair summary of what the member has said.

I have subsequently discussed this matter again with the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader. He has indicated that he is in fact prepared to allow the subamendment to be put to the House. I would certainly hope, and I assume that the member for Saint-Denis would share my view, that the Official Opposition as well would agree to that which was in fact the original understanding.

The final point that I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker, is this. I did consult this morning first thing with the Deputy Clerk who was very helpful. She indicated that of course the House is the master of its own proceedings and, if the House wishes to proceed by unanimous consent, it can do so. I want to emphasize the profound danger of this approach when the House has agreed to defer a vote following debate on a particular item then, whether by unanimous consent or otherwise, to change the nature of that vote after debate has concluded is very dangerous. Again, I recognize that, while it may be procedurally in order, I would certainly hope that this is not something which will ever be repeated in the House again.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis, who is one of the most senior members here, has risen on a matter and is supported by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on matter which I think is very serious indeed. I think it is serious because debate took place on a motion, the vote was deferred and hon. members expected to be voting on the motion that was debated. For reasons that we do not need to go into, by consent, the motion was changed. That means that hon. members will go to vote on a different motion than that which was debated. I very much regret this.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis has said that an abuse of Parliament by consent is just as much an abuse. We are at a time when the country is watching this institution very closely. Much of what the country sees, it is not happy with. All of us are going to have to make a much greater effort to give an example that is in keeping with the great traditions of this place, in keeping with the history of it, and in keeping with what I think most of us want this place to be in the hearts and minds of Canadians.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway has stated correctly that the House can by consent do what it wishes. The reason that that is so is because ultimately this is the place where the people of Canada have sent all of us to do what we think is in the best interest of the country. If the House agrees and there is consent, then no matter what other rules we may have or whatever customs we may have, we can abridge those to do what the whole House consents to do.

There may have been, and there may well be, sound reasons under the circumstances where it was felt by some that it may have been in the national interest to change the motion. I do not want to get into that side of the debate. What I have to say to hon. members is that, in my view, what happened was improper and an abuse. I am not in a position to change it, but I view it as a very serious matter. However, I want members to know, and I want the public to know, that it was done by consent and we are now all bound by it. I would hope that not again for a long, long time, if ever, would hon. members, such as the hon. member for Saint-Denis, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, or others, have to rise to complain about an event which, while procedurally proper because of the consent, in my opinion, ought not to have happened.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. You rose, and I simply wanted to comment on what the Chair and my colleagues just said.

Friday, unfortunately, I was in the House as well. I was called to the telephone, so I had to leave for a few minutes. However, I must admit we had been told the same vote would be taken Tuesday on the amendment, the sub-amendment and the main motion. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the House made its decision and I also understand your comments. I feel it is inappropriate for the House to proceed in this manner, and I wish we could reconsider.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have other points of order. I am aware of them and will deal with them as I can. I think in deference to the hon. member for Calgary West and maybe another member, we should proceed.

PRIVILEGE

HOUSE LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the point of order just concluded is of some interest to me, both in the fact that it was argued before the question of privilege and that it would indicate your personal sense of importance about it. Your comments in conclusion are in reality a reflection on the leadership of the House that was present on Friday and the leadership of the House officers charged with certain responsibilities in the Chamber which, in part at least, is an essential element of the question of privilege about which I wish to speak.

I want to say thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your good offices in bringing the hon. member for Kamloops and myself together for close to one and a half hours just prior to the commencement of Question Period.

The meeting came to no conclusions other than the conclusion that we could share with the House so that all members would be aware that we had met and met under your auspices, seeking perhaps, Mr. Speaker, to reach a solution to the considerable tension between us.

As we are both House officers in this place and both members of the Board of Internal Economy, I as chief government Whip and he as House leader for the New Democratic Party, it does not serve this institution well for that level of tension to continue. It does not facilitate our responsibilities in terms of the Board of Internal Economy and our responsibilities to govern the House in terms of its budgets, facilities, and so on and does not serve us well to have this level of tension between us in terms of ordering the business of the House, which is part of our daily existence.

I would like to signal at this time that, provided my right to continue this point of privilege is protected, I would be willing to continue with the hon. member for Kamloops, under your auspices, a series of discussions to see if we could resolve most, if not all, of the matters that lie between us in what might be the best interests of the House, its management and the importance of this democratic institution. It would have to be done on the understanding that the both of us would cease talking to the press in the interim until we had either agreed to disagree once again in public, or to agree that we could resolve the issue and are prepared to share with the House and the Canadian people the results of that resolution.

That would be sort of the one precondition. I have tried to be patient for close to 10 days now on what I take to be some very important matters. I have not always succeeded. I have talked to some press people in the interval. Maybe when I hear some of those words reported back to me I will not feel as good about saying them as I did when I said them in the heat of anger and in the heat of the moment.

I felt a deep sense of anger on October 11 because I felt we had reached collectively such a firm understanding and such an important understanding about dealing with something very important.

When we open the Parliament of Canada Act, it is the one piece of legislation that in statute form sets us all apart from everybody else in society. It is a piece of legislation that deals only with the Parliament of Canada and the parliamentarians who serve either in the Senate or in the House.

We are unavoidably and inescapably involved in a question of conflict of interest from the moment we start until the moment we conclude our business. Those of us who serve on an actual committee, given that responsibility on behalf of the other members of the Chamber, feel that pressure more perhaps than do all members.

In the final analysis, we have to vote in an atmosphere where we have that conflict because the act itself determines how we are to be governed. The act itself talks about our financial compensation, our use of resources and all of these things.

It is something that I felt we had collectively agreed to work on collectively, which is a slow process. Sometimes if governments are supposed to be responsible for something, they can do it more quickly. When we are trying to reach 100 per cent consensus in this place with 295 potential people in the House of Commons and ultimately with the Senate on something as central to our existence as that act and its relationship to the reputation of our institution, it is something we should be very careful about making comments.

These are comments which any of us believe to be untrue, on any side of this House, and which reflect discredit on individuals and ultimately on this institution. In that atmosphere, they are very serious indeed.

If the delay in arguing this question of privilege could perhaps accomplish a return to the tracks of all the members of this House in bringing about a successful resolution of these matters on behalf of the Canadian people in this democratic institution, I for one am prepared to be a little patient, provided that the war does not continue either inside or outside the Chamber, in terms of talking about it, until we have either agreed to disagree or agreed that we have something to agree to.

I would just like a response to that. Mr. Speaker, if you are willing to have an answer to that and if there is a preference to proceed at this time, I am quite prepared to do that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain what the hon. member for Calgary West was referring to in a number of those questions, but I want to make very clear that regarding the opening of the Parliament of Canada Act in an effort to resolve some concerns that members and other have, we have indicated from the very beginning an interest in co-operating as much as humanly possible and working together as a team in an effort to resolve this issue.

I want to say that at this moment, that same motive exists and hopefully will exist into the future. I have discussed this matter in the last hour with our one representative on the committee, and I can only say that he indicated an enthusiasm in continuing working in a co-operative effort to resolve what is obviously a concern of members of Parliament in a way that we can all support, hopefully a consensus of agreement, and that is our goal.

I want to preface my remarks by saying that at the outset. Also, I want to say that over the past number of days my friend, the member for Calgary West, has made a series of allegations and has claimed that my behaviour personally has infringed on his privileges as a member of Parliament. He has condemned me both on the record in the House as well as in the committee.

• (1540 )

With the indulgence of the Chair, I would like to reply to at least some of his comments in the following way.

I think it is only fair that having heard from my hon. friend, the government Whip, for nearly half an hour of House time, that I be permitted at least a few moments to respond to the allegations that he has made. I will briefly summarize my understanding of the hon. member's concerns and I would like to address each of them briefly, yet separately.

If the hon. member for Calgary West or any other members of the House have other concerns or charges they wish to make, I will deal with them afterward, but I hope there will come a time when the members of the government front bench cease from this and, in fact, to reflect his own words, that we develop a sense of civility once known in this House and get on with the business of the country as people expect us to do.

The member for Calgary West made the following allegations: He said that I infringed the privileges of other members of this House when I criticized the committee report on Bill C-79, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, before the report had been made to the House.

He also said that I made a series of false statements concerning this bill. Among those allegedly false statements were the following: The member said that I was wrong in saying that the government used its majority in committee to reject the opposition amendments to sections 52.8 of Bill C-59. That particular section, Mr. Speaker, is something that has been called the tip-off clause. It says: "No criminal process may be applied for, issued or proceeded with unless the applicant for the criminal process has requested and obtained from the board an opinion concerning the use on which the offence is based".

The government Whip also said I infringed his privileges or was contemptuous of—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Calgary West wants to say something about keeping the record straight. I will hear him very briefly.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, if we are entering into the points of privilege which I intend to raise, I caution the House that I think it is my right to raise those first.

On the specific point for which I interrupted, I have attended many legislative committees on clause-by-clause review of bills. The clause is a great deal larger than the part of the quote that was just read into the record. For instance, the clause as he read it was the committee's clause of the fourth report which the House endorsed unanimously, including the House leader of the New Democratic Party. But Bill C-79, when it came back from cabinet had a definitional section of that clause which restricted the words "criminal process' to what in effect are court processes and have nothing to do with investigations, but simply with evidence that must be provided before a court. Those courts are in place in our criminal process to protect all of us from the potential abuse of police authority.

If the hon. member wants at this point to enter a part of that total clause on the record, I think we should, to make sure there is no misunderstanding, put the total clause on the record, including that part of the clause that restricts the words "criminal process" in statute form, to what are in effect six court processes. I am sure his former justice critic sitting behind him would know that they are viewed in our kind of society as essential protections for individuals.

Partial information to the Chamber is not going to be helpful in resolving this issue because it may be in fact the source of the difficulty. It should be complete information, Mr. Speaker, if you are allowing him to head in that direction.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can help the two hon. members whom I think are trying to help the Chair. The hon. member for Calgary West has made a tentative suggestion or offer that these differences could be discussed further, after the discussion that took place today in my chambers.

The hon. member for Calgary West has tried to indicate that perhaps some of the things he said, if he had to say them over again, might be said in a different way.

The hon. member for Kamloops in responding is, I think, trying to make clear to his colleagues and to the House that among a number of specific things that were said, he stands in disagreement. I am not sure that we necessarily need to be debating the sections of the bill here.

If it would help in clarification, perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops, if he agrees with the information which the hon. member for Calgary West just gave to the House, could accept that as part of the factual presentation. Of course I am going to let the hon. member for Kamloops proceed at least for a few more minutes. I hope that he would be able without going on too long to meet, for my information, the suggestion that the hon. member for Calgary West has put forward.

I should make it very clear that while I attended a meeting with both hon. members this morning, it was a lengthy meeting, that meeting was asked for by one of the members. If I can be helpful, I would be more than prepared to carry on attending a continuation of that meeting in the interests of resolving these difficulties, as the hon. member for Kamloops said and others have said, in a civil way.

I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops for a few minutes so that I can get a sense of where it is going. I will come back to the member for Calgary West. If there cannot be some arrangement to continue the discussions, a continuation might be helpful. The hon. member for Calgary West has all his rights under his question of privilege.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think your intervention is appropriate. I read from both the committee report and the proposed legislation. I accept in part what the hon. member for Calgary West has indicated, but only in part. Obviously there are obvious areas of either disagreement or areas requiring further clarification. I do not think this is the place to get into the nuances of Bill C-79. We have a committee that is struck especially for that purpose. It has done an incredible amount of work to date. I hope that that committee will continue in that same spirit.

Considering some of the allegations my hon. friend has levied at me, I feel some obligation on behalf of my constituents to respond. I plan to do that briefly and concisely. I will simply leave the continuation of a comment on section 52.8.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt. Could the hon. member provide us with his reference for those allegations? Some of them that he has mentioned so far are in my question of privilege which I have not delivered yet. I am not sure where the allegations have been made. It may be that I did make them on radio or in some other place. If he could do the courtesy of letting me know where I made those allegations so that I could look at the full text, I would appreciate it.

Mr. Speaker: It might help the Chair and the House if the hon. member for Kamloops were to summarize what he thinks is the gist of the allegations and express what I am sure he is going to express, that is that he is in disagreement with the hon. member for Calgary West with respect to those.

That is quite obvious to all of us. I certainly will allow him to get that on the record. If there is going to be some further discussion with the idea of trying to resolve this in a careful way, I do not know how much need there is to be absolutely specific. I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, to help my hon. friend, on October 12 he spoke for about a quarter of an hour about the various allegations. It is from that source in Hansard where I take most of my comments in terms of his utterances. I do not know if he made other comments publicly or not.

I will simply say that the Whip in those proceedings suggested I infringed his privileges or was contemptuous of the House when I said that: "The government insisted on that clause in response to pressure from its Quebec caucus." Similarly, he objects to the statement attributed to me in the press that the majority of politicians who are the subject of the investigations which prompted the introduction of Bill C-79 came from the province of Quebec.

The member for Calgary West also alleges that I have established a consistent pattern of undermining the work of the Board of Internal Economy by speaking publicly about matters which are the subject of discussion in the board. At the outset, I would like to comment that the Bill C-79 committee met and made its decision in public. The committee has yet to report to the House. For the member to suggest that we should refrain from commenting on the committee's deliberations until a transcript is published and the bill is reported to the House demonstrates what I suspect is a lack of respect for the public comment on these important public issues.

Let me first deal with his allegation that I am wrong in saying that the government has a majority on the special committee on the review of the Parliament of Canada Act. What was reported in The Kamloops Daily News was that "The Conservatives have with the Bloc Quebecois voted to place MPs above the law". That is essentially what I was saying. Mr. Fife, in The Ottawa Sun, reported: "Riis attacked the Tories yesterday for using their majority on a Commons committee".

What was alleged was that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Calgary West, said in the House on Friday, October 12, as reported at page 14106 of Hansard, and I quote:

> He says things that are simply not true.

> There is a reference in one article—that came out of the paper yesterday about the government having a majority on the committee. The government does not. People who are not supporters of the government represent four votes on the committee and supporters of the government represent three.

The fact is that the committee was struck with eight members, five representing the government, two from the Official Opposition, and one from the New Democratic Party. Because one of the members on the committee now defected from the government ranks and now sits as an independent, the current membership list shows that four members of the committee are Conservative caucus members. Four of the eight may not be a majority, in the Whip's eyes, but it certainly is no minority. I would suggest that in fact the government still controls five seats on that committee and that the independent member holds a seat at the pleasure of the government Whip. After all, as is well known, it is the Whips who have the power to send in a form and replace any member of a legislative or special committee.

I would suggest that the Speaker may rule that the government Whip could replace the member who was on the committee with the simple stroke of a pen; but he need not because in this instance that member supported the government. In this case the government most certainly had an effective majority of the committee.

The government Whip's next allegation is equally easily dispensed with. He says that I impugned the government by saying that it insisted on this version of Bill C-79, in response to pressure from its Quebec caucus. In fact his exact words taken from Hansard of October 12, at page 14107, are and I quote:

> —the member says things about the motivation of members who cast a ballot in committee—
> For the member for Kamloops to be out and about impugning the motivation of the members of this committee, the officers of this House, is a dastardly deed.

What was reported, Mr. Speaker, in The Ottawa Citizen of October 11, 1990 was, and I quote: "The NDP Whip charged that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney had insisted on the clause requiring the RCMP to check before beginning investigations on the Hill in order to try to keep his Quebec caucus intact, earlier this year".

The facts are as follows: it was widely reported earlier this year that the pressure for this bill was coming from the Quebec caucus of the Conservative Party. I have a series of press clippings, copies of which I will send over to my hon. colleagues if they are interested, which demonstrate the wide coverage of the special interest of the Quebec caucus in this measure.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to clarify. Is the hon. member up on his own question of privilege or is he responding to certain allegations which have been alleged to have been made by a member opposite? I am just not certain that I am following.

I thought the hon. member was going to raise a question of privilege. I did not hear his case but now I hear, I think, a rebuttal. It is uncertain for me as to what the procedure is here. In view of comments that have been made maybe it is well in order for the hon. member to be proceeding, but I am at a loss; I do not know. Is this a reverse question of privilege or what is it?

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Calgary West in a moment.

The hon. member for Calgary West has in effect put a suggestion forward. The hon. member for Kamloops is tending to respond, seriatim, to a number of statements which he says the hon. member for Calgary West has made. I can understand that, but the difficulty we are getting into, to which I think the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is alluding, is that we still have an unfinished argument by the hon. member for Calgary West. The question of privilege which is before the House is the question of privilege of the hon. member for Calgary West. The hon. member for Kamloops has not filed a cross question of privilege, although he might deal with his own objections and concerns in the argument as he is already doing.

I do not want to cut off the hon. member for Kamloops if there is any hope at all of having further discussions between the two hon. members. My worry is that the longer we go on maybe the chance or possibility of the two hon. members being able to work out their differences, or at least some of them, and with dignity being able to let us know where it is not possible to work out some other differences may diminish if we get into too much debate at this time.

I am wondering if at this time in order to keep the procedure tidy—and I am indebted to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for raising the point; it has been concerning me for the last few minutes—the hon. member for Kamloops could give the Chair any indication as to whether and under what circumstances he might be able to postpone this matter in the Chamber and carry on the discussions which commenced this morning.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond raised an interesting point. I was beginning to wonder whether or not I was beginning to initiate my own question of privilege in terms of the personal attacks that the government Whip had made on October 12; I suppose in a sense a reverse question of privilege. I do not want to pursue that.

My point was simply to respond to some of the very personal attacks that I had experienced coming from, to be precise, the government Whip, the hon. member for Calgary West.

We have had discussion. We have two opportunities. Presumably, in the personal attacks by my hon. friend, he had not finished those. We are at a point where we can continue to hear those personal attacks and allow me to respond in total as opposed to only part of them, which I was attempting to do now, or set aside these personal attacks. I do want to respond to the personal attacks at some point.

The other matter concerning Bill C-79 is relatively straightforward. I think all parties have indicated an interest to pursue it and resolve it as quickly as possible. What I am talking about, just on a very personal level, is that these are not attacks against the New Democratic Party or against the opposition. They were personal attacks against myself, levied by a single person from the government benches.

I simply want a right at some point to respond in some detail to what I call another disgusting performance. If the hon. member wants to continue with that performance now, he can do so. If he wants to set it aside while we maybe discuss some aspects of Bill C-79, I am quite prepared to do that; but I do want an opportunity, either now or later in the day after further attacks or at some later date, at least to respond to the allegations the hon. member has made of me.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, what I am after in my question of privilege is the referral of the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a report back to the House, because I think the attacks on members of the committee themselves, including myself, made by the member for Kamloops about Tory members and cabinet generally are of a nature that they pass well beyond the bounds of reasonable criticism, that they are indeed false, and that they indeed bring damage to the reputation of individuals, to members of the House, and to the House itself.

I would be quite happy to give you the assurance, Mr. Speaker, that members on this side of the House would give unanimous consent for such a motion to be moved and the subject matter sent to the committee, including, if he likes, a subset on the supposed slanderous behaviour of the chief government Whip, myself, in relationship to personal attacks on the member.

I am quite willing to have a committee of my peers examine my comments, each and every single one of them, within the context of a total evidentiary picture to determine whether those comments were justified or were not justified. I think people out there in the community would have some difficulty following what are supposed to be my allegations without page numbers and episodes in Hansard and so on.

• (1600)

The question of privilege I wish to bring forward is reasonably well documented in terms of exact pieces of paper, which I will put in your possession showing exact pages and exact procedural documents and so on. I do not think that this is the kind of an issue, given the importance of the subject matter and its implications for the reputation of this institution, where we can get by with sloppy research and sloppy half truths.

Sitting here listening to it, I throw out for consideration the possibility of unanimous consent but I am nervous about it. Perhaps in the next half hour we could agree on a motion to refer the matter to committee involving the independents in the House and the leadership of the Liberal Party. Maybe we could bring forward a motion that we refer the subject matter of this entire problem to that committee. I would think members on my side of the House would be willing to support that, even though I have given up the opportunity to lay the whole matter out before the Canadian public in Hansard in some detail.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to pre-judge the decision that you may make or this House may make in terms of the appropriateness of sending any matter to committee for further discussion.

I would wish to point out to you, Sir, that it would be totally unfair for such a matter to be referred out of this House until my House leader, the hon. member for Kamloops, has had an opportunity to at least take as much House time in responding as the government Whip did in attacking him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has made an offer. That offer amounts to simply this, that we adjourn this discussion with all rights retained and the hon. members go away, or come to my chambers, and continue the discussion of this morning.

It is not for me to tell hon. members what to do, but it might be helpful. It would be done on the basis that both the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Kamloops return to this Chamber if they cannot agree on some sort of accommodation between them.

There are really two issues here. One is the question of Bill C-79 and the work of that committee. The other is the general complaint by the member for Calgary West that there are times and places in the working of this House where hon. members have to be very careful what they say because of information which they may have gathered in either confidential or quasi-confidential places.

It seems to me not particularly helpful to debate Bill C-79 this afternoon unless it is only mentioned in order to support or to refute the question of privilege. But there is here a matter of importance to the House, to both the hon. members, and to probably other hon. members. There are two ways to proceed now.

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could continue and I will certainly hear the hon. member.

There may be three ways to proceed at this moment. One, we can continue the question of privilege. To do that I would, of course, go back to the hon. member for Calgary West. The second is to pick up the offer and adjourn the matter with all rights retained and to have some discussion to see if some resolution in a civil way could be reached. The third is the possibility that if the House wished, by consent, to put the whole matter over to a committee, at which place the matter could be pursued in front of a—if I could put it this way—a committee of the peers of the two members.

That is where we are. I of course want to be helpful if I can.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion or the offer made by the hon. member for Calgary West is a reasoned one, as are the comments which have been made with, I believe, genuine sincerity by the House leader of the New Democratic Party, both on the substance with regards to Bill C-79, as well as comments which he alleges have been referred to him personally, I think are serious and require either some airing at some point or after an adjudication.

But perhaps the musings of the Speaker may be appropriate in resolving this matter. Further discussions should take place with the caveat clearly understood by the hon. member for Calgary West, as well as the the House leader for the New Democratic Party, that all the rights are retained so that if they wish to pursue other courses of action on the completion of their discussion, they would have that right.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of not only those hon. members but in the interest of the institution which is so important to us all, that we would want to proceed with caution and reason. We would like to have an airing of the matter in a way which is tasteful to all individuals, making certain that their rights in this institution are not infringed upon in any way.

Your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that the matter be adjourned for further discussions with you in your chamber, from my perspective as a deputy House leader of this party, may be the fairest way to proceed at this time.

I take no issue with any of the sentiments which have been expressed by the House leader of the New Democratic Party, or the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I want to be fairly brief, but I do want to make a few points at this time with regard to the suggestion made by the member for Calgary West and reiterated as one of the possibilities to which you yourself alluded. That is that the matter not be judged by you at this time, and then possibly sent to a committee, but that it be sent to a committee directly.

I think that before any member of this House chooses that route, they should consider what we are dealing with at the present time. We have a number of charges that were half made by the chief government Whip since October 12, both in this House on more than one occasion, but also in front of the committee. I understand charges were made at times when the member for Kamloops, the House leader of the New Democratic, was not here.

The problem is if we send this matter to the committee, this committee has a Conservative majority. The Conservative majority is appointed by the government Whip. Substitution in many ways is the responsibility of that same Whip. Permanent membership on that committee is the responsibility of that Whip.

Other privileges of the Conservative members on that committee, whether it is trips abroad or other assignments, is the responsibility of that Whip. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, without making any reference to the motivation of the chief government Whip, that this particular committee would not be perceived in any way, shape or form as an impartial panel that would listen to both members and be perceived by the public, or anybody else, as a body that could truly, impartially judge the facts, the motivations and the activities of the two members.

On that point, I do not believe that this is an option by which any member in this House can abide. I believe that it is possible for the two members to resolve some of their differences outside this Chamber and I think that that might be the approach that should be followed.

I think all of us have learned a lesson on what has happened since October 12 on this issue. I think this is an important lesson because the whole purpose of the Special Committee on the Parliament of Canada Act was to make sure that members did not find their names out in public, allegations made without them having a chance to defend themselves or without people understanding what the rules and regulations of the House of Commons are.

What I find interesting is that we seem to be going through that same exercise within the House as a result of our procedures and because the member for Kamloops had business elsewhere. We had on a continuous basis from October 12 until last Thursday the chief government Whip getting up in this House or in committee and starting on his process of making charges and always ending by saying, "But I won't raise those issues here. I will deal with them when the member gets back".

However, the damage was done. The charges were, if not made, at least alluded to. There was some damage done to the reputation of the member for Kamloops. That member has never had an opportunity in the House or in the committee to respond. That is the problem. To say, "Let us have peace now, the member for Kamloops should keep quiet, should not go to the press and we will resolve this outside the Chamber or inside the Speaker's office or by getting together over a beer" does not resolve the problem in many ways. The allegations were made.

It is like charging someone, a member of this House, with misspending his budget, or saying he has hired his own relations or friends of his family for jobs that should not be done. Once the charge is made, the damage is done.

I think that if the chief government Whip considers what he has said in this House about the member for Kamloops, what he has said in the committee about the member for Kamloops, he would recognize that he has engaged in the same sort of exercise that the committee was established in the first place to try to prevent.

I am quite willing to see the two members go out and see if they can resolve the issue quietly, but at the same time I think it is a lesson for all of us that if we are going to get up here and make charges against one of our fellow members, then we should at least expect those people to have the right to reply.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, we may be getting somewhere. I accept totally the comment that once the charge is made, the damage is done. Forty-five minutes after the committee meeting on October 10, charges were starting to be made about my behaviour and the behaviour of my colleagues and the damage was done. They were printed on October 11.

In this House in an S. O. 31 on October 11 charges were made and the damage was done. The charges are false. I believe they were known to be false but some rhetoric crept in, that people can use rhetoric in this place—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Can I say something? We may be able to find a way to resolve this but I would urge that we do not make more charges at least while we are discussing what we are going to do with this thing. The hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it might be helpful to us if you were to rise and say that you asked me to delay because I felt that as a charge, that I had asked for delay for the last 10 days. In fact, I think I was starting to present my question of privilege and you rose, and the record will show that the Speaker of the House asked me to delay until the member for Kamloops returned. I think the record will show that the Speaker asked to be notified when the member for Kamloops could be here. The record will show that I rose daily to ask if we had had word and I did acknowledge that, in a corridor I had heard from one staff person that the member for Kamloops would be in Ottawa probably late Thursday evening, but tried to get it on the record so that I could prepare and plan to be present. This is what has been happening.

I want to assure the House that if this item is referred to committee, I will have nothing to do with the choice of committee members. To believe that I would be involved in a conflict of interest of that kind, that I had a hand in the picking of the jurors, if you like, of a trial in which I was involved, is really to provide you, Mr. Speaker, with concrete proof that these allegations that are floating around are interfering with my capacity to serve my functions on behalf of this Chamber.

The very fact that it was raised on the floor that I, as chief government whip—and it was raised earlier in a different context—could have substituted somebody on the special parliamentary committee, and I chose not to because it has never been the intention of the government to dominate the committee. It has always been the intention to try to achieve 100 per cent consensus on everything that we have done for months.

To raise the issue that I, as chief government whip—and the context in which it was raised is essentially threatening the independent member—will, if they do not behave and vote the way I want them to vote, replace them is the context. There is a totally different construction. This is that I, as whip, had an opportunity to make sure that the government dominated the committee and I had not taken that opportunity.

It is a committee which agreed to function in a non-partisan fashion. When one leaves a non-partisan meeting and there is a press conference 45 minutes later slamming part of that consensus, one is in trouble.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is helping by continually repeating the very thing that has caused a lot of the anguish here.

The hon. member has risen and said that he ought not to be accused of attacking a committee. I do not think that is really the issue that I have in front of me.

I might say so that members understand, on a question of privilege, after there has been debate, it is for the Speaker to decide not the final issue, but only if there is a prima facie case. Then, if the Speaker decides there is a prima facie case, the matter goes to the House, this Chamber, and the matter can be debated and can be debated for a long time. Eventually, the House decides whether it goes to committee. When it then gets to committee—and what the House has then said is it thinks there is enough reason to put it into a committee—the whole matter will be heard by committee members and the committee will finally make up its mind. That is where the final decision is made.

In any of these questions of privilege, if I decide it is a prima facie case and if the House decides that it go to committee, those committees are invariably lopsided in the sense that a majority will come from the government side because that is just the nature of the thing. One would have to hope that, whether or not the committee has a majority on the government side, they would understand that they are sitting in judgment of their peers and would behave accordingly. That is what one would hope they would do.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am sure if anyone is watching this performance or is listening in on this, it must confirm every suspicion they have ever had about this place. Here we are, hour after hour, costing taxpayers unbelievable amounts of money, and I do not know if we have made any progress at all. But, let us try to resolve this.

First, I will say there is no question that in terms of dealing with this piece of legislation, the Parliament of Canada Act and revisions to it, Bill C-79, I have heard time and time again that we all want to resolve it, so let us get on and resolve it. I pledge on behalf of my colleagues a willingness and a keenness to do that. We will get on with it. The same from the Official Opposition, and I suspect from the government benches as well. So, let us set that aside. We will deal with that as expeditiously and as quickly as possible. It is a difficult task, and it is already in process, I understand.

The other matter is these personal accusations. I never referred to my hon. friend from Calgary West, as a matter of fact, I did not even know the name of his riding, so I could not have done that very well. I had concerns about what appeared to be what the Conservatives are doing on a committee. Those are my public comments, the Conservatives on the committee. It was not non-political or non-partisan, the overwhelming majority were Conservatives, some Liberals, and other New Democrats.

Mr. Hawkes: That's not true.

Mr. Riis: Well, Mr. Speaker, in other words, the parties were not equally represented. The largest group was from the Conservative Party. So, I presume that is why I said it seemed like the Conservatives were doing this because the two of the three opposition parties were working together.

• (1620 )

Set that aside, Mr. Speaker. Surely to goodness we can deal with that.

On the other matter of personal attacks, all I said is that I want an opportunity to respond to what I perceive to be personal attacks in terms of my integrity in my work as a member of Parliament, in the House, in committee, and beyond.

Let us drop this, Mr. Speaker. If my hon. friend wishes to retract the allegations, we will leave it and get on with the matter of C-79. If he does not want to retract what are personal attacks, then I do not see any way around it. He must go on and make the accusations, and I will respond, and then in your judgment you will decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. If you do, then it goes on to a vote; if you do not, that is the end of it.

I appeal to my hon. friend. For people watching this, what are they thinking? For people who have to sit through attacks and counter-attacks back and forth, is this what the House of Commons has become? I appeal to my hon. friend. Simply withdraw the allegations to allow us to get on to do the work that, as members of Parliament, we were elected to do.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am searching for the allegations the member made in the House on October 11, and I want to ask him if he will withdraw those first. Can I read them, Mr. Speaker, so that all Canadians can understand them?

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I will hear them if I have to.

Both members, of course, could rise in the House and say that, if anything they said has caused distress to the other and are unfair allegations, they would wish that they were withdrawn and that they will get on with the business of trying to work together, as in fact they have to do given their positions on committees and on the Board of Internal Economy. That would resolve the matter. It would not be that difficult, but it is not for me to say what hon. members are prepared to do.

In the interest of not tearing this place apart hour after hour with allegations and cross-allegations, denunciations, and other things, that is clearly an option. It might be the most sensible thing to do, but that is up to both hon. members and their colleagues.

In the meantime, I am getting to the point where I feel that the tentative offer of the member for Calgary West is not being acted upon for whatever reason at the moment and to discuss whether or not that offer could be taken up, which is simply to adjourn this matter for the moment, with all rights reserved, and the two hon. members meet again either in the Speaker's Chambers or by themselves, to see if there is some honourable way to resolve this.

That is the issue that I want answered and, if it is not possible to do that, then I think both hon. members will have to say it is not possible. We will then revert to the question of privilege and we will probably have to listen to a great deal of debate on who said what to whom and about whom, but that is what happens in questions of privilege. Ultimately, I will have to decide whether there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege. If I do, I put it to the House as I said. If the House agrees, it sends it to committee. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the spirit of your suggestions, let me respond to what I think was an offer by my hon. friend the government Whip and hon. member for Calgary West. He referred to a statement I made in the House and some comments I made in that statement. He suggested that if I would consider withdrawing those comments, that he would then consider withdrawing the allegations he made against me personally.

Let me read this, Mr. Speaker, and then I have a comment I would like to make. I think it is worth repeating.

> Mr. Speaker, this morning Canadians awoke to the news that Conservatives want to be above the law. Yesterday—

An hon. member: No.

An hon. member: You're just throwing gas on the fire.

Mr. Riis: I'm coming to a resolution, Mr. Speaker.

> Yesterday the Tories used their majority muscle in a legislative committee to force through changes in the law which govern MPs and Senators. They want to be tipped off to any RCMP criminal investigations into their parliamentary affairs.
>
> In other words, the Conservatives are creating a two-tiered justice system—one level for Tory MPs and another for ordinary Canadians.
>
> Earlier this year, the Minister of Justice said there could only be one law for Canadians. She told the House: "We cannot pick and choose when we want to apply the law and we cannot pick and choose which laws we want to obey". A few weeks later her colleagues are looking for special laws for Tory MPs.
> There seem to be—

Well, it goes on and on.

If it will facilitate resolving this issue, I will withdraw these comments.

Mr. Hawkes: I will withdraw any one of the comments I made that he would like me to withdraw, then we could move to the next one. There is a series that occurred outside the House that is equal or of more concern in terms of accusations. That is what I thought if we were to delay, we could resolve.

I am willing to withdraw some things I said. Okay? What this does, I think, Mr. Speaker, is withdraw the allegation that Tories want to be tipped off to any RCMP criminal investigations into their parliamentary affairs. It is my conviction that we have never wanted that. The charge that we did want that was extremely serious—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member for Calgary West would take his chair.

Now, both members have indicated that, subject to a little bit of discussion with respect to which statements are to be withdrawn, they would be prepared to move seriatim through them. The hon. member for Kamloops has just taken a serious issue and has said, "I withdraw that".

It seems to me that if we exercised a little bit of good sense here, this matter could be adjourned while the two hon. members decide what other retractions they might make, because in the interest of this place the two of them have to work together on committees and, as I say, especially the board.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I really seek your guidance. I understood clearly from what my hon. friend, the government whip, said and I suggested that if he was to withdraw the allegations he has levied against me, then I would be prepared to move on it, accept that, and discuss our concerns regarding Bill C-79, which are very serious.

He then rose and said: "I will consider that if my hon. friend would withdraw his comments that he made in this House on October 11." Hearing his offer, I stood in good faith and in the best interest of this institution and withdrew those remarks. Now surely my hon. friend can live up to his half of the bargain and withdraw the allegations. If he does that, the matter is settled and we get on with resolving the issue. Mr. Speaker, I have just withdrawn those comments to enable this issue to be resolved. I ask my hon. friend to do the honourable thing and do the same.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, if the the hon. member is talking about the allegations I made in the House, I will withdraw them. Okay? There are some very serious allegations about the behaviour of myself, the committee members, and my members, that were made outside the House, at the 6.45 press conference on October 10 and carried on October 11. They have led, Mr. Speaker, to editorials and so on that would bring the House into serious disrepute.

I will throw another one that bothers me the most, the one that police forces—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member continues to try to argue the case, rather than meet the issue as to whether or not we can resolve this in a civil way by adjourning at this time and sorting out where there could be agreement and where there must remain disagreement. That is an option. It might make a lot of sense. But we cannot keep arguing every one of the allegations and going through them seriatim in this Chamber.

The sensible thing to do would be if the two hon. members are prepared to sit down together and say: "All right, maybe we can fix this up and live together. Maybe we come out with a statement that will at least preserve our own positions without offending others." Surely, that is something that can be worked out. I do not think it can be worked out on the floor of the House, although I think the House has exercised extraordinary patience for the last number of minutes. Perhaps, also, so has the Chair.

• (1630)

I put the suggestion to hon. members that the two of them agree to adjourn this matter, meet and see whether they can resolve it.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to do that. I would hope we would not talk to the press in the interlude.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think I made my point clear. I have withdrawn the comments that I made in this House that in a sense summarize the comments made.

If my hon. friend is not prepared to withdraw the personal attacks and allegations upon me, then I say to him: If he wants to attack me personally, he ought to do that now.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West responds by saying he has withdrawn everything that was said in the House, just as the hon. member for Kamloops has. That is some advancement. I suggest that we adjourn this matter to hon. members. Their colleagues can discuss it further. All rights are reserved.

If the two hon. members would agree, I think that that would be the appropriate thing to do.

Mr. Riis: I agree. I think that your intervention is an appropriate one. As long as the understanding is there, if there is a need to return to this issue in terms of further allegations, I think what you said, Mr. Speaker, members would have the right to do just that.

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly the condition. I see the hon. member for Calgary West is in agreement.

First of all, I want to thank all hon. members who have been here for the last hour and who have exercised great patience in listening to this. Contrary to what the public often thinks, this has been a very civilized discussion on a very difficult issue indeed.

As your Speaker, I am going to say you are to be congratulated on your decorum this afternoon. Second, I want to thank the two hon. members. I hope that this matter can be resolved.

I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Kamloops, and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond for his helpful contribution. I want it also clear that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is not in the firing line.

The matter is adjourned.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have two short points of order.

First, I know that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment is here. During Question Period, he suggested that I either support or endorse the 1987 Alcan agreement, which I do not. He thereby inferred that I might in some way be happy with the process of exempting the Alcan completion project from the 1984 cabinet guidelines order.

I know he is here. I have had a chance to speak to him. I am sure he would like to have something to say about not leaving what he said on the record.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on the same point. As you will recall, I indicated earlier today in Question Period that it was my understanding that he was on the record as supporting the agreement.

I stand to be corrected if he wishes to correct me. I now stand corrected, Mr. Speaker.

BILL C-78

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my second point of order is in relation to what is happening with Bill C-78.

As some members will recall, on June 27, page 13173 of Hansard the Minister of State for Youth and the Minister of State for Fitness, and the Deputy Leader of the government in the House moved a motion dated June 26, 1990 respecting Bill C-78, an Act to establish the federal environmental assessment process, that it stand adjourned until Monday, September 24, 1990 with various provisions.

At that point, our Whip the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan pointed out:

> I am just wondering if the minister can indicate that once the committee has been established, it will not meet during July and August, and that there may be a short meeting in September to deal with the agenda. The purpose of establishing the committee now is to let people know that the committee is available to receive briefs and that it will be looking for information.
> Second, can the minister indicate that the 1984 cabinet guidelines dealing with the environmental assessment review process will not be modified unless the Minister of the Environment has met with the committee?

Then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons confirmed that.

The point that I am making is that at that time on the closing day of this Chamber in June, a special committee was struck. For the first time in the history of the House, a bill which had not completed second reading was referred to the special committee so that we could, as I understood it and as other members understood it, redraft a very important environmental piece of legislation for Canadians now and on into the future.

We have only just started our hearings. We have only heard from FEARO, from Mr. Robinson, and we are just about to hear witnesses from across Canada to redraft Bill C-78 as we understood we were supposed to. For three months the special committee has been solely a post box. There have been no witnesses. The members have not been sitting. We did not have a chair. Mr. Stevenson was not appointed until just a matter of days ago to actually chair the committee.

I think hon. members need to hear from the government side on this point of order, how it is possible that we set up a special committee process, and as soon as the special committee process gets going it is collapsed so that second reading of Bill C-78 can be completed, which will force it off to a legislative committee where only minor adjustments can be made. The serious amendments with which the committee has undertaken its study simply cannot be made to Bill C-78 once it goes to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: It is not a point of order.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): With due respect, Mr. Speaker, what was done was to accommodate the wish that the subject matter of this legislation, very important, could be proceeded with while the House went into recess for the summer and that is what was done.

It is not an unexceptional thing. It has been done in the past. There is no reason in the world why the committee cannot work. There is no reason in the world why amendments to Bill C-78, if appropriate, cannot be made when it goes to committee stage. It happens all the time. That is the purpose. I do not understand why the hon. member is upset. It is desired to have Bill C-78 debated and voted on in principle as soon as possible. Then it goes to committee and, based on the work of committee, amendments can be made if the committee in its wisdom decides they should be made. That is part of the legislative program

To do what the hon. member is suggesting would be to ask the government to withdraw this legislation and bring in something else later on, next year some time, and I do not think it would be prudent for us to wait.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member for Skeena, but I am persuaded by the hon. House leader that this is something that has been done before. The government has the right to set the order of business. I would urge that if there are concerns from the hon. member for Skeena and his colleagues that those concerns be the subject of further discussions with the hon. House leader.

The hon. House leader I think has indicated that the process is such that with a little bit of skill, there can be input from that committee into the progress of the bill.

NATIONAL PETROLEUM COMPANY OF CANADA

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-84

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, since we are getting points of order out of the way, I thought I would try again, especially with you in the chair.

I wish to indicate that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the second reading stage of Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours, for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the bill.

PRIVILEGE

KEMANO COMPLETION PROJECT

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has filed with me a question of privilege. I have accepted it as being in order. I wonder if the hon. member would want it heard at perhaps a more convenient time than presently.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I certainly would not object to having it put over, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That would be the appropriate thing to do. I thank him for his co-operation.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would let the appropriate person—I assume it has to do with some actions of somebody on this side of the House—know the substance of the question of privilege so that some preparation might be undertaken on this side.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. House leader has made a suggestion which is eminently sensible under the circumstances, especially as the House now knows the hon. member for Skeena does have a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: I do not object to giving a quick synopsis, Mr. Speaker, to the question of privilege. It involves the October 12 Order in Council exemption of the Kemano completion project. As I think the government House leader is aware, the Prime Minister and four ministers of fisheries are on the record as supporting a full public inquiry into that project before it was approved.

• (1640)

The other point is in relation to the June 27 agreement that was reached. Effectively what has happened is the October 12 Order in Council exempting the Alcan hydroelectric project from the 1984 cabinet guidelines order removes the agreement that was reached on the June 27. That agreement was that there would be no variance made to the 1984 cabinet guidelines order until Bill C-78 had gone through and become law.

It is a two part question of privilege. One is involving the government endorsation of a public review of an environmental evaluation of a very large project. The other is that an agreement was reached in the House that there would not be substantive changes made to a special Order in Council from 1984 until legislation presently before the House was law.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Skeena for putting the point so succinctly. I hope it is of assistance to the hon. government House leader.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Sudbury—Children's Rights; the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood—Goods and Services Tax.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C–78, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jean–Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C–78 before the House today. This legislation is the cornerstone of our government's commitment to integrate the principles of sustainable development in all federal decisions.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will require the environmental assessment process to start at the beginning of the planning stage, so that decisions are made with a full knowledge of the potential environmental consequences.

Bill C–78 arises from the government's commitment to make the process more effective, fairer and more open. It reflects the main recommendations made by experts and the general public during two years of in–depth consultation.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will put Canada in the forefront of nations that seek to protect and preserve the environment. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Netherlands government, known as a leader in environmental assessment, wrote recently to congratulate the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office on its reform proposals, saying that in their opinion we had gone one step further than they had in this area. That is good news, Mr. Speaker.

The legislation will also ensure that federal authorities are accountable on environmental matters and will also increase public involvement at all stages of the assessment process. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we shall be mindful of our responsibility for administering the process efficiently. We will give environmental assessment of the impact of each project all the attention it deserves, no more and no less.

However, Mr. Speaker, this bill goes beyond providing for assessment of the potential impact of a project. Bill C–78 also requires that measures designed to protect the environment be put in place and maintained. The bill provides for follow–up and for monitoring programs. This bill will oblige us to treat the environment with respect, and that is a very good thing. But we also owe it to ourselves, our constituents and our children to see to it that the measures we are enacting be strictly tested and enforced. We will also have to keep a close watch on the evolution of projects so as to judge the effectiveness of the environmental assessment process and as a basis to assess similar projects in the future.

Mr. Speaker, a new agency—the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency—will be established to meet to the challenges inherent in this reform. Quite independent from other government organizations, the new agency will answer to and advise the Minister of Environment. It will also be responsible for implementing and managing the new assessment process within the federal administration.

With a view to concentrating our resources on projects requiring the greatest attention, Mr. Speaker, we will have three assessment approaches: mandatory studies, assessments by category, and lists of exclusions. The first, mandatory studies, relates to all projects likely to have a lasting environmental impact, such as major industrial or hydro power projects which will be the subject of very extensive environmental assessments right from the start.

The federal authority responsible for carrying out mandatory studies will scrutinize all the environmental consequences of a given project. Their report will be made public and presented to the Minister of Environment who will then decide if the project should be submitted to a mediator or a review commission. The project might also be referred to the federal authority for a final decision, but only if the Minister of Environment, enlightened by public input, is convinced that the proposition requires no further consideration.

The second approach, Mr. Speaker, will be used for many routine projects similar to other previously assessed projects, such as formation and road maintenance, to name just a few.

I think it would be a waste of our very limited financial resources to reassess the possible impact of such projects. Once the environmental impact of these projects and the appropriate mitigation measures are well known, all further assessment will be done by category. The new act will allow the Minister of the Environment to choose a standard assessment for a model. Assessment of individual projects will then be based on a standard assessment, and also take into consideration local circumstances and cumulative impact.

Mr. Speaker, the new Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency will determine which assessment reports may be used for the assessment by category.

The third assessment approach has to do with exclusions. This approach will be used for projects known for having no environmental effect. No assessment is needed in such cases, and the proper authority can make a prompt decision concerning the implementation of these projects.

In accordance with the spirit of this reform, the people will again be consulted on what projects to include on the exclusion list. So you see, the decision does not lie only with the minister. The people will be consulted, which goes to show the openness and extension of Bill C-78. Of course, some projects will not appear on the exclusion list or on the mandatory study list. These proposals would be subjected to a screening process to determine the possible environmental affects and to decide whether mitigation measures and more thorough studies are indicated.

• (1650)

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to elaborate on the process proposed in this bill.

This Government recognizes that it is necessary to balance the needs of this society with those of future generations. That is the only way Canada can start firmly on the way to sustainable development. It is a major challenge. Bill C-78, however, will help Government departments and agencies become more aware of environmental issues and their respective responsibilities.

The purpose of this bill is to require any federal authority, whether a minister, department or agency, to carry out an environmental assessment of all projects coming under its jurisdiction. It must make sure that the process is open and accessible to the public. It must take into account and act on the public's comments in the decision-making process. It should not be satisfied with consulting the public, but should respond to its comments. That is a major element in this bill.

Another principle in this assessment process is also very important: the Federal authority must determine as soon as possible during the planning stage the possible environmental effects of each project and the necessary mitigation measures. This way, in the Federal decision-making process, environmental aspects will be accorded the same importance as economic and social ones.

From now on, the environment will no longer be the last consideration, for it will be given the same importance as economic and social issues. Many factors will be taken into account when determining whether a project is environmentally sound.

We will look into the changes which the project will make to the environment, including the impact of any environmental change on health as well as socio-economic conditions.

We shall consider also the possible cumulative effects which could result from the completion of a project on top of others, both existing and to come.

Finally, we shall consider the mitigation measures which would be necessary to eliminate or limit the environmental effects of these projects.

In the case of a major project, we look at the purpose of the project, the various ways of carrying it out, the need for a follow-up program and the viability of the renewable resources that are likely to be affected by the project.

The comments and concerns expressed by the public will also be considered.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, provides for two types of public review for projects that could pose a serious threat to the environment and raise serious public concern, that is mediation and panel review.

We will proceed with mediation when the parties who have a direct interest in or who are directly affected by the project agree to find a way to identify and mitigate the adverse environmental effects of the project. Mediation will be preferred to public hearings because it is more efficient.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, there will be cases where mediation will not be suitable. Those projects will undergo a complete review by a panel. Furthermore, if a mediation attempt fails, the Minister of the Environment can still appoint a review panel.

Mr. Speaker, the evaluation reports relating to all major projects will have to include a follow-up program that will be made available to the public. We are not hiding anything. We are making it available to the public. This will enable us to check the accuracy of the environmental assessment basis as well as the efficency of the actions taken to mitigate the environmental effects of the project.

The aspect I like best, Mr. Speaker, is the increased opportunity for public participation. The public being an integral part of the process, the bill is transparent and accessible to the public. That way, we avoid the risk of things being said and turning out to be different. So, the follow-up process open to the public guarantees the efficiency of Bill C-78.

Mr. Speaker, we also intend to bring to light all actions that have been taken and to ask for the full participation of the public at all stages of the environmental assessment process. Not only in the beginning, in the middle or at the end, but all through the process. Most of all we wish to ensure the concerns of the public will be taken into consideration as part of the assessment process.

Mr. Speaker, there will be public consultation at all stages and in all cases. The public will be kept informed and we will ask for its comments. For that purpose, public registries will be kept. They will be used as information sources regarding all projects. The public will have access to them, and will be informed of all projects.

The ultimate and laudable goal of this bill is to ensure better protection for the environment by giving the Minister of the Environment greater responsibility in that process and facilitating the participation of the public at all stages while maintaining the principle of self-evaluation and keeping various federal departments and bodies responsible for the environmental consequences of decisions they will take on projects.

All those elements considered, the proposed reform deserves our support. The new environmental assessment process proposed here is fair and equitable, and above all, it takes into account the environmental reality of Canada of the twenty-first century.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the process will be balanced. Each project will get the exact qualitative or quantative attention it deserves.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and I will conclude by saying that the process will help us to step from a costly and inefficient environmental approach by which we can only find a cure to a much more profitable preventive and predictable approach.

Mr. Speaker, time has come to cease making decisions on big development projects without taking into account their implications for our economy and environment. Mr. Speaker, reacting to and making up for damages that we were not able to predict as was done in the past is all over. We are debating today Bill C-78 that will allow us to integrate from the outset an environmental concern in the planning of big projects and to see to it that we do not have to fix 15 or 20 years down the road what will have been destroyed for lack of planning or judgment.

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask all members of this House to support the second reading of Bill C-78, because it is an efficient and open bill, a bill that includes a visible process, that gives the public an opportunity to actively participate in this whole process. Mr. Speaker, I think all members of this House will be very happy with this bill, which is a government's initiative, and will very happy to support it with great enthusiasm, because I know that all members are very concerned with the environment and that they want us, with a bill as excellent as Bill C-78, to be able, right now, to protect our environment and our resources in the interests of future generations, of the future of our children.

So, once again, Mr. Speaker, I invite all members of this House to support wholeheartedly Bill C-78, for the sake of the environment.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the deputy chair of the special committee on Bill C-78. I know him to be a very interested member in the proceedings of the Canadian environmental assessment legislation.

I wonder if the member could take a moment to confirm my understanding, which is that on June 27 we created the special committee and for the next three months it acted as a post box. The initiative of the government pursuant to the McGrath recommendations on parliamentary reform was to make use of a special committee so that the bill could be redrafted in a major sense including in terms of the principles.

We have discussed this in committee and in terms of the witnesses we will call. It has been our intention to redraft the legislation dramatically because, as the hon. member knows, we have heard from FEARO. They have indicated that more than 100 acts of Parliament ultimately will be included in the legislation. Surely that should be in the legislation. The projects that are to be exempted are not listed; surely, they need to be listed. The regulations in the legislation are not listed; surely they should be. The mandatory inclusion projects are not listed, and they should be. Even intervener funding is not listed.

I wonder if the member could take a moment to explain to the House his understanding of the process that was intended by having this bill go to a special committee before it goes to a legislative committee. This piece of legislation is described universally by serious environmentalists in this country as a legislative Swiss cheese where the holes are larger than the cheese. I am sure the member knows that we want to make this a good piece of legislation so that future generations can look back and say that the men and women in this Parliament knew what they were doing and knew what kinds of projects should be assessed and how they should be assessed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Skeena for his question. As for his desire or intent to bring changes, amendments or that sort of things, I think the hon. member will understand that that is part of the legislative process, which is to say that after the legislation is approved on second reading and sent to a legislative committee, the hon. member will be allowed to propose changes and amendments he feels right and relevant during the committee proceedings.

In the other part of his question, the hon. member compares the legislation to Swiss cheese. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, as I was saying a moment ago in my speech, that the Dutch government, which is recognized as a leader in the environmental assessment area, recently wrote to the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office saying that from an analysis of the reform proposed in Bill C-78 they felt we surpassed them in that area. So, we might be eating better Swiss cheese than the Dutchmen.

Nothing is perfect in this world, but Dutchmen are recognized as experts in the area of environmental assessment. And they are the ones who sent us a letter telling us that we have a good legislation, that we are surpassing them and becoming international leaders in the environmental assessment area.

So I feel this legislation is not that bad. But the hon. member has of course every right to find deficiencies in it. Nothing is perfect. On the other hand, I think the hon. member may use all those ideas and suggestions to propose changes or amendments during the committee proceedings after second reading approval.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to commend our colleague from Terrebonne for the excellent speech he has just made on an excessively important piece of legislation for Canada. The hon. member has shown great concern for the environment, Mr. Speaker, and I know for a fact that the people of Abitibi—Témiscamingue are also very interested in environmental issues.

You may or may not know this, Mr. Speaker, but the residents of Abitibi—Témiscamingue have witnessed anarchic industrial development in the last 50 years. Our environment has been marred to the extent that bills like this one take on a special meaning for us. You can readily appreciate the fact that had this kind of process been in place 50 years ago we would not be coping with the environmental problems we have now. This exemplifies the kind of leadership our government has shown since 1984. Given the legislation this Progressive Conservative government has enacted since then, it is clear that it is fully conscious of environmental issues.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from Terrebonne. Considering that this bill will have a tremendous impact on the environment, to what extent does this important measure differ from regulations dating back to 1984? Can he point out the difference to show how much further this bill goes?

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Témiscamingue for his very good question. I know the hon. member for Témiscamingue is having, or has been having environmental problems in his constituency caused by development projects which were planned with no consideration whatsoever for environmental concerns. I would like to add, Mr. Speaker, with all partisanship aside, that the constituency of Saint-Maurice is having a similar problem, where Consolidated Bathurst, of which Mr. Chrétien was a member of the board, has polluted the Saint-Maurice River. And it is precisely because of our lack of concern in the past that we are having these problems today.

The hon. member asked me why Bill C-78 is so important compared to what we had before? What we had before, as everybody knows, were guidelines approved by Order in Council in 1984 when the Liberal government was still in office. Bill C-78 in a great improvement over that Order in Council, Mr. Speaker. Progress has been made in many very important fields.

First of all, this bill is written in statute form, and will be interpreted as such by the courts. It will not be vulnerable and open to challenge in courts of law.

Mr. Speaker, one of the important aspects of the bill is the fact that, in the past, when a public review was seemed necessary, the decision making process would rest entirely with the minister, while in the present bill the decision making power rests with the Minister of the Environment, which is going to be now a bit like having the fox mind the geese.

As for the old order in council concerning regulatory bodies and the Crown corporations, just as an example, it was very vague and optional. It means that they could proceed with an environmental assessment, but the decision was up to them. Now, in bill C-78, it is set out in specific rules, Mr. Speaker.

Moreover, in the past the order in council only provided for review boards. Now you can have arbitration as an alternative to review boards, and this again, Mr. Speaker, is an improvement. Then, the public can have access to every step of the process.

• (1710)

We are therefore talking about a bill and a process which are characterized by openners, a process which the public can have access to. It is becoming increasingly difficult, for whatever reason, to hide anything from anyone. In addition, Mr. Speaker, we will financially support organizations willing to take part in the assessment process. We are talking about openness, public participation to the review process and that, to me, appears to be one of the most interesting aspects of Bill C-78.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker, and give you 15, 20 or 30 exemples of how the bill improves the guidelines of the old order vicouncil but I see that you are letting me know that my time is up and I know you wish to give everyone the possibility to ask questions, so I will end my remarks right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Skeena on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the hon. member would want left on the record a suggestion that there is intervener funding included in Bill C-78, as he just suggested. There is no clause in the bill allowing for intervener funding.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Terrebonne on a point of order.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that there is some indication in the bill about our financing it, but the governement has clearly stated its intention to grant financial support to those environmental groups and public stakeholders wishing to participate in the environmental assessment process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): End of questions and comments. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I was quite intrigued in following the debate and the questions and answers. My colleague, the hon. member for Terrebonne, certainly painted a picture that would excite most people who are concerned about the environment. I daresay all of us are.

When reading a Canadian Press report dated October 19, I noted that a coalition of the 28 groups of environmentalists wanted to pass its judgment and its views on precisely what the hon. member was speaking about. This group gave the government an f on this issue.

An hon. member: For fine.

Mr. Volpe: An f, as with a report card, because the process required for projects under federal jurisdiction obviously does not meet even the minimum requirements.

[Translation]

The French-Canadian press describes the bill as follows: "This legislation is well intentioned, but lacks teeth".

[English]

Mr. Speaker, when one reads these kinds of reports from environmentalists about whether the legislation has teeth and whether the proposed law is, in effect, attacking what it ought to be attacking, one begins to wonder. The hon. member for Terrebonne has talked at great length about the involvement of the public and the importance of gathering public opinion. I do not want to introduce an element of cynicism into a debate that should be of interest to all Canadians but, frankly, we have seen public input discarded by the wayside without much ado. We have seen it on the GST and all kinds of other things. We have seen, for example, closure imposed on debates at a very minor whim.

Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for us on this side of the House to understand and appreciate the enthusiasm that the hon. member for Terrebonne has for the whole public inquiry process that is going to be implemented through Bill C-78. But, lest I be too critical, what I want to do is draw the attention of the House to the fact that this bill should have had underlined, as its main purpose, in fact its raison d'être, that it would foster sustainable development, and it would do that through a particular process which is indicated in the title of the bill and that is, "an act to establish the federal environmental assessment process".

When I look at this legislation, and I keep these very minor considerations in mind, I am already calling into question in my own thoughts whether in fact we are missing an opportunity. And the opportunities that we are missing with this legislation are precisely those which have been indicated by the coalition of environmentalists.

[Translation]

This is legislation without teeth.

[English]

It is, in fact, legislation without teeth.

The government has called us into question on many occasions, saying: "Give us alternatives, give us positive suggestions, give us an indication, critique, and be positive in the support of any legislation that might come forward." Well, members of my caucus have already introduced an element of criticism in this debate that has been positive and in that positive criticism they have also pointed out, as the environmental coalition group, has pointed out that there are very few, very effective enforcement mechanisms that would encourage the various departments to initiate proper assessment.

We have seen in both a question and answer, as well as in other debates, that this is a very crucial element of legislation. If it is going to have teeth then we have to see that mechanism in place. We have to be able to see it function in order to appreciate it, and the public has got to develop its confidence by seeing those elements in place.

I know that my colleague from Témiscamingue talked about the anarchy that prevails in the kind of industrial development in the sector of Quebec from where he comes. He says it would not have happened over the course of the last hundred years if we had had this.

Well, I am not sure whether he is infusing his own optimism in this, but we are certainly not going to be able to turn back the clock. The idea would be to put in place something that would ensure that under no circumstances would we have any ways out. He is from an area that is very dependent on the kind of industry that is by his own admission degrading the environment, and if he can see that what is required is some effective mechanism for ensuring that there be sustainable development, then surely he would have tried to encourage his own caucus to accept the kinds of mechanisms that needed to be put in place.

He will remember that since 1984 the courts have ruled that, whenever there have been questions on the environment, every minister and every agent of government was required—and I stress the word "required" because that suggested there is not very much discretion and that there is an obligation incumbent on that office, a shall or must component—to do a full environmental assessment of any project that touches on the minister's area of responsibility. This act holds out the possibility that that might happen.

And so we collapse into a direction that suggested that we must act in a particular fashion to one where he may and we cloud that may in words that convey the impression that the minister now has greater power. But the power always seems to be discretionary and so we again collapse into the strength of the minister himself. We collapse into the strength of the political will of the government at the moment. We again collapse into whether there is an acceptance of the public input in the mechanism that appears to be put in place.

The guidelines for the environmental assessment are clearly much, much too vague and leave too much to the discretion of the Minister of the Environment and to those individual ministers who are ultimately responsible for making the final decisions regarding those environmental decisions that impact on their departments.

I have seen in the question and answer session of the last debate that the member for Skeena suggested that the committee on the environment has very fundamental suggestions to make about how to redraft. The key word was "redraft" and not make amendments that are going to provide acceptable frills to this bill but to alter completely the whole dimension of this bill. One only does that in the context of committee if in fact one sees great big gaping holes, whether one calls into question in fact the entire direction of the bill or the ability of the minister to deliver on what the bill purports to deliver.

I know that my colleagues will also be interested in pointing to certain projects, as my colleague for Témiscamingue did and others have done in past. The House has debated over the course of the last week on the Rafferty Dam. But this does not specify, for example, which projects or classes of projects, which acts of Parliament or regulations, or which federal authorities will be subject to the bill. In fact, Orders in Council through cabinet will make some of these determinations after the bill is passed. There is no predetermination prior to the passage of the bill. We are going to be faced, as I think one member has indicated already, with a desire to deal with about 100 or more federal statutes that should be coming under Bill C-78. We are dealing with only about eight of them.

We are making a big deal of it. We are making a small step and it is a big deal, because it suggests that there is a frame of mind that is going in the direction where we are finally accepting responsibilities for sustainable development. We are finally accepting responsibilities for environmental degradation, and we are going to do something about it.

If, Mr. Speaker, from this side of the House, you hear criticism, it is not because we are negative, but because we want to take a reasonable initiative and make it better. What would we do to make it better? One of the things that we would like to do is make sure that we can pinpoint those departments or ministries that have to come into play.

For example, the minister and members of the government side have pointed out that we cannot apply our principles to everything. For example, we cannot apply them as well to things such as the Export Development Corporation or CIDA. We would have some obligations that extend from our understanding of the environment for us in Canada as Canadians, but understanding, as well, that environment is a global issue. We have incumbent responsibilities to ensure that the kind of principles that guide us here also guide us with our dealings with any of our partners, whether they be on a business side or through CIDA which is also business.

Just as a trite reference, for 1990-91, there is a projected budget of $399 million through the EDC and $2.1 billion under CIDA. Both of them are going to be exempt from this bill because we are waiting—and I am paraphrasing the minister and the government—until the international community comes to an agreement on whether this is acceptable or not.

If we accept the principle, certainly we ought to be able to do it on our own. We need not wait until the international community approves of something. There are certainly ways that we can influence how we as Canadians are going to have an impact on the environment. We do not have to go very far for that advice. We can go to the committee. I am going to make reference to the committee on the environment, because it has produced an excellent interim report that I think the government has ignored, to be very kind.

One of those items refers to the fact that the compliance component of the bill certainly is very lacking. There is absolute indifference to the concept of making various jurisdictions of government comply, particularly when they set up their own review mechanisms.

I think all members here are very familiar with the events surrounding the Rafferty–Alameda Dam, and they need not be raised again in this debate. It certainly tells you, Mr. Speaker, some of the problems we have to address. If we cannot do it in a bill that is here before the House right now, and if we cannot sit in the committee and allow for some of these suggestions to come through as amendments and toughen up this bill, when are we going to do it?

That committee presented its interim report only on October 11. That is not a long time ago. It includes members on both sides of the House. To read the report, one would be very surprised that this would be coming from a committee that has a majority of government members.

The last three recommendations are made on page 15. The committee wants to address the concept of compliance and enforcement, eliminating the may component from the minister's power and introducing a must and shall requirement component.

For example, in recommendation 15, the committee recommends that the Minister of the Environment have the responsibility and authority to develop policies, programs and regulations that span a full range of activities of the federal government, analogous to those of the Minister of Finance for financial and economic affairs.

In a subsequent recommendation, the committee asks for the establishment of an environmental audit function to ensure that all federal departments and agencies have implemented environmental assessment processes and to monitor the effectiveness of those environmental programs. It continues with setting and attaining targets for greenhouse gas emissions, as one component of what Canada must do with respect to addressing environmental issues.

Finally, the seventeenth recommendation is that all federal departments and agencies report on the direct and indirect impacts of their operations on global warming and set annual targets for reduction in greenhouse gas emissions.

I refer to those three because I wanted to point to a particular area that the government might have addressed in its bill. It has not done that at all. One asks oneself if the government is putting up a bill in the absence of a context that the House's committees bring forward for consideration.

The very first thing that is missing in this bill is the definition of sustainable development. Presumably, the bill is designed to ensure that we have sustainable development. Second, it shows a lack of direction. Once we have removed the purpose, we removed its sense of direction. Yet, that committee recognizes, on behalf of the government, enormous obligations for Canada.

In its report, it cites the World Resources Institute Report of 1990 that ranks Canada on a per capita basis for emissions and air pollutants at fifth, even though it has only 0.5 per cent of the population of the world. The only nations that rank ahead of Canada in terms of emitting contaminants in the air are developing countries or countries in the oil producing area.

The government's own committee says it must address some of these problems because there is an obligation. This bill does is alludes to a sense of obligation that the government refers to itself and there is a parliamentary committee that says: "Look, here we are. We have produced a document that should begin the discussions for where we ought to be going." And what are we doing? We are going into second reading.

As the member for Skeena pointed out earlier, on a question of privilege, the whole process of legislation appears to be designed to avoid very constructive implementations of amendments or redrafting by the committee before the legislation is accepted in principle and before it is passed on to the legislative committee where the process dictates that there will be few amendments that will allow the principle of the bill to be altered.

I have alluded to the fact that Canadians and parliamentarians acknowledge that they are offenders in questions of the environment. That same report talks about deforestation and what Canadians can do on behalf of regenerating a very essential element of the quality of air and life that we will enjoy down the road.

Recommendation number seven recommends that the government develop policies and programs which encourage Canadian companies to commercialize and export technologies and equipment that are effective in reducing greenhouse gases and gas emissions, particularly to developing countries, and so on. We might have referred as well to the import of that technology. If we do not have it, there is no reason why we cannot import it.

I refer to an issue that was raised only last year when we had the transportation of waste oil for purposes of re-refining or for the purposes of burning. That has all been put on hold because there has been a conflict of two jurisdictions. There is no question of compliance. There does not seem to be a political will on behalf of the federal government to co-ordinate the activities of provincial and municipal jurisdictions to ensure that there be an implementation of technology.

In reference to the implementation of technology to remove one of the problems, we already have technology in this province to deal with the over 325 million litres of waste oil that comes out of automobiles and other means of transportation. That waste oil can be not necessarily re-refined, although the technology exists for that, but the technology in the province of Ontario alone can only deal with about 100 million litres.

• (1730 )

That means that there are about 225 million litres that are left there for people to do whatever. We used to put it on country roads, but there is a system available where the $CO_2$ emissions and other hydrocarbon emissions can be reduced to virtually zero. We do not have anything that allows any of our ministers or departments to capture that. Another one of the mandates that this committee would like to see the government engaged in is, of course, energy conservation by reducing the amount of energy products that we use, or at least making greater efficient use of it.

The technology exists. It does not exist necessarily in Canada, but there are countries that have it readily available and we should be making a concerted effort to get it.

I know I am running out of time, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to add a last point. We do not have sufficient amounts of money available in order to ensure that a proper environmental program be put in place.

The federal environmental assessment review office has had roughly $44 million budgeted for this year. The minister says that we could add up to $100 million. Mr. Speaker, we have to move away from "we could", "we may", and "we might", to "it is a possibility, and this is what we will do". We have to remove ourselves from assurances of the political moment to the guarantees of legislation that is going to put teeth into our principles.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the speech made by the member for Eglington-Lawrence. A bill certainly cannot satisfy all our expectations, we all know that. It is impossible. My hon. friend listed, and that is his right, all the amendments, all the guidelines he would like to have inserted in the bill. That is understandable. A legislative committee will surely study all these amendments. My question for him is this: Does he not recognize that this bill is a step in the right direction, that it is very important for a country to give itself such an environmental assessment process? On the same point, I would like to remind him of what one of his colleagues, the hon. member for Davenport, said during a press conference, and I quote:

[English]

"I think that it is a good step in the right direction."

[Translation]

My question is then quite simple, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask my colleague, in spite of the amendments he would like to add to this bill, if he is in favour of the bill or against it.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglington—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question put by the hon. member for Témiscamingue because I know there is no— I don't know the French term—

[English]

There is no mischievousness in his question. Since he is talking about whether in fact we are going in the right direction, it is important to keep in mind independent studies. For example, Informetrica economist Carl Sonan in a report just last August said that in order for Canada to have a modest effort just in the area of global warming, it would cost Canada $37 billion over 10 years. I am going to give you these figures, Mr. Speaker, so that my colleague can understand the context in which we would criticize this bill. There is another $33 billion for other environmental clean-ups. The environmental clean-ups are not going to happen if we have mechanisms in place that would prohibit environmental damage and environmental degradation.

At any rate, that is roughly $70 billion over the course of 10 years. Now the five-year plan outlined by the Green Plan initially was apparently going to cost us about $5 billion. That is like $1 billion a year as opposed to the $7 billion, but the amount has now been reduced drastically. The money is going to come from cuts elsewhere. Where that elsewhere is, I really do not know. Our information, and I am trying to get the exact quote here, is that over the course of the last several months, the bill from when it was first proposed has undergone enormous revision as a result of the input of some of the heavy duty cabinet ministers around the table. Those heavy duty cabinet ministers around the table might have wanted to draw to the attention—

Mr. Lewis: They are all heavy duty.

Mr. Volpe: Well, the member for Etobicoke Centre is one and the other one is from Alberta. He is heavy duty enough because of his size.

Statistics Canada, for example, suggested that what we ought to do, if we are going to address this properly—and again, it is just a question of suggestion because you will have to read the statistics yourself and I address my hon. colleague through you, Mr. Speaker—is find the statistical means by which the present measure of wealth, that is the GDP, is contrasted with resultant resource depletion. I will conclude in a moment, Mr. Speaker, but rough estimates indicate that between 1984 and 1986, that is just two years, resource consumption in Canada amounted to between 1.4 and 4 per cent of GNP. That is roughly about $6.9 billion to $17.9 billion.

Those figures are important because what they do is they have to translate into what else Canadians consume. For example, on the question of the environment, if we take toxic pollutants, what that does is boost health care costs and thereby GDP in that area, as it does as well on clean-up of environmental disasters. If you put it in the context of all those moneys that should be spent and are not being spent, but are actually being cut back, in the context of thinking in terms of whether we are putting in an appropriate compliance and enforcement mechanism, one has to suggest to the member for Témiscamingue that this, if it is a step in the right direction, is very likely a minute step in that direction.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with interest and I just want to make one or two points and ask a question.

First, with respect to the question of second reading, I would inform the member, because I do not think he was present in committee, that the official critic for his party did express his agreement with the bill coming back into the House for second reading. In fact, he indicated that he would be quite agreeable at seeing it have speedy second reading so it could go back to the legislative committee and witnesses could be heard, et cetera.

I would ask the hon. member if he could, on behalf of his party, indicate how much money he believes should be made available for the Green Plan. Could he indicate whether his party would advocate raising that additional money in the form of a green tax or would he suggest it be taken from some other department and in which case, from which department.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the parliamentary secretary was paying careful attention to what I said. I think I gave him at least seven figures that he might address in a context of where we would take a look at what kind of moneys have to be spent. They were independently arrived at figures. They were not the figures from this member, nor from members of this caucus. I threw them out to him to give him an indication of what independent members in the community who are interested in the environment, who are experts in the environment, are making as a recommendation to the Canadian Parliament.

I did that very deliberately because I took sincerely the suggestion of the hon. member for Terrebonne suggestion that there be a great move to invite public input and to get the public engaged at every step of the way in order to ensure that Canada would be not only environmentally correct, not only environmentally safe, but it would be a beacon, a lighthouse if you will, a beacon of inspiration for all those countries that are looking for legislation that is going to correct the evils that are being perpetrated on the environment.

As for how much money will have to be there, I would have loved to have seen the member give me a response as to what the recommendation of his own Minister of Finance was around the cabinet table when the cuts went from $5 billion over five years to whatever obfuscated figure is now on the table.

• (1740)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Terrebonne has 45 seconds.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member's speech. He referred, and correct me if I am wrong, to the bill's effectiveness as far as projects were concerned in which Canada, through CIDA, provides assistance to foreign countries. I simply want to ask the hon. member on what grounds he says that Bill C-78, the bill before the House today, has no legislative provisions to deal with this. If you look at Section 44 of the Bill, you will see, and in any case it seems to me there are a number of provisions to deal with this. So I would like to know what grounds the hon. member has for saying that projects financed by CIDA outside the country are not subject to environmental assessment.

[English]

Mr. Volpe: Certainly, I will be very, very brief. One goes on the basis of what is in the legislation, what the minister says is the intent of the legislation and how he goes about explaining what is applicable and what is not. Take a look at the ministerial statements and the press kit.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this important debate today.

The objectives presented by Bill C-78 are of great importance to all Canadians. I wish to concentrate my remarks today on a particularly important segment of the Canadian population, namely, Canada's aboriginal people and the way in which the bill has been designed to relate to their specific needs and interests.

There have been from time to time criticisms of federal governments, including past administrations, for not giving adequate recognition to the needs, rights and interests of Canada's first nations peoples. These criticisms have been justified in large measure and it gives me great pleasure to be able to indicate to the House today the substantive advances toward that recognition made in Bill C-78.

First, I want to point out to the House the basic scope of the process established by Bill C-78. Whenever an environmental assessment is conducted in accordance with this bill, it must consider not only the effects on the biological and physical environment as represented by the water, air, land and wildlife, but also the effects of any changes to the environment on the health and socio-economic conditions of Canadians. This means that full consideration must be given, where relevant, to the effects on aboriginal people of any development initiatives for which the federal government has a decision authority.

This is a particularly relevant clause because of the great reliance of Canada's aboriginal people on Canada's natural resources. It is sad to note the extent to which these have already been depleted and degraded and the extent to which, as a consequence, the life styles of Canada's first nations people have been changed, in some case drastically and in others tragically.

We are determined to begin to turn this around and we have introduced a number of specific provisions in the bill which will have that effect. I intend to identify and explain for members the key references in the bill to the interests of aboriginal people, beginning with the definition of federal land.

The bill applies to all projects taking place on federal land. Specifically included in that definition are reserves and other lands set apart for the use of bands under the Indian Act. This means that all projects taking place on reserves are subject to the act. To the extent the Minister of Indian Affairs has decision authority over those projects, the minister must ensure that the act is respected. However, because the decision regime on Indian lands is somewhat complex, special provisions have been introduced in the bill to deal with that complexity.

First, it is important to note that the act is intended to apply in various way to federal authorities. These are decision-making bodies established under federal legislation that are bound by the provisions of Bill C-78. In order to respect the autonomy and distinctiveness of band councils established under the Indian Act, they have been explicitly excluded from the definition of federal authority.

First nation self-governments will be recognized for the purposes of this legislation as distinct jurisdictions, with the same type of intergovernmental co-operative arrangements being possible as with other jurisdictions. For example, provision is made for joint public review panels to be established with bodies created under land claims agreements and self-government legislation. It should be clearly understood that this marks a significant step forward in reshaping the relationship between the government and first nations people.

I referred a few moments ago to the complexity of decision making on reserves and the need for special measures to take account of that while preserving the important principles of this bill. While reserves are designated as federal land for purposes of this bill, considerable autonomy of decision making rests with band councils. While the federal government does not want to interfere with that autonomy, it must ensure that project related decisions taken on reserves are taken with the full appreciation of the environmental consequences. The more that can be done by the band councils themselves, the better.

To enable the federal government to discharge its obligations under the proposed act for projects on Indian reserves, it is intended that provisions be made in this legislation for the establishment of a special regulatory regime to apply to projects on reserves. This will recognize the mix of federal government and local decision making taking place on reserves and place accountability where it belongs. This means that the federal government will be accountable for the requirements of this act when it makes or explicitly shares decisions for projects.

I want to make it clear that with respect to this special regulation, as well as for others that have been mentioned during the course of debate, the government does not expect to be taken on faith. It has made firm commitments to the principles it will follow in developing the regulations. It has made those principles public and is looking forward to being publicly and openly accountable for the effectiveness of the regulations that will ensue.

If one takes the time to look beneath the skin, one finds very quickly that the Swiss cheese referred to in flights and rhetoric by certain members opposite is in reality very solid indeed and much more reminiscent of a wholesome Canadian cheddar; but, to be more explicit, in the context of the regulation for projects at Indian reserves I wish to set out for members the principles that have been adopted by the government to apply to that regulation.

First, all projects proposed to be carried out on lands reserved for Indians will be subjected to environmental assessment.

Second, a regulation will be developed to provide for assessment of proposed projects where first nations are the primary decision makers.

Third, the regulation will be consistent with the principle of devolution of authority to first nations and therefore accountability under these regulations will reflect the accountability outlined in the devolution instrument.

Fourth, the regulation will be developed in consultation with first nations and in accordance with the regulatory policy and citizens code of regulatory fairness.

Fifth, the regulation will be drafted in such a way as to avoid the placing of first nations at a competitive disadvantage. Sixth, the regulation will minimize duplication of process with other jurisdiction.

One of the most noteworthy parts of this list is the provision for direct consultation with Indian people in the development of the special regulation. This is the only way to produce a practicable, effective result that will have the commitment of all parties.

It will also enable us to recognize the differences that exist from one part of Canada to another in the way Indian people think about the environment and make their respective decisions.

The government has already begun preliminary discussions about this with representatives of first nations who have expressed satisfaction with our demonstrated commitment to effective consultation. In fact one of the practical outcomes of even this preliminary work is an environmental assessment training initiative for the first nations people so that they will have a substantive technical basis for implementing the procedures they eventually adopt.

I wish to continue to point out for members the specific references contained in Bill C–78 to the special requirements of aboriginal people. I referred earlier to the provision enabling joint reviews to be undertaken with certain aboriginal bodies. These are contained in clause 37(1) of the bill and are subject to conditions that are spelled out in clause 38.

These conditions ensure that the basic standards required to discharge federal government requirements under the law are in fact met. These are the same standards that apply to all joint reviews regardless of whether they are undertaken with the province, a foreign state, another federal body, or an aboriginal body, as I have already described.

• (1750 )

The conditions are as follows: The minister can only establish a joint review panel if the minister is satisfied that the minister can appoint or approve the appointment of the chairperson or a co–chairperson and one or more other members of the panel; the minister may fix or approve the terms of reference for the panel; the public will be given an opportunity to participate in the assessment conducted by the panel; on completion of the assessment, the report of the panel will be submitted to the minister; and the panel's report will be published.

These are important conditions. They safeguard the key principles of the federal process but allow enough flexibility so as not to be unduly intrusive where that cannot be justified. In most instances it is anticipated that the degree of federal government involvement in the review will be commensurate with the significance of the federal involvement in the project decision; but as always the conditions I have just described will prevail to safeguard the federal process.

A different type of interaction between processes can occur when a body established under federal law has a mandate to conduct public reviews and to consider the environmental effects of project proposals in so doing. An example of that type of body is the National Energy Board. More recently bodies established under land claims agreements have this type of authority, for these bodies when certain conditions are met may be declared by the minister to be substitutes for public reviews under the process set out in Bill C–78. This is a practical innovation which will help avoid undue regulatory duplication and confusion, without sacrificing environmental values.

The conditions that are to be met before such substitution can take effect are not only the last three of those I just described for joint reviews, but also the review body must include in its review the very comprehensive range of environmental considerations described in clause 11 of Bill C–78. This will ensure consistency and continued high standards of federal reviews.

The reference to aboriginal people in this regard lies in the fact that such substitutions can only be allowed to occur with any body established pursuant to a comprehensive land claims agreement. The environmental assessment processes established so far under the land claims agreements have been rigorous and thorough. There is every reason to believe they will deliver sound environmental decisions.

One of the most intriguing and potentially one of the most important and powerful provisions of Bill C–78 is the manner in which the trans–border provisions relate to Indian land interests. The trans–border provisions are to apply only when there is no explicit federal government decision to be taken under clause 5 of the bill in respect of the project such as those decisions which trigger the normal assessment provisions of Bill C–78. Under the trans–border provisions, the environment minister can call for a public review and can issue a stop work order for projects that may have serious trans–border effects until satisfied that those effects are acceptable.

In respect of most Indian land interests the term trans–border is somewhat of a misnomer, but the same sort of principle applies as to interprovincial or international trans–border problems. It is intended that the federal government would not involve itself in these matters if the other concerned jurisdictions are able to sort out their differences. This will probably make it certain that they will come to an accommodation, which is the best way as long as the environment is not compromised.

There are four distinct categories of aboriginal lands affected by this provision. These are: reserve lands, settlement lands set out in a comprehensive land claims agreement, lands set aside pursuant to self-government legislation, and lands in respect of which Indians have interests. These categories are quite straightforward, with the exception of the last one: lands in respect of which Indians have interests. This represents one of the most significant departures from the conventional, much criticized government view of Indian interests.

The government has taken a bold step in identifying in law the following four categories of land to which this is to apply. First, land areas subject to a comprehensive land claim accepted by the Government of Canada for negotiation under its comprehensive land claims policy; second, land identified and agreed in respect of specific claims or a treaty land entitlement; third, settlement lands in a comprehensive land claims agreement; and, fourth, lands set aside for the use of Indians pursuant to self-government legislation.

Unquestionably aboriginal people themselves, while supportive of these steps, will wish to see further explicit recognition of their rights to land use in certain circumstances. I am confident that the government will continue its discussions and investigations in this direction during the coming months.

As we can see, the relationship of this bill to the interests of aboriginal people is multifaceted and, for the first time, addressed rather boldly. We still have much to do in this area, but we are on track and confident the track will lead us to a mutually acceptable destination.

I would like to conclude by delving in somewhat more detail into the very innovative and important area of trans-border assessments, which I have just explored as it relates to the interests of first nations people. I believe members should be more aware of the detailed provisions of this key component of Bill C-78.

By providing for the assessment of trans-border environmental effects, Bill C-78 takes environmental assessment in Canada one giant step forward. The present guidelines order is silent on the issue of adverse environmental effects which traverse interprovincial and international borders causing harm outside the jurisdiction of their sources.

This silence produces confusion and consequently inaction. Bill C-78 ends the confusion, uncertainty, and inaction by outlining clearly the steps that might be taken in dealing with serious adverse environmental effects which cross jurisdictional borders, whether those borders are interprovincial or international or simply between lands in which Indians have interests and surrounding Crown or privately owned lands.

In each instance, before undertaking an assessment of such environmental effects, the federal government will give notice of its intention to establish a review panel to all interested parties so that they may participate in the process.

Where serious adverse environmental effects resulting from projects in Canada threaten other countries, the Minister of Environment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs together will establish a review panel to conduct an assessment. The review panel established will in most cases be one established jointly with the foreign country affected and any provinces affected.

In keeping with its promise made to the provinces during consultations on this proposed legislation, the federal government will not exercise its jurisdiction to establish a review panel to conduct an assessment of the serious adverse trans-border environmental effects of a project if he has reached an agreement with the governments of the affected provinces on another manner of assessing those environmental effects.

It is very likely that in most cases alternative methods of assessing extraprovincial environmental effects will be worked out between the federal and provincial governments through administrative agreements which are provided for in paragraph 54(1)(d) of the proposed legislation. In any event, the review panel established in these circumstances is likely to be a panel established jointly with the interested province or provinces.

However, in the hopefully rare circumstances in which agreement cannot be reached, the Minister of the Environment will be able to stop a project from proceeding until he is satisfied that any serious adverse environmental effects will be mitigated.

Section 47 of the proposed legislation creates two ministerial orders which are enforceable by way of an injunction. The first order is made at the time a review panel is established and prohibits any work on the project until the review panel completes its assessment and the minister is satisfied that the project is not likely to cause serious adverse trans-border environmental effects or that any such effects can be mitigated or are justified in the circumstances.

The second type of order is made after the review panel has submitted its report indicating that serious adverse trans-border environmental effects will be caused by the project. This order will prevent any work from occurring on the project until the minister is satisfied that the serious adverse trans-border environmental effects will be mitigated.

This government recognizes that Canadians place an extremely high value on the quality of their environment. This government has demonstrated leadership in environmental protection by enacting the Canadian Environmental Protection Act in 1988.

Bill C-78 is a further manifestation of this government's commitment to move away from the outmoded practice of react and cure and toward the principle of anticipate and prevent. By ensuring that environmental factors are considered early in the planning process of projects, we increase the likelihood that projects will have a good record of compliance with environmental protection legislation such as CEPA.

The pay-off will be more than simply a reduction in the cost and burden of enforcing environmental protection legislation. It will be a healthier environment for all of us, our children, and their children to enjoy.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I was certainly interested in the remarks of the hon. member.

Clearly he is the designated expert on the government side in relation to the impact on first nations of Bill C-78, should it become law.

I would not agree with the member's assessment though, because we on the committee have heard the expert evidence of Ray Robinson, who is presently the chairperson and head of the FEARO operation, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office. He confirmed to the committee in his recent evidence that Bill C-78, as drafted, does not go as far as the 1984 cabinet guidelines order does.

As someone from Saskatchewan, the member would be well aware of the catastrophic implications of government interpretation of the existing 1984 cabinet guidelines order in relation to the Rafferty-Alameda situation and also the Oldman dam in Alberta, the Alcan Kemano completion project in British Columbia or the Point Aconi coal thermal project in Nova Scotia.

I would like to lay to rest on the basis of expert evidence, the member's allegation that Bill C-78 goes further than the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, because probably the most expert person in Canada who could give such a view has already set that one to rest. The member has obviously researched and written a very thorough paper on the matter of first nations. He listed reserve lands, settlement land, lands affected by self-government and lands in which first nations have an interest.

He went on to point out that those lands that are accepted by the Government of Canada for a comprehensive claim will be able to have an environmental assessment done once Bill C-78 becomes law. I am very interested in that from the perspective of both law, from having studied the bill, and where the member received such information. I would like to know what, in the member's view—speaking on behalf of the government—would trigger an environmental assessment into the 19 comprehensive claims accepted for negotiation in British Columbia, the eight that are being studied by the Department of Justice and the three that are on their way, let alone the 582 specific claims across Canada.

Since the member appears to be expert on this, what is it that triggers an environmental assessment into those comprehensive and specifically claimed lands?

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the member opposite, as astute as his experience in the House of Commons is, would tend to indicate and recognize that I am an expert on the subject to which I have spent some time speaking.

I would like to advise the member that I am not alone in being an expert in this particular category. I believe that the interest and the intent with which the government has proceeded with respect to Bill C–78 sees the member looking at a considerable number of experts on that particular subject on this side of the floor.

Therefore, I would not only like to thank him for his specific reference but for the opportunity to be able to point out that there are many experts, particularly many people with their hearts and souls behind this bill.

I would hope that when all members consider the development of this bill, we look at it for what it can be for Canada's aboriginal peoples and not try to make it the subject of much debate, which in effect simply prolongs the opportunity for providing the benefits of this bill to Canada's aboriginal communities and as well to Canada's environment.

The hon. member makes some reference to a catastrophic situation in Saskatchewan, and I would certainly like to address that. First, I had thought that it was unlikely that the question, comments and answer period following my remarks could pass without someone making reference to the situation in Saskatchewan.

I will agree with him that it is a rather catastrophic situation, but I believe I have a different perspective of that than he does. I had hoped that the particular situation in Saskatchewan, which has absolutely nothing to do with aboriginal lands, could be set aside for a time. This is the place for a debate on that subject, but perhaps not the time.

However, because the hon. member wishes to address that particular issue today, I would be only too happy to give you my perspective of what I deem to be a catastrophic situation in Saskatchewan.

Of course, he was referring to the Rafferty–Alameda dam.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. I referred to the Rafferty–Alameda but I referred to it in the preamble to a question. I am not sure whether the member wrote the speech he just gave or whether someone else did, but he made certain suggestions that once this bill becomes law those lands, which have been accepted by the Government of Canada for comprehensive negotiations, will have an EARP triggered upon them. I would like the member to be somewhat more specific and refer other members of the House and the first nations who are watching to the section of the bill to which he refers.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I would conclude that you are likely thinking, as I am, that that was no more a point of order than other things we have seen happen in another place constitutes any order at all within the elected body we represent.

I was leading up to the portion of the question to which the hon. member made reference. I was going to set aside any sarcastic references that I heard made with respect to whether or not I, in fact, had any input into the speech. Surely, I would hope that the hon. member would give me some benefit of the doubt and, in order for me to rise on this particular subject, say that I might at least have an interest.

Second, I likely did refer to some research material to put these remarks together. I am again—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I said what I said was because the hon. member read the entire speech. It is not usually the sign of someone who has prepared the speech themselves.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the gentleman's obvious physical advantage over me, being probably one foot taller and one hundreds pounds heavier, I will totally disregard the insinuation that I do not know what I am talking about, which I think is essentially the point the hon. member is trying to make.

Similarly, may I reflect upon the intelligence behind the question.

The hon. member made reference to a catastrophic situation in the preamble to a question, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to address that before I get into the final portion of his dissertation. I think I have every right to do that.

The catastrophic situation is best understood and appreciated if any member who wishes to criticize that project were to spend some time in Saskatchewan and get to understand a little bit about the naturalness to which Mother Nature has said "Let the buffalo roam on the hay for which I have provided it". But, you, the individual farmer wishing to make a living there is going to have to use more than a little initiative to make things work in the semi-arid region of Canada that we know as the prairies.

Mr. Speaker, if I may continue with the catastrophic situation, subject to the amount of time that you are willing to let me have in which to conclude, is a situation that is caused to be catastrophic by the involvement with those that have political agendas that have absolutely nothing to do with the protection of the environment.

We hear such absolutely silly arguments, saying that the construction of a reservoir might affect some grasslands. Obviously we cannot flood a piece of land without affecting some grasslands and some of those grasslands happen to be wild natural pasture that happen to belong to the federal government which, according to the courts, require that the federal government necessarily bind itself to an environmental impact study. Now, for what cause? For what purpose, other than to delay the project and to embarrass governments that are associated with that particular project?

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the entire catastrophe associated with the Rafferty-Alameda project is caused by politicians, not the validity of the project, not the contribution that the water will bring to the semi-arid portion of the prairies called Saskatchewan, not the likelihood that this will provide for some irrigation spin-off, not the likelihood and the very just economic reason of providing for flood control downstream in the United States area to which these people have agreed to submit substantial millions of dollars towards the causing of that project to happen, none of those are what relate to the catastrophe. Politicians have decided that they are going to take issue because the federal government decided there was perhaps a slightly more convenient way at one stage of the process to proceed with the project. So, no, I say, Mr. Speaker. There was nothing catastrophic about this project that is caused by the project itself, but by the politicians who have their hidden agendas and wish to cause embarrassment to certain governments.

• (1810)

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back in my speech and follow up on one of the questions that the member for Skeena put about some sections of Bill C-78 which I think are very important for us to consider, in particular when it relates to the question of first nations and aboriginal people in Canada.

I do not recall that I heard an answer from the member who just spoke. The member for Skeena posed such an important question. We did hear a lot of time being filled in, I guess, but did not hear an answer.

In any case, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak today on a very important piece of legislation, Bill C-78, to legislate a federal environmental assessment process. I think it is clear today and on previous days that there has been considerable discussion about the weaknesses of this legislation and how it does not in fact result in the kind of rules and regulations governing environmental assessment that most Canadians are expecting from this government, given the rhetoric of the Prime Minister and others on their so-called Green Plan.

In fact, one of the comments that was made the other day at a news conference where one group of environmentalists gave the government an f on how it is doing on the environment, was that Bill C-78 is actually going to put in law the guidelines, which we already have. Those guidelines have become the force of law through the courts and this government has really refused to follow them.

I guess the mockery of the situation as it has developed around the Rafferty-Alameda and now the Alcan Kemano completion project really shows how much work has yet to be done on this legislation to see that we get something with some teeth and that we can all consider and review, that companies in good faith know what the rules of the road are and that other government departments know as well.

I have a couple of comments that I would like to make on the bill and then make reference to one or two specific examples that I think really shows the confusion on the government's part in current assessment procedures and what we may have as a result of this legislation.

In Bill C–78, cabinet decisions are exempted from the legislation. The government has promised that all cabinet documents will have an environmental assessment attached but that only the summaries of these are going to be made public. We are expected to trust the cabinet to do the right thing. When it comes to this cabinet we know that we are going to have to extend that trust a long way to see that that actually happens.

The legislation is discretionary, that is, it is a step backwards from the current guidelines which were ruled as binding on the government by the Rafferty–Alameda Federal Court decision. The member for Skeena made reference to the evidence given by the current chairperson of the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, the government's own employee, who suggested that Bill C–78 is actually a step backwards from the Order in Council guidelines that we are currently following.

Another important point is that some very important sections of the bill are left to regulations that have yet to be drafted. It is not even clear what federal legislation comes under the bill or what type of projects will be excluded. A perfect example of that was the questions that were just put by the member for Skeena concerning the application of this legislation to those claims that have been accepted by the Government of Canada, the comprehensive claims process that most members of this House are aware of. The member for Skeena asked the government member on the assumption that these claims and these lands fall under this legislation, what would trigger an environmental assessment review. That is not clear in this legislation. It is not pointed out at all.

I think a perfect example of the point I am making is the Alcan project in British Columbia, which will have tremendous impact on the Carrier Sikanni area. A comprehensive claim was accepted by the Government of Canada. Does that mean that already this government is not following the intent of its own legislation.

I think it is pretty clear that this legislation has a long way to go before it is going to be able to do the kind of work that we have come to expect.

There are two areas that I think point out pretty clearly to the failing of the government to respond and to act as a responsible government as it relates to environmental assessment. The first point is one that I think bears repeating. I mentioned it the other day in the House, but it is an important point and shows exactly what we have come to expect.

In the forestry committee, I had an opportunity to ask the Minister of Forestry an interesting question. Under the guidelines the Government of Canada, under a federally initiated program, is required to do its own internal assessment. I said to the minister: "The forest agreements are an important component of environmental and forestry legislation and programs between this government and the governments of the provinces. Do you have any initial assessments done of these agreements such that you could provide them to the committee so that we could take a look at them on the argument that an assessment here would say that these forest agreements are good for Canada."

The minister said, "No, that has not been done." That is shocking in its first statement, in any case. But he was corrected later by his officials who tugged at his sleeves said: "Mr. Minister, we actually did do an assessment." Of course, I said: "Well that's handy. I would like to see them. Could you provide the committee with these assessments? Let's see how the current Environmental Assessment Review process is being followed by this government."

It took a couple of letters from the clerk of the committee to request those assessments, and lo and behold, a couple of months later when they got around to checking through all the filing cabinets and to see if they did actually have an assessment, despite saying, yes or no, that they did, we found out it was not done. The minister was right for all the wrong reasons. It points out clearly how the government has failed since it has been in office from 1984 to see that indeed it follows these guidelines. It is a Cabinet order.

What if it had something to do with drug dealers? Would the Cabinet avoid the law, as it has with environmental assessment, if it was related to drug dealers? I think not, and I hope not. But that is an indication of just important I believe the whole environment debate has become and how important the whole question of environmental assessment has become as well.

We need to know the guideposts and the milestones so that we can pursue various projects, be they initiated by this government, joint projects initiated by the Government of Canada and the provinces, or projects initiated, of course, by various companies, local governments, what have you. That is a pretty clear example of its failure on that point.

The second issue that I want to respond to has been brought up in the House in the past week by some of the comments that the hon. member for Skeena made. It has to do, of course, with the decision by the government to exempt the Alcan project in British Columbia from the environmental assessment review process. It is an interesting debate. There is a bit of a paper trail so we can follow the twists and the turns of the government on this issue.

Back on May 30, 1990, at page 12047 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Forestry about the Alcan projects and if the government would follow through on a full review as promised by the now Prime Minister in the 1984 election campaign. I do not know if that is a reflection on this particular minister, but he answered:

> Of course there was an environmental assessment carried out at the time that the new arrangement was made.

• (1820 )

We now have a decision made two Fridays ago exempting this project from the Environmental Assessment Review Process. What is it? Was there an assessment done or not? Or, is the government too afraid to proceed further with an environmental assessment because it knows a lot of the information and concerns that are now coming out would be brought to the public, it would be on oath, and it would be an opportunity for all interested parties to review this particular project.

Earlier today, the discussion in the House of Commons of June 27 was mentioned in the question of privilege raised by the member by the Speaker after Question Period today. The Speaker will be reporting back to the House on the member for Skeena's question of privilege. I would suggest a reading of the discussion in Hansard at page 13173 about commitments of the government as to whether it would proceed with any terms or changes to the environmental assessment guidelines while Bill C-78 was being discussed.

I know there will be a report back from the Speaker. But if it was not the technical word followed of the agreement made in the House, certainly the spirit of that agreement was not followed by the government in exempting the Alcan project from the agreement made on June 27 in the House. I expect to hear exactly what that most important ruling may be. In fact, the action taken by the Minister of Fisheries two Fridays ago may be a contempt of Parliament. It may have been a contempt of an agreement made in the House that there would not be any fooling around, if you like, when Bill C-78 was being discussed.

Why is this project so particularly important? It goes back for some time. For those who were not in northern B.C. in the 1984 federal election when this issue was being debated then. I do not recall seeing the provincial Minister of the Environment, who is now criticizing the federal officials on this matter, around the campaign in 1984. At that time, a crucial decision was made. The New Democratic Party was the only party at the time that said it should have a full environmental review and it should provide funding to interveners.

There was the election victory by the Conservatives in 1984, with the blessing then of the Liberal Party which did not support funding to interveners at that time. Its position may have changed, let us hope so. It goes back to the debate about what kind of effect and impact this project is going to have on the Nechako River, flowing into the Fraser River.

I quote from a publication called British Columbia Report of June 4, 1990. It is probably not subscribed to by many New Democrats and probably not considered to be a publishing wing of the NDP research group. The title alone suggests the impact: "Alcan's gigantic private fiefdom—They're taking the river from us, bitter north-central residents charge". The article states:

> The flow at Prince George will be reduced to 50 per cent of its pre-1950 flow rate.

This is after the settlement agreement that was signed by the government a couple of years ago to the point now where we have a decision to exempt this whole agreement, this massive project from the environmental assessment review guidelines. It is a shocking condemnation of the government's attitude towards this whole project and the people of British Columbia.

I hope that when the Prime Minister is in B.C. today or tomorrow he makes an announcement and that he will not allow the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment to get away with this. I quote from The Vancouver Sun editorial of October 20. It is questioning that the province of B.C. should call upon the federal government to conduct a full environmental review. It states:

> If, as the federal government claims, the studies carried out have satisfied all environmental concerns, then Ottawa and the company have nothing to fear from the full disclosure that's needed to reassure the public that the project poses no serious risks.

That is an important statement because it applies not just to the Alcan project but any other project. Good corporate citizens will ensure that their projects are referred to environmental assessment review procedures so that we know that the project that eventually comes out will be a better project or a fair project and will treat the area properly. Or, if it is not a good project, it will not happen.

I suggest that the Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada are not sure what they have gotten into. We do have a commitment now from the provincial Minister of the Environment that, if a pulpwood agreement in the central interior of B.C. looking at the possibility of a new pulp mill in the Vanderhoof area, is issued, that in fact there will be a joint provincial major projects review process and a joint federal environmental assessment review process. Since the Minister of the Environment in British Columbia has already said there will be a joint federal-provincial assessment of this pulp mill project, we should have a commitment from the government that it will in fact participate in that review and that we will not have yet another exemption just because it is on the Nechako River. Hopefully, the residents of that area can ask some serious questions about the impact on the Nechako River and the Fraser River.

It is important that we get the Government of British Columbia there as well. By participating in this federal-provincial Alcan so-called settlement agreement exempting this from the environmental assessment review process, the government is now afraid 40 per cent of the recreational fish stock in the Nechako River will be destroyed by this project and it is going to be the taxpayers who will have to pick up the tab to rehabilitate that fishery. It is an indication of more and more information that is coming out, not just from the three or four scientists who are now on the public record expressing their concerns about this project.

Clearly, we have some legislation that needs to be tightened up and strengthened. We have to take the guidelines that are there and tighten up the whole process. That will mean that we have better environmental legislation and better government so that companies know what the guideposts are and so that we can put some action and some legislation into the green plan we are expecting some time this fall from this government. It is high time they lived up to the rhetoric of the green plan it has been talking about.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if you have ever had an opportunity to take a trip out along the Aviation Parkway here in Ottawa. I suspect you have and I suspect you are well aware of what a beautiful part of the Ottawa area that Aviation Parkway is.

If you have been out there in the Montreal Road area, you have seen the federal housing agency of our government. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's head office is out there in a beautiful setting. It is a park-like setting, a wildlife setting, a ravine setting, right in the middle of an urban area.

That particular location was acquired by the federal housing agency, CMHC, back in 1950. It was acquired at that time for the purpose of building, of course, a head office location for CMHC and perhaps for some other governmental uses. The intention at that time and it always has been since that time, after CMHC and other government agencies made use of the land they needed, was to dispose of any surplus land, to subdivide it and make sure it was put to good use, and to make sure it was used for affordable housing. I know you are aware, Mr. Speaker, as I am, and as all members of the House are that good, affordable housing is something that is very badly needed.

When CMHC turned its attention, after making use of all the land in the area it needed, to what it would do with the rest of the land, it was decided that it should be devoted to housing.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, there is a very important piece of legislation known as Bill C-78 which is presently before the House, and there are fairly broad parameters to rules of relevance. I am not certain the member is sticking to rules of relevance in relation to the Canadian environmental assessment act.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sure the Minister of State (Housing) will want to address the subject matter of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I am so pleased that the hon. member for Skeena is paying close attention to my remarks. I know he is well aware that every housing development entails a whole question of environmental assessment. I know he is well aware of that, and I cannot believe for a moment that a man like the hon. member who is concerned with the environment and environmental assessment, and who is concerned with the legislation before the House, would not for a moment be aware of the fact that all of this entails the environment and environmental assessment.

When CMHC, or for that matter any land owner, wants to build a house, wants to do anything in the way of developing housing, one of the major concerns and factors that have to be taken into account is the question of the environment and the impact of that sort of development on the environment, particularly when the land is owned by the federal government and the federal government will be doing something about developing that land for housing. Certainly the hon. member would agree that the environmental assessment legislation currently before the House is something that should be considered in a case like that. I am surprised that he would even question it for the slightest moment.

After 1950 we had a situation where CMHC developed part of this land it needed on the Aviation Parkway. Now it has turned its attention to developing the rest of it for a badly needed housing subdivision. Of course, that development impacts on the environment and we have to do something about making sure that the environment is protected. That is exactly what CMHC has tried to do with the land on the Aviation Parkway.

That land does not just impact and affect CMHC and the federal government. There are a number of other governmental bodies which also are impacted by that particular piece of land. Some of these are the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, the city of Ottawa, the city of Gloucester, and the National Capital Commission. So, there are a lot of governmental bodies involved in making decisions over what can be done with that land, whether it can be used for housing, and whether or not the whole question of the environment and an environmental assessment of that land needs to be done and what kind of an assessment needs to be done.

As a good governmental organization, the federal housing agency, CMHC, has in fact proceeded with an environmental assessment. It has retained a firm of consultants to carry out an environmental assessment of that particular piece of land for the purpose of putting together a draft plan of subdivision, which would have to be approved partly by the city of Ottawa because it is partly in the city of Ottawa, partly by the city of Gloucester because it is partly in the city of Gloucester, partly by the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton because, of course, it is in the region and, of course, partly by the National Capital Commission because it is in the national capital area.

There are a lot of different bodies that are involved in this whole question of the environmental assessment of that land, if it is to be used for housing.

CMHC has retained the firm of Winters and Associates to carry out an environmental appraisal and to assess the tolerance of that particular piece of land and its environment for the purpose of developing housing on that site.

In fact, it is interesting to note that in this day and age, a careful observation is carried out on a piece of land like that by the residents in the area and by various environmental organizations, all of whom are keeping a careful eye on land such as that to make sure that there is an environmental assessment carried out and that that environmental assessment complies with all the rules and regulations that are in place.

In fact, the Ottawa Field Naturalists Club is one of those which is keeping that particular piece of property under very close observation. As one who belongs to the Field Naturalists Club of Metropolitan Toronto, I have great sympathy for the fact that it is keeping a close eye on this particular situation. In fact, it has raised with me a number of concerns about the unique qualities of that particular piece of land and its concerns with respect to what will happen if that is turned into a housing project.

I think that is typical of the concerns that Canadians right across this country have with the environmental impact and environmental concerns relating to housing projects and all sorts of other kinds of projects that may be carried out by the federal government, any of the agencies or Crown corporations of the federal government or by the private sector.

I think it is particularly important that all of us bear in mind the environment when dealing with a situation like this. Fortunately, in the case of this particular piece of property, CMHC has received a report from Winters and Associates, who did this assessment, which concludes that in their opinion as professionals in this field, there are no rare and/or significant environmental features located on CMHC lands. Therefore, no special consideration is required during the construction.

That is an opinion of some professional appraisers, and it may or may not be accepted by the general public, or by environmentalist organizations such as the Ottawa-Carleton Field Naturalists Club. That assessment and the procedure that is being followed is one that is being followed under the present guidelines and the present environmental assessment regulations that are in place as far as the federal government is concerned.

Of course, we know that as a result of at least two court decisions and concerns expressed on all sides of this House and by Canadians across the country, there is not the kind of confidence in the current rules and regulations that you and I believe Canadians should have in the environmental assessment process that is currently in place for the federal government and for federal government agencies. That is demonstrated as well, to my mind, by a recent survey that I carried out with some of my constituents. I asked them a variety of questions relating to the environment. I asked them a series of questions, eight questions in fact, and asked them to express their opinion on whether they were concerned, unconcerned or very concerned about those eight different areas of the environment. I guess I was not surprised but the results that came back to me indicated that a minimum of 55 per cent of my constituents were very concerned about every one of those environmental questions.

I think that certainly illustrates for me, and I think illustrates for all of us, the feeling that all of our constituents have, particularly these days, about the state of the environment, their concerns with the environment and their feeling that we have a responsibility on their behalf to make sure that the environment is protected and that it is cleaned up where there are pollution problems.

In the light of those concerns, and in the light of the fact that the federal government has a vast number of projects and undertakings which impact on the environment—whether it be the development of land for housing or whether it be some other projects which are intended obviously to be for the public benefit and for the public good, but at the same time intended to bear in mind the concerns which all of us have in relation to the environment—it is important to assess the bill that is before us and to bear in mind, at the same time, the progress and the path that has been taken over a number of years, not only by the present government but by past governments as well with respect to trying to deal with the assessment of projects of this sort as far as the environment is concerned.

You are aware, as I am, Mr. Speaker, that the first environmental assessment process was put in place by the Government of Canada in 1974. That was updated in 1977. In 1984 the present process was put into place. That process was the environmental assessment review process guidelines that were issued, as you will remember Mr. Speaker, by Order in Council. When CMHC or any other federal Crown corporation or any other federal department goes to proceed with one of these major undertakings, they are faced at the present time with these Order in Council guidelines that were put into place in 1984.

Those guidelines do not have the kind of teeth that we and Canadians are looking for in the year 1990. That of course is why the government has introduced the Canadian environmental assessment bill, Bill C-78, the one that we are debating at the moment.

I think it is very significant to point out the differences between that old set of guidelines and the current bill to show what the changes are that have taken place and the way in which this process is being strengthened and strengthened enormously by the bill that is before the House and that is being put forth today for passage at second reading.

The first of those differences is the fact that the process we now have, the process put in place in 1984, is merely a set of guidelines that were put into place by Order in Council. What we have before us now is an actual bill, a piece of legislation that has much more in the way of teeth and much more in the way of permanency in law than an Order in Council. An Order in Council can be revoked at the snap of a finger, as you know Mr. Speaker. However here we have an act which would have to come before this Parliament again for amendment or change in any way.

At the present time under those 1984 rules and regulations that were put in place we have decisions that can be made in respect of having environmental assessments which lie strictly within the control and the jurisdiction of a minister of the particular department that is involved and is putting forward that particular public work or that particular development.

That is changed under this piece of legislation. In fact it is now the Minister of the Environment who will have the say, not the line minister, and therefore the question of the potential conflict of interest which was there when the line minister had the decision-making process as opposed to an entirely different minister will not be there. It is the exclusive responsibility of the Minister of the Environment to protect the environment. That is an enormous change. It is making sure that we do have a minister responsible exclusively for the environment who is now in charge of this whole process.

It is not something which can be decided just by the minister who wants to put forth the policy. It is not something which could just be decided by me any more. For instance, I might want to develop this piece of land. I think it is a good idea. I think it will be of great benefit to Canadians to have some more affordable housing on this land; but at the same time this bill would remove that decision-making process from me and put the environmental assessment aspect in the hands of the Minister of the Environment. That is a real advance on the process in place at the moment.

In addition, the rules and regulations of the 1984 guidelines are currently the ones that we have in place. They certainly are not clear and they are certainly voluntary. The ones set out in this bill are going to be explicit requirements through regulations. They are not going to be voluntary any more and they are not going to be unclear.

As well it is important to remember that at the present time there is no system or process in place for an ongoing evaluation or reporting on the environmental aspects of any of these undertakings by the government, whether it be a housing development or whatever. Under the bill which we are debating today, the bill which hopefully will be in place with the help and co-operation of all members of the House on both sides, we are going to have a regular ongoing process of examination and reporting.

Under the current rules, regulations, and guidelines that are before us there is nothing in the way of mandatory requirements for environmental assessments, but under the bill before us now there will be a list of projects that will require mandatory assessments.

I have just touched on a very few of the major changes that will be brought about as a result of this bill, but as you can see, Mr. Speaker, there is a very major change, a very major improvement. The bill will strengthen the process immeasurably. It will produce a process in which you and I and all Canadians can have confidence that our environment will be taken into account and dealt with properly by the Government of Canada when it undertakes one of its many, many projects for the good of Canadians, whether it be housing or anything else.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that what we have just heard from the hon. member opposite is an example of what is wrong with the government's thinking on this issue, and what is wrong with the government's understanding of its own bill and what it is trying to perpetrate.

• (1850 )

The minister has said that the current guideline orders are voluntary, not mandatory. I think he must be saying that in the absence of having read either of the three court decisions in the last year concerning the Oldman River dam or the Rafferty—Alameda dam, because he would know that the courts have said very clearly that it is not voluntary, that it is not discretionary, that it is required.

We put against that what this bill does in giving cabinet a great deal of discretion as to whether an environmental assessment will or will not be carried out and in giving cabinet the ability to exempt major classes of projects from any environmental assessment whatsoever. The environmental groups which have said that the court decisions put us in a stronger position vis-à-vis the environment and the requirement for a public review than this legislation are absolutely correct.

I want to go to a more specific problem that directly affects the minister's portfolio and how he is going to interpret the mandate of his department with respect to the environment and sustainable development.

Some of my colleagues have pointed out that the bill does not deal with sustainable development. It is very clear from the minister's comments that he and probably the rest of his colleagues do not understand or have not even started thinking about the whole principle of sustainable development. If the minister had done so, he would certainly not be satisfied with an assessment from any consultant that simply says there are no environmentally sensitive features on the land.

He would be asking important questions like the following ones. How much housing are we going to be developing? How much energy is it going to use? How much water is it going to pollute? How can we ensure that development on this site takes into consideration all principles of sustainable development, minimizing our use of resources, minimizing our production of wastes, and minimizing our pollution of water? Only then can he as minister of housing say that his department is truly looking at principles of sustainable development in every program it has.

We have a very good example of this in Lebreton Flats where the federal government is coming forward with plans and has paid absolutely no attention to principles of sustainable development, as I have just been discussing them.

I wonder if the minister can tell me if he is prepared to get himself a little more educated, so that when he is responsible for the development of urban areas, as he is in most cases, he will ensure that the developments that his department is funding are in fact minimizing their impact on the environment and on the use of resources.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have heard the hon. member's question and her comments as well.

I might say my comments related to the fact that the 1984 rules and regulations or guidelines that were put in place by the former government, of which party she is a member, indeed were intended to be voluntary. Certainly there have been decisions since then of the courts and they have changed the interpretation of those guidelines, but the former Liberal government which put the 1984 guidelines in place certainly never intended them to be anything else but voluntary.

This government is introducing a piece of legislation which will change all of that once and for all, clearly set it out, and we will not have to rely on the courts to tell us that there is something firm in place there.

The hon. member has also referred to the question of sustainable development. While she has touched on two aspects of sustainable development, she has neglected the third aspect which is a very important aspect as well and one which I, the federal housing agency and my officials take very seriously and are applying in each and every case now and will be in the future.

The first is the whole question of the physical environment that is there. We have to take that into account. Also taken into account is the actual development of the housing and the economic factor. Third, taken into account in the whole area of sustainable development is the social factor and what sort of impact that has on the entire social fabric.

One of the important aspects of that is the whole question of ghettoization, the importance of making sure that we have mixed communities and that we do not create social problems by the housing developments we put in place.

Sustainable development is more than just the economy and the environment. It also entails these social aspects and the quality of life. All these are things the Government of Canada, the federal housing agency, CMHC, and I personally, are taking into account. I hope that the hon. member will have a chance to read some of the speeches that I have given in the past on the question of sustainable development. I know she will find them most interesting.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can paraphrase what the minister was saying. He has indicated his concern that the 1984 cabinet guidelines order is unclear but that he believes the regulations to be included in Bill C-78 will clear that up.

I am sure the member is aware of the problems surrounding the Rafferty-Alameda, the conflict between the federal and provincial governments on the Oldman River dam, as well as in relation to Alcan's Kemano completion project in British Columbia that was exempted from the existing guidelines by Order in Council.

The member has stated for the record that he believes that one of the problems with the existing 1984 cabinet guidelines order is that it is unclear. He also suggests that there should be a clearly understood mandatory list where environmental assessments are applied automatically. Would the member not agree that those three projects—the Rafferty-Alameda, the Oldman River dam project and the Kemano completion project—are precisely the kinds of projects that should undergo a full public environmental assessment?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question and comments with respect to this bill. They indicate that he shares my concern and the government's concern to put this piece of legislation into place as rapidly as we possibly can.

The old 1984 guidelines were full of flaws and problems. They were certainly unclear. They were intended to be merely voluntary guidelines and nothing else. This piece of legislation will clearly change all that. It will be a change for the better, a great improvement.

I know the hon. member agrees with that and I know the hon. member will want to urge his colleagues to pass this legislation very quickly. He has about one minute left this evening. I would suggest that we allow this bill to pass on second reading unanimously right now.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on October 2, 1990, I directed a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the imposing of GST on children's clothing, boots, and on the heat that keeps them alive in the winter. I had a very unsatisfactory answer to my question.

On September 30, 1990, our Prime Minister was addressing the United Nations, some 70 leaders, regarding child poverty in the world.

• (1900 )

I was very pleased to see the Prime Minister taking a leadership role outside our country with regard to children. I think that it is extremely important that we think of our children because our children are our future. However, I would certainly much prefer to see him take a leadership role here in Canada with regard to our children.

When we talk about our children and the GST, we must realize that this tax will, for the first time, impose a federal sales tax on children's clothing. Anyone who has raised a family, who has had children in this country, knows how difficult it is to keep a child adequately dressed for winter conditions. One cannot say: "He will be fine," or "She will be fine". We know they grow very quickly. In the wintertime they need skidoo suits, boots, mitts, gloves, and hats. Children being children, they grow. They outgrow these things. They lose their mitts. They lose their hats. So the parents have go out and buy more. All of this now will be taxed.

We also know that one-third of all of our children in Canada live in poverty. You will say to me, Mr. Speaker: "We have this tax credit, this wonderful tax credit". Let me begin to tell you that this will not come close to helping these people when they have to suffer the nefarious results of this tax on their livelihood. It may help some of the poorer people. These people are already having a very difficult time. They are going to have an even harder time.

Let us speak about our middle income people with families. We are going to be discriminating against them. Again they are going to have to suffer and pay this extra money because they have children. We should be helping them, not hindering them.

We talk in terms of heating our homes. We know how difficult, how large and how cold many of the regions of our country are. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if you have ever been cold in the winter time, but it is not funny and especially when you are a little child. How can this government be imposing a tax on heating, on the fuel to heat our homes, for these families with children, these poor families, these middle income families. It is as vital to our life here in Canada as food. Yet this government persists in imposing this tax.

Now we have the crisis in the gulf. This will escalate inflation. It will escalate the cost of heating our homes. Again the tax will come on top of this.

I wanted the government to take note of how difficult life is for families, for just average families, as well as poor families. Can the government please reconsider its tax on some of these items? It is not fair to say to the future generations: "We are going to give you a few dollars today so we can help you out". This tax is extremely regressive. It is extremely regressive because of the size of our country.

The parents of a child who live in the far north of our country will have to pay far more for that piece of clothing. By the way, there is no manufacturers' sales tax on clothing right now. There may be minute taxes buried somewhere here and there, but there is no real manufacturers' sales tax on clothing. In any event, added to the cost of manufacturing that piece of clothing will be the cost of shipping it to wherever this child or this family lives. The further away it is, the more costly it is. Add to it the cost of transportation now the escalation in the cost of fuel. Again the cost of this skidoo suit, the hat, or the mitts will be even higher. The farther away one moves from the major centres, the more costly it is going to be.

When we speak about how regressive this goods and services tax is, that is what we mean. We mean that they are going to cause even more difficulty for those people in those areas that are far away from the major centres, those same areas that have the longest winters and the longest nights, where hydro or light is essential. It is essential if these children want to learn, to go to school, because without light they cannot read.

• (1905)

This brings me to another topic concerning the GST which is to be applied on reading materials. Again we are going to be taxing learning. How do we expect to have another generation of people who can know more and can compete in the world around us. We have said it and this government has said it: training and retraining is the answer. Yet we are going to tax the very books by which they will learn.

It is absolutely incredible that this government persists in imposing this tax at this time when businesses are closing down, when people are losing their jobs, and when fuel costs are escalating.

I beg this government to reconsider, to wait a little while perhaps. If it must have this tax, it should at least wait until this recession slows down and the economy of the country is in a better condition to withstand the harshness of this tax.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury is asking the government to drop the GST. What the hon. member did not say is that her leader, who recently was obliged to declare his position because he is now running in a by-election in New Brunswick, said that he did not know what kind of tax it might be but did not dismiss the possibility that he might keep the GST in its present form, because he realizes that the only way to a fairer tax system is to introduce the goods and services tax.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the situation of poor children in Canada is dramatic. We have been saying this for a long time. It is absolutely incredible. The gap between rich and poor is widening, and obviously we must do something about it. What we can do, as a responsible government, is to take the money from income tax and other taxes and redistribute it to Canadians who need it most.

The hon. member forgot to mention that when we came to power in 1984, we found a horrific debt which is now taking on gigantic proportions. Everyone agrees that we must pay off the federal debt and the deficit. Mr. Speaker, just imagine all the money we are spending just to pay the interest on the interest on our debt. If we had only 50 per cent of that money to hand out to poor children, I think there would be fewer, if any, poor children left.

We must get at the root of the problem. As I see it, if we go on, it will get even worse, because we will have no money to redistribute.

In her question to the Prime Minister on October 2, she mentioned the world summit on children's rights. I think it was the first time the United Nations, in fact the first time ever that a children's summit was held and an international declaration was drafted on the survival, protection and development of children, with a corresponding plan of action. We are committed to putting in place a national action program to help children. Mr. Speaker, I think much remains to be done. This is one of the issues I am very much concerned about. There are children who are mistreated, but there is also the very distressing question of child sexual abuse. And now, for the first time, there will be a national office to co-ordinate the activities of all federal departments with a mandate in this area, and I think that is a good sign. We need the help of all parties in this House to find long-term solutions. Mr. Speaker, in concluding I think the hon. member will agree that the best way to find those solutions is to get the money, from income tax and other taxes, and redistribute it to the poor children of this country.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have participated in the late show, so correct me if I get off track here.

• (1910 )

My purpose in speaking this evening concerns a question that I put to the Minister of Finance on Friday, September 28. I asked him why he continued to say that business in this country was basically supportive of the goods and services tax when, in fact, over 90 per cent of the business in this country is opposed to the GST. I was kind of wondering why he kept saying this when it was a fallacy.

The second part of my question was: In light of this current economy, why would he be proceeding with the goods and services tax when the sectors of our business community such as construction, retail and tourism were the sectors that were hardest hit by the GST?

Of course, in his second answer, the Minister of Finance talked about some visitor that he had to his office. He was nowhere near the answer to the question.

I put this question to the Minister of Finance because I am hearing day in and day out, not just from my own constituents, the small businesses in my community, the butchers, the bakers, over 300 restaurants in Broadview—Greenwood, small and medium manufacturers, that at this point in our economy, we do not need another tax.

When even the largest supporter of business, the group that represents the largest 150 corporations in Canada, the Business Council on National Issues, presented its submission to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in the initial pages of the representation, Mr. D'Aquino said that by international standards, we already impose a heavy income tax burden on our citizens.

In 1987, almost 40 per cent of all tax revenues raised in Canada came from personal income tax. This was higher than any any of the G-7 countries.

What we have today is a system in our country. The Minister of Finance is really misreading this whole tax problem. The GST has really become the lightning rod, but the real problem is that our fundamental Canadian Income Tax Act with its regulations comprises a document of almost 15,000 pages, rules, regulations, exceptions, exceptions to exceptions. Most honest tax lawyers and tax accounts who represent these businesses will admit to you that it has gone beyond control.

They no longer understand what is going on in this tax act. So, the Minister of Finance, in the middle of a recession is not only ignoring the fact that the fundamental tax act is wrong, he comes along and adds the GST, a goods and services tax which also has all kinds of rules, regulations and exceptions. People are going out of their minds with complication.

In his answer to me, he said—I give him credit for this—that there are elements of the GST that some parts of the business community do not like. That does not, in any way, take away from the importance to the business community and to the economy of Canada for getting on with what is widely regarded internationally as one of the best things we can do to improve the competitive position in our economy.

I have been listening. This is something that the Minister of Finance really does not want to participate in, which is primarily what a member of Parliament's responsibility is supposed to be. We are agents of our constituents here. We are supposed to be listening to them.

Do you think I would be standing here talking about this if my constituents were not really delivering me a message? The secret to world class competitiveness is to treat people fairly.

• (1915)

How can you motivate people? How can you change the attitude on the shop floor and in the executive office if there is a feeling of unfairness and the basic system is unfair?

Mr. Speaker, what I am telling you is that phase one of this government's tax reform has not been done. Phase two, which is the GST, is not fair, and this unfairness is a disincentive to productivity, the productivity that the minister hopes we can get in this country.

The minister continually says that there are no alternatives. Professor Brooks has put forward an alternative. You know that I have worked hard with many people across the country on the single tax, which is a much more simple, fair, efficient and workable system which will bring the government the same amount of revenue.

There is also a system from the University of Toronto called the alternatives to the goods and services tax. So, Mr. Speaker, I wish and I plead through you to the Minister of Finance that when he stands up to answer questions in the House that he stop following that line, what is the line we are going to put out, and really try to deal directly with the questions put to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am saddened to hear my colleague on the other side of the House say that his constituents do not understand and do not accept the GST. Mr. Speaker, I should think that the first responsibility of a member is indeed to explain to the people the nature of the legislation adopted by the House of Commons. And if the constituents of my colleague do not understand the GST, his duty is to explain it to them, not to criticize it. In response to my colleague's arguments concerning Canadian companies, here is what Canadian Appliance Manufacturers Association Vice-President Steve Snyder had to say, and I quote:

> The Canadian appliance industry believes that the GST will go a long way towards increasing fairness in the sales tax system.

Stephen Baker, Chairman of the Committee on Intergovernmental Relations of the Canadian Gift and Tableware Association stated, and I quote:

> Our association supports the GST because it feels that during the 90s and at the beginning of the next century the GST will lighten the tax load of the manufacturing sector and spread it more equitably among all sectors of the Canadian economy.

Here is another statement, this time from Canadian Manufacturers' Association Vice-President Jim Wright:

> CMA officials have been advocating a reform of the sales tax for over 35 years, and they are quite pleased that their proposition has finally been acted on.

For his part, CMA President Laurent Thibault stated:

> As you will see for yourself the comments we have had indicate that most of our members support the goods and services tax.

And this from Strong Equipment Corp. President Jordan Sullivan:

> The industry is in favour of the GST [—]

Ingersoll-Rand Canada Inc. Controller Charles England put it this way:

> The new tax will solve that problem because we will no longer have to determine whether a product is taxable. Collecting the sales tax will be simplified.

Stelco Inc. President Frederick Telmer said this:

> The new goods and services tax—applicable to consumer goods rather than income—is a worthwhile measure.

And from WCI Industries Ltd. Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Bill Lutton:

> WCI Canada management endorse the tax because we believe the new tax is a positive measure which will make the sales tax system fairer and more readily understandable.

In New Brunswick, Maritime Beverages Ltd. Manager Marvin Corscadden sees it this way:

> The GST seems to be more advantageous than we first thought.

Another opinion, this one from steelmaker IPSCO Inc.:

> Without the federal sales tax a good many IPSCO customers will be more competitive and, by the same token, find it a lot easier to market their products.

Finally, a word from the Canadian Construction Association:

> The GST will lower prices in the non-residential construction sector.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on, but instead allow me to give my colleague a list of people and Canadian industries that support and understand the GST.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.21 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 23, 1990

The House met at 11 a.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Before the business of the day commences, I feel obliged to refer to comments I made following the point of order by the hon. member for Saint-Denis yesterday and a point of order that was supported by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

I want to make it very clear to the House that my comments meant no reflection whatsoever on the House or the House leadership. I also am prepared to acknowledge that whatever my views might have been at the moment, I probably went further than a Speaker should. The rule remains the same; this House can do by consent what it wishes to do. I am sorry if I have caused any undue anxiety for any of the House leadership. That was not my intention.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 36 I would like to present four petitions, in which the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. The petitioners are residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, from the towns of Manitouwadge and Cochrane.

On behalf of the 278 petitioners who rely on this tax benefit, I must reiterate the importance of this deduction to northern communities. The government is presently studying the report and it is imperative that it reject the recommendation presented in this same report.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, the pleasure and, in fact, the duty to table today a petition in this House, signed by residents from a number of communities in my riding, including Prince George, Vanderhoof, McBride, Burns Lake, Willow River, Cluculz Lake and Penny. The petitioners express concerns about this government's policy as it relates to taxation, specifically, their opposition to the goods and services tax.

They hope and pray that this Parliament, including the Liberals in the Senate, will do its best to try to defeat this tax.

WHARFS AND HARBOURS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured today to rise, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition, signed by many residents in my riding who are concerned about the maintenance of wharfs and harbours in Prince Edward Island.

The petition states that whereas, the Government of Canada has a duty to provide properly maintained wharfs and harbours; whereas many of the wharfs in Prince Edward Island are in a deplorable and unsafe state and require major repair; and whereas the fisheries is one of the most important industries on Prince Edward Island, these petitioners ask the government to proceed with the necessary maintenance and repair and ensure the safety, in future, of the fishery in Prince Edward Island.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to table a petition which has been certified correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions.

The petition is signed by a number of residents of the province of Ontario, including people from Toronto, Burlington, Simcoe, Hamilton, Brantford, Scotland, Waterford, and Cayuga.

All of the petitioners, Mr. Speaker, are opposed to the goods and services tax. They point out that the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins, and home heating fuels and, perhaps, depending on the intention of the Prime Minister, books. They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. They want reform of the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to submit to you a petition that I have here in my hands, from a number of Canadians who are very angry. They are angry about the goods and services tax and they have said so in this petition to which they have affixed their names.

Among the things which they are angry about, as I read this petition, is that they are unhappy about the goods and services tax touching such areas as haircuts, fast foods, piano lessons, and even consumer loans which they take out to pay the taxes. But they are angry too because, last night, the Prime Minister indicated that he might be fudging with the tax and they did not have a chance to put that "fudging" stuff into this petition.

In consequence, I submit this petition in anticipation that there will be more to come, because of the fudging last night by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour of presenting a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out their concern that the government, apparently up until last night at least, was planning to tax reading material.

This, of course, would include young children's story books. Parents sit with their children in the evenings and attempt to teach them reading and listening skills. The government was going to tax this but we have heard that the Prime Minister may be changing his mind on this and we certainly hope that he does. The petitioners are asking that the whole tax be chucked out. That is on the reading materials, Mr. Speaker, and I have a petition on another matter.

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker, another group of petitioners from western Canada point out a whole list of concerns and why they oppose the government's decision to proceed with the unpopular goods and services tax.

They point out that while 85 per cent of Canadians do not want this tax because it will be inflationary and consequently encourage a further increase in interest rates. They ask the government to back off from imposing this very punitive, cruel tax on the people of Canada.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF 36TH COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE IN HARARE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to revert to Reports from Interparliamentary Delegations.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to revert to Presenting Reports from Inter-parliamentary Delegations?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Erie.

[English]

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House in both official languages the report of the official parliamentary delegation which participated in the 36th Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference in Harare, September 14 through September 22, 1990.

During the time of that conference, the Canadian delegation was well represented in the plenary and committee sessions on important topics such as South Africa and its problems, one of the important issues that was dealt with during that conference.

I just want to inform all members of the House on all sides that we can be proud of all the members who participated in the debates.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Reverting to petitions. The hon. member for Scarborough Centre.

[English]

PETITIONS

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petitioners who have signed this petition are from Scarborough, Peterborough, Toronto and Lakefield.

The petitioners submit this petition in respect to disclosure of food content in packaged food. This is a very serious issue. I was moved on this particular issue because of the premature death of Robyn Allen, age 15 years, and other young people whose lives have been snuffed out because of a severe allergy reaction.

The petitioners are calling upon this Parliament to amend the food and drug regulations to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in pre-packaged foods.

In addition, in this petition, they request that restaurateurs and food retailers be required to provide, on demand, to customers a list of all food ingredients, including additives in prepared foods.

GANNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from the residents of Grand Manan Island, pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain the staffing of the Gannet Rock lighthouse.

I want to take a minute to explain this petition. It is a very important one to the residents of Grand Manan Island. Gannet Rock is a lighthouse in the Bay of Fundy. There is a great deal of commercial traffic in this area, notably tankers on the way to the largest oil refinery in eastern Canada.

This lighthouse has been in service from the 1800s and we do not want to see it automated. We do not want an automated lighthouse there. We believe it is important that the residents of the island continue to have the kind of service they have today, in other words, a manned lighthouse to preserve the environment of that area. It is critical that the lighthouse be maintained the way it is.

The residents of the island have signed this petition and I do present it on their behalf.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-84

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, not more than one additional day shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on such day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would wish to take a few moments to speak briefly to the motion I have introduced.

I think it is fair to say that we have introduced time—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the debate, but I have had precious little experience as Assistant Deputy Chairman and I cannot learn the finer points of procedure overnight. Indeed, first I have to read the motion now before the House.

[English]

The hon. Minister of State for Privatization has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I think you are doing fine in the Chair. You do not have to apologize to the House at all.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we have introduced time allocation because the system in the House of Commons is that the House leaders get together to discuss what business the government has and how it will be carried out. If an agreement cannot be reached to allow so much time for debate on a certain bill, then the government has some options at its disposal. One, of course, is to allow the debate to carry on, as some people would say, ad nauseam. Another option is time allocation where the government specifies a certain number of hours or a certain number of days to debate the bill. Another is one that we hear all the time about closure. The government announces that it will just shut down debate. The debate carries on in the House that day until one o'clock in the morning and then the vote takes place.

It is my understanding, and I find it rather interesting, that in the British House all legislation is given a time allocation, if I can put it that way. The parties sit down and between them say that this is a very important bill, we will debate this for 20 hours. This is not so important, we will debate it for an hour, and so on. That way the order of business is controlled in a much better way in the British Parliament. It is something that I would urge this government and the opposition parties to sit down and discuss, because I think it makes sense.

One of the things that I hear from people when I go to my riding on the weekends is that they do not understand, when the government has a majority, why it cannot get its legislation through.

An hon. member: Forty-three per cent is not a majority in modern day mathematics. You're at 15 per cent now.

Mr. McDermid: Well, the NDP has a majority government in the province of Ontario and it got 37 per cent of the vote. The NDP says it has a majority government. I have heard the premier, an NDP premier, say it has a majority. So, all the cackling from the NDP at the present time is nonsense.

• (1120)

As I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted by the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party—he has a tendency to be doing that these days as he is hurting a bit—we are in a position in which we have a legislative timetable and we want to proceed with it while at the same time allowing debate in the House and getting legislation into committee where it can be examined on a clause-by-clause basis. That is what we are doing today.

I want the public to understand clearly that we will have four full days of debate on the Petro-Canada legislation at second reading. It will then go to a legislative committee which will call witnesses, examine it on a clause-by-clause basis, and make its recommendations back to the House at report stage. Then we will have a third reading debate.

I am sure the opposition will disagree, but we feel that that gives ample time in the House of Commons to carry on a reasonable debate during which genuine points can be made by every opposition party. They have their concerns, and that is fair. They have ample time to express those concerns in this debate. They have had two days already. There will be today and tomorrow as well.

I will close my remarks because there are a lot of people who do want to debate this bill and participate in the privatization debate on Petro-Canada, but I would like to note this. This morning on Peter Gzowski's show on CBC radio there was a discussion with three people representing different parties. There was the Hon. Marc Lalonde, who is a former minister of many positions in the Liberal government. There was Rosemary Brown from the New Democratic Party, a very prominent member of that party and former member and cabinet member in British Columbia, and Dalton Camp.

The three of them were discussing Petro-Canada this morning, and it was rather interesting. Rosemary Brown asked Mr. Lalonde the question: "Since you were around when Petro-Canada was put together, was one of Petro-Canada's goals or reasons for being in existence to control oil and gas prices, the petroleum prices, at the pumps?" Mr. Lalonde said: "Never. It was never considered for that. It was never envisaged that that would be one of its responsibilities as a Crown corporation." Of course, he was expressing the government's opinion at the time it was established.

The other thing that he said this morning, which I found rather interesting, was that he has no trouble with the privatization of Petro-Canada. He feels it does not serve a public policy purpose, and that there are other areas such as the Petroleum Monitoring Agency and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration that give us the window on the industry. Therefore, he has no trouble with the privatization of Petro-Canada.

I wanted to publicly thank Mr. Lalonde for his endorsation this morning. Since he has returned to the private sector, he has started to see things in much better perspective. I want to thank him for that publicly today.

In closing, I want to say once again that we feel, because we could not reach agreement with the opposition parties to manage the business of the House in respect of Petro-Canada, that we did have to bring in time allocation to allow today and tomorrow for debate. Then we will have the vote tomorrow so it can go on to a legislative committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to take part in the debate on the time allocation motion moved by the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, but nothing more. I believe I made this speech a number of times in this Parliament and I regret having to do so once again. The minister has introduced a motion to limit debate to only two days, today and tomorrow. These would be the third and fourth days of debate on this bill, and that is not enough. The minister knows that full well, and I think the government has taken a dictatorial approach as to how the business of the House is to be conducted.

[English]

I am going to continue to expound on the theme because I feel it is time again to expose the government for its shocking approach to Parliament and parliamentary debate.

The minister says agreement could not be reached, as though agreement was somehow necessary in this kind of debate. Surely, on a bill that is opposed by the opposition, there should be a reasonable time for debate. Yet what is the record on this bill? We have had two days of debate so far. Four hours and ten minutes is the total time that has been spent in the Chamber debating this bill. We have the government saying it is time to draw this to a close.

Four of our members have spoken. That is four members out of approximately eighty in the Liberal caucus who have had an opportunity to participate so far in the debate on this bill. Yet, the government now takes the view that it is time to close off debate.

I must protest this in the very strongest terms. In my submission it is improper for the government to be constantly using this rule. The Minister of State for Privatization says to look at the British experience and we should follow that. This House is not the British House. This House has different traditions from what the British House has. The tradition has been to allow for freedom of speech and freedom of debate in this House. This government is intent—I could use other words—on limiting debate at every opportunity.

I would like to go through the list of closure and time allocation which we have suffered in this Parliament at the hands of this Draconian and uncaring government. It is really a disgraceful record. We have had closure applied, and I am referring to closure under Standing Order 57, 13 times in this Parliament to date. We have had time allocation applied six times and today is number seven. Bear in mind that when time allocation is applied, it often can cover two stages of a bill at once, that is, report stage and third reading. In fact, that is exactly what has happened. I am not counting those as double whammies. I am only counting those as single episodes. That is six times without counting them twice.

Let us go back to the list. I invite members to listen to the list of bills that this has been applied on. First, there is the free trade bill. It was closured at every opportunity in the first session of this Parliament and it was also moved on a motion to suspend the rules in relation to that bill. Second, it was applied on the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, at second reading, report stage, third reading, and then on the Senate amendments. Third, there are the Excise Tax Act amendments in Bill C-20. Closure was applied at second reading. There was the Plant Breeders' Rights Act with closure at second reading; the Advance Payments for Crops Act, closure at second reading; Bill C-28, the clawback provisions of the Income Tax Act, closure at second reading and time allocation on third reading and report stage; Bill C-49, the Resumption of Government Services Act, closure at second reading; the Goods and Services Tax, closure at second reading and time allocation on report stage and third reading; the Crop Insurance Act, closure at third reading; the Borrowing Authority Act, time allocation at second reading; the Restraint of Government Expenditures Act, time allocation at second reading; and, the Hibernia Project, time allocation for both report stage and third reading.

That is the litany of dictatorial approaches that the government has taken to government legislation in the House. In every case the debates have been short. It is not as though there has been a week allowed on any one of these bills before closure or time allocation was applied. In every single case the debate was less than five sitting days. We have never had a protracted debate in this Chamber on any item of government legislation since November of 1988.

The minister of state and government House leader were up on October 11 when the government lost its first notice on this bill. Mr. Speaker, you will recall that they gave notice of time allocation on the first day of debate on this bill, if you can imagine.

• (1130)

During the first day they said they were going to move it the next. It was only because the Minister of State for Privatization could not read his notice properly that we were fortunate enough to have the Speaker strike that notice out, and so we have got it again today.

The minister of state and leader of the government in the House got up and made a speech. In his speech he quoted certain statistics. He said that between 1980 and 1984 time allocation under rule 78, which we are discussing today, was used 29 times in that four-year period. He claimed that in the six years since then it has been used 27 times. Well, this must be number 28.

He was talking about rule 78 alone. He tried to suggest that the government had been slow in using this rule because it had only used it as many times in six years as the previous government had in four. What he omitted to discuss was the number of times closure, rule 57, had been applied. As I have indicated, that has already been used 13 times in this Parliament, and I do not know how many times it was used in the previous one. I was not here and I have not gone back to check all those records.

It is a distorting group of figures that the government House leader used. I submit it was a set of figures that were intended to mislead the public as to the intent of the government here in using closure so often. I submit that when you look at the total picture, this government has used closure and abused the rules of this House to ensure that its legislation gets through without debate or with very limited debate.

I would like to turn to the example I cited in this House a year ago, on October 26, 1989. I was speaking on this same subject in this House. I pointed out what kind of record it was the previous government had.

As the government House leader has said, time allocation was used something like 29 times in a four-year period. One of the times it was used was in 1983. This was on Bill C-155, an act to facilitate the transportation, shipping and handling of western grain.

That bill was extensively debated in this House. I would like to recount, Mr. Speaker, once again the statistics on that debate to show something of the latitude that was allowed by previous governments, by previous Houses, by previous Parliaments, that is not allowed in the current situation.

That bill was introduced on second reading and 97 speakers were given an opportunity to address the bill at second reading. Just at second reading, 97 speakers, Mr. Speaker. Think of it. We have not had anything like that number on this bill. I would be surprised if we have had more than 10. I did not do a count on the total, but there are only four from this caucus, and there cannot be many more from the New Democratic Party caucus. In fact there would be less. I would bet there were two.

The bill was sent to a committee after this extensive second reading, nine days at second reading, 97 speakers. Then it went to committee. Three months of committee hearings with over 200 representations, and then the bill came back at report stage. How long was it debated at report stage, Mr. Speaker? What is the longest we have had in this Parliament at report stage on any bill? I will bet it has not been more than three days. I will bet it has not been more than two, but I will give the government the benefit of the doubt and say it was three. Fifteen days on report stage on this bill, Mr. Speaker, 15 days, and then finally the government brought in time allocation and limited debate on third reading to two days. That was considered Draconian.

Hon. members who now sit on the government benches objected in the strongest terms to the use of time allocation on that bill. Yet, here we have the minister piously intoning that we ought to agree to this because it is reasonable in the circumstances, that it is a fair restriction on debate because we have not been able to agree on a time allocation for this bill. Four days is insufficient to debate a bill which is so roundly condemned by the public.

If this bill were introduced at any time other than when the GST is the big item in the news, it would be roundly condemned in the press and there would be a public outcry against it. This government is seeking to stifle any criticism, and avoid the public outcry, by ramming this bill through with time allocation, and I object in the strongest terms.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have mixed feelings, I suppose, about participating in this debate. Once again we have to say it is a very dark day for the democratic system in the House of Commons. It is a very bleak day in terms of parliamentary democracy because once again we see the Conservatives using the heavy hand of closure to muzzle the House of Commons, to cut off debate prematurely, to end discussion of government legislation.

I want to at the beginning make it very clear that the people who are watching the debate today on television should be well aware that this government has used some form of closure and time allocation more than we have ever witnessed in Canadian history over a period of time. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, first of all that since closure was first introduced away back in 1913, it had only been used 19 times up until 1984.

Then of course in 1984 things began to change. Closure of course is a motion which ends further debate on a measure with a mandatory vote at 1 a.m. The Tories have used it 15 times and have threatened to use it another 10 times since 1984. Time allocation allows the government to set a time limit of as little as two days of debate on any measure. It has been used 27 times in the six years of Tory government.

What it says is that this government does not like democracy. It finds the Parliament of Canada a nuisance. It finds the committees of Canada a nuisance. It has taken step after step, time after time, to throw the rule books away and has used this very Draconian, undemocratic, unparliamentary measure called time allocation or closure.

I challenge the minister who indicated that an agreement could not be reached. Quite the contrary, we made a very clear offer. When the New Democratic Party was approached, after we had had only one speaker on the bill to dismantle Petro-Canada, we were asked if we could come to an agreement. We said: "We are reluctant to agree to anything that would expedite the destruction of our national oil company, but at this particular stage of the debate, to facilitate the matter getting into committee where we can bring forward witnesses to point out clearly what this is going to do to our ability in terms of energy security in the future, we would like to be given four and a half hours of debate time in the House of Commons".

Four and a half hours of debate time on a process to dismantle a multimillion dollar enterprise that touches the lives of every Canadian, no matter where they live in the country, is hardly being unrealistic. The government said: "No, we cannot allow four and a half hours of time to listen to the opposition on this matter, so we are going to introduce time allocation".

This is at a time when we are in an energy crisis, where the oil prices at the pumps are sky-rocketing. Canadians carry a card in their wallets, their purses and their hip pockets with pride, and that is the Petro-Canada card, because they know it is their oil company. It is not Mobil Oil, it is not part of the Exxon family, it is not a multinational company operating out of the United States. It is Canadians' own oil company, Petro-Canada. Now the government wants to say: "We are going to take all of the credit cards and in a sense tear them up on behalf of Canadians because we want to turn it over to private interests".

Mr. Speaker, do you know how many oil producing countries in the world have private interests solely in control of their oil patch? The United States is one, because it owns virtually all of the multinationals. Second, Margaret Thatcher sold off their national oil company as part of her ideological approach to the marketplace. That is the only one, other than the United States. Every other country has its own oil company.

Now the Tories say: "There is one last vestige of Canadianism in this country and we are going to dismantle and destroy it". They do not want to allow debate on this critical issue, and we say that is absolutely unacceptable.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are into a national emergency, with oil prices increasing at the pumps so that it is causing pain to every single Canadian, when it is going to result in an increase in the cost of goods that Canadians buy in every part of the country, when it is driving companies, farmers and fishermen into bankruptcy, who is behind all of this nonsense? Who is it that is really responsible? I suggest that it is not the hon. member, who is the government House leader, from Calgary. I suggest that it is the Prime Minister of Canada because not only is he wishing to destroy and dismantle Petro-Canada, he is in the process of destroying the Parliament of Canada. and we find that unacceptable.

• (1140)

I pose some questions. Could it be that the government House leader has been instructed by the Prime Minister to do what he can to destroy Parliament?

An hon. member: Ram legislation through.

Mr. Riis: Who is it that comes in daily, striding into the House to challenge the Speaker, to challenge decisions that the House has taken? Who is it that is continuously making spurious allegations against members of the House and casting aspersions on the table officers, as well as the Speaker in the chair from time to time? It is the hon. member who is the government representative in the House.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that those kinds of actions by the government House leader are causing this House to be a House of ill repute. The people of Canada are disgusted with the kind of antics that they are seeing on behalf of government members time and time again as they challenge the chair, and so on.

Who is it, Mr. Speaker, that on occasion has threatened the Speaker? I remember when the government House leader stormed the Chair. He stood in front of you, Mr. Speaker, and flexed his muscles and put his fist into the face of the Speaker because he did not like a ruling of the Speaker. This is the first time we have seen any of that despicable, disgusting behaviour in the House of Commons. Who was it that really did that, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. member: Harvie?

Mr. Riis: Who is it that continues to behave this way? Is it really the government House leader or is it the Prime Minister who is running this puppet in the House of Commons from the Prime Minister's Office in the Langevin Block?

There is something extremely sinister going on in this House.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Riis: While we assume that it is the government House leader who from time to time challenges the Speaker's rulings, that bad mouths the good office of the Speaker and his advisers, is this the person who is really doing this?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Riis: Or is it the quiet voice of the Prime Minister from the Langevin Block, from the Prime Minister's Office?

Is my hon. friend, the Minister of Science over here who shakes his head, saying that the Prime Minister does not support the despicable behaviour?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary House Leader for the New Democratic Party, but I think he is skating perilously close to open water. I would therefore ask him to be very careful and stick to the subject matter of the motion.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I am attempting to do, in trying to explain to the people of Canada what is going on. But this motion is just one of an ongoing series where this government—and to be more specific, this Prime Minister—is attempting to run the Government of Canada not through the House of Commons, but through the Langevin Block, the Prime Minister's Office, and the Prime Minister is using his puppet in the House of Commons, called the government House leader, to carry out his dirty work. We are simply saying we have identified this plot and we do not plan to sit quietly by and be muzzled by it, not able to speak out to the people of Canada on this issue.

An hon. member: They're muzzled. They have been told to shut up.

Mr. Riis: I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that regardless of how any of us might feel about the government using closure and time allocation on a regular basis, and trying to give the impression that this is somehow being based on the practices of the Mother of Parliament in the United Kingdom, is absolutely and totally false. There is no connection between the two in terms of how they deal with legislation.

I know that this is the desire of the Prime Minister to enable him to move his political agenda through the House of Commons with as little public comment as possible because when the people of Canada understand what this legislation is all about, they oppose it. In the GST, we now have 85 per cent of the people saying they oppose that legislation.

As my hon. friend from the official opposition who just spoke indicated, if the GST was not dominating people, like the public consciousness, and people understood that right now the Government of Canada and the Prime Minister of Canada want to dismantle Petro-Canada, that it wants to destroy the national oil company that belongs to the people of Canada and turn it over to American oil interests, the people of Canada would be speaking out again.

I say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we oppose this type of procedural tactic in the House of Commons to limit debate. We oppose what the government is doing in terms of dismantling one more fabric of what Canada is all about. We will never accept the kind of dictatorial totalitarian approach to parliamentary democracy and our parliamentary system now or in the future.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not often get the privilege of entering into a debate, and I did not intend to enter into this one. However, I have to admit that watching and listening to my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party inspired me to rise to my feet to enter into this debate for a few minutes.

The question of time allocation is one that has for a long time been a matter of controversy within this House because the opposition parties have consistently said that there is something wrong with time allocation, that we should not be using time allocation, that it is disgusting behaviour on the part of the government, that it has no right to do it, that it should not be doing it, and on and on and on.

The reality is that time allocation and closure are a part of the rules of the House of Commons. Why are they a part of the rules of the House of Commons? It is because the tradition in this House which has gone on for years and years—certainly more years than I have been around—has made it very clear that from time to time there have to be provisions that allow a government to proceed with its legislation.

That was put in there because there has always been a concern as to whether or not the government can continue to put forward its legislative agenda. The man on the street understands that. He recognizes that a government that was given a majority in the House of Commons was given that majority for one purpose, and that purpose was to allow it to complete its legislative agenda.

Why are we into a debate on time allocation this morning? Is it because the people across Canada are angry about it? No, I do not think that is the case at all. Is it because the opposition and the government have been able to come to an agreement on how this bill ought to be debated and handled in the House of Commons at the second reading stage, the committee stage, the report stage, and the third reading stage? No, in fact it is quite the contrary.

What the opposition failed to see and to mention in its speeches is that the government on a regular basis puts forward a number of pieces of legislation. Each of those pieces of legislation is designed and put forward to be dealt with in a certain time frame that fits with the scheduled sittings of this House.

As a result, we have been successful in previous sessions and periods of time negotiating among parties a calendar with which all parties could deal. The purpose of that was of course to allow more debate on bills that had a higher degree of controversy. The trade-off was to have less debate on those bills that do not have the same degree of controversy.

We are faced with exactly that situation today. As I stand before you in this fall session of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, what we are faced with is that we as a government have a fairly extensive legislative agenda. That agenda has been put before other members of this House and certainly the other parties of this House.

We have offered to negotiate with them all of those pieces of legislation to find out if there is between us an agreement as to how we will handle each and every piece of legislation. We recognize that some of the bills we proceed with are more controversial than others. Therefore we are prepared, on bills where there could well be agreement among the three parties to deal with them quickly, to add or attach the time that would normally have been used for debate on them to the more difficult and more controversial bills.

The problem we are facing at the moment is that we have no such agreement. In fact we have a sense that each and every bill, no matter how controversial or how important it is to members of this House, will continue to be debated without some sort of action being taken. That is a very serious matter that we need to look at. I think the reason that we need to look at it is that there is within the country a growing sense that this institution is breaking down. People are losing confidence in this institution.

Why are they doing that? I think there are a number of factors, one of which has to be the behaviour in the other place. That, under the leadership of the Liberal Party in this House, has done more to discredit the Senate and this institution than virtually any other item existing across this country today. For that there certainly should be loud cries of shame.

The other thing is that one of the problems we face in the question of time allocation and closure is that we hear words as those that were used a while ago by the House leader of the NDP when he said it is dictatorial. He has a favourite expression called putting the jack-boots to Parliament. Those very words imply something illegal, immoral, and wrong when in reality this is a legitimate exercise allowed for and created by the rules that we live by in this Chamber. How can that be, then, putting the jack-boots to Parliament? How is that somehow an action of a dictator? It is not.

The impression that is left with the Canadian people is that this institution is constantly in a state of aggressive confrontation, when all of us in this House know in fact that is not the case. There are on regular occasions opportunities for us to agree, to do things by unanimous consent, to do things with minor disagreements, to allow something to proceed so that a minor amendment can be made and we as a House can agree to it. That is normal, acceptable behaviour in this House, just as the use of time allocation is normal, acceptable behaviour in this House when the negotiations break down.

The Canadian people need to understand that that kind of behaviour, that kind of rhetoric, is not in fact the reality within this Chamber. The reality is that we can and should be able to proceed as adults on all pieces of legislation. Canadians need to understand that this is not a forum where we all sit in a big circle and chit-chat with each other. It is a forum where we are separated by an aisle and we engage in aggressive debate. We try to put forward the pros and cons of each piece of legislation, and that is the style of the institution.

It does not mean that therefore the process itself has to be viewed as a war or a combat. The process is simply the means by which we do our business. In reality, the hard hitting debate has to come as we address the issues. That is why the rules state what they state. That is why they have provisions in them for this kind of situation.

Mr. Speaker, I see you have signalled that I am coming close to the end of my time, but I want to say this. The House leader for the New Democratic Party made several charges against the House leader on the government side, some very aggressive words. First, he should go back and read the record. It was not the House leader for the government who at any time marched the Chair in a debate of years ago. That was not the case. This House leader has a job to do, just as the New Democratic House leader has and as the House leader for the Liberal Party has. He has a job to push, to prod, to attempt to get his legislation through. When it is necessary he has to move time allocation and closure.

It is important for Canadian people to understand that that is only resorted to in times of—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am very hesitant to interrupt my hon. friend's comments, but I rise on a point of clarification. I want to make it clear that whatever the House leader for the New Democratic Party does in the House, he does so with the support of his leader. I am suggesting that the House leader for the government must be doing whatever he does in the House with the knowledge and support of his leader as well.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to leave any doubt on the record but that I as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House and his colleagues support him. We support him because we have confidence in the way he manages our business and in the way he delivers to the country a consistent pattern of legislation that reflects the concerns and goals of the government.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the motion of the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs to allocate time and impose closure on the debate on the bill that would authorize the privatization and sale of Petro-Canada.

The government calls it time allocation. We in the opposition call it closure. That is a bit of an ugly word. It is an historically ugly word. It means a lot of members who want to speak to a bill will not have an opportunity at the particular stage with which we are dealing, the stage in relation to which time allocation is moved. These members come from all across the country. They represent regional and local interests. They all have a perspective on the legislation, and they must have the right to continue to have input into all legislation on behalf of their constituents.

Closure or time allocation removes that. It squeezes it out. It squelches the debate which is essential to the deliberation of legislation in the House. The closure or time allocation instrument is a very blunt instrument, and Canadians are entitled to an explanation from the government whenever it is used. They should demand it, and I am demanding it. I want to know why the government requires time allocation/closure right now.

It has not provided a reason. It feels that parliamentary procedures are a little too cumbersome for it. Why does it want to exclude members of the House from debate on what we regard as a very important piece of legislation? What is the reason? What is the rush?

I am curious because just last week, after the first three speakers had spoken in the House, the minister for privatization rose and moved time allocation. What was the rush? Having tripped up at that instance, it is back in the House this week. It still has not been explained why. The government claims it cannot reach an agreement, but the evidence in the House last week was that it barely tried to reach an agreement.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to interrupt my friend, the critic for privatization, but I would want him to be accurate in his comments. I introduced a motion which gave notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: That is not a point of order.

Mr. McDermid: I am on a point of order; I can have a point of order. I introduced a motion to give notice that in the future I would be introducing time allocation, but in fact I did not introduce time allocation. I want the hon. member to be fair when he is making those comments.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I hear what the minister is saying, but the fact remains that notice was attempted to be introduced at the time, the same notice that was introduced yesterday. I am sure the Canadian public will understand the fine distinction between notice of the motion and the motion itself. However, I want to suggest that this is another form of tyranny by the majority. We all know it is there, it is a legislated tyranny. The majority in this Parliament has the right to move ahead with its agenda, but it does not have the right to trample on a healthy opposition, and this is a a healthy opposition.

We find, in exercising this tyranny the way the government does, we only have the odd check and balance left, and one of them happens to be the Senate. The government does not like that; it is shocked that there is a check and balance in the existence of the Senate. But that is what the Senate, as a place of sober second thought, is doing.

An hon. member suggested earlier that the government House leader was a puppet of the Prime Minister, that the Prime Minister had a particular agenda, and that this time allocation motion was part of that. I have another suggestion. I have a suggestion that this time allocation initiative is not part of that agenda at all. In fact, I want to suggest that the government does not have any agenda.

The Minister of State for Privatization went to cabinet table and said, "Gee, do you think we could get on with the Petro-Canada bill", and the other ministers around him said, "Wow, we have nothing else going. John, take it away, roll with it, run it through, because we have nothing else to put forward". If the government does have other priorities, where are they? Where is the broadcasting bill, the bill governing transfer payments to the provinces, the bill on MPs conflict of interest, the proposed OSLO oil sands legislation, the proposed legislation concerning criminal records, and environmental assessment? Where is that legislation? What is the rush with the Petro-Canada bill?

I think this minister has carte blanche because the government does not have another agenda. The government wants to turn out the lights at this stage. But the bill will be back, Mr. Speaker, the bill will be back. But the government wants to turn out the lights now and preclude members from making their positions known to this Parliament and to their constituents. I object strongly, my constituents object strongly, and the opposition objects strongly.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like for a moment to discuss why it is necessary for this government to use time allocation in the House to get very necessary legislation through.

I would like to answer my hon. friend who suggests that there is no other legislation to bring forward and that is why we are using time allocation. It would seem to me that if this government did not have legislation to put before the House, it clearly would not use time allocation, because all time allocation does is shorten up the time the bill is in the House. All we are doing is pushing forward the agenda so other bills can come into the House.

An hon. member: Shocking.

Mr. Shields: We hear comments that it is shocking and accusations about our government and the use of the rules of the House to shorten debate in order to bring legislation to a conclusion in this House.

Mr. Speaker, here are some facts of which my hon. friends might not be aware. If they look back to 1980 to 1984, time allocation motions were used in this House 25 times. From 1984 to 1988, time allocation has been used 20 times. If we consider closure motions, from 1980 to 1984, there have been two closure motions used. From 1984 to 1988, two closure motions were used. We do admit that in 1988 time allocation was used more often. That is because the opposition's tactics forced us, on this side of the House, to use closure. The opposition is no longer content to use legitimate debate and then a negative vote to show its opposition to legislation that the government has brought before the House. It wants to force the government to use closure at every opportunity. Somehow this gives them evidence of being strongly opposed to any legislation or points of view.

This was demonstrated very clearly during the free trade debate. The free trade passed this House, it went to the Senate close to election time. The government had an election on free trade that was passed by the people of Canada who elected this government to implement its program. The government brought in free trade legislation. The opposition then forced the government, after the new government was formed in 1988, to use closure on free trade three times. That should tell everyone in this House of Commons and the people of Canada exactly what the opposition is up to and what its modus operandi is. All it wants to do is create problems.

I support this legislation for a number of reasons. When the formation of Petro-Canada was first debated, I can remember the critic from the NDP standing up and asking why we should be forming a Petro-Canada oil company. He said that what the government should be doing is nationalizing one of the biggies, was the word that was used. Let the government nationalize Imperial Oil. It shows know where they come from. They would like to nationalize all the oil companies right across the country. I hear my hon. friend from Halifax saying the government should nationalize these big oil companies. I wonder if she really believes that that is the policy of the Liberal Party.

Let us look at Petro-Canada and the problems that it faces today. First, it has not discovered any resources. However, the government has a good inventory of the resources that are available in the Northwest Territories in the Canada Lands and so on. Petro-Canada needs to increase its capital base. The government has a chance of increasing that capital base by one of two ways. One, to allow Canadians through the regular system of investment, that is investment in direct share ownership into the company, or the government can turn around with the taxpayers' dollars and turn over more funding to Petro-Canada.

Petro-Canada is going to lose ground at some point with its counterparts in the oil industry. I think that is a known fact. It is time for the Canadian government to get out of the business of pumping gas at the service stations. That is not what its business is about. Its business is about creating the climate for investment so that Canadians and other people can take part in the investment in Canada. The government sees this bill being held up for political reasons only. It is being held up only to create an insecure feeling with the Canadian people.

This is an opportunity for Canadians to own a piece of a large Canadian oil company. The legislation will limit the ownership levels and will not be taken over by foreign control. The government has other ways to control the oil industry in Canada in ways that it wants to do. The discussions that go on in this House are repeated over and over again. All the opposition is attempting to do with this very important piece of legislation is hold it up. We know it, they know it on the opposite side. My friends over there know exactly what they want to do. They want to force this government to use closure or time allocation. That is all they have been doing since coming back in 1988.

Petro-Canada was created in 1970 by the Liberal government. We were told at that time that a state oil company was needed to achieve a number of objectives. It is my believe that the objectives that were outlined when Petro-Canada was formed are no longer necessary today. We can control those objectives. The monitoring can be done through the agencies that have been established since and we have a better understanding of the oil industry today.

My time is up, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say very clearly, and I will put on the record again, that time allocation was used 25 times in 1980 to 1984. Time allocation was used 20 times from 1984 to 1988. Each government in a four-year period has used closure twice.

There has been an increase since taking office in 1988 because that opposition over there, both the Liberal and the NDP, have very clearly signalled its intention to force this government to use closure or time allocation at every opportunity. The other side appears to be using tactics similar to the tactics we see in the Liberal Senate. It is not going to work here because we have rules here, not like the Senate, where they do not have the rules.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader talks of process and rules. I think it would be fair to say that not only does the process stink, but the rules that this government wishes to impose not only on this House but the people of Canada stink.

Not only is it being irresponsible in moving time allocation as it is at this particular issue, but as it has on most fundamental issues that have come forward in this country. It is a disgusting display, I suggest to you, of arrogance and disrespect and disregard for the traditions, not only of the House but for the rights of the people.

This government really has the gall to attack the Senate for its undemocratic nature, then runs roughshod over this House day in and day out. To tell the truth, it makes the Senate look like a poodle compared to the pit bull tactics it uses each and every day.

I suggest that the people of Canada, the man and woman on the street, understand that this government is abusing the power of the majority, abusing the power of Parliament, and abusing the power of government. The rules are made to be respected. They have to be fair and not abused.

Essentially this government has abused the rules and the process in this House to ram through an agenda that it suggests Canadians voted on, but I suggest Canadians knew absolutely nothing about the privatization of Petro-Canada in 1988, knew absolutely nothing about the GST, and now it has the gall to stand up and say: "Oh, Canadians love what we are doing. Canadians want us to pass our legislative agenda". You know that it is a bunch of hogwash.

What really is hypocritical is that this government promotes the fact that it is telling eastern Europe and even the Soviet Union to open up, to become more democratic. What an example it is to the east European countries, and what an example it is to the Soviet Union because 15 times this session it has imposed closure. That is not democratic. That is being dictatorial, so perhaps the government should learn something from the east Europeans, such as the Soviet Union, who are starting to understand and talk about democracy. This government has absolutely no concept of what democracy is all about.

The hon. member for Athabasca talked a little bit about history, but I also want to take this opportunity to talk about the bill, because we are being muzzled. Therefore, I am going to use the remainder of my time to talk, not only about closure, but what in fact Petro-Canada means to the country and, in a sense, what this bill is doing.

First, Mr. Speaker, the government would have us believe that this bill will reduce the government's deficit and, by selling off Petro-Canada, the government will have the mechanism or opportunity to raise capital and do those other things.

Believe it or not, selling Petro-Canada would not assist the government's deficit reduction efforts. Canadians already own Petro-Canada, and Ottawa carries the Crown corporation on its books as an asset of about $4.3 billion. Canadians will not be selling 15 per cent of Petro-Canada. We will be giving it away. Selling an asset means receiving payment in return. How are Canadians going to receive payment in return, or a dime, for Petro-Canada? The government will be giving 15 per cent of it away. The company will keep all the revenues. It is not going to be coming back to Canadians.

Let us look at it hypothetically. If 15 per cent of Petro-Canada is sold at an equivalent value of a $645 million share offering and all the shares are sold, Petro-Canada will receive $645 million. The Canadian people will retain, according to this bill, 85 per cent of the company.

Here is where the fancy bookwork comes in. Canadians now own 100 per cent of Petro-Canada valued at $4.3 billion. If the government privatizes, selling off 15 per cent of the Crown corporation, then Canadians will own 85 per cent of the company valued at $4.3 billion. How can 85 per cent of a company can be worth $4.3 billion when 100 per cent of the same company was worth $4.3 billion before the share offering? The government cannot allow the 15 per cent loss to show up on its books because that would create a loss and increase the deficit. Instead, the government will artificially over-value Petro-Canada's worth to hide the fact that the Tories gave away $645 million of taxpayers' money.

The Minister of State for Privatization told Canadians: "Both the company and the taxpayer can be better served by allowing the company to raise new equity from investors rather than continuing to rely on the Canadian taxpayer." Well, Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must recall the rule of relevance. The debate is on time allocation, not on the substance of the bill. I would therefore appreciate it if the hon. member would keep his speech relevant to the motion before the House.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to defend the right of the hon. member for London East to debate this motion and to refer to the bill.

The motion is to allocate time on this bill. It has been the practice of the House for as long as I have been here, and for many years before, that on a time allocation motion, the merits of the bill can also be raised as relevant to that motion. Clearly, if the bill is a defective bill, the limit of time on it is a serious matter. I submit that with all respect and deference that in fact it is normal on a time allocation motion—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's message has been transmitted. The hon. member for London East.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, you have seen the light. The hon. member for Athabasca went on to talk about history in Canada, so thank you for accepting that.

As I was saying, when the government and other advocates of privatization ramble on about the need for Crown corporations to raise revenues through share offerings, they are deliberately forgetting to tell the Canadian people that privatization gives away billions of tax dollars to a company no longer operating in the best interests of the taxpayer.

I am sure all members have noticed Petro-Canada's new phrase in its advertisement. I am proud to say that it states: "Committed to Canadians." In fact, that is what Petro-Canada is. It is a Crown corporation committed to Canadians in its present form. When it is privatized, what will its slogan be a year from now? Committed to the shareholders? In fact, it will not belong to Canadians any longer. As the government suggests, this is only 15 per cent. As it sells more and more of it, the interest of the shareholders will in fact be of paramount importance to a corporation, not the interests of the Canadian people because we are all shareholders. Each man, woman and child in the country now owns, has invested, and bought Petro-Canada.

• (1220)

Petro-Canada was established 17 years ago as part of an incremental policy to respond to the uncertain oil industry after the oil crisis in the Middle East. Embargoes on shipments of Arab oil suddenly made security of supply a crucial government policy issue. Control of national energy supply in an unstable world was the underlying motive.

The need to become self-sufficient in oil and gas production became an immediate policy priority of the Canadian government with the focus on research and development of new oil and gas projects. When the Crown corporation was created in the mid-seventies, Ottawa's intention was also to give itself a window on the industry.

These policies, I suggest, are more important now more than ever in light of what is happening again in the Persian Gulf and in light of the fact of what is happening with respect to gas prices out there on the street. Petro-Canada was not created because of some desire by the Canadian government to become an entrepreneur. The government was then protecting national interests through a Crown corporation. These national interests, a guaranteed energy supply, exploration and development of frontier oil and gas supplies, and a window on the industry, still have a place in Canadian priorities.

This government chose to change the mandate of Petro-Canada from a frontier development company. To ensure energy self-sufficiency in the country it turned around and said to Petro-Canada: "You must become like every other oil company. You must have downstream operations. You must be a gas station like any other." Now that the government has essentially created an oil company like any other, it now says: "Turn around and dismantle it."

I suggest that if Petro-Canada was given its original mandate, in light of the fact that the government does not even have an energy policy for the country, why not develop an energy policy first and see how Petro-Canada can be the national instrument by which to ensure that Canadians do have security of supply and do in fact have a window on the oil industry so that we can protect Canadian interests? This is not a time to get rid of Petro-Canada or a Crown corporation.

The government must listen to the people and retain a national treasure which in fact is Petro-Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the next speaker, I think it is always useful to remember that although there is some latitude, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the debate must observe the rule of relevance, and the motion before the House today deals with time allocation on Bill C-84. I therefore ask all members of all parties to observe this rule, although, as I said before, some latitude is allowed.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, your comments are well taken. I was listening to the hon. member for the Official Opposition who said that so far, there had been two days of debate on the bill, that there would be two more days, and that it was all because of the motion before the House today.

Mr. Speaker, I did some private research. When we talk about Petro-Canada and privatization, we talk about the reason why the corporation was established, when it was established and how it was established. Mr. Speaker, I can inform you that the bill to establish Petro-Canada, which goes back to March 1975, took four days of the time of the House on second reading. The Liberal government at the time took four days of the time of the House on second reading to pass the enabling legislation for Petro-Canada. Mr. Speaker, today, when we want to take four days of the time of the House to undo what they did, they scream bloody murder. Well, Mr. Speaker, what's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, a saying that is very apt, but unfortunately, they don't seem to appreciate that in this Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will allow me to explain, for the benefit of constituents in the ridings of Trois-Rivières, Abitibi, Matapédia—

An hon. member: Laurentides.

Mr. Vincent: —how this place operates. Everybody who watches the House has the impression we are always debating and discussing bills.

Mr. Speaker, a bill arrives in the House on first reading; it is tabled and printed. No member of this House speaks to the bill at this stage. On second reading, Mr. Speaker, then—

Take for example the opposition; there are about 120 opposition members. According to them, every single member of the opposition should have the right, on second reading, to speak for 30 minutes on this bill. This means, Mr. Speaker, that if all 120 opposition members are present and speak on second reading of a bill, it would take 60 hours.

An hon. member: They are often absent.

Mr. Vincent: An average of four hours a day is spent discussing bills, because we also have Question Period and other business. This means, Mr. Speaker, for the information of our listeners, four hours a day, five days a week, which adds up to 20 hours.

To adopt a bill on second reading, without a single government member having spoken, would take three weeks of the time of this House—and this is only second reading, Mr. Speaker. Next, the bill is referred to a committee of members of all three parties. In committee, they can discuss the bill as long as they like, hear witnesses and draft a report. The report is then referred back to the House, where all opposition members may again speak at the report stage, which means another three weeks. This is still just one bill, Mr. Speaker.

Next, we have third reading. Here again, 120 members with 30 minutes each—a total of 60 hours—would be able to speak to the bill for three weeks, and this is just the opposition. This means, Mr. Speaker, always according to the reasoning of hon. members opposite, that it might take nine weeks of the time of this House, without a single government member having spoken, for a bill to leave the Commons. But that isn't all, Mr. Speaker! After nine weeks of debate, the opposition can then discuss the bill in the Senate, on first, second and third reading.

According to the opposition's reasoning, Mr. Speaker, Parliament would pass about two bills per year. We cannot run a country with two bills a year, when the party in power has received a mandate from the electorate to adopt legislation and govern this country. If Canadians are not happy with the way laws were passed during four years, they have the opportunity, after four years, to say: "Go home!"

I remember that, almost everyday from 1984 to 1988, the Opposition requested elections, saying: "We want elections now!" When elections were called in 1988, they were disillusioned because, on November 21, they were defeated again. The population felt that this government had governed well. In the four year period from 1984 and 1988, the government introduced 20 motions for time allocation and two motions for closure. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, we did not make an abusive use of anything which, by the way, is allowed in our system.

Between 1980 and 1984, the Liberals introduced no fewer than 25 time allocation motions as well as two motions for closure. Again, what we are criticized for today, the Liberals did more often when they were in power.

Mr. Saint-Julien: In 1975.

Mr. Milliken: That is not true!

Mr. Vincent: I would like to point out to my friend the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, as I did earlier, that he seems to have missed the point, Mr. Speaker.

In 1975, the bill establishing Petro-Canada was debated in the House for four days on second reading.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Four days!

Mr. Milliken: No, no! That is false!

• (1230)

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member opposite to check again. At the second reading stage, the House spent four days dealing with the legislation setting up Petro-Canada. He should go and get his facts straight, and then return to apologize for wrongfully saying that it was not true.

The House will again use four days to return to Canadian taxpayers a private enterprise which belongs to them.

Mr. Milliken: Two days only: October 10 and 11!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I will explain to my hon. friend that the House has already spent two days on this and is planning to spent two more days, for a total altogether of four days. I know full well that my hon. friend is a lawyer, but so am I, Mr. Speaker; I thought that most lawyers knew how to count up to four, but I suddenly realize that are some who just cannot. Two and two make four.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you realize how this government would work if we followed the Opposition's approach. It could only pass two pieces of legislation a year. I wish again to explain, because these rules of procedures are difficult to understand for the viewing public: without any government member taking part in the debate, it would take three weeks for a single bill to get through second reading. It would be impossible to govern a country this way. Moreover, I suggest to my hon. friend he should talk with his Liberal colleagues in the other place, the so-called Senate, and ask them to show a little more respect for democracy, something they accuse us of lacking. It might be important for the Liberal Senate to show more respect for democracy—when we used the word "democracy", we mean vote, election, as well as the fact that this Conservative Government, having been duly elected, has the right to pass legislation and govern this country. Mr. Speaker, today they have the gall to tell us that we never mentioned the GST during the election campaign, although it appears on page 2 of the Liberal party platform. They are those who decided that the Free Trade Agreement would be the main issue during the election campaign.

Since 1984, the government has always insisted that it was planning to privatize Petro-Canada. This is nothing new. Hon. members opposite seem to wake up all of a sudden. All Conservative Members at one time or another talked about privatizing Petro-Canada when they sat in the opposition, and since they came to power in 1984. It was not a secret. One could read about it everywhere. And they say now that they have just learned about it. Come on!

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately my time has run out. In conclusion, I want once more to remind my hon. friends in the Opposition that in 1975, on the second reading of the bill establishing Petro-Canada with the assets of Petrofina—as a matter of fact, we were never able to find out just how much this purchase had cost and how much money our Liberal friends pocketed on this.— Mr. Speaker, the House spent four days dealing with this bill on second reading. I suggest, therefore, that this motion for closure is more than appropriate, and I encourage the House to vote on it as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to speak on time allocation, closure. I think history will prove to us that this is the most undemocratic democratic House in the country. The time allocation closure prevents us from the real debate. I do not think Canadians really care whether there have been two motions for closure or 24 motions, or whatever. I think the closure time allocation prevents us from the real debate, and the real debate is Petro-Canada, the privatization of Petro-Canada.

My House leader tells me that this Parliament has passed more legislation than any Parliament in the history of Canada and that we are not obstructive in any way in our opposition to the government. We are only obstructive when it is appropriate, and it is appropriate when a free trade issue comes before the country, or when a GST issue comes before this House and before the country, or when the privatization of Petro-Canada comes before this House and comes before the country. The present debate prevents us from getting into the real meat of the debate. Mr. Speaker, I know I run the risk of breaking your most recent admonition of about 10 minutes ago, but I ask that you allow me the same latitude that you allowed my friend from London and my colleague across the floor from Athabasca, because this may be and probably will be the only opportunity that I have to speak to the actual very important issue, and that is not time allocation and closure because Canadians are not interested in that. They are interested in: what about PetroCan? What about it? As most clippings say, it is the wrong time, it is the wrong reason, it is the wrong price and it is the wrong decision to sell Petro-Canada. I think Mel Hurtig, who is now recognized as a great Canadian said: "This government will sell anything to anybody".

Well, I think he is a great Canadian.

The chairman of PetroCan said in May 1990 that if it is not the right time, it will not go. I think everyone will agree that this is the wrong time, and the chairman said if it is not the right time, it will not go.

PetroCan was begun at the behest of the New Democratic Party. We encouraged the Liberals to formulate it. It was begun because of a mid-East crisis. Here we are again with the same situation. The time could not be worse to privatize the country, a privatization without purpose.

It is difficult to get support from the country. I talked to my constituents in Sault Ste. Marie. They say: "Sell it, so what?" But they do not understand. They say that PetroCan is not operating for their benefit any longer. It operates just like any other oil company, and most unfortunately so because it had, and still would have, the opportunity to be a leader in its field. Given the fact that Canadians have invested $10 billion in PetroCan, people ask me: "Where is my dividend? When am I going to get my money back? Are you going to sell it back to me? I already bought it".

If PetroCan had been allowed to serve the public purpose, people would be up in arms right now over the privatization of that company. It could have been a leader in environmental issues. There is a problem in my community with waste oil. People call me and ask what they should do with their waste oil. I think people are forced to go into the forest and dump it. Would it not be a good idea if PetroCan said: "We will accept your waste oil. We will accept it. We're a leader. We're Canadian. We're here to work for you"?

How about border cities? It is a well known fact now that in my community along with probably 75 others, Canadians are leaving Canada to fill up in the United States. If Petro-Canada were serving a useful public purpose, maybe PetroCan would give us a break at the pumps, and say: "Canadians, we want to work for you. We want to lower the price of gasoline to give you a break". That would be a useful public purpose. You say you cannot do it? Well, PetroCan made a profit last year and I understand just this week that the American major oil companies made a $90 million profit, each one of them. The top three, each made a $90 million profit. I am sure that the Canadian industry is doing just as well. So, once again it is the wrong time, the wrong price and the wrong decision.

We have a seamless tube mill in my community. It is state of the art. It cost hundreds of millions of dollars. The government assisted us. It was great. PetroCan is to buy from Algoma 50 per cent of its seamless tube. Now there is some dispute as to whether they do or do not. The chairman of PetroCan tells me they do. Algoma Steel tells me they do. My question is: In the future, will PetroCan be obligated to buy Canadian seamless? Highly unlikely, Mr. Speaker. One would hope so, but when foreign ownership of 25 per cent takes place, and probably wealthy Canadians buy the remainder of the shares, will it operate for the benefit of the public or will it operate for the benefit of the shareholders? I think the latter will be the appropriate answer on that one.

I can never forget the share of the flame and how proud we were at the Calgary Olympics. Everybody got excited about it. I think this government is going to douse that flame. It is going to douse everything that is Canadian. It is going to douse Canada with free trade. It is going to douse PetroCan. It is going to sell of Air Canada, as I said earlier. It will sell anything to anybody, just ask for it. It is all sacrificed, if you will, at the altar of profitability. Most unfortunate.

Petro-Canada has a world renowned reputation. It proudly flies the Canadian flag in all of the Third World countries. It says that we get a great reception because we have a different ethic from the Americans, that we are well respected. Will the Canadian flag continue to fly with the same symbolic national pride and remain a truly Canadian company? Somehow I doubt it.

It gives me some pride to read from page 7454 of Hansard for July 10, 1975, when Mr. Cyril Symes, who represented Sault Ste. Marie and the New Democratic Party about three or four terms ago, was the energy critic for the New Democratic Party. I want to read this into the record for the benefit of everybody back in the Soo and also Mr. Symes. I do not think things have changed in the 15 years.

> The three components of a national energy policy, which we have lacked to date because of the misguided policies of previous Liberal and Conservative governments, are ensuring adequate and reliable supplies, reasonable prices, and that Canadians through their government have a direct share of the wealth of our resources. This government has failed miserably to ensure these fundamental principles of a national energy policy.

I am approaching the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate that you allowed me a little bit of latitude because, again, I think that is the issue at hand. It is not the point of time allocation or closure. This government forces us to discuss that either directly or indirectly, but once again the semantic wrangling of what record it has set, or what records it has not set on time allocation and closure is totally irrelevant to the Canadian public.

We ask that we vote down this closure time allocation and we spend as much time as necessary, because I believe every member of the New Democratic Party would like to speak against the privatization of PetroCan.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to share some of my views on the sale of PetroCan and the proposed privatization of PetroCan.

Before I do, I want to report a few comments by the Hon. Marc Lalonde in an interview where he was asked by Rosemary Brown:

> Wasn't PetroCan supposed to protect us? The consumers against the vagaries of the market and the kind inconsistent behaviour and buffeting around that happens out there?

Mr. Lalonde's reply was:

> No. That was never the purpose of Petro-Canada.

Then Peter Gzowski posed the question:

> So the privatization of Petro-Canada is irrelevant to what's happening to oil prices now?

The Hon. Mr. Lalonde said "Absolutely". Then further, Mr. Lalonde responded by saying:

> —if the Government of Canada can get a good price for us as the taxpayers by privatization, by privatizing Petro-Canada if we can keep it as a Canadian under Canadian ownership, I don't see that it is essential to the national interest that Petro-Canada should be forever government owned.

It is interesting that we have those replies and those statements on record with regard to privatization. They are the views of a former Liberal minister of energy, someone who sat in this House for a good many years. I think it is important to have that on record.

I want to share a few of my views regarding Canada's energy policy. The objectives which largely remain as articulated in 1984 are these: to promote the efficient development and use of Canada's energy resources; to assure security of energy supply; and to increase the flexibility, the diversity, and the competitiveness of the Canadian energy economy. These goals are largely being achieved through the implementation of appropriate framework policies.

The government's deregulation of energy markets has freed Canadian industry and consumers to protect and further their own best interests in the marketplace and has eliminated the artificial constraints that previously bound trade. The establishment of a stable investment framework has provided the certainty investors need to make decisions about where and how to develop new supplies. The non-discriminatory, non-interventionist, land management regime, which we in co-operation with the coastal provinces have implemented in Canada's offshore areas, has provided the terms necessary to attract companies to economic development prospects on the frontiers. The use of profits based taxation and of targeted incentives have stimulated increased investment in the Canadian oil and gas industry.

These framework policies have been supplemented by specific policies or programs that deal with particular issues. The creation of opportunities for Canadian ownership of the domestic petroleum industry is best achieved by making the industry an attractive place to invest, and that is what we want to do. We have done this.

We have also continued through Investment Canada to review proposed acquisitions of oil and gas companies in Canada and to disallow acquisition of healthy Canadian owned firms. The level of Canadian ownership and control has declined in recent years due to the sale of companies in financial difficulty and some rationalization which took place in the industry. The level of Canadianization increased during 1989, and there remain good opportunities for expanded Canadian ownership as the industry's economic prospects improve over the next decade.

Security of energy supply means that Canadians can be confident in their access to competitively priced energy without fear of sudden interruption. This government has adopted a market oriented energy policy in the belief that a flexible, dynamic and diverse domestic energy sector provides the best option to guarantee the long-term energy security of Canadians.

To deal with possible short-term interruptions of oil supply, the government has relied on a co-operative approach with the International Energy Agency member countries. Canada participates in an emergency oil sharing scheme which would be triggered should a significant loss of oil supplies occur. Continued pubic ownership of Petro-Canada does nothing to enhance stability of oil prices, nor does it increase the quantities of oil flowing to Canadian consumers.

The sources of information available to the government on the operations and the opportunities in the industry are today quite extensive. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency gathers and publishes valuable information annually and semi-annually regarding the financial performance of the oil and gas industry, as well as trends in ownership and control. The National Energy Board and the department are probably well informed on industry developments and are able to provide advice on developments in geology, technology, and market conditions. The window on the industry role no longer is a critical element of Petro-Canada's mandate.

Many of the energy policy initiatives which were once to be carried out in large part by Petro-Canada can now be served without the need for intervention by a Crown owned company. In these circumstances it is clear that continued Crown ownership of Petro-Canada is not required.

• (1250)

In addition to the many fiscal and other reasons for privatizing Petro-Canada which the minister for privatization has touched on, it is the government's view that the sale of the company would help achieve the government's energy objectives. Privatization will remove some financial constraints to the aggressive oil and gas investment activities of Petro-Canada and will increase Canadian energy security by increasing the strength of the Canadian oil and gas industry. It will also leave the company free to respond efficiently and effectively to supply demand conditions both internationally and in domestic markets.

In conclusion, some members opposite in this House believe that Petro-Canada should be used as an instrument to help keep gasoline prices down. I would like to reply to them that it was never intended that Petro-Canada be forced to play this role and that it has never done so.

Furthermore, should Petro-Canada try to depress gasoline prices it would damage the corporation's viability and drive small independent gasoline retailers out of the business, as they do not have the ability to withstand long periods of low or negative earnings. The outcome would be only a decrease in competition in gasoline, refining, and marketing, and ultimately increased costs to the consumers and reduced profitability for the industry.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted in one sense to have an opportunity to take part in this debate on time allocation but really saddened that the opportunity has been forced upon us one more time.

The hon. member for Athabasca threw some figures around in his speech earlier today, and I cannot let those figures go unchallenged. We know that since 1989 and the Speech from the Throne that commenced this particular session closure has been used 13 times by this government. One might hope that the 13th time might prove singularly unlucky for this government, but of course I shant get into superstitions of that nature.

Previous to that, in this government's Parliament that sat from 1984 to 1988, closure was used twice. In the governments previous to that, the Trudeau government of 1980 to 1984, closure was used twice. Where are the rights of Canadians being taken care of with a government that refuses to allow debate?

The whole point of closure historically in the parliamentary sense was to prevent an opposition that was being unduly recalcitrant and refusing to allow the will of the government to be passed, the duly elected government. To have a bill introduced and closure motion brought in instantly, hardly fits the spirit of time allocation. How can anyone say that the opposition, either the Official Opposition or the New Democratic Party, is being unruly or unduly blocking government legislation when we barely have the time to discuss matters of great importance to our nation? Thirteen times and this Parliament is barely two years old.

My hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands has brought this to the attention of the House. My hon.

friend from Scarborough—Rouge River has done the same thing. We have a duty as the opposition to ensure that bills brought forward by the government are debated fully and discussed clearly, so that Canadians across this country understand what the government policy is, how these bills are going to affect them, and what a reasonable person—and there may be a few still on the other side of the House—might expect from the implementation of government policy.

We have here a situation of time allocation being placed on the bill that will end the existence of the oil company owned by the people of Canada.

I realize that there are basic philosophic differences between the party that forms the government and my party. I guess one of those basic philosophic differences has to do with the creation and the continued existence of Petro-Canada.

Back in 1973—1975 when Petro-Canada was first being formed in this country there were a variety of reasons for its formation. Those reasons hold good today. Every member who sits on this side of the House recognizes that. I suspect, in spite of the differences in policy, that many of the members on the other side of the House—perhaps most particularly those members who come from eastern Canada and there are still a few of them left—will remember why Petro-Canada was formed and why it was created.

The hon. member for Erie who spoke just before me said that it was not formed to lower gas prices. I believe it was the hon. member for Athabasca who said that it was not formed to pump gas for Canadians. These are specific and small minded responses to the creation of a national oil company. A Crown corporation was formed so that the Canadian people could have a piece of the action in whatever the future held in energy policy in this country.

If pumping gas was a part of it, so be it. By using it as a hedge against oil prices because of the problems in the gulf or because of other problems that have happened from time to time and will continue to happen given the unstable political situation in the Middle East, that is what Petro-Canada is for. It is to carry out the public policies on energy, to the benefit of the Canadian people. It is to carry out the will of the Canadian people with regard to energy policy.

It is not—and I fear this is one of the reasons that we see a time allocation motion before us today—a corporation that falls in line with American policy on energy and it is not a corporation that falls in line with the new style energy policy put forward by this government which again is one that says: "whatever the Americans want, we are prepared to give it to them; whatever the Americans need, we are prepared to see they have it." Eastern Canadians suffer, particularly Atlantic Canadians, Nova Scotians and Prince Edward Islanders in my region, from world oil prices and from the enforced purchase of oil from foreign sources.

Thirteen times this government has inflicted closure and six times it has inflicted time allocation, stifling debate for a total of nineteen times. It is not good enough.

The minister sits there and smiles. I suggest that the minister and those members will smile on the other side of their faces when the Canadian people have the opportunity to say what they feel about the stifling of the debate, when the Canadian people have the opportunity to tell this government what they feel about democracy and about the tearing down of their institutions.

The expression was used that the infrastructure of Canada is being systematically destroyed by this government. Every single one of the members of the government is a part of the systematic destruction of this country. The people of Canada and members on this side of the House will not stand by and let this destruction take place without response. This is our response. These measures are Draconian. There is only one word to say, and that word is shame.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canada's resource communities are being devastated by this government's economic policies. Communities from Valemount to Atikokan to Canso are suffering.

Thousands of forestry and fishery jobs are disappearing. This government has allowed our resource stocks to be depleted and wiped out. The finance minister asks what can he do. This government signed away our forest policy decisions through the softwood lumber tariff. Because of this, our lumber exports to the U.S. are down. The U.S. government has even issued 64 orders to the Canadian government telling us how to run our forest policy.

The Government of Canada should use section 9 of the agreement and give immediate notice of termination of this tariff. This would help ensure Canadian forestry jobs are protected. It is time the Minister of Finance understood the effect of his policies on real Canadians.

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it appears that this government will miss the January 1, 1991 deadline for the issuance of regulations mandating new warning labels on cigarette packages.

It is now known that smoking is addictive. It is a major cause of stroke and fatal lung disease and harms non-smokers as well. The new regulation would require that warnings be explicit on the package and that toxic ingredients would have to be listed without abbreviations and that information leaflets on the adverse effects of smoking be inserted inside packages.

Cigarette smoking is the number one future killer of today's teenagers. Thousands of Canadians smoke their first cigarette by the time they reach adolescence.

Therefore, I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to step in and speed up the wheels of bureaucracy in the interest of all Canadians. A good cause delayed is a good cause denied.

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, small businesses in my riding are outraged at the latest initiative by Canada Post to increase its profitability.

Canada Post has begun an aggressive campaign to increase the corporation's share in the distribution of flyers for large national firms, a job that is currently being done by a number of smaller independently-owned operations.

Sales representatives are roaming through the marketplace and systematically undercutting the smaller operations on many of these contracts by offering prices close to 100 per cent lower than the next lowest private sector bid. Canada Post is driving the private sector into financial ruin with these predatory pricing policies.

As this is Small Business Week in Canada, I call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to begin an immediate review of this policy to ensure this Crown corporation is not improving its own fiscal position at the expense of the small business community in this country.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the federal government plays a major role in helping small businesses secure loans. The Federal Business Development Bank remains one of the government's main channels to provide financing for companies.

Since its foundation in 1944 the FBDB has made loans valued at $12 billion to more than 160,000 small- and medium-sized businesses. Some 90,000 customers benefited from its services in 1990.

That same year the FBDB gave strong support to small- and medium-sized businesses by underwriting 5,602 loans and loan guarantees worth $963.9 million.

Note that the lending activities of the FBDB have increased in the weaker economic regions.

This government intermediary provides the kind of support which Canadian businesses have come to appreciate, all the more so since it encourages women's entrepreneurship.

EASTERN EUROPE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, 34 years ago today the flame of liberty was lit by the freedom fighters of Hungary. For a few glorious days, the yoke of oppression was cast off and democracy made an appearance. However, the idealism of the people was soon crushed by the might of the Soviet military, with the loss of many lives.

However, the blood of these patriots was not shed in vain, for as we know, the people of Hungary and all eastern Europe have come to realize what the west has long known; communism does not work.

Let us hope that the spirit of the Hungarian freedom fighters, manifested most recently in the hearts of students on Tiananmen Square continues to light the way to liberty throughout the world.

THE LATE GORDON WRIGHT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the late Gordon Wright, former MLA for the Alberta provincial constituency of Edmonton Strathcona.

Edmontonians are deeply saddened at his passing.

He was a noble, principled, sincere gentleman who was concerned with the human condition. Gordon was a champion of the ordinary Canadian and a fighter for the less privileged.

I worked with him on many cases and knew him to be a warm, concerned individual who would spare no effort to see a problem resolved.

On behalf of my Alberta caucus colleagues, I offer his family our deepest sympathies and condolences.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has passed a motion recently to censure the Minister for International Trade for saying that the Deputy Prime Minister should be ashamed of himself for providing $8.8 billion of support to Canadian farmers.

Canadian farmers are outraged by the comments of the minister of trade because they are simply not true. He quotes financial support programs that the government provided in 1987 and 1988, most of which the government has since cancelled.

In fact, direct farm support programs this year will be less than $2 billion. This shows how the minister of trade is trying to mislead Canadians.

How can Canadian farmers have confidence in the minister of trade to protect their interests at the GATT negotiation when he demonstrates such a woeful ignorance of the very documents that he himself has tabled there? It is time the Deputy Prime Minister or someone with integrity in the government sets the record straight on the amount of Canadian farm support programs because we have not heard the truth from the Minister for International Trade.

MULTICULTURALISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, racism takes many forms in Canada and must be challenged.

We call on the Liberal appointed board of the Ottawa Congress Centre to reconsider its decision and cancel the November 5 appearance of holocaust doubter, David Irving. His kind of racism should not be imported to Canada.

Former Governor General Jean Sauvé showed outdated colonial thinking that assumes the superiority of our anglo–franco heritage when she stated recently: "If the growing mixture of immigrants does not assimilate into either the French or English culture, Canada will become multiracial and the French–English basis of our nation will become indistinct".

Canada already is a rich mix of races who must be treated equally. The MP from Winnipeg South recently said that multiculturalism promotes racism and has divided Canadian society by emphasizing differences among cultures.

The reverse is true. Multiculturalism respects diversity, protects equal rights, and promotes pride in being Canadian. It must be the goal of Canadian citizenship in the 1990s.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Right from the beginning in 1984, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government got down to work to reduce federal outlays. Among other things, there are 57,000 fewer civil servants on the federal payroll, or about the same number as the Public Service had in 1973-74, and operating expenses have risen at a lower rate than inflation.

Therefore I urge the government to keep a tight rein on things. My fellow Canadians in Richmond—Wolfe happen to believe that further cut-backs can be made, particularly in the various departments in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, I would strongly suggest that each department hire private consultants to study deparmental organization and operations, redefine jobs, evaluate salaries, and reduce operating an travelling expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there is still enough fat left to slash even more resolutely and use these savings to lower the deficit and the national debt.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, in Quebec only, 300,000 women are abused verbally, sexually or physically. In 1989, some 9,376 cases of family violence were reported to the police, a 15 percent increase over 1988. This figure does not include the thousands of women who never filed complaints against their spouses. Ninety seven percent of abused women were kicked or punched, beaten or shot with a gun.

It is very difficult for health care professionals, Mr. Speaker, to detect family violence. That is why I really want to point out the work accomplished by Mrs. Michelle Doyon and her team at the Regroupement des CLSC du Montréal métropolitain, who put together a family violence detection guide.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that initiative will be recognized as a further step towards ending violence against women.

TRANSPORT CANADA

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, Sandy Pedersen was accepted into an eight-month training program in Cornwall, Ontario beginning February, 1989 to learn how to advise pilots of weather conditions. She quit her job in Fort Erie, sold her home and relocated.

On October 25, just two days before her graduation, she was told by the minister's officials that she was medically unfit for this job.

Sandy Peterson stated that she was epileptic on her original application in 1988. One year later, her medical report of August 1, 1989 stated she was healthy and her epilepsy was controlled. The department, in a memo dated September 1 of that same year, posted her to an airport in Sudbury. Yet on October 25 the department, after having the knowledge of her controlled condition for over two years, decided that she was unfit for the job. Surely, the department has made an error.

I call upon the Minister of Transport to personally reopen the case of Sandy Pedersen and either reinstate her or compensate her for the two years of wasted time his department has caused.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was a memorable day for Canada and the canadian people. The House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States both agreed on measures to substantially reduce acid-rain-causing emisious in the United States. These measures, combined with those our Government has taken since 1985, will protect the Canadian environment from damages caused by acid rain.

Mr. Speaker, need I remind the House of the vital role played by the Prime Minister of Canada in bringing this issue to the fore. His perseverance and tenacity over the past six years are bearing fruits. We should also emphasize the determination shown by President Bush on this issue.

This major legislation, which should be passed by the US Congress before the end of the week should clear the way for the bilateral acid-rain accord now being negotiated which should ensure once and for all the elimination of acid rain.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs refused to commit himself to play among Canada's allies a leadership role in an effort to convince them to never use nuclear weapons should war break out in the Persian Gulf. Thousands of Canadians men and women are quite concerned about the possibility of a war in the Middle-East which could result in a great many lives being lost.

[English]

Given the explosive and dangerous environment of the Persian Gulf in which the Canadian Peace Alliance estimates that there are 21 nuclear-capable ships carrying 368 nuclear weapons, it is imperative that all multinational forces operating in the Middle East immediately come under UN command. The peace seeking mandate of the United Nations will certainly help to prevent a nuclear or chemical conflict. Canada must lead the way in demanding that all countries involved pledge not to use chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday heralded good news for both Canada and the environment with the announcement that both houses of the U.S. Congress had reached a consensus on the acid rain provisions contained in the new U.S. clean air legislation.

The legislated measures will cut the annual U.S. emissions of sulphur dioxide by 10 million tonnes or almost 50 per cent by the year 2001 and reduce the emissions of nitrogen oxides, the second major ingredient of acid rain, by between 2.5 million and four million tonnes by the same target date.

President George Bush has promised to sign the legislation into law, after its quick passage expected this week in both houses of the U.S. Congress.

As one who has fought long and hard for over 10 years on the acid rain issue, last Sunday's news was the realization of a dream come true and a personal vindication of the time and energy spent.

Mr. Speaker, I know also that you were a member who visited Washington some years ago to start putting the pressure on the United States government.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, this is Small Business Week in Canada.

[Translation]

It would be appropriate to pause each year to emphasize the accomplishment of small and medium-sized businesses which are unquestionably the motor of our national economy. This of course is obvious when one realizes that over 98 per cent of the 900,000 Canadian corporations belong to these two categories.

Small businesses, which provides employment for over 40 per cent of the Canadian labour force, contribute very significantly to the welfare of our nation. There is no doubt that they will be called upon to play a very important role on the threshold of the 21st Century.

[English]

With the Canadian economy in recession, the federal government must readjust its high dollar and high interest rate economic policy that has been hurting Canadian businesses.

In conclusion, I wish to salute the entrepreneurial spirit of the small businesses in my riding of Restigouche—Chaleur, as well as to all those across Canada. Small businesses are the engines of the economy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday evening the minister became the last person in the country to be willing to use the r word, recession.

Now that the minister has admitted that we are in a recession, will he tell Canadians just how long he expects it to last? Will he now begin reversing the high interest rate, high dollar policies that experts say have largely contributed to this recession and bring in a new economic plan to make this recession shorter than it would otherwise be, instead of prolonging the agony caused by the government and its policies for the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just note some of the other observers of the economic scene. We heard the Royal Bank yesterday when it stated that it was going to be a shallow recession. It said that it was something that was based on factors that are happening in other countries.

The hon. member knows that we have been sensitive to the weakening in the economy. We have taken steps going back three or four months to start the reduction of interest rates. I think that demonstrates the commitment of the government.

Before I resume my seat, let me remark that it is a rarity that the ridiculous rhetoric from the rubes across the room ever resulted in anything rational, relevant, or right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance really is wrong once again. Also, what he just said is ridiculous.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Conference Board says that the minister's policies have created the first made-in-Canada recession. Yesterday, in Vancouver, even the Prime Minister admitted that he was deeply troubled by aspects of this minister's goods and services tax. He stubbornly and perversely insisted that he would do nothing about them until the tax became law, even though experts are saying that the GST will make this current recession even worse.

Why is the Minister of Finance persisting with the GST when even his Prime Minister says it has serious flaws and when experts say it will make the recession even worse? Why does he not withdraw the tax and go back to the drawing-board before the GST makes the recession even more severe than it would otherwise be?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might draw my friend's attention to a headline today which states: "Recession not Ottawa's fault". The article goes on:

> "It is very difficult to describe (it)—

—the recession—

> —as a uniquely Canadian situation—It's a North American situation.

That is Ed Neufeld of the Royal Bank of Canada.

If there is a slow-down in the United States, there is a slow-down here. There has been a major slow-down in the United States.

My friend can quote the Conference Board. There are other people who have different opinions. The point that we have to recognize is the point that I have been talking about in the House and elsewhere for some nine months now. This is going to be a difficult year in the economy as we come through a year of transition, from when we had severe inflationary pressures, to one where we are getting inflation under control, to one where we can see a good recovery from the situation that we are in now.

• (1420)

My colleague says: "Let's scrap the GST." Mr. Speaker, if he would listen to some of the very people that he persists in quoting, including the Conference Board of Canada, they are supportive of the goods and services tax because it will be helpful for the economy and it will be helpful for the manufacturing sector. It will provide a 4 per cent boost to new investment in plant equipment and new technology. It will help low-income people because the low-income credit will result in Canadians, with incomes of less than $30,000, paying less tax.

Why, in face of all these benefits, should we pursue the route that is pursued by the Leader of the Opposition which is precisely, politically motivated in a very cynical way?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's self-righteous and rigid point of view will not help Canadians who are being, daily, damaged by his policies.

He talks about concern for low-income Canadians and yet, today, the Toronto-Dominion Bank in a report states:

> The inflationary pressures from the GST will become much more pronounced in the early months of 1991, when the tax will be levied on nearly all goods and services at the retail level.

It goes on to state:

> Another contraction in the economy is forecast in the first quarter of 1991 as the full effects of the implementation of the GST are felt.

[Translation]

So I ask the Minister of Finance why would he insist on imposing his GST when experts say that it creates serious problems? One of the experts is the Prime Minister himself who admits that the GST creates serious problems, while others like the Toronto-Dominion Bank state that the minister's policies have led us into this recession.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we all listen to this continuing rhetoric that the Leader of the Opposition and other members have about the goods and services tax. We got a little bit more of it from Jean Chrétien last night when he said, critically, of the leader of my party, the Prime Minister: "It is always my way or the doorway."

Well, what is Mr. Chrétien's way? First, Mr. Chrétien's way is to say: "It is irresponsible to scrap the tax unless we have an alternative." But then he says: "I want this tax dead." But then: "We will review it. I'm forming a committee to consider alternatives." Mr. Chrétien's way is to say: "My way or no way—maybe, possibly".

We might get some answers from Mr. Chrétien, but we certainly do not know which way is his way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and has to do with the Prime Minister's promise to change the GST even before it is adopted by Parliament.

Before forcing Canadians to swallow the GST, why does the minister refuse to admit that this tax is basically wrong and that it unfairly applies to other things besides books, for instance newspapers, funeral services, home heating, children's clothing and housing?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was well known to the Liberal Party of Canada, when it supported an approach to a broad-based sales tax in a committee of the House and a committee of the Senate, that a broad base included all those products.

Why did the Liberal Party of Canada support those resolutions and why has it changed its mind now? The only reason that anybody can give for that is pure, cynical politics or as Donato has written in a cartoon in the Sun today: "Sure we have to kill the GST, Allan," says Jean Chrétien, "but don't kill it too much. After we win the next election, we're going to need that extra money."

That is the reason why the Liberal Party is flip-flopping all over the map on this one. It does not have any alternatives because the Liberals do not want to have an alternative.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister seems to be willing to change his tax, but the Minister of Finance is not. We have to wonder whether it is the government's tax, or whether it is just the minister's tax.

The Prime Minister yesterday finally admitted what Canadians have known all along, which is that the GST is going to have been changed because it is flawed. The height of stupidity is that the government now seems ready to attempt to fix the GST after it has implemented it. It will be the first tax ever to be changed before it has even been passed.

Why does the minister not do the sensible thing, forget about the GST, and come forward with some policies to fix the recession in Canada that he, by his own policies, has caused?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says we have not changed any elements of the GST. The hon. member is a member of a committee that came out with a report a year ago. We read that report very carefully, responded to a number of the suggestions, proposals, and recommendations that were in that report and made some changes which I announced in the House on December 19 last year.

The hon. member says we should scrap it. If the hon. member has any alternatives, any basis on which we could improve the tax, then we have listened to those. We have incorporated those and they have been the subject to a vote in the House. It is passed and it is now sitting in the other place waiting to be passed over there.

The basic reason why we think that it must be passed is because it is going to be better for this economy.

Mr. Fontana: It will be wrong.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member for London East says it will be wrong. If he would let me know how he thinks it will be wrong, maybe we could have listened. But he was nowhere to be seen a few months ago.

What we have said, Mr. Speaker, is that the tax is good for the manufacturing sector. It is good for our resource sector. It is good for exporters. It is good for producers who are having to compete with importers. It will improve the health of this economy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, last night the finance minister finally got his courage up and he said the r word.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langdon: He also complacently went on to say, and I quote from the transcripts of the committee:

> —it is not only natural but it is necessary to have some levelling off here—

Can the minister tell Canadian families across the country how it can be natural and necessary to lose 80,000 jobs next year, as the Royal Bank has forecast? How can it make sense to drive us into a recession?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to make that statement, but to make it in the context of what has happened since 1984, when 1,600,000 jobs have been created.

I also ask him to consider what would happen if we had let the party go on and let inflation get out of control, as is happening right now in the United Kingdom. The result would have been far higher interest rates and a much more difficult economy.

I take no satisfaction out of seeing people lose jobs. I made that point last night, but my hon. friend neglects to quote that. I would like to see an economy that is booming, but unfortunately an economy cannot continue to boom. That is why I say it is natural to have a slow-down. It is the same way for someone running a marathon, they cannot run it at the same pace as they run a four-minute mile.

• (1430)

We have to slow down, get our pace, catch our breath and understand how we can get back on to a faster pace of growth later. That is the basis on which I said last night, as I have said on many occasions, that it is a natural evolution of an economy to have that type of slowdown.

The key is to make sure that the slowdown—

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this would be the first marathon runner that I have ever seen who turned around and started to go backward.

Does the minister not realize that his recession means lost farms, lost businesses, lost jobs and lost hopes for Canadians right across this country? Will this minister not take action to do something about this recession? Will he not cancel the punitive GST tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the same question that was asked on two occasions by the Liberals just today in the House.

I would suggest that possibly the hon. member might write his questions three or four at a time so he could have a little variety.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we keep hoping that the minister may actually listen, change his mind and help this country to recover.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister of Finance finally admitted that we Canadians are in a recession. What is he going to do to stop this recession?

[English]

If he is not prepared to take action to counter it, is he prepared to do the right thing, and stand up and quit as finance minister of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to that question is no, I am not.

The hon. member neglects to say that during the six years that this country has been governed by the Progressive Conservative Party, we have had extremely good levels of growth. We have seen 1.6 million jobs created. We have seen Canada number two in the major industrialized countries, just behind Japan in economic growth.

For him to focus on a very narrow period neglects the position that we have attained over the course of the last six years. This is a very difficult period that we are going through. I have always acknowledged that. I predicted that in the budget that I had in February of this year. I do not take any pleasure in seeing those predictions come through, but I think it is important for me, as Minister of Finance, to be forthright and direct with Canadians, and tell them—

Mr. Tobin: But you weren't in the last election. You misled them then, too.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are getting some very direct talk over here.

Maybe the hon. member could stand up and ask a question. I would answer that one, too.

The point is that we have been frank. We have said to Canadians what we think is going to happen to the economy. The position that we are saying right now is that we are going through this difficult period, but in the spring of next year we expect to see some recovery back to the more normal rates of growth in the 3 or 3.5 per cent range.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. For the first time yesterday the Prime Minister admitted that he does not like the GST on books, the Bible, the Koran and other learning materials, and that he was considering re-examining it after it is in place. He admitted that the GST is full of errors. Is the government prepared to remove the GST on books and other learning materials? Does he agree with his Prime Minister?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister is saying is that the government is quite prepared to look at various aspects of the implementation of this tax to see what the impact of the implementation will be. Then we can look to see if any changes are appropriate. That is the same as what happens with any income tax changes. We make changes to the income tax system and watch how they affect the people who are affected by those changes. The same holds true for the goods and services tax as well.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

The Ontario Federation of Students just concluded a study which shows definitively that as students, they will have to pay between $340 and $725 more per year for items such as books, reading and other learning materials, transport, electricity, lodging and cafeteria services as well.

What is the minister prepared to do to help these students, who are among the poorest of all Canadians, to counteract these extra costs to them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those students are living pretty well if they are going to be paying $725 more. Seven per cent of $10,000 is $725. Today, on average, Canadians are paying $690 of sales tax already. If you apply that again, those figures would suggest that those students are living on $20,000 a year. I do not know many students who are living on $20,000 a year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In recent days we have seen the release of British, American, French and Russian hostages from Iraq. By their own admission, Canadian officials have indicated that they have been unable to secure the release of Canadians still held in Iraq, including those with illnesses and our diplomats from Kuwait.

I would like to ask the minister if he has any special measures that he proposes to undertake to release Canadian hostages, for example, sending a special emissary to the Iraqi government or special committees of Parliament or whatever means to try to provide for the release of Canadian hostages, many of whom are being held under duress.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will remember that Canada was the first country that was able to arrange the release of large numbers of persons in Iraq and in Kuwait by chartering an aircraft.

We took out not only Canadian nationals but also others. That started a practice that was of sufficient concern to the Iraqi government that it stopped permission for that practice later on.

I would be prepared, naturally, to seriously consider any proposal the hon. member or other members of the House might make with regard to ways in which we could help more Canadians who are in Iraq or Kuwait against their will to come home, providing that that was consistent with the very strong position that Canada and other countries have taken in support of the common actions of the Security Council of the United Nations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

It has been reported that the government is now planning to change the complement of ships or crews that are presently in the gulf in the immediate or near term.

Can the government confirm its plans? In particular, can we get assurances from the minister in the spirit with which we have been approaching this to have Parliament consulted before any final decisions are made as to these plans relating to our forces in the gulf area?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are several alternatives that have been examined by military leadership as to replacing the ships' complements or replacing the ships.

We had hoped the hon. member would understand that this is neither adding to nor detracting from the commitment that Canada has made to enforcing UN sanctions and deterring aggression. Now that he has raised the question, it is important that I be allowed to answer it because of the concern that dependants of Canadian men and women who are serving would have because he has raised the question.

I can inform the hon. member that the government will be rotating ships' complements on the three vessels that are there. He will know that we cannot replace the Protecteur. He will also be aware, Mr. Speaker, that the Athabaskan, which is one of the DDH class, would have to go into the TRUMP program so we will put in its place the Huron. It would not be cost-effective to equip one ship, strip it, equip another ship and have it stripped.

• (1440)

The Terra Nova is a long-serving vessel and will continue to serve. It will remain where it is. We believe the most cost-effective thing that we can do is rotate the complements. To the dependants of those men and women, I would say that the duration of the stay of the Canadian forces personnel will not be longer than necessary. They can anticipate, although there will be varied times, that the ships' complements will be returning home, after a stay of from five to seven months.

ENERGY

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy and is related to gasoline pricing.

In February 1990, oil was selling at $25.97 a barrel here in Canada and gasoline was selling that same month at 53.8 cents per litre.

In June 1990, a barrel of oil was $18.85, a drop of $7, and in June 1990, the price of gas went up to 57.8 cents.

In October of this year the price for a barrel of oil was approximately $40 U.S. a little over a week ago, and the price of gasoline was 63 cents a litre. Now the price for a barrel of oil is down to $28 and gasoline is still 63 cents a litre.

As a former minister of health, can the minister tell us why the oil companies act like they have Ex-lax when the price has to go up but Kaopectate when the price has to come down? Can you tell us that, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as minister of health, neither my age nor expertise gave me the ability to describe those situations the hon. member is experiencing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Epp: I want to tell the hon. member that we are concerned about energy prices. Along with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we are monitoring the cost of energy to consumers very carefully.

Last week I was asked about the increase in the price of energy. I said there is a mathematical formula both up and down and that is for every dollar of increase per barrel of oil, approximately a $20 benchmark, it is about .7 cents per litre increase, but it also has to factor in taxes.

What we will be doing tomorrow is meeting with the industry as well as consumer groups and we will be discussing these various issues. I say to the hon. member that we have moved toward a world market price for oil, both for Canada as well as, obviously, the imports we have to pay for, and we will continue monitoring.

Keep in mind as well the accounting system which we have in Canada for oil going into the system as well as oil going out, as against the American system which has a much bigger response time.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I was not impressed with the answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barrett: Are you suggesting that the government have an enema?

Why is the minister going to have a friendly chat with the oil industry tomorrow at the same time there is legislation selling off Petro-Canada? If the minister was serious in monitoring the price, he would use Petro-Canada. Why does he not use the government instrument of Petro-Canada to check on the gas prices in this country?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member did not like the answer I gave him, but I hope that the diagnosis still fits. I remember 1972-74 and the creation of Petro-Canada. The former minister of energy, Mr. Lalonde, was quoted just today on a question on Petro-Canada. "Wasn't Petro-Canada supposed to protect us, the consumers, against the vagaries of a market and the kind of inconsistent behaviour and buffeting around that happens out there?" That was the question.

This is today's answer. He said today on the Peter Gzowski show: "No, that was never the purpose of Petro-Canada, not to protect us against the vagaries of the market. It was to provide the Canadian government with an insight on the industry, a window on the industry if you wish, and secondly provide a significant Canadian ownership in the industry. But nobody ever guaranteed that the existence of Petro-Canada would mean cheaper oil".

NUNAVUT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

As the Deputy Prime Minister knows, division of the Northwest Territories in order to create a homeland for Inuit called Nunavut is a long-standing goal of the Inuit of the central and eastern Arctic. Toward this goal, the Government of the Northwest Territories and the Inuit negotiators recently agreed to a target date for the creation of Nunavut.

What steps is the Government of Canada taking to support the creation of Nunavut, both politically and financially?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. We indeed are very pleased that the agreement has been reached by the Government of the Northwest Territories on the division.

My colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, indeed will be working and meeting with both groups, the government and the native groups in that area, to arrive at the steps that are to be taken so that we can move quickly to its completion.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, on September 25, in this House, the Prime Minister stated about his new aboriginal agenda: "The objective will be the enlargement of aboriginal capacity for self-government within the framework of the Canadian Constitution".

Since the creation of Nunavut will achieve that objective for the Inuit, will the minister agree to the proposal by the leader of the Government of the Northwest Territories in terms of committing financially the amount needed to create that territory and ensuring that the western portion of that territory does not suffer as a result of that division?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, the financial arrangements as well as all of the administrative arrangements are points for discussion in the upcoming meetings, and they will be looked at very closely.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

An hon. member: Your father is listening.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, whatever you do, don't call me out of order today.

Mr. Speaker: Whatever the hon. member does, don't give me reason.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The minister intends to apply very strict criteria to the James Bay project. However, he did not apply the same criteria to Point Aconi in Nova Scotia or the Alcan project in British Columbia. These projects were exempted because, according to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, there would be no environmental damage.

My question is this: does the scientific information on which the decision of the Minister of Fisheries was based, which includes scientific opinions that are totally unacceptable, reflect the criteria the Minister of the Environment intends to apply in future?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the Point Aconi project, he should know that we initiated an assessment of this project. We considered all the points raised by the public throughout Nova Scotia with respect to the Point Aconi project. According to the experts, all the questions that were raised could be dealt with through action that was taken and in fact requested by the company concerned. Once the criteria had been met, there was no need to request a public panel on a matter that, according to the experts, could be dealt with satisfactorily.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, if there is any indication of the problem of defending the environment with this government, it is that the Minister of the Environment refuses to stand up and defend the record of his government.

For some months this government has defended its case with regard to the Rafferty-Alameda, but I would like to cite a federal official who said yesterday: "Irreparable harm is being done to the environment by the Rafferty-Alameda project." The fact is that irreparable harm is being done to the environment by this government.

Given the very high quality of scientific attack which is being levelled against the evaluations that were done in the case of Point Aconi and in the case of Alcan, will the minister order a complete review of these projects now? Or, once again must the Canadian people and this side of the House push this government and this minister into doing its job?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat something I have said quite often. This government is following the EARP guidelines exactly in the way that the former government put them in.

It is important to note that we have put forth a new bill on environmental assessment to go further than the EARP guidelines and to do the job the way we believe it should be done.

I would urge the opposition to support strongly the bill that we have before this House at the moment.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, last night the Prime Minister, in response to a student who protested the application of the GST to books, said the following: "My hope and expectation is that once we get it in and get it implemented, we are going to be able to revise the tax code in such a way as to ensure that the quite sensitive and sensible question you raise can be dealt with, with satisfaction."

My question is for the Minister of Finance. What on earth does the Prime Minister mean? Does he mean that the government was wrong to apply the tax to books in the first place? Does he mean he is going to remove it next year? Does he mean he is going to remove it now? Why doesn't he remove it now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have responded to that question. What I have said in previous answers in the House today is that with any tax initiative, particularly a tax initiative of this sort of magnitude, we always review the implementation. We always review the impact of the tax as it affects different people. We are quite prepared to do that in this case, as indicated by the Prime Minister yesterday.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister of Finance discovered the r word recession. Prime Minister, in his turn, discovered another r word, reversal, reversal of the claim that the GST was revenue neutral.

Will not the government discover the virtue of other r words like repent, respond to the people, and renounce the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's r word, let me talk about another r word, revenue neutral and precisely what is meant by that word.

In the course of tax reform we said we would not take additional revenues under the cloud of tax reform, that dollars in would equal dollars out. We would replace an existing tax with a new tax and would not try to get additional revenues.

As far as the impact of the GST on the economy and on tax policy is concerned, it definitely helps generate additional revenues over what would be the case if we did not have the tax.

For one it will result in a major boost to new investment. That will create jobs and new revenues. In addition, it will reduce a significant amount of tax avoidance amounting to some $2 billion a year. Again, if we had not brought in the GST we would see that the deficit would go up by $2 billion.

Those are two very clear reasons as to how the GST will help us reduce the deficit.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This summer we were supposed to sign an agreement with the Government of Quebec to confirm Quebec's full authority over immigration matters. I am sure you realize that controlling the selection of immigrants and their cultural, linguistic and economic integration is extremely important to Quebec.

Madam Minister, why the delay in signing this agreement?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is of course unfortunate that we cannot sign constitutional agreements as originally planned under the Meech Lake Accord. Nevertheless, our two governments still intend to update the existing Cullen-Couture accord signed in 1976.

Today, however, I cannot confirm on what date intergovernmental talks will be finalized, but I can assure the hon. member that we remain firmly resolved to conclude an agreement.

SPACE AGENCY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Last February, a press conference was held at Saint-Hubert to announce the construction schedule for the Space Agency. At the time it was announced that architects and engineers would be appointed by April 15. It was also announced there would be a progress report on September 30 this year. However, the people of the South Shore and the greater Montreal area complain that nothing has been done. What is happening on this score, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Longueuil used to sit on this side of the House, he ought to know that the Space Agency is a very complex dossier and that it is part of the overall plan for space development in Canada.

The Space Agency itself has proceeded with a number of operations, including the transfer of a number of people to Saint-Hubert and Montreal. In a matter of weeks I should be in a position to announce that not just the agency but the whole space program has been finalized, and I think the people in Saint-Hubert and Montreal and across this country will be delighted with the announcement I intend to make in the weeks to come.

BILL C-21

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This year, for the first time in 14 years, the government refused to pass the variable entrance requirement bill for unemployment insurance. In the face of a recession the government held thousands of Canadians in high unemployment regions hostage to the passage of the bill, which regrettably passed last night in the Senate.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, now the applause has died down, perhaps the government can tell us, then, why the government announced today that it will take four more weeks for this bill to be implemented and an additional four weeks to process UI claims, so that the net effect of the passage of the bill is that thousands of Canadians in high unemployment areas right across this country will not have any income for Christmas.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think there are three or four things that the hon. member should know. First of all, at least part of the delay having to do with the fishing benefits concerned a compromise between the Senate and the elected House through our desire to be reasonable. Had we accepted the amendment originally proposed by the Senate, it would have taken longer.

Second, I would like to point out it was this elected House of Commons that passed this act originally. It is the policy of this elected House, and it is about time it went into place. Third, let me point out that when the Liberal government changed the law with Bill C-69, Royal Assent was on December 20, 1975 and the bill went into effect only on July 4, 1976, six months and 14 days later.

• (1500)

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister has obviously, inadvertently, given completely false information to the people of Canada. It must have been inadvertent because the fact remains a VER bill was before this House on December 19 and again in June, and on both occasions her party voted down the VER, not the Liberal Party of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, my question is very simple. For 14 years her department has been administering a 10-week rule, there is nothing new. Why are we waiting eight weeks for people to be eligible for their unemployment insurance? Why are we stealing Christmas from thousands of the poorest of the poor families of Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was so concerned about the unemployed, I do not see why he did not urge his Senate colleagues to pass this bill months ago.

The changes to the fishing benefits for self-employed fishermen go into effect on November 4. The changes to the entrance requirements and durations go into effect on November 18. We are all ready to move as fast as we can, in terms of sending out the cheques and processing claims. But the hon. member knows as well as I do that under the law of the land our hands are tied, in terms of administration, until we have the legislation that we could have had nearly a year ago.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery—

POINT OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT ORDER NO. 16 AND ALL RELEVANT AMENDMENTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, pursuant to the discussions which took place in the House yesterday and on Friday of last week, concerning the government motion which is to be voted upon this afternoon. In the course of substitution on Friday last of the motion which is now before the House for the earlier motion, through a procedural irregularity, unfortunately, the amendment and the subamendment are not before the House.

As I indicated yesterday, I have discussed this matter with representatives of both the government and the Official Opposition.

[Translation]

I also spoke to the hon. member for Shefford.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that there might be agreement to allow the question to be put, without debate, this evening at six o'clock on the amendment which we had originally sought to place before the House to the original government motion. That amendment would read as follows:

> That this House censure the government for not recalling Parliament at the earliest opportunity to fulfil its legitimate function of consultation and debate, as to what role Canada should play in the resolution of the present crisis.

Point of Order

> That Canada work at the UN Security Council to seek assurances that no country will undertake offensive military operations against Iraq, unless they are under UN command and explicitly authorized by the Security Council;
> That this House accept the undertaking of the government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian forces in and around the Arabian Peninsula.

This motion, as its predecessor, would also be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

The effect of allowing this motion to be put would be very straightforward. It will allow us to vote on the subamendment that we had originally proposed to this House and originally sought to vote on before the decision that was made by unanimous consent of this House on Friday last.

I would hope that there might be agreement to allow the vote to take place on this subamendment. I understand that there is to be a meeting of House leaders this afternoon. If it is not possible to arrive at an agreement at this point, I understand there is a discussion of the House leaders and it might be further discussed there. I hope we might agree that the House would be allowed to vote on this subamendment which was originally before the House and in fact was the subject of debate during the entire course of debate on this very important issue.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the matter raised by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway concerning a request for consent on what I consider to be a very important matter.

This is not the normal business of this House. We are dealing with issues that affect, in basic terms, life and death and war and peace. It is not often that we have occasion to come together and make this kind of judgment and choice. We have had a serious debate in this House on this matter.

It was of some real concern to our caucus and our own party that we wanted to indicate a clear will on behalf of Canadian people concerning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraqi forces and to ensure that we clearly stand for the international response that has been mounted. We are attempting to find an agreement and to co-operate in doing that. Many members on this side of the House stated their position that we were prepared to do that.

Point of Order

We had certain questions relating to the government's original resolution in the sense that it did imply that there would be a blank cheque, if you like, or a mandate given for further action on behalf of the government. We raised that with members opposite, with the Secretary of State and with others. They were most forthcoming in providing, by way of written assurance, that they would be seeking a UN resolution and mandate as well as, and I think this is very important, ensuring that Parliament would be consulted in virtually all circumstances. That was incorporated as part of the amendment.

I have been on both sides of the House and I have participated in literally hundreds of debates. I know from experience that when there has been that sort of dialogue across the House and a mutual agreement made to find a way of resolving some of those differences so that there can be some common ground, that was the basis upon which the resolution was put forward. I think that the amendments and the revisions the government is proposing are certainly acceptable to our side and we would like to proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I think that yesterday I said in no uncertain terms what I thought about this matter. As we approach the end of what to me is a non-debate, since as far as I am concerned, the debate ended Thursday night, some incredible things have been going on in this House. I would like to reserve comment on the statement made by the Speaker this morning until tomorrow. There are no two ways about it: either I do not understand or I understand all too well. I would like to think about it until tomorrow. I did not exactly appreciate the tenor of the debate this morning when the Speaker made some comments on yesterday's ruling. I support the decisions of the Speaker. It is not up to the Speaker of the House of Commons to tell us he may have gone too far. He handed down a ruling yesterday. I want to analyze very carefully what he said this morning and get back to it tomorrow, if necessary.

What I fail to understand, and I hope my colleagues will understand that this is not a split between the parties— I can hear the hon. member, to whom I always refer as my esteemed colleague from the New Democratic Party, saying: another split among the Liberals.

• (1510)

It is not a matter of division but of knowing what is happening. I never saw a debate get so complicated. What exactly is going on? Everyone has an opinion on the subject. I don't understand. I refuse to take part in a debate on such an important matter, with all the wheeling and dealing that is going on, some of it public, some of it private, some of it between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and a few members. This is not the way to approach such an important matter. I will say no more. I won't commit myself. The hon. member said there might be consultations this afternoon. I will be reasonable. Get on with your consultations! I am going to stay here in my seat until the division at six o'clock. I intend to stay here all afternoon. I will see what happens.

Get on with your negociations, but don't ask unanimous consent for something you might decide to do this afternoon, but which is still up in the air. Mr. Speaker, I know there will be a division at six o'clock on a motion. I regret the unanimous consent given last Friday. We will vote accordingly. Now, get on with your work, do as you please, but I am going to stay here and watch this semi-public, semi-private business. We will see, once and for all, whether we are able to conduct our business here in this House, in full view of the Canadian people, because I think they will soon want to know what really happened in this debate. Thank you.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to comment that I don't think the proposal made by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party is reasonable, considering the fact that earlier, the hon. member from Winnipeg made a great show of being magnanimous, claiming that all this had taken place with the full co-operation of all concerned. Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do it was all done with the greatest possible secrecy. Like the hon. member for Saint-Denis, I wonder who has an interest in this conspiracy of silence, this last minute conspiracy involving a couple of members and the minister. What is going on in this House? Why are Canadian public and hon. members being kept in the dark?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the debate is now on a different subject. Perhaps the hon. member will have another opportunity to air his grievance.

[English]

I am obligated to ask the House if there is unanimous consent for the proposal of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Is there unanimous consent?

For the third time, is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. Orders of the Day.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MOTION FOR TIME ALLOCATION AT SECOND-READING STAGE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid (p. ).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate on the motion for time allocation. The hon. member for Laurentides.

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate you before the House on your recent appointment to the elevated position of Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, in 1975 it took four days to adopt the second-reading stage of the bill to establish Petro-Canada.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in my place to support this legislation authorizing the sale of shares of Petro-Canada to the general public. Today, I would like to discuss how this proposed transaction fits into the broader approach to privatization which has been followed by the government since 1984.

In the past six years the government has issued an economic policy based on less government involvement in the private sector and more disciplined use of taxpayers' resources. Privatization is a key component of that policy.

At last count, the Canadian government owned 53 Crown corporations, 113 subsidiary Crown corporations, and had partial holdings in a number of other firms. This is after having successfully privatized 13 Crown corporations and Crown holdings, and five mixed-ownership corporations. Some of these include Canadair, an aircraft manufacturer; Teleglobe Canada, our overseas telecommunication carrier; and, of course, Air Canada, Canada's largest airline which was sold through two public shares offerings to over 100,000 shareholders.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it took four days to adopt the bill to establish Petro-Canada in 1975, and this was under the Liberal government.

[English]

The success of Canada's approach to privatization is due largely to the fact that it reflects our country's unique demographic, economic, political, and historical circumstances.

Consider for a moment the disparity between our geography and our population. Canada is the largest country in the western hemisphere. Its total area is almost 3.8 million square miles, compared to the U.S. with 3.6 million square miles. We have a population of only 26 million, one-tenth of that of the U.S.A.

Mr. Volpe: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): One moment, please. The hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, earlier in the debate you raised a question of leeway that you would allow in debate with respect to time allocation and the kinds of principles we might introduce when talking about the points with respect to this motion.

When we were debating, I think you said that while you were willing to allow some sort of leeway, we were discussing time allocation. I wonder if you would feel it opportune at this moment perhaps to remind the member that the eloquence of his speech is probably more appropriate for discussion on Bill C-84, and not on time allocation where some members want to have—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence who seems to have listened carefully to the proceedings this morning. That being said, I showed some tolerance this morning towards members on both sides of the House. I would ask the hon. member for Laurentides to continue his speech and try to address the subject of time allocation, although we do allow some latitude on the substance of the debate.

Mr. Vien: Mr. Speaker, as far as time allocation is concerned, I believe that in 1975, the Liberals, who took four days to pass the bill, made good use of the time allowed.

[English]

The disparity between our geography and our population and that of the U.S. has encouraged a reliance on government ownership as a way of supplying vital national services such as rail and air transport. Some of the customers of these services express concern that a change in ownership will mean a reduction in service or safety, or increased prices. Therefore, in developing its privatization plans, the government gives special consideration to the concerns of the customers. Where necessary, regulations are introduced to ensure that health and safety standards are maintained.

• (1520)

Another factor explaining Canada's approach to privatization is the role of foreign ownership in our economy. Canada's economic development gave rise to an industrial base dominated by branch plants. Most of Canada's manufacturing and petroleum products sectors are still dominated by subsidiaries of companies headquartered outside Canada.

As a result, Canadians have welcomed the financial benefits of foreign investment while remaining a bit nervous about the consequences of foreign influence on our economy. Because of this, the government's privatization program looks at the foreign ownership question on a case-by-case basis to determine whether non-resident restrictions are required.

All of these uniquely—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Laurentides. His speech is most interesting but once again, relevance requires us to consider the following question: why should Parliament limit debate on Bill C-84? Although I am quite tolerant, I find it difficult to let the hon. member proceed without dealing specifically with this question. I would appreciate his co-operation.

Mr. Vien: Mr. Speaker, as I said before, in 1975 the Liberals who are now in the opposition certainly made good use of the time allowed for the debate on the bill to establish Petro-Canada.

[English]

All these uniquely Canadian circumstances that I mentioned before—a small population and a large mass, the predominance of branch plants, our Constitution with its complex division of powers between the provincial and federal governments, and the nature of our domestic capital markets—had to be taken into account when the government first got itself into the business of owning commercial interests. They are now taken into account as we get out.

The minister has assured us that the government's privatization program is based on a pragmatic, common sense, case-by-case approach. The time is taken to examine very carefully the circumstances associated with each company in order to determine the best method of timing of sale.

As the minister stated earlier, Crown ownership is no longer necessary to achieve the principal public policy objective in the energy sector—to establish the conditions in which economic development of our energy reserves can occur.

What is necessary for Petro-Canada to participate aggressively in is the development of our oil and gas reserves and access to a new and reliable source of equity.

Once again, we are left with a choice in the House of finding that money by taxing Canadians, by borrowing even more money on their behalf, or by inviting Canadians to take a direct stake in the company, to share the challenge which lies ahead.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired. I must recognize a new speaker. The hon. member for Etobicoke North.

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I find it surprising, having listened to the member in his brief intervention, that he is evidently advocating time closure. The arguments he had adduced for supporting time allocation, I had thought, would have led him to quite the opposite conclusion. He also set forth a very good case, indeed, why Petro-Canada should remain a Crown corporation.

Of course, the reasons for Petro-Canada being a Crown corporation—and this is why I rise to speak against time allocation—are fundamental to the Canadian economy. Canadians have seen the role of Petro-Canada in the past decade as a vital aspect of government policy and the ability of the government, on behalf of the people of Canada, to intervene and to have a window on the energy industry that otherwise simply would not exist. Otherwise, the industry would indeed be in the hands of foreign corporations only.

In Canada, we have seen over the years the importance of Crown corporations in our economic development. We have seen the blending of private enterprise and public corporations in a way which has been uniquely Canadian and which has brought major benefits to Canada. It is for that reason that I rise to speak, however briefly given the limited time now available, against this motion of time allocation.

The privatization of Petro-Canada is far too important a subject to be encompassed in the few hours of debate that the government foresees for this very important issue. As I said, Canadians have benefited from the mixed economy that we have known since the days of Confederation. There is no need, today, to turn our backs on those benefits. We have seen those benefits in various industries and we have seen them no less in the petroleum industry.

What was the logic behind Canada's creation of Petro-Canada? As the speaker before me noted, Canada has a vast territory, a small population, immense natural resources, but the only Canadian-controlled element available to ensure a Canadian presence in the vital petroleum industry was, of course, the national government. The government acted more than 15 years ago to create a national petroleum company and, if we look at the record over that period, we shall see the wisdom of it so doing.

The international price of oil is not set by free market conditions as all of us in the House recognize. OPEC is a near monopoly in setting oil prices. Therefore, the argument that Petro-Canada is somehow unnecessary because free market forces can determine international oil prices is patently untrue.

What the existence of Petro-Canada does give Canada is the opportunity to participate in international pricing and to sense the nature of oil pricing with regard to OPEC's dominant position. PetroCan is a window on the industry which permits Canada to pursue its interest in a way that simply would be impossible if our industry were in the hands of foreign corporations or even of Canadian private investors.

The inability of the market to foresee the nature of long-term supplies is another serious issue that has caused problems for Canada. Again, the presence of Petro-Canada in the international oil markets helps to ensure that Canadians have the opportunity to overcome the problems that arise from uncertain supplies.

• (1530)

What was Petro-Canada's mandate? It was to help ensure energy supplies for Canadians, to assist the government in the formulation and execution of a national energy policy, and to increase Canada's presence in the petroleum industry. The record is clear, to that end, Canada's PetroCan has been active in frontier exploration, in foreign petroleum reserves and in the mediation of state-to-state trading.

I would suggest that the necessity of Canada having such a corporation is even more evident today given the continuing uncertainties of the international petroleum scene and, indeed, following the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are indicating that my time has expired. I want to stress once more that we on this side of the House will vote against time allocation on this important issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It now being 3.31 p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) have expired.

Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Orders, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings to put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

October 23, 1990

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverley M. McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd day of October, 1990, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Judith A. LaRocque,
Secretary to the Governor General

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McDermid that Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Lee, (p. 14001), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East), (p. 14010).

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure today to speak in support of the proposed legislation which will authorize the Government of Canada to sell shares of Petro-Canada to the Canadian public.

Globally, governments everywhere from China to France, from Hungary to Israel and Britain, are involved in major privatization initiatives on an ever-increasing broad scale. In Canada, provincial governments such as Quebec, British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, have also made major sales of Crown owned corporations to the private sector and to ordinary Canadians.

The question often asked is: why privatize at all? Reasons for privatization differ from country to country and from province to province but, in Canada, the federal government's commitment to privatization is rooted in the Canadian tradition of creatively and successfully mixing pubic initiative with private enterprise. Both have their place, the issue is striking the proper balance between the two.

In earlier periods in our history, it has been made necessary for Canada to put an emphasis on large government doing many things. Today, though, the private sector is recognized as being more appropriately the principal stimulant of economic growth and renewal in Canada.

In Canada's early years, state intervention was important, in fact, essential in building the great canals that opened our country to commerce, in assisting in transcontinental transportation, through the building of the CNR and even developing our national broadcasting system. National medicare and income-support programs also resulted from government interest and intervention, for the common good.

Today, Canada has a developed and maturing social and economic infrastructure, the emphasis on state ownership and big government growth that continued into the 1980s has to be curtailed or two situations will worsen. Government deficits, used to pay for increasing state intervention, will continue to rise uncontrollably, and the private sector, the engine of growth in the economy, will be constrained by unnecessary and unfair competition and pressures from the public sector.

Can government do everything, and should governments do everything? The answer is unequivocally no, and that leads to the underlying assumptions behind our government's privatization program.

There are basic reasons why your federal government pursues these privatization initiatives. First, the changing economic environment for many Crown corporations. The original objectives behind the creation are no longer valid. Second, there is abundant evidence to suggest that many Crown corporations are not as effective in serving their clients as the private sector. Privatization, by putting corporations under the test of the marketplace, can certainly improve efficiency. Third, public funds. Public ownership of Crown corporations can place enormous demands on government resources to manage and financially support various enterprises.

Public institutions use taxpayers' money to operate. The recognition that a Crown corporation is responsible for public funds often leads to slow, deliberate decision-making and occasional aversion on the part of management to risk taking. What about fairness and equality? Petro-Canada and other corporations compete directly with the private sector. The Canadian government's approach to privatization is based on specific objectives designed to confirm the appropriateness of public institutions while encouraging a vibrant and vital private sector. Should governments do everything? Again, a resounding no. Canadians saw the enormous price that had to be paid when governments of all sorts got involved in every manner of human endeavour in Canada.

Our government believes in the individual. We believe in the private sector. We believe in creating wealth through entrepreneurial initiative and competition. We believe in creating opportunities for small business persons, for workers, for women, for the disabled, for the corporations and for everyone. That is why we see so many countries turning to privatization regardless of the prevailing political philosophy, privatization is results-oriented and deals with the real need of a nation.

Because of our sparse population in Canada and peculiar and expensive geography, there are times when the private sector could not properly meet an important public objective. Crown intervention was one way to accelerate or enhance the growth of our young nation. Many of our Crown corporation earn the loyalty of Candians as they served as pioneers in resource development , manufacturing and the transportation sectors.

Something happened sometime in the sixties when suddenly the accepted norm of Canadian mixed public policy, the creative mixing of public initiative with private enterprise, became unbalanced. Everything seemed to go one way, to public intervention in Canada. Suddenly the prevailing thought was that government should and could do everything. Governments went in search of needs to fill, of hurts to mend, of inequities to overcome.

Government became big business in Canada or perhaps more realistically, just plain big. Because the business part and the rationale for Crown corporations in the first place got lost, many Crowns began operating like government departments themselves, pursuing an array of public objectives but virtually obliterating many of the business components of their mandates: products, client service, profit and return on investment.

Here is what the Auditor General of Canada said in 1982. He talked about "a problem of accountability, massive in its dimensions" and "In the aggregate, Crown corporations represent a hole in the taxpayers' pocket, resulting, as they do so often, in a consistent negative return on investment."

The reasons for my support are simple and clear. State ownership of Petro-Canada is not necessary for the company to achieve public policy objectives.

• (1610)

The company needs capital to develop our oil and gas reserves, and a public share issue is a better way to raise capital than a higher deficit or raising taxes.

Let me discuss the public policy role of Petro-Canada. At the time Petro-Canada was created in the seventies, we were told by the previous government that a state-owned oil company was needed to achieve three basic objectives on behalf of the Canadian people.

First and foremost, the company was to work to increase the petroleum supplies available in Canada by exploring new sources of oil and gas, especially in the frontier.

Second, the company was charged with being a window in the industry to help the government formulate a national energy policy.

Third, the company was to be Canada's agent in state-to-state negotiations.

In the 1990s, it is clear that government ownership of Petro-Canada is no longer required to achieve such public policy objectives. Canada has a much clearer perspective on the extent of our frontier reserves and their potential development.

Additionally, we have the agencies and instruments in place. We have the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration and the National Energy Board. Therefore, we have the public agencies in place to do the things that Petro-Canada was to do.

In short, the reasons for state ownership of Petro-Canada are no longer valid. We will leave the debate about whether they ever were to historians.

Today, Canadian energy policy embraces the reality that Canada's economy is part of the world market. Efforts of previous governments to insulate us from that reality simply did not work. Today, we recognize that energy markets must be allowed to respond to changes in supply and demand conditions.

This approach works for Canadians because it leaves a foundation for both expansion of our resources sector and competitive pricing for consumers. When the government has intervened, it has been to act to facilitate the development of large energy projects where the costs and risks are significant impediments to private investors.

Petro-Canada has a role to play in the development of Canada's energy reserves, not as an instrument of government policy, of course, but as an active and competitive private sector company. As a chairman and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada has stated publicly, unless the company gains additional funds to shore up its capital base, the company cannot get on with the job of developing our energy reserves without raising its debt to dangerous levels.

Let us talk a bit about Petro-Canada. Based on Petro-Canada's 1989 annual report, the company has proven reserves of 3.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas and 527.3 million barrels of crude oil. Petro-Canada's share of Canada's proven reserves is 4.3 per cent of natural gas and 6.7 per cent of crude oil. Petro-Canada estimates that it can spend in the order of $2.5 billion over the next five years for its exploration and development expenditures. Certainly, it is going to need money to do that.

Without new equity then, Petro-Canada will not be able to contribute to the important development of exploration in this country in the way that we all think it should, and we want them to.

First, I suppose what we could do is just ignore the problem and hope that it will go away. This would leave Petro-Canada with the decision to either risk financial instability, sell assets and change the profile of the company or cut back on this important exploration and development that we would all like to see them do.

Second, the government could find the money to secure Petro-Canada's financial future. That would mean either increasing the federal deficit even further or by raising taxes or cutting out some other government programs to free up the funds.

Third, we can invite Canadians to take a direct stake in a company through a public share offering, as was suggested with this bill. By offering Petro-Canada shares to the public, the government is giving individual Canadians the opportunity to take a direct stake in this great Canadian oil company and share in its important future.

Even more important, Petro-Canada will give a new source of equity that it simply cannot obtain as a wholly-owned Crown corporation.

The company's current financial position underscores the need to access more funds and equity, as we mentioned. Petro-Canada's 1989 performance reflects an emphasis on improving efficiency in order to position the company to benefit from the potential opportunities available in the Canadian oil and gas industry.

With respect to the first half results for 1990, the chairman has indicated that their efforts must be redoubled in order to improve the company's performance. These are important facts and statements from the people who run the company, the Crown corporation, as it is now.

As the Minister of State for Privatization has stated, both the company and the taxpayer can be better served by allowing Petro-Canada to raise new equity directly from investors rather than relying on the Canadian taxpayer through the federal government. When one examines the alternatives before us, I believe Canadians will agree that the intelligent decision is the one of privatization.

Petro-Canada operates in a competitive and dynamic industry. In order to remain competitive, that company must have access to a reliable source of new equity. It is no longer acceptable to expect that the equity comes from the taxpayers' pockets. The taxpayer does not want to pay any more taxes. Privatization will give Petro-Canada direct access to an alternate source.

Privatization will help strengthen the company by providing funds so that it can get on with the job. It will give Petro-Canada the financial flexibility now enjoyed by its competitors and give the company access to that new equity without hurting the taxpayer.

There is a cost to keeping Petro-Canada as a state-owned company. The first casualty of this decision would be Petro-Canada itself. But the costs would also be felt by the ordinary Canadian through higher taxes, a higher debt, and fewer possible public services. This would be wrong. It would be the wrong decision for Petro-Canada and the wrong decision for the people of Canada.

These are some of the reasons why I support this important legislation. Continued state ownership of Petro-Canada would impair this great company's ability to compete. It would impair its ability to explore, and impair its ability to bring on stream gas and oil that will be needed for our domestic use.

While Petro-Canada may have been conceived as a product of ideology, the decision to privatize it is clearly a product of common sense. It is not only common sense here, but it is common sense around the world. As The Economist magazine has noted, at least 35 countries in the world have moved to privatization. It is not a move of ideology; it is one of common sense.

Liberal governments, conservative governments, socialist governments throughout the world have moved in great numbers to privatization of these Crown-owned companies. It is stated in The Economist magazine dated December 21, 1985:

> Herbert Morrison, the father of nationalization, assumed the public sector would work hard for the public good—and that competition was a waste of resources. Consumers around the world know he was wrong. When privatization fosters competition, and with it the concept of risk and reward, it appeals to the basic greed for individual betterment. As such, it has become deservedly popular—and may deservedly succeed.

I am pleased to be able to speak in support of this bill. I am pleased and proud that our government is moving this very important and great Canadian company into the hands of the Canadians who can invest in this company so that it will bring greater benefits to all Canadians in this very important sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On questions and comments, the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to investigate a little further the hon. member's concept of common sense, which he touted during at least the closing parts of his remarks.

I noted that the member said that Petro-Canada had to be privatized in order to enable it to—and I believe I am quoting correctly—"raise new equity, rather than relying on the taxpayer." He said, as well, and I believe I am quoting here too: "it's no longer acceptable to say new equity will come from the taxpayers' pockets".

As near as any of us are able to tell—the government has not been terribly forthcoming in this regard—in attempting to read the runes, watch the smoke signals, and check out the entrails of the owls, and all this sort of stuff, we seem to be left with the situation in which, to begin with at least, we are looking at a 15 per cent treasury issue for equity in Petro-Canada.

By the way, the proceeds from this 15 per cent will be ploughed back into the company. That is where the new equity is coming from and various estimates have placed the value of that initial 15 per cent issue at between $500 million and $700 million. That is money that will be taken from the sale of shares in the company, shares now owned by the taxpayers, the receipts for which—that $500 million to $700 million—will be ploughed back into the company.

My first question to the hon. member is this: How does that constitute not relying on the taxpayer? How does that constitute a situation in which it is no longer acceptable to say new equity will come from the taxpayers' pockets, when that is exactly where it is coming from?

Beyond that, having raided the taxpayers' pockets for that initial 15 per cent issue, I quote from the remarks of the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs made in the House on October 10, at page 13995 of Hansard:

> This initial public offering will create a broad market for the company's shares—The net proceeds of future sales of the government shares will be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

If we are going to take the rest of the shares owned by the taxpayers, sell them, and return that money to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, where is this huge new pool of equity that we say Petro-Canada will then be able to exploit? If we are not going to take at least $3.5 billion out of the equity markets before we pay out the Consolidated Revenue Fund, then we will be engaging in a raid on that fund of historic proportions.

But assuming we get all that back, and assuming we have soaked the equity markets for between $4 billion and $5 billion in this Petro-Canada issue, where in the name of sweet reason does the member believe even further equity for the corporation is going to come from?

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, certainly the treasury issue is going immediately to PetroCan so it can use those dollars for investment.

He did not say the secondary issues would go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund which will certainly lower the government's need to borrow in the future. Additionally, we are going to the private sector for investment along the way. There will be an infusion as people buy in, of course, and those moneys will be used.

I do not know what else he would want to take from that. The main thrust is to provide equity, other than the areas that we are mentioning where we would have to have taxpayers' money go directly. It needs an infusion of cash. It needs an infusion of equity. It needs that money to go out and explore. That has been stated. The kind of figures that were mentioned is in the billions of dollars. That will be done by privatization that is going to take place. He knows that, and Canadians know that. Canadians are very happy that they are going to have the opportunity to invest in this company.

What is important with all the other companies that are around in Canada is that now they will know that will have an integrated oil and gas company that is going to be competing as a private enterprise, rather than one that is supported, if need be, by the Government of Canada. That is pretty important and it will probably make them cut their costs and be more competitive.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter this debate today, not because I support the privatization of Petro-Canada. On the contrary, I strongly oppose this legislation and will vote against it at all stages. Rather, I am pleased to enter this debate because I think it is time that the Canadian people, and more importantly, the government opposite, take the time to discuss the public policy role being served by Crown corporations in our country and that we take the time to understand the true values of the collective needs of the country.

Just when the potential for gouging Canadian oil and gas consumers by foreign owned and controlled oil companies is at its highest point in more than a decade, the government opposite is moving to privatize our national oil company. If ever there was a time in a way for the government to be involved in the oil industry, it is now. That can best be achieved through the Crown corporation we already own.

New Democrats have frequently and incorrectly been labelled as the party that wanted to own everything, but that is far from the truth. In fact, as has been shown by our highly successful provincial governments, New Democrats believe strongly in the mixed marketplace, a marketplace run by the private sector, the co-operative sector, and the public sector working together.

The New Democratic Party was created from a foundation established by the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, the CCF, in Saskatchewan. In 1944 the CCF under its then leader, and a great Canadian, Tommy Douglas, formed the government and, of course, at that time worried all of Canada about what it might do. Those worries proved fruitless.

Tommy Douglas was always a man ahead of his time. When the CCF formed the government in 1944, he clearly outlined his plans and I quote from his memoirs:

> When we talked about a co-operative commonwealth, we had in mind a mixed economy combining public ownership, co-operative ownership, and private ownership. In our opinion, those industries that were vital to the life of the community, and were monopolistic in character, ought to be publicly owned.

The Tories said Tommy was removing freedoms when he set up a Crown corporation in Saskatchewan, but Tommy said the only freedom that he was taking away was the freedom to exploit somebody else. Since then Saskatchewan has run successful telephone and power companies, extended transportation services across the province, and reduced taxes in that province by generating revenues from resources.

The present Leader of the New Democratic Party in Saskatchewan, Mr. Roy Romanow, has a good story that he tells about Tommy. Flying over Saskatchewan one night, Roy Romanow and Tommy Douglas were talking. Roy said to Tommy: "What is your greatest achievement?" Roy thought that Tommy Douglas was going to answer hospitalization. But instead, Tommy looked out the window of that airplane into the night sky over the Prairies and he said: "Look down there, Roy. Do you see those lights across every piece of rural Saskatchewan? That is the greatest achievement that I think that I brought to Saskatchewan." Rural electrification—Saskatchewan Power Corp. working in the province of Saskatchewan, a Crown corporation serving the interests of the Canadian people.

A big part of this debate today centres around the value of the public sector and, in particular, the value of the public corporation in the energy sector. The essence of the debate should concentrate on what is in the best long-term interest of Canadians rather than what seems to be the short-term interests of the members of the government opposite.

Public sector activity is an exercise in the management of government. It is using the tools available to achieve positive and necessary objectives. When a government determines that something is in the country's best interest, it has to act to ensure that best interest is served.

For years in this country, public corporations have been created with this in mind. We in Canada have never had a strong ideological bent in favour of public ownership. Rather, Crown corporations were created one by one to address real policy needs when it was felt that the private sector could not, or would not, do the job. For the most part, these Crown corporations have served Canadians well. But, this government would have us believe that Crown corporations are despicable, horned monsters destroying our economy and increasing the national debt. In actual fact, the Crown corporations often represent an income source or a national goal which would be lost without these corporations in place.

This government does not believe that governments should be in business. It believes that business can manage the economy better than government. What examples does it use to justify those statements? Since Crown corporations represent the government's ability to manage, if a Crown corporation fails, it is attributable to the management abilities of the government, just as when a business fails it is because of the management abilities of that business.

There are many success stories in the Crown corporation sector, and Petro-Canada could be one of them. Certainly, if a government thinks it can be successful as a private enterprise, then why, with the right management and the right direction, can it not be successful as a Crown corporation? Certainly, the people of Canada benefit to a larger extent if it is a successful Crown corporation rather than if it is a successful private corporation.

The other side of the coin is the success of the private sector. What's with the myth of the private sector being the perfect manager? There are hundreds of business failures in Canada and the United States every year. If Petro-Canada, a company that should be run for Canadian interest, is privatized, there is no guarantee that it will not end up like CN Route, the Campeau Corporation, Dun and Bradstreet or Peter Pocklington's operation.

I just happened to pick up a copy of the May 1990 issue of Report on Business magazine, published by The Financial Post. In there it talks about a number of businesses serving the great Canadian private sector and public interests. The Campeau Corporation, outlined in that magazine, in August 1987: "Stock prices reached an all-time high of $30.38 on the Toronto Stock Exchange. By September 1989 the stock fell to $13.50 and then by March 1990 the stock traded for less than $2.00 a share". Investors lost millions in this marvellous example of the marketplace at work.

In that same issue of The Globe and Mail "Report on Business" section, there is an article about Dun and Bradstreet, 150 years of trustworthiness that were gutted by bilking and sleazy tactics of their sales force, customers being taken for thousands of dollars by sales people who were motivated by management and commission structures. The marketplace scores again and the public loses.

We have heard about CN Route, a situation where the Tories privatized the company, sold it to a man who had been denied a credit card and then watched as 1,900 employees lost their jobs in a bankruptcy that occurred only 20 months after the privatization.

Malcolm Brickland, the great Atlantic car maker, bilked taxpayers of huge sums of money. Peter Pocklington in Saskatchewan. The taxpayers of Saskatchewan gave Peter Pocklington the money to build a bacon processing plant in my home town of North Battleford. The province of Alberta took over the assets of Peter Pocklington and now the taxpayers of Alberta own the company for which the Saskatchewan taxpayers paid. The great private sector at work.

What about the recent examples of Alberta Telephone and Air Canada? These privatizations have cost investments and jobs. Another popular myth with the privatizers is that there is a greater "public participation in share offering than there is in taxpayer ownership". Aside from the fact that Crown corporations, by their very nature, are owned by everyone and hold a great deal of taxpayers' equity, the best thing that can be said about Crown corporations is that they are accountable to their governments, and therefore accountable to the taxpayers.

Certainly the Howard Pawley government in Manitoba learned that lesson after car insurance rates increased beyond what the consumer was willing to pay. I would like to see a private car insurance scheme that was accountable to its shareholders and consumers.

A Crown corporation is the only way that a widespread shareholding can be effectively democratic. If we, as Canadians, ever want to have an influence through our government on the energy sector and its subsequent influence on the environment, then we have to maintain Petro-Canada.

To maintain Petro-Canada is also to give it a renewed mandate for exploration and development, and one that also includes other energy sources that will one day replace our nation's in the world's dependence on fossil fuels. The national interest has been forgotten in the name of the almighty marketplace which this government praises, while farmers and small business people go begging. The so-called middle class in this country is forced to pay the ever increasing bills.

Privatization is very mixed up in the marketplace agenda that the free trade deal and the goods and services tax have begun. Mr. Speaker, if you believe that the mythical marketplace will stabilize and develop our economy, then you have to believe the Crown corporations should not be interfering with it. So what, then, if we lose the Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan and Air Canada? So what if we see plans being prepared to get rid of Petro-Canada, Sask Energy, Canada Post Corporation and even the CBC?

There are more, of course. Canada and the provinces have always used Crown corporations for various positive purposes, but we cannot let our dislike for the present Prime Minister, or even for the premier of Saskatchewan or any other Conservative politician and our frustrations with their actions convince us that privatization is the answer to an improved economy. Rather, privatization just removes by one step our ability to control and manage our economy in our own interests.

New Democrats like public enterprise because, among other things, it acts as a vehicle for decentralizing entrepreneurship and investment decisions. It decentralizes economic power and acts as a buffer against the growing concentration of ownership and control in private corporate firms.

There is a role for public corporations in Canada, in the provinces and even at the local municipal level.

In fact, public enterprise has a vital and successful history. We have in Canada some of the world's best electrical utilities, the best telephone companies, the best broadcasting networks, the most efficient automobile insurance companies, a leading airline that once paved the way for health and safety matters, and a grain marketing agency that has liberated farmers from speculative markets and held their own in difficult times.

Mr. Speaker, you may not think of the Canadian Wheat Board as a Crown corporation, as a public enterprise, but it is. The Canadian Wheat Board belongs to all of us and acts for all of us in the selling of grain in the international marketplace. It has been highly successful and must be continually supported to keep it operating. The Canadian Wheat Board is in trouble. The United States wants it gone. Its top officers have just been replaced and the present government believes in privatizing everything and is examining the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

If any of the public questions the future of the Board, take a moment to review the market for oats in the past year since the present government removed the Wheat Board's authority over oats. The price has tumbled. The marketplace has caved in. The Wheat Board obviously is a very important factor in the future of grain prices for Canadian farmers.

Crown corporations have been created to do what private corporations could not or would not do. The Potash Corporation in Saskatchewan was created when the international potash corporations were reaping windfall profits and refused to share Saskatchewan's resource wealth with the people of Saskatchewan.

Ontario Hydro, one of the largest Crown corporations in the world was created originally to protect the electricity consumers in that province and went on to become a pioneer in large dam construction and in high power long distance transmission.

Petro-Canada was created when the world's energy stocks were in crisis and Canadians demanded to be a player at the table. The world's resources continue to be in crisis. Fossil fuels present a challenge to environmental scientists and the future of the world. Canada is preparing to abandon its public role in the sector and in the industry. The government does not need to own a gas station on every corner in this country, but we do need a presence in the energy industry, and Petro-Canada serves that purpose. We must maintain Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation. It can be well managed and it can operate without affecting the federal budget and the taxpayer's pocket-book.

There are a lot of problems associated with language used by governments when we talk about privatization. In fact, the word itself "privatization" means removing public influence and control and turning the enterprise completely over to the private sector. As much as the government wants that to happen, it instead tells us that privatization is public participation and that there will be greater public involvement in an enterprise that is privatized because of the ownership of shares. The theory is that you own the shares, you influence the company. The reality is you own the shares, you have less control of the company.

When a Crown corporation operates, it does so in the interests of its constituency, national or provincial. When a private company operates, it does so in its own interests and the interests of its immediate shareholders. The shareholders are almost always the more wealthy in our society. A few shares held here and there by ordinary Canadians in the system mean virtually and return virtually nothing. When we give up a successful Crown corporation, we give up a community-centred entrepreneurship that ties every taxpayer together.

There is the theory that the Crown corporations are costing taxpayers money and must be sold if we want to reduce the debt. Look at examples. Saskatchewan is full of them. I tend to think of this game of privatization as an exercise, as a game of Monopoly, the great illustration of private capital at work. The object of the game of Monopoly is to build a base from which revenues will flow and grow. No one ever won the game of Monopoly by selling their properties. When you started to sell your properties and your hotels, the other players in the game knew you were done for. That is what happened in Saskatchewan. Revenue generators were sold and the ones that cost money were maintained. Saskatchewan by selling its Crown corporations was selling Boardwalk on the Monopoly board. It cashed in its chips and let others play the game to win.

The federal government must not be allowed to make the same mistakes. At the same time as Saskatchewan sells off its assets, the provincial deficit continues to grow. The provincial debt in Saskatchewan is now $4 billion and we have seen privatization hit Sask Oil, the Potash Corporation, the Prince Albert Pulp Company, Sask Minerals and parts of Sask Tel, to name a few. Threats are being made against Sask Energy and Saskatchewan government insurance. We are selling off the province. We are not paying the debts.

Obviously privatization is not the answer and therefore Crown corporations were not the problem. On Petro-Canada as with a number of other federal Crown corporations, the government must be prepared to admit its mistake. Petro-Canada like Air Canada and the post office ought to be public service corporations carrying out some sort of defined social, political or economic goal that our society requires that is not being looked after and will not be looked after by private enterprise.

Petro-Canada, like Air Canada, the post office and others must be open, responsible and responsive. Like governments they must be accountable. A Crown corporation represents a taxpayer's investment in his or her own future. That future could be a job, an income, a quality of life or a safe and secure environment.

Petro-Canada has an important role to play in this country's future. We cannot afford to give up our investment just to satisfy the ideological dreams of the Conservative Party and their big business friends.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake being fairly demeaning to private enterprise and what it does in the marketplace.

I thought it might be interesting to him if I read from The Economist magazine which says:

> Mr. John Moore, the Treasury minister",—

This was in the U.K.

> —in charge of privatization, argues that past experience has surely taught us that, from the customer's point of view, the state is just as likely to abuse a monopoly position as a private owner.

The article goes on to say:

> He ought to know, The British Treasury has almost routinely forced the gas, electricity and water industries to charge their consumers more than the industries' chairmen thought either necessary or justified.

Listen, that is not private enterprise. They are examples of where public ownership is doing consumers in. Let us not be so demeaning to private enterprise. There is real reason to know and we can look around in Canada.

I have a question for the hon. member as to who said the following: "There are some sectors and some situations where the government buyouts make sense, but there are other sectors of the economy where such direct public ownership would be profoundly counterproductive; a huge investment of public dollars for little return. If our interest in democracy is to increase participation by workers and the public generally in the life of the company and the economy, then making the government the only shareholder isn't really the answer."

I do not think the member knows who said that, so I would like to tell him. It was Mr. Bob Rae, premier of Ontario.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I did not know the answer to the member's question, but I was thinking as I was listening to the quote that any good New Democrat would probably say that. As a result, I am very happy to hear that it is the new premier of Ontario who is credited with such good words by the member opposite.

There is also another person whom I would like to quote briefly. It was a note that I took in reading from Walter Stewart's 1987 book, in which Mr. Stewart talks about Crown corporations. He describes the worst situation that affects a Crown corporation: first, a corporation funded in part by the taxpayer but not responsible to Parliament; second, a corporation without social or political responsibility; and, third, an entity with neither heart nor head in proper working order".

Mr. Stewart was talking about Crown corporations in general, but he could be talking about the type of management that a private sector government would apply to either a post office or an airline company or, in this case, an energy company.

Petro-Canada, Air Canada and the post office, such corporations serving the interests of Canadian people must be accountable at all times. Only through Parliament can they be accountable to the people of this country.

A private company operating Petro-Canada can make all the mistakes in the world and the Canadian people have no recourse to correct them, but the government managing the sector through the Crown corporation must be held accountable every two, three, four and, heaven forbid, five years by the people of this country in general elections when they think about the management abilities of whatever government is serving them. I think accountability is key to the answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to you today concerning the legislation that will authorize the government to sell shares of Petro-Canada to the public.

I am particularly interested in assuring hon. members and reassuring Canadians that public ownership of Petro-Canada is not required for energy policy purposes. Indeed, quite the reverse is true. The privatization of Petro-Canada will directly and indirectly assist the pursuit of a number of energy policy objectives.

Petro-Canada has evolved through a number of phases since it was created in 1974. From very modest beginnings, it has become the largest Canadian owned and controlled oil company, with a major presence at every stage of the hydrocarbon production chain, including exploration, production, refining, marketing, and distribution. The corporation has arrived at its present state largely in response to government policy direction and partially in response to market opportunities.

• (1650)

In the early days of its operation, Petro-Canada's primary role was defined by the government of the day as an instrument of government policy. The corporation was directed to perform a number of functions considered desirable for energy reasons. It also was provided with the authority and funds from the public Treasury to carry out these tasks.

After the Progressive Conservative government took office in early 1985 Petro-Canada was given a commercial mandate. Since that time the government has not taken a direct role in the day-to-day operations of the company, and Petro-Canada has arranged its business operations largely to enhance the return to its shareholder.

To a significant extent Petro-Canada's current structure and financial situation are a result of its early mandate and path of development. Now Petro-Canada's future will depend largely on its ability to access the financing that it will need to take advantage of the opportunities presented for commercial growth as the large and aggressive member of the Canadian petroleum industry it has become.

It would be useful but not very uplifting to review how Petro-Canada's role has evolved over time. Petro-Canada was established by the Liberals in 1975 as their response to energy and economic forces which were prevalent in the mid-1970s. As originally established, Petro-Canada's mandate was supposed to be to work to increase petroleum supplies available to Canada by exploring for conventional oil and gas and by pushing forward the development of tar sands and heavy oil resources, to increase the Canadian presence in the industry by becoming a substantial land holder and operator and by participating in join ventures, to act as the agent of the Crown in state-to-state oil trade, and to serve as the government's window on the industry to help evaluate the domestic supply potential and provide insights on industry issues.

From 1975 to 1984 there was a rapid expansion of Petro-Canada into both upstream and downstream activities. Petro-Canada's entry into the downstream was accomplished through the purchase of Pacific Petroleums. This acquisition provided some modest balance to the high risk, long-term investments which Petro-Canada had taken on at the government's request. The entry into refining and marketing helped to provide the steady cash flow which could be used to support longer term projects.

Actions taken during this period established Petro-Canada as a major integrated producer with a significant market presence in Canada from coast to coast, but look at the costs: Petro-Canada acquired Pacific Petroleums for $1.5 billion over 1978 and 1979 and Petrofina Canada Inc. and BP Refining and Marketing Limited for approximately $2 billion between 1981 and 1983. Up to the end of 1984 the federal government had invested $4.3 billion in Petro-Canada to make it a major factor in the Canadian oil and gas industry. This $4.3 billion went to only one bottom line, the bottom line of our national debt. With interest I am sure the amount it has cost us is well over $6 billion, and some members opposite would have us continue expanding this debt.

In the late 1970s Petro-Canada also negotiated its first and only significant deal as a Crown agent involved in state-to-state oil trading. Agreement was reached with Pemex, the Mexican national oil company, to provide Petro-Canada with up to 100,000 barrels per day of crude oil.

This deal proved problematic. That is a way of saying it was a disaster. As it was largely in excess of Canadian demand for that quality of imported crude oil, the deal was eventually modified to reduce the volume of purchases by Petro-Canada and then it was allowed to elapse, which is another way of saying that we finally wriggled out of it. In fact it became clear during this period that many of the original public policy purposes for which Petro-Canada had been established were no longer as important as had once been thought, if they ever existed at all.

When the present government came into office in 1984, it was at a time of significant change in international energy markets. The higher energy prices of the 1970s and early 1980s had provoked some structural changes in the world oil market. Conservation and substitution away from oil had reduced total oil demands sharply, and many new sources of oil production outside OPEC had come onstream. In Canada the government also committed itself to a more market oriented energy policy based on confidence in the ability of competitive market forces to produce good results in terms of prices, investment, trade, and growth. These changed and welcome circumstances required a different role for Petro-Canada.

The government was also convinced that a different approach was needed for the energy sector. It was clear that the public interest in energy supply development did not require public ownership of an oil company. Many of the investments in frontier exploration that Petro-Canada had made, largely financed by direct federal incentive grants, had not yet led to commercial production. The expansion of supply and of Canadian investor participation in the industry could be better assured through establishing a stable and favourable investment climate. It was clear too that the window on the industry role was unnecessary, as the information needed by the government for energy policy formation was readily available from other sources. Generally it became apparent that direct state intervention in the domestic oil market was often non-productive and excessively costly for taxpayers.

Accordingly, in early 1985 the government gave Petro-Canada a commercial mandate. This mandate required the company to operate on a competitive basis in accordance with good industry practice. The corporation was expected to arrange its operations and investments in such a way as to increase the value of the shareholder's equity and earnings. Petro-Canada has done so largely at arm's length from the government with policy guidance provided only in general terms through the annual review by cabinet of the corporation's corporate plan and capital budget. In short, Petro-Canada has been subject to most of the same disciplines and expectations as are imposed upon private companies operating in a commercial environment, save one: the necessity of having to face the market to raise its capital.

Members of this House will not find it difficult to agree that Petro-Canada remains the pre-eminent Canadian company in the oil industry. While this government has been in charge it has, as Petro-Canada's shareholder, looked to the company to play a strong and positive role in the industry, investing in projects that make commercial sense and stimulating activity that is of broad economic benefit across the country.

Since this new mandate was given, Petro-Canada has remained an active investor in the oil and gas industry. It has participated in the offshore Terra Nova oil discovery, acquired Gulf Canada's refining, marketing and distribution assets, and announced its intention to diversify its activities through all phases of the hydrocarbon value added chain. It has continued with its partners to negotiate terms and conditions which would permit the development of its megaproject interests on a commercial basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CRIMINAL CODE AND SUPREME COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough) moved that Bill C-210, an act to amend the Criminal Code and the Supreme Court Act (habeas corpus), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a fortunate opportunity for many of us in the House of Commons who have for many years been trying to bring about changes to our extradition act. We have seen the effort that has been put forward by special interest groups, and to name one you tend sometimes to forget others, but they brought together into this House of Commons over 105,000 personal letters to the Minister of Justice of the day, the Hon. Doug Lewis.

In addition, we had petitions totalling some 97,000 names that were entered into the House of Commons by 47 members of Parliament from one end of this country to the other, asking for a streamlining of our extradition process.

In my 20 minutes I want to take you through some of the history of why we are where we are today, where I would like to see us in the future, and what Canadians from coast to coast, both in Canada and the United States, through governors of different states, which I will mention shortly, have been asking the Canadian government to do.

I am indeed honoured as a backbench member of Parliament to bring forward what I think is one of the most popular private member's bills that I have had the opportunity to work on.

I want to make it abundantly clear that what our government allows a fugitive from another country to do is escape from justice in their country of origin, or escape from death row in that country. We have examples of both. For example, Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler escaped from the United States, found a safe haven in Canada from which to escape justice in the United States at our expense.

We not only pay for the incarceration in isolation to protect them from being killed by inmates, which costs up to $70,000 a year every year they are here, we also pay for all of the Crown prosecution in an effort to get them back to the United States. We also pay another cost, as suspected convicts in some cases, or death row inmates in others, we pay all of their costs in order to defend them under our Charter of Rights, allowing them to seek a safe haven in Canada against prosecution in the United States.

After you have had time to think about that for a while, think about Charles Ng for just a moment. I know this is repugnant to many but it is necessary to review.

In 1984 and 1985 Charles Ng is alleged to have kidnapped and murdered 11 people in California. In June 1985 he fled to Canada, crossed the border at Windsor, Ontario, and made his way to Calgary. On July 6, 1985, Ng engaged in an attempted burglary at a downtown Hudson Bay store in Calgary, shot a security guard in the hand in the process and was apprehended by police. In December of the same year he was found guilty of attempted robbery, aggravated assault and the unlawful use of a firearm. He was sentenced to four and a half years at the federal penitentiary in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan.

In February 1987, U.S. authorities requested the extradition of Charles Ng to the State of California to face the 25 charges pending against him. More than 18 months of legal wrangling then followed.

In October and November 1988, at an extradition hearing held in Edmonton, Alberta, Madam Justice Marguerite Trussler of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, ruled that sufficient evidence existed to extradite Ng on 19 of the 25 charges that he faces in California, 12 of which are for capital murders.

If that was not bad enough, on February 3, 1989 a judgment was issued on the return of the writ of habeas corpus by Justice Paul Chrumka of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench. Chrumka upheld Trussler's ruling that there was ample evidence to extradite Ng. Ng appealed that judgment, at our cost, to the Alberta Court of Appeal. On May 2, 1989 the three judges of the Alberta Court of Appeal also upheld the extradition order. Ng's lawyer, Donald MacLeod, had 60 days to file a motion, asking the Supreme Court of Canada to hear the case. The motion was filed with the Supreme Court in June 1989. On August 31, 1989 the Supreme Court ruled that they would not hear Ng's appeal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt my colleague from Peterborough, but I want to raise a serious point of order with respect to the propriety of referring in this House in the manner in which the member has done to a case which is still very much before the courts. The hon. member will know that the Minister of Justice on June 8 of this year referred the question of the extradition of Charles Ng directly to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing a determination. To the best of my knowledge, that case is still before the Supreme Court of Canada.

The long-standing precedent in this House certainly would indicate that it is inappropriate for this House to be discussing a specific case of this nature which is now before the Supreme Court of Canada and being considered.

I know the member has concerns about the extradition act, as all members of this House do, but I would ask the Speaker to caution the hon. member with respect to references to a particular case which is now before the courts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Nicholson): The hon. member for Peterborough would like to address that point.

Mr. Domm: I rather suspect, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the member who raised the point of order, that these interruptions will occur quite regularly in my address. I know I am at conflict with the member over trying to rush this bill through the House in the first place. I know this member will not agree, as the Liberals have agreed, and as the Conservatives have agreed, to move this bill on to committee for discussion at the legislative stage.

Given that as the parameter and from the member of Parliament who just raised the point of order, who supported an all-party position of four recommendations, one of which was to remove a Supreme Court opportunity, I would think that this point of order, which I am now addressing, and not my speech, would not be taken from the content of time allocated to me to speak. If the member wishes to ask questions, with all due respect, I am available to answer questions for as long as this House wishes to stay on this subject. I am not prepared to sit here, when a man who is outwardly and openly against this process of expediting extradition of convicts back to the United States—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Nicholson): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, just to be very clear, I certainly would not want it to be suggested that the time spent dealing with this point of order should in any way be taken from the time of the hon. member for Peterborough. I am quite prepared to agree that the hon. member for Peterborough should have all the time necessary to argue this particular point of order. That is certainly understood and I agree completely with the hon. member.

I do have the citation from Beauchesne, Mr. Speaker. It is under citation 335:

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub-judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would note that it is particularly important that this convention be applied in criminal cases. As citation 336 notes:

> The sub-judice convention has been applied consistently in criminal cases.

Mr. Speaker, it is very important that this House recognize that the sub-judice convention is one which must be applied and which must be respected. Certainly, I do not in any way wish to detract from the full time which the hon. member would normally have for debate of the issue and not of this particular case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Nicholson): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway has raised this point of order with the very best of intentions. In strict theory what he says is perfectly correct. I agree with him. But I think there is one thing that is very important.

I was listening to what the hon. member for Peterborough was saying and as I heard it, he was simply reciting the facts of this case that are public knowledge. He was not in any way discussing the merits of the case in so far as it was a criminal case. He was listing the events that had happened publicly in respect of this case.

• (1710)

I do not think that this constitutes anything but, possibly, a technical breach of the rule. I submit that in the circumstances we ought to let the hon. member continue with his recitation of the facts.

If he begins to discuss the merits of the case, I agree it may be that there is a valid point of order to be raised. But I think in listing the public events which have transpired, the hon. member is not transgressing the spirit of the rule and I hope we can hear him out on that basis.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I really hesitate to raise this but we all appreciate the fact that the Speaker is the servant of the House and the Speaker, at all times is, if you like, in a position to offer a fair and unbiased judgment.

I guess the question as to whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice ought to be in the chair on an issue of this nature raises some questions. As I say, I do not want to cause any difficulty because I know there are alternatives to the Chair. But I do have to say that it seems to be somewhat of a problem perhaps in terms of, at least, perception, when the parliamentary secretary is in the Speaker's chair on an issue as important as the one we are discussing today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Nicholson): I have heard the hon. member. I would have hoped that my position, as the parliamentary secretary, would have enhanced and given greater weight to a particular ruling on this.

I have heard what the hon. member said, and to deal with the points one at a time, this intervention, this point of order, will not be taken from the hon. member's time.

I think the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway accurately set out the rules by which we govern ourselves in this place. However, but I have to agree as well with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that what I heard, up to this point, was a recitation of the public facts as they relate to that particular case. At the same time, I would caution the hon. member that the convention referred to in the point of order is a voluntary restraint on the members of the House and I hope the member will keep that in mind in his remaining comments.

The hon. member for Peterborough.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, perhaps without taking more time on the point of order and going back to the contents of my remarks, I would like to continue with the court record of Charles Ng.

Ng's lawyer, Donald MacLeod, had 60 days to file a motion, asking the Supreme Court of Canada to hear the case. The motion was filed with the Supreme Court in 1989. On August 31, 1989, the Supreme Court ruled that it would not hear Ng's appeal. The then justice minister, now the Minister of Transport signed an extradition warrant on October 26, 1989 without seeking assurances that the death penalty would not be imposed. Ng's lawyer has indicated that he will be filing an appeal of the minister's decision to the Federal Court of Canada, Trials Division, and Mr. MacLeod has indicated that the earliest court date for the Federal Court would be June of 1990, taking two weeks to hear all witnesses, with a decision not expected before the fall of 1990.

On June 8, 1990 the Minister of Justice announced that she was referring the Ng case directly to the Supreme Court for a determination. A copy of the request is attached to my notes, for the benefit of Hansard. On October 1, 1990 the case had still not been inscribed at the Supreme Court in order that the court can set the date for trial.

What I would like to do is read to you one of the major concerns I have on this matter of the extradition of convicts, or suspected convicts. I quote from The Ottawa Citizen of June 13, 1990:

> Charles Ng, who is wanted for mass murder in California and is fighting extradition proceedings, is scheduled to complete a 4 1/2-year Canadian prison term this week.
> But his lawyer said Tuesday Ng is sure to remain behind bars—despite the formal expiry of his sentence—while the Supreme Court of Canada ponders his fate.

I will move onto another situation that brings home the urgency to get rid of what we have in Canada, a two-track system of justice. Those escaping justice in their own country can come to Canada and get more opportunities, more kicks at the cat in the court system in Canada than a Canadian citizen could get under a similar condition.

I would remind you that we now have seven opportunities for persons such as I have mentioned, and others, to go to an extradition hearing, number one; a writ of habeas corpus, number two; an appeal to the relevant provincial court of appeal, number three; an appeal to the Supreme Court, number four; and then, if the Minister of Justice decides to sign the extradition request, it then goes on to an appeal of the minister's decision to the Federal Court of Canada, Trials Division. It then goes on to number six, an appeal to the Federal Court of Canada, Appeals Division. It goes on to number seven, an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. No one in the House of Commons can give me one example of any Canadian citizen in the country today who would have seven court opportunities to escape justice in the United States.

Let me tell you what some of our justice ministers have said on the subject. The hon. Doug Lewis spoke in Washington on January 24, 1990. He said:

> It is incumbent upon all countries to ensure that alleged criminals from one country do not regard other countries as safe havens. We must, therefore, strive to ensure that our extradition arrangements appropriately meet current needs—It now appears that a two-track process is developing in Canada, or has in fact been developed. The first track involves a judicial hearing to determine if the crime is one for which the extradition may be granted and includes any subsequent appeals. The second track entails a judicial review of the decision of the Minister of Justice in the Federal Court of Canada with the possibility of an appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal, and ultimately to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I will not read any more from his statement in Washington when he attended the Conference of the Society for the Reform of the Criminal Law. That minister and previous ministers, and the present minister, all agree that we need changes to our extradition laws.

In particular, I will deal for just one moment with another type of person who finds his or her way into Canada in order to escape justice in the United States. Could I refer the House for a moment to the case history of Joseph Kindler who was wanted on death row in the United States.

In the case of Joseph Kindler, let me reiterate what the situation is. He has been in our country, after escaping death row in the United States, for six years at least in our court system. He is also being granted his appeal on the minister's signature for a hearing at the Supreme Court of Canada.

What my bill does is very simply put these suspected or convicted persons on a fast track, one track, up through the judicial system. It affords them the opportunity to do the following: first, have an extradition hearing and a habeas corpus hearing. Then, if they wish to appeal the habeas corpus ruling, they have the right to go to the Federal Court of Appeal directly, not to be tried by a provincial judge, a one judge trial, but to be judged by a three judge trial at the Federal Court of Appeal. That is the appeal to the extradition order providing the minister signs the request and approves it first. In other words, he signs the order to be extradited.

Then they go directly from the habeas corpus case to the Federal Court of Appeal with three judges. If they lose that case before the Federal Court of Appeal, they have the right under my bill to make application to the Supreme Court of Canada. That is what my bill does, very simply. It gives them those five steps and eliminates only two. It eliminates a provincial court of appeal and it goes directly to the federal courts. It eliminates the first track, the Supreme Court of Canada, and goes directly to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Federal Court of Appeal under my bill.

It is a very soft bill to what I would really like to see, but what I would really like to see is not always possible in a government situation. Here is the difficulty. We have a Charter of Rights. The Charter of Rights guarantees a hearing under habeas corpus. I do not want to remove that because I do not wish to get into conflict with the Charter.

However, there is nothing to say that that should not be considered. In Section 1 of the Charter something in the way of a protection such as that can be removed as long something better is put in its place. I think this bill puts something in place that is better. It gives that person the right to go directly to a federal three judge court of appeal right from the habeas corpus hearing, if he or she wishes. It also leaves the door open for that final appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

With the kind of history we have to look back on and with the kind of support we have as members of Parliament to consider legislation that would speed up this process, think of the good side to the victims in the United States who are trying to bring people such as those whom I have mentioned to court to face justice in the United States.

I read from The Toronto Star of Thursday, May 18. It states:

> —families of at least 12 slain American men, women and children—torture victims who were beaten, raped, shot, their bodies later incinerated and buried. Some bones and body parts were uncovered by investigators at a remote farmsite in Calaveros County, outside San Francisco. The bodies of other victims have never been found.
>
> No funerals, no spiritual farewells for their families, the final resting place for their loved ones unknown—
>
> Trying unsuccessfully to hold back the tears—

—one of the 12 victims family members that visited Ottawa back in May of 1989—

> —told how her family has agonized over their inability to give her son a proper burial—
> Her 20-year-old-daughter, Brenda, year-old grandson, Lonnie, and son-in-law Lonnie Bond, were also among the murder victims. Film even exists that shows her daughter, handcuffed and bound in chains, begging for her baby. The child's body has never been found, and O'Connor hangs on to the slim hope he is still alive somewhere.

Justice denied is a very unfair analysis to put on this case, but it is a real one. Witnesses to these kinds of murders, or suspected murders, go unanswered while we hold these people in our prison system waiting for extradition.

I hope that the House will see fit to put this to committee for a quick decision on technical amendments, or whatever other amendments are permissive under our system of private members' legislation, to return it with due haste to the House of Commons for a report and third reading vote.

I do not think these concerns will be able to go unanswered by Canadians across the country.

I have one closing comment. I think the governors of California and of Ohio have spoken very key words in trying to find a solution to this problem.

I would like to read from their comments as they pertain to justice being denied. This is a letter from the Office of the Governor, state of Ohio, dated May 5, 1989. It reads:

> As you know, Charles Ng is wanted by the State of California for nineteen criminal charges that include burglary, kidnapping, and twelve counts of murder. At present, his extradition case is in Canada's judicial system, at the provincial level.
> I fully support the extradition of Charles Ng to the State of California, to face prosecution for his alleged acts of violence—Mr. Ng should be returned to California not only to stand trial, but also so that the victims' families may be able to learn the fate of their loved ones.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I was listening very intently to the presentation of the member for Peterborough on Bill C-210.

I agree with the member that there need to be some changes in this law. In fact we have waited an undue length of time for changes in the laws of extradition in this country.

He referred to some cases. I do not think there is any one case which really emphasizes this more than the Ng case, but I think that there are a lot of incidents where we have seen that the extradition process in Canada really is antiquated and needs to be changed.

That is not to say that in routine proceedings a lot of the extradition cases are dealt with expeditiously. Sometimes they can be sometimes quite routine, but in cases where there is an allegation of murder or a capital offence then the extradition will most certainly be challenged by the person whom the government is proposing to extradite. Of course this process can take quite a length of time.

The Minister of Justice said on January 24 of this year, as the member for Peterborough mentioned, that he was very concerned about this law and that he would be giving it a great deal of attention in the months and weeks ahead. That was in January. Now we are in October and we do not have any presentation by the government. I think that is wrong. The government just seems to be stalled on this. For that reason I would like to give the hon. member's bill a lot more attention in a legislative committee.

It is the position of my party that we should allow this bill to go to a legislative committee where we can look at it. We are not saying that the bill is perfect, that it supplies all the needs or has everything that we would want; but it is the only basis we have at the present for discussing this matter and bringing forth more modern concepts or more modern law to deal with this increasingly important question.

I recommend, on behalf of my party, that this matter be brought before a legislative committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having an opportunity to participate in the debate on this very important question of the extradition law in Canada.

I want to just pick up on the point that was made by the previous speaker, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, with respect to the real issue here. The real issue here, Mr. Speaker, surely is the fact that the Conservative member for Peterborough has a grievance with his own government and, in particular, with the Minister of Justice.

• (1730)

It was the Minister of Justice who promised many months ago that she would be moving forward on this issue of extradition. The minister was questioned before the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General when she appeared, and she was asked about possible changes to the law on extradition. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it was not just representatives from one party who expressed these concerns, there were representatives of all three parties on the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The Minister of Justice said yes, she was concerned, she would look at it. But, Mr. Speaker, we are now into the latter part of October and there has still been no action taken whatsoever.

If the Conservative government is serious about changes in the law of extradition, why does it not bring forward a bill? Why does the member of Parliament for Peterborough not persuade the Minister of Justice to finally do something in this area of extradition? Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that he is getting up with a bill which was drafted long ago which, in fact, does not reflect the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General in this important area of extradition?

My colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys said: "Let's send this whole thing to the committee and study the bill".

The problem with that, Mr. Speaker, is that we have already done that. We have done exactly that. The Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General did in fact study the whole question of extradition. We received extensive evidence from a number of witnesses who looked at this issue with great care. We received background studies from the Library of Parliament, an overview of the extradition process. Following that lengthy and thoughtful process of hearings—and the member for Peterborough recalls that, he was a part of the process of hearings around this question of extradition—the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General unanimously submitted a report to this House.

Why is the Minister of Justice ignoring the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General for changes? We have the member for Peterborough coming before the House and pointing out concerns in this area. We have the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys saying: "Let's study this some more". Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not need any more study.

The member for Peterborough, the Liberal justice critic, a representative of my party, all have studied this issue. The people of Canada want action. They do not want more studies. They do not want more committee meetings. They want a government that is prepared to move.

It is that which causes me concern and which causes my colleagues concern. What the member for Peterborough is doing in fact may very well delay the process of real change in this important area.

I believe that the people of Alberta, the people of other provinces in Canada, want this government to move, and the member for Peterborough is giving the government an excuse for further delay. That may not be his intention, but practically speaking that is exactly what is going to happen. Instead of the Minister of Justice being forced to finally move and to act on the unanimous recommendations of the standing committee, the Minister of Justice can say: "No, no, I can't bring forward legislation now because the bill is being studied by another committee. The member for Peterborough wants us to spend more time".

Mr. Speaker, people in this country are fed up with—

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, because of my very special interest in the subject, I listened very carefully to what the Liberal member said and I know what I said. At no time did I ever ask for any study, nor at any time did the Liberal member ask for any study.

What we asked for is—

Mr. Robinson: Point of order.

Mr. Domm: Just let me finish. You have a habit of interrupting.

Mr. Robinson: This is not a point of order.

Mr. Domm: This is a point of order.

He has accused both the Liberal member of Parliament and myself of asking for a study. The Liberal member of Parliament asks that this bill be passed on tonight to the legislative committee to bring back the bill with whatever technical changes are needed. I did not ask for any study. The Liberal member did not ask for any study. The only member who is asking for any study is the NDP member who refuses to pass it today, send it to a legislative committee, and vote on it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Peterborough expressed an opinion that is subject to debate, and I again recognize the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I trust that this will not be taken out of my time, just as the member for Peterborough received a similar assurance.

Parliament has studied this issue. There has been a unanimous report. What this member is doing is proposing to the people of Canada that we study an issue which has already been studied. That is exactly what it means when a bill is sent to committee. There will be more hearings, more witnesses and more reports. That is not acceptable to the people of this country.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, the member is clearly questioning the procedure of a private members' bill. when we vote on it at second reading it must go to a legislative committee, not for study, but for amendments and changes. This applies to every bill, whether it is government or private.

What he is doing is filibustering against a private members' bill and saying the government should do it. He is here as a private member with bills himself.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Peterborough, but this is again a matter of opinion. I think we should get back to the main subject of this debate. I again recognize the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the member for Peterborough is perhaps a little nervous in recognizing that by proposing this particular strategy, he is going against the wishes of the people of this country who want legislative action. They are looking for a government to provide some leadership in this issue.

I would like to challenge the member for Peterborough. His caucus meets, I believe, on Wednesday mornings. I suggest that the member for Peterborough raise this issue in his caucus and ask his colleague, the Minister of Justice, to bring a government bill before this House. I am quite prepared, on behalf of my colleagues, to make a commitment that if that bill which the Minister of Justice brings before this House reflects the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, that bill will in fact receive the prompt attention of this Parliament.

What the member for Peterborough is doing is proposing yet another delay. This member knows that there has been a great sense of anger and outrage in this country with respect to what are perceived to be understandable flaws and weaknesses in this legislation, in the existing Criminal Code provisions.

I do not think that the people of Peterborough, the people of Calgary, the people of Red Deer or other Canadians would be very happy at the suggestion that having studied this legislation and having submitted a report to the Government of Canada, the Government of Canada is simply ignoring the recommendations of a parliamentary committee. That is exactly what it is doing.

Where is the Minister of Justice? Why has she not stood up in this House and said: "Yes, I have read the recommendations of the third report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. I understand the concerns of Canadians from coast to coast about the extradition process and here is a bill." That is not what the Conservative government is doing. It is failing to provide any leadership whatsoever. I understand the frustration that the member for Peterborough feels with his own minister. It must be terribly frustrating because he cannot get his own government to move. Now he is desperately looking around for some other way to do an end run around his own government. The people of Canada deserve better. The people of Canada deserve leadership on this important issue. The people of Canada do not want more committee hearings on a process which has already been studied, and studied, and studied again.

• (1740)

Mr. Speaker, you are asking me to conclude, and I will conclude by saying that the time for action on this very important subject and for government action is now.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to point out to all here and the people of Canada that we are seeing a filibuster by the New Democratic Party.

The critic for justice, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, talks about bills coming into this House. He knows full well that time allocation for bills coming into the House is limited indeed because every bill that comes before this House with a government initiative is being thwarted by members of Parliament in the opposition.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I will reserve.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1750)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Private Members' Business

> Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act—Chapter 39
> Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act—Chapter 40

THE CRIMINAL CODE AND THE SUPREME COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Domm for second reading and referral to a legislative committee. Bill C-210, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Supreme Court Act (habeas corpus).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the time the sitting was suspended, the hon. member for Athabaska had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, there is one point I would like to say very clearly, and that is that the member of Parliament—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I believe that I had the floor when the Black Rod knocked, on a point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the end of your speech coincided with the end of your speaking time. Your speaking time has now expired.

[English]

The hon. member for Athabasca had the floor. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I did have the floor on a point of order when when the knock came on the door. I was just starting the point of order when we were interrupted by Her Majesty's representative.

Very briefly, because I know that the hon. member for Athabasca wants to speak on this important question, the hon. member for Athabasca suggested that in some way there was a filibuster under way in this House. I want to just draw to the attention—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but this is not a point of order. It is more a matter of opinion. I again recognize the hon. member for Athabasca.

[English]

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway underlined in his presentation that there is no use in members of Parliament submitting private members' bills—and there are many submitted in this House— because, even if there is general agreement in the House of Commons and they follow the same procedure as any other bill presented in this House by the government, they are not worth anything in that they will in some way impede the government's way of doing business.

I want to compliment the member for Peterborough who has been very diligent in his work. He has worked very hard with the law officers of this establishment to put together a bill that I think is very reasonable, that should go forward immediately to committee and that should be brought back to this House for third and final reading.

I would like to suggest—we will quit before the time is up—that all members stop speaking on this bill and that by unanimous consent we move it into committee.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the minute or two that the hon. member for Athabasca has left me, I want to point out that there are certain measures proposed by the all-party committee, which included the member for Peterborough, with which I am in agreement. I think everybody in this House is likely in agreement, but I want to say that I think it is a mistake for the member for Peterborough to intervene in this way rather than by bringing the pressure to bear on his government. There is a pattern that is occurring in the last several years, the last four our five years in particular, of endangering human rights.

The point about human rights is that when you endanger the human rights of one, you may endanger the human rights of another one. The one may look quite bad enough, but you may hurt somebody else that you would not have wanted to hurt. However, the precedent when it is set is set. This is why I would—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

IRAQ

INVASION OF KUWAIT

The House proceeded to consideration of motion No. 16 in the name of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead).

That this House condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and, encouraged by the unprecedented international consensus demanding the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the full restoration of the legitimate government of Kuwait, affirm unequivocally its support for Canada's actions in the Security Council and its support for all relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions adopted since August 2 and for the sending of members, vessels and aircraft of the Canadian Forces to participate in the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula, and in recognition of the seriousness of this matter, accept the undertaking of the Government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian Forces in and around the Arabian Peninsula; and

That upon adoption of this motion, the said motion shall be deemed referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 6 p.m, pursuant to orders made Thursday, October 18, and Friday, October 19, 1990, the House will now proceed to the defferred division on the motion concerning the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, Government Business No. 16.

Call in the members.

• (1825)

The House divided on the motion Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), which was agreed to on the following division:

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

LONG POINT MILITARY BASE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, there has been a peaceful demonstration to focus the attention of the public, and especially that of the federal government, on the closing of the Long Point military base. The demonstration in front of the base has just ended.

A few weeks ago, the Minister of National Defence said he was still considering this possibility. This is no time to consider, Mr. Speaker. It is time to act and say no to closing this base, a step that would jeopardize more than 1,000 jobs in East Montreal and more than two million dollars worth of economic spinoffs in the region. East Montreal, as you know is already in poor economic shape, so that closing the base would have a devastating effect.

I therefore wish to ask the government and the Minister of National Defence to inform employees and the people in East Montreal immediately that the base will not be closed and to do so in writing. Only then will businesses, residents and the employees concerned be able to look to the future with confidence.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR THÉRÈSE LAVOIE-ROUX

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, today, the School of Social Services at the University of Montreal intends to honour Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux for the exceptional contribution she made in the course of her public career, by awarding her an honorary doctorate this afternoon.

Thérèse Lavoie-Roux was, in the course of her career, first commissioner and then president of the Catholic School Commission of Montreal, MPP for the riding of Acadie, Minister of Health and Social Services, and was recently appointed to the Senate.

Mrs. Lavoie-Roux was the first woman to become Minister of Health and Social Services in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, not enough women accept the challenge of public life, and that is why I think it is very important to emphasize the contribution made by Mrs. Lavoie-Roux and her importance as an example for women who are attracted to public life.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer Mrs. Lavoie-Roux my sincere congratulations on receiving her honorary degree this afternoon.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Forestry is now saying that he only has $100 million to fund a new forest agreement with British Columbia, despite the fact that the entire forestry community is demanding a joint agreement which would include a commitment of $350 million from the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, by buying gas at PetroCan and picking up some forestry stamps, the Boy Scouts are doing more to plant trees in Canada than this government; I will send some stamps to the minister.

Both the federal government and the Socreds in Victoria have failed to sign an agreement despite repeated commitments and promises to do so.

A well-managed forest industry is vital to Canada's economic and environmental well-being, but the health of our forests is left twisting in the wind by the Socreds and Conservatives. They should get on with it and sign a new forest agreement now.

S. O. 31

CANADA POST

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that Canada Post, as a Crown corporation, essentially operates independent of Parliament, on behalf of many residents of Brandon—Souris, I would like to urge Canada Post, in the words of a recent Deloraine Times & Star editorial to "Consult With Your Community".

Although most Canadians are relieved to know that Canada Post no longer requires a $300 or $400-million annual subsidy upon which it used to depend, many rural residents are frustrated and angry with this Crown corporation's recent tendency to reduce both the hours of service and the number of employees without consulting with either the local postmaster or town and rural municipal officials.

If Canada Post officials have sound and logical reasons for the policy changes which they are announcing, they presumably could convince others of the merits of those proposals. To proceed, however, as they are currently doing, without consulting with local leaders, is only to ask for the angry editorial response which many rural weekly newspapers are now providing.

UNITED NATIONS DAY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, today is United Nations Day, the 45th anniversary of the founding of the United Nations.

In the past half century, the United Nations has had enormous successes and, of course, significant disappointments. The successes include programs of health, aid to refugees, and progress on development. The UN has led the struggle against apartheid and colonialism, has pointed the spotlight on human rights abuses and set the agenda for meeting the terrible and great problems that face the global environment. The end of the cold war holds great hope now that the fundamental purpose of the UN, to establish an international rule of law, can finally be realized.

On United Nations Day, we join with the Secretary General of the UN, Perez de Cuellar, who said, "We must continue to draw inspiration from the ideals to which our Charter gave luminous expression. These ideas are not the intellectual fabrications of visionaries. We are embedded in the hearts of men and women around the globe".

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, since this is Small Businesses Week, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the past ten years, small businesses have generated exciting ideas and a host of innovative products and services, thus creating thousands of jobs and playing a major role in boosting the economy of this country.

More than ever before, Canadians have realized that entrepreneurship could be exciting and profitable and offer tremendous opportunities for personal enrichment and financial success.

The Small Businesses Loans Act is a federal initiative aimed at helping small businesses, either new or existing ones, to obtain medium-term loans from chartered banks and other designated lending organizations to finance capital improvements.

Under this legislation, the government is committed to reimbursing 85 per cent of the loan to the approved lender, should the borrower default on his payments. This guarantee applies to loans of up to $100,000 for the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1989. More than 17,726 have been granted, representing a total of $682 million.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON "LA FRANCOPHONIE"

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, recently, the Minister of Communications established an advisory committee on la francophonie.

Without wishing to reflect on the competence of the committee's 15 members, I fail to understand why the minister decided that only one Francophone from outside Quebec met his selection criteria and that no members of ethnic minorities qualified for this team of advisers.

Should this not be seen as an insult to Francophones outside Quebec and to new Canadians, including Haitians, Vietnamese, Lebanese, Africans, and so forth, all of whom make a substantial contribution to French culture? How could the government ignore this potential and fail to take advantage of the pluralism that has become one the major elements of our Canadian social fabric, especially in the province of Quebec?

I hope the minister will take steps immediately to correct this oversight, and thus make his committee a more authentic reflection of today's Canada and present to the world an accurate image of what we are. We are very anxious to hear the government's response.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of Small Business Week 1990, I would like to pay tribute to the small business community in Canada, and in particular, to small business in my riding of Delta, British Columbia.

The small business sector has created thousands of jobs and made a major contribution to the Canadian economy. Small and medium-sized businesses have spawned exciting ideas and a host of innovative products and services.

In Delta, we have many examples of new products and technology. Horizon Fibreglass has created a canopy for the safe transportation of seedlings used for reforestation. MST Products makes specially designed bicycle handle bars to allow cyclists to assume the most aerodynamic position for racing. Sentinel Vision Inc. has developed a unique technology to inspect seams in food and beverage cans for a more efficient quality assurance process.

• (1410)

The federal government, through the Federal Business Development Bank, Western Economic Diversification, and other initiatives, has worked to foster an economic climate in which small business can grow.

Canadian entrepreneurs have seized the opportunities and created their own successes. Small Business Week 1990 celebrates the entrepreneurial spirit and drive behind the success of the small business sector in Canada.

UNITED NATIONS DAY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, today is United Nations Day and the beginning of UN Disarmament Week.

Faced with the threat of war in the Gulf region, it is imperative that the United Nations be given the support necessary to settle this horrible conflict.

This means we must work within the mandate of the United Nations to make it the co-ordinating body of any military or political action. Otherwise the world will miss this chance to consolidate a new approach to international conflict resolution and peacekeeping.

We must now, more than ever, reject the doctrine of "might is right" and adhere to the rule of law between nations. This could lead, not only to a peaceful resolution in the Gulf, but would help establish an important precedent to prevent and resolve future conflicts.

Let us use this terrible incident as an opportunity to reform and strengthen the United Nations.

TRIBUTE TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as an Anglophone member from Southern Ontario, I would like to congratulate the Premier of the province of Quebec, the hon. Robert Bourassa.

Last Friday, Mr. Bourassa categorically rejected independence for Quebec. He said that Quebecers do not want a Quebec passport and do not want to lose their citizenship. They don't want to lose Canada. Mr. Bourassa also said, with unaccustomed vigour, that he would not compromise Quebec's economic stability.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think we need Mr. Bourassa in this great debate on Canada, and as a Canadian, I say: bravo, Mr. Premier!

SRI LANKA

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Sri Lanka is in the process of committing genocide against the Tamil minority. In my riding there are many constituents of Tamil origin. I have been contacted by many, including the chairman of the National Association of Canadian Tamils, to bring this issue to the attention of the Canadian Parliament.

We in Canada know the problems that can arise with vocal minorities, but we also know that killing the minority group is not the answer.

I ask the House, when will the Secretary of State for External Affairs take appropriate steps to pressure Sri Lanka, which is a member of the British Commonwealth and the United Nations, to stop this outrageous behaviour?

In light of the massive oppression and death that faces Tamil people living in Sri Lanka, I also ask the House to ensure that those who are in need can take refuge in Canada from the brutal regime of the Sri Lankan government.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it's time once again for the corporate welfare bum of the week award.

This week the nominees are BP Canada with $6.2 million in profits in 1989 and no taxes paid; Confederation Life Insurance with $103 million in profits in 1989 and no taxes paid; and last, but by no means least, Domtar with $18 million in profits in 1989, and no taxes paid.

Now for the winner. The envelope, please.

The winner is Domtar. This company along with two other nominees have been outstanding members of Tom d'Aquino's BCNI, but we feel that Domtar deserves special consideration because not only did it have $18 million in profits but on top of that it received an extra $21 million in tax credits from this government. With that kind of business savvy, Domtar deserves a b rating.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, at a time when thousands of workers are losing their jobs in Atlantic Canada, it is unbelievable that this government, through Bill C-21, will inflict more hardship on Canadians struggling with high interest rates, the proposed goods and services tax and a made-in-Canada recession.

The government adds insult to injury by eliminating its financial contribution to the UI fund, while at the same time maintaining control over the allocation of money collected from workers and employers.

In its arrogance, the government will take our money, do with it as it pleases, and leave the regions, such as Atlantic Canada, with added strain on their already fragile provincial economies.

With the passage of Bill C-21 and if the unemployment rate remains stable, Prince Edward Islanders will receive only 35 weeks of benefits rather than the 42 weeks received under the old system.

At the same time, they will have to work two extra weeks to qualify for fewer benefits. This means that Islanders must now find an additional nine weeks of work.

BILL C-21

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): At long last, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 has been given royal assent after a long stay in the other place. Our government is satisfied with this turn of events because we are now in a better position to help Canadian workers acquire new skills and plan for the future.

Several amendments will make it easier for workers to cope successfully with ever changing labour market conditions. These amendments also bring unemployment insurance provisions in line with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments reflect the government's labour force enhancement strategy and make the unemployment insurance program more atuned to the priorities of workers seeking assistance and vocational training.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Today, the government's own figures show that bankruptcies are up 37 per cent. In the face of this, the minister has the nerve to send out 40,000 videos to try to tell Canadians that they are among "the most fortunate people on earth".

Why does the Minister of Finance think that the thousands of Canadians going into bankruptcy, losing their jobs, their businesses, and their farms are among the most fortunate people on earth? Why does he not stop this phoney propaganda campaign and bring in new policies that will turn this economy around, and not drive it into the ground?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I say to you again that Canadians are one of the most favoured people in the world today.

We are going through a difficult period in the economy. There is no question of that. I have been talking about that for a number of months now. I am not happy about it. But when you stand back, Mr. Speaker, and look at the advantages that we have in this country and when you look at the challenges that we are facing in relation to the major difficulties and disruptions that are going on in other countries of the world, you have to reflect on the fact that we are a very fortunate people.

It is very important as that very fortunate people to do the things that are right and to follow the sound economic policies that we have been following to get our economy back on track so we can continue to do more to help those in other countries.

In the meantime, we have our work cut out here. We are sticking to our guns on it, because we believe that it is the right thing to get our economy on track again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what will it take for this minister to recognize and admit the damage his policies are doing to our farmers, our business people, and our workers? Do they have to start sending him videos showing themselves losing their farms, their businesses, their homes, and their jobs. If they did, those videos would be rated r for recession to show the horror of the government's policies.

When will the minister stop trying to defend, as he is doing now, the policies that got us into this mess and start trying to do something constructive about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to this video. The video is designed to respond to questions that people have been asking us. We have had 350,000 odd people who have called the information line. They want to know about the GST. They want to know where the GST fits into our economic plan. They want to know what we are doing to control government spending. They want to get an accurate picture of the financial position of the federal government, and that is precisely what this video is designed to do.

I would also say to my hon. friend that he has a short-term point of view here. I do not deny it is a view which shows that we have a difficult period in the economy. If he would extend his view to the last five or six years when the same policies that we have been following have resulted in record rates of growth, growth that is second only to Japan of the major industrialized countries and growth that has resulted in the creation of over 1.5 million jobs.

• (1420)

That is the combination of policies that the government has been following that has got us to a position where we have had a very good economy over the past six years. We have to get through this period. If we can get through this period, get the rate of inflation down, and get the inflationary pressures under control, then we can build the base for strong non-inflationary growth into the future.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are losing their farms, their businesses and their jobs because of the policies of this minister. Meanwhile the Minister of Finance is wasting public funds on a video which shows nothing of the economic mess his policies helped create.

Again I ask the Minister of Finance when will he recall that video and come up with a policy designed to pull Canadians out of the recession?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to withdraw the video because the video is responding to the concerns and questions of many people in the country. I will send the hon. member a video later this afternoon, if he wishes. I will send one to my colleague, the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It is important for all members of Parliament to learn what is happening.

The title of the video is Where Do Your Tax Dollars Go? I think there are a lot of Canadians who are asking that question. They have seen increases in taxation, which my hon. friend has commented on on a number of occasions. It is important to know what those tax dollars are spent on, the impact of the debt that we inherited in 1984 on the spending of the government, and the impact of the compound interest which we inherited in 1984. That compound interest, by the way, represents 80 per cent of the accumulation of debt that we have seen since 1984.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition should understand that it was the government that he was associated with which laid the groundwork for the high interest rates that we are facing.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs. On September 25, the Prime Minister spoke of his commitment to accelerating the specific land claims process. The aboriginal peoples of the Atlantic provinces have yet to be convinced of this commitment.

The maritime chiefs are meeting in Moncton, New Brunswick this week, including the chief from the Woodstock Band whose specific claim was validated by the government six years ago with no progress to date.

How does the minister intend to accelerate the specific claims process in the Atlantic regions of Canada?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, consistent with the Prime Minister's commitment, we have been holding meetings with various groups with a view to expediting the settlement of treaty deficiencies and the comprehensive claims. Such was the discussion in which the Prime Minister participated yesterday in Vancouver. It was a very successful meeting with the combined leadership of all of the native leadership of British Columbia.

Two weeks ago in this city, with members of Atlantic chiefs present, a process was undertaken with a view to improving the processing of specific claims. The government will certainly be bringing forward a major initiative in that respect, hopefully before the end of this year.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister.

In excess of 500 specific claims remain unsettled to this day in Canada. In New Brunswick alone over 68 claims remain outstanding. A year and a half ago the government refused a proposal for funding for land claims from the Union of New Brunswick Indians and has not responded to a re-application for funding submitted one year ago.

Is this what the Prime Minister means by acceleration, a system that cannot provide a response to a serious request and a Conservative member of Parliament who refuses to meet with the chief of that reserve?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the hon. member to show as much confidence in our ability to deal with these issues as the native leadership of Canada has done. They are participating in important meetings and have promised me a report within 30 days on the process which will be required to improve our ability to dispose of specific claims quickly.

I myself have met with the chief of the Woodstock band to get on with the process that the Liberal government was unable to complete over many years when the party of which she is a member was in office.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance about the record number of bankruptcies.

In the previous worst year, 1982, when the minister was in opposition, he said: "This government must begin to realize that it is individual people who are being hurt." He went on to say: "We must deal with individual Canadians who are losing their jobs and their businesses."

Will the minister back up his caring words from then with action now to respond to this record 37 per cent increase in bankruptcies in the country?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is people who are losing those businesses. I understand that the people who are working at those firms are losing their jobs, and I do not take any pleasure in that. I do not enjoy that at all.

What I have to point out to the hon. member, as he makes reference to 1981–1982, is that the level of bankruptcies as a percentage of the economy is about half what it was at that time.

The other point that I would make to him is that, if we are going to be able to get through this period and avoid the excessives of the high interest rates of 22 per cent and 25 per cent that we endured in 1981–1982, it is important for us to get the inflationary pressures under of control. That is why we have been following the policies that we have been following. We are making some progress there. We are getting those inflationary pressures under control. As we do so, we will be able to see some reduction in interest rates.

If we let the party go on, as was the case in 1981–1982, then the hon. member is asking for exactly the sort of thing we want to avoid here. Mr. Speaker, we are determined to avoid that.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that the minister has lost those caring attitudes that he expressed in 1982.

Paul Cazabon is a farmer in St. Joachim in my constituency who has lost his 740 acre farm because of high interest rates on his machinery, his land, and his operating loans. That is what these bankruptcy statistics mean. They mean broken dreams for people right across the country.

I want to ask the Prime Minister directly: What has the Prime Minister of the country to say to Paul Cazabon and his family?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Paul Cazabon is someone for whom I have a great deal of sympathy and the difficulties that he is going through. But if we do not do the things we are doing, there will be many more Paul Cazabons who will be suffering from the same sort of interest rates that we had in 1981–1982. Surely, my hon. friend must recognize that that is something that we want to avoid. We must avoid. That is why we are following the directions we are now.

As I have indicated on many occasions, we are making progress. If we continue to make progress, we are going to see many fewer people such as Paul Cazabon suffering from the things he is going through now. Those difficulties are very, very difficult for him. I understand that, but we want to stop this happening in the future. The best thing we can do to stop that happening in the future is get the problems under control, as we seem to be getting those problems under control.

• (1430)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I cannot believe that this minister is telling us the best that he can do is to see an increase of 7,000 in bankruptcy statistics this year. Why can this minister and this Prime Minister not give us some sensitive, caring answers? Instead of action to help Paul Cazabon, the minister is spending another $300,000 on a video.

I ask this minister—

[Translation]

What explanation does the minister have for wasting this kind of money when so many Canadians have gone bankrupt this year?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): As I indicated in my previous answer, Mr. Speaker, I do not take any pleasure in seeing what Paul Cazabon is going through now, but I do know that in the province of Ontario there are a lot fewer Paul Cazabons than there were as recently as 1986. The 1986 statistics show 71 farm bankruptcies. That reached a low point of 12 in Ontario in 1989. It is up to 19 this year.

The point that I am making is that we are trying hard to make progress. We have put out additional funds, additional support for the farm community through interest-free advances. We are fighting the battles at the GATT to make sure that we have the international problems as well looked after as we can as one single country. We are introducing the goods and services tax that for the farm community will result in a savings in aggregate across the country of $250 million. That is a major assist for the farm community and it will help keep the Paul Cazabons of this country from going over the edge into bankruptcy.

That is an indication of the commitment that we have as a government to dealing with the problems in the farm community today.

ENERGY

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of energy. The minister is fresh from a meeting with representatives from Canadian oil companies and consumer groups. Given the continued high price of gasoline and the fact that oil companies want to raise prices even higher, with the minister's blessing, adding to their soaring profits, did the minister express to the oil companies his desire to see an immediate decrease in the price of gasoline to bring it in line with the lower oil prices on the world market?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, yes, I did meet with the oil companies, as well as consumer groups. I point out to the hon. member what has been said here many times. That is in the Canadian system of accounting for the price of oil at the gas pumps, there is a 60 to 90 day lag. I have said also to the oil companies that I do not expect them to take any advantage of the situation. We discussed that with the consumer groups as well.

In fact, if the hon. member takes a look at the profit pictures, for example, today, I think it is fair to say that one has to look at more than one quarter, if he looks at the downstream side. The figures are different, for example, on the upstream side, depending on the price of crude that went into the system and the price of crude that went into the refining process.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave this House the assurance, and with him his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that he was watching energy costs very closely. The minister is of course aware that his department has already received a number of complaints from Canadian consumers. I would like to ask the Minister whether there is any evidence of fraud. If so, could the minister inform this House of the facts in this respect?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of Competition Policy is responsible for examining each case brought to its attention. It has a monitoring role and receives information similar to that just given by the hon. member. In fact, all members of this House have a joint responsibility, if they have the slightest impression or if they have any evidence that might lead one to believe that something is wrong or that there is a failure to comply with the Competition Act, to get in touch with the Director of the Bureau of Competition Policy and give him those facts, to avoid any public perception that there could be abuse in this area. If you have any facts, it is up to you to meet the Director of the Bureau of Competition Policy and give him the facts, and he will investigate the matter. That is his responsibility, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure you that he will do what is necessary.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for seniors. The minister is surely aware of the number of Canadian senior citizens who live at or below the poverty line. Indeed almost 40 per cent of single seniors live below the poverty line. How can the minister justify the imposition of the goods and services tax on simple things like band-aids and aspirin, which many seniors take to prevent heart attacks?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, to me social justice means helping people who really need it and this is what our government is doing with the GST. We want to share the tax revenue and seniors will be protected within this process.

Our government and myself, as Minister responsible for the rights and also for the responsibilities of older people, are working to help those in need including senior citizens.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. We all know that visiting the doctor is quite expensive for our health care system. Can the minister explain the fact that according to the GST Information Office, a cane or safety bars bought with a prescription is tax-free, but if a person walks in off the street to buy the same item, the GST is charged.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. Member that essential goods will not be taxed and that purchasing power will be the same and even higher for seniors. We are listening to them and trying to help them fill their needs.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in Vancouver yesterday the Prime Minister committed his government to resolving native land claims and to priorizing native issues.

On November 10, the Innu of Labrador will be marching on Ottawa to advance their land claims and to protest Canada's decision to triple low level military flights over their homelands.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Is his government prepared to extend the same commitment to the Innu of Labrador that he extended to natives in B.C.; that is, to settle their land claim fairly and expeditiously and to deal fairly with their objections against low level military test flights.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using statements and numbers that are not accurate, and he knows they are not accurate.

What he does know, Mr. Speaker, is that there has been a decision taken by NATO not to proceed with the NATO tactical fighter centre. He knows that. The Innu know that. We understand, as he does, that there is an overlapping claim. There already are Indian claims, the CAM group and the Labrador Inuit Association which are being addressed by my colleague.

If the Innu of Labrador would use the dollars that the Government of Canada provided to research their claim and submit that claim to the Government of Canada, I am sure the government would look at it and take action.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

The Lubicon people of northwestern Alberta have been waiting for over half a century for a just settlement of their legitimate land claims. All they have received is neglect at best, and wholly unreasonable take-it-or-leave it offers at worst.

Again arising out of the Prime Minister's remarks in B.C. yesterday, when will the government give substance to the Prime Minister's words by starting to bargain in good faith with the Lubicon people? Will the government, when it does so, agree to use the Lubicons' June 1 Draft Settlement Agreement as the basis for that bargaining?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows of this government's commitment to deal with comprehensive and specific claims. Of course, we have been engaged in serious negotiation of the Lubicon claim, at least up until the time last June where that negotiation was suspended. I might remind the hon. member that a United Nations committee, looking into a grievance of the Lubicon, indicated that the federal government was taking an appropriate approach to negotiating and resolving this claim. Finally, I remind the hon. member that the Lubicon demand is vastly in excess of the settlement which has been achieved with most other native communities in Canada.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for small businesses. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business released a study yesterday showing that small businesses along our borders from coast to coast are being adversely affected by our tax system. The threat of the GST is going to further complicate this. What does the minister responsible for small businesses say about those tens of thousands of small businesses that are being destroyed by this government's tax policy?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would remind all of those border communities that the federal government is putting in place, under the GST, a rebate system for everything that visitors from the United States and other countries buy and take home. They get a complete rebate. We are making it very easy for them to apply for it through the duty-free shops. That is the best possible answer for our retailers.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the minister heard my question. The point is that a baby suit or a baby jacket is the same in Buffalo as it is in Toronto, Vancouver or Montreal. There is only one thing which is different; it is the price. What ideas does he have to put forward to keep those purchases in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend and congratulate him on his appointment as critic for small business and entrepreneurship. I am glad that he is trying to be creative, especially on this important issue. What is happening here, though, is that the manufacturers' sales tax is being removed for the first time in 65 years. The manufacturers' sales tax will lower the cost of running every single business in Canada, plus foreign tourists will be getting the rebate.

More important, the CFIB made the point yesterday that it feels the level of taxation is too heavy across Canada; municipal, provincial and federal. It believes that the municipal role is even higher than the federal role. We believe in working with the border communities, as we have through our border community task force, to find ways to better market our products, to better position our products, and to help the small business community of Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago it was a tough-talking government that proclaimed its intention to clear the refugee backlog with a new refugee system. Instead, what it has created is a monster that tortures claimants and their families with long delays, will eat hundreds of millions of taxpayers dollars and probably give birth to a backlog of its very own.

What is the Prime Minister doing about what has been so aptly described as his Minister of Immigration's costly flop of a program?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, we have set up a mechanism which will enable us to catch up with the backlog. As our Minister of Immigration so aptly put it a few days ago, we are well within the time limit. We have taken a humanitarian approach. We review each case on its own merits and we certainly intend to go on working diligently and showing respect for applicants who need our help.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the facts and the figures prove the minister wrong; they prove the Minister of Immigration wrong. In human terms, this government has failed. What we are talking about is people who want a better life for themselves and their families. I want to ask the Prime Minister again: how is he going to have his Minister of Immigration put a stop to her dehumanizing policies and simplify the criteria to clear the backlog?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague opposite ought to read the newspapers now and then. Appearing before the parliamentary committee, Chairman Gordon Fairweather himself spoke highly of the quality of the system set up by the Canadian government and suggested that the international community might take it as an example. We respect people, ours is a humanitarian approach and we will continue to work as we have been doing all along.

SPACE AGENCY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Yesterday the minister said he would soon announce the names of the architects for the space agency, as well as the government's over-all plan for a space program. He went on to say that the plan would meet with the approval of all Canadians.

Can the minister assure us that the new plan does not undermine the federal government policy and Quebec's efforts in the aerospace sector? Does it not also threaten the original development plan announced by other ministers before him?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague from Longueuil knows very well that the plan we will unveil with respect to the space agency at Saint-Hubert applies to the rest of Canada as well, and that it will be an excellent plan like other similar plans we have announced so far.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite satisfied with the answer I got and I am surprised. I have the impression that as a Quebecer the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology has enough complexes to be unable to acknowledge the competence of our experts—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but he should put his question, please.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): My question— The point is that he has no confidence in professionals in Quebec. He is about to choose— Will the minister award the space agency contract to a competent Quebec firm?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, of course my colleague is not satisfied with my answer, and that is because it is not the answer he wanted to have. Still I will continue to give him answers which he feels are the good ones.

With respect to the engineering consultant firm, Mr. Speaker, my colleague found out that Quebec firms were fully qualified for Hibernia since they did land the contract for the structural foundation of the Newfoundland project.

Since the space agency is a Canadian undertaking, as my colleague would know, all Canadian firms were invited to submit tenders. I am sure my colleague will agree—otherwise he would not be as honest as he claims to be—that the government should choose the one firm among all Canadian applicants which will best meet our requirements, according to the rules.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my collegue agrees with the principle that a company cannot be awarded a contract simply because it is based in Quebec. The job will go to Quebec firms if they are qualified to do the work, Mr. Speaker.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

The Canada-Quebec subsidiary agreement on forestry development expired last April. Right away, in co-operation with the Minister of Forestry, the Minister drafted and submitted an offer to the Government of Quebec on August 24 this year. My question is this: Why are Quebec forestry producers being ignored today by Quebec Minister Albert Côté, at a time when they desperately need this money? Quebec forestry workers are sick and tired of waiting. Mr. Minister, are you going to do something? We know that our people in Quebec are ready!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked a very good question. It is true that on August 24, the Minister of Forestry sent the Government of Quebec a proposal for negotiating a forestry agreement. The reply we received recently from the Government of Quebec was that the Government of Quebec would determine its position in terms of its priorities.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is anxious to implement agreements in the forestry sector, based on the prevailing situation in that sector. Depending on the speed with which our government receives a reply, we may have to consider options other than this particular type of agreement.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

As he knows, in Saskatchewan, the Rafferty–Alameda dam proceeds without a completed environmental assessment. In Alberta, the Oldman River dam proceeds without a completed environmental assessment. In British Columbia, Alcan's Kemano II project, dams and diversions, proceeds without a completed environmental assessment.

Why should Canadians expect that Quebec's James Bay II dams and diversions will be subjected to a meaningful environmental assessment when none of the dams and diversions in western Canada are and when the National Energy Board has already approved the export licences for James Bay II power to the United States?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have already given the answer to that question.

In each case we want to ensure that the environmental concerns of Canadians are met. We are doing that in different circumstances and in different ways.

I can only say to my hon. colleague that the best way he and his party could help in this process is to support strongly Bill C–78 which is now before the House.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The National Round Table of which the minister and the Minister of Finance are members has already dumped on Bill C–78 and that process. I hope he is not suggesting that we should pass it as it is. It is a giant Swiss cheese.

Will the minister assure the House that the same full public inquiry and environmental assessment process that will be applied apparently to James Bay II will be applied to Alcan's Kemano II and that these assessments will be completed and made public before construction proceeds, even if that means delay, modification, or cancellation of part or all of these projects due to environmental concerns?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that this government will satisfy itself that the due environmental review is done in a way to satisfy the public's concern about the environment on all these projects.

TRADE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Supérieur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On June 13, he stated in the House that the Minister for International Trade would inform the Americans of this government's intention to renegotiate the memorandum of agreement on lumber, to eliminate the 15 per cent surtax. On October 11, the Minister for International Trade met his American counterpart. Could the Secretary of State tell this House, for the benefit of producers and workers in Canada's lumber industry, whether he honoured the commitment he made in June?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that we honoured the commitments we made here in the House. This is a difficult matter, as the hon. member and the House are well aware, and we will keep looking for ways to achieve the objectives of Canadian producers.

[English]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the industry and I have been hearing this song and dance for the last two years.

In the meantime another sawmill went into receivership last week. Another one closed before it went bankrupt. Seven mills have closed. Two thousand jobs have been lost.

Would the minister pass on to the Minister of Finance the message that this government's high interest rate policy is killing the industry? Will this government finally stand up on behalf of the industry and send a termination notice to the Americans?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member on seeking to cast blame very broadly for this difficult situation facing that particular industry. He has asked me a particular question. I have replied to it.

I have indicated to him that we are working with American authorities and indeed we are keeping in touch with the Canadian industry. We are also keeping in touch with the provinces affected which, as he knows, are very closely involved in this file. We have not made the progress that we hoped to make, but we continue to seek ways in which we can advance the interests of Canadian producers.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last week we were shocked to learn that a dam near Elk Lake in northern Ontario broke, spilling what one newspaper account called 10,000 dump truck loads of old mine tailings containing cyanide, arsenic, lead and mercury, into the Montreal River. This is a major disaster for northern Ontario.

What is the minister going to do about it?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are quite concerned with this spill situation. Through conversations with the ministry of the environment of Ontario and through press reports we see that there is extensive damage.

We have offered to be of help in the situation, but the hon. member must recognize that this is a matter for the provincial government to deal with. Should it want to indicate that this is a disaster situation then that would obviously trigger federal help in the issue.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, many residents in communities along that particular river have been told not to drink their water. I think it is either a responsibility or a shared responsibility of the ministry to seek some kind of action.

My supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Northern Ontario has literally thousands of old mines that have been closed down, similar to the one in question.

Is the minister monitoring these other closed mines to ensure that that kind of disaster does not happen again in the future? If not, will he commit the House to undertake such an endeavour?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question.

The monitoring under the mines act comes under the responsibility of the provincial government. I am also pleased that my parliamentary secretary phoned the provincial Government of Ontario, asking it to get on with monitoring the work. I appreciate the work that he has done.

I would hope that the provincial government of the NDP, having said what it said in the past about the environment, will now get on with the job and the responsibilities it has.

HOUSING

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing.

In federally subsidized co-op housing projects across this country, 9 per cent of the units are occupied by high income Canadians, those earning over $50,000 per year.

This is an abuse of a program meant for low and medium income Canadians, effectively shutting out the homeless and many needy Canadians from affordable housing.

Will the minister give consideration to either a policy of encouraging high income Canadians to move out of these co-op projects or a policy of charging them market rents?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member is one that is being asked by many Canadians: when so many low income Canadians are on waiting lists for assisted housing and housing dollars are scarce and understandably Canadians do not want to pay any more taxes, is it fair that high income Canadians should occupy assisted housing?

Central to the whole question of co-op housing is a philosophy that there be a mix of low and moderate incomes in each co-op housing project. Since 1985 it has been government policy to target scarce housing funds to the core and low income needy Canadians.

I will be making recommendations to cabinet before the end of the year, and of course we will be addressing this issue.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA.

Earlier this year the minister had this to say to me with respect to Technitread Ltd. in Glace Bay: "It is true that Mr. Dicenzo has those detractors who say that he was part of a failed operation and that was something for which he bore responsibility. If that can be proven conclusively and if there has been a mistake made, I will take full responsibility for it." I have in my possession, Mr. Speaker, two memoranda, one sent to the former minister responsible for ACOA, the Hon. Senator Lowell Murray and another sent to the present minister responsible for ACOA, in which the connection between Mr. Dicenzo's operation in Glace Bay was tied conclusively to his operation which had failed in Brantford. In fact, the conditions of the bankruptcy in Brantford were very clear. The minister was aware of them because he signed "I concur" on the memorandum.

• (1500)

Now that it is clear that this government has handed out $1 million of taxpayers' money to a shyster, is the minister now prepared to accept responsibility and do what any responsible minister does in a parliamentary democracy and resign? Is he prepared to do that?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I was thinking how much better this latest exposé would have been on television if it had the hon. member for Nickel Belt as moderator. At least we would have a bit more accuracy.

I did undertake that I would look into the allegations. I have done this. There has been no federal funding advanced since the time the hon. member brought this to my attention in committee.

I want to remind my colleague opposite that this particular matter is under investigation, that the amount of moneys advanced is not as great as has been alleged by certain individuals, that there is security available for the realization of some of these funds. I think in fairness he would want to wait until the investigation is over to see whether or not the situation is as he believes it to be.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. I am not asking about an RCMP investigation, I am asking about the minister's responsibility. This matter was brought to the minister's attention by the hon. member for Churchill long before we raised it in committee. Yet $1 million was advanced—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would like to pursue this on another day.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

KEMANO COMPLETION PROJECT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, you will be in possession of a question of privilege that I filed with you extensively in writing dated October 22. I would like to quickly summarize what I feel is the pith of the question of privilege.

I believe a series of events which concluded on October 12 of this year have violated my ability to represent my constituents and have violated precisely and specifically my freedom of speech.

If the members would look at page 13173 of Hansard of June 27, one will find that an agreement was reached that no changes to the 1984 cabinet guidelines order, more commonly known as the EARP guidelines, would take place until the Canadian environmental assessment law was in place, known in this Chamber as Bill C–78.

On October 12, 1990 the Cabinet met and this agreement was violated. The 1984 guidelines were violated because Alcan Kemano II dams and diversions were exempted from environmental assessment.

My freedom of speech is violated because I have informed my constituents over many years that based on two facts; first, the June 27, 1990 House agreement, and second, the public statements of the Prime Minister, Ministers of Fisheries McGrath, Fraser, DeBané and LeBlanc, all five of whom publicly endorsed a full public inquiry and environmental assessment and review of what is known as the Kemano II or Kemano Completion Project, that there would be a full public environmental assessment and review.

This exemption of October 12 violates the ruling of the Federal Court on the Rafferty–Alameda dam. It violates the unanimous ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal on the Oldman River dam in Alberta. Now three leading federal scientists have gone public, revealing the nature of political intervention to overrule environmental concerns.

This is the same project which had to be ordered by the Supreme Court during the 1980s to release enough water to allow fish to spawn.

If agreements reached and confirmed on the floor of Parliament are without substance, and I refer to the June 27 agreement, I believe that is a violation of freedom of speech and the ability of any member, particularly an environment spokesperson in the opposition, to carry out his duties.

If the promises of four ministers of fisheries in a row, along with the promise of the present Prime Minister, are without substance, this I believe is clearly a violation of freedom of speech.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to find any substance in the arguments of the hon. member, when you link freedom of speech to a decision that a government can by law make.

He talks about an agreement being broken. Any person who cares to look at the facts will remember that the agreement, which the hon. member refers to, was simply that any proposed changes to the EARP guidelines order would be discussed with the special committee examining Bill C–78. That was the agreement, that if the EARP guideline order was amended, then it would go to the committee.

In this instance, the Kemano completion project guidelines order is a separate order pursuant to section 6 of the environment act and not an amendment of the EARP guidelines order.

Anyone who cares to look at this will realize that these are the facts. I submit with respect, Your Honour, in no way are the privileges of the hon. member infringed.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The matter which the hon. member for Skeena has brought to the floor was set out very extensively in a letter from the hon. member to the Chair, for which I thank him.

I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Skeena. I also read the letter and the material very carefully. I have listened very carefully to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Whatever one might have to say concerning the events which the hon. member for Skeena has put forward to the House and been responded to by the hon. minister of fisheries, I cannot find that all of the events taken together, or any single one of them, meets that test of privilege which is diminishing, or prohibiting, or preventing the hon. member for Skeena from doing his duties as a member of Parliament.

Therefore I have to rule that it is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On September 28, 1990, the hon. member for Shefford rose on a question of privilege concerning a statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announcing the launch of the Hibernia Development Project, the press release of that statement and certain news reports based on the announcement. The hon. member compared this situation to the question of privilege concerning the advertising of the Goods and Services Tax and my ruling of October 10, 1989.

I would like to take this opportunity at the outset to thank all those hon. members who made interventions: the hon. member for Shefford; the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader; the hon. member for Kamloops; and the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

[English]

In his presentation the hon. member for Shefford described quite succinctly the situation which existed last year regarding the goods and service tax advertising campaign and accurately summarized the Chair's ruling on that very serious matter. He then went on to liken the situation in 1989 to the September 14 statement of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and its coverage by some of the media.

• (1510)

I would like to thank the hon. member for providing the Chair with a copy of the minister's statement which I have read very carefully.

The hon. member pointed out that certain television reports indicated that the project would begin immediately. He also stated that the premier of Newfoundland had said that Bill C–44, the Hibernia Act, had already been passed. The crux of the hon. member's argument was that the press release and the way it was reported gave the public the impression that the government was using Parliament as a rubber stamp. Parliament was being disregarded and ignored unless all parliamentarians were being insulted.

[Translation]

As was the case with the GST advertisements, the Chair must look at two issues. First of all, has there been a breach of privilege insofar as the press release and certain media reports prejudice the work of the House? Secondly, does this matter constitute a contempt of Parliament because it is inferred that the House is merely a rubber stamp with no role to play in the final go ahead of the Hibernia Project? I would refer hon. members to my lengthy ruling of October 10, 1989, on the GST advertisements and to the ruling of December 18, 1989, on a related question.

While superficially there may be a similarity between these issues, at their heart the two situations are very different.

[English]

Having read the Hibernia development press release and some of the media reports, as well as the testimony of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before the legislative committee on Bill C–44 and before the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, it is abundantly clear to the Chair that there was no attempt on anyone's part to mislead this House, or to imply that the passage of Bill C–44 was a fait accompli. The thrust of the press release of the minister's statement was that the Government of Canada and the other parties to the project had resolved all outstanding issues in their negotiations and that agreements binding all parties had been completed. These agreements would, to quote the press release, and I am now quoting exactly the press release, "now go into escrow, where they will be held by an independent third party until they can be signed formally following the passage of Bill C–44, the Hibernia Act, by Parliament this fall".

[Translation]

The statement leaves no impression that legislation has not been submitted to Parliament. The reference to the role of Parliament is not ambiguous and even press reports noted that the completion of the deal was contingent on the passage by Parliament of the enabling legislation.

[English]

One aspect of this issue which may appear confusing to the media and the general public is the fact that work is beginning on this project before Bill C–44 has been enacted. As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader and the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte both pointed out, start-up funding for the project from the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Development Fund has already been approved by Parliament. This was also pointed out in the minister's statement. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte also noted, quite rightly, that if Bill C–44 is not enacted, the project will be shut down when it runs out of interim financing.

[Translation]

It is contingent on all levels of government, on parliamentarians and on the media to explain to Canadians, as carefully and completely as possible, complex issues such as the funding of the Hibernia Development Project. It is my view that the minister's press release was careful (in tone and content) and clearly respected the role of the House of Commons. Accordingly I must rule that there is no prima facie case of privilege.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

TABLING OF REGULATIONS RESTORING BENEFITS FOR SELF-EMPLOYED FISHERMEN

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the regulations restoring benefits for self-employed fishermen and, particularly, the regulations on the 10-to-14-week variable entrance requirements governing the eligibility of independent fishermen for unemployment insurance benefits.

I am tabling this document pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) and Unemployment Insurance Act section 130(3).

[English]

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in both official languages an Order in Council appointment which was made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), it is deemed referred to the appropriate standing committee.

LEBANON

ASSASSINATION OF DANY CHAMOUN

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to request the unanimous consent of the House to adopt the following motion, which is seconded by the hon. member for Fundy—Royal. I move:

> That this House, in this time of sadness in Lebanon over the death of political leader Dany Chamoun, extends its sincere sympathy to the people of Lebanon and that this House continues to pledge its support for sovereignty, independence, and peace in Lebanon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

FOOD AND DRUGS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to present a petition today. The petitioners reside in Scarborough, Thornhill, Mississauga, Oakville, Toronto, and Etobicoke. They are concerned about the labelling on packaged foods.

As a result of some tragic deaths in Canada of young people who had very severe allergic reactions, the petitioners insist on having some action on the part of this Parliament to enact legislation amending the food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in pre-packaged foods, in place of the general classification that is presently in place.

The petitioners are also calling on restaurateurs and food retailers to provide to customers a list of all the food ingredients and additives in their prepared foods served in the restaurants and available through the food retailers.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this petition is certified correct as to form and content by the Clerk of Petitions which is signed by almost 5,360 people from the cities of Cambridge, Kitchener–Waterloo, Hamilton, and the surrounding area.

These petitions were collected as a result of a rash of convenience store robberies. It was a group of citizens who co-ordinated their efforts. They have petitioned for a revision to the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquent Act with the lowered maximum age of 13 years.

• (1520)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and indeed a pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents from various communities in Ontario who are opposed to the government's decision to impose a special tax on reading material. The petitioners point out that this will make Canada virtually the only country in the world that has a tax on reading material, newspapers, magazines, books, and so on. They are asking the government to refrain from this initiative.

Second, Mr. Speaker, on another topic, I have quite a number of petitions signed by people from Kamloops, Logan Lake, Clearwater, Birch Island, and Red Lake, British Columbia, who are all concerned that the government's decision to proceed with the goods and services tax.

The petitioners state that it goes against the better interests of the Canadian economy. They point out that this tax will be inflationary and, consequently, will result in higher interest rates and, therefore, lower disposable income leading to a further worsening of the recession. They are asking the government to back off from proceeding with the 7 per cent goods and services tax.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Once again, Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present yet another petition against this dastardly tax, the goods and services tax.

I add the names of these people from various points in Ontario to those from across Canada which I have already presented to this House, who ask this government to reject the proposed goods and services tax and cause the government to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

CABLE INDUSTRY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition with signatures collected over the Labour Day weekend in my riding. It is concerned with the cable industry in Canada.

The petitioners point out that cable companies made an average of 32 per cent profit on fixed assets in 1988, or more than twice the level of the regulated telephone companies and that cable prices increased by 6 per cent annually between 1984 and 1988. The petitioners ask that Parliament adopt Bill C–284 and apply rate–of–return regulations on the cable industry.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting four petitions on behalf of citizens from across Canada who—no surprise—are opposed to the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that it is an unfair and regressive tax and that the government is now going to be taxing reading material, haircuts, diapers, and heating oil. They pray that the tax reform system which the government would bring in would be one that taxes people fairly and puts a minimum tax on corporations and those who are able to pay. The petitioners insist that if there is an imposition of a sales tax, such as the government is proposing, that it have broad consensus and that it be reformed in such a way that it does not also become a massive tax grab.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the pleasure of rising in the House to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia who are wishing to have the federal government rescind the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that the Prime Minister and the government has completely lost its mandate at 15 per cent in the polls. There can be absolutely no justification for implementation of such an unpopular, regressive tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to recognize the hon. member for Fundy—Royal on a short point of order.

LEBANON

ASSASSINATION OF DANY CHAMOUN

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to take this opportunity to speak briefly to the motion that was unanimously adopted by the House and put forward by my colleague from Ottawa Centre. I wanted to advise that I joined with my colleague in seconding this motion because I felt it important that we urge all the parties involved in the wrenching turmoil in Lebanon to come to grips with the root cause of their agonies.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chamoun's death is another reminder that the violence in the Middle East will continue until the main issue is dealt with in a fair and acceptable way. The responsibility for that rests with us all.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order to which my hon. friend has just spoken. I simply want to associate myself and my caucus with the motion put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. Of course, it is in all of our interests and we hope and pray daily that sovereignty, independence, and peace in Lebanon becomes a reality soon.

I simply want to say, on behalf of my caucus, we associate ourselves with the previous comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On behalf of our caucus, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that we are very proud of our member for Ottawa Centre and that the initiative he took today had our unanimous consent. We took it for granted that there would be no debate. But if we are to have a debate, we too support this proposition. In fact the unanimous consent of the House was sought and obtained, therefore the matter is closed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, unanimous consent was sought and obtained. The hon. member was the seconder of the motion and I thought I would give him an opportunity to say a few words.

I think that that is it. We will go to Questions on the Order Paper.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we too gave our unanimous consent so there would be no need for a debate because we fully agree with the contents of the motion, especially with respect to Lebanon sovereignty and the quest for peace. We express sympathy for the afflicted families. It should be obvious that all members of the House—including those of the Bloc québécois—support this highly commendable motion.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all notices of motion for the production of papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, October 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. de Cotret that Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate at second reading stage, having had an opportunity to sit on a committee with other members on a pre-study of this bill.

As a former chairman of the Committee on Fisheries, Forestry and the Environment, I feel that perhaps what is already in existence is probably good enough to start with and that we should make it stronger rather than weaker. This bill is not strong enough. I just want to explain the reasons why I feel that what is already in existence is strong enough. The departments and the responsible authorities, perhaps, did not realize there are already, in existence, guidelines that have to be followed.

I had a very real experience in my own constituency which started in the summer of 1988 with an ACOA grant, of all things. No one would think that the giving of an ACOA grant would be of such importance to residents of a given community and create such a stir. This happened to be an ACOA grant for an aggregates plant in Southwest Nova. This plant grinds rock and makes gravel and entails a lot of run-off and a lot of air pollution because of the crusher and other equipment. The grant was substantial. We do not get too many grants of that size. The grant from ACOA was over $800,000.

At the time, I suggested that there should have been an environmental impact study on the giving of money under that grant to that particular site in view of the public concern, which was given no opportunity to be aired.

Oddly enough, the grant was announced in September. The Department of the Environment satisfied itself with ACOA action in a letter in November of that year after the grant had been approved, but before funds had been given out. I thought every opportunity should have been taken by the Department of the Environment or at least have a hearing to allow the people to state their concerns over the giving of public money for a project where there was definitely opposition.

The odd thing that happened after the little encounter that I had with the Department of the Environment and ACOA was that on May 22, 1990, an exclusion list was put forward under the existing law. We have an environmental assessment and review process, and yet we have an exclusion list brought forward by ACOA for any future funding. It presented its exclusion list to the Department of the Environment.

This is exactly what is wrong with this bill. There is not enough power in the Ministry of the Environment, or the new agency, to totally reject a project and force the Governor in Council, cabinet, to defend a decision that is contradictory to a review recommendation or where the Minister of the Environment or the agency which will be set up under this bill could totally reject the project. Then we would have to see the basis of whatever the cabinet felt was the values involved in the project in order to go ahead with funding.

That, in my opinion, is what is lacking. There are no teeth in this bill to make the government accountable for a project in which it is overstepping the bounds of its own act.

Let me tell you that the definition within the bill is very commendable. The preamble is very commendable. The purposes of the bill are commendable. You can summarize clause 4 in three parts: first, to ensure the careful consideration of the environmental effect of federal projects; second, to encourage actions which promote and maintain both a healthy economy and a healthy environment; and third, to safeguard against serious transporter environmental effects.

We have gone over the Rafferty-Alameda dam project in this House and we have seen the ineptitude throughout the whole process with the courts saying that a review should have been done before the federal government took part in that process, issued the licences or gave out any money of any type. There was no review in the court sent to the government.

Today, we have a government that is scared to take away the licence of that project because on one hand, it is scared to do it, and on the other hand, it has not followed its own process. It may have a contract, and it may have set up a review process. Obviously, something is wrong when there is this mix-up what with continuation of that dam project that we have seen in the last two weeks, and the Saskatchewan government totally ignoring the federal Minister of the Environment.

I cannot emphasize enough that this bill does not allow the agency to reject outright a project. It only allows the agency to review a project after the project manager, the responsible authority, the government department that wants to fund that project, after that government department does the screening. That is the way I understand it. The agency can say it goes along with whatever the recommendations are, and there is no need to go further. If it says some areas are being violated, it can set a mediation or a panel review. But at no point in the screening can it reject it totally. There must a mediation or a review panel.

The whole object of this bill is to try to find a negotiated settlement to environmental concerns. I do not think that the people in Canada want to see negotiated settlements if there are real concerns about the environment with respect to projects funded by this federal government.

I congratulate them that it put in a section so that we can get into discussions with provinces as to concerns over jurisdiction and transboundary concerns with the Americans on joint projects and studies. That will happen only if those parties want to become a party to the federal process. This bill will be studied again, but there are so many things that weaken it that I truly feel that a prestudy of the bill should have been done before second reading.

Some of the things that weaken it are references to being able to set up mandatory lists of projects, exclusions to lists that must be reviewed and the criteria of what will, under regulations, be excluded. I refer to clause 5 of the bill where there are projects to be assessed. There are four subclauses to clause 5. These are the type of projects that should be assessed: a project proposed by a federal authority; a project financed in whole or in part by a federal authority, unless a project was not identified at the time of financing and the federal authority would have no power with respect to the project after it was identified; a project requiring the transfer or lease of lands by a federal authority unless the project was not identified at the time of the transfer, and a project for which a federal authority issues a permit or a licence, grants an approval or takes any other action in order to facilitate the project. These are the things which would trigger the projects that should be assessed. Then you go to clause 55 and these are the regulations. It refers to the Governor in Council. That is our cabinet or any cabinet of the day, which has a great discretion. I pick out three of the clauses that it may make regulations about.

Under subclause (b) it may make regulations about prescribing a list of projects or classes of projects for which an environmental assessment is not required where the Governor in Council or the cabinet of the day is of the opinion that the environmental effects of the project are likely to be negligible.

What is negligible? Negligible to someone in downtown Toronto may be a $1 million project. In South West Nova that may affect 120 families. That might be negligible to someone in Ottawa. It is not negligible to the people in rural Canada. It is not negligible if it is going to destroy the value of their homes, their wealth and their environment. That is what that ACOA grant did.

Under the present rules, they were able to put in an exclusion list as of May 22, 1990. I am sure no one at ACOA ever thought that their projects had to be screened. I remember, having been on the committee when that regulation was passed or prior to it being passed, that any government project had to be looked at to see if there was an environmental effect and, if so, what effect it would have in the dispensing of that money.

So, negligible in clause 55 has a lot of interpretation. A $1 million grant might be negligible in Edmonton, but it is not negligible in southwestern Nova Scotia. If you talk to the people in Lockeport today, you will know that $1 million will go a long way toward helping them achieve some type of stability in restoring their livelihood.

Subclause (d) prescribes a list of projects, or classes of projects, for which an environmental assessment is not required. Remember this is the governor in council, not the agency. If you gave the new agency the ability to decide this, you might feel that they were putting the environment first, rather than a cabinet formed from different responsible authorities and different departments, as under the act. This is giving it to the governor in council, it is not giving it to the new agency. The governor in council in subclause (d) may make regulations prescribing a list of projects, or classes of projects, for which an environmental assessment is not required, where the governor in council—and remember, Mr. Speaker, we only have one minister from Nova Scotia—is of the opinion that the contribution of the responsible authority to the projects through the exercise of its powers or the performance of its duties or functions is minimal.

I wonder what it would do with Point Aconi where it was only the Department of Fisheries that had a federal responsibility in the environmental process. I wonder what it would do with the Nova Scotia tidal power project that is in existence today and kills thousands of fish. The government was told in the past that that project would kill fish. It also caused erosion. The government is going to make it into a sanctuary for ducks now that the fish are destroyed in the river. There would not have to be a review because it might be considered minimal in the sense that this government's policy as it relates to fish is anything goes.

Look at the west coast. We saw it last week. Look at Point Aconi. There was no problem with the fisheries and obviously it is a prescribed attitude of this government that if it does not affect the big, then it will not worry about the small. If the big companies are not complaining, it will not worry about the small people who may complain. We just have to look at free trade and the ads about that, even though communities are dying because of the free trade agreement.

I want to go back to the responsible authority and describe for my constituents and others across Canada what happens. The responsible authority, the departmental minister or deputy minister, or someone, because not all projects go to the ministerial level, screens the project, sends it to the agency and the agency either sets up mediation or a review panel if the agency feels there should be one. If the agency feels that there is nothing wrong with it, it can go ahead as long as there is public notice given, and public notice in Canada means The Canada Gazette. Ordinary Canadians do not read that gazette to find out what the Government of Canada is proposing. Unless there is someone who wants to talk about it, who wants to bring it to the attention of people, we will not know, because if it goes back to ACOA, it does not have to tell anyone who it will fund or what it will give. It is usually after the fact, after the announcement that you get the concerns of the people.

The Minister of Finance may like this legislation because he has more control over the costs of expensive review processes. I have seen expensive review processes happen. I have seen one happen in the last few years. A most qualified group of people looked at it and gave a report that was positive. Yet we will never have that type of review again. The government would not follow it because it had its own agenda.

As long as we give no power to the agency to reject totally, let the Governor in Council defend the project for Canadian people and then let the Canadian people decide if a decision of the Governor in Council is right or wrong, if that power were in the bill, I could go along with its purposes.

However, as long as they narrow the purposes of this bill so that there are no teeth in it, there is something wrong with trying to pass it when there is already a process in existence requiring every agency in the federal government, before they take part in any project, to have a review of the project as it affects the environment. If they are not going to give it teeth, I think we should go with the status quo, and we know the courts have said that they must have a review.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the hon. member's speech on this important bill. I am encouraged to hear that she also is opposed to the passage of the bill in its present form.

The deficiencies in Bill C-78 are evident for anyone who has read the bill, although there was a lot of hype when the bill was first introduced and there was a lot of hope among Canadians that we would finally have a real environmental assessment process to meet the challenges that face us in the 1990s and on.

Some of the deficiencies that are evident are in the whole process design of environmental assessment. The process must be effective in guiding and encouraging and, where necessary, forcing environmental responsibility into all stages of the conception, planning, and approval of environmentally significant undertakings.

The member was speaking as a member from Atlantic Canada. She mentioned the Point Aconi process where it is evident that the environmental assessment was not followed. There is another Atlantic Canada initiative, the whole Hibernia undertaking. There is a significant amount of taxpayers' money going into it, and there is no test of sustainability in either one of those projects.

I would like her comments on particularly the Hibernia project involving billions, of taxpayers' dollars. We know who pays the majority of the taxes in this country. It is ordinary Canadians, to a far greater degree than large corporations. I would like her response to those two projects, Hibernia and Point Aconi.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the member's question. I will say this about Hibernia: we in the east do not get too many major projects. This is one of them. Oil and gas in the east is perhaps one of the future areas of development, particularly if we relate it to the fisheries, what is happening on the east coast, and this government's attitude toward the fisheries.

In oil and gas there have been effective actions on the environment on Georges Bank. When it wanted to put an oil rig there or go out to look for development, the people in the area rejected it. The fishermen rejected it. The citizens in the southern end that I represent did such a fine job of opposing it that there were no rigs on Georges Bank.

• (1550 )

There have been studies on Hibernia. I am not as close to Hibernia as I am to Sable Island or to Georges Bank.

If there are people in Newfoundland who are satisfied with the process that was used on Hibernia, and the government is satisfied with the process, then I cannot say—and I have not seen too many people in the east opposed to the process used on Hibernia, and I say that quite honestly—they have weighed the environmental consequences of the development of Hibernia.

I might have a different view from some of the people who are going ahead with it. I also know that at one time the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was doing some of the exploration for oil and gas on the east coast. There were studies done about what was to be done in the event of a crisis in the water in the future: who was to pay the costs, and things like that. I know that there was a very intensive study done. I know that every segment of industry on the east coast took part as far as Hibernia was concerned.

I can agree that as a federal government or a provincial government we do not make people aware enough of just what is going to happen and whether or not our decisions are based on a full evaluation of the consequences. I say this because people do look at the jobs that can be created. That is the present day concern. The review process, the safeguards, and the safety nets were not considered in the process before.

As far as some of the fines and the penalties that were brought in for any sort of destruction of the environment by oil companies are concerned, they have been set in the process. Maybe after five or six years we should be looking at some of it in terms of the destructiveness of such a project.

I certainly am well aware that the Canadian public is never as aware as it should be until after the fact. I do not know if there is not a role in here for doing this. I welcome in this act the follow-up to anything that has been reviewed and anything the mediator or the review panel has put in; but people must know that there is a follow-up program and what their rights are under it.

As well, under this bill there is a fund for people to take action. We do not know how much money will be put into the fund, whether it is only an injunction or whether one can proceed right to the Supreme Court. I can only say that there is a lot more we can do to make people aware and allow people to weigh the consequences of a decision by cabinet, by governments, whether provincial or federal, as to their environment.

In my own province they may not follow it, but at least there is a guideline that people know each step of the way where to go to intervene, as is being done presently for development on Digby Neck.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that I am sure the hon. member has studied the bill with care, I find it difficult to understand how she could reach the conclusion that this was, in her words, "toothless legislation", particularly in light of the fact that those who are writing on behalf of the Dutch government—and I think that we all understand that the Dutch government has a world-wide reputation for being leaders in the field of environmental protection—wrote a letter of August 3 to Mr. Robinson who is in charge of FEARO. They said in part:

> Bill C-78, it is not the most exciting name but the content counts. We, the whole EIA-department, would like to congratulate you and FEARO with this milestone.

They continued:

These new elements will bring Canada back to the lead in EIA regulation! And give us inspiration for new developments.

That is an extremely noteworthy compliment to be received from a government for which we at least on this side of the House have a great deal of respect. With all deference to the hon. member, it would seem to me that this individual who is head of EIA department in the Dutch government is an individual whose views I would certainly hold in great esteem. I am wondering how the contrast could be so great.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Holland, Mr. Speaker, is a very small country. Its government may think that this legislation looks good and maybe it would like to have it there. However, this legislation is not as strong as the existing guidelines wherein one had to do something in order to be in compliance with them.

This time the responsible authority will screen. It will go to the agency. The agency will make a decision as to how much further it goes, but the agency does not have the teeth to reject. I do not see that it has much power.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow along on that point because we have seen the track record of this government when it comes to national standards. It seems to retreat from national standards.

I want to cite specifically Bill C–29 respecting the forestry act wherein we have a definition of sustainable development. That is the national standard. Presumably Bill C–29 is the national forestry standard for this country which has been put forward by this government. Time after time we have seen where the provincial standard is lower and yet our standard is subservient.

Does the member not think that without the necessary teeth to rule supreme on this act we are going to see a situation evolve across this country where we have 10, 11, or 12 different standards?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I would say definitely we will have 12 different standards. The most important point about this legislation is that if the government of the day decides that water is not important then chances are it is going to destroy the water.

It allows the Governor in Council to make the ultimate power to control the process. I think we should have the guts, the boldness, and the leadership in a country this size, with the natural resources at our disposal, to enhance our environmental review process, and to give the minister or this new agency sole discretion to make the decision as to the effect on the environment that the project will have, and then have the government have the guts to say to the people: "We are going against that."

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I am fully prepared to proceed with debate. However, my colleague from Prince Edward Island who represents the riding of Egmont is ready to proceed.

I would only ask, on this point of order, if the Minister of Finance would be kind enough to remain for the rest of the day so that he will have an opportunity to hear my speech first-hand. Then perhaps he would respond with some questions and thereafter we could have a good debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak on Bill C–78 today, an act to establish the federal environmental assessment process.

The purpose of this bill was supposed to be the creation of binding legislation to ensure that environmental assessments are carried out on certain projects within the federal jurisdiction. It was designed to replace the federal policy on environmental assessment and review known as the "guidelines order" which has been in effect since June 1984. Under the guidelines order environmental assessments are discretionary.

• (1600)

All major projects defined to fall under the provisions of this bill will have to undergo mandatory environmental assessments. The assessment process would be transformed from a recommended course of action based on guidelines to a binding and statutory one.

However, in a decision rendered by the Federal Court of Appeal on March 13, 1990 the question as to whether or not the guidelines order was binding or discretionary became subject to interpretation. The court basically ruled that a federal minister had responsibility to comply with the guidelines order and that the guidelines order was intended actually to bind the minister in the performance of his duties and functions. This actually means that the minister is bound by the process but the result is not binding.

This decision and an earlier one handed down by the Federal Court on January 24, 1990—this was a case which involved the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the federal Minister of the Environment and had to do with the Rafferty-Alameda dam project in Saskatchewan— were landmark decisions that greatly influenced the federal government's decision to go ahead with this piece of legislation.

Many observers claim that these two Federal Court decisions have conferred on the guidelines order new powers which are fully backed by judicial precedence. It is against this new background that we have to balance and compare the provisions contained in Bill C-78.

This was a long-awaited bill. The people of Canada had been promised legislation over six years ago. They had been promised a bill which would take the oft expressed goals and ideals of the government and translate them into something concrete, into something that people could look at and say our government is really concerned. These people thought they were getting legislation of substance and with teeth.

The people of this country who are legitimately concerned with the state of our environment, who are legitimately concerned about the kind of world we are going to pass on to our children, who have listened time and time again to this government's boast that Canada is a world leader in environmental protection, are a very disillusioned group today. Their great expectations have been dashed. This bill has both disappointed and angered every environmental group in the country, including environmental law experts.

What has happened, Mr. Speaker? What has gone so wrong so as to provoke such a barrage of criticism, such a massive condemnation from individuals and groups with such expertise in environmental matters?

The flaws begin early. They begin in the preamble. An environmentally conscious public has demanded that we establish sustainable development as a major goal. This government has regularly paid lip service to this goal. Yet the term "sustainable development" does not appear. Much of the text alludes to sustainable development but we seem to have another example of aversion to precise terminology.

For several weeks the Minister of Finance refused to use the infamous r word; this despite the fact that everyone else in the country knew we were in a recession. Everyone including the Minister of Finance discussed the policies that caused the recession. Everyone including the Minister of Finance discussed the economic horror stories that were beginning to unfold because of the recession, yet the minister refused to admit that we were in a recession. Finally, the minister has come to grips with reality. He finally used the terminology the country was familiar with. He finally admitted Canada was in a recession and further admitted it was a good thing for this country.

Now the Minister of the Environment says he is talking about sustainable development, but he refuses to use the term. Why such an aversion to precision, to a definition of terms? The Brundtland report defines sustainable development as "development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs."

Is this the definition that the Minister of the Environment is using or does he have a different one? I would think that if the overriding purpose of this whole legislative exercise is the fostering of sustainable development, then we should at least have established exactly what it is that sustainable development means. Such statements as "ensuring that economic development is compatible with the high value Canadians place on environmental quality" and "to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration" are so vague and so subject to interpretation as to be virtually meaningless.

In addition to a lack of clarity in the purpose of the bill, there are further problems with some of the terms, including the restrictive definition of the term "environment" especially when one looks at the definition of "environmental effects".

Also included in this category would be the term "federal authority". Why are the commissioners of the Territories and the Council of Indian Bands not included?

The conditions set out in clause V for the review of a project are even weaker and more restrictive than the guidelines order presently in existence. The four new conditions in this bill would be, first, that the federal government is the proponent or initiator of a project; second, that federal funding is involved in the project; third, that the project is on federal land or affects federal land; and fourth, that federal approval is required, that is, a licence or a permit, et cetera.

The existing EARP guidelines order says, and I quote:

> These guidelines shall apply to any proposal that may have an environmental effect on an area of federal responsibility.

Clearly the conditions in this bill are weaker than those in the old legislation. Time prohibits a detailed analysis of every clause in the bill, but I think the point has been made. Bill C-78 does not satisfy the legislative requirements necessary to protect our environment. Public interest and public concern in environmental matters are so great at present that environmental impact assessment has to be a priority item for this or any other government.

In view of the importance and the urgency of environmental impact legislation, we cannot be satisfied with an imprecise, toothless piece of legislation such as the bill presently before us. While regulations required to implement the bill have not yet been drafted, we really have very little idea of the scope of the legislation.

When the Cabinet has such wide-ranging discretionary powers so as to say just "trust us", we do not have a legitimate bill. We are putting the onus on environmental groups and concerned individuals to create such a hue and cry on every issue that the government would have to react.

There are simply too many discretionary situations in this bill. Granted, many of the "mays" in the old guidelines order have been replaced by "wills". However, we now have expressions such as, and I quote, "where deemed appropriate" and "in the opinion of the responsible authority". These types of Cabinet discretionary powers are not acceptable in an area of such vital importance to all Canadians.

The degree and the ferocity of the condemnation of this bill is really not surprising. Highly reputable groups have unanimously rejected this bill. The Saskatchewan Action Foundation for the Environment says the proposed legislation intends to completely eviscerate the laws of Canada as they presently exist under the EARP guidelines order as interpreted in the Rafferty-Alameda and subsequent cases; and the foundation goes on to say that in fact, a comparison of the legislation to the briefing documents issued by the federal government discloses that the government is saying something and doing exactly the opposite.

The Manitoba Environmentalists Inc. says the legislation needs a major overhaul. They say "there are so many problems with this bill it needs a virtual rewrite. The intent of this bill is to return environmental assessment to yesteryear". Not a very good recommendation.

A conference of experts which met in Ottawa in early October harshly criticized the proposed legislation. Elizabeth Swanson of the Alberta Environmental Law Center said: "This legislation will undo everything that has been achieved in recent court decisions".

In addition to all of this, on Tuesday of this week the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, a group established by the government in March, 1989, made public its advice to the Prime Minister on how to strengthen the new environmental assessment reform package. Key to their report was an emphasis on public participation in all phases of the assessment process. Public confidence in the process has to be established and above all the government must be accountable to the public for its entire environmental assessment operation.

The evidence is overwhelming. This bill does not meet the expectations of the people of Canada. It does not measure up to the expectations of its own appointed environment and economy committee. It is so seriously flawed that it should be withdrawn and redrafted, or the government must be prepared to accept major amendments in committee. Their track record in accepting opposition amendments does not lead me to expect very much in this regard.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the need to define sustainable development in terms of the Brundtland commission as an appropriate location for such a definition.

I wonder if he would address himself to the second paragraph in the bill where it says:

> Whereas environmental assessment provides an effective means of integrating environmental factors into planning and decision-making processes in a manner that ensures that present needs are met without compromising the ability to meet the needs of future generations;

Would the member not recognize in the latter part of the sentence the very definition of sustainable development as used in the Brundtland report?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question.

If the definition of sustainable development is a very important aspect of the legislation, why has the government refused to give a definition and to include that definition as part of the bill?

What is the government afraid of? Why is it so afraid to be bound to a strict interpretation which could be incorporated in the bill so all Canadians will know exactly what the government means when it says sustainable development. Why does it not put the definition in right now?

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the member's speech on Bill C-78. I was heartened to hear him bring up the whole issue of definitions and the importance of definitions in this whole debate. What we are talking about is sustainability. Sustainability is a term that requires greater focusing on definition.

We must also define more broadly what the term environment means. We must adopt a broader term to include the social, economic and cultural environment as well as the biophysical environment. The term "environmental effects" also has to be broadened. The definition must be included to the long-term individual, additive, synergistic and punitive effects.

I am quoting from a paper by Dr. Robert Gibson who is with the department of environment and resource studies from the University of Waterloo. I recommend this paper to the government. It is entitled The Basic Requirements for Environmental Assessment Processes. Although I was opposed to the bill before I read it, it heightened my opposition to Bill C-78 because the evident flaws in Bill C-78 became all the more clear having read this paper.

This is a bill that is fatally flawed. I agree with the member's assessment that it should be withdrawn, completely redrafted and brought back. It is so shot full of holes, as my hon. colleague from Skeena points out—he entitles it Swiss cheese—in his usual colourful way he has encapsulated the whole problem with the bill. It is shot full of holes and should be withdrawn from the Order Paper. Otherwise, I recommend that members such as the previous speaker vote against it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the previous point that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment made.

He brought up the point about sustainable development being in the bill. Once again this government thinks that we on this side have not become aware of the trick that it is using. There is a preamble to a bill which describes it in general and then there is the body. It is only when we have the words in the body of the bill that it really has teeth and substance.

I want to ask the hon. member's view, again, on this national standard question. I happen to believe with the words "sustainable development" left just in the preamble, when it comes to enforcing standards coast to coast, the bill does not really have any teeth. I repeat, does the hon. member not agree with me that, once again, this is going to weaken the national standards for this very important issue?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the clarification he has just made. Canadians, right across the country, are looking for a precise definition of what sustainable development is and what is the actual contents of an environmental assessment.

In Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, there was an EARP recently done on the fixed link between P.E.I. and New Brunswick. This whole thing about the fixed link was begun by two ex-ministers, people who are no longer with us today, but the seeds that they have sown are still with us. The ex-Minister of the Environment was prepared to go to build a fixed link, even without an environmental assessment. This was a federal Minister of the Environment who was willing to take on a really crucial and a major project in eastern Canada, without an environmental assessment review, because he was willing to do it for political purposes.

Anyway, cooler heads prevailed and the environmental assessment review was done and reported. We were really no better off after the assessment than before the assessment. People in Prince Edward Island still do not know whether the link is an on project or an off project. What Canadians are looking for is to know when a project is environmentally feasible and when it is not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

It is with some regret that I have to enter this debate at second reading. I feel the haste with which the government is moving on this bill is a little bit unusual. It really cannot be justified, given the arguments that were presented by the government some time ago.

What is set in place by this legislation must be as tight as it can possibly be. We have to ensure that we have the best possible legislation because what we set in place here with Bill C-78 will likely stand for many, many years to come. And our environment is perhaps the most important area of concern for this government and all future governments.

As a father with two small children who are going to inherit the world that we leave behind, I feel very strongly that the work that we do in the House now to protect our environment is very important for their future.

The environment must be a sincere government priority and that requires action and not just words on behalf of the government. Those actions mean a very strong and sincere piece of legislation which will stand the test of time. It takes time to make the legislation do what we want it to do. It takes time to get good and adequate legislation. Let us take that time. Let us take the time to ensure that we do it right.

I am reminded of something that I was told as a youngster by person I admire very much. That person told me: "If you do not have the time to do something right the first time, when are you going to get the time to do it over again?" In other words, we cannot afford to make mistakes at this juncture.

As I see it, the government is rushing through this legislation in the hope of completing it quickly in order to get on with other business when, in fact, this proposed legislation should receive the most intensive study we give any bill in the House. In environmental matters, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that we will get the time or the opportunity to do this over again.

• (1620)

The existing process obviously is not working. The existing guidelines that are in place obviously are not working. The dispute over the Rafferty-Alameda project in my own province is just one example. An editorial that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 22, 1990 blames both the federal and the provincial governments for the problems that exist. It blames the legislation and the process that governments are following for the problems. The Winnipeg Free Press claims that both the federal and provincial governments are heedless of the environment and the law. I quote:

> The sight of bulldozers moving earth near Estevan in complete disregard of federal law is startling. So too are the allegations from a Saskatchewan official that his development agency has every right to move earth because the federal environmental review process is mismanaged and worse than a sham.

That is a quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of the day before yesterday.

The allegations that exist there deserve a reply and a public hearing. We have had a review panel in place for eight months on that project. They claim they need more time. I am not in a position to say they need more time, but they are on the spot and they know what they need. The federal government, the federal process, must allow for the proper and adequate environmental protection process to occur.

The Winnipeg Free Press editorial concludes:

> It may be a long time before the dust settles on the issues at stake in the Rafferty and Alameda development. The dinosaurs have made a good mess of them.

The dinosaurs being the people in charge of the environmental process federally and provincially.

The process is what we are talking about in Bill C-78, and the process is what is crucial to this whole process, this whole project.

The government earlier had set up a pre-study committee on Bill C-78. That pre-study committee was to look at the bill and what was happening within the industry within the country, and to try to make the bill the best that it possibly could be before it came into this House for second reading. Here we are at second reading on the bill and the pre-study committee on Bill C-78 has yet to hear a single witness.

The pre-study committee, though, has met. It has established memberships. It has elected a chairperson. It has hired a clerk, a researcher, and a lawyer. It has established a schedule for hearings, identified witnesses, and contacted those witnesses to establish a specific schedule for hearings.

That pre-study committee is being pushed aside by the House discussing Bill C-78 in this second reading debate. That is one of the main reasons why I regret having to stand in my place here today to discuss this bill, before we have had the opportunity to hear the testimony of the expert witnesses, and the interested and concerned groups and individuals out there. It is one of the reasons I believe that the government is acting in haste to get this legislation passed. That pre-study committee obviously was important to the government, to the opposition, and to the people of the country just a few months ago. Why is that pre-study committee not now so important?

The government has brought in Bill C-78 for second reading, ignoring that reference to the pre-study committee and it appears to be rushing to get this legislation through as quickly as possible. With its bent toward closure, Mr. Speaker, I would bet that we are going to see closure on Bill C-78, too, in the very near future.

The House and Canada want this bill to be as good as possible. There is no reason to rush this through. There is every reason in the world to hear all the evidence and testimony that is being prepared to come before the pre-study committee.

Since the government had set up a process that would ensure adequate and proper study, we should be following that process and not trying to pre-empt it. We have to do this correctly because, as I said before, we will not have the time to do it again.

Earlier today in Question Period, my colleague from Skeena, the NDP's environmental critic, raised the question with the Minister of the Environment. He pointed out that the new environmental assessment package that the government claims is the best in the world needs major changes because a top level ecological forum said so on Tuesday.

The National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy was set up more than a year ago by the Prime Minister. It includes the environment minister and the finance minister, as well as business leaders and environmentalists. That Round Table on Tuesday recommended that the environmental reforms introduced by the government in June had to be tightened, that an environmental auditor be named, and that cabinet documents on the ecological implications of government decisions be made available to the public.

The chairman of that Round Table, Mr. David Johnston, principal of McGill University in Montreal, said that the changes are needed because the government departments that put forward the proposals to cabinet will also carry out the environmental assessments. "There is a need for public confidence in the process," Mr. Johnston said.

Obviously, these are the types of things that we need to be doing and working on in the pre-study committee before this bill comes to the House for second reading, discussion, and full debate in the Chamber.

The key to all this is that this debate has to be built around the best possible bill and that we do it in a process that has been established ahead of time.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I had indicated that the national forum had called for an environmental auditor to be named. I know that you are a well read individual. You will be aware that the New Democratic Party's task force on the environment, in its document released earlier this year, also called for an independent auditor.

It is worth noting that an independent auditor was mentioned in the original draft of Bill C-78. Somehow, in the final version that we now have before us, the presence of an independent auditor is not in place. I wonder why. We should be discussing that in the pre-study committee.

There are lots of things that are wrong with Bill C-78, and I should just mention a few of them here before my time expires.

The bill is actually less effective than the EARP guidelines which are currently in place. The bill undoes progress made through court decisions such as the Muldoon decision on the Rafferty-Alameda Dam. That is something that concerns me personally. The measures in this bill are left up to the discretion of the environment minister, making it difficult for the courts to order compliance.

Cabinet decisions and government policies in general are exempted from the law. Although intervener funding has been promised, it is not in the legislation so can easily be withdrawn. In addition, the level of funding is certainly not yet clear, if indeed it is available.

Crown corporations, such as CIDA and Export Development Corporation, are exempted and basic questions such as which projects will be reviewed, which ones will be exempt, and what rules will apply are not answered by this bill. This will be in the regulations that can easily be changed by cabinet.

These are all very important matters which have to be looked after before we can deal with this bill effectively in the House. We all know how much the public demands that the environment be paid its just due. Those demands are made, not because of personal fears. People are not out there collecting cans, glass and newspapers because they fear for themselves. They are making these sacrifices because of their care and concern for our earth, for our children who will inherit this earth when we are not here to say to them that we are sorry. It is the environmental assessment process, the protection that we put in law, that establishes the basis on which we can judge ourselves in the future. That is why this act is so crucial, and so important to the work we are doing today.

• (1630)

With that, I would like to bring my remarks to a close. In doing so, I would like to move an amendment to the motion on the floor. I would like to move this amendment, which I have written here for you, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-78, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, because it fails to include provisions which would apply to all projects or undertakings under federal jurisdictions and it also fails to provide for intervener funding.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the amendment proposed by the hon. member under advisement. Resuming debate. Questions and comments. The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the member's remarks. There is no doubt that we share a common view and a common vision as to how environmental assessment should be handled.

The hon. member spoke of his amendment at the very end of his remarks. I wonder if I could ask him to stand and elaborate as to the purpose of his amendment.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, thanks to the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard. The amendment basically deals with things that are not a part of the legislation which should be a part of the legislation.

The very important matter before us here, as I indicated in my remarks, is primarily that there are a number of things not in place that should be in the legislation, that we would expect the prestudy committee to put into the legislation before it is brought into the House for debate at second reading so that all members of this Chamber would have an opportunity to debate the best possible piece of legislation that could come before us. There is no question in my mind that as long as we are left with this process that we have here now, in which we are dealing with a very flawed piece of legislation, we do not have the best opportunity in which to address the matters that are of concern to all of us.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member keeps referring to what he calls a prestudy committee that should take place before the bill comes into the House at second reading. I think the hon. member will realize, if he checks his records, that the special committee to which I think he referred was struck late last June when the bill was before the House at second reading. The bill entered the House at second reading toward the latter part of June and we are now continuing that process.

I also hope that the hon. member understands that the many witnesses to which he referred in detail in a study will, as is always the case, take place in legislative committee after second reading. That has been the case with each and every bill that has been before the House, and there is no reason to expect it would not be before the House in this particular case.

The hon. member referred to the report of the Round Table. I wonder if it is the same Round Table which on October 15, 1990, wrote to the Prime Minister, and I quote:

> Dear Prime Minister, The National Round Table commends your government on the environmental assessment reform package tabled in the House of Commons in June of this year, and welcomes the proposed improvements to the federal assessment process.

Is that indeed the same report from the same Round Table, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank the the hon. parliamentary secretary for the question.

I think the government is trying to play some games here with this prestudy committee.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Taylor: It was obviously a very important committee when it was appointed in June. I have no question at all about the timing that the minister is referring to.

Mr. Fulton: First one in the history of Parliament.

Mr. Taylor: My colleague for Skeena indicates to me that this was the first prestudy committee set up in the history of Parliament so obviously it had been given some serious thought by members opposite and had been given a certain amount of importance. Hopefully, that was not just for public perceptions back in June. They now do not seem to put the same importance on that committee.

With regard to the games that I am talking about, Mr. Speaker, while that prestudy committee was appointed back in June, the chairperson of that committee was not selected and appointed until September 24, when Parliament came back into session here after its summer recess.

Mr. Fulton: Shame. Smoke and mirrors.

Ms. Hunter: Smoke and mirrors.

Mr. Taylor: Smoke and mirrors, Mr. Speaker. Smoke and mirrors.

The other part about this is that the prestudy committee could examine all aspects of this bill and in fact send back to the government arguments for change before that bill was introduced for second reading. It could be completely redrafted under its terms of reference.

The legislative committee would be responsible only for amending that bill clause by clause. In fact, a redrafting of the bill under the current committee structure in this House would be impossible and that is what we are left with now, if we are not allowed to carry on with the prestudy committee and then bring the bill back into this House for second reading.

I am hoping that the government is not attempting now to get debate along a certain extent and then invoke closure on this bill because, in their words, "Oh, there has been enough debate on the bill". Obviously, there has not been enough debate on the subject matter of this bill and we have to find ways to redraft this flawed and inadequate bill dealing with the future of our country and the future of the earth.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the member on his excellent remarks regarding Bill C–78. He is quite correct that the government is providing all of the smoke and mirrors that it possibly can in relation to this bill.

Let me paraphrase and requote one of the only witnesses who appeared before the special committee and that is Ray Robinson, the present head of FEARO, who pointed out that the existing 1984 cabinet guideline order which is in place goes further than Bill C–78 does in its present form.

How could a Parliament possibly consider passing a piece of legislation that does not go as far as the existing Order in Council? We are getting a lot of flim–flam from the government side.

We also have yet to hear from the Minister of the Environment who proclaims around the country that this is an important legislative measure. Well, where is the minister? The minister has never appeared before the standing committee on environment, has never appeared before the special committee on Bill C–78.

We are the first special committee this Parliament has ever had to redraft a piece of legislation pursuant to the recommendations of the McGrath commission which thought in terms of parliamentary reform. It was a piece of legislation that had a broad impact on the majority of Canadians. The committee should have been allowed to prestudy and redraft it, to have it come back before it completed second reading. In fact a democratically changed bill in terms of the entire principles that were within it could come back before the House, making the job of the legislative committee easier down the road so that only the fine tuning, the final amendments, need to be done.

I would like to come back to the member who gave such an excellent speech on this and ask him whether or not he thinks that there is some kind of stunt going on here from the government side, where it will be travelling around the country saying: "Well, we had a special committee. It sat from June until October", not bothering to say it only had a chairman for two days. It did not have a clerk until after the end of September. It did not hear the first witnesses until October, never heard from the minister. Would he not agree?

• (1640)

I wonder if the hon. member would have something to say about the kind of smoke and mirrors. Now the government apparently plans to bring in closure. It not even putting up any speakers. It says say it is the most important bill before the House and it does not put up any speakers. Interesting. I would like to hear from the hon. member about all this stuff.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I realize that I probably do not have a lot of time to answer the eloquent question posed by the hon. member for Skeena, but as a member of this House who has been sitting in on the preliminary meetings of the C-78 committee, I can tell you that we have been working and trying to obtain the presence of the Minister of the Environment before the committee. Last week was supposed to be the week in which the Minister of the Environment would appear before the committee. I do not know what has happened to the commitment from the Minister of the Environment to appear before the C-78 committee.

If the government is not putting a lot of attention on the C-78 committee, I see no reason why the minister would be bothered with spending much of his time appearing before the committee. I think that that is another bit of evidence which indicates that the government does not consider C-78's prestudy committee to be worth what it had intended it to be in the first place, that in fact we do have a smoke and mirrors game being played here. What we should be doing is reverting this matter to the prestudy committee and not discussing it at second reading here in this Chamber until we have a different bill recommended by the prestudy committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have considered the motion presented by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and I find it procedurally acceptable.

Resuming debate, I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to use this opportunity, rather belatedly, to congratulate you on your work as Speaker. I know you have been at it for several days now, but it is my first opportunity to wish you well in your position.

I rise to speak on this bill which is very important for all Canadians, particularly western Canadians, since we have so many projects that must be governed properly, unless there is a negative effect on the environment. I know the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, as a fellow westerner, feels the same way, that every step must be taken to guarantee the protection of the environment.

I was struck today during Question Period when two ministers, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, were asked about two important environmental questions, one concerning the pollution in Montreal River, and one concerning the more generic problem relating to older mines that stretch across the Canadian shield from the maritimes straight through to the Alberta-British Columbia border.

Since all those earlier generation of mines use the tailing process and use a great deal of chemicals which we now have found to be harmful to the environment, my question is a very straightforward one, what is the government planning to do?

The vacuousness of the answers—and I use those words advisedly—reminded me of the fact that despite that on the one hand of doing all these pretensions toward environmental impact, the lessons have not been learned by this government. In fact, this has not been incorporated into its daily life.

This has caused me to reflect on what is the difficulty here with this government in dealing with the environment. I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that this government does not understand how fundamentally the rules of the game have been changed and that Canadians are getting caught in a triangle they do not quite understand. They are getting caught in a triangle between the federal government in one corner, at times being the proponent of big projects such as the Hibernia project. In another case it is supposed to be the protector of the environment, such as in the case of the Rafferty–Alameda dam. In other cases it is just being a bystander, such as what happened in northern Manitoba.

Then in the other corner we have the provinces that are proponents of many big projects in this country. Some people estimate the total value of projects on the drawing boards in each of provinces to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $14 billion. Obviously a tremendous amount of wealth is at stake.

In the third corner is something we never had there before in this triangle. It is the courts. We have had to keep going back to the courts: the federal government to sue a provincial government, environmentalists to sue the federal government, environmentalists and citizens to sue provincial governments, private corporations to protect their interests, and environmentalists to take on the private corporations. Through this litigation and the lack of legislation we have had no resolve, no sense of a protection of the environment. Canadians have become pretty anxious about what is going on and what is the intention of their politicians: what exactly do we want to do with the environment.

The response of this government after years of debate and an idea that has been carried out in many other jurisdictions for many different purposes is to have an environmental assessment process; that is, to set up apart from politics a way of considering the environment, a way of protecting the environment, to give Canadians some sense of confidence that the environment is going to be protected by some people who are impartial, non–partisan, away from the fights of the floor of the House of Commons and into a more and more considered process.

Unfortunately that very process is being tarnished by the weakness of the legislation that we are being presented with. The government should consider the criticism of the opposition and think twice about handing us a process which is flawed in its spirit and flawed in its detail in terms of responding to the problems that have been discussed elsewhere.

We have talked perhaps too much in this House about specific projects in our own provinces, but if we look at some of the series of projects in the west—the Oldman dam project, the Rafferty–Alameda project, the projects in northern Manitoba, as I alluded to before, the protection of water, the water system at Shoal Lake for the city of Winnipeg— we will see that all of these projects have created either litigation or tremendous conflict.

One of the sad parts of the process is not only that we have the big headlines in the major newspapers and the top stories on the national news, but we also have a lot of local interests that are hurt by this insecurity because they do not understand the intention of the politicians. I know for example the ministers from the west who represent farming communities are very sensitive to this issue. These farming communities are dry. They need water, but at the same time we do not need to pay the price of environmental damage in order to give them water.

There is a conflict, a basic economic, social, value system conflict at stake here. We just cannot impose regulations. We just cannot impose laws. We have to make sure that people have confidence that the system being set up is going to protect their interests. If it is going to be non–political, if it is going to be arm's length from the government, if it is going to be a new agency located in Ottawa, this agency should be sensitive to the interests of local communities whether they be an Indian band, a small farming community or a more isolated part of the country which we do not even perceive at first to be a community. We also have to make sure that these people understand that the interest of the legislation is to protect them, as well as to protect the environment, and that they work toward consensus.

That is why, for example, it is so important that we state publicly and in writing as part of the legislation that the people who are going to be intervening are supported by the federal government. The cost of intervention for people from a small town is tremendously expensive, particularly when they do not have a lot of experience in these interventions and they have to buy high–priced experienced help who have appeared in front of these panels and appeared in front of other semi–autonomous bodies. If they do not have that resource, how can they participate? If they cannot participate, they are going to get hurt. If they get hurt, they are going to resent the federal government.

Instead of building up confidence, this type of legislation will do just the opposite. It will pull away confidence and make people feel that somehow or another they will be made more vulnerable to the whims of a federal government.

Why do we need a strong federal government to play a role here? In some respects it is one of the odd curiosities of what is happening in this debate in the last three or four years. It is the reason why we have edged toward this piece of legislation. As weak as it is at least it is the first step. It gives something to debate. We are sure the minister will contribute to the various committees and state in detail what is wanted. We have reached this stage because ironically the federal government has refused to act. It is the courts that have produced some action on some projects in western Canada.

• (1650)

The reason why we turn to the federal government is that we have come to realize that the provincial governments are proponents of industries such as the hydro-electric industry and of the biggest projects ongoing in Canada. As a result, it is in their interest to get projects on stream as quickly and cheaply as possible. They are not prepared, from anything that we have seen, to protect the environment.

One of the interesting quotes used in the House—and some members may remember this earlier in the debate—was the quote of the member for Winnipeg—Transcona. He said that he was very sorry that the NDP provincial government in Manitoba, in the mid-eighties, did not see the damage that to be done by the Rafferty-Alameda dam.

It does not matter which party is in power. There are dangers involved which have to be addressed for every party. No party, no matter what is its claim to fame in this House, has a provincial wing which does not understand the importance of the environment. It is important that the member recognize that his brothers at the provincial level are just as likely to make errors as those of another party. I am sure he will be vigilant in watching the provincial Government of Ontario to make sure it does not make similar errors; for example, that it will respond quickly to the crisis in the Montreal River area.

The provincial governments are taking this in any way, shape or form in a passive fashion. The provincial governments have been meeting to discuss the environmental review process because they know there is a lot at stake for themselves.

For example, on Thursday, April 19, representatives from Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Quebec, Ontario, and Nova Scotia met in Vancouver to develop a strategic response regarding the proposed federal Environmental Assessment Act and to try to see what moves they should be making to prevent the federal government from establishing greater authority in this domain. They asked the province of Manitoba before the election—and so it is not being discussed in a public fashion—to prepare a memo organizing the provinces against this federal intervention. What they wanted to try to establish is that the provincial jurisdiction must be domain and that the act must contain provisions for joint reviews based on a formula in which they could participate and which they can determine.

What the provinces have been looking for and what we must guard against when we are dealing with them—and hopefully they will come forward as witnesses in front of the House of Commons—is a grandfather clause for projects that are either under way or have previously been reviewed by a provincial process. In other words, there is a basic conflict that provincial governments are not willing to accept federal authority. We must make sure that the federal authority which is being established is tough and determined enough to establish environmental rules that will withstand the pressure from the provinces.

If this process were in place in 1984 or 1986 when this particular government started to discuss it, would the Rafferty-Alameda dam project have happened? My response is that this process is so weak that that project would have still happened. The reason why I say that is that in the end the minister still has the ability to intervene at the last minute and accept or reject the recommendations from this agency. This is not arm's length in the sense of being independent and being able to say for sure this project cannot go. This is in fact a very weak use of the words environment assessment.

Another issue that needs to be addressed when looking at this legislation is what is going to happen in the international domain. We find the legislation is silent on this issue. Canada spends billions of dollars a year offshore in Africa, Asia, and the Pacific Rim. Through CIDA and other development agencies such as the Petro-Canada International corporation governed by External Affairs, it gets itself involved in a number of projects, but it does not apply environmental assessment criteria to these projects; nor does the legislation speak to it.

The legislation allows Crown corporations to set their own criteria and allows the Canadian government offshore to negotiate or to ignore the very guidelines it applies to itself in this country. Our party considers that to be a major flaw in the efforts being made here.

There have been recent discussions by Probase International, a Toronto-based research organization interested in international problems. It reviewed, for example, the Three Gorges project in China, which will be the biggest hydroelectric dam project in the history of the world. Canada has been very active through engineering firms and through CIDA, in funding the engineering work.

Essentially the proponents of this project came forward with a very strong recommendation that the project should continue. Probase International went in with an impartial group of international experts. They looked at that project and for every set of recommendations, for every chapter, they had point after point after point of what had been missed by the original proponents.

This goes back to the point that governments cannot be both project proponents, actively trying to encourage a particular project and at the same time saying: "We will evaluate our own work". They cannot have it both ways. There is an obligation to the Canadian people to set up a more independent process.

This government has failed in this legislation to protect in any way Canadians from the ambitions of provincial and federal governments.

For example, in clause 22, the responsible authority is given wide powers to ignore or terminate the environmental review provisions of the act. The minister, who is the final court of appeal under the act, is given similar powers under clause 23. In clauses 34(a) and 34(b), the opinion of the responsible authority is the only factor necessary in deciding whether or not a project should proceed. As we see, this act is no more than a toothless paper tiger.

We cannot continue to exploit the environment at the rate at which we have done so in the past. Jobs alone, although jobs are so important particularly in small communities, cannot be the only priority. We have to balance our concern for economic growth with the need for our physical survival and the health of our planet.

To my colleagues on that side of the House the phrase "sustainable development" means a licence to push industrial exploitation to the very limits. We can see by just how much failure there has been in Winnipeg itself with the institute. We are still waiting to see it actually get off the ground and be operational in a way that is going to mean something, not only to Canadians but to people throughout the international community.

There are many other points which are weak in this legislation. I am very disappointed in the way the government has introduced it. The government had an opportunity during the summer to build up a coalition of support among well meaning and interested Canadians, people who would give them their time and thoughts, people who would encourage them to strengthen the legislation.

There is among Canadians in every community and in every walk of life a will to protect the environment. It is one of the last areas in which we can prove ourselves as politicians to be of goodwill toward this planet. We fail people in so many other ways and, if we continue to fail them in the area of the environment, it will be the blackest of black marks against this Parliament.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have been following this debate with considerable interest. It has become obvious that Bill C-78 is dramatically flawed.

I want to start out by saying to the hon. member who just spoke that I appreciate many of his remarks. I want to ask him what his thoughts are on this piece of legislation when applied to a very specific situation. In my riding, which borders on the Fraser River, we have had the CN Railways expropriate all of the foreshore and is in the process of putting in an intermodal yard.

• (1700)

It will end up being the biggest rail yard in Canada. It is being built right across the last freshwater marsh on the lower Fraser River. No environmental assessment has been done. It is jeopardizing the wildlife. It is jeopardiz-ing the quality of the water on the Fraser River. It is jeopardizing our valuable fish resource, and there has been no environmental assessment done.

We must recognize that CN is a tool of the government. It is part of the government system. It has ignored the environment. Once it got away with it, now other developers are starting to say: "We want to develop on that marsh. If the government can get away without any environmental assessment, why can't we?"

I would like the member's thoughts as to what changes would be necessary to this bill to ensure that if this legislation was in place, that developments such as this could not take place, and that the minister who would be acting on behalf of the CN in a conflict of interest situation could not intervene and determine when assessment would take place, could not stop an assessment from taking place, could not overrule an assessment.

What changes does he see are necessary to Bill C-78 to bring it into line so that we could go back to a community like mine and say: "We are going to pass an environmental bill in this Parliament that will protect the environment in Surrey, specifically the Big Bend on the Fraser River?"

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think the hon. member picks out a fatal flaw in the legislation, that is, for some reason Crown corporations such as CN are not necessarily subjected to the same conditions as private corporations. It is something to be negotiated between the corporation and this new agency. It is ironical that in some respects we have more control over our private corporations than a Crown corporation. Perhaps in its oddball way that is why it is trying to privatize things.

The point about changing the legislation is, first, to subject the Crown corporations to the same rules and regulations as the private corporations. There is no reason to make them exempt. They are not special in that sense.

Second, I think that having the minister's discretion at the end of a process—he may consider it being at the end of a rainbow and makes it at the end of the Cabinet. So, Mr. Speaker, you are subject to the political constraints of a government at a particular point in time. What we should be looking for is if for some reason that is rejected, if that does not end up in Cabinet for debate, for political shenanigans, it ends up somewhere else.

I think that the House of Commons committee should look at that as one of its primary concerns. Where can you take it if there is a disagreement between a minister and an agency? Mr. Speaker, you cannot just take it into Cabinet and let it have that final say. You have to do something more independent.

Third, we are all regional politicians, so this has a little self-interest attached to it. I am wondering what the merits are of automatically assuming this agency should be located in the National Capital Commission area. Mr. Speaker, the closer you are to the environment, the closer you are to dealing with these people's problems and the more you are part of that community, the more you understand their sensitivities.

One of the problems we have had in building up a more sensitive central government is that when we locate things in Ottawa, people lose their sensitivity to the region. So a project like that which is just a little spot on the map, if agencies were located closer to those little spots on the map, those problems would become more alive.

For example, just think if an agency was out in Estevan, how differently the Rafferty-Alameda dam project would have unfolded.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, this is a comment to the previous questioner from Surrey. He was making an interesting point about the Fraser River. I do care a lot for the Fraser River, although I am resident further north on the river than he, but as he explained—and he must be a plumber—everything runs downhill.

Mr. Karpoff: We get a lot of your sewage.

Mr. Worthy: It goes past Surrey and that, of course, creates a real concern for the residents of the lower mainland.

Mr. Karpoff: Baloney. Totally wrong.

Mr. Worthy: His discussion about the habitat on the Fraser has to be corrected. In the lower Fraser area, the Fraser River Estuary Management Program, with which I am sure the hon. member is very familiar, has evaluated all the habitat and industrial lands in the lower Fraser delta area. They are operating on a no net loss basis.

I am sure the hon. member would not want the people across Canada to feel that the people on the Fraser River will allow developments which will interfere with the habitat. In fact, the wildlife, the fowl, the animal and fish habitat on the lower Fraser is increasing every year, not decreasing.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member who just spoke does not want to leave the impression that there is no deterioration. Have you been to Surrey? Have you seen the intermodal yard? Have you actually gone and looked at what has been done on the far shore?

An hon. member: That's not a point of order, that's a speech.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order! Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre want to respond to the comments made by the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin?

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

That is an interesting point and perhaps the acrimony that broke out for a few minutes just shows how tender feelings are about the environment. I am sure the member feels concerned and yet feels he would do everything he can to encourage the minister through the parliamentary secretary to look after this issue in greater detail. I am sure the member would love to see that everyone in Canada appreciates just how open this process is and, given the fact that the member from the area does not understand this, perhaps the three of them can contribute to the environment a lot more wholesomely.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, a quick comment on the issue. The environmental assessment review process related to the P. J. Wooding ferrochromium undertaking in Port Hardy provided absolutely no intervener funding. The people who had to attempt to analyse this project had no money whatsoever. They were unable to hire anyone. They all worked full time. There was no money for telephones, faxes, or anything else. Would the member not agree that this kind of a handicap is an enormous flaw, and a failure to guarantee intervener funding is an enormous flaw in the bill?

On the other side, the government was prepared, through western diversification, to provide Wooding with about $10 million. B.C. Hydro was willing to put in several million dollars. On one side was an enormous amount of support and capital, and on the other side, were the concerned citizens who have to live with the mess down the road, absolutely nothing. This is a major flaw and an inequity in this bill that has to be remedied.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, very briefly please.

Mr. Walker: In ten seconds, Mr. Speaker. Its strategy is incomprehensible and the fact that it does not fund interveners is absolutely unreasonable.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome second reading debate today on Bill C–78, which represents, at last, a small sign that this government is beginning to address environmental decision–making. New legislation is this area is badly needed and I hope that this bill, flawed as it is, will begin the discussion necessary to bring this legislation to fruition.

Presently, environmental assessments are governed by the EARP guidelines order. Bill C–78 represents a Tory election promise of 1984 to update this process. This promise had been conveniently been forgotten and now, due to public and court pressure, is finally being addressed.

• (1710)

There are some positive elements in the bill but there are many other aspects which are deeply flawed and I would like to address some of these today.

I am pleased that the bill introduces mediation, financial assistance to participants and a follow–up program into the environmental review process.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there are several aspects of this legislation which give me great cause for concern. I wonder, for example, at the resistance of the government to mention the words "sustainable development" anywhere in the legislation and what that means about this government's commitment to this principle.

As well, I have problems with the degree of cabinet control over key elements of the review process and the failure of the government to specify the regulatory powers which will accompany the legislation. How these regulatory powers are distributed, who is responsible for what in the review process, what projects will and will not be subject to review, these and other questions are at the heart of the bill and will determine how serious the government is with Bill C-78 when it comes to environmental assessment.

The introduction of mediation into the review process is an encouraging step. When opposing parties in an environmental dispute can sit down in a less adversarial situation and come to a decision quickly and efficiently, we all win.

When a project is small or the environmental consequences are primarily local in nature, such as in the case of a municipal landfill site, a way of ensuring speedy and cost-effective dispute settlement is required. In these cases mediation may well be the ideal process.

Under the EARP guidelines order there is now no way to differentiate between large costly projects and more minor localized ones regarding environmental reviews.

Bill C-78 proposes a tool for accomplishing this and we will have to examine it more closely just to see how effective it is.

However, I have serious questions regarding the criteria which the minister will use to determine which individuals or groups will participate in the mediation process. How will these participants be chosen? Who will determine those that will be rejected, and what kind of appeal process will there be?

We must also ensure that the minister gives mediation a fair chance at success. Section 25(a)(i) indicates that the minister will decide beforehand whether mediation would be successful or not.

Regarding financial assistance to review participants, many have heralded it as a great improvement to the environmental review process. I agree. Bill C-78 provides for funding for each review even though the levels of this funding may vary. Hopefully this measure along with the mediation process will ensure the legitimate environmental concerns are adequately heard. Yet there is much missing in this aspect of Bill C-78. How much money will be committed to this is not known because, unfortunately, the details of the financial assistance program have not even been submitted to the Treasury Board.

A follow-up program is something which has been sorely missing in the present environmental review process and I welcome its addition. Under section 34 of Bill C-78 the responsible authority or the departmental minister takes the review report and decides whether a project will be carried out or not. If a project is to be carried out the responsible authority will have to design, inform the public of, and arrange the implementation of a follow-up program which would ensure the compliance and the enforcement of decisions regarding the project.

It makes no sense to me, though, that the final decision and the follow-up program is to be left solely to the discretion of the responsible authority and not the environmental minister or, better yet, an arm's length agency.

In the bill which claims to recognize federal responsibility in environmental assessment through the environment minister, it is strange that first, the environment minister is not obliged to press for a full panel review and, second, that the powers of final decision, implementation, and enforcement of review recommendations seem to be out of the environment minister's control as well.

The present EARP system allows individual ministers to follow their own agenda, even when the agenda varies from the environmental needs of Canada. I do not see how Bill C-78 changes this at all.

We are all familiar with the problems resulting from the present process which bestows to individual ministers the power of decision regarding environmental assessments. It is these problems which Bill C-78 is supposedly designed to address.

For example, the federal fisheries minister is responsible for the environmental review process when a proposed project may impact on water and fish life. This ministry has recently decided that the Ashfield landfill site proposal in Inverness County in my riding must go to a full panel environmental review. DFO has taken over a year to come to this decision, thus placing proponents.

and opponents of this landfill site and indeed the residents of all of Inverness County in limbo.

The people in Antigonish County, who are now seeking a landfill site or a way of disposing of their solid waste, may well have to wait a similar waiting period and suffer similar uncertainty with the same ministry regarding their plans to find a new disposal site for their municipal waste. This is causing a great deal of concern locally in my area.

This bill claims to eliminate this kind of problem by placing the power with the environment minister. The bill seems to mandate the environment minister only to initiate reviews, while the minister responsible for the project holds powers which include determining whether a full review is necessary, making the final decision, and overseeing the follow-up program. There does not seem to be any clear obligation for the environment minister's involvement in these latter stages.

This leads me to question the amount of control which the environment minister will actually have. The level assessment, final decision, and the follow-up program are instrumental to a review's authority. This severely weakens the impact of this legislation. Indeed, even Mr. Raymond Robinson, Executive Chairman of FEARO, admitted on October 4 to the committee pre-studying Bill C-78 that "having the minister responsible deciding what level of assessment his project should receive—is very much like having the fox in charge of the hen coop."

This is an aspect of the bill which I hope will be addressed and corrected during committee stage.

In addition, I have many concerns about the philosophy behind the bill and about the bill's effectiveness.

Although the government claims to support the principle of sustainable development, these two words are not mentioned anywhere in Bill C-78. The government attempts to explain this omission by saying that sustainable development is a concept that is very difficult to define precisely.

How can this government claim to support a principle which it admits it cannot define in its legislation? I believe this is a cop-out by the government.

Sustainable development is, in fact, definable. The Brundtland Commission defined it. Even though Bill C-78's preamble quotes directly from the Brundtland report's definition of sustainable development, the government did not take the next logical step and use those two important words. This seems to indicate the government's weak commitment to the principle of sustainable development.

Instead, the government has chosen to achieve an appropriate balance between the economy and the environment and to make sure that the two are compatible.

The government appears to view the economy and the environment as being fundamentally at odds. This is a dichotomy which in reality is quite false. Sustainable development is a principle which sees one interest, that of the economy, flowing from and benefiting the other. That is to say, the environment and the economy must be interlinked and are not fundamentally at odds.

New models of development must be created since the old ones are just not working. As long as the government legislation that we have before us continues to reflect this archaic mind-set, that the environment and the economy are forces at odds with one another and must be reconciled, no real progress will ever be made in achieving a fully sustainable future.

• (1720 )

The regulations referred to in clause 55 of Bill C-78 constitute the heart and the guts of this legislation. They ultimately will decide the scope of the bill's implementation and the effectiveness of this legislation in practice. Unfortunately, these regulations have not yet been specified and, if they have, those specifications have not been released. As a result, I have serious reservations about a piece of legislation which has been introduced without our knowing how the key regulations governing its implementation will work.

Among these regulations, which are mentioned in Bill C-78, are various lists upon which the bill depends on for its very implementation. There is a mandatory study list which will include classes of projects having significant adverse environmental effects. These automatically fall under review.

There is also an exclusion list which will contain projects or classes of projects which will automatically fall outside review.

As one of my colleagues stated previously, these provisions are big enough to drive a truck through. What about the Point Aconi project in Cape Breton? In which category does it fall? The federal fisheries minister has just decided it will not undergo a panel review. Would this project be included under the mandatory study list?

The Governor in Council will itself determine the contents of these two lists. It has yet to present them to Parliament or to the public. Once again, how can we properly assess this legislation without being advised as to the contents of these lists?

As well, these regulations can be changed without having to bring them before the House. That is another weakness in this bill.

We have been told that the government plans to lay before the legislative committee a list that would constitute the draft of these regulations. That is not good enough. This is a part of the legislation that determines how it will work and we should have an indication now of how these regulations will operate.

Why has the government not provided these details lists by now during public and parliamentary debate on second reading? The fact that the government cannot produce one in time for this debate does not bode well for the future. There seems to be a lot of internal lobbying going on, as various ministries presumably fight for their particular interests within Cabinet.

Although not part of the regulations, clause 5(b) presents another gaping hole through which projects may evade environmental review. Bill C-78 claims to ensure that all projects with federal involvement will be subject to an environmental review. Clause 5(b) excludes tax breaks aimed at particular projects as a reason to refer these projects to environmental review. A government may choose to provide tax incentives to projects, rather than devising financial subsidy packages so as to avoid environmental reviews on particular projects. This provision is a major flaw in the bill which, if the bill passes second reading, will have to be seriously amended.

The lack of specific regulations and the Governor in Council's complete discretion in formulating them brings to light another concern which I have about Bill C-78. In this bill, environmental screening, mediation, or review panel reports are merely advisory. Bill C-78 gives the responsible minister, and apparently not the environment minister, the power to accept or reject the recommendations of these reports.

Again, to quote Mr. Robinson of FEARO: "There is certainly no point in having a fairly elaborate process of assessment if indeed we are not going to pay attention to those decisions."

I find this disturbing, considering the track record of the present government regarding environmental matters.

Mr. Kaplan: It is disgraceful.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): It sure is disgraceful.

Mr. Marchi: How disgraceful is it?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): It is unspeakably disgraceful.

To assert that the government will take environmental reports and make the correction in light of public opinion is not certain in the least. It is obvious from the government's pursuit of the GST debate that public concerns mean nothing to the government between election campaigns.

Today, I have tried to outline some of my concerns regarding Bill C-78. The more I listen to this debate, the more I realize that the government should go back to the drawing-board before presenting this debate. It should present a more thorough set of regulations to accompany this bill and rethink many of the fundamental aspects of the bill. That is not to say that legislation is not required and the status quo is not acceptable. Legislation in this area is overdue and urgently needed.

The government has finally brought something forward, flawed as it is. I hope that this discussion will begin a process of coming to grips in Canada with a comprehensive and effective means of reviewing small and large environmental projects in a way that is effective and that allows for the full environmental consequences of projects to be taken into account.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my comment and question to the previous speaker concerns the environmental review process and the ability to assess social impacts. I refer again to the case of the P. J. Wooding ferrochromium proposal in Port Hardy, British Columbia in which the government failed to take into consideration impacts on native communities in the area.
